

TIBET DIGEST 2024

FOUNDATION FOR
Non-violent
Alternatives
To inform and shape policy on Tibet and the region

Tibet Digest 2024 offers a year-long compilation of key news and developments related to Tibet, Chinese politics, and Sino-Indian relations, as observed from January to December 2024. Curated monthly by the Foundation for Non-violent Alternatives (FNVA), this annual digest brings together the most critical events, policy shifts, and human rights concerns impacting the Tibetan plateau and its people. Drawing from open-source media, the 2024 edition provides a broad yet focused view of the ongoing challenges and geopolitical dynamics shaping the region.

www.fnvaworld.org
143, 4th Floor, Uday Park, New Delhi, 49
office@fnvaworld.org

Disclaimer: FNVA does not endorse "China's Tibet", "Tibet Autonomous Region of China", "Xizang" or any such phrase that denotes Tibet has been/is a part of China. Articles that contain such phraseology are news items from the Chinese state media and must not be confused as endorsement by FNVA

CCP'S TIBET POLICIES 93

December 93

China claims its highly dangerous, world's biggest hydroelectric dam in Tibet will pose no serious threat to downstream India	93
China suppressed a rebellion in Tibet due to the construction of a dam, reveals the BBC	94
Retired Party official exposes misuse of Quake-relief aid in Kyegudo	97
Video captures abuse of Tibetan student by Chinese principal	98
Alarms raised over removal of Tibetan language in college entrance exams	98
China's Rules through Ideologically Indoctrinating the Youth	99

November 100

Tibet Autonomous Region chairman reported to have resigned	100
Eying their mountain mineral deposits, China is relocating hundreds of Tibetan families citing landslide dangers	100
Tibet Leads China In GDP Growth In 2024	101
Patriotic Mandarin speech competitions in Tibet seen as undermining of locals' mother tongue	102
Chinese repression against Tibetan and other diaspora communities in Japan: HRW	102

October 103

China Tries to Blot out Tibetan Criticism of Mining Firm's Damage to the Environment	103
Artificial Chinese Cordyceps Threaten Tibet's Traditional Market, Livelihoods	104
China identifies over 4000 new tourism sites in Tibet's capital Lhasa	105
China reports more archaeological discoveries in Tibet	105
Chinese court rules in favor of Lhasa Public Security Bureau against Gonpo Kyi	106
Investigation of Tibetan officials in historical Dechen reveals rampant corruption in Chinese bureaucracy	107
Tibetan School Falls to China's Legal Pressure	109

September 111

In Tibet, China's plans to hike retirement age sparks concerns	111
China's Legal Warfare Closes a Beloved Tibetan School	111
China orders harsh crackdown on Tibetans ahead of 75th PRC anniversary	113
China's security chief convenes "anti-secession" meeting in Tibet	114
Tibetan streamer faces censorship and detention by Chinese authorities	116
China Launches Massive International Propaganda Effort on Tibet	116

August 117

Cataract incidences in 'Tibet' 60% higher than in rest of PRC amid lack of medical facilities	117
China's top political advisor calls for 'integration among all ethnic groups' in Tibet	117

Xi demands all-out efforts to carry out reform tasks	118
3 ways China is ratcheting up surveillance of Tibetans	118
China has impoverished Tibetan villagers by force- relocating them as ‘border guardians’	120
China’s efforts to boost Tibet’s economy benefit Han population, report says	121
China’s ethnic policy chief says minority artists must focus on common national identity	122
Chinese Social media platform bans Tibetan language, Tibetans condemn decision	123
Tibet is only provincial-region where road building is fully funded by Beijing	124

July 124

Tibetan parents forced to enroll children at state-run residential schools	124
China Brings Official From Tibet to Lead Banker Crackdown	125
China shuts down 30-year-old Tibetan school in Amdo Golog	125
Tibetans express anguish over China’s ban of Tibetan language on Douyin	126
China clamps down on social media ahead of Dalai Lama’s birthday	126

June 127

TIBETAN MONK DETAINED AFTER WECHAT POST	127
Tibetan political prisoner hospitalized following severe illness	127
China Using 'Discriminatory Surveillance Technologies' To Target Muslim Minorities, Tibetans: US Report	128
China reiterates conditions for talks it does not want to hold with the Dalai Lama	129
China says Dalai Lama must 'thoroughly correct' his political views	129
President Xi inspects Tibet Sinicization drive in Qinghai province	130
Former top Tibet official under probe for corruption	130
Chinese police arrest Tibetan for flying banned flag at his house consecration ceremony	132

May 132

EXCLUSIVE: Teen Tibetan Monk Takes Own Life After Being Forced to Leave Monastery	132
China issues manual banning activities related to Independence of Tibet	133
China to Punish Tibet Officials who Support Dalai Lama	134
Surveillance ramped up after anti-dam protests	134
China touts Tibet’s tourism development, ‘ethnic unity’ on 73rd illegal annexation anniversary	135
China’s United Front ensures CCP control over Tibet	136
Children Protest “Genocide Tourism” to Tibet	137
‘Tibet’ to supply clean electric power to 16 other provincial regions of PRC	137
China subjects Tibetans to political education for protesting, rejecting paltry compensation for their pastureland	137
Tibetans undergo political education for protesting land grab	138
Tibetan singer arrested for song lamenting Dalai Lama’s absence	139

Students banned from speaking Tibetan in Sichuan schools	140
Tibet to provide financial aid to Nepal's northern border districts for five years	141
April	142
Gonpo Kyi assaulted again, phone holding evidence of police brutality destroyed	142
Released from Arrest, Tortured Tibetan Monk Committed Suicide	143
China expels teacher for pushing for students to use Tibetan language	143
Campaign Against "Cults" Launched in Lhasa—But What Is a "Cult" in Tibet? (Cyber News)	144
Smuggled Protest videos offer a rare glimpse at resistance in occupied Tibet	146
Historic Tibetan Buddhist monastery is being moved to make way for dam	149
Chinese police mass killing: Over 20 lives lost in peaceful protests in Lhasa, Tibet	150
China blocks popular Tibetan-language blog	151
Lone Tibetan Protester Calling for Return of Dalai Lama Detained Incommunicado in Ngaba	152
Wang Junzheng instructs central media in Tibet to promote Tibet propaganda	152
CPC launches education campaign on Party discipline	153
China-ruled Tibet is second least free country, territory in rights group's annual survey	153
March	154
Former Tibet official from China awaits sentence for decades-long corruption	154
China's Tibet offers college exam takers a spot if their parents invest $400,000	154
China promoting Mandarin in parts of Tibet: Report	155
2024 Two Sessions show China will continue plans to Sinicize Tibet	156
Tibetan quarter in Chengdu under tight surveillance on uprising anniversary	159
Tibetan prisoner released with disabled leg after forced labour.	159
Three years on, whereabouts of Tibetan poet is a mystery	160
Tibet boarding schools: China accused of trying to silence language	160
China's continued crackdown targets Tibetans who might have sent out Dege dam protest videos	162
China's claim of no 'mass incidents' in 'Tibet' last year rejected	162
Over 1,000 people, including monks, arrested for opposing Dege hydropower dam project in Tibet	163
UN rights chief says China committing violations in Xinjiang, Tibet	164
New report says Tibetans lack representation in China's leadership	164
Authorities urge 'stability' amid restrictions on Tibetans due to dam protests	165
China imposes lockdown on seven monasteries in Kham Dege	166
China awards 12 top Tibetan Buddhist degrees in Tibet, compared to over 300 in India in last four years	166
Some Tibetans protesting against dam construction released after international coverage	167

February 167

Exclusive: Chinese authorities release dozens of Tibetans arrested for dam protests	167
Tibetans protesting against dam construction face violence and detention	169
Despite protests against dam construction in Tibet, Beijing is proceeding with its plans	169
Buddhist monks among 100 held in China over dam protests	170
China's biometric surveillance in Tibet matures to integration projects (Cyber News)	171
Gonpo Kyi stages sit-in outside court for justice for imprisoned brother	171
Unprecedented Tibetan Protest Against Hydropower Station in Sichuan	172
Report claims Chinese authorities spying on exiled Tibetans (Cyber News)	173
Journal retracts 18 papers from China due to Tibet and other human rights concerns	174
Tibetans in Eastern Tibet Protest Hydropower Station and their relocation	174
Chinese nationals moving into hitherto vacant 'border defence village' buildings in occupied Tibet	175
China Increasing Digital Surveillance of Tibetans (Cyber News)	176
China could use anti-fraud app to monitor Tibetans – report (cyber News)	177

January 178

Tibetan woman detained and beaten for social media posts critical of China	178
China in door-to-door drive to stop Tibetan children attending private lessons, practising religion	179
China sentences Tibetan man to 11 years for alleged spreading rumour	180

BUDDHISM 182

December 182

China deploys troops to enforce stringent new restrictions at biggest centre for Tibetan Buddhist study	182
China's ideology tsar views Buddhism reincarnation exhibition in signal to Dalai Lama	182
Tibetan Buddhist scholar released from Chinese prison	184

November 184

China's Panchen has concluded 5-month Tibet tour	184
Sacred buddhist mountain in China transformed into commercialized tourist destination	185
China Moves Tibetan Buddhist Monastery Students To State Schools   Exclusive	185
Monastic schools in Ngaba targeted amid crackdown on Tibetan-language education	186
Chinese scholars highlight Ramayan's footprints in China buried in Buddhist texts	188
China restricts young Tibetan monks in 'prison-like' schools	189

October 190

China Escalates Crackdown on Tibetan Buddhism	190
---	-----

China detained Tibetan youngsters for resisting transfer from monastic to colonial boarding schools 191

China's Sixth World Buddhist Forum to be held 15–17 October at Xuedou Temple, Ningbo 191

Authorities transfer 200 Tibetan monastic students to state schools 192

September 193

China jails monk for Tibetan uprising voice message, online display of Dalai Lama speech 193

Prominent Tibetan Buddhist monk sentenced to 3 years in prison 193

EXCLUSIVE: Area where Buddhist monastery stood now under water 194

China-appointed Panchen urges firm upholding of final party say on reincarnation issue 194

China's World Buddhist Forum aimed at boosting soft power: experts 195

China hosts meeting on reincarnation of Tibetan Lamas to reinforce government control 196

For Beijing, the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama must follow Chinese laws 197

China's Panchen reappointed to head 'Tibet' branch of PRC's Buddhist authority 198

August 198

Beijing-appointed Panchen Lama intensifies campaign against the Dalai Lama, promotes Xi's "rule of law" 198

Tibetan monks to visit Findlay 199

China to hold World Buddhist Forum in October 199

China-appointed Panchen promoted 'Three Consciousnesses' Sinicization of Tibet drive during Nagchu visit 200

China misuses law to demolish historic Atsok Monastery for dam construction 200

China coerces Kirti Monastery students into state-run boarding schools 202

July 203

China destroys monastery to expand world's tallest 3D-printed hydropower dam in Tibet 203

Tibetans forced to remove religious structures outside their homes 204

China graduates 320 more monks and nuns to promote Sinicization of Tibetan Buddhism 204

China's top leaders visit Tibet, seeking to assimilate Tibet's religion and children 205

China claims Tibetan religious rights protected, but reiterates right to appoint next Dalai Lama 205

China targeting Tibet's monasteries to student-populate their colonial-style boarding schools 206

China closes 2 Tibetan monastery schools, sends novices to state boarding schools 206

China now asserts 'natural' authority to identify Dalai Lama reincarnation 207

29 Buddhist nuns awarded "Chi Ram Pa" diploma in China's Xizang 208

June 208

China has 'natural' say in choosing next Dalai Lama, Tibet experts tell Beijing forum 208

China's Panchen visits Jokhang Temple in 'Chinese city of Lhasa' 209

China restricts key Buddhist event citing security concerns 209

REPORT: Sinicization drive pervades China's religious repression in Tibet	210
US report highlights China's policy of controlling all aspects of Tibetan Buddhism	211
Xi visits Tibetans and temple in western China, calls for ethnic unity	212
Dalai Lama's Remarks On Reincarnation Are A Slap On Xi Jinping's Face: Tibet Watchers	214
Beijing uses Chinese Buddhist group to transform Tibetan Buddhism: report	214
May	215
Beijing uses Chinese Buddhist group to transform Tibetan Buddhism: report	215
China cracks down on Tibetans during holy month	215
April	216
Controversy Erupts as China Restricts Tibetan Buddhist Practices in Dalai Lama's Name	216
China Gives Monks a List of Things They Can't Do After The Dalai Lama's Death	217
March	218
Tibetan monk who criticized China's policies released from prison	218
China 'pressuring' eminent monks and admn in Tibet to denounce Dalai Lama	218
China claims 'no idea' on monk it arrested for republishing books from exile Tibetan community	219
February	219
Exclusive: Chinese authorities release dozens of Tibetans arrested for dam protests (check if its duplicate)	219
Tibetans protesting against dam construction face violence and detention	220
Despite protests against dam construction in Tibet, Beijing is proceeding with its plans	221
China's Panchen gets an earful on perfecting his role to help Sinicize Tibet, Tibetan Buddhism	222
Buddhist monks among 100 held in China over dam protests	222
China's biometric surveillance in Tibet matures to integration projects (Cyber. news )	223
Gonpo Kyi stages sit-in outside court for justice for imprisoned brother	224
Unprecedented Tibetan Protest Against Hydropower Station in Sichuan	224
Report claims Chinese authorities spying on exiled Tibetans (Cyber)	225
Journal retracts 18 papers from China due to Tibet and other human rights concerns (Repeat?)	226
Tibetans in Eastern Tibet Protest Hydropower Station and their relocation	226
China arrests Tibetan monk for possession of Dalai Lama photo	227
Chinese nationals moving into hitherto vacant 'border defence village' buildings in occupied Tibet	228
China Increasing Digital Surveillance of Tibetans (Cyber)	229
China could use anti-fraud app to monitor Tibetans – report (Repeat)	230
Tibetan monk who criticized China's policies released from prison	231
China 'pressuring' eminent monks and admn in Tibet to denounce Dalai Lama	231

China claims 'no idea' on monk it arrested for republishing books from exile Tibetan community
232

January 232

Blanket ban reported imposed on new admissions at a monastery in Tibet 232

TIBET'S ECOLOGY & RIVER WATERS 235

December 235

Nagchu champions glacier protection on plateau 235

Tibet Adopts Clean Energy For Centralised Heating 237

Himalayas: Arunachal government deploys central forces to counter dam protestors in Siang Valley
238

Tibetan area in Sichuan hit by second forest fire in last 20 days 238

November 239

Global warming accelerates upward expansion of the alpine tree line in the Himalayas: study 239

China's dam projects in Tibet pose environmental and social risks, new report reveals 240

Regulations provide extra protection for glaciers 240

China speaks of greater protection for Tibet's glaciers, citing their alarming retreat 241

October 242

Lead pollution in a remote Tibetan glacier reveals far-reaching human activities 242

Researchers Catch Humans Living on the Tibetan Plateau Evolving in Real Time 242

Small areas of Tibetan Plateau may have outsize impact on East Asia's spring rains 243

Warmer winters mean world's highest places may store less carbon 244

Geologist Tracks Lead Pollution In A Tibetan Glacier, Revealing Global Impact Of Human Activities
244

September 245

National park in E China enhances biodiversity protection 245

Artificial rain (snow) operations in Tibet fill the gap, and large drones fly over Shigatse 246

750 meters! Chinese researchers set new record for environmental science drilling on Tibetan Plateau 246

Scientists find 1,700 viruses trapped in Tibetan Glacier 247

After millennia apart, these Tibetan lakes are now linked and could merge by 2030 247

Torrential rains, deadly flooding hit Tibetan areas of Qinghai province 248

August 249

Ghosts of the past: Global warming fears resurface as 41,000 years old viruses discovered in Tibetan glacier 249

'Over half of Tibetan Plateau's glaciers may melt by 2100' 249

Scientists drill holes in world's highest salt lake in Tibet for a glimpse into one million years of earth's history	250
Fast multiplying Tibet-Himachal glacial lakes could threaten lives, infrastructure	251
2 dead, 17 missing after flash flood, mudslide in Tibetan area of Sichuan province	252
China begins observation experiment on land- atmosphere interactions in Mt Everest region	252
July	253
Over-10,000-year-old stone tool site in Tibet a rare find	253
Tibet rain: Floods and landslides leave hundreds stranded	253
Extinct humans survived on the Tibetan plateau for 160,000 years	254
Taming the Drichu: China's Derge Dam Threatens Tibetan Culture and Communities	254
June	255
Urgent action needed to save Hindu Kush Himalaya, the world's 'water tower'	255
China's Climate Hegemony: Exploiting Tibet and Manipulating the Maldives	256
China sends glacial water from Tibet to the Maldives, raising concerns	257
Tibetan lakes are estimated to expand 50% by 2100: Chinese study	259
China Gold's Jiama mine in Tibet resumes operations	260
May	260
Lakes on Qinghai-Tibet Plateau growing rapidly, study finds	260
Warmer Climate Risks Societal, Ecological Impact on Tibet	261
China sends second consignment of glacial water from Tibet to Maldives	261
Ancient DNA Unveils Western Tibetan Plateau's Past	262
China targets Tibet to establish world's largest national park system	263
Study investigates extreme precipitation events across diverse regions of the Tibetan Plateau	263
Occupying Tibet's Rivers	264
China's Greed for Lithium is Killing the Tibetan Plateau	265
Inside the exquisite Tibetan monasteries salvaged from climate change	266
April	268
Wildfire destroys prized mushrooms, income source for Tibetans	268
Earthquake of magnitude 5.5 strikes Tibet, says GFZ	269
China's new gold deposit discovery in Qinghai, with 346 mining sites, is worth over $20 billion	269
This fungus that turns caterpillars into zombies is more expensive than gold. And it might go extinct because of it	269
The disappearing glaciers of the Himalayas	271
Half-Stopped Factories Become Norm in Chinese Lithium Battery Industry	272
March	273

Now China donates 1,500 tonnes of Tibet glacial water to Maldives amidst water crisis	273
Most eastern Tibet dam protesters reported released, endured severe ill-treatment, beating	273
Nearly 3400 villagers evacuated as forest fire rages in eastern Tibet	274
New study reveals plateau's evapotranspiration changes	275
Tibetans demand China halt Derge dam work	276
How land conditions affect the Asian monsoon climate	276
Construction of mega dams in Tibet worries downriver nations	277
Online reports of fatalities due to flood damage to dam in Qinghai province denied	278

February 278

Breakthrough in Qinghai: Cloning of Tibetan Goats Promises a Sustainable Future for Local Breeding	278
Shifting Skies Over the Tibetan Plateau: A Future of Increased Precipitation	279
Decoding Summer Rainfall Variations on Tibetan Plateau	279
Lakes in Himalayan Plateau gradually transitioning to carbon sinks from sources: Study	280

January 281

Indian Tectonic Plate May Split Tibet in Two, Says New Study	281
Jiusan Society Qinghai Provincial Committee: Study the ecological culture of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau and build an ecological civilization highland – Entertainment – China Engineering Network	281
New discoveries show Tibetan Plateau remained inhabited over 50,000 years ago	282
Nepal explores tapping flood-risk glacial lakes for clean power	283
Satellite Images Show China's Dam Threatening Neighbors' Fresh Water Supply	284
Climate change in South China Sea will have global weather impact: experts	285

TIBET IN EXILE 288

December 288

Condolences for President Jimmy Carter	288
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Congratulates Eriko Yamatani on Becoming Chairperson of Japan's Parliamentary Tibet Support Group	288
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Congratulates Hiroshi Yamada on Appointment as General Secretary of Japan's Parliamentary Tibet Support Group	289
Dalai Lama unlikely to visit Bodh Gaya this tourist season	289
Estonian Delegation Visits Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, Delivers Letter from Estonian Speaker	290
Dalai Lama's visionary leadership keeps Tibetan cause alive: CTA President	291
His Holiness the Dalai Lama Sends Condolences on the Passing of Former Prime Minister Manmohan Singh	292
Official Resolution of Solidarity Regarding the Critical Situation Inside Tibet	292

No interest in reviving talks with Dalai Lama's envoys from China: US Congressional Commission on China	295
Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel Congratulates Taiwanese Labor Minister Hung Sun-Han	296
The Congressional Executive Commission on China (CECC) Tibet Museum's 'Long Look Homeward' Draws	296
Press Statement from Tibetan Parliament on China's Sanctions Against Tibetan and Uyghur Advocacy Groups in Canada	297
7,000 Visitors, Highlights Tibetan Freedom Struggle	297
Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel Educates Students at Leadership Workshop on the Evolution of Tibetan Democracy	298
Co-convener MP Tapir Gao of All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet Speaks on His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Indian Parliament	299
China sanctions Tibetan and Uyghur advocacy groups in Canada	300
Dalai Lama Addresses Health Concerns Amid Succession Plans	301
Department of Education Commences Leadership Workshop for School Prefects and Captains	301
US Commission report highlights brutal rights abuses in Xinjiang, Tibet, Hong Kong, etc	302
Tibetan Leaders Advocate For Challenges Faced Under Chinese Rule in Delhi	303
Parliamentarians Migyur Dorjee and Pema Tso Commence Official Periodical Visitation	303
Dalai Lama set for extended stay at Bylakuppe Tibetan settlement	304
SFT France to continue protest as Musée Guimet refuses to rename exhibit to "Tibet"	304
Dalai Lama's office, Tibetan NGOs, CTA among top targets of cyber-attacks by China: Report	305
Japan's parliamentary support group for Tibet elects new leadership	305
Tibetan Youth Congress embarks on 15,000 km 'All India Motor Bike Rally' against China's "cultural genocide" in Tibet	306
Massive new Tibetan dictionary will help protect against Chinese encroachment	307
US Congress extends 'Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act' for five more years	308
All-Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet Adopts 12-Point Resolution on Tibet	308
ICT hails reauthorization of the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act in National Defense Authorization Act	310
Tibet advocacy group in Switzerland conduct awareness campaign on 35th anniversary of Dalai Lama's Nobel Peace Prize	310
Sikyong Tsering Strengthens US-Tibet Ties in Washington Meetings	311
Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Concludes Official Visit to Nepal	312
Kalon Tharlam Dolma Changra Graces Commemoration of 35th Anniversary of Conferment of Nobel Peace Prize on His Holiness at Tibet House, Delhi	312
MPs from New Zealand and Fiji Visit Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile	313
Department of Religion and Culture Secretary Attends Long-life Prayer Ceremony Offered to Kochhen Rinpoche	314
Tibetan Youth Congress urges Nepal to reject China's interference in the Tibetans' Religious affairs	314

Tibetan delegation meets Dutch officials to discuss Tibet crisis	315
A Delegation from India Foundation Visits Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile	316
UN Forum: ICT highlights erasure of Tibetan identity through the PRC's educational policies	316
Senior Journalists Visit Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile	318
Tibetan leader calls for independent Tibet as key to Sino-Indian border resolution	318
35th Dalai Lama Nobel Peace Prize anniversary marked with New Zealand, Fiji MP guests	319
Protest in Vienna Unites Tibetans, Uyghurs, and Christians Against CCP Oppression	320
Buddhists celebrate 35th anniversary of Nobel Peace prize conferment on HH 14th Dalai Lama	320
Tibetans and Tibet Activists Call On Nepal to Reject China's Illegitimate Panchen Lama Visit	321
ICT testifies at European Parliament's hearing on EU-China human rights dialogue	322
Tibetan Government-in-Exile condemns Chinese atrocities on 35th anniversary of Dalai Lama's conferment of Nobel Peace prize	324
Statement on International Human Rights Violations in Tibet and China's Systemic Breaches of International Standards	324
Students for Free Tibet observe World Human Rights Day, urge China to release Tibetan political prisoners	326
Tibetan admin in exile 'not concerned' by Trump's election. 'US support for Tibet is bipartisan'	327
Chairman of the Public Service Commission Karma Yeshe Successfully Concluded Week-long Outreach Tour	328
Indian government to recognise Bhoti (Tibetan) as one of the official language of Ladakh	328
Austria: Tibetan youth in Europe empowered to lead advocacy efforts at Vienna workshop	329
22nd North American Tibetan Associations' Conference Kicks Off in Washington DC with Sikyong Penpa Tsering's Keynote Address	330
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Commences Official Engagements in the United States	330
Speaker Emerita Pelosi to receive Light of Truth Award for unwavering support of Tibet	331
REPORT: China's rampant dam-building spree could dislocate up to 1.2 million in Tibet	332
Lower TCV school fails to attract Tibetan students living abroad, to shut down in December	333
Indologist who helped Jawaharlal Nehru to train army in Tibetan at Ladakh during Sino-Indian War, no more	333
Dalai Lama reflects on hardships and opportunities of exile at long-life prayer ceremony	334
Dharamshala facing potential drinking water crisis due to lack of rain	334
Parliamentary Committee to Review the Rules and Regulation of Parliamentary Procedure and Conduct of the Business of Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile	335
Dr. Lobsang Monlam testify before US Commission on China in Washington D.C.	335
Hollywood star Whitaker, well known for his charity work, visits Dalai Lama	336
Kyabje Kundeling Rinpoche Represents Tibetan Buddhism at World Interfaith Conference in the Vatican	337
Symposium on Enhancing Tibetan School Education Begins in Dharamshala	337
Tibetans in France protests against Musée Guimet for 11th time	338

Representative Tsering Yangkyi Makes Inspection Visit to Sunday School for Tibetan Language and Culture in London	339
Tibetan Artists Festival concludes with vision of forming Tibetan Arts Council	340
CM lauds pivotal role of Tibetans in preserving ancient Indian philosophy	341
Young Tibetans Gathered for Europe V-TAG Strategy Meeting in Stockholm	342
Tibetan government-in-exile flags 'colonial style' schools at UN forum	342
November	343
Inaugural Tibetan Artists Festival honours artists and intellectuals	343
Critical Schooling Situation in Tibet Raised at 17th UN Forum on Minority Issues	344
Sikyong Visits Tibetan Institutions in Mundgod, Implores Residents to Uphold Tibetan Spiritual and Cultural Heritage	345
Tibetan advocacy alliance lobbies Indian MPs with three appeals	345
G7 nations condemn China's human rights record in Tibet, East Turkestan, and Hong Kong	346
Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Led by Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel Continues Scotland Study Mission	347
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Attends the Enthronement Ceremony of the 105th Gaden Tri Rinpoche	348
TYC team embarks on bike rally to gather support for Tibet's cause	348
New 5-year programme launched of US support for south Asia Tibetan communities	349
USAID's Mission Director Steve Olive led Delegation Visits Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile	349
Central Tibetan Administration Hosts Symposium in Taipei on Building Common Ground with Key Allies	350
Tibetan Parliamentary delegation concludes London mission with key advocacy meetings on Tibet's global cause	351
Dharamshala: Tibetan monk transforming lives of slum children helping them through higher studies	352
Tibetan Sikyong's Portugal visit seen as groundbreaking	353
Tibetan Oracle delivers message of faith at WVSOM	353
Exile Tibetan delegation visits Westminster as PM Starmer seeks to cement China ties	354
Advocacy and Capacity Building to counter China's Transnational Repression in Europe	355
Tibetan leader highlights Tibet's struggle, role of global advocacy	357
Biden publicly mentions Tibet in final meeting with China's Xi Jinping at APEC	357
Parliamentary Delegation Continues Visitation Program in Arunachal Pradesh	358
Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Calls for Stronger Support for Tibet at India-China Relations Conference in Patna	359
Uphold Dalai Lama's values: Tibetan min	359
Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel Launches Book on His Holiness the Dalai Lama's Four Commitments	360
Tibetan Sikyong testifies in Catalan parliament commission as exile parliament outreach team concludes Baltic States visit	360

Chinese officials counter Tibetan diplomatic efforts in EU with propaganda tour	361
Tibetan Women's Association hosts tour in Dharamshala to highlight the plight of children, environment	362
Tibetans, Uyghurs welcome China-sanctioned Rubio for US Secretary of State	362
Seeking to counter Tibetan outreach, China sends propaganda team to Europe	363
Education Kalon Highlights Urgent Need to Preserve Tibetan Language in Her Children's Day Message	364
Red-House Indie Film Festival to feature documentary 'Un-titled' on Tibetans in exile	365
Exile Tibetan parliament members interact with Lithuanian, Latvian lawmakers, others in advocacy drive	365
Tibet Information Office Participates in seminar hosted by the Chinese Alliance for Democracy	366
Asian Buddhist Summit 2024 Focuses on Strengthening Asia Through Buddhism	366
China-linked group hacked Tibetan media and university sites to distribute Cobalt Strike payload	367
10th Young Tibetan Researchers Conference Held at Central Institute of Higher Tibetan Studies (CIHTS) in Varanasi	367
Tibetan Delegates Highlight Derge Dam Concerns on First Day of COP29 UN Climate Summit	368
Vietnamese Buddhist Sangha meets Dalai Lama, with invite for Vesak celebrations next year	369
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Visits Tibetan Institutions in Kalimpong, Addresses Tibetans on Key Issues Concerning Tibet	369
Tibetan MPs meet Czech lawmakers to discuss Tibet's struggles under Chinese rule	370
Tibetan MPs meet Czech lawmakers to discuss Tibet's struggles under Chinese rule	371
Tibetan environment activist highlights China's large-scale timber extraction	372
Tibetan parliament in-exile calls for UN research on 'damage that is being done by China' in Tibet	372
'Rivers of the Sky' Exhibition Highlights Mismanagement of Tibet's Vulnerable River System Ahead of COP29	373
Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang Meets Australia Tibet Council Delegation, Expresses Gratitude for their Support to Tibet	373
Tibetan translation of Barbara Demick's "Eat the Buddha" launched in Dharamshala	374
Europe Tibet Advocacy in Germany: Tibetan MPs Discuss Critical Situation in Tibet with German MPs	374
His Holiness the Dalai Lama Extends Congratulations to the U.S. President-elect Donald Trump	375
Department of Education, Central Tibetan Administration Unveils New Children's Books for Tibetan Children	375
Arunachal: TSGAP reiterates support to Tibetan cause	375
DIIR Expresses Gratitude to 15 Countries for Their Statements on Human Rights Violations in Tibet at the 79th UNGA	376
Deputy Speaker Meets FNVA Trustee and Tibetan Researchers	376
Central Tibetan Administration Convenes Three-Day Communication Strategy Meeting	377
Pioneering Tibetan IT outfit unveils five new stages at Monlam Manifest 2024	377

Chinese Liaison Officer Sangay Kyab Participates in a Conference Discussing Democratisation of China in Berlin	378
India Tibet Coordination Office Holds Tibet Awareness Program in Mumbai to Strengthen Advocacy for Tibet	379
BTSM protests against China	379
Tibetan delegation in Europe raises awareness on repression by China in Tibet	380
Representative Dr Tsewang Gyalpo Arya Concludes his Maiden Tour to the Philippines	380
Tibetan rights group demands information on four missing detainees in Ngaba	381
Modi-Xi meeting at BRICS draws cautious optimism from Tibetan leader	382
Over 140 global Tibet groups condemn Musée Guimet's cultural erasure of Tibet	383
For Tibetan political leader, 'Middle Way' to autonomy is still core focus	383
Tibetan Parliament Continues Europe Tibet Advocacy in Switzerland	384
15-Nation Joint Statement Demands China Address Human Rights Abuses in Tibet and East Turkistan	385
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Addresses Seminar Titled 'Charting Tibet's Future' in Delhi	385
Bengaluru: Panelists urge global action for Tibetan rights amid growing pressures from China	386
UK Foreign Secretary raises Uyghur's rights, ignores Tibet during China visit	387
Tibetan advocates highlight language suppression at UN Human Rights Council event	388
Tibet and Ukraine share struggle against colonial power: former CTA President in Kyiv	388
China should look for Mao's reincarnation instead of Dalai Lama, says CTA President	389
Documentary Film 'Never Forget Tibet' Launches in Brazil	390
Tibetan Sikyong meets with Czech leaders, Tibet supporters	391
Surveillance in Tibet: ICT delivers remarks at 6th International Religious Freedom or Belief Alliance Ministerial Conference in Berlin	392
Tibetan students face crisis as arrivals in India decline	393
An open letter to Foreign Secretary David Lammy	394
Tibetan leadership congratulates Japanese atomic bomb survivors on winning Nobel Peace Prize	395
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Attends the 28th Forum 2000 Alongside Former Taiwanese President Tsai Ing-Wen	396
Tibetans in France continue protest, condemning museum's refusal to rename exhibit as "Tibet"	396
In new film, Dalai Lama says inner peace is key to happiness	397
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Advocates for Tibetan Rights During Official Visit to the Netherlands	398
Tibetan nuns touring the U.S. spending six days in Lincoln County performing ceremonies, creating mandala	399
Tibet Museum Showcases Travelling Exhibition Alongside DIIR's Tibet Awareness Talks	400
Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang Meets with the US Embassy Staff	400

Tibetans urge NYC to add Losar to 'Alternate Side Parking suspension calendar	401
Exile administration issues guidelines for Tibet or China visits by Tibetans	402
DIIR Tibet Awareness Talk Reaches Thousands Across Indian Universities and Colleges	403
Open Letter to the co-founder of Rubin Museum of Art	404
12 Years After Dalai Lama's Previous Visit, MPs from Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile Coming to Kashmir	405
Chamgon Kenting Tai Situpa Rinpoche Visits Tenzingang Tibetan Settlement, Confers Teachings to Tibetan and Local Residents	406
Dalai Lama to visit Ladakh next summer	406
Sikyong Delivers Kashag's Message at the Celebration of 41st Sakya Trizin Kyabgon Gongma Dorje Chang Rinpoche's 80th birthday	407
Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Meets European Parliament Members in Belgium	408
Office of Tibet in Canberra and Alliance for Victims of the Chinese Communist Regime Organise Counter-event on PRC's Founding Anniversary	408
Department of Religion and Culture Achieves Key Milestones in First Year of Tibetan Digital Library Initiative	408
Top Paris museum has replaced 'Nepal-Tibet' with incorrect 'Himalayan World' to avoid mentioning 'Tibet'	409
Sikyong Visits Two Schools in Mussoorie, Advice Tibetan Students on Continuing Future Tibet Struggle	409
Dalai Lama praises Japan for promoting peace in world	410
Tibetan Student Unity Network Debuts on PRC's 75th Anniversary, Aims to Empower Tibetan Students	411
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Extends His Congratulations to the New Prime Minister of Japan, Honourable Shigeru Ishiba	411
30 Tibetans detained	412
Embassy in New Delhi targeted as exile Tibetans, others protest on China's 75th National Day	412
Office of Tibet, Nepal Hosts Three-Day Exhibition Showcasing Jamyang Dorje's Masterful Tibetan Calligraphy	413
His Holiness the Dalai Lama Confers Teaching on Tsongkhapa's Three Principal Aspects of the Path	413
The World Needs a Champion like the Tibetan People and the Guidance of His Holiness the Dalai Lama More Than Ever: Congressman Jim McGovern at Gratitude Event in His Honor	415
September	416
The Three Principles of the Path	416
Former Chief Justice Commissioner and Deputy Speaker Sonam Sangpo Jadur passes away at 85	418
Taiwanese devotees attend teachings of the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala	419
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Addresses Tibetan Community in Dehradun: Emphasises Cultural Preservation and International Support	419
China deepens repression in Tibet after passage of Resolve Tibet Act in US	420

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Talks on Significance of Tibetan Plateau and Tibet's Water Resources at Sambhota Tibetan School, Herbertpur	421
Tibetan activist begins 5th cycle rally for Tibet cause	422
Tibetan anthology feature showcasing stories of exile and identity to premiere at Busan Film Festival	422
Amid EU, others' criticisms, China claims over 100 countries' support for its stance on rights situation in Tibet etc	423
Additional Secretary Tenzin Lekshay Addresses Students and Faculty of the Central Institute for Higher Tibetan Studies on the Middle Way Policy	424
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Assesses Damages Caused by Heavy Rainfall at Puruwala Tibetan Settlement	424
Gonmo Kyi speaks out about her treatment in new video	425
Unclimbed peak in Arunachal Pradesh named after 6th Dalai Lama, Tsangyang Gyatso	425
European Union Reiterates Concern about the Continuous Dire Situation in Tibet and Calls for the Preservation of Tibetan Identity	425
French Museum removes "Xizang", reverts to 'Tibet' for artefacts after public protest	426
Tibetans and activists call for Tibet Intergroup at the European Parliament	426
Tibetan leader claims cultural identity threats from Chinese policies	427
Tibetan artist's installation 'Biography of a Thought' exhibited at Metropolitan Museum of Art	427
Renaming Tibet "Xizang": Are French Museums Backing Off?	428
Tibetan leaders respond to Biden and Modi's remarks on China at Quad Summit	429
Tibetan NGOs condemn defamatory video threatening the Dalai Lama	430
Tibetans rally in Paris against museum's use of Chinese term 'Xizang' for Tibet"	431
Central Tibetan Administration Launches Investigation Over Dalai Lama Threat	431
Bill to include Jonang in Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile fails floor test	432
CTA Prez criticizes French museums for 'pandering to Chinese wishes'	432
ICT invites presidential candidates to state positions on Tibet	433
Exile Tibetan parliament to resume session Sep 17 morning	433
Exile Tibetan parliament session aborted by lack of quorum	434
Vienna: Premiere of 'Amala' shines light on Tibetan struggle amid "cultural genocide"	435
Tibetan cast film "Shambhala" selected as Nepal's official entry for 97th Oscars	435
"If I were in Tibet" Art Exhibition of Tibetan students inaugurates in Dharamshala	436
Tibet rights organisation condemns launch of Chinese propaganda centre in Lhasa	436
UP-STF arrests Tibetan refugee for providing Indian bank accounts to cyber criminals	437
China tries to reshape Tibet, Xinjiang narratives with new propaganda efforts	437
'General Session' of TPiE begins, Tibetan advocacy group urges Charter amendment	439
Tibet: UN experts demand clarity after wave of arrests	439
Motion on Tibet moved in Australian House of Representatives	440

Tibetan group calls for charter amendments to appoint judge of TSJC	440
Eight Session of Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile Begins	441
Tibet Lobby Day in Australia urge sanction against Chinese officials, support for Dalai Lama's reincarnation process	442
UN Raises Concern Over Kamtok Dam	443
Central Tibetan Administration Expresses Concern Over China's Expansion of Colonial Boarding Schools in Eastern Tibet	443
Wangchuk Sends Climate SOS from Tanglang La at 17,400 ft to World Citizens	444
Dimple Yadav meets Dalai Lama in Dharamshala: 'We support cause of Tibet'	444
Arunachal Chief Minister participates in long-life prayers offering to Dalai Lama	445
UN human rights experts deeply concerned over repression of dam protests and Chinese hydropower policies in Tibet	445
China's Interference in Dalai Lama's Reincarnation Sparks International Concern	446
Tibetans-in-exile mark 64th anniversary of 'Democracy Day' in Dharamshala	446
Ramon Magsaysay Foundation launches series to mark 65th anniversary of Dalai Lama's award	447
Countries should accept Tibet's historic status as independent nation: Penpa Tsering	447
Himachal Pradesh: Tibetans in-exile celebrate 64th anniversary of Democracy Day in Dharamshala	448
Tibetans praise US, Canada for support on 64th founding anniversary of Parliament-in-exile	448
Tibetans mark 64th Democracy Day with Estonian guests	449
Human rights organisations express concern over enforced disappearances in Tibetan region	450
Tibet group welcomes former exile Tibetan administration head to Arunachal Pradesh capital	450
August	451
Human rights body claims China subjects Tibetan people to inhuman treatment	451
SFT honours Dege protestors and activists with Lhakar Award on 30th anniversary	452
China's top political advisor calls for 'integration among all ethnic groups' in Tibet	453
Dalai Lama back in D'shala after New York visit, to resume religious teachings	453
Report by UNHRC highlights severe concerns about Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region and Tibet Autonomous Region	454
China: two years after Xinjiang findings, UN Rights Chief reports 'limited access to information', 'reprisals' against activists	454
US coordinator highlights Tibet's role as regional freshwater source	456
Karmapa calls on Dalai Lama in Zurich, their first meeting in seven years	457
Dalai Lama emphasizes helping all sentient beings at Zurich long-life prayers offering	457
Rubio Sounds Alarm Over Chinese Abuse of Tibetans	458
Capacity crowd of 17,000 attend long-life prayers offering to Dalai Lama in New York	458
China protests, foul-mouths Dalai Lama, after US envoy for Tibet meets him	459

US official meets Dalai Lama to discuss Chinese 'human rights abuses inside Tibet'	460
Dalai Lama Chair to be set up at Panjab University	460
China's Tibetan Traditional Medicine Center eyes Manila satellite facility	460
Tibetan actress wins Best Acting Performance at 77th Locarno Film Festival	461
The Schrucker Fellowship for the Arts: Empowering Contemporary Tibetan Creatives	461
Solidarity campaign for justice and protection of Tibetan rights	461
TYC concludes annual meeting, reaffirms commitment to Tibetan independence and global advocacy	462
Toronto Tibetan activist concludes third bicycle rally for Free Tibet	462
Central Tibetan Administration Commemorates 78th Indian Independence Day	463
Petition by 100 Tibetan scholars to UN High Commissioner calls for an end to school closures and cultural assimilation policies in Tibet	463
Former Ambassador Dilip Sinha talks to Tibetans in- exile about "Imperial Games in Tibet"	465
Committee Reviews Rules and Regulations of Parliamentary Procedure and Conduct for Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile	466
Department of Education Initiates Free Distribution of Storybooks for Schools	466
Dalai Lama's Succession Strategy; China's Xi Jinping Can't Handle Unpredictability: Tibet's Sikyong	466
MPs re-launch Tibet group   Gao supports Tibetan people's rights	467
Indo-Tibetan support group declares 2025 as 'Year of Compassion' for Dalai Lama's 90th Birthday	467
Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Advocates Tibet, Meets Key Indian Leaders	468
American Bar Association urges rights violations investigation in Tibet in first stand on the issue	469
China must end its persecution of Tibetan human rights defender Tsering Tso	469
Tibetan athlete fails to medal in her latest Olympics but is 'happy'	471
'Pro-democracy' academic who spied on Tibetans etc for China set for Jan 9 sentencing	472
Tibet House Japan Starts Three-month Tibetan Language Class	472
Lower TCV hosts first residential school for overseas Tibetan students	473
Richard Gere helping to produce documentary on Dalai Lama's message of kindness	474
Sikkim: Tibetan Association hails MP Dorjee Lepcha's statement clarifying border as Tibet's, not China's	474
July	474
Central Tibetan Administration seeks US action on exiled Tibetans as Chinese repression intensifies	474
Panel Discussion on 'Forced Closure of Ragya Sherig Norling Educational Institution: Causes and Impacts'	475
Tibet Represented at the Opening Ceremony of Paris Olympic Games	476
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Meets US Congress Members in Washington DC, Expresses Gratitude on Behalf of Tibetans	476

International Campaign for Tibet alleges "systematic censorship" of Tibetan content on Chinese platforms	477
Secretary Tsering Yangkyi is Appointed Representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama at Office of Tibet, London	478
'People's Court' finds President Xi guilty of 'crime against humanity' in Tibet, verdict refutes China's propaganda	478
"China cannot just change history", says Tibet President in exile as US passes Resolve Tibet act	479
Tibetan govt-in-exile takes on Chinese embassy, says Tibet not 'internal affair'	480
Tibetan govt in exile to issue map of Tibet to counter China's 'cartographic aggression'	480
Dr Gyal Lo's Makes Presentation on China's Colonial-style Boarding Schools in Tibet at a Conference in Tokyo	481
Hegemonistic Ambitions: Tibet PM-In-Exile On China Renaming Places In India	482
Chinese know "they're hurt": Tibetan leader on US President Biden signing 'Resolve Tibet Bill'	482
Tibetans in-exile condemn China's policies, hold candlelight vigil	483
Long-time friend of Tibet Richard Gere recovering after prostate operation	484
"We consider ourselves extension of Indian culture," says Tibetan leader in exile	484
Tibetans express gratitude to US President for enacting 'Resolve Tibet Act'	485
Back-channel talks between China, Tibetan govt-in-exile going on: Sikyong Penpa Tsering	485
7th international Rangzen Conference concludes in Toronto, Canada	486
OoT, Canberra & Chinese Alliance for Democracy Conduct Seminar titled "Sino-Tibet Relations in the Post-Xi Jinping Era"	487
Tibetans in exile mark death anniversary of freedom fighter Tulku Tenzin Delek Rinpoche, release book on his struggles	488
President Biden signs Resolve Tibet Act, strengthening US support for Tibet negotiations	488
Statement from President Joe Biden on S. 138, the "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act"	490
India and US support for the Dalai Lama and Tibetans upsets China	490
Japan to Host International Meeting on Support for Tibet Next June for 1st Time; Dalai Lama to Deliver Speech Online	491
Previously banned, Dalai Lama's 89th birthday celebrated in Nepal's capital	492
Sikyong Penpa Tsering's Visit to Ladakh: Engaging with Monasteries and Schools on a Cultural and Educational Journey	492
China's Interference in the Succession of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama Unacceptable	493
"He was being playful": Delhi High Court rejects plea for POCSO action against Dalai Lama for kissing child	493
Dalai Lama relocates to Syracuse, NY for recovery from knee surgery	493
China condemns US and India's Dalai Lama birthday greetings as subversive, reiterates vow of its own successor to him	493
Dalai Lama Succession: US, India Don't Want China Involved	494
Sonam Wangchuk demands Bharat Ratna for Dalai Lama	495

PM Modi sends greetings to the Dalai Lama on his 89th birthday	495
The Dalai Lama turns 89; exiled Tibetans fear future without him	496
World Tibet Day - Showcasing Uniqueness Of Tibetan Culture, Thought	497
Penpa Tsering, Sikyong of CTA raises concern as China imposes restrictions ahead of Dalai Lama's 89th birthday	498
As UPR concludes, UN Human Rights Council voices clear criticism of China's abuses in Tibet	499
Dalai Lama's followers pray for his knee surgery recovery outside makeshift 'temple' – a ritzy NYC hotel	500
2nd International Tibet Youth Forum Commences in Dharamshala, Sikyong Calls for Unified Efforts in Advocating for Tibet	501
Artist launches collection of 108 visual arts from exile Tibetan artists	502
June	503
Discourse facilitator 'Democracy and Debate' launches report on opinion poll from Tibetan public	503
Tibetans worldwide rejoice over Dalai Lama's successful knee surgery	503
Tibetans worldwide pray as Dalai Lama undergoes knee surgery in the USA	504
'Dalai Lama will live on, Xi Jinping will die'—former Tibet PM on reincarnation geopolitics	504
'Tibetans Forced To Join Chinese Army Won't Be Deployed Near Indian Border': Tibetan Govt In Exile Head	506
US is Ready to Stand With Tibet and Its People	506
PM Modi meets US delegations who visited Dalai Lama despite China's objection	508
Nancy Pelosi, After Meeting Dalai Lama, Says China Is 'Trying to Erase' Tibetan Culture	509
Nancy Pelosi's scathing attack on Xi Jinping: 'Dalai Lama's legacy will live forever, you'll be gone'	509
US Legislators in Dharamshala to Meet Dalai Lama, China 'Gravely Concerned'	510
Washington's new Tibet policy bill 'likely to be counterproductive'	511
Tibetans protest Chinese Premier Li Qiang's visit to New Zealand with six demands	511
Dalai Lama keeps cards close to chest on his successor, says 'not thinking of re-incarnation'	512
US 'Resolve Tibet Act' an important tool to internationally counter China's claim on Tibet	513
Canada should consider recognizing Tibet as an Independent Nation	513
EU officials to make rare Tibet visit to examine human rights	514
Exiled Tibetan political leader honored with democracy medal	516
115 candidates for the European Parliament pledge to support Tibet	516
US Congress passes Resolve Tibet Act	517
Dalai Lama to meet Australian ministers	518
Canadian Parliament supports Tibet's self-determination	519
Auckland Tibetan Association Calls on PM Luxon to Raise Tibet During the Chinese Premier Li Qiang's Visit to New Zealand	520

Sikyong Penpa Tsering and Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang Launch Autobiography of Former Kalon Tashi Wangdi	521
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Congratulates Indian PM Modi for Historic Third Win	522
Dalai Lama to visit US for knee treatment in coming weeks	522
Department of Religion and Culture's Monastic Assessment Committee Presents Report of their Findings to His Holiness the Dalai Lama	523
Tibetans in Dharamshala vote in the 2024 Indian general elections	524
New school for overseas Tibetan kids aims to preserve language	524
May	527
Chinese ambassador reprimands Estonian MP for visiting Tibetans in D'shala last month	527
PM Modi refers to his frequent talks with the Dalai Lama in election speech	527
His Holiness the Dalai Lama Addresses Participants of Conference Themed 'Investigating the Impact of Contemplative Practices'	528
Central Tibetan Administration Appreciates the US Senate's Unanimous Passage of Resolve Tibet Bill	529
Senate approval sends bill back to House for eventual US mandate to help resolve Tibet's status	530
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Addresses Closing Ceremony of Tibetan Cooperative's Conference	530
Kharge calls upon scholars to unearth hidden history of Buddhism to enlighten next generation	531
Resolve Tibet Act unanimously passes Senate	532
Reports detail forced displacement and violent reprisals against protest in Tibet	533
China accelerates forced relocation of rural Tibetans to urban areas, report says	536
From Scrolls to Screens: Tibetan Digital Library Initiative Begins in Dharamshala-based Monasteries and Cultural Centres	537
His Holiness the Dalai Lama Congratulates the New President of Taiwan	537
The only power China lacks is moral power	538
Tibet Support Group in Vilnius Organises Peaceful Protest to Free Panchen Lama In Front of the Chinese Embassy	540
DIIR Statement on the 29th Enforced Disappearance Day of the 11th Panchen Lama	540
Marking 29 Years Since the Panchen Lama's Disappearance	541
Central Tibetan Administration Congratulates New Co-Chair for Australian Parliamentary Group for Tibet, Senator Barbara Pocock	541
Tibetan In Exile Reveals Cousin's Ordeal	541
Former Chinese spy expose covert operations against dissidents overseas	542
Congressional Executive Commission on China's Annual Report Finds Persistent Human Rights Violations in Tibet	543
16th Kashag Convenes 6th Permanent Strategy Committee Meeting	544
No interest from PRC to resume dialogue: US Congressional Committee on China	544
Representative Genkhang-led Tibetan Delegation Visits Spanish Parliament to Discuss Tibet	545

Tibetan women detained over 'Free Tibet' bag in Paris	546
Sikyong Continues Advocating for Tibet and Acknowledges Italy's Longstanding Support for the Tibet Cause	546
Xi Jinping's Visit to Hungary: Hiding the Flag, mysterious Chinese Policemen and 18 Agreements	547
Austrian MPs host Tibetan government in exile, pledge support	548
Calligraphy Day keeps alive Tibetans' written language	548
Representative Kelsang Gyaltsen Bawa Meets with Ukrainian Cross-sectoral Delegation	550
Sikyong Advocates for Tibetan Rights & Religious Freedom in Germany, Calls on Europe to Stand Against China's Authoritarian Regime	550
Chinese volunteers joined Hungarian security to harass Tibet protesters during Xi Jinping visit	551
Office of Tibet in Taiwan Leads Efforts to Revive Taiwanese Parliamentary Group for Tibet: Over 30 Legislators Poised to Join	552
Tibet's Derge printing house's historic printing blocks earn UNESCO recognition	553
CTA Prez calls for unified action against CCP to catalyze positive change	553
Zeekgyab Rinpoche Appeals to Japanese parliamentarians	554
President Macron Urged to Raise Tibet with President Xi and Put Tibet at the Heart of French Strategy Towards China	555
Tibetan, Uyghur protesters greet Xi Jinping in Paris	555
Long-time supporter of Tibet awarded US Presidential Medal of Freedom	557
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Meets President Kompatscher; the Latter Assures to Lead Parliamentary Initiatives to Spotlight Tibet's Deteriorating Situation	557
Calls for freedom on Panchen Lama's 35th birthday	558
Calls for freedom on Panchen Lama's 35th birthday	559
Gyari Dorjee Youdon, female warrior who fought Chinese army passes away at 92	560
Tibetan activists to protest Xi Jinping's visit to Paris	561
Tibetan Sikyong meets with French President ahead of state visit by Chinese president	562
French president urged to put human rights, Tibet at heart of Xi Jinping talks	562

April 564

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Discusses Bringing Positive Change in China with Swiss Parliamentarians	564
Sikyong Addresses Tibetan Community in Zurich, Debunks Recent Comment by Spokesperson of Chinese Foreign Ministry	565
Resolution of Sino-Tibet conflict to be mutually beneficial: Tibetan leadership	565
China pushed back on rights, Tibet in meetings with top US diplomat	566
Dialogue with Dalai Lama's representatives only, not with Tibetan Government-in-Exile, says China	567
Fleeing Chinese persecution: One woman's great escape from Tibet to India	567
Chinese 'democracy activist' in Germany known to be close to Tibetan groups held for spying	568
Calls grow for proof of whereabouts of Tibet's missing Panchen Lama	569

Estonian Parliamentary Delegation Holds Press Conference to Express their Concerns Over State of His Serenity the 11th Panchen Lama	570
Very informal talks with China on since last year, but have no immediate expectations: Tibet's gov't-in-exile head	571
Tibetan gov't-in-exile holds back-channel informal dialogue with China	572
Tibetans call on India, other democratic nations to press Beijing on whereabouts of Panchen Lama	573
Buddhist Leaders from Himalaya Holds Joint Press Conference to Raise Issue of the 11th Panchen Lama's Whereabout	574
Statement of TPiE on the 35th Birthday of the 11th Kunzig Panchen Rinpoche Jetsun Tenzin Gedhun Yeshe Trinley Phuntsok Pal Sangpo	575
Statement of the Kashag on the Thirty-Fifth Birthday of His Serenity the Eleventh Panchen Rinpoche	576
Tibetans from Europe find China's visa-free policy not so free	578
Genocidal China condemned for catena of Tibet violations in US annual rights report	579
State Department reports show need to resolve Tibet	580
The Tibet Support Group of the Riigikogu will pay a visit to the Dalai Lama	581
Massive Chinese Cyber Espionage of Tibetan Diaspora Revealed	581
Chinese government tries to destroy Buddhism, but Chinese people show interest in it	582
Why a Tibetan lama visiting Bhutan is significant	583
Chinese Ambassador's address at Harvard disrupted by student activists	585
G7 foreign ministers express concern over China's human rights violations in Xinjiang, Tibet	585
US 'repatriates' lost Tibetan Buddhist relics to China	586
Dalai Lama's sister receives award for educating Tibetans in exile	586
Former political prisoner shares testimonial of her suffering in Chinese prison	587
Senators Young, Merkley celebrate committee passage of bill promoting peaceful resolution to the Tibet-China Conflict	588
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Calls on Legislators, Addresses Tibetan Community in Vermont and Boston	588
Report: Government-linked hackers in China target exiled Tibetan leaders	589
Why China is blocking the Dalai Lama's Sri Lanka visit	590
Bill mandating US gov't help to resolve Tibet's legal status set for full Senate vote	592
US Senate Committee on Foreign Relations Approves Resolve Tibet Bill, the Committee's Chair Assures His Support for the Bill's Passage in Senate	593
China prevents exposure of human rights violations in Tibet and Xinjiang in foreign media	593
Bill mandating US gov't help to resolve Tibet's legal status set for full Senate vote	595
Central Tibetan Administration Appreciates Senate Foreign Relations Committee's Approval of Resolve Tibet Bill	595
Senate committee advances bill pushing Tibet-China negotiations	596
Sikkim CM alleges former state gov't. coerced Karmapa's exit from India	599

Bollywood star calls on Dalai Lama as she campaigns for parliament seat	600
Representative Rigzin Genkhang Briefs Dutch Ambassador for Human Rights on the Critical Situation in Tibet	600
Eminent Buddhist teacher Arjia Rinpoche gives first-hand information about China's atrocities to Japanese lawmakers	601
Europe For Tibet Campaign Launched in The European Parliament	602
27th Tibetan Shoton Festival Begins in Dharamshala, Kundeling Tatsak Rinpoche Graces the Festival's Inaugural	602
White paper addresses Himalayan water security challenges	603
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Addresses Members of Tibetan Community in Toronto	603
"Don't flood your country with cheap Chinese products": Tibetan leader in exile Sikyong Penpa	604
Sri Lankan monks present Buddha relics to HH the Dalai Lama	605
Dalai Lama determined to live 100+ years to continue to serve Buddhadharma	606
His Holiness the Dalai Lama Expresses Solidarity with Victims of Taiwan Earthquake	606
China celebrates annexation of Tibet with events in border villages	606
US government allocates $23 million to support Tibetan programs	607
March	607
Latest US gov't spending bill allocates $23 million for Tibet support projects	607
Tibetan musician advocates colonial boarding school in Tibet, sparks backlash	608
2023 Annual Report on Human Rights Situation in Tibet Released	608
Human Rights Violations in Tibet Raised at 55th UN Human Rights Council Session	609
Office of Tibet in Canberra Urges Australian Foreign Minister to Address Tibet Issue During Chinese Counterpart's Visit	609
Sikyong Penpa Tsering Meets with Martin Luther King III, Discusses Tibetan Freedom Movement	610
New resolution on Tibet introduced in the US House	610
Tibet Policy Institute Convenes Panel Discussion Titled "China's Dam in Dege" on International Day of Action for Rivers	611
House resolution supports Tibetan self-determination, protestors	612
China eroding Tibetan language, religion: Sikyong on 65th uprising day	613
Tibetan Resistance Resurfaces: Protests Erupt Over Controversial Dam Construction	613
Tibetans targeted by China-linked supply chain attacks using malicious language translators	614
'China should leave Tibet:' Tibetans march near Parliament House to mark 65th uprising	615
Statement: Kashag Urges PRC Govt to Immediately Release all Tibetans Detained in Derge Protests and Respect Rights & Aspirations of Tibetans	615
Most Indians Ignorant of Indo-Tibet Historic Ties, says Tibetan Activist News	616
Austria: Protest held outside Chinese Embassy demanding release of Tibetans arrested in Sichuan	616

February 617

Freedom House gives Tibet global freedom score of zero	617
Tibetans in India march in solidarity with those arrested in dam protest in China	618
US official expresses concern over crackdown on Tibetans protesting dam	619
Austria: Tibetan youths protest outside Chinese embassy in Vienna over human rights violations	620
Dalai Lama's 1959 escape route in Arunachal to be developed for spiritual tourism	620
China's Policies Are 'Like a Python Squeezing Us Out of Our Breath Slowly', Says Tibetan Exiled Leader	621
Division and factionalism in exile "regrettably shameful", says Dalai Lama in new letter	622
Beijing crushing Tibetans, exiled political leader says	622
US House passes bill recognising Tibet's unresolved political status	623
China fails to stop New Jersey Township Mayor from raising Tibetan flag to celebrate Losar	624
On Losar, Dalai Lama exhorts Tibetans to uphold culture	625
China opens Lhasa for Tibetans from other regions for Losar, but tight restrictions remain	625
Tibetan Flag Raised in Belleville: An Act of Solidarity Amid Diplomatic Tensions	626
'Lack of information from Tibet is due to high level of Chinese gov't repression'	627

January 627

China started destroying monasteries after occupying Tibet: Former Tibetan PM-in-exile	627
DIIR Holds 'Tibet Advocacy Training and Youth Capacity Building Program' for North Indian V-Tag Members	628
Tibetan politician in exile talks about continued saga of survival	628
Dalai Lama reaches Sikkim after 13 years amidst tension with China, know why this visit was special	629
Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Calls on Maharashtra's Governor and Speaker	629
The UN China Review Finds Unprecedented Support for Tibetan Rights by Member States, While Beijing Shuts Down Criticism	630
Twofold increase in states raising Tibet at UN China review	631
UN China review: International community must clearly address Tibet	632
Tibetan activist receives State Department religious freedom award	632
India awards gallantry medals in previously unreported recent Tibet-border clashes	633
'India should be alert...': Shashi Tharoor warns on growing proximity between Maldives and China	634
Tibet Not in Focus, Repression Persists: Exiled Former Leader	634
His Holiness the Dalai Lama Congratulates President-elect Lai Ching-te of Taiwan	635
Human Rights Situation in Tibet 2023 – A Year in Review	635
UN Must Include Strong Language on Tibet in China Review	636
Refusing to add 'China' to sash, Tibetan woman forced out of pageant	637

Belgian Prime Minister urged to take up Tibet during upcoming China visit	638
Thermo Fisher stops sale of DNA kits in Tibet after activists raised fears of rights abuses	638
Body found near where Tibetan Buddhist monk went missing	639
Child-ed group Manjushri unveils new books	640
Long-life prayer ceremony concludes Dalai Lama's Bodh Gaya visit	641

CHINA POLITICS 643

December 643

Corruption galore in China's new detention system targeting the corrupt, dissent	643
China makes room for younger faces on middle rungs of Communist Party promotions ladder	644
China's Xi vows to stop mass killings known as 'revenge on society crimes'	645
VOA Mandarin: Four generals' absence from Chinese ceremony sparks power struggle speculation	647
2 more Chinese generals fall after anti-corruption drive delivers big changes to military	647
VOA Mandarin: Chinese graduate school applications drop as youth unemployment rises	648
China sets dates for 'two sessions' as investors await 2025 economic growth target	648
China says economists who spread 'inappropriate' views should be fired	649
China's security ministry says foreign spies are slandering revolutionary heroes online	650
Xi Jinping's anti-corruption campaign nets record number of 'tigers' in 2024	650
Wang Huning urges efforts to forge sense of community for Chinese nation	652
Chinese Premier Li Qiang pledges to crack down on unfair targeting of private firms	652
China's anticorruption crackdown is impeding its military buildup plans, Pentagon says	652
China's top political advisor again calls for community-for-Chinese-nation drive among ethnic minorities	653
The EU Expresses Concern About Deteriorating Situation in Tibet	654
The CPC Central Committee approved the expulsion of Wu Yingjie from the party due to improper family traditions	654
Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Mao Ning's Regular Press Conference on December 11, 2024	655
China's record 'worsening' on Human Rights Day, activists say	657
Xi Jinping calls for wider use of Mandarin in China's border areas amid security push	658
China's villages put to Communist Party loyalty test in national anti-corruption campaign	659
China's security chief urges all-out efforts to ensure safe New Year and Spring Festival	660
In wake of mass attacks, China's judges urged to ensure fairness to maintain stability	660
China's Xi calls for the protection of Belt and Road Initiative interests overseas	661

November 662

China condemns G7 foreign minister's Fiuggi statement on Tibet etc as interference	662
China's defence minister Admiral Dong Jun under probe for corruption	662

China investigates head of Shanghai's free-trade zone for corruption	663
China aims for more than 100 'trusted data spaces' by 2028 under national action plan	663
China zeroes in on 'common' disputes in wake of deadly Zhuhai attacks	664
Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Mao Ning's Regular Press Conference on November 25, 2024	665
China's top judge promises swift justice after recent mass killings that shocked nation	667
China's top political advisor stresses united front in Chinese modernization	668
China confronts false accusations that plague Communist Party's anti-corruption crusade	669
Top political advisor urges pooling strength of Chinese from home, abroad for Chinese modernization	670
Xi Jinping weighs pros and cons of China's shrinking population	671
China's Communist Party expels former agriculture minister for corruption	671
State television serial paints President Xi as worthy son of a glorious father	672
"Red Cultural Education" for Clergy of All Religions in China	672
Entire Village of the Yi Ethnic Minority "Deprogrammed" in Yunnan	673
China warns military members against online dating, gambling	674
Xi Jinping urges China's provinces to be patient and fair in push for economic reforms	674
Chinese officials told to stop avoiding media questions about emergencies	675
Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Lin Jian's Regular Press Conference on November 1, 2024	675

October 677

Xi stresses advancing reform at study session for senior officials	677
Role reversed for China's birth-control enforcers, now cajoling women to marry, have children	677
China faces stormy future as confidence in Xi crumbles	679
Village leaders facing spate of investigations	681
China takes down fake news about its military, closes social media accounts	682
Xi stresses enhancing inclusive public services for people	682
Former Chinese Justice Minister Tang Yijun Arrested on Corruption Charges	683
China accuses Australia of 'systemic racism', 'hate crimes' after human rights concerns raised	683
China's top political advisor stresses forging strong sense of community for Chinese nation	684
West blasts China on rights, China responds: What about Gaza?	684
China eyes 'top-tier industrial workforce' by 2035, vows hi-tech training, talent support	685
'Confident' China should relax grip on cultural, information exchange: academic	685
Xi Jinping again urges his troops to be ready for war	686
China's increasing passport controls evoke Mao era	687
China again ranks as the country with worst internet freedom, Myanmar giving it company this time	688
Gansu, Association of Disciples Member Deprogrammed—to Atheism	689

China cracks down on Communist party officials for reading banned books	689
China's Li Xiaopeng, son of former premier Li Peng, signals end to closely watched career	690
China's finance minister says there is room for more economic stimulus but offers no plan	691
China's political advisors urged to contribute to country's cultural advancement	691
Japan urged to investigate China's transnational repression operating in the country	692
Political disloyalty being emphasized in China's anti-corruption investigations	692
Japan: Chinese Authorities Harass Critics Abroad	693
China throws the book: more corruption suspects hit with claims of illicit reading	697
As economic challenges and security threats linger, China marks 75 years of Communist Party rule	698

September 698

Building on Past Achievements and Forging Ahead Together Toward a Community with a Shared Future for Mankind	698
China's top political advisor calls for broadest patriotic united front at National Day reception	702
'Get things done': China tries to rally risk-averse officials to revive economy	703
Top Chinese economist disappears from public life after criticizing Xi Jinping	704
Reforms key to better protection of human rights	704
Xi stresses imperative to give full play to CPPCC's political strengths	705
China sees significant rise in protests despite CCP regime's tight control: Report	707
Translation: Chinese Universities Install Software to Identify and Punish Students Who Circumvent the Great Firewall	708
Xi urges continuous efforts to run people's congresses to good effect	709
China is poised to amend its anti-corruption law for the first time	711
Report details how China retaliates against people for engaging with UN	712
China to train 3,000 foreign law enforcement officers to protect overseas interests	714
Questions continue to swirl around China's 'disappeared' foreign minister	714
Chinese legal community asks: where is the line on death penalty for corrupt officials?	715
Rock 'n' roll, internet are potential Western 'colour revolution' traps: Chinese textbook	717
China is pushing divisive political messages online using fake U.S. voters	717

August 719

China places former chairman of top aircraft maker AVIC under investigation for corruption	719
China's Communist Party brings in new rules to regulate faith, loyalty and performance	719
New Chinese textbooks play up national security, Xi Jinping Thought and Vietnam, India wars	720
China to make marriage easier, divorce harder in latest move to reverse population decline	721
China moves to ease low-level officials out from endless meetings, reports and red tape	722
China's Politburo meeting stresses Chinese-ness, ethnic unity, border stability	723

As China celebrates Deng Xiaoping's legacy, the country is again at a crossroads	724
Honour reformer Deng Xiaoping by realising China's revival, Xi Jinping urges nation	726
Leaked Documents Reveal CCP Plan to "Eliminate" Falun Gong, Escalating Persecution	727
Chinese cartoon campaign warns village clans against hindering Communist Party	728
Walz's China experience draws GOP attacks, but Beijing isn't counting on better ties	728
Jailed Chinese activist faces another birthday alone in a cell, his wife says	730
TikTok promotes pro-China bias on Tibet, Taiwan, Uyghurs: study	730
Experts warn of national security risks from Chinese apps	732
Communist Party exhibitions lean on honour and obligation among young Chinese	733
Chinese diplomat reaffirms "One China" stance	734
China's third plenum highlights the quiet rise of political theorist Wang Huning	735
Agents 'implanted' anti-China content in overseas university applications, ministry says	737
China's Proposed Nationwide Digital ID System Stokes Fears of Government Overreach	737
Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Lin Jian's Regular Press Conference on August 1, 2024	738

July 740

China's state employees to face forced three-child policy?	740
China's former Hainan party chief Luo Baoming faces corruption investigation	741
Chinese Communist Party Plans To Raise Retirement Age To Deal With Aging Population	741
China's third plenum sees Communist Party double down on economic, tech, military power	742
Xi's big economic meeting shows the Party bracing for slower growth driven by advanced manufacturing	744
China's Communist Party removes ex-foreign, defence ministers from top body	744
China's Communist Party meets to set direction for troubled economy	745
China's ailing economy under spotlight as leader Xi Jinping and top officials to meet	746
China amasses record half-year 'tiger' tally in anti-corruption campaign	747
China's uncalled for gloating over UN's adoption of its rights review report	748
China rejects key Western calls for human-rights reforms at U.N. meeting	749
China's internet watchdog calls for 'favourable' environment ahead of third plenum	749
Former Chinese TAR boss Wu Yingjie's fall likely due to misuse of funds	750
Xi Jinping exposes China's hypocrisy with Panchsheel fakery	751
China's Communist Party on track for 100 million members by year's end	753

June 753

CHINA: Harsh words, political disloyalty allegations mark purge of two former defence ministers	753
Xi Says China Planning 'Major' Reforms Ahead Of Key Political Meeting	754
China condemned for rejecting key recommendations of UN review of its rights record	755

Chinese Government Rejects Key Human Rights Recommendations in Latest UN Review	756
Cities, provinces across China join global propaganda push	757
Xi calls for carrying forward patriotism	758
Xi Jinping visits Mao's caves	759
Xi Jinping tells top PLA leaders they must eliminate 'conditions that breed corruption'	760
China's leader Xi Jinping vows to step up crackdown on corruption in armed forces	761
Xi stresses PLA's political loyalty at crucial meeting held in old revolutionary base	761
Chinese Communist Party warns members not to criticise policy ahead of major economic policy meeting	762
China's Communist Party Members Revised Disciplinary Code Details "Hundred Sins"	763
China rolls out 'zero tolerance' crackdown on fake government officials, financial crimes	764
Xi Jinping using relatives to conceal $707.2mn wealth, says report	764
In China, regional security officials have been told to make regime stability a priority	765
Key report helps to reveal the wealth and corruption of the CCP	766
China's political advisors meet on high-level socialist market economy	767

May 767

Statement From the Tiananmen Mothers on the 35th Anniversary of the 1989 Tiananmen Massacre	767
Former China politics lecturer slams curbs on university research	770
China's political advisors discuss fortifying strong sense of community for Chinese nation	771
China's latest AI chatbot is trained on President Xi Jinping's political ideology	772
"Educate the Masses to Change Their Minds"	772
China-proposed river ethics initiative wins support	774
Thailand: 'Swap Mart' Targets Foreign Dissidents, Refugees	774
Chinese nationalist groups are launching cyber-attacks – often against the wishes of the government	776
Xi Stresses Breaking New Ground in Ideological, Political Education	777
How China's latest government overhaul is shaping up, and what it says about the Communist Party's priorities	777
Senior Chinese leaders' tours round country offer clues to economic policy agenda ahead of key meeting	780
'Resist temptations': China's top spy agency warns overseas staff are being targeted for hi-tech secrets	781
Australian study says China uses global apps, games for propaganda	781
Senior official with China's new financial regulator targeted in corruption probe just a week into the job	782
New rules let China's state security police check people's devices	783
Former Chinese defence minister Wei Fenghe emerges after months of speculation	784

British lawmaker – and China critic – denied entry to Djibouti	785
A tale of two slogans	786
Warrantless Phone Searches Allowed Under New Chinese National Security Regulations	787
Macron, Xi call for worldwide ‘Olympic truce’ during Paris Games	787
China has jailed more journalists than any other country	788
Chinese Communist Youth League Reports Membership of 74 Million	789
China's amended secrets law sparks fears over widening state powers	789

April 790

China Vows Reforms at Long Delayed Party Conclave Amid Challenging Economy	790
China's national political advisory body holds leadership meeting	791
China to try former Tibet propaganda chief for corruption	791
Publicize the wealth and corruption of the CCP leadership	792
China sees foreign threats ‘everywhere’ as powerful spy agency takes center stage	793
Whistleblower alleges UN's ‘dangerous favours’ to China, Covid cover-up	794
China's spy agency encourages people to see spies everywhere	795
It helped China enforce zero-Covid. Now the community ‘grid’ network is going ‘professional’	797
Chinese Communist Party Suffocates Christians; The West Should Take Heed.	798
Li Qiang: Middleman for Xi?	800
Xi's article on putting people first to be published	801

March 802

CPC leadership reviews disciplinary inspection report	802
China spy agency fingers consultancies as espionage threat	802
U-M study reveals how China’s local bureaucrats struggle for power through negative media coverage	803
Detailed measures stipulate place name translation from foreign language must not compromise China’s territorial claims, sovereign rights	804
What to expect at China’s ‘Two Sessions’ amid sagging economy, party drama	805
China’s premier won’t meet the press after ‘two sessions’ for first time in 3 decades	806
China's top political advisory body concludes standing committee session	807
Intrigue swirls about possible reshuffles as China’s parliament convenes	808
China’s Xi Jinping calls for ‘loyalty and honesty’ from younger officials as morale runs low	809
China economy gaining momentum despite calls for hardline US stance: senior diplomat	809
Further fall from grace for disappeared former foreign, defence ministers in opaque world of China	811

February 811

China’s embattled former foreign minister steps down as a lawmaker	811
--	-----

Leaked document trove shows a Chinese hacking scheme focused on harassing dissidents	812
China revamps discipline inspection rules to ensure Xi Jinping's instructions are carried out	813
China's would-be powerhouse Hunan wants officials to 'emancipate their minds'	813
Chinese firm behind local 'news' websites spreading Beijing propaganda in 30 countries	815
State education leaders urged to investigate whether CCP is infiltrating K-12 schools	815
BASF to speed up exit from Xinjiang ventures after Uyghur abuse reports	816
China's Political Power List Hints at Fate of Disappeared Official	816
China's increasing political influence in the south Pacific has sparked an international response	817
Chinese security agencies tell students studying abroad to beware risk from foreign spies	818
China expands visa exemption policy to attract more foreigners	819
China to strengthen propaganda control on discussion of ethnic minority issues	820

January 821

China's anti-corruption watchdog says 110,000 Communist Party officials faced disciplinary action last year	821
China 'gamed' UN human rights review, experts say	822
China's Communist Party vows to take on 'new and old challenges' in People's Daily article based on Xi Jinping's speech	823
China tests new ethnic assimilation policy on Uyghurs	824
China in overdrive to defend its UN-battered rights record ahead of review report	826
Open letter from Chinese Civil Society Organizations to the President of the United Nations Human Rights Council	827
China's ethnic affairs officials urged to promote integration of minority groups	827
Western countries use UN-backed review to press China on its treatment of activists and minorities	828
China's human rights record criticised at UN as it faces rare scrutiny of policies	829
Xi Jinping urges loyalty from China's courts and law enforcers to 'defuse' social and financial risks	830
China Builds Spy Stations in Mountains on Disputed Border	831
China's patriotic education law a bad news for ethnic minority areas	831
'No one is safe': China purges record number of senior officials in 2023, with more 'tigers' likely to fall	832
China's cadres urged to connect with the masses as part of education campaign, but some question its methods	833

PROTESTS, DETENTIONS AND OTHER NEWS FROM THE PRC 836

December 836

Highlights China's human rights violations in Tibet-2024	836
Chinese authorities torture Tibetan village head to death amid crackdown on Tibetan Language	837

China's top procuratorate orders arrest of former senior political advisor	838
China: Five years on, activists jailed in 'cruel' 2019 crackdown must be released	838
Prominent Tibetan activist detained for two weeks amid Chinese discrimination	839
Testimony of a Chinese human rights defender: inside China's brutal prison system	840
Rights group urges China to release jailed Tibetan activist	843
Tibetan environmental activist sentenced to 8 months in prison	843

November 845

China sentences veteran journalist on espionage charges	845
Tibetan whistle-blower sentenced to eight months for exposing illegal sand mining	845
Renowned Tibetan writer and intellectual, Rongwo Gendun Lhundup released from Chinese prison but remains under strict surveillance	846
Two influential Tibetans released from Chinese prison	847
Tibetan language rights activist Tashi Wangchuk detained again for "slanderous" videos on Chinese TikTok	848
Tibet, Sera Monastery Monk Persecuted to Death in Detention	849
Chinese official ruined by crypto investments gets life in prison for selling state secrets	849
Jailed Tibetan Community Leader Denied Retrial	849
Cheng Peiming: Organ Harvesting Survivor Slandered in China and Threatened in the US	850
China said to intensify crackdown on Tibetan monks, religious education	851
Undisclosed Arrests of Four Tibetans Sweep Through Ngaba as Chinese Authorities Target Monks, Civilians	851

October 852

Authorities Arrest Four Tibetans in Ngaba County for Contacting Outsiders	852
Tibetan monks' phones seized after accusations of sharing news about school closures	853
China cracks down on 'uncivilised' online puns used to discuss sensitive topics	853
Condemned Uyghur official dies in prison in China's Xinjiang region	854
Overcrowding reported at China detention centers amid economic downturn	855
Falun Gong Practitioner Persecuted to Death 5 Days After Arrival in Notorious Prison	856
In rare appeal, Tibetan calls for company to stop digging up river	856
Yunnan, Update on Brother Chang Hao: Sentenced, Liberated, and Detained Again	858
China's ruling against Tibetan activist highlights Beijing's poor human rights record	858
Tibetan singer arrested for 'patriotic song' released early from prison	859
Former Tibetan political prisoner Thupten Yeshe passes away at 74 in Lhasa	860

September 860

China targets high-ranking officials who read banned books	860
Chinese police 'stalling' after school attack on dissident's son	862

Chinese dissidents cut off from families at Mid-Autumn Festival	863
Political Shakeup at China's Top Social Sciences Institute Over Alleged Dissent	864
August	865
China's Economic Protests Give President Xi Jinping a Headache	865
Tibetan woman arrested for spreading rumours about closure of Ragya Sherig Norbuling school	865
Feds accuse Tiananmen Square pro-democracy activist of secretly working for China's intelligence agency decades later	866
Another Chinese Young Man Confronts CCP, Calls for Xi Jinping's Resignation	866
The First Known Survivor of CCP's Forced Organ Harvesting Speaks Out in Washington, DC	867
China tries 11 Mongol herders for defending traditional land	867
Activist of Hunan bridge banner, White Paper Movement missing	868
Fate of Drepung monastery monk remains uncertain after 17 years of disappearance	869
Protest banner against Xi Jinping in China calls for freedom and democracy	869
July	870
Job losses, protests present difficulties for Chinese Communist Party	870
Rights group urges forced labour investigation, especially in mining industry, in Tibet	871
June	873
US: China still arresting 'thousands' each year for practicing faith	873
After Escaping China by Sea, a Dissident Faces His Next Act	874
China's political refugees remain at risk long after leaving country	875
Chengdu Early Rain Church Member Detained for Commemorating Tiananmen	877
May	877
Chinese lawyers decry official supervisory interferences during court trials	877
Ms. Rei Xia's Speech at the 16th Annual Geneva Summit for Human Rights and Democracy	878
China Tries to Erase the History—of 2022	880
A growing number of Chinese Indonesians are winning political offices	881
April	883
Children not spared in China's persecution of human rights defenders' families	883
China reveals it executed scientist for spying in 2016 in documentary about 'shocking' cases	883
China's top legislator meets DPRK top leader	885
Covering China brings surveillance, harassment, report finds	886
China and Thailand to Carry Out Joint Moon Exploration	887
China Accused of Buying Off Strategic Island Nation With Bottled Water	887
China court jails 'tortured' rights activist Xu Qin for four years	888

March 889

CPC leadership reviews disciplinary inspection report	889
China spy agency fingers consultancies as espionage threat	890
U-M study reveals how China's local bureaucrats struggle for power through negative media coverage	891
Detailed measures stipulate place name translation from foreign language must not compromise China's territorial claims, sovereign rights	892
What to expect at China's 'Two Sessions' amid sagging economy, party drama	892
China's premier won't meet the press after 'two sessions' for first time in 3 decades	894
China's top political advisory body concludes standing committee session	895
Intrigue swirls about possible reshuffles as China's parliament convenes	895
China's Xi Jinping calls for 'loyalty and honesty' from younger officials as morale runs low	896
China economy gaining momentum despite calls for hardline US stance: senior diplomat	897
Further fall from grace for disappeared former foreign, defence ministers in opaque world of China	898

February 899

China's embattled former foreign minister steps down as a lawmaker	899
Leaked document trove shows a Chinese hacking scheme focused on harassing dissidents	899
China revamps discipline inspection rules to ensure Xi Jinping's instructions are carried out	900
China's would-be powerhouse Hunan wants officials to 'emancipate their minds'	901
Chinese firm behind local 'news' websites spreading Beijing propaganda in 30 countries	902
State education leaders urged to investigate whether CCP is infiltrating K-12 schools	903
China's Political Power List Hints at Fate of Disappeared Official	903
China's increasing political influence in the south Pacific has sparked an international response	904
Chinese security agencies tell students studying abroad to beware risk from foreign spies	905
China expands visa exemption policy to attract more foreigners	906
China to strengthen propaganda control on discussion of ethnic minority issues	907

January 908

China's anti-corruption watchdog says 110,000 Communist Party officials faced disciplinary action last year	908
China 'gamed' UN human rights review, experts say	909
China's Communist Party vows to take on 'new and old challenges' in People's Daily article based on Xi Jinping's speech	910
China in overdrive to defend its UN-battered rights record ahead of review report	911
Open letter from Chinese Civil Society Organizations to the President of the United Nations Human Rights Council	912
China's ethnic affairs officials urged to promote integration of minority groups	913

Western countries use UN-backed review to press China on its treatment of activists and minorities	913
China's human rights record criticised at UN as it faces rare scrutiny of policies	914
Xi Jinping urges loyalty from China's courts and law enforcers to 'defuse' social and financial risks	915
China Builds Spy Stations in Mountains on Disputed Border	916
China's patriotic education law a bad news for ethnic minority areas	916
'No one is safe': China purges record number of senior officials in 2023, with more 'tigers' likely to fall	917
China's cadres urged to connect with the masses as part of education campaign, but some question its methods	918

MILITARY AND INFRASTRUCTURE DEVELOPMENT 921

December 921

China completes building highest-altitude, largest-capacity hydropower project in Yellow River basin in Qinghai	921
China approves Tibet mega dam that could generate 3 times more power than Three Gorges	922
Satellite images show huge construction activity on Chinese side near Arunachal Pradesh	922
New flight to connect Tibet's capital with Singapore	923
China has expanded its nuclear force and strengthened ties to Russia, the Pentagon says	924
China has improved military infrastructure and training along LAC: US report	925

November 926

Chinese military conducts patrol near disputed Scarborough shoal	926
Western China railroad work progressing smoothly, boosting shared growth	927
China opposes using Taiwan question as excuse to strengthen military deployment	928
Tibetan Art Museum wins Supreme Award for Structural Engineering Excellence	929
EU has 'conclusive' proof of armed drones for Russia being made in China: sources	929
China's largest air show takes off with fighter jets, attack drones	931
China's Advanced firing range and probable SIGINT facilities near in Shigatse( Tibet Autonomous Region)	931
Exclusive: Chinese researchers develop AI model for military use on back of Meta's Llama	939

October 940

China's leader has a new military secretary, state TV video of rocket force visit suggests	940
Xi Jinping Inspects Rocket Force Unit, Emphasizes Combat Readiness and Party Leadership	941
Border town in Xizang sees rapid growth in cross-border trade, tourism under favorable national policies	941

September 942

China confirms 'successful' intercontinental ballistic missile test	942
---	-----

China builds laser communication ground station for massive satellite data transmission	943
China mulls national military training for children, college students	943
Construction begins on 1.1 GW solar project in Tibet	945
Exclusive: US expected to send senior Pentagon official to China military forum	945

August 946

Chinese military's new focus: Winning wars against "strong enemies, opponents"	946
The Middle Of Nowhere: Introducing China's 5 Most Remote Airports	947
China Revises Military Personnel Benefits Regulations for 2024 Implementation	949
China eyes anti-drone technology as key to future battlefield success	949
Tibetan prefecture marches toward modernization	950
Pidu District in China's Chengdu leads way in urban- rural integrated development	951

July 953

China's defence spending dwarfs rest of Asia combined, likely to be close to US	953
Beijing promises joint facility, but builds full army base in Tajikistan	953
President Xi Jinping purges PLA generals in massive military overhaul	953
China redefining air power with huge stealth fighter rollout	954
Satellite images show China's new bunker near Pangong Lake in eastern Ladakh	956
Exclusive: India races to build power plants in region claimed by China	956
China's military sends troops to Laos for 2-week joint military drills	957
SOF Pic of the Day: People's Armed Police Tibet Special Warfare Detachment – Guardians of the Roof of the World	958
Satellite images reveal China's military build-up near Pangong Lake, India's western border	959
Chinese crews drill through Xinjiang glacial area for 'super-long' highway tunnel	960
Poised along the Indian border, Chinese troops are there for the long haul	961

June 963

Xi eyes military supremacy as he reorganises China's armed forces	963
China is snapping up land near military sites – Washington needs to act ASAP	964
Central Military Commission Tells PLA to Tighten Budget	965
Xi signals further military purges to eradicate corruption	965
China Sends Advanced Fighter Jets to Contested Border with India, Satellite Images Show	966
China to boost rail links to Xinjiang and Tibet, with eye on supply chains and energy security	967
China reported to have boosted offensive air capabilities along Tibet-border with India	968

May 968

China's PLAAF Deploys Stealth J-20, J-10 Fighters At Shigatse Air Base Just 150 Km From Indian Border	968
---	-----

Incredible new £34bn train line that's 1,012 miles long and will cut journeys by 35 hours	970
Guangming Daily: the Importance of Chinese-Built International Communications Platforms	970
China launches new satellite into space	971
China militarizing its entire population in new defence build-up?	971
China's next defense buildup: mandatory military training for students	972
China takes measures against 12 U.S. military-linked firms	972

April 973

China Ramps Up Military Activity In Tibet And Xinjiang   Why It Matters To India?	973
Xi shakes up China's military in rethink of how to 'fight and win' future wars	973
Xi Jinping unveils newest branch of Chinese military	975
Xi orders China's biggest military reorganization since 2015	976
Chinese Ministry of State Security: 'Military Fans' at High Risk of Becoming Espionage Targets	976
Xi Jinping tightens grip on China's military with new information warfare unit	977
NASA chief warns of Chinese military presence in space	977
China's latest Military Buildup in Tibet: China's Provocation does not end with just Cartographic Aggression	978
Highest Altitude Airport in the World 2024, List of Top-10	980
Chinese military researchers zero in on AI-driven navy, space combat to 'win future wars'	981
Longest Runway In The World: A Brief Guide To China's Rikaze Peace Airport	981
China set to become the world's largest air force, top US military official warns	983

March 984

Chinese military's security chief Wang Renhua elevated to top rank of general	984
Chinese Ministry of State Security: 'Military Fans' at High Risk of Becoming Espionage Targets	985
China's South Asia 'bridgehead' needs urgent infrastructure boost to aid security, mineral exploration	986

February 986

China moved military forces in disregard of agreements: Jaishankar on border row in eastern Ladakh	986
Military diplomacy in focus amid mega peacekeeping exercise	987
CCP Expands Military Recruitment, Especially in Rural Areas	988
DEFENSE/9 Chinese military aircraft cross median line: Taiwan defense ministry	988
China 'Targets' India In Its Latest Military Venture; Works On '007 Drones' To Fight Indian Army At LAC	989

January 990

China's defence ministry spokesperson says India border issue 'left over from history'	990
Taiwan begins extended one-year conscription in response to China threat	990

Map Shows China's Latest Military Moves Around Dangerous Flashpoint	991
Over 700 Chinese border outposts connected to national power grid, boosts defense capability	992
India in rush to outbuild China while continuing talks to avoid border conflict	992
Communist Party diplomat Liu Jianchao, on US visit, urges 'correct' understanding of China	993
US and Chinese military officials meet in Washington	994
US lists China among 'Countries of Particular Concern' for severity of religious repression	995
China to spend $11bn on Tibetan infrastructure this year	995
China sanctions 5 US defense companies in response to US sanctions and arms sales to Taiwan	996
Pakistan in Talks with China to Acquire J-31 Stealth Fighters	996

CYBER SECURITY 999

China activates 'freedom in Tibet' propaganda triggered by US-Dalai Lama meet in Dharamshala	999
Chinese hackers have stepped up attacks on Taiwanese organizations, cybersecurity firm says	1000
Geologists raise concerns over possible censorship and bias in Chinese chatbot	1001
Hackers for hire: How the Chinese Communist Party is trying to monitor the entire world	1002
China's local governments shut down social media accounts as budgets shrink	1004

SINO-INDIAN RELATIONS 1007

December 1007

China creates a new county made up largely of India-claimed Aksai China	1007
China expresses condolences over death of India's former PM Singh	1008
Recent Sino-India pact being implemented effectively, says China	1008
India-China ties in 2024: Military standoff with India ends in Ladakh, long freeze over	1008
India not on same page with China on 'bifurcating' border issue at Special Representatives meeting in Beijing	1010
China building ability to 'fight and win wars' post 2020 standoff with India: US report	1010
'What if China suddenly releases water?' Arunachal Chief Minister asks protesters against major dam project	1011
China ready to enhance mutual trust with India at border talks, foreign ministry says	1012
India's Spending on Defense To Deter China	1012
23rd Meeting of the Special Representatives of India and China	1013
Successful Modi-Xi meeting signifies new beginning of India-China ties: senior CPC official	1013
Indian opposition raises doubts over India-China border deal	1014
Chinese company to set up plant in Punjab to manufacture robotic agricultural tools	1015
China, India vow to learn lessons of deadly 2020 border clash, keep talking to avert rerun	1015
As relations improve, Indian foreign minister outlines three principles for engaging with China	1016

India's success in capturing 'China-Plus-One strategy' limited: NITI report	1017
---	------

November 1017

Patrolling Agreement with China Implemented: MEA tells Lok Sabha	1017
China, India find common ground for 'strategic recalibration' in post-clash thaw	1018
Armies making great progress in implementing settlement: China	1019
China looks forward to harmonious dance between the Chinese dragon and Indian elephant with concerted steps: defense spokesperson	1020
Centre Approves ₹ 28,229 Crore For 1,637 Km Arunachal Frontier Highway Along LAC	1021
China outpaces India in nuclear aircraft carrier race with new breakthrough	1021
Resumption of Kailash-Mansarovar pilgrimage discussed during recent India-China foreign ministers' meeting	1022
Need to focus on cooperation, not conflict: Rajnath tells Chinese minister	1023
EAM Jaishankar Emphasizes De-escalation as Next Step in Sino-Indian Relations After Disengagement	1024
China accused of trying to stifle India's growth with export restrictions	1025
Rajnath Singh, Chinese counterpart likely to meet for 1st time after border truce	1025
Nepal's exports to India suffer due to latter's concern about Chinese components	1026
Indian Army denies reports China is causing deadlock in coordinating Depsang patrolling	1027
'Other steps could happen': EAM Jaishankar on India-China ties after LAC disengagement	1027
China is building new villages on its remote Himalayan border. Some appear to have crossed the line	1028
Relationship between India and Tibet is centuries old: CM	1032
Union minister Rijiju interacts with Chinese soldiers in Arunachal as eastern Ladakh disengagement set for completion	1032
Indian and Chinese border troops exchange Diwali sweets after Depsang and Demchok disengagement	1033

October 1034

Indian And Chinese Troops Gift Sweets At Contested Border	1034
Rajnath Singh to celebrate Diwali with soldiers at Bum La Pass in China border	1034
India: Border issues far from fully resolved, normalizing China ties to take time	1035
India and China disengaging at Ladakh border after reaching a patrolling deal	1036
Two Nepalese nationals arrested in Lucknow for digital fraud linked to Chinese operative	1036
China and India should manage their differences, Xi tells Modi in first formal talks in 5 years	1037
Amid Modi-Xi meet, Indian Army opens museum to counter China's claims about Arunachal Pradesh	1038
A Modi-Xi Meeting Could Signal a Thaw Between India and China	1038
China's Xi and India's Modi meet after border accord between two countries	1039
China confirms pact with India to 'resolve' conflict over disputed border	1040

Arunachal's Siang valley dam project on fast track to counter China threat	1041
India calls out China's non-transparent subsidies that stifle competition at WTO meet	1042
China urges India to handle Taiwan issue cautiously after Mumbai office opening	1042
Satellite pics show new Chinese settlement under construction near Pangong Lake	1042
India expresses cautious optimism in Tibet-border talks with China	1043
India launches major strategic infrastructure projects and plans, procurements as China threat simmers	1044
India 'cautiously optimistic' about border talks with China: Rajnath Singh	1045
EXPLAINED: Is China taking away people's passports?	1045
"Ready to enhance communication with India, increase mutual trust": Chinese Foreign Ministry	1046
New air force chief calls for India to 'catch up' with China on defence tech	1047
Jaishankar refutes Chinese incursion claims in Arunachal Pradesh	1048
China's restrictions drive Indians to undertake helicopter Mt Kailash pilgrimage from own country	1048
India's renewed push for permanent UN Security Council seat faces persistent China roadblock	1048
India: Tension with China to remain amid trust deficit, continuing border standoff	1050
India cites 'trust deficit' to continue winter troop deployment on China-ruled Tibet-borders	1050
September	1051
Jaishankar Puts China And Pakistan On Blast at the U.N.	1051
China sends 'deterrent message' with missile intercept test near Indian border	1051
China demanding patrolling right in Indian held Arunachal territory?	1052
China calls India's conquest, naming of Arunachal peak after 6th Dalai Lama 'illegal'	1053
Renaming of Arunachal peak illegal: China	1053
Reached 'some consensus' with India: Chinese military on disengagement process in Ladakh	1054
China's high-altitude heliports in Tibet a sobering reminder of threat to India along LAC	1054
India displays battle readiness as eastern Ladakh standoff continues amid Chinese buildup	1055
India rules out joining world's largest trade deal, accuses China of 'very opaque' trade practices	1056
China welcomes more Indian investments, ambassador says	1057
Indian minister cites Tibet-border progress with China, cites a host of other difficulties in bilateral ties	1057
India, China agree to redouble efforts for complete disengagement along border	1058
China occupied land the size of Delhi in Ladakh': Rahul Gandhi makes big claim, attacks PM Modi	1058
India has to change its policy if it wants to attract more Chinese investment: China Daily editorial	1059
Indian foreign minister Jaishankar says "not closed to business from China"	1060

Mere painting of marks does not mean China encroached our land: Rijiju 1060

August 1061

Foreign minister Jaishankar underlines India's special problem with China 1061

India, China discuss situation along LAC to narrow down differences and find resolutions 1062

Indian solar panels face US scrutiny for possible links to China forced labor 1062

Ladakh herders seek mechanism for return of yaks straying across Tibet border 1063

Jaishankar says China, Pakistan not invited to join Voice of Global South summit 1063

China Threatens To Snatch Disputed Areas On India- China Border, Indo-Pacific Using PLA-Backed 'Civilian Soldiers' 1063

Message to China? PM Modi says India's progress doesn't come with crisis for anyone, we are land of Buddha 1065

Eye on China & Pakistan, India fast-tracks deal for 31 US 'hunter-killer' drones 1066

Minor Indian-Chinese troops skirmish along Ladakh border reported 1066

China, Pakistan Try To Derail India, G4 Nations' UN Security Council Bid 1067

Civil 'guardians': China quietly builds villages near border with India, other countries to press territorial claims 1068

China still to acknowledge having custody of 2 Arunachal men missing from border for nearly 2 years 1068

China ready to work with India to bridge gap between people of the two countries: Chinese diplomat 1069

China's Pangong Tso bridge in Tibet seen as meant to alter India-border status quo 1069

July 1071

Tensions raised as China expands military presence along India's vast northern border 1071

India-China relations under the Modi 3.0 government 1072

Arunachal lawmaker raises serious concern over China's mega dam construction in occupied Tibet 1073

Take up China's under-construction mega dam issue with Centre: Ering 1074

India Considers Easing Visa Restrictions for Chinese Technicians 1075

China's continued blocking of Kailash-Mansarovar pilgrimage in Tibet violates bilateral agreements 1075

Indian and Chinese diplomats to meet soon as border dispute continues to freeze bilateral ties 1076

China says India has no right to develop contested border region 1077

Satellite Images show China building infrastructure in area which it is illegally occupying since Nehru's time 1077

PLA Readies for Extended Conflict with India as Global Crises Intensify 1078

India, China foreign ministers agree to work on border issues 1080

At SCO Summit, PM Modi's speech takes a veiled swipe at China, Pakistan 1080

June 1081

Xi invokes Panchsheel as key to end today's global conflicts	1081
Indian tank sinks while crossing river near China border, killing 5	1081
EXCLUSIVE   India Has Legitimate Say in Dalai Lama Selection, China Just Wants to Control Tibet	1082
India plans Tibet renaming tactic to foil China's water diplomacy with Maldives	1083
India should recalibrate its position on China, says president of Tibetan government in exile	1084
'Unwarranted': India slams China, Pakistan for mentioning J&K in joint statement	1086
China ready to improve bilateral ties with India and work on border dispute	1086
After Modi's election win, China calls for 'stable' relations with India	1087

May 1087

Modi's uncoordinated approach on Tibet gives China the advantage	1087
'China allegedly invaded India in 1962': Congress' Mani Shankar Aiyar sparks row with remark	1088
The Chinese strategy of 'resettlement villages' aims at colonising LAC	1088
China Is Upgrading Dual-Use Villages Along Its Disputed Indian Border	1090
Open airing of serious differences belie border settlement hopes as China's new envoy arrived in India	1092
Jaishankar on India-China standoff: 'Abnormal deployment along LAC'	1093
China is India's top trade partner, enjoys a huge trade surplus	1093
China's new envoy to India appears accommodating, but belittles border standoff issue	1093
Indian Embassy in China holds first meeting with students hit hard by COVID visa bans	1094

April 1095

Chinese military on PM Modi's border remarks: 'Situation generally stable'	1095
China may say whatever they want, but Sikkim is part of India: CM PS Tamang	1095
India takes big step to counter China snooping threat from surveillance cameras	1096
PM spells out India's position on China	1096
India takes big step to counter China snooping threat from surveillance cameras	1098
Indian Army celebrates 40 years of 'Operation Meghdoot' on Siachen Glacier	1098
China has not occupied any Indian land, claims S Jaishankar	1099
China says 'great positive progress' made to resolve border row with India	1100
Naam ke vaaste, let's call Tibet dalailabad	1100
In Newsweek interview, PM Modi speaks on India-China border dispute: 'We need to urgently address...'	1101
China's Neighbor Sends Russian-Made Air Defense Missiles to Border	1101
Why are there three Chinese spy ships in the Indian Ocean Region?	1102
China may disrupt elections in India using AI, warns Microsoft	1103
Chengdu as Bharatnagar and Kunming as Modinagar?	1103

US 'strongly opposes' China's renaming of areas along disputed Indian border	1104
Ban order compels climate activist Sonam Wangchuk to call off Tibet-border March	1105
China developing 175 more security villages in Tibet near India-border?	1106
US Reacts After China Renames Neighbor's Territory	1106
India's remote Ladakh protests against Beijing-Delhi squeeze	1107
Assam CM proposes Tit-for-Tat response to China's gimmick	1108
India rejects China's renaming of 30 places in Himalayan border state	1109
China gives its own name to 30 more places in Arunachal Pradesh in cartographic extension of its Tibet rule	1109
China renames 30 places in Arunachal Pradesh; Jaishankar says it means nothing	1110
Tensions mount as India deploys 10,000 additional troops along its contested border with China	1111

March 1111

China gives its own name to 30 more places in Arunachal Pradesh in cartographic extension of its Tibet rule	1111
China continues to harp on its claim over Arunachal Pradesh	1112
China's State Media Reacts After India Predicts Prolonged Border Tensions	1112
Arunachal Pradesh 'inherent part of China's territory', claims Chinese military	1113
US Intelligence Report Warns of Potential Armed Conflict Between India and China	1114
Trustworthiness-challenged China criticizes India's Tibet-border redeployment move	1114
China protests against India tunnel opening, warns it will only complicate border issue	1115
India-China relations: Foreign Minister S Jaishankar highlights decades of peace shattered by 2020 conflict	1116
China-India ties remain adrift as wait for Chinese envoy to New Delhi drags on	1117
China urges Indian media to uphold One China policy, berating a Taiwan foreign Minister interview	1119
India to open 'strategically important' navy base near China-friendly Maldives	1119
India, China in 'constructive communication' to settle Ladakh standoff: Chinese military	1119

February 1120

'Mind games ...': Jaishankar warns against China's bid to derail bilateral ties	1120
'Ladakh stand-off led India to cite China as No. 1 threat'	1121
'Beijing tried to...': Amit Shah likens LAC standoff to 1962 Indo-China war in Lok Sabha	1121
Budget for cultural bodies linked to Tibetans slashed to Rs 20 crore	1122

January 1122

India's top civilian honour to Taiwanese business leader seen as message to China	1122
Apprehensions in India as Chinese Survey Ship Heads to Maldives	1123
India parades domestic weapons amid China border tensions	1124

China reiterates 'historical legacy' to continue holding up resolution of Ladakh border dispute	1125
China and India Compete for Influence in War on Border	1126
China has not filled India Ambassador's post in over one year	1127
Chinese research vessel heads to Maldives, could concern India	1128
India urged to properly handle ties with China	1128
Fresh Details of India-China Skirmishes on Ladakh Border Emerge	1129
Exclusive: India could ease China investment curbs if border stays calm	1130
China's Visa Revolution: Over 180,000 Visas Issued to Indian Citizens in 2023	1131
'Normal relations with China impossible if...': EAM S Jaishankar on India-China ties	1131
'New Delhi should stay more open-minded': China amid Maldives- India 'derogatory' remark row	1132
'Boycott' Maldives call: President Mohamed Muizzu's 'India-out' policy and pro-China tilt	1133
'Indeed, a major power': China's Global Times article praises India's strides under PM Modi	1133

CHINA IN THE REGION 1136

China-Bhutan 1136

Bhutan and China Border Meeting Shows China's Use of Coercive Tactics in Land Disputes	1136
New township reported coming up in Lhokha in China's Tibet-border build-up	1139
Chinese academic warns Bhutan's India-bonhomie is inimical to Tibet-border talks	1139

China-East Turkestan 1140

December 1140

China's United Front takes Taiwanese youth on Xinjiang trips	1140
Digging of 46 illegal wells by Chinese migrants threatens Xinjiang's ecological balance: Report	1142
Reinvestigation: Better lives in Xinjiang villages refute "forced labor" allegations	1142
Chinese surveillance tech firm Dahua exits projects in Xinjiang	1144
Illegal wells in Xinjiang spark tension and dry up the land	1144
Chinese agricultural products linked to Uyghur forced labour, report suggests	1145
West urged to lift Xinjiang sanctions	1146
China Demolishes Uyghur Business Landmark in Xinjiang	1146

November 1147

China wants to turn Xinjiang's vast deserts into a string of pearls	1147
Uniqlo criticised in China after BBC report of CEO's Xinjiang comments	1147
Xinjiang's forced labour: Volkswagen and Uniqlo's take a step back	1148
Great wall of Taklamakan: China surrounds its largest desert with giant green belt	1149
Uyghur exiles accuse Xinjiang's leader of repression beyond borders	1150

School Stampede In China's Xinjiang Injures 14	1151
Trump's China Hawks Are Also Uyghur Advocates	1151
Uyghur advocates press for stronger enforcement of forced labor laws and Xinjiang recognition	1152
China uses London travel show to promote its narrative of Xinjiang in the West	1153
Civil group calls for accountability from China over human rights violations in Xinjiang	1154
October	1155
China's idyllic Xinjiang grasslands hid a salty soiled secret that's been solved	1155
China hosts World Media Summit in Xinjiang amid human rights concerns	1156
Former political advisor of Xinjiang arrested for suspected bribe-taking	1156
Rights groups blast Skechers over new store in Xinjiang	1157
EU Parliament urges China to release Uyghur doctor Gulshan Abbas, economist Ilham Tohti	1157
Chinese vice premier urges bolstering Xinjiang's development	1159
For Companies in China, Pulling Out of Xinjiang Poses 'Messy Dilemma'	1159
September	1161
Beijing's Transnational Repression of Dissidents: From Bad to Worse	1161
China: Free Uyghur Economist Ilham Tohti From Life Sentence	1162
The Uyghur Democratic Reform Movement Needs Unity and Support	1163
Xi Jinping stresses cultivating more high-caliber officials for Xinjiang	1165
China tried to influence MPs to vote against Uyghur genocide motion, documents show	1165
Uyghur-American politician calls out lack of global attention towards Xinjiang human rights crisis	1166
China's Xinjiang accelerates development of 'Air Silk Road'	1167
China ramping up transnational repression, Uyghur exiles in US say	1167
China bishop leads patriotic education tour in Xinjiang	1168
Travel warning issued over CCP Xinjiang efforts	1169
August	1170
China deflects after UN renews calls to investigate Xinjiang abuses	1170
China willing to engage with UN rights body on Xinjiang	1171
China's Xinjiang officials want to build 'strategic barrier for geopolitical security'	1172
China: two years after Xinjiang findings, UN Rights Chief reports 'limited access to information', 'reprisals' against activists	1173
China: Update on the work of UN Human Rights Office	1174
China's Xinjiang region emerges as a Powerhouse of international trade	1175
The Sunday Story: Arresting Your Brothers and Sisters	1176
Hundreds of Uyghur scientists imprisoned in China, rights group says	1176

China's Uyghur policies a 'racialised atrocity crime', Harvard law scholar finds	1177
7 brothers from prominent Uyghur family confirmed jailed in Xinjiang	1179
China diverting world attention away from Xinjiang crisis, says Swedish Uyghur Committee	1180
16 August 2024, The News Mill	1180
Report highlights systematic repression, human rights violations of Uyghurs in Xinjiang by China	1180
Turkish journalists on China-sponsored Xinjiang tour give positive reports	1181
Uyghur rights group condemns China for destroying 16,000 mosques in Xinjiang	1182
Uyghur Prison Sentences Total 4.4 Million Years	1183
Xinjiang starts water diversion for China's longest inland river	1184
Uyghur-American politician calls for enhanced cooperation to address independence struggles in China, PoGB	1184
Exclusive: Uyghur activist says former business partners sentenced in Xinjiang	1184
Xinjiang authorities target Uyghurs cadres in 'dark forces' crackdown	1186
July	1187
China executes 'slow-motion genocide' in Tibet, Xinjiang, conference told	1187
Xinjiang authorities intensify reporting requirements for Uyghur visitors	1188
Uyghur rights organization bashes China for atrocities in Xinjiang	1189
International pressure builds on China for human rights violations in Xinjiang, Tibet	1189
On Eid Al-Adha, calls for action highlight Uyghur and Turkic Muslims' plight in Xinjiang	1190
China bans Muslim Eid holiday rites for Uyghurs in Xinjiang	1191
China destroying mosques, erasing Islamic identity from Xinjiang: Report	1192
CCP's Anniversary Marred by Outcry Over Xinjiang 'Genocide'	1193
Ancient Buddhist temple in Xinjiang stirs controversy	1193
China, UAE hold 2nd annual air force drill in Xinjiang	1194
Uyghur Muslim Genocide: ETGE slams, exposes PRC globally for 'barbaric' human rights abuses in Xinjiang	1195
Uighur culture being erased as Beijing tightens grip on Xinjiang, 15 years after Urumqi riots	1195
15 years after Xinjiang unrest, China fends off criticism of hardline rule	1196
China's Xinjiang Communist Party chief urges 'unwavering' terror crackdown	1198
'Western misinformation regarding Xinjiang' addresses allegations of a genocide	1199
Committee to Protect Journalists demands release of two Kazakh journalists in Xinjiang	1199
No Uyghurs from Xinjiang went on Hajj pilgrimage, data shows	1200
Chinese authorities arrest 2 ethnic Kazakh TV journalists in Xinjiang	1201
CCP's anniversary marred by global outcry over Xinjiang 'genocide'	1201
June	1202

Canadian ambassador's visit to Xinjiang draws China's ire	1202
Sinicization in Xinjiang: CCP authorities kill Uyghurs, sell 'halal organs' to run medical transplant industry	1203
China changes names of 630 Uyghur villages in Xinjiang: report	1203
Human rights groups call for UN update, action on China's Xinjiang	1204
Religious and cultural mentions removed from names of China's Xinjiang villages	1205
Uyghur woman re-sentenced for teaching youth the Quran	1206
Former senior Xinjiang official expelled from CPC, public office	1207
China promotes Xinjiang, epicentre of human-rights abuses, as tourist destination	1207
China's ethnic policy chief slams 'ignorance of history' in Xinjiang assimilation claims	1208
Xinhua Headlines: "Forced labor" lies bring "forced unemployment" in Xinjiang	1209
Uyghur brothers shot dead on same day in Xinjiang prison	1211
Exiled Uyghur journalist links Urumqi arrests to his reporting	1212

May 1213

Mosques demolished, texts censored: How China is repressing Muslims in Xinjiang	1213
In Xinjiang, China's security chief calls for 'normalisation of counterterrorism'	1214
A decade of uncertainty: the fate of detained Uyghur refugees in Thailand	1214
'Significant' Volume of Xinjiang Cotton Mislabeled as US or Brazilian	1215
Jailed Uyghur official highlights Chinese-Uyghur land disputes	1216
INTERVIEW: Lawyer debunks China's historical narrative of control over Xinjiang	1216
1 in 26 Uyghurs jailed, accounting 1/3 of China's prison population: Uyghur Human Rights Project report	1216
China: Phone Search Program Tramples Uyghur Rights	1216
Uyghurs have highest rate of imprisonment in world: report	1219
US labor official calls on companies to exit China's Xinjiang	1220

April 1221

UN expert states Xinjiang and Tibet situations are components of Chinese Colonisation process	1221
China bans Uyghurs from using social media apps	1222
C House Reps urge crack down on companies benefiting from Chinese forced labor	1223
US lawmakers relaunch Uyghur caucus	1224
China finds foreign support for Xinjiang policies as region seeks to boost economic ties	1225
With feasts and patrols, China tries to keep Uyghurs from fasting	1226

March 1228

Uyghur publisher jailed for books on Uyghur independence, identity	1228
Human rights activist exposes Chinese oppression of Uyghurs in Xinjiang at UNHRC	1229

So-called 'forced labor' in Xinjiang is one of the most notorious laws of the 21st century, aiming to destabilize Xinjiang: FM 1229

China pushes 'Sinicization of Islam' in Xinjiang as Ramadan arrives 1230

EU reaches deal on forced labour ban, with China's Xinjiang in its sights 1231

China's foreign ministry brings in new press official from Xinjiang 1232

February 1233

BASF to speed up exit from Xinjiang ventures after Uyghur abuse reports 1233

January 1233

China tests new ethnic assimilation policy on Uyghurs 1233

China's Xinjiang posts robust foreign trade growth in 2023 1234

About 1,000 Tourists Trapped in China's Xinjiang After Avalanches 1235

Experts denounce trips to Xinjiang as 'genocide tourism' 1235

CCP Pilots Ethnic Interpenetration Policy in Xinjiang 1236

China's Xinjiang region says all new religious buildings must 'reflect Chinese characteristics' 1236

Xinjiang issues revised regulations on religious affairs 1237

China says 456,000 Uyghurs newly hired this year in Xinjiang 1238

China & Hong Kong 1239

December 1239

Explained: 6 Hong Kong activists against whom arrest warrants have been issued 1239

US report says Hong Kong becoming 'nearly indistinguishable' from Chinese cities, as Beijing condemns 'arrogance' 1240

Xi Jinping tells Hong Kong's John Lee country has 'very high expectations' 1241

China Customs seizes Hong Kong geography textbook said to wrongly depict Chinese borders 1242

Hong Kong officials learn neighborhood surveillance from China 1243

November 1244

China resumes multiple-entry visas for Shenzhen travellers to Hong Kong 1244

Hong Kong's AI efforts connect China and rest of the world amid geopolitical tensions 1244

From VOA Mandarin: Beijing redefines 'Hong Kong people governing Hong Kong' 1245

Anti-China separatists in HK sentenced, sending clear message to West's interference 1245

Hong Kong democracy activist Jimmy Lai denies inciting hatred towards China in trial 1245

China's vice premier vows to boost Hong Kong competitiveness, says stimulus push has 'benefited' the city 1246

Chinese Vice-Premier He Lifeng urges Hong Kong to be 'self-assertive' on 3 paths to reform 1246

After long legal battle, Hong Kong's 47 democrats brace for sentencing 1248

Hong Kong leader updates Xi Jinping on city's progress at Apec summit in Peru 1249

Mainland further eases travel to Hong Kong and Macao 1249

China hawk Rubio likely to take hard line on Hong Kong but Beijing well prepared: experts 1250

October 1251

Hong Kong inmate denied early release under security law 'treated unfairly', court told 1251

Beijing urges HSBC to keep backing mainland China and Hong Kong's development push 1252

China heightens surveillance in Hong Kong; critics and citizens on alert 1253

Hong Kong and mainland China broaden trade agreement to support local firms' expansion across border 1253

Hong Kong plans to install thousands of surveillance cameras. Critics say it's more proof the city is moving closer to China 1254

Amnesty International recognizes three activists as prisoners of conscience 1256

September 1257

Prison sentences to Hong Kong journalists highlight China's suppression of opinion 1257

China calls on Hong Kong tycoons to help kickstart national economy 1258

Hong Kong man jailed 14 months under new security law for 'seditious' online statements 1259

US lawmakers call on China to free Hong Kong Catholic, democracy advocate Jimmy Lai 1260

Hong Kong man sentenced to 14 months in jail for 'seditious' T-shirt 1261

Hong Kong man jailed for 10 months under new security law over 'seditious' graffiti left on back of bus seats 1261

Musical "Patriotic Education" in Hong Kong 1262

China's central government will 'expand' Hong Kong's role in Belt and Road Initiative 1262

Stand News Editors Convicted of Sedition by Hong Kong Court, Marking Setback for Freedom of Press in Hong Kong 1264

German Activist For Tibet Issues Says Denied Entry To Hong Kong 1264

August 1264

Hong Kong has 'irreplaceable' role in country's reform efforts: senior Beijing officials 1264

In Hong Kong, Xi has completed where Deng 1266

left off 1266

A History Museum Shows How China Wants to Remake Hong Kong 1267

Conference on promoting China's peaceful reunification held in Hong Kong 1268

Beijing admits Hong Kong-flagged ship destroyed key Baltic gas pipeline 'by accident' 1269

Exclusive | Hong Kong should work with mainland China to host 'Belt and Road Games', Regina Ip says 1270

Hong Kong secondary students may soon be schooled in 'Xi Jinping Thought' 1271

Xi Jinping sends rare letter urging Hong Kong entrepreneurs to play major role in China's reform 1272

01 August 2024, SCMP, Willa Wu 1272

July	1273
Hong Kong probes scandal of fake degree certificates from China	1273
Rich Chinese return to Hong Kong as Singapore steps up scrutiny	1275
China grants 5-year travel visa for Hong Kong, Macau residents; all details here	1276
June	1277
Man charged under new Hong Kong security law over 'seditious' social media posts remanded in custody	1277
Hong Kongers embrace politics in UK, but some still fear Beijing	1277
China's intelligence agency says trial of Hong Kong 47 a 'major test' of national security, rule of law	1278
17 people jailed up to 5 years, 10 months over attempted escape from besieged Hong Kong campus during 2019 protests	1279
Three arrested in Hong Kong for 'insulting' Chinese anthem at World Cup qualifier	1279
Heavy security in China and Hong Kong on 35th anniversary of Tiananmen crackdown	1280
04 June 2024, NPR	1280
China and Hong Kong reportedly detain dissidents before Tiananmen Square anniversary	1281
May	1282
'Hong Kong 47' trial: 14 activists found guilty of conspiracy to commit subversion	1282
Hong Kong trade offices 'keep an eye' on 'anti-China' activities	1283
YouTube agrees to remove videos of banned Hong Kong protest song	1284
Beijing adds 8 mainland Chinese cities to Hong Kong solo traveller scheme, with residents in parts of Inner Mongolia, Xinjiang and Tibet to benefit	1285
Hong Kong court ban on pro-democracy anthem 'Glory to Hong Kong' sparks new fears over heightened censorship in Hong Kong	1286
April	1287
China says Hong Kong must 'tightly hold' national security line to safeguard development	1287
March	1288
Article 23: China hits back at criticism of Hong Kong's hardline new security law	1288
China Tightens Grip On Hong Kong, Issues New National Security Law Bill	1288
China removes Hong Kong affairs veteran Zhang Xiaoming from senior role at top advisory body	1289
China's 'two sessions' 2024: Hong Kong delegates to raise ways to keep city unique, help mainland companies go global	1289
China urges U.S. to stop interfering in Hong Kong affairs	1291
February	1291
Hong Kong is now over, says China's former good friend	1291

China says Messi's absence in Hong Kong match beyond 'realm of sports' as fury builds	1292
China's Xi Jinping hails progress in integrating Hong Kong and Macau in speech ahead of Lunar New Year	1293
January	1293
China and Hong Kong broaden investment and financing Links	1293
Hong Kong should allow mainland Chinese travellers from more cities to visit on individual trips, industry figures say	1294
Hong Kong crackdown turns Taiwan against China doctrine	1295
Hong Kong, mainland China in talks over bringing back multiple-entry visas for Shenzhen residents before Lunar New Year: government source	1296
China Urges Countries to Fully Respect Fact that Hong Kong Has Returned To China: FM Spokesperson	1297
China- Mongolia	1298
Heavy Jail Sentences Against Falun Gong Practitioners in Southern Mongolia	1298
After 'Xizang' for 'Tibet', is it 'Northern frontier' for 'Inner Mongolia'?	1298
China tries 11 Mongol herders for defending traditional land	1299
A Letter to UN Special Rapporteur on the Independence of Judges and Lawyers by the Southern Mongolian Human Rights Information Center	1300
China recruits Mandarin-speaking teachers to move to Inner Mongolia	1301
China – Nepal	1302
December	1302
Nepal, China universities sign collaboration agreement	1302
Himalayan Yak: No more treasure for mountain people as Tibet restricts trade	1303
China-Nepal railway to be a game changer, transform Nepal from landlocked to landlinked: former envoy	1304
Nepal embraces China's BRI	1305
Chinese class restarted for Nepali journalists	1306
Nepal media note absence of Beijing's Panchen Lama	1306
Controversial monk behind attempts to bring China-appointed Panchen to Nepal?	1308
Li Qiang Holds Talks with Prime Minister of Nepal KP Sharma Oli	1308
Nepal shoots down the prospect of Panchen Lama's visit	1309
Panchen Lama to make rare visit to Nepal after Tibet trip, reports say	1311
BRI Cooperation Framework made public	1312
Nepal's leader visits Beijing, joint statement uses 'Xizang' to refer to Tibet	1312
Nepal's Multimillion-Dollar Pilgrimage Industry Crumbles Under China's Tibet Restrictions	1313
Nepal PM Oli reaffirms 'One China' policy, bans anti-China activities	1314

November 1315

Nepal Foreign Minister to visit China tomorrow to lay grounds for PM Oli's visit	1315
Nepal readies new BRI deal ahead of PM's China visit	1316
Security deals related to Tibet-border on agenda of Nepali PM's visit to China	1317
My visit to China won't harm Nepal's ties with India: PM Oli	1318
BRI debate drags on as Chinese envoy lobbies Congress	1319
China's BRI rattles Nepal's ruling coalition	1321
Prime Minister's prioritizing of China visit becomes political issue in Nepal	1322
CPN-UML Condemns Former PM Prachanda's Remarks on PM Oli's China Visit	1322
Chinese VP offers help to overcome security challenges in Pakistan	1323
Nepal PM picks Beijing over New Delhi for maiden visit, urged to bolster economic ties	1324
China should show magnanimity and waive off the Pokhara airport loan	1325
Chinese envoy: We support Nepal's infrastructure development	1328
China reported to have banned Nepal-Tibet borderland marriages	1329

October 1329

Nepal opens Lomanthang to all citizens travelling to Chinese ruled Tibet	1329
Nepal entrusts China to print Rs 100 notes with map laying claim over Indian territory	1330
China-aided public welfare projects handed over to Nepal's community	1331
CPC holds meeting of Nepali political parties, PM Oli reiterates 'no anti-China activities' stand	1331
Chinese leaders meet top party leaders in Kathmandu	1332
Chairman Prachanda stresses for implementation of agreements signed between Nepal, China	1333
CPC invites 15 leaders each from Nepali parties in House for its briefing in Kathmandu	1333
China expands territorial claims with new fence along Nepal-Tibet border	1334
China fails to push BRI implementation plan in Nepal	1335
China's economic and political ties with Nepal affecting lives of Tibetan refugee community	1337
Nepal Urges China to Share Data Required for Flood Management	1338
Chinese Communist Party's direct aid to Nepali parties comes under fire	1339
China's withholding of vital information on glacial lakes in Tibet may have contributed to Nepal's flood disaster	1340
Chinese Communist Party launches relief initiative for Nepal flood victims	1340
Red Cross Society of China donates $100,000 to disaster victims of Nepal	1341

September 1341

Nepal surveys damage after deadly floods kill at least 193 people	1341
Nepalese Prime Minister Khadga Prasad Sharma Oli Meets with Wang Yi	1341

Nepal's Deputy PM, Chinese Vice Premier discuss bilateral relations; implementation of projects in time bound manner	1342
China committed to building closer China-Nepal community with shared future: Chinese FM	1342
Nepal, China see surge in border trade	1342
China, Nepal launch joint military training	1343
Nepal and China set to resume military drill	1343
Nepal trade point of Khasa opens for cargo trucks to Kathmandu after 2 week closure	1343

August 1344

China–Nepal strategic partnership stumbles over BRI and boundary issues	1344
Nepal, China to issue five-year passes for Himalayan districts	1345
China-Nepal agricultural technology park launched in southern Nepal	1346
Benighat-Manaslu-China road brings promises of economic shift	1347
Nepal Asks China to Wipe Away a Loan It Can't Afford to Pay Back	1348
In Nepal, the US and India Come Together to Counter China	1349
Nepal government prepares to lift TikTok ban	1350
Locals of Gorkha elated with reopening of Nepal- China border	1351
Chinese drones to transport trash from Nepal's Mount Everest in groundbreaking initiative	1351
Chinese envoy to Nepal kicks up another row via social media	1352

July 1352

As China drags feet on key project, Nepal says: 'No, thanks. Will fund it ourselves'	1352
Will Nepal's new coalition government tip the scales of India-China rivalry?	1353
Chinese Ambassador meets Prime Minister Oli, discusses strengthening bilateral ties	1354
Outgoing Nepal PM Approved China Rail Deal Ahead Of Trust Vote: Report	1354
Storms trap more than 130 near China's Tibetan border with Nepal	1355
Nepal: Activists protest at China-built Pokhara Airport, denounce BRI as intervention tool	1355
New round of China-Nepal customs exchange held for better cooperation	1356
Nepal PM Dahal faces crisis as key ally drops parliamentary support	1356
Govt slammed for BRI agreement with China	1356
Nepal seeks Interpol help for two citizens held by China for allegedly helping Tibetans flee	1357
Nepali leaders reaffirm commitment to one-China principle	1358
No info on two Nepal's called and held by China on suspicion of helping Tibetans flee	1358
China's "Empty Airport" In Nepal Sparks Online Tensions; Envoy Intimidates Journo For Reporting Pokhara Airport Loan	1358

June 1360

Govt slammed for BRI agreement with China	1360
Nepal seeks Interpol help for two citizens held by China for allegedly helping Tibetans flee	1361

Nepali leaders reaffirm commitment to one-China principle	1361
No info on two Nepalis called and held by China on suspicion of helping Tibetans flee	1362
China's "Empty Airport" In Nepal Sparks Online Tensions; Envoy Intimidates Journo For Reporting Pokhara Airport Loan	1362

May 1363

'You dare to lie:' Chinese ambassador to Nepal snaps at senior journalist over Pokhara loan claim	1363
After prolonged, tortuous Covid closure, China finally reopens 14 Tibet-Nepal border trade points	1364
2 schools rebuilt with China aid handed over to Nepal	1365
China's hand seen in Nepal's new currency-note-map claims on Indian territory	1366
China pledges five-year development assistance for Nepal's Tibet-border districts	1367

April 1368

Nepal Deputy Prime Minister Shrestha visits Tibet; calls for opening 14 traditional border points with China	1368
China exempts regular visa fee for Nepali travellers	1369
Nepal-China economic relations high as Himalayas: Minister Bhandari	1369
Nepal and China sign two agreements in the presence of Finance Minister Pun	1370
Nepal-China Aid Project meeting held in Lhasa	1370
China-Nepal military relations: Risks and opportunities for India	1370
Chinese Language Day observed in Nepal	1372
Beijing's message: Won't tolerate anti-China activities in Nepal	1373
Nyingchi apples' first export to Nepal	1375
Nepal Sounds Alarm Over Chinese Encroachment, Calls for International Intervention	1376
Increased traffic at Tibet-Nepal border crossing	1377
Deputy PM Shrestha says he proposed new corridors to China	1377
'China positive to Nepal's request for free visa privilege to Nepali nationals'	1379
New township reported coming up in Lhokha in China's Tibet-border build-up	1380

March 1380

Nepal Deputy Prime Minister Shrestha visits Tibet; calls for opening 14 traditional border points with China	1380
China's anti-India, Tibet-pilgrimage restrictions ruining friendly Nepal's tourism industry	1381
Willing to work with new Nepali government, says Beijing	1382
Nepali ambassador to China interests in two sessions	1382
Nepal and China to renew talks on cross-border transmission lines	1382
Nepal is ready to welcome back Chinese travelers	1383

February 1384

China's continued Covid closure of Nepal-Tibet border separates families, affects livelihoods	1384
Govt highlights special initiatives in cross-border trade with China: Prime Minister Dahal	1385
Chinese Citizen Found Dead in Kathmandu Hostel: Investigation Underway	1385

January 1386

Nepali leaders privately complain about China's aggressive public diplomacy	1386
China says rivals trying to sabotage its ties with Nepal	1387
Nepal & China to sign plan of Beijing BRI projects: Nepal's Deputy PM	1388
Chinese Vice Minister Sun Haiyan arrives in Kathmandu	1389
Communist unity top on agenda as Chinese flock to Nepal	1389
Nepal and China are close neighbors, trusted friends, and reliable partners: PM	1391
Nepal committed in not allowing anti-Chinese activities, Dahal says	1392

China & Pakistan 1392

December 1392

CPSC inaugurates 'China Corner' at ISSI library	1392
Pakistan plans to acquire 40 planes of China's latest stealth fighter J-35: Report	1393
Pakistan slams U.S. official's remarks on its missile capabilities	1394
China, Pakistan wrap up counterterror drills amid concerns over attacks	1394
China Refuses Nuclear 'Second Strike' Capability for Pakistan	1394
CHINA: Pakistan, China's diplomatic relations deteriorates	1395
CPEC Phase 2.0: Pakistan-China partnership enters new era with high-level engagements in Beijing	1397
China keen to invest $1 billion in Pakistan to establish medical city	1398
Pakistan Requested Nuclear Weapons Assistance From China in Talks Over Strategic Port	1399
CM Maryam hails Pak-China ties as time-tested	1401
Pakistan becomes third-largest buyer of Chinese solar panels	1401
China, Pakistan flexing military muscle at anti-BRI militants	1402

November 1403

Punjab CM Maryam Nawaz set to visit China next month at special invitation	1403
Pakistani exercises show how Chinese investments fuel military mission creep	1403
China, Pakistan talk security as they target terrorism against belt and road projects	1405
Any attempt to harm Sino-Pak ties bound to fail: Chinese envoy	1406
Rising Violence Threatens Chinese-Funded Projects In South And Central Asia	1407
One killed, dozens injured in clashes with Imran Khan's supporters near Pakistan's capital	1408

Pakistan tests secret China-like 'firewall' to tighten online surveillance	1409
Pakistan's military to launch new offensive against separatist militants	1414
China's PLA Sends Troops To Joint Anti-Terrorism Exercise In Pakistan	1415
China, Pakistan to hold first anti-terror drills in 5 years amid rising attacks	1415
Protection of Chinese nationals a recurring headache for Pakistan	1416
'Don't trust Pak soldiers': Xi faces flak for Chinese deaths in Pakistan	1418
China pushing to deploy its own security staff to protect citizens in Pak: Report	1419
China to continue support for Pakistan's counter-terrorism efforts	1419
At least 26 people killed by bomb blast at southwestern Pakistan rail station	1420
PM visits Chinese embassy to condemn firing on Chinese nationals in Karachi	1420
Pakistan watches China-India border thaw with mixed feelings over Kashmir	1421
Pak missions in China to have 20 new trade posts	1422

October 1423

Pakistan says China's remarks on safety of its citizens 'perplexing'	1423
Chinese envoy miffed at CPEC security lapses	1424
China warns security threats to its nationals impede BRI investments in Pakistan	1425
Pakistan requests additional $1.4 billion loan from China amid ongoing financial challenges	1426
Pakistan requests China to increase currency swap agreement limit to 40 billion Yuan	1427
Minister discusses cooperation initiatives with Chinese envoy	1427
Pakistan Faces Brunt Of US Sanctions; A Total Of 26 Entities Blacklisted For Supporting Weapons Development In Iran, Pak, China	1428
Pakistan gets 'promising response' from China over debt refiling: FinMin	1429
Rise in violence against Chinese nationals in Pakistan threatens China's 'Silk Road' vision	1429
Symposium held in Islamabad on China-Pakistan cooperation to drive modernization	1431
Pakistan to increase security for Chinese projects as Beijing calls for urgent steps	1432
China's Premier Li begins Pakistan visit amid rare strains in relations	1432
China to work with Pakistan to protect Chinese personnel following attack	1434
China's security agency vows to boost intelligence sharing after deadly attack in Pakistan	1434
China calls on Pakistan to 'severely punish' attackers after 2 Chinese die in Karachi	1435
China sends 27 military aircraft, six naval vessels towards Taiwan	1436
'Terrorist attack' near Karachi airport kills two Chinese nationals, embassy says	1436
Chinese modernization serves as model for Pakistan to promote economic development: Pakistani PM	1436
Pakistan approves ₹45 billion for armed forces to protect Chinese interests	1437
Chinese investment plays instrumental role in stabilizing Pakistan's economy: minister	1437

September 1438

Zong expands its footprint in Gilgit Baltistan	1438
China to establish special agricultural industrial park in Pakistan	1438
Pakistan prepares over 70 projects for China's cooperation in CPEC phase II	1439
China emerges as stabilizing force in global affairs under CPC leadership: Pakistani president	1440
Pakistan's potential Brics entry seen as benefiting China at India's expense	1440
Pakistan set to strengthen counter-terrorism collaboration with China	1441
Chinese military officials vow 'unfettered commitment' to Pakistan in meeting with top general	1442
Pakistan and China pursue corridor dream, despite risks	1442
China shows interest to invest in Pakistan's diverse sectors	1444
Pakistani scholars hail China's modernization, envision CPEC cooperation	1444
Pakistan committed to enhancing cooperation with China: foreign office	1445
Pakistan resolves IMF issues to unlock $7 billion loan	1445

August 1446

Pakistan relaxed rules to award $2 billion contract to China for construction of Karakoram Highway: report	1446
Deadliest Attack in Years Sabotages Pakistan's Security Promises to China	1447
China strongly condemns attacks in Pakistan, says Chinese foreign ministry	1449
Pakistan's Nishan-e-Imtiaz (Military) awarded to top Chinese general Gen Li Qiaoming	1449
PM, Commander Ground Forces of PLA China discuss bilateral ties, defence relations	1449
Pakistan's Balochistan, home to China-led projects, hit by militant attacks, 60 killed	1449
Pakistan postpones opening of $250 million China-funded airport over security fears	1450
Pakistan blames users for slow internet as firewall rumours grow	1451
Pakistan-China friendship highlighted in Independence Day celebrations, two former diplomats awarded for contributions	1452
Embassy of Pakistan in China celebrates 78th Independence Day of Pakistan	1452
China-built landmark hydropower project connects to grid, another milestone for China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, despite Western media's smears	1453
China, Pakistan: Rallies in Gilgit Baltistan interrupting cross-border trade and travel disruptions end as of Aug. 12 /update 1	1454
Traders end protest against taxes at northern border pass linking Pakistan to China	1455
Relations with US should be repaired but not at China's expense: Pakistan PM Shehbaz Sharif	1455
What China is doing for Pakistan, no other country can do: PM	1456
China's reform policy opens up opportunities for global investment: Pakistani experts	1457
Pakistan PM writes to China for debt reprofiling as IMF loan approval nears	1457

July 1458

PM orders swift implementation of agreements with China	1458
Operation Azm-e-Istehkam: Pakistan Acts at China's behest	1458

Pakistan releases new anthem honouring China's 97th PLA anniversary	1459
Fears rise of China supplying Pakistan dreaded chemicals for use against Baloch rebels	1459
COAS Asim Munir lauds Chinese army at PLA's 97th founding day	1460
Pakistani entrepreneurs to attend China's int'l exhibition	1461
Beijing reiterates calls for Pakistan to create 'safe' environment for Chinese workers and projects	1461
Chinese ambassador highlights enhanced cooperation with Pakistan under Global South Initiative	1461
Pakistan to approach China to restructure its $15 billion energy debt	1462
Pakistan, China enter new era of cooperation	1464
Is China fueling Pakistan's nuclear ambitions against India?	1464
June	1465
Pakistan's new anti-terror initiative aimed at protecting Chinese projects: Report	1465
Azm-e-Istehkam: China's wish is Pakistan's command	1466
Chinese minister urges closer ties to achieve development goals	1468
China's minister reaches Pakistan today, will preside over meeting on CPEC	1468
Pakistani PM Shehbaz Sharif highlights safety and economic cooperation with China	1468
Terrorism and economy expected to top agenda at China-Pakistan talks as security concerns cloud belt and road	1469
May	1470
China supports Pakistan in further investigating terror attack on Chinese: spokesperson	1470
Chinese Propaganda in Pakistan: "Xinjiang Is Having Its Best Time in History"	1470
Pakistan scrambles for relief on $15bn energy debt owed to China	1471
Today is the 73rd anniversary of Pak-China diplomatic relation	1472
Pakistan, China on path to new heights of friendship	1474
China hands over data collected from Pakistan's first satellite mission on Chang'e-6 lunar probe	1474
India protests China's building of road in Ladakh territory ceded to it by Pakistan	1475
China pledges five-year development assistance for Nepal's Tibet-border districts	1475
April	1476
China Coast Guard holds second high-level meeting with Pakistani counterpart	1476
Former Pakistani PM Nawaz Sharif embarks on 'private visit' to China	1476
Pakistan strikes $200m deal with China for solar power conversion	1477
Growing Angst against China in Pakistan	1477
Pakistan-China border reopens for tourism and trade after 4 months closure	1478
March	1478

Six killed in suicide attack on Chinese engineers in Pakistan	1478
Pakistan assures IMF not to allocate additional budget for China-Pakistan Economic Corridor	1479
Two Sessions fosters stronger Pak-China ties	1480
Ship from China to Pakistan stopped at Mumbai port; Indian agencies suspect nuclear link	1481
February	1481
Pakistan 'secures' $2 billion loan rollover from China	1481
Pakistan exports to South China increase by 16pc in 2023	1482
China Endorses 'Successful' Pakistan Polls With Big Thumbs Up to Army Amid Rigging Claims	1483
Pak-China friendship strengthening with passage of time: SCCI	1483
Nepal's Office of Tibet Celebrates Losar	1483
China remains Pakistan's top trade partner amid falling exports to US and EU	1484
January	1484
Cash-strapped Pakistan seeks $2 billion loan from China	1484
China stands ready to work with Pakistan to upgrade Cpec project: Report	1485
China assures Pakistan of closer economic ties, support on efforts to defend 'territorial integrity'	1485
China on mediation mission to 'bridge' differences between Pakistan and Iran	1487
Remaining works of peace process to be completed on consensus: PM Dahal	1487
China's reopening border reflection of Pakistan's good economy, experts say	1488
China &amp; Taiwan	1489
December	1489
China's propaganda office taps Taiwanese god of cities as ally	1489
Former Taiwan leader emphasises shared historical roots of island and mainland Chinese	1491
Reunification is inevitable: TAO	1491
Experts sound alarm over low awareness of China threat among Taiwan's youth	1492
VOA Mandarin: China faces operational challenges if it were to invade Taiwan, US says	1493
Taiwan-Shanghai forum opens after military tensions	1493
China's new tactic against Taiwan: drills 'that dare not speak their name'	1494
Chinese officials arrive in Taipei for rare visit	1495
After Days of Military Activity, China Restates Its Hard Line on Taiwan	1495
China jeopardised peace with its military threat: Taiwan Defence Ministry	1496
Taiwan Flags Alarming Threat After China Deploys Largest Naval Fleet	1496
Taiwan reports near doubling of Chinese warships nearby	1497
China slaps sanctions on 13 US military firms over Taiwan arms sale	1498

November

1498

Taiwan's Lai provokes China's ire with planned US visit	1498
Pro-Taiwan Lithuania expels three Chinese diplomats	1499
Foreign Minister Dr Rana off to China	1499
China could launch military drills near Taiwan over president's Pacific visit, sources say	1500
Taiwan reports Chinese balloon, first time in six months	1501
PRC threatens regional stability: Taipei	1501
Taiwan rebuts remarks made by China's Xi at APEC meeting with Biden	1502
Taiwan's business leaders are finding ways to reduce their exposure in China	1503
Former Taiwan Navy officer praises Chinese military, sparks outrage	1504
Beijing urges US not to let Taiwan's William Lai transit through country	1504
Taiwan detects spike in Chinese military activity around itself	1505
Taiwan businessman Tsao to sue Chinese officials over sanctions	1506
Taiwan indicts couple for promoting Chinese political agenda amid military tensions	1506
Taiwan reports rise in Chinese military activity as US election nears	1506

October

1507

CCP attempts to extend jurisdiction	1507
Taiwan issues warnings to Chinese coast guard vessels around Kinmen	1508
Taiwan reports Chinese 'combat patrol' after Beijing slams US arms deal	1508
China vows to take 'countermeasures' over US and Taiwan $2bn arms deal	1508
Taiwan president 'won't yield an inch' in defense of island's territory	1509
China Responds to Taiwan's Plea for Cross-Strait Peace with Military Pressure	1510
Taiwan unveils plans to cope with potential Chinese military blockade	1511
Taiwan says blockade would be act of war as China holds more drills	1512
China holds live-fire drills on island closest to Taiwan	1513
Preparing for a Chinese blockade, Taiwan maps out wartime food plans	1514
China reiterate vow to use force over Taiwan as president Xi visits frontline island	1514
China starts new round of war games around Taiwan	1515
China threatens Taiwan with more trade measures after denouncing president's speech	1516
Taiwan says four iPhone maker staff detained in China under 'strange' circumstances	1516
US says Taiwan speech no justification for China military pressure	1517
No one can stop China's reunification: mainland slams Lai's separatist remarks	1517
Taiwan willing to cooperate with China, but not as subordinate to it as 'motherland'	1518
Most Taiwanese believe China unlikely to invade in coming five years, poll shows	1519
China criticizes Taiwan president for his 'motherland' comment	1520

Communist China not the motherland, says Taiwan's president, because our republic is older	1520
Taiwanese people ready to fight as China ramps up aggression, ambassador says	1520
China wants Taiwan to make mistakes and is looking for excuses to trigger a blockade, Taiwan's navy commander says	1521
Not subordinate to China, says Taiwan in response to Xi Jinping's "one-China principle"	1521
Xi vows to 'reunify' Taiwan, warns of 'rough seas' ahead, on low-key 75th National Day	1522

September 1523

Taiwanese military report says China lacks full invasion force	1523
China fails to promptly notify Taiwan on detention of citizens: MAC	1523
Taiwan opposition faces test over motion denying China's U.N. claim	1524
China targeting Taiwanese military: expert	1525
China are the real hackers not us, Taiwan says after cyber accusations	1526
China urges vigilance against Taiwanese cyberattacks	1526
China blocks Taiwan executive from returning home	1527
China says it is verifying email tipoffs about Taiwan 'separatist' activity	1528
China accuses Taiwan president of 'hunting down' rivals like Ko Wen-je	1529
US House passes bill to financially deter aggression against Taiwan	1530
China's harsh sentencing of Taiwanese activist sparks tensions in cross-strait relations	1531
Taiwan detects increase in Chinese military activity near its territory	1531
Exclusive: Staff member at US consulate general in China openly spreads 'Taiwan independence' rhetoric	1532
Taiwan court sentences three retired officers for spying on China's behalf	1532

August 1533

Residents of Nepal's 15 northern districts to get five- yearly Tibet entry-exit passes	1533
100 days into the job, Taiwan's new leader is cutting mainland ties by reframing history	1533
China lacks the ability to invade, but has options	1535
Hundreds of Taiwanese 'disappear' in China over past 10 years	1536
Taiwan sentences 8 military officers on charges of spying for China	1538
Taiwan condemns China for disrupting regional peace	1538
Taiwan bans concert by Chinese rapper over insulting 'Taipei, China' promotional materials	1539
U.S. national security advisor to raise Taiwan on upcoming China trip	1539
Chinese Planners Push Creation of Post-Takeover 'Shadow Government' for Taiwan	1539
China's 'growing authoritarianism' poses a global challenge, Taiwan's President Lai warns	1540
China confident of 'reunification' with Taiwan: CCP official	1541
Tensions Rise: Taiwan Monitors Increased Chinese Military Activities	1541
Chinese vessels patrol Taiwan Strait to close jurisdictional gap: Experts	1542

MAC criticizes China's claim of uncovering over 1,000 Taiwanese spy cases	1543
China says it 'destroyed large network' of Taiwanese spies	1543
China says it uncovered over 1,000 Taiwanese espionage cases in recent years	1544
China lists Taiwanese independence supporters it wants people to denounce	1544
Beijing should set up 'shadow government' ready to run Taiwan, academics say	1545
Taiwan condemns China's guidelines on punishing 'stubborn independence supporters'	1546
Taiwan celebrates badminton victory against China, without political symbols	1546
Taiwan joins international parliamentary alliance countering China	1547
Taiwan says Macau's 'One China' demand blocks envoy's visa	1547
Taiwan detects 29 Chinese aircraft, 10 naval vessels near its territory	1548

July 1548

China pressures lawmakers from 6 countries not to attend conference in Taiwan	1548
Taiwan jails citizen doing business in China for spying on Tibetans, independence activists	1550
China's New Non-Military Offensives against Taiwan	1550
China's Wang complains about Japan lawmakers' visits to Taiwan	1553
Von der Leyen is 'playing with fire' over Taiwan, China warns after her re-election	1554
Taiwan's Blunt-Talking Leader Faces China's Backlash	1555
Taiwan Steps Up Alertness After Detecting Test-Firing by China's Missile Unit	1556
Taiwan says record number of Chinese warplanes detected amid NATO summit	1557
Taiwan soldier charged with leaking military secrets to China	1557
Taiwan probes senior official who deals with China over bribery suspicions	1558
Taiwan reports more Chinese military activity, calls for de-escalation	1558
Firms weigh removing Taiwan staff from China after death penalty threat	1558

June 1560

China presses Global South leaders to support Taiwan 'reunification'	1560
China threatens death penalty for Taiwan independence 'diehards'	1561
China's reunification is 'unstoppable', says Beijing's top man on Taiwan affairs	1561
China's war games near Taiwan threaten international peace and security	1563
Taiwan tracks 23 Chinese military aircraft around nation	1564
China ready to 'forcefully' stop Taiwan independence: Defence minister	1564

May 1565

Exiled Writer Yuan Hongbing Reveals Chinese United Front Strategy Targeting Taiwan's Legislature	1565
Most countries support one-China principle, oppose Taiwan region's participation in WHA: FM	1565
PRC Military Drills near Taiwan	1566

Chinese agents highly active in democratic Taiwan, dissidents say	1567
Taiwanese star forced to publicly support 'one China' policy	1569
China ramps up pressure on Taiwan ahead of presidential inauguration	1570
Taiwan reports second Chinese 'combat patrol' in a week	1571
Taiwan on alert for post-inauguration Chinese drills	1571
April	1572
Ma Ying-jeou urges Taiwan's next president to respond 'pragmatically' to Xi Jinping's 'olive branch'	1572
Chinese President Xi meets former Taiwan leader Ma Ying-jeou on pro-unification visit	1573
RFI: Taiwan Rejects China's Relief Aid After Earthquake	1574
Taiwan detects 30 Chinese military aircraft, 9 navy vessels around nation	1574
Ex-Taiwanese President Ma visits China to help build social and cultural links	1574
March	1575
Taiwan Calls for Return of Military Officer Rescued by China	1575
Taiwan Faces Sovereignty Dilemma in South China Sea Amid Chinese Pressure	1575
Taiwan warns of 'enormous' Chinese bases near its S.China Sea holding	1577
Unification of Taiwan not priority for many Chinese, one-third disapprove of war: Report	1577
CCP is increasing cross-strait 'gray area': report	1579
"Neither India nor Taiwan is part of the PRC and we're not its puppets" Taiwanese FM	1579
China drops 'peaceful reunification' reference to Taiwan	1580
Taiwan faces steady 'drip' of pressure as China tightens pre-inauguration squeeze	1581
February	1582
China Says Its Coast Guard Patrols Around Taiwan Islands 'Beyond Reproach'	1582
Over 80% of Taiwanese favour maintaining status quo with China: Survey	1582
Mainland China's top Taiwan official pledges support for pro-unification forces	1583
China-Taiwan tensions surge as Beijing increases patrolling following fishermen's deaths	1584
'Cycling for a Free Tibet' event launched ahead of Tibetan Uprising Day in Taiwan	1584
Taiwan reports more Chinese balloons over Taiwan Strait	1585
January	1585
China is troublemaker by repeatedly using Taiwan Strait issues to hold other countries hostage: Taiwan	1585
Beijing Continues Military Operations Near Taiwan After US and China Announce Talks	1586
'Taiwan independence' an obstacle to China-US relations, says Beijing	1587
Taiwan says it spots six more Chinese balloons, one crossed island	1588
Purges in China's military allow Taiwan some respite – for now	1588

Taiwan's top diplomat sets record straight on China: 'We want the status quo. We want the way it is'	1590
How China's public views Taiwan's elections	1591
'China most likely to win war against US over Taiwan': Niall Ferguson	1593
FM spokesperson: China firmly opposes US passing of Taiwan-related act	1593
China says threats of force over Taiwan not aimed at most Taiwanese	1594
Lianhe Zaobao: China's Weibo Blocked "Taiwanese Election" Search Results on Election Day	1595
China's Taiwan approach 'has been counterproductive,' Blinken says	1595
Taiwan election: China says US 'gravely wrong' to congratulate new leader	1596
New Taiwan Government Faces Challenges in Policy, China Pressures	1596
Taiwan expects China to apply pressure on incoming government	1597
China looms large in Taiwan's presidential election	1598
Beijing Postpones China-Japan-South Korea Summit so it can Focus on Taiwan's Presidential Election	1599
China calls on Taiwan's people to promote 'peaceful reunification'	1599
CHINA-US	1602
December	1602
China sanctions 7 companies over US military assistance to Taiwan	1602
China Reacts After Biden Signs Record US National Defense Bill	1603
US government starts another investigation targeting these Chinese technology companies	1603
US nuclear expansion unlikely to deter China, finds CSIS-MIT study	1604
China says US 'playing with fire' by giving Taiwan more military aid	1605
Guilty plea exposes Chinese 'secret police station' in New York	1605
China refutes U.S. irresponsible report on military, security developments	1606
Trump meets TikTok CEO after saying China, US can 'solve all world's problems' together	1606
FBI warns some lawmakers that China aims to create fake stories about them to erode support for Taiwan	1607
Chinese migrants in US illegally uneasy after fourth removal flight	1608
US bans all cotton and tomato products from Xinjiang over slave labor	1610
China Restricts Visas To US Officials Who "Interfered" In Hong Kong Affairs	1610
Trump invites China's Xi Jinping to inauguration	1611
US House to vote to provide $3 billion to remove Chinese telecoms equipment	1611
Trump taps China critic Perdue as next ambassador to Beijing	1612
China rejects claims of "forced labor" in Xinjiang's tomato industry, criticizing BBC report for relying on subjective claims, unverified assertions	1613
Activists tell US Congress of China's far-reaching cultural erasure	1613

November 1615

US' plan to ban 200 Chinese technology companies; China's responds with this warning	1615
US and China swap three prisoners each in exchange	1616
China criticises Trump tariff threat, says it won't solve America's problems	1616
China's been trying to 'Trump-proof' its economy amid his tariff threats, experts say	1617
US blacklists 29 more Chinese companies over alleged forced labour in Xinjiang	1618
China rebuffs meeting with US defense secretary	1618
Taiwan, Democracy, Development Are China's 'Red Lines', Xi Tells Biden	1619
During meeting with Biden, China's Xi cautions US to 'make the wise choice' to keep relations stable	1619
U.S. companies could be caught in the crosshairs if China retaliates to fight Trump	1620
Biden and Xi will meet in Peru as US-China relations tested again by Trump's return	1621
Investigation into Chinese hacking reveals 'broad and significant' spying effort, FBI says	1622
China Issues Donald Trump a Warning Over Taiwan	1623
Chinese State Media Mocks US Election as 'Battle of Five Presidents' While Analysts Warn of Propaganda Motives	1624
China urges U.S. cooperation as Trump trade threat looms	1624

October 1625

Exclusive: China's Xi pressed Biden to alter language on Taiwan	1625
Intel invests US$300 million in China chip packaging and testing plant	1626
Chinese Hackers Are Said to Have Targeted Phones Used by Trump and Vance	1626
Oversight Committee Releases Report Exposing the CCP's Destructive Political Warfare and Influence Operations	1627
China rivalry will continue 'into the next decade,' U.S. ambassador tells NBC News	1628
Cold War legislative barrage: House passes 25 anti-China bills in one week	1629
US to curb AI investment in China soon	1630
DJI sues US department of defence over military company blacklist designation	1631
Xi says China willing to be a partner, friend with the US	1631
China slaps sanctions on 3 US firms, 10 senior execs over weapons sales to Taiwan	1632
Chinese hackers access US telecom firms, worrying national security officials	1632
Transnational repression endangers Americans: US diplomat	1633
Joe Biden 'sent Xi Jinping congratulatory message' to mark China's 75th National Day	1633
US bans Chinese steel and food-additives firms over Xinjiang human rights	1634
China, US to hold talks on economic and trade issues, Xinhua reports	1635

September 1635

China taps into AI to ramp up fake-news campaign amid U.S. election	1636
---	------

Legislation to curb US investment in China is top priority, lawmaker says	1637
Eric Adams Indictment: China Could Lose a Friend in New York	1637
Republicans propose bill that would double tariffs on Chinese imports and end favored trade status	1638
Chairman McCaul on House Passage of the STOP CCP Act	1639
China to Investigate U.S. Retailer, Sending a Message Over Xinjiang	1639
Biden tells Quad leaders that Beijing is testing region at turbulent moment for Chinese economy	1641
FBI says it has disrupted major Chinese hacking operation that threatened US critical infrastructure	1642
China sanctions 9 US firms over military sales to Taiwan	1643
China says it tailed a US spy plane through the sensitive Taiwan Strait	1644
China frees American pastor after 18 years in detention	1644
Top US, Chinese military brass hold first call to stabilise ties	1645
China says it is ending foreign adoptions, prompting concern from US	1645
Former aide to New York governor charged as 'agent' of Chinese government	1646
August	1647
India open to 'unprecedented' cooperation with US because of Chinese aggression, says ex-NSA McMaster	1647
Agenda for US-China talks includes Taiwan, South China Sea, Russia and AI	1648
Chinese Communist Party Plots Response to Trump's America First Agenda	1649
Jake Sullivan to make first China visit as US national security adviser	1650
China warns US not to allow Dalai Lama's 'separatist activities' or talks with officials	1650
China says it is 'seriously concerned' about US nuclear strategic report	1651
US soldier pleads guilty to selling secrets to China	1651
Biden repeats debunked claim he traveled 17,000 miles with China's Xi Jinping	1652
U.S. Officials to Visit China for Economic Talks as Trade Tensions Rise	1652
Love the army, defend the motherland: how China is pushing military education on children	1653
U.S. Vies With Allies and Industry to Tighten China Tech Controls	1654
Kamala Harris' VP pick has a long history with China. But Beijing may not be happy about it	1656
US bans imports from five more Chinese companies over Uyghur forced labor	1658
China targets U.S. track athletes in response to doping allegations dogging its swimmers	1658
Chinese businesses hoping to expand in the US and bring jobs face uncertainty and suspicion	1659
US reportedly to escalate AI chip restrictions on China, 'may incur countermeasures'	1660
US sounds alarm bell on China's military development	1661
Protesters in US were attacked by Beijing-linked figures: report	1663
US lawmaker calls Chinese sanctions 'badge of honor'	1664

China woos local U.S. officials as tensions with Washington rise 1665

July 1666

Chinese envoy calls out US 'political correctness' of taking tough line on China 1666

China halts nuclear arms talks with US over Taiwan support 1667

U.S pursuing visa restrictions on Chinese officials involved in human rights abuses in Tibet and East Turkistan 1668

US to sanction Chinese officials for alleged ongoing human rights violations 1668

China Threatens To Retaliate Over US Resolve Tibet Bill 1669

Foreign Ministry Spokesperson's Remarks on the US Signing into Law the "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act" 1669

China blasts US Tibet-China dispute bill, vows to defend its interests 1670

China's top political advisory body strongly opposes U.S. signing of Xizang-related act 1670

US sanctions more Chinese officials for 'genocide and crimes against humanity' in Xinjiang 1671

Foreign Ministry Spokesperson's Remarks on the US Signing into Law the "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act" 1672

China slams US for spreading disinformation 1672

China urges U.S. not to support "Tibet independence" forces: spokesperson 1672

US-China ties may have hit a wall since Xi-Biden summit, noted Chinese commentator warns 1673

US House probes Harvard's handling of students protest during Chinese ambassador speech 1674

China makes mock dill of destroying US F-35 and F-22 fighter jets. Is PLA preparing for war with US? Details here 1674

US deports 116 Chinese migrants in first 'large' flight in 5 years 1675

June 1676

House passes bill urging China to mend ties with Dalai Lama 1676

After South China Sea, US, China Set To Wrestle At 'Roof Of The World'; Washington Begins Himalayan Push 1676

Chinese embassy threatened House lawmakers, urged them to 'cancel' Dalai Lama visit 1678

A Texas congressman was sanctioned by China. He's not backing down. 1679

Won't let China sway Dalai Lama's successor choice: US lawmakers 1680

EU raises human rights concerns with China in 39th Dialogue Session 1680

US calls for immediate release of prominent rights activists held in China 1681

U.S. bans imports from 3 more Chinese companies over forced labor 1682

US report documents China's extreme isolation of 1683

Tibet 1683

China says US provoking arms race in moves into South China Sea 1683

Five Eyes nations say China is poaching Western ex-military 1684

May 1685

The Chinese Communist Party is infiltrating the US from the inside	1685
China's gray zone social media war comes to America	1686
US committee targets Georgia Tech's alleged ties to Chinese military linked research	1688
US confronts China over Volt Typhoon cyber espionage	1689
House Oversight Seeks More Briefings on U.S. Government Response to China's 'Political Warfare'	1690
US annual int'l religious freedom report red-flags China's move to acculturate Tibetan Buddhism	1691
US Commission highlights China's growing 'Sinicization' of Tibetan Buddhism	1691
'Xenophobia' behind India and China's economic troubles, says US President Joe Biden	1692

April 1693

Antony Blinken begins key China visit as tensions rise over new U.S. foreign aid bill	1693
US blacklists four Chinese tech apps for helping military in China	1694
US-China competition to field military drone swarms could fuel global arms race	1695
Comer Announces Hearing on the CCP's Efforts to Infiltrate and Influence the United States	1696
China accuses US of Deporting Chinese students without proper evidence	1697

March 1697

EXCLUSIVE Now Chinese migrants are sneaking onto Guam: Top Republican warns Communist Party wants to 'exploit' every part of the U.S. map and warns critical American base is vulnerable
1697

China slams the U.S. for interfering in Arunachal Pradesh border dispute with India	1698
'Renewed US-India ties amid China rise', says President Joe Biden in his final State of the Union Address	1699
US has a wrong perception of China, says foreign minister	1700
China Hopes For Better Relations Regardless Of US Election Outcome	1700

February 1701

U.S. allegation of 'forced labor' in Xinjiang is huge lie: Foreign Ministry	1701
'Decoupling from China will only backfire on US itself,' Wang Yi holds 'frank' talk with Antony Blinken	1701

January 1704

US hyping up China as "threat in outer space" to expand its forces in outer space: Chinese Foreign Ministry	1704
U.S. and China are working to make the business environment less volatile, Beijing says	1705
China's Wang Yi and America's Sullivan to meet in Bangkok	1706
India, U.S. firm up plan to counter China's aggression in Indo-Pacific	1706
China's strength gap with the US will widen as competition deepens, top political scientist says	1708

Beijing Criticizes US Proclamation Cracking Down On Corruption, Accuses US of Harboring Corrupt Fugitives	1709
EXCLUSIVE: Second-Largest Foreign Owner Of US Land Is A Chinese Communist Party Member	1709
Taiwan spotlights China crackdown on Hong Kong ahead of key poll	1711
China tells U.S. it will 'never compromise' on Taiwan as the island's election draws near	1712
China Foreign Minister: Healthy US-China Ties 'No Longer a Choice'	1712
COMMENTARIES	1715
December	1715
Indian Tibetan community's struggles in exile: Declining numbers, preservation of art & culture	1715
15th Dalai Lama: Will Tenzin Gyatso name successor on his 90th birthday?	1716
Bracing for a Chinese storm in the Indian Ocean	1717
On a path to embrace Chinese models	1718
What will China's new mega dam mean for India ties and fragile Tibetan ecosystem?	1719
The Next Dalai Lama: His Reincarnation And Why It Matters For India	1722
Sanctioned by China, Tibetan activist expresses disappointment over lack of support from Tibetan community, administration	1723
Buddha's birthplace a geopolitical playing field for China?	1724
How China turns members of its diaspora into spies	1725
Why China's proposed Tibet mega dam has left India worried	1726
Bridging Borders	1727
China and India rebuild trust on the path to reconciliation	1729
Of Diplomacy and Gaffes: Making Sense of Prabowo and Anwar's China Visits	1730
Guest Opinion: The truth about Xinjiang and its Uygur population	1731
Self-Determination Of Tibet: A Contentious Issue – Analysis	1732
A dam ignited rare Tibetan protests. They ended in beatings and arrests, BBC finds	1735
Missing in the Gray Zone? China's Maritime Militia Forces Around Taiwan	1738
Opinion: The China factor in India-Nepal relations	1741
Tibet under siege : The dark side of China's hydropower drive	1743
In Dharamshala, nonviolent Tibetan leaders grapple with Chinese occupation, Gaza war	1744
Can cultural exchanges fix 'ambiguity and uncertainty' in China-India ties?	1746
British Museum faces backlash over use of "Xizang" for Tibet	1747
The Environmental Toll of China's Exploitation in Tibet	1748
The complexities of India's relations with Tibet and China	1750
China 'not dreading' Trump 2.0, but reforms will decide who wins big power game	1750
COP29 Failed the 'Third Pole': Wither Tibet in the Climate Agenda?	1751

China's Panchen Lama and Xi's sinister plan to tamper with Dalai Lama's succession	1754
An Identity in Flux? The Case of Tibetan Muslims Residing in Kashmir	1756
The Father of Chinese Authoritarianism Has a Message for America	1758
India starts resembling China in unflattering ways	1762
Editorial: Nepal in China's strategic embrace	1763
United Front: China's 'magic weapon' caught in a spy controversy	1763
2024, the year India defeated China's salami-slicing strategy	1765
Dalai Lama: Succession and beyond	1767
A Tibetan writer reflects on the fight for his motherland while living in 'exile' in India	1768
A Tibetan Christmas	1770
Uyghur separatist threat could reach beyond China's Xinjiang	1770
Falling enrolment in Tibetan schools a community challenge	1772
Hong Kong redefines its economic DNA for China's new era	1773
Xi brought down powerful rivals in the military. Now he's going after his own men	1773
Communist China: Weaponizing Buddhism and Erasing Tibet	1775
Tibet Under Pressure: China's Geopolitical Ambitions And Cultural Repression	1777
Jaishankar: Finding balance with China complex as both nations evolve	1779
How India's soft power led to a border deal with China	1779
Guest Opinion: The truth about Xinjiang and its Uygur population	1781
Why Nepal's 'one China' stand matters to PRC	1783
Dam Construction in Tibet Threatens Local Communities and Environment	1784
Pakistan Ditches 'Iron Brother' China, Reaches Out to US for Financial Rescue	1785
Nepal blocking China's Panchen Lama visit is rare resistance. It's not enough	1786
Interview: Gerald Roche on the Erasure of Tibet's Minority Languages	1788
Tibetans Coming To India Reduced To A Trickle – OpEd	1795
Nepal "Snubs" Dalai Lama For China-Appointed Panchen Lama; Is Beijing Weaponizing Buddhism?	1796
View: India shouldn't let its data turn Chinese	1798
Breaking the Circle: Chinese Communist Party Propaganda Infrastructure Rapidly Expands	1798
What Lies Ahead for India-China Relations	1800
K P Oli's China gamble	1802
Self-Determination of Tibet: A Contentious Issue	1803
India must support the Dalai Lama's right to rebirth	1806
Xi unlikely to attempt Taiwan invasion during Trump second term, experts say	1806
What Do the Latest Purges Mean for China's Military?	1807
CWhat China's critical mineral ban means for the US	1808

China's Rules through Ideologically Indoctrinating the Youth	1810
India's North East & Indo-Pacific Partnerships	1811
China's assimilationist tactic towards Tibetan children (IANS Analysis)	1812
Xi's "China Dream" Proves a Hard Sell	1812
To defend Taiwan tomorrow, we must prepare to sanction China today	1814
Trump's tariff war 2.0 looms. And China isn't just watching	1815
Will Tibetans be led by a Reincarnated Dalai Lama, or One Picked by China?	1816

November 1817

China leverages buddhist diplomacy to counter negative global perceptions?	1817
What's behind Nepal's pivot away from India?	1818
China's military corruption crackdown explained	1819
Xi Jinping Doesn't Have an Answer for China's Demographic Crisis	1820
India's history of providing refuge – and why Sheikh Hasina poses a unique challenge	1822
The Perseverance of an Independent Tibetan School: The 30-Year Journey of Jigme Gyaltsen Ethnic Vocational School	1825
China: Human rights defenders criminalised as well as face harassment, surveillance and transnational repression	1827
Nepal's China dilemma	1830
Why India needs to take its ties with China 'sincerely' & the inconvenience of US indictment of Adani	1831
Is This Civilisation Finished?	1833
Pakistan and China's diplomatic relations reach a low ebb	1834
China's atrocity crimes in Xinjiang are entering an even darker phase. The UN must act.	1835
Google blocked 1,000-plus pro-China fake news websites from its search results	1836
Experts discuss future of Tibetan leadership and Dalai Lama's succession	1837
Protecting Chinese workers in Pakistan: Should the PLA intervene?	1839
China-India ties to be more resilient in the Trump 2.0 era	1840
Why loan from China under BRI may bring down KP Oli govt in Nepal	1841
China's People Deserve the Truth—Not Censorship   Opinion	1843
How Xi Jinping is going back to Confucius to define China's future	1844
New Delhi needs to warm up China-India relations with sincerity	1847
Decoding PM Modi's message to China	1848
India-China border agreement: A case for military buildup	1850
What draws China's anti-corruption watchdogs to Guangdong and its 'sin city' Dongguan?	1851
What Trump's proposed tariffs against China mean for India	1852
Biography of a Thought'	1852
Has Trump-fear driven China to be conciliatory towards India?	1855

Nepal PM K P Oli's Beijing visit may not win him points at home	1855
'Trashing' Scientific Warnings, China Is Constructing Three Upstream Dams In Tibet; A Disaster In The Making?	1856
Words Used for Cultural Genocide: How "Northern Frontier" Is Replacing "Inner Mongolia"	1858
Why Is China's Atheist Regime Trying To Pick The Next Dalai Lama?	1858
Debatri Dhar   With India's lead, Brics can be a voice for Global South Columnists	1860
Nepal's New PM Oli Is Going To China, Why Is He Not Coming To India?	1861
How attacks on Chinese working for CPEC projects dent China-Pakistan ties	1862
Why India and China Are Finally Starting to Patch Things Up	1863
Why go to China?	1864
COMMENT: The Dalai Lama's death and reincarnation will be a defining moment for Indian politics	1865
Analysis: Under Trump, Pakistan to be viewed through 'China, India lens': experts	1867
Lhasa: Black and White'	1868
A Modest Call for China to Elevate Kailash's Status	1871
Tibet-Aid Program at 30: Driving Tibet's Development in Xi's 'New Era'	1872
At Tiananmen Square, tight security with metal detectors reflects a changing China	1875
Why Is China's Atheist Regime Trying to Pick the Next Dalai Lama?	1877
China's Commodification of Minorities	1878
China Is Recalculating Its Middle East Policy	1881
Analysis: Xi Jinping to keep chasing Chinese dream despite Donald Trump's return	1883
Future global economy to be shaped by India, China: Experts	1884
India's Troubled Truce with China	1885
To China, Trump is 'poison'	1886
India needs to leverage Trump's China antipathy	1887
Trump's return to White House spells uncertainty for U.S.-China relationship	1888
The Next Dalai Lama: Preparing for Reincarnation and Why It Matters to India	1890
Military Digest   A Tibetan spy who was a Gorkha soldier: Dramatic rise and sudden fall of Lha Tsering	1901
As Trump Threatens a Wider Trade War, the U.S. Confronts a Changed China	1902
Beijing's Transnational Repression of Dissidents: From Bad to Worse	1904
Sitting in India, We Have Become Internal Exiles	1905
The Secret Sauce of the China-India Rivalry Is Education	1907
Eyes north, ears south	1908
Mountains of Resistance: The Past and Present of Tibet's Quest for Independence	1910
The CCP Insists that Chinese Islam Should Be "Confucianized"	1912
Why Has China Halted Centuries-old Sino-Nepal Borderland Marriages?	1912

Is Sino-Pak 'Sweeter Than Honey' Friendship Turning Sour? – OpEd	1913
Depsang to Kazan: Emerging détente between China and India	1915
EXPLAINED: How do Asia's authoritarian states pick leaders?	1917
EXPLAINED: What is China's United Front and how does it operate?	1918

October

1923

REVEALED: Inside the CIA's (largely) secret role in the Tibetan resistance	1923
Has India made friends with China after the Modi-Xi agreement?	1927
EXPLAINED: What's Hong Kong's role in China's hi-tech military plans?	1929
Confronting the Growing Threat of the Chinese Communist Party	1930
Data shows the Chinese government is less popular than state media makes it seem	1931
Is Tibet forgotten?	1932
A silent resistance is growing in Tibet	1934
The changing dynamics of India-China relations amidst India-U.S. tensions	1934
LAC patrolling agreement with China doesn't mean everything is resolved: Jaishankar	1936
The Man Who Shaped China's Strongman Rule Has a New Job: Winning Taiwan	1937
Explainer: India and China troops disengage at disputed Ladakh border, easing decades-long tensions	1939
Opinion   China-India border detente paves way for a more balanced world order	1940
Brahmaputra's challenges: A call for strategic cooperation and sustainable solutions	1942
What's next for China and India as Modi, Xi start over?	1943
24 October 2024, DW, Murali Krishnan	1943
The curious case of China renaming locations in India's Arunachal Pradesh	1944
Thaw in Sino-Indian relations: Trust, but keep verifying	1946
Decoding Chinese Military Diplomacy in South Asia	1947
We need to talk about China	1952
From Orchards to Auctions: The Chinese Robbery of Uyghur Wealth. Part II	1954
From Orchards to Auctions: The Chinese Robbery of Uyghur Wealth. Part I	1955
China's Agents of Chaos	1957
Guest Opinion: False narratives about Xinjiang won't halt its development	1960
Value Vacuum: China's command versus India's concessions	1961
Getting Hongkongers to retire in mainland China isn't the answer to poverty: experts	1962
PRC at 75: In China under Xi Jinping, people run or 'lie flat'	1963
China's economy is set to have its slowest year of growth in decades	1966
Who really benefits from China's winter tourism promotion in Tibet?	1966
Xi Jinping Has Further Boosted the Military-Industrial Group of China	1967
China's Political Mobilization Challenge	1970

Nicholas Roerich, Shambala, and Agarth. 1. Tibet and Paris	1972
Decision of The Court of the Citizens of World on the Proposed Indictment of Xi Jinping – The Opinion of Judge Bhavani Fonseka	1973
India's Arunachal Dam a defence against China's 'Mother of all Dams' plan in Tibet?	1976
Book review: A document for the posterity	1977
Opinion: What China's leaders grasp about another Trump term	1980
China's government is about to spend big on stimulus – can it turn around the country's sluggish economy?	1981
The Politics of China's Land Appropriation in Bhutan	1983
China's 'Mother Of All Dams' Threatens More Tensions With India; Delhi Responds By Building Another Dam On Its Side	1986
India has a China problem, not just a border problem	1987
EXPLAINED: Xinjiang's largest cotton producer turned 70; not everyone is celebrating	1988
The Great Han Chauvinism: Why China doesn't have any place for minorities	1989
A Japanese boy was killed in China. Was cyber-nationalism to blame?	1991
Don't play Big Brother, be nuanced with a long view Columnists	1993
PRC Positive Messaging Frames Successful Colonization in Xinjiang	1994
Building a Historical Narrative of Tibet	1996
Human rights take a new hit in Xi Jinping's Tibet	1999
Caught in India-China clashes, Ladakh's nomadic herders fear for future	2000
China's 'New Great Wall' Casts a Shadow on Nepal	2002
From G2 to Cold War 2.0: The Changing US Attitude Toward China	2004
Dashain: Nepal turns to India for meat, China for toothpicks	2005
CCP Insists on Falsifying the History of "Humanistic Buddhism"	2006
From Deng to Xi, China's Foreign Policy Identity Has Been Consistent	2006
Critical Translation Readings On Monyul In The History Of India's Tawang Monastery – Book Review	2009
Opinion: The Erasure of Tibet- A Dangerous Change at the Guimet Museum	2012
China still challenges India in the Himalayas as BRICS summit approaches	2014
China's Dark Shadow Over Nepal's Tibetan Refugee Community	2015
Book Review: The Phallus by Bhuchung D. Sonam	2016
China's Sentinel State	2017
IAF downs Chinese spy balloon: What is China up to and what is India doing?	2021
'Monks, Business and Rebellion: Nepal's Bhot-China Relationship and India' book review: Nepal's geographic location is both strength and a weakness	2022
Why US-Taiwan aid package is a signal to China ahead of election	2023
Why China is investigating US companies Calvin Klein and Tommy Hilfiger	2024
Are China's lauded anti-poverty triumphs at risk of vanishing?	2026

Jaishankar's Hard Sell In Colombo	2027
Why do so many Chinese officials fall for fake promises of political charlatans?	2029
How India-China border tensions affect Ladakh nomads	2031
Sino-Indian relations coming full circle	2032
PRC at 75: Deng Xiaoping never delivered on young people's desire for freedom	2036
Why China's soft power fails to soften its image	2038
After 19 years, a docent at the Rubin Museum says goodbye to his 'home away from home'	2040
Geopolitics and the fate of Manipur	2040
China is using an "anaconda strategy" to squeeze Taiwan	2042
Did Jaishankar's long story of China mean Mao's 5 fingers...this secret of the dragon will force you to think	2042
India's geopolitical manoeuvring disrupts Mongolia's religious harmony	2044
Chinese are seeing India as going soft. Talk of 'consensus' over disengagement rings hollow	2045
The Tibet International Communication Center and China's Latest Manipulation Exercise	2046

September

2048

Communist China is celebrating its 75th birthday and its stock market is soaring. But not everyone is in the party spirit	2048
The 57th Session of the United Nations Human Rights Council and Chinese Stance	2049
What is China doing at such heights in Tibet? The research report revealing the truth about PLA is surprising.	2051
Securing the Legacy: The Future of the Dalai Lama and Tibet. A Tibetan Point of View	2052
Xi Jinping Is Prioritizing Political Survival Over Economic Prosperity	2053
Restoring Tibetan Supreme Justices: An Ode to the Supreme Strength of Public Mobilization	2054
How China Soured on Nepal	2055
India-China relationship 'significantly disturbed' but it's key for the world: Jaishankar	2057
Reimagining human rights and China?	2058
Open questions   Why minority languages are disappearing from some classrooms in Xinjiang but not Tibet	2060
Understanding China's policy of forced labour towards Uyghur Muslims in Xinjiang (IANS Analysis)	2063
There's More to China's Politics than Xi Jinping	2064
The India 'hiding in plain sight'	2065
Is China losing the plot against the Dalai Lama?	2066
EXPLAINED: Why choosing the Dalai Lama is not just a spiritual matter	2067
The India-China standoff: One border, two systems Columnists	2069
Keeping an Eye on the Watchdog: proposed revisions to the Supervision Law	2070
Sinking McLeodganj: Dalai Lama's Monastery and Army Cantonment Under Threat	2070

"Buddhist Diplomacy" and China's Support of Russian Aggression Against Ukraine	2071
What lies ahead for a complete normalisation of India-China ties?	2072
China's Legal Warfare Closes a Beloved Tibetan School	2075
First line of defence: The role of border villages as custodians of India's frontiers	2076
For Tibetans, There Is Now a "Xi Jinping Thought on Reincarnation"	2077
Remember Tibet?	2078
Western stories about Xinjiang nothing more than mythical dramas	2081
China's increasing influence in the UN: The role of Africa and Asia	2082
In memoriam: Chungdak Koren, former Representative of the Dalai Lama and ICT Board member	2083
Musical "Patriotic Education" in Hong Kong	2084
Fallen From the Front Page: Plight of Tibetans	2084
Bipartisan support for Tibet as US election draws near	2085
Sinification of Buddhism: China's manipulative quest for control	2089
Attempts to keep up exchanges between Taiwanese, Chinese face obstacles	2090
EU-China-India: Three to tango?	2091
China and India in the multipolar global order	2093
Third plenum inspires renewed vitality into China's modernization drive	2094
India's commitment to Tibetan cause continues	2095
How Chinese J-20 fighters in Xinjiang and Tibet are a concern for India	2096
17th Karmapa Ogyen Trinley Dorje to return to India After Exile?	2098
Why Planes Avoid Flying Over the Tibetan Plateau	2100
Diplomacy Beyond the Elections: How China Is Preparing for a Post-Biden America	2100
Taiwan must tighten the lid on China's misinformation campaigns	2102
EXPLAINED: The (worrying) popularity of caterpillar fungus	2103
Tibetan Villages Driven to Poverty by China's Forced Relocation Program	2104
World merrily forgets Uyghur cause as China mobilises mega-propaganda machine	2106
Why a China-US thaw may not be in India's economic interests	2107
Tourist boom threatens to swamp Indian mountain town where Dalai Lama took refuge	2108
Chinese Premier Visit To Pakistan: A Milestone For Strengthening Bilateral Ties – OpEd	2109
How China's Boarding Schools in Xinjiang (East Turkistan) Are Erasing a People's Identity: A Uyghur View	2110
Nepal between India and China	2113
Rural bookstore shares story of Tibetan culture	2114
Celebrating Tibet, Challenging China's Narrative, Understanding India's Concerns	2117
How Deng Xiaoping's 'one country, two systems' dates back to 1957 in Tibet	2118
The Significance of China's Reforms for Pakistan	2119

US Supports Strengthening India-Tibet Relations	2120
Top French museums have succumbed to China's soft power on Tibet etc?	2121
'China distorting Tibetan history, destroying architectural buildings'	2122
Bursts of Sympathy, Teetering Commitment: U.S. Policy on Tibet	2123
China's Preference as the next US President: Kamala Harris?	2127
India's special China problem	2129
Tibet, the Dalai Lama and the Power Struggle with China	2130
China's Crackdown on Tibetan Voices of Freedom: The Silencing of a Culture on Social Media	2130
How China's internet police went from targeting bloggers to their followers	2131
High time the Chinese leadership resolved the longstanding Sino-Tibet conflict: Tenzin Lekshay	2132
August	2133
Ethnic unity in China or cultural genocide in Tibet?	2133
Analysis: Elders stay faithful to Deng over 'reformer Xi Jinping'	2134
CPEC 2.0: Transforming Pakistan-China Relations – OpEd	2136
Opinion: Dr. Doom's origin in Tibet- Disney should not whitewash and kowtow to Communist China	2137
Why China must recall history before replacing Tibet with 'Xizang'	2138
Beijing's Sovereign Claims for Tibet	2140
Dalai Lama – thorn in China's side	2143
Don't Ever Invade China: Xi Jinping Prioritizes Border, Coastal, and Air Defense	2143
The dark side of China's Tibet strategy	2146
Modi 3.0 Faces the Dragon	2147
China's urban-rural gap is a threat to growth. Is the divide too wide to fix?	2149
India-Tibet Ties Higher Than Himalayas: Need Stronger Bond Amid Chinese Sinicization	2152
China's quest to replace 'Tibet' with 'Xizang' is destined to fail	2153
How to secure the China front	2154
China-Xizang Himalayan Forum: The cynical 'sinicisation' of Tibet	2156
Diaries of Mao's secretary at the center of a legal battle over the history of modern China	2157
The Dalai Lama Divides China And The US	2159
Taiwan and China must negotiate a new political agreement to avoid war	2160
The Rise, Decline, and Possible Resurrection of China's Confucius Institutes	2161
The Future of Leadership: What Lies Ahead for the Senior Military Leadership in the Chinese Army?	2163
Claude Arpi   China's 'salami' warfare big danger to Himalayas Columnists	2164
The Climate Crisis in Tibet: The Dalai Lama's Warning	2166
The Climate Crisis in Tibet: The Dalai Lama's Warning	2168

Realism, strategic interests should dictate India- China ties	2170
China isn't mocking India as usual. It's praising Modi's Russia-West balancing act instead	2171
Bhutan: A Frontier Against China's Expansion in the Himalayan Region	2172
Is China winning the Global South?	2173
Dharamshala's Tibetan tide ebbs, arrivals fall steeply amid China's strict border vigil	2174
Opinion: More Painful Than the Agony of Death	2175
India-China relations: The ball is in the Chinese court	2176
Opinion: More Painful Than the Agony of Death	2178
'Monument to history' battle between US and China over future of Mao's secretary's diary	2179
Tibetan Travails: China's Stranglehold on Movement	2181
China's extreme restrictions on freedom of movement affecting ethnic Tibetans	2181
Dalai Lama, the US and diplomacy	2182
Nancy Pelosi has consistently called out China's oppressive policies	2182
President Biden's Missed Opportunity: He should have met the Dalai Lama	2183
Tibetan people deserve their dignity – and their rights	2184
India lagging behind the West on Tibet stance?	2185
What 'Tibet' means for China's water security	2186
Surrounded by the flames	2186
Xi balances between professionalism and political control of the PLA	2187
COMMENT: Sino-Indian relations warm, but Delhi sticking to a neutral middle path	2188
Coercive annexation of Taiwan by the People's Republic of China would unleash globally destructive consequences, Rice Baker Institute report says	2190
Imposing on questions of faith will get China nowhere	2191
Beijing intensifies gray tactics against Taiwan	2191
Pakistan's Role In Protecting Chinese Interests In CPEC – OpEd	2194
The race to choose the next Dalai Lama China and India disagree over reincarnation	2195
America's gambit: Putting Tibet in the legal spotlight	2197
China's third plenum shows its reform era has entered a new phase	2198
Opinion: India's policy on Tibet remains steadfast	2199
What China's Strategists Think About China-US Relations	2200
America's gambit: Putting Tibet in the legal spotlight	2202
India Needs To Reset Its Ties with China Instead Of Relying On America	2203
US attempt to cause a rift between China and India over border issue deserves vigilance	2205
The Resolve Tibet Act, a Timely Impetus for Foreign Policy Review	2206
Did climate change kill the ancient Tibetan empire?	2207
China's Anti-Religious-Freedom Policy: A Threat to World Peace and Stability	2208

With US keen on military base and China eyeing deep sea port, India must engage with Bangladesh smartly	2210
Book Review   When India let Tibet down Books and Art	2213
India's foreign policy misalignment	2213
China's Great Wall of Villages	2215
Stories of Tibet	2217
Journey to Tibet	2219
China has turned inward to sell Xinjiang cotton after a trade ban. Will it be enough?	2223
Can democracy in South Asia withstand US-China rivalry?	2225
Fighting for Tibet must be a Team Effort	2226
Experts discuss China's infrastructural ambitions in Himalayan region during recent webinar	2227
The geopolitics in 'Tibet border' reference	2228
Taiwan should step up transparency amid Chinese 'gray zone' tactics: Expert	2229
India-China: A frozen relationship	2230
Explainer: Tim Walz's long track record in China	2231
The Annexation Of Taiwan In Xi Jinping's Timeline – OpEd	2232
China's Iron Grip on Tibet: A Scathing Indictment of Religious Repression	2233
China's War on the Dalai Lama Stokes Tension with India and Russia	2235
India cannot afford to lose plot while chasing Chinese investment	2236
Why time is ripe to shun 'One-China policy'	2238
Does a deal over 2 fishermen mean Taiwan and mainland China are ready to restart talks?	2239
China's, US' Indo-Pacific strategies	2240
Xi's Hong Kong letter a gesture to shore up confidence in the private sector	2242
As China, India ramp up naval rivalry, is the Indian Ocean at a maritime crossroads?	2242
What Does China's Plenum Mean For The West?	2245
Taiwan is readying citizens for a Chinese invasion. It's not going well.	2246
China needs to pick a side, and it just might pick the west	2248
In Xi's China, Politics Eventually Catches Up With Everyone	2249
The Jaishankar-Wang Meeting and the Future of China-India Ties	2250
Tibetans hail new US legislation	2252
Is the growth rate of Uyghurs in Xinjiang higher than that of the Han?	2252
Unmasking the Truth: China's Campaign of Disinformation on Tibet	2254
After a population exodus, Hong Kong looks to mainland China for new residents	2257
July	2259
A Shift in the China-Tibetan Dispute	2259
Empowered Together: Our Journey at ITYF 2024	2262

America's Resolve Tibet Act and India as Third Polarity in Sino-Tibetan Negotiations	2262
Xi's economic, political headaches	2263
REPORT: Pro-Han bias, tension at India-borders hamper China's new economic development policy in Tibet	2264
Amitabh Mathur on the Tibetan Struggle, Post-Dalai Lama Scenario, and the 'Tibet Card'	2265
Tibet and Xinjiang: The US increases pressure on China	2268
As China's economy spirals, the Communist Party tightens its grip	2270
Why Chinese TikTok is being accused of deleting Tibetan content	2271
Opinion: Hopes and Dangers of new Tibet-China dialogue- A friendly warning	2272
The Tibetan Struggle at 70: Challenges and Opportunities	2278
Inaction, or complicity? Chinese authorities turn a blind eye towards restrictions on Tibetan language	2279
Echoes from the Tibetan Youth Convention: A growing experience	2282
Can the US 'Resolve Tibet Act' Make a Difference?	2282
China's Leaders Just Held a Third Plenum. So What?	2283
When Tibet Sought China's Help Against "Napoleon of India" – The Incredible "Twist In Tale" From Today's Scenario	2285
Golog, Qinghai: After 30 Years, a Prestigious Tibetan School Is Liquidated	2286
China's controversial boarding school policy for Tibetans explained	2287
The Vibrant Villages Programme: A Response to PLA's Salami Slicing through Xiaokang (小康) villages	2288
Tibetan Buddhist Nuns: An Overlooked Pillar of the Four-fold Sangha	2290
Pema Tsenden's Other Legacy	2291
Tibetan exiles are on the move again	2293
India sees US 'Resolve Tibet Act' as driven by great power rivalry?	2294
Biden's Tibet Stance Draws Criticism Despite Signing Landmark Act	2295
Tibetan Exile President Ups Ante In Nomenclature War – OpEd	2295
US' rivalry with China primary driver for 'Resolve Tibet Act': Former NSA Shivshankar Menon	2297
China Calls the US Resolve Tibet Act a "Sinister Farce"	2297
China's Grip on Tibet: Struggles and Sovereignty Explored	2298
Hope of Returning Home Springs Eternal in the Breasts of Tibetan Exiles in Dharmshala	2298
Can Modi 3.0 end tensions with China? What Experts say	2300
'China fails to win hearts and minds of Tibetan people': Former envoy	2302
Textbook case of bad textbooks	2302
Global Watch   China's Weaponisation of Water Resources is a Grave Threat to South Asia	2303
China's border dispute with India	2305
Researcher explains how Uighurs are exploited in Xinjiang forced labor regime	2306

Chinese soldiers gear up for winter warfare	2307
Anti-Cult Propaganda in Ulugqat County, Xinjiang—Where There Are No “Cults”	2309
Bhuchung D Sonam - “Human experience is as deep as it is vast”	2309
Interview with Rinzin Namgyal on Life, Tibet and the Dalai Lama	2311
Bilateral diplomacy is a never-ending tightrope walk for India and China	2314
It’s time for India to revise its voice on Tibet	2315
Last-gasp bid to use Dalai Lama to destabilize China	2316
The Resolve Tibet Act and Its Implications for Tibet-China Relation	2317
Will Tibet Be Independent One Day?	2318
Tibet And Its Position In The India-China-US Geopolitical Triangle	2319
The Dalai Lama's revenge: the high fertility of Tibetans in China	2320
How a US act revived Sino-Indian confrontation over Tibet	2322
As Violence Surges, Can Pakistan Protect Its Chinese Projects?	2323
Tibetan Dilemma: Uncertain Future Without The Dalai Lama	2325
Could Taiwan's 'separatists' face death penalty in China?	2326
Why the Panchen Lama Matters	2327
Tibet embodies larger issues of religious freedom in Asia	2329
Jaishankar-Wang Meeting: Why normalcy in India-China ties is likely to stay elusive	2330
Tibet back under the spotlight	2331
Tibet, not LAC, is the real issue	2332
World Tibet Day Special   Tibetan struggle is on an upward swing despite its ups and downs: Amb Dilip Sinha	2333
Why the Himalayan Region Is Integral to a Rules-Based Order in the Indo-Pacific	2335
India mum on environmental losses due to China’s Tibet policies: Academic	2337
Sino-Indian Conflict Is The Centerpiece Of India’s Foreign Policy – Analysis	2338
Is integration of Tibetan schools in exile the way forward?	2339
India playing Tibet card to prick China	2343
THE TIBETAN DILEMMA	2344
Boycotting Xinjiang cotton: What does it mean for environmental and labor justice in Central Asia?	2345
Relocation Of Chinese Industries To Pakistan: Strategic Move For Economic Growth – OpEd	2346
Is there going to be an India-China deal?	2348
Forced Relocation in Tibet: The Downside of China’s Poverty Reduction Strategy	2350
A new dawn in Tibetan diplomacy	2351
Tibet In The Spotlight – OpEd	2353
Pinching the dragon’s tail on future of Tibet	2353
The Past (and Future) of the Territorial Swap Offer in the China-India Border Dispute	2354

Modi 3.0: How India is setting the course for relations with China	2357
Building Bridges: Impact Of PM Shehbaz Sharif's Historic Visit To China – OpEd	2360
June	2361
"India Should Revise Tibet Policy On China Occupation, Make Stance Clear On Dalai Lama's Succession"	2361
The shift in US policy toward Tibet	2362
Resolve Tibet Act: An Opportune Time To Revisit India's Tibet Policy	2363
PLA reorganisation has implications for China's neighbours	2365
Why Do India and China Keep Fighting Over This Desolate Terrain?	2366
Straight Talk   India's Himalayan Powerplay: China Caught Off Guard As India, US Play the Tibet Card	2372
Centring 'Tibetan' in Tibetan and Himalayan Studies in India	2373
The world ignores threats from China, promotes the cause of self-determination of Tibetan people	2376
Cyberthreats sponsored by Chinese Communist Party	2377
China must not choose the next Dalai Lama	2378
Chinese military developments and national security challenges for India	2379
Tibet is back on the table	2381
Lack of education helps Xi to stay in power	2382
Effects Of Indo-China Political Tension In Global Framework – OpEd	2384
India Reiterates Tibet Position After US Delegation Visit – OpEd	2388
Opening up the Tibet front?	2388
Why India's 'Tibet card' against China is stronger and working like never before	2389
Awakening for Tibet	2392
What's behind India's hardening posture against China?	2393
China's name change spree in Xinjiang and Tibet continues unabated	2394
Resolve Tibet	2396
China-US-India 'situationship' over Dalai Lama: Will reincarnation have geopolitical implications?	2396
The Tibet Play	2398
What is the Resolve Tibet Act?	2398
Why Tibet Matters?	2399
South China Sea tensions force US and Beijing to talk more	2400
Exiled Tibet Leader Calls on World to Press China Into Talks	2402
What is the Tibet-China Dispute Act passed by US Congress last week?	2403
The forced assimilation of Tibet	2404
China's massive attack against India: A looming possibility	2405

View: India must revive its Tibetan Buddhist links to show a mirror to China	2407
Before signing bipartisan-Tibet-Bill, PrezBiden ought to know it is merely a token exercise. By Hem Raj Jain	2407
Why China takes young Tibetans from their families	2408
China's Ambitious '5G-A' Plans in Tibet: Strategic Implications for India	2409
Chinese armed forces have been upgrading. India must keep up	2411
New Delhi's Tibet-Taiwan move: How India-China relations will fare under Modi 3.0	2412
Why India Needs To Act Against China's Renaming Of Arunachal Spots: Intel Sources Explain   Exclusive	2414
The Dalai Lama Is Landing in the Middle of the 2024 Election	2414
After Nepal, will China reopen Covid-closed Tibet-India border trade points?	2415
Why China should introspect and stop seeing India through Western lens	2416
Mainstream media turns blind eye as UN visits Xinjiang, criticises US	2417
CHINA-JAPAN-SOUTH KOREA TRILATERAL SUMMIT: WHY WAS THE CHANCE TO ADVOCATE FOR XINJIANG AND TIBET NOT TAKEN?	2418
What do India's neighbours expect from the new government?	2420
Tibetan Participation in India's Elections: Past, Present, and Future	2421
'Short of war,' China's gray zone strategy on Taiwan is gathering in intensity	2423
India to rename two dozen places in Tibet region under China as retaliation	2425
China 'Heats-Up' Indian Border With Civil-Military Fusion, Dual Use Villages To Assert Claims Near Disputed LAC	2426
Decoding the role of Chinese Military Companies operating with the PLA Information Support Force (ISF): A Comprehensive Analysis of the Major Military Companies	2428
China is Erasing the Memory of the Tiananmen Massacre. We Can't Let Them.	2430
#9 Unlocking Tibet: In-Depth Mapping of Transport Infrastructure Through Geo-Spatial Analysis	2431
INSTIGATION OF REBELLIONS IN TIBET	2435
India-China Nomenclature War Intensifies In The Himalayas – OpEd	2437
Six decades later, scholar locates site of secret CIA-Tibet training camp	2438
With China willing to discuss 'Dalai Lama's future', Tibetan fate hangs in balance	2440
May	2442
Modi Mentions Dalai Lama: Anticipation Builds for Possible Meeting	2442
Growing Repression in Tibet: A CECC Report Confirms	2443
From Tibet to Xizang: China's strategic moves	2443
Gen Sundarji gave a China strategy 4 decades ago. India failed to execute it at LAC in 2020	2445
Global Watch   Seventeen-Point Agreement: A Story That Traces Origin of China's Betrayal of Tibet	2447
'Thread of Beads': China's Cartographic Aggression Against India	2448

History, culture are foundations for understanding China's politics: renowned Spanish expert	2451
India needs to counter China's united front tactics	2451
The importance of being Tibet's 14th Dalai Lama	2452
Onus on India to exert pressure on China over Tibet	2453
China's 'virtual invasion' of India and the cultural genocide of Tibet	2455
Will China Succeed in Creating an Asian Security Order?	2456
China's Supposed "Change" in Policy Towards Chinese Overseas: Nothing to See Here	2458
Xi Jinping's strongman politics is China's 'new normal'	2460
Xi's alternative world order	2461
Himalaya in Dilemma	2462
China removes the PLASSF and establishes ISF: Implications for India	2465
China doesn't need to invade to achieve Taiwanese unification	2466
China's sinicisation campaign puts Islamic expression on the line	2468
China Threatens India's Hold Over Siachen, Kashmir As Beijing 'Creeps Into' Shaksgam Valley Using CPEC	2469
Chinese Foreign Agent was Behind New York Parade with Eric	2471
Unravelling of Chinese spies' dirty work in Europe	2471
How China's latest government overhaul is shaping up, and what it says about the Communist Party's priorities	2473
China wants to control reincarnation of the next Dalai Lama	2475
The escaped dissident still pursued decades on by China	2476
What Xi Jinping Really Thinks	2478
ང་དང་ཨ་མ་གྲོ་ཤེ་མའི་ལམ་དབང། My Destiny with Amdo Ngaba: Generational Impeded Culture leading to Self-Immolation in Ngaba	2479
Backdoor support of China fuels Nepal's cartographic aggression irks India May 10 2024, Organiser	2480
Human rights organizations hold lecture tours at world-renowned universities to commemorate the 35th anniversary of the Tiananmen Massacre	2481
From the bookshelf: 'The Political Thought of Xi Jinping'	2484
China Must Cease Collective Punishments Targeting Families of Tibetan Human Rights Defenders	2485
India's Spying Upsurge Can Complicate Security Ties With the West	2486
What China is signaling by renaming regions	2487
Opinion   China Is Revamping Its Military, And India Must Not Take It Lightly	2488
India is starting to split in two parts, What's Next?	2489
Competition and conflict: On the U.S.-China relationship	2490
Where is the Panchen Lama? Will the CCP manipulate the Dalai Lama's Reincarnation?	2491
Can Nepal get a lift from wooing by India and China to become a middle-income economy?	2494

How Xi Jinping is consolidating his power by revamping Chinese military	2495
Are there really Chinese sleeper cells operating in the U.S.?	2497
Why China disbanded once-touted Strategic Support Force: Implications for India	2498
The naming dispute between India & China	2500
Billions in US investment goes to Chinese firms linked to CCP military, human rights abuses	2501
Xi's Imperial Ambitions Are Rooted in China's History	2502
Suddenly, Chinese Spies Seem to Be Popping Up All Over Europe	2504
The story of one of Buddhism's most revered figures, long missing, explained	2506
Significance of passage of Resolve Tibet bill'	2507
China's Alternative Order	2508
Why the Dalai Lama's Message Still Resonates Today	2514
Beyond Borders: China's attempts to censor global Academia	2515
We must be free or die	2518
Reform and opening up are not dead', but today's China 'looks risky': veteran observer David Lampton	2520
More and More Chinese Citizens Lose Trust in CCP Leadership	2524
Xi Jinping's meeting with former Taiwanese president: Understanding Cross-strait dynamics	2525
What Would Modi's Third Term Mean for India-China Relations?	2527
We need a strategy, not retorts, to deal with China	2529
China had a 'special place' in PM Modi's heart, now it's a thorn in his side	2530
India-China border dispute: Beyond the hype, the reality of the LAC	2531
Ian Explains: Xi Jinping's nationalist agenda is rebuilding walls around China	2533
The Hot Peace Between China and India	2533
China's Cartographic Antics Signal the Logic of an Expanded Alliance With India	2535
China-India-US power balance at stake in 2 elections	2536
Thread of Beads: An analysis of China's renaming of 62 locations in the Indian State of Arunachal Pradesh since 2017	2537
Going Back in time: When China was clueless about McMahon Line	2538
Why we must take seriously China's mastery and misuse of AI espionage	2539
The Emerging Great Game Chinese, Indian and American Engagement in South Asia	2541
New Chinese Gray Zone Warfare Against India	2548
The China-India-US Imbroglia	2550
China's Unquenched Territorial Greed: What Is The Limit? – OpEd	2552
Arunachal Pradesh Again: Why China Keeps Coining New Names For Places In Other Countries	2553

India Stands To Lose Strategic Leverage Against China As Exiled Tibetans Leave Settlements – OpEd	2554
China’s Advancing Efforts to Influence the U.S. Election Raise Alarms	2555
De-Risking’s Blind Spot: China’s Targeting of Global Civil Society	2557
The CCP’s Performing Arts Troupes in the U.S.	2559
March	2562
The United States should seek engagement without provocation of China	2562
Tibetan culture, livelihoods are being damned in Xi Jinping's China	2563
Communist China had a good run – but the Party is over	2564
Opinion: A Gullible Singer And a Few Questions	2566
As China prepares to invade Taiwan, US forces are about to combat-test a vital weapon	2567
Xi’s China deserves a diplomatic surgical strike by India on Tibet	2568
Why is China provoking India over Arunachal Pradesh?	2569
India shows the world how to deal with hegemonistic China	2570
There will be no ‘short, sharp’ war. A fight between the US and China would likely go on for years.	2571
With new national security legislation, China shows it will never loosen its grip on Hong Kong	2573
In the busy waters between China and Taiwan, the de facto border is being tested	2574
Developments that rattled China in a fortnight	2575
Upholding one-China principle an unstoppable historical trend	2576
The 2 nd session of the 14 th NPC: The Government Work Report and Key Takeaways for Inner Mongolia, Tibet and Xinjiang	2578
Economic diplomacy: Charting the course for China-U.S. relationship	2579
Rahul Sankrityayan’s Tibet connect debunks false Chinese narrative	2580
Tibetans in Exile – Raising Voices for a Distant Homeland	2582
Exposing China’s Human Rights Charade Under Xi Jinping: Insights From China’s Fourth U.N. Universal Periodic Review and Beyond	2583
‘Tibet’s path to freedom mirrors challenges faced by Palestine, Ukraine’	2584
How exiled Tibetans keep alive the culture of a homeland most have never dared visit	2587
Reassessing Tibet’s Plight in the 21st Century	2588
Tibetan Soldiers in the Chinese Army. 2. “Tibetans Are Useful but the CCP Doesn’t Trust Them”	2590
Tibetan Soldiers in the Chinese Army. 1. The Context	2591
Reincarnation and realpolitik keeps Dalai Lama’s succession in dilemma	2593
Exiled Tibetans Guard Heritage From 'Cultural Genocide'	2594
Tibetans fear for future as they recall failed uprising against China	2595
The Dalai Lama: Tibet's Spiritual Leader, Bane Of Beijing	2597

The Maldives Is a Tiny Paradise. Why Are China and India Fighting Over It?	2598
Book Review: Echoes from the Forgotten Mountains	2599
Unsettled LAC is Xi's pressure point on India to stay away from West	2603
Peace At Border Must For Improvement Of Ties With China: S Jaishankar	2603
Is turbulent the new normal in Sino-Indian relations?	2604
Money, power and the peril of courting Chinese nationalism	2605
China bolsters military recruitment aimed at sharpening its military power: A warning for its neighbours	2607
Make in India can dial up Chinese characteristics	2608

February 2609

China says Hong Kong's 'one country, two systems' is permanent	2609
Expanding Forced Labor in Xinjiang: New Report Exposes CCP's Growing Atrocities Against Uyghurs	2610
Leadership Psychology of China's Xi Jinping	2610
New Report: Uyghur Forced Labor Increased in 2023	2612
Red China Isn't 'Back' Under Xi Jinping. It Never Went Away	2613
How does India's military measure up against China and Pakistan?	2614
Claude Arpi   China playing new border games close to Mt Kailash	2615
Tibet border closure hits family reunions, local trade	2617
Feature story: Is the migration of exile Tibetans to the west a boon or bane?	2618
AlIndian Army Prepares For A Tough Summer On China Border – OpEd	2622
Book Review: 'Women In Tibet: Past And Present'	2622
A window of opportunity for Western companies to quit Xinjiang	2624
China, Xi Jinping and the making of 'one people, one ideology'	2625
Echoes From Forgotten Mountains: Tibet In War & Peace	2626
Hong Kong's economy needs reinvention to become more than just China's superconnector after a lost half decade	2628
Xi Jinping's Succession Dilemma	2629
Tibet's Enduring Struggle: A Tale of Resilience and Hope	2634
Why Pakistan's unstable coalition won't faze China, IMF: 'everyone understands army is in charge'	2635
Uyghurs Continue to Oppose "Genocide Tours" to Xinjiang	2637
Explained: China's 'Xiaokang' border defence villages along the LAC, now being occupied	2638
Why China Isn't Blowing Up Over the Deaths of Fishermen That Taiwanese Forces Chased Away	2639
Tibetan Legacy: Under the Dragon's Gaze	2640
Why China Wants to Be Asia's Only UN Security Council Member	2641

Why global firms are looking to exit China's Xinjiang	2642
How America is failing to break up with China	2643
China Pulls Taliban Out Of Isolation; Beijing Eyes Afghanistan's Mines To Dominate Smartphone, EV Market?	2644
China 'Pushes the Boundaries' with its expanding borders	2646
China Is Winning the Battle for the Red Sea, America Has Retired as World Policeman	2649
Xi Jinping's never-ending hunt for corruption in the Communist Party	2650
India Says It Stopped China's Attempt to Repeat 1962 Border War	2652
China's increasing political influence in the south Pacific has sparked an international response	2653
The New Regulations for Religions in Xinjiang: Part of a Wider Campaign Against Religion	2654
China and the Question of Tibet	2656
January	2658
China Continues to Pose a Challenge to India's Security and Economy	2658
China Introduces Strict Rules In Xinjiang On Islam, Other Religions	2659
Why Chinese spy balloons are back in force over Taiwan	2661
15 months on, China may appoint ambassador to India	2662
A New Great Game: China, India, and the Dalai Lama	2663
Atheist China should have no say in Dalai Lama's reincarnation	2665
Beware of Thermo Fisher's Net	2666
China is preparing for 'history warfare' that India must counter	2667
China's Preference for Hard Power Is Creating Major Headaches for Beijing	2669
US company must stop supplying China's regime with DNA surveillance tech	2671
Opinion: Will Lai Ching-te move away from Tsai Ing-wen, The Tibet Question in Taiwan's New Era	2672
The PLA is in crisis. That won't stop China invading Taiwan	2674
China is 'risky' for supply chains and India a favored destination for U.S. firms, survey shows	2676
Fewer Westerners in China is bad for China – but worse for the West	2676
India-China Border Issue: Stable Yet Sensitive – Analysis	2677
How China's Government Keeps Inadvertently Hurting Its Own Economy	2679
What Taiwan's Election Tells Us About China and 2024	2680
Activists Decry Tibet 'Cultural Genocide' Ahead Of China Rights Review	2681
When China ceded Hong Kong to the British in 1841 – and how its impact is felt till date	2682
What next for China and Taiwan?	2683
100 years since death of Lenin marked by silence from China's Communist Party. Why?	2684
What's at stake for China as border tensions flare between Iran and Pakistan?	2686

Managing Regional Rivalries and Extraregional Interests as a Buffer State: The Nepalese Case Study	2687
The Futile Legacy of Mao Zedong	2688
With an Eye Toward India, China Bolsters Military Infrastructure Development in Tibet	2690
Unmasking Global Corruption: A Tale of China, America, and Nepal	2692
Tibetan issues not in focus, but repression persists – exiled former leader	2693
China’s perspective on ties with Pakistan and CPEC’s prospects	2693
Feature story: The continuing saga of housing for Tibetan Exiles in India	2694
Taiwan's president-elect Lai Ching-te: How China, US and Russia reacted to his election	2696
Sino-Indian Border Infrastructure In The Indian Defense Ministry’s Year End Review – Analysis	2696
China Failed to Sway Taiwan’s Election. What Happens Now?	2698
China: Guidelines Instruct Religions How to Implement the New Patriotic Education Law	2699
China’s external propaganda on Tibet: Erasing Tibet to ‘tell a good Chinese story’	2701
The Taiwan that China wants is vanishing	2707
China’s Colonial Boarding Schools In Tibet And The Danger They Represent	2710
China’s Public Image Actually Getting Worse	2711
The China factor seemingly less significant in Taiwan’s 2024 presidential election	2711
Dark realities of Xinjiang: Tough test for Uighurs	2712
Vicious circle of Chinese propaganda: Will 'emperor' Xi remember what happened to his father?	2714
Will Hong Kong's National Security Law safeguard or harm its citizens?	2714
China's Election Interference in Taiwan Explained	2715
Two key military appointments from China’s naval ranks reflects Xi’s territorial ambitions, analysts say	2717

TIBET DIGEST 2024

FOUNDATION FOR
Non-violent
Alternatives
To inform and shape policy on Tibet and the region

CCP'S TIBET POLICIES

www.fnvaworld.org
143, 4th Floor, Uday Park, New Delhi, 49
office@fnvaworld.org

Disclaimer: FNVA does not endorse "China's Tibet", "Tibet Autonomous Region of China", "Xizang" or any such phrase that denotes Tibet has been/is a part of China. Articles that contain such phraseology are news items from the Chinese state media and must not be confused as endorsement by FNVA

China claims its highly dangerous, world's biggest hydroelectric dam in Tibet will pose no serious threat to downstream India

28 December 2024, Tibetan Review

CCP'S TIBET POLICIES

After reporting its approval of a plan to build “a dam” close to India’s border in occupied Tibet’s Yarlung Tsangpo, and it was later revealed by various news reports to be for the world’s largest hydroelectric project – or, in fact, the planet’s biggest infrastructure project ever – China has on Dec 27 sought to allay concerns that it posed serious threats to downstream countries India and Bangladesh. But neither country is likely to feel assuaged by mere words-of-mouth assurances.

China’s foreign ministry spokesperson Mao Ning has said the project aimed to speed up developing clean energy, and respond to climate change and extreme hydrological disasters.

“China has always been responsible for the development of cross-border rivers. China’s hydropower development in the lower reaches of the Yarlung Zangbo River aims to speed up developing clean energy, and respond to climate change and extreme hydrological disasters. The hydropower development there has been studied in an in-depth way for decades, and safeguard measures have been taken for the security of the project and ecological environment protection,” the timesofindia.com Dec 27 quoted Mao as saying.

“The project will not negatively affect the lower reaches. China will continue to maintain communication with countries at the lower reaches through existing channels, and step up cooperation on disaster prevention and relief for the benefit of the people by the river,” she has added.

China had previously agreed to share hydrological data with downstream India under a 2006 deal, but failed to do so after bilateral ties sored over cross-border issues.

The construction site is located at a significant gorge where the Yarlung Tsangpo forms a U-turn before flowing into India’s Arunachal Pradesh state as Siang and Brahmaputra rivers and eventually into Bangladesh. When completed it could generate three times the power of the Three Gorges Dam.

The project’s total investment is expected to exceed one trillion yuan (USD 137 billion), surpassing all other infrastructure projects globally, including China’s Three Gorges Dam, currently considered the world’s largest, as reported the South China Morning Post on Dec 26.

China's current biggest hydroelectric dam project in Tibet is the USD 1.5 billion Zam Hydropower Station, which commenced operations in 2015.

The latest project was incorporated into China's 14th Five-Year Plan (2021-2025) and National Economic and Social Development, along with Long-Range Objectives Through the Year 2035, adopted by the CPC Plenum in 2020.

India's concerns stem from China's potential to control the river's water flow, including its possible release of huge volumes during conflicts, given the dam's unprecedented scale.

Apart from that, the dam's construction faces significant engineering challenges due to its location on a tectonic plate boundary prone to earthquakes.

The report said the Trans-border river data sharing was discussed during talks between India's National Security Adviser Ajit Doval and Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi, serving as Special Representatives for border questions, on Dec 18.

China suppressed a rebellion in Tibet due to the construction of a dam, reveals the BBC

27 December 2024, Vijesti

The planned construction of the dam sparked protests by hundreds of Tibetans at the beginning of the year, but they were arrested in a harsh crackdown on the rebellion, and some of them were beaten and seriously injured, the BBC learned from multiple sources and based on confirmed footage.

China has approved the construction of the world's largest hydroelectric dam, raising concerns about the displacement of communities in Tibet and environmental impacts downstream in India and Bangladesh.

The dam, which will be located in the lower reaches of the Jarlung Cangpo River, could produce three times more energy than the Three Gorges Dam, currently the largest hydroelectric plant in the world. The planned construction of the dam sparked protests by hundreds of Tibetans at the beginning of the year, but they were arrested in a harsh crackdown on the rebellion, and some of them were beaten and seriously injured, the BBC learned from multiple sources and based on confirmed footage.

Such protests are extremely rare in Tibet, which China has tightly controlled since annexing the region in the 1950s.

That they are still happening is illustrated by China's controversial insistence on building dams in a long-sensitive area.

Claims of arrests and beatings began to emerge shortly after the events in February.

In the following days, the authorities further tightened the restrictions, making it difficult for anyone to verify this story, especially journalists who cannot freely travel to Tibet.

But the BBC spent months searching for Tibetan sources whose family and friends were detained and beaten.

The BBC's fact-finding team examined satellite images and verified leaked footage showing mass protests and monks begging the authorities for mercy.

Those sources live outside of China and are not affiliated with activist groups.

But they did not want to be named for security reasons.

In response to questions from the BBC, the Chinese embassy in the UK neither confirmed nor denied the protests or their subsequent crackdown.

"China is a country governed by the rule of law and strictly protects the rights of citizens to legally express their dissatisfaction and express their opinions or suggestions," they answered.

The protests, which were followed by their suppression, took place in the territory that is the home of the Tibetans in the province of Sichuan.

Chinese authorities have been planning for years to build the massive Gangtuo Dam and hydroelectric plant, also known as Kamtok in Tibetan, in the valley that includes Dege (Derge) and Jiangda (Jomda) counties.

Once built, the dam's lake will submerge an area that is culturally and religiously significant to Tibetans, and home to several houses and ancient monasteries containing sacred relics.

One of them, the 700-year-old Vangudi (Vonto) monastery, has concrete historical value because there are rare Buddhist murals on its walls.

Because of the Gangtuo dams, thousands of Tibetans will be displaced.

The BBC has had access to a public tender document for the relocation of 4.287 residents to make way for the dam.

The BBC contacted an official named in the tender documents as well as Huadian, the state-owned company that is said to be building the dam.

No one answered.

Plans to build the dam were first approved in 2012, according to the letter of the United Nations special rapporteurs to the Chinese government.

In a letter from July 2024, concerns are highlighted about the "irreparable consequences of the dam" for thousands of people and the environment.

From the outset, residents were not "consulted in any significant way" about the dam, according to the letter.

For example, they received information that was not adequate and was not in Tibetan.

The government also promised them that the project would only start if 80 percent of them agreed to it, but "there is no evidence that that agreement was given," the letter said, adding that residents had tried to raise concerns about the dam multiple times. The Chinese authorities, however, denied this in their response to the UN.

"The resettlement of the villages in question was carried out only after full consultation with local residents," according to a September 2024 letter from the Office of the Permanent Mission of the People's Republic of China to the United Nations.

It added: "The local government and project developers financed the construction of new homes and provided subsidies for grazing, keeping and raising livestock. As for the cultural relics, they have been completely relocated."

But the BBC heard from two Tibetans that in February officials told them they would be evicted quickly, giving them very little information about resettlement and compensation options.

This triggered such deep anxiety that the villagers and Buddhist monks decided to stage protests, despite knowing that the rebellion would be severely suppressed.

"They didn't know what was going to happen to them"

The largest protest gathered people in front of the government building in Dege.

In a video obtained by the BBC and verified as authentic, protesters can be heard calling on the authorities to stop evicting people and allow them to stay.

Separately, a group of residents addressed visiting officials and pleaded with them to cancel plans to build the dam.

The BBC obtained footage that apparently shows this incident and verified that it took place in the village of Siba.

The video shows red-robed monks and villagers kneeling on a dusty road and giving thumbs up, a traditional Tibetan way of begging for mercy.

In the past, the Chinese government has been quick to suppress any resistance to the authorities, especially in Tibetan territory, where it is sensitive to anything that could potentially increase separatist sentiment.

This time was no different.

Authorities moved quickly to crack down on the uprising, arresting hundreds of people at the protests while simultaneously raiding homes across the valley, according to one of our sources.

One unverified but widely shared insert appears to show Chinese police pushing a group of monks on the road in what is believed to be an arrest operation.

Many were detained for weeks and some severely beaten, according to our Tibetan sources whose families and friends were targeted in this repression.

A source shared fresh details from the hearing.

He told the BBC that his childhood friend was detained and interrogated over a period of several days.

"He was asked questions and from the beginning the treatment was kind. They asked him: 'Who asked you to participate, who is behind this'.

"Then, when he couldn't give them the answers they wanted, he was beaten by six or seven different security guards over the course of a few days."

His friend ended up suffering only minor injuries and was soon released.

But others were not so lucky. Another source told the BBC that more than 20 of his relatives and friends had been detained for taking part in the protests, including an elderly person who was over 70 years old. "Some of them suffered injuries all over their bodies, even on their ribs and kidneys, from kicking and beating...and some of them got sick from their injuries," he said.

Similar claims of physical abuse and beatings during arrests have appeared in foreign Tibetan media reports.

The UN letter also cited reports of arrests and the use of force on hundreds of protesters, noting that "they were severely beaten by Chinese police, resulting in injuries requiring hospital treatment."

After the suppression of the rebellion, the Tibetans in this area faced even stricter restrictions, the BBC learns.

Communication with the outside world was further restricted and there was increased surveillance.

Those who could still be contacted were reluctant to speak for fear of retribution, according to the sources.

The first source said that while some of the freed protesters were eventually allowed to travel within Tibetan territory, others were given a curfew.

This has created problems for those who have to go to the hospital for medical treatment and nomadic tribes who have to roam the pastures with their herds, he said.

Another source said that he last heard from relatives and friends at the end of February: "When I managed to reach them, they told me not to call again because they would be arrested." They were very scared, they kept hanging up on me.

"We used to talk through WeChat, but now it's no longer possible. I am completely blocked from contacting any of them," he said.

"The last person I spoke to was a younger cousin. She said: 'It's very dangerous, many of us were arrested, there is a lot of trouble, they hit many of us'... They didn't know what would happen to them next."

The BBC was unable to find any mention of the protests and crackdown in Chinese state media.

But shortly after the protests, Chinese Communist Party officials visited the area to "explain the need" for the dam construction and called for "measures to maintain stability," according to the report.

A few months later, a tender was awarded to build a "public security station" in Dege, according to documents posted online.

The letter from Chinese officials to the UN indicates that the villagers have already been resettled and the relics moved, but it is not clear how far the project has progressed.

The BBC has been monitoring the valley through satellite images for months.

For now, there are no signs of the construction of the dam or the demolition of the village and monastery.

The Chinese embassy told us that the authorities are still conducting geological investigations and specialized studies for the construction of the dam.

She added that the local authorities "actively and thoroughly understand the demands and aspirations" of the locals.

Construction or exploitation?

Controversy is nothing new in China when it comes to dams.

When the government built the world's largest dam in the 1990s - the Three Gorges on the Yangtze River - it sparked protests and criticism over the way it handled resettlement and compensation for thousands of villagers.

In recent years, as China has accelerated its transition from coal to clean energy sources, such moves have become particularly sensitive in Tibetan territories.

Beijing has eyed the steep valleys and mighty rivers there, in the rural west, to build mega-dams and hydroelectric plants that can keep powering China's energy-hungry metropolis.

President Xi Jinping personally led the initiative for this, a policy called "sidiandongsong" or "sending western electricity to the east".

Getty Images

Like Gangtuo, many of these dams are on the Jinsha (Dri Chu) River, which flows through Tibetan territories.

It forms the upper reaches of the Yangtze River and is part of what China calls the world's largest clean energy corridor.

Gangtuo is actually the last in a series of 13 dams planned for this valley, five of which are already operational or under construction.

The Chinese government and state media have presented these governments as a win-win that cuts pollution and generates clean energy, while improving the lives of rural Tibetans.

In a statement to the BBC, the Chinese embassy said the clean energy projects focus on "promoting high-quality economic development" and "enhancing feelings of progress and happiness among people of all ethnic groups".

But the Chinese government has long been accused of violating the rights of Tibetans.

Activists say the dams are the latest example of Beijing's exploitation of Tibetans and their land.

"What we are seeing is an accelerated destruction of Tibetan religious, cultural and linguistic heritage," said Tenzin Choekji, a researcher at the rights group Tibet Watch.

"These are 'high-quality development' and 'ecological civilization' that the Chinese government is implementing in Tibet."

One key issue is China's resettlement policy of evicting Tibetans from their homes to make way for construction, which has sparked protests by villagers and monks living near the Gangtuo Dam.

It is estimated that more than 2000 rural Tibetans have been resettled since 930,000, according to Human Rights Watch (HRV).

Beijing has always been claimed that these relocations are happening only with the consent of the Tibetans and that they receive housing, compensation and new job opportunities.

State media often that represent as an improvement their living conditions.

Getty Images

But rights groups present a different picture, with reports detailing evidence of coercion, complaints of inadequate compensation, cramped living conditions and job shortages.

They also point out that the resettlement breaks the deep, centuries-old connection that rural Tibet shares with its own land.

"These people will lose practically everything they have, their livelihood and community heritage," said Maya Wang, the interim China director of Human Rights Watch.

Government and environmental concerns over the submergence of Tibetan valleys famous for their biodiversity, and the possible dangers of building dams in an area rich in earthquake fault lines.

Some Chinese academics have discovered that the pressure from the accumulated water in the dam lakes can potentially increasing the risk of earthquakes, among them iu say Jinsha.

This could lead to catastrophic flooding and destruction, as seen in 2018, when rain-triggered landslides occurred in a village located between two dam construction sites on the Jinsha.

The Chinese embassy told us that the implementation of any clean energy project "goes through scientific planning and rigorous demonstration, and will be subject to proper supervision."

In recent years, China has passed laws to protect the environment around the Yangtze River and the Qinghai-Tibetan Plateau.

President Xi Jinping has personally emphasized the need to protect the upper reaches of the Yangtze River.

About 424 million yuan has been spent on environmental conservation along the Jinsha, according to state media.

The report highlighted efforts to make dam projects earthquake-resistant.

A number of Tibetan rights groups, however, argue that any large-scale construction on Tibetan territory, including dams such as Gangtuo, must be stopped.

They have organized protests abroad and called for an international moratorium, arguing that companies participating in such projects would "allow the Chinese government to profit from the occupation and oppression of Tibetans."

"I really hope this dam building stops," one of the sources said.

"Our ancestors were here, our temples are here. We have been here for generations. It is very painful for us to move.

"What kind of life would we lead if we moved?"

Retired Party official exposes misuse of Quake-relief aid in Kyegudo

20 December 2024, ICT

In a startling revelation 14 years after the devastating 2010 Kyegudo (Jyekundo) or Yulshul (Yushu) earthquake that left around 3000 dead, a former Tibetan member of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) has accused local authorities in Yulshul Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in present-day Qinghai Province of misappropriating earthquake relief funds and causing environmental damage. The allegations were made in an undated video statement by Lobsang Dorjee on Chinese social media who holding his identity card identified himself as a former government official and CCP member. The video statement was most probably posted around mid-December and first posted on the social media X on December 17, 2024 under the account name Sakar Tashi.

Dorjee's multiple accusations center around the aftermath of the devastating 7.1 magnitude earthquake that struck Kyegudo on April 14, 2010. In his statement, Dorjee declares that the funds intended for emergency aid and reconstruction were diverted for personal gain by local officials, leaving many residents without proper housing assistance. In the video statement, he also discusses the unresolved issues for nomadic workers following the closure of the Military Industrial Enterprise in his area, and wasteful use of reconstruction resources.

On the then suppression of Tibetan protestors and petitioners challenging the authorities abuse of power, Dorjee states that the public has the right to petition about their grievances. He emphasizes that while CCP regulations state that all party members should work for the benefit of the people, it is clear that Kyegudo local officials have abused their power for their own interests. He further asserts that Chinese authorities use police to intimidate protesters, view them like "terrorists", and that the abuse of power for personal gain severely impacts the lives of ordinary people.

The retired official also highlighted a controversial $1.1 billion power plant project, which he states has significantly damaged the environment. "The environmental impact is severe, yet operations have not started," Dorjee stated in the video. Although not clearly specified, he also expresses his doubt over how the investment has been used, which could either mean who benefits from the power plant or how the funds meant for the plant have been used.

In mid-October this year, a 29-year-old Tibetan environmental defender, Tsongon Tsering, posted a video statement on Chinese social media, exposing illegal sand and gravel mining in his native Tsaruma hometown in Ngaba (Aba), Sichuan. After the exposé revealing the troubling situation of environmental neglect and the apparent governmental inaction in protecting a critical water source for Asia went viral, Tsering was arrested and sentenced to eight months detention which he is currently serving.

Reality far from propaganda

China had painted a picture of remarkable recovery in Kyegudo following the devastating earthquake urging Tibetans to be grateful to the CCP and the government. Then Chinese President Hu Jintao had vowed to help rebuilding when he visited the region on April 18, 2010 and was quoted by Chinese state media as asserting, "We must be more determined, act more swiftly, and adopt more scientific methods to overcome any difficulties". However, reality is far from what the Chinese government claims. The International Campaign for Tibet reported in the past that Tibetans have been largely excluded from the reconstruction planning process. Protests have occurred over land confiscation and government policies. Some viewed the rebuilding as an opportunity for authorities to advance controversial resettlement programs.

While Chinese state media projected rapid progress and full recovery, Lobsang Dorjee's recent video statement reveal that reality is far from propaganda. A poignant quote in a May 2014 New York Times report four years after the earthquake still rings true a decade later. "The tragedy of the earthquake became an opportunity for the powerful and the greedy," told Kunchen Norbu, then a 52 year-old-trader, to the New York Times.

Video captures abuse of Tibetan student by Chinese principal

19 December 2024, RFA

Incident at boarding school violates ethnic and children's rights, expert says.

A disturbing video has emerged showing a teacher slapping, pushing down and pulling the ear of a Tibetan student in front of other students gathered on what appears to be a sports field.

The video, which contains no sound, was contained in a report released by the Tibet Action Institute, an advocacy group based in North America, on Dec. 16. The incident was filmed on or before Nov. 18, according to sources of the rights group.

The institute identifies the teacher as Dang Qingfu, the school principal at a boarding school for Tibetan students called Tsokhyil Township Ethnic Boarding Primary School in Tsolho Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, in China's Qinghai province.

Dang is also the local Communist Party secretary, the institute said.

The video footage of the incident was shared with the school's parents' association and was also posted online, where it went viral. However, Tibetans were later barred from sharing the footage.

China has many such boarding schools for Tibetan students, where they are instructed only in Mandarin, not in their native Tibetan language.

Tibetan advocates see these as part of broader government efforts to eradicate the use of Tibetan language and enforce "patriotic education," which mandates that love of China and of the ruling Communist Party be incorporated into work and study for all.

The school has claimed the principal is under investigation, but still remains in his position. The Tibet Action Institute called for Dang to be immediately removed from his position and face legal charges.

Gyal Lo, an educational sociologist at Tibet Action Institute told Radio Free Asia, that the incident was a serious violation of human rights, ethnic rights and children's rights.

But he said that it's difficult to hold Chinese officials accountable in Tibetan areas as local governments consistently implement policies that contradict their own constitution.

"I don't think the Chinese government will consider this as racial discrimination against Tibetans, investigate and punish these kinds of school principals," he said.

In recent months, reports of abuse faced by Tibetan children at these state-administered boarding schools have come to light in recent months.

In September, Radio Free Asia reported that five young Tibetan former monks who were forced to attend a local government-run boarding school in Sichuan's Zungchu county attempted to take their own life saying they found it "unbearable" to stay in the school, where they said they were discriminated against, beaten and deprived of good food.

In October, RFA learned from sources that hundreds of young Tibetan Buddhist monks who had been forcibly transferred from a shuttered Buddhist monastery school to government-run boarding schools in Sichuan's Ngaba county were being held in 'prison-like conditions' in the schools.

Alarms raised over removal of Tibetan language in college entrance exams

05 December 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

A Tibetan parents' association has voiced serious concerns on WeChat about the removal of the Tibetan language from China's college entrance examination framework, relegating it to an elective subject. The discussion was sparked by a warning from a teacher who cautioned parents about the potential exclusion of Tibetan language studies.

The issue gained traction after a video shared on WeChat was later circulated on X (formerly Twitter). In the video, an individual expressed fears about the gradual erosion of Tibetan language. Some local responses framed the change as an inevitable consequence of China's educational reforms, but these comments were reportedly removed shortly after being posted.

Screen grab of a Tibetan raising concerns over the removal of the Tibetan language from Chinese college entrance exam

The removal of Tibetan language instruction from the core curriculum aligns with the Chinese government's "Model 2" education policy, which prioritises Mandarin Chinese as the medium of instruction. Experts view this as part of a systematic effort to destroy the Tibetan language and culture.

In 2022, Chinese authorities began implementing this assimilationist policy in primary schools across Ngaba (Ch: Aba) Tibetan and Qiang Autonomous Prefecture in Sichuan Province, within the Tibetan region of Amdo. The policy has faced widespread criticism from local Tibetans and activists. Among the prominent critics is Thupten Lodoe, a renowned Tibetan intellectual and writer, known by his pen name Sabuchey. He openly condemned the policy in a letter that led to his arrest and subsequent sentencing to four years and six months in prison.

China's Rules through Ideologically Indoctrinating the Youth

06 December 2024, RTV

Education is often viewed as the bedrock of critical thinking and intellectual freedom. Yet, in China, schools and universities serve a different purpose: indoctrination into the ideology of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). From the earliest stages of education to the halls of higher learning, the Chinese education system has been understood to systematically mould students to align with state narratives, enabling compliance and discouraging dissent.

In China, the education system is weaponized by the CCP to inculcate unwavering loyalty to its ideology. Nowhere is this more evident than in the Party's narratives about Tibet, Xinjiang, and Taiwan. Through manipulating curriculums and state-controlled pedagogy, Chinese schools and universities have transformed classrooms into arenas of political indoctrination, aiming to distort histories and suppress alternative perspectives.

This systematic indoctrination has not only entrenched authoritarian control but has also perpetuated harmful stereotypes and fuelled divisions that has hindered China's relationship with the international community.

The CCP's Narratives: A Manufactured Reality

From the earliest stages of education, Chinese students are taught that Tibet and Xinjiang are 'inseparable parts' of China and that Taiwan's sovereignty is non-negotiable. School textbooks have known to whitewash histories of these regions, portraying them as historically Chinese territories and erasing the cultural and political autonomy they once held.

The CCP's narrative on Tibet emphasizes its "peaceful liberation" in 1951, a euphemism for military invasion. Students are taught that Tibet continues to be backward, yet a feudal society rescued by Chinese intervention. The realities of Tibetan resistance, the destruction of monasteries, and the suppression of Tibetan Buddhism are unsurprisingly absent from these discourses. By presenting Tibet as a grateful beneficiary of Chinese governance, the CCP's projection has attempted to reinforce its legitimacy while silencing the Tibetan struggle for self-determination.

Similarly, in the case of Xinjiang, elementary school textbooks have emphasized economic development and ethnic harmony, downplaying the harsh realities of mass detentions, cultural erosion, and systemic repression faced by the Uyghur population. These curriculums have projected narratives emphasising how Uyghurs have benefited from Beijing's policies, glossing over their lived experiences of surveillance and forced assimilation. Students are conditioned to see the CCP's actions in Xinjiang as necessary measures to combat 'extremism', showcasing a nationalistic justification for human rights abuses.

The Limits of a Controlled Narrative

The CCP's propaganda on Tibet, Xinjiang, and Taiwan, however also does more than distort history. It has for decades bred prejudice and suppressed critical inquiry, especially when it comes to the human rights abuses the Party has conducted in these regions. By teaching students to view these regions through the lens of state ideology, the education system has entrenched harmful stereotypes and perpetuates systemic inequality.

For instance, Chinese students are been conditioned to see Tibetans and Uyghurs as 'ungrateful' or 'backward' for resisting assimilation, reinforcing societal discrimination against these groups. Similarly, the vilification of Taiwan has bred undeniable hostility that has severely undermined the possibility of peaceful cross-strait dialogue.

However, perhaps the most concerning aspect of the CCP's educational indoctrination is its suppression of dissent. Schools and universities have been equipped with surveillance systems to monitor student behaviour, and classmates are encouraged to report those who express 'unpatriotic' views, similar to practices that were exercised during the fateful 'Cultural Revolution'. This has thus created an atmosphere of fear and conformity, where self-censorship has unfortunately become the norm.

The recent crackdown on students involved in labour movements and human rights advocacy illustrates the lengths to which the Party is prepared to go to silence dissent. These students, who dared to apply the Marxist principles they were taught to contemporary labour struggles, were met with arrests and expulsions, demonstrating the CCP's hypocrisy in promoting ideology only when it serves its own interests.

The indoctrination of Chinese students has far-reaching consequences beyond China's borders. As these individuals enter global academic and professional spaces, they will carry with them a worldview shaped by CCP propaganda and Party indoctrination of views. This complicates international dialogue on human rights, as many are unwilling, or unable, to critically engage with the realities of Tibet, Xinjiang, and Taiwan.

Moreover, the CCP's education model serves as a blueprint for authoritarian regimes worldwide, demonstrating how control over education can be weaponized to sustain power and suppress dissent. The global community must recognize this and push for academic freedom and truthful education as fundamental human rights, for if not, then it must prepare to decimate the state-propaganda machinery run by the Party and its Supremo, Xi Jinping.

November

Tibet Autonomous Region chairman reported to have resigned

29 November 2024, Tibetan Review

Yan Jinhai, an ethnic Tibetan with Chinese name from Qinghai province, has resigned as the Chairman of the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) government. An acting chairman has been appointed, reported China's official chinadaily.com.cn Nov 29, citing the local party mouthpiece Xizang Daily.

China usually appoints a Tibetan as the chairman of the TAR government, with concurrent position as a Deputy Party secretary. The regional Party Secretary, who wields the real power, has always been an ethnic Chinese.

Karma Tsedan was appointed acting chairman of the Xizang autonomous region on Nov 28, the report said, using the Sinicized name for Tibet.

The appointment was stated to have been made at the 13th meeting of the Standing Committee of the 12th People's Congress of the TAR.

The committee also accepted Yan Jinhai's request to resign from the region's chairman position, the report added.

The report said both decisions would be submitted for the record of the 12th People's Congress of the TAR. Yan, 62, previously served as the Mayor of Lhasa City. Before that, he was vice governor of Qinghai from Jan 2013 to May 2017, when he became a member of the standing committee of the CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee, the province's top authority.

In Jul 2020, he was transferred to TAR and appointed a deputy party secretary, concurrently serving as party secretary of Lhasa since Jan 18, 2021.

On Oct 8, 2021, he was appointed chairman of TAR, succeeding Che Dalha, a Tibetan from Gyalthang (Chinese: Zhongdian, now renamed as Shangri-La) County, Yunnan province.

Eying their mountain mineral deposits, China is relocating hundreds of Tibetan families citing landslide dangers

20 November 2024, Tibetan Review

China has ordered the relocation of hundreds of Tibetan families in Tsoshar (Chinese: Haidong) Prefecture-level City of Qinghai Province, citing landslide hazards. However, in reality, it is suspected to be planning to mine the overlooking mountain after years of exploring it for mineral deposits, said London-based Free Tibet campaign group (freetibet.org) Nov 19, citing its research partner Tibet Watch.

The group said that in late October this year, the Chinese government ordered the relocation of half the total households of Yarka and Bitsang villages in the City's Yadzi (Xunhua) County, located in the upper slopes and base of the sacred mountain Amnye Ratoe.

While Yarka village, one of the 22 semi-nomadic villages in Karing Township, has around 200 households, Bitsang has over 100.

Ninety percent of the local residents are said to be farmers harvesting abundant agricultural produce, growing mainly grain crops such as wheat, barley, peas, as well as buckwheat and oilseed.

The local government is said to have given two options to the Tibetans ordered to relocate, both of which would impoverish them, with no sustainable means of livelihood. One is to accept a subsidy of 150,000 Chinese yuan per household for building a new home, and the other is to move into new homes built in the Yadzi County town.

While the subsidy is not sufficient to buy land and build a home, those moving into the government-built homes have no money for their sustenance.

The group cited sources as saying the Chinese government had been exploring the mountain for mineral deposits over the past several years. And it is not clear what deposits have been found.

Some households from Yarka village are said to have been already moved into the state-built houses in the Yadzi county-town. Others reluctant to leave are not being allowed to stay in their ancestral land, the group said.

Tibet Leads China In GDP Growth In 2024

15 November 2024, The Rising Nepal

Last week, China's provinces released their economic performance data for the first three quarters of 2024. Preliminary calculations show that Tibet achieved a regional GDP of 250.5 billion yuan during this period. Calculated at comparable prices, Tibet's GDP grew by 6.2 per cent year-on-year, once again ranking first in the nation for economic growth. Notably, the per capita disposable income of all residents in Tibet has ranked first in China for eight consecutive years, and the first three quarters of this year were no exception. This figure reached $3,055, reflecting an 8.1 per cent increase year-on-year, 2.9 per cent above the national average. Specifically, urban residents in Tibet enjoyed a per capita disposable income of $6,000, up 6.5 per cent and 2 per cent higher than the national average. Meanwhile, rural residents in Tibet saw a per capita disposable income of $1,900, growing by 8.2 per cent, 1.6 per cent higher than the national average. The main driver of this growth is Tibet's impressive performance in online retail. In the first three quarters of this year, Tibet's online retail sales reached $2.297 billion, up 75.4 per cent year-on-year, the highest growth rate in the country. Online retail sales of physical goods alone reached $1.93 billion, a 91.1 per cent increase, also ranking first nationwide. Jewellery tops the list of online purchases in Tibet, with growth in this category reaching 214.9 per cent in the first three quarters, far outpacing other categories. Most purchases were for everyday accessories, with diamonds making up the largest portion. Women's clothing and other apparel items also grew rapidly, becoming key drivers of growth in online physical goods sales.

This growth is closely linked to Tibet's unique cultural appeal and the maturation of its consumer market. As consumer aesthetics improve and spending habits shift, there is a greater demand for quality goods. Additionally, the rapid development of e-commerce platforms and continuous improvements in logistics have played a major role, with local e-commerce also expanding swiftly.

The significant growth of platforms such as Tmall and Douyin (China's TikTok) demonstrates that livestreaming has become a popular shopping method in Tibet. Rural e-commerce in Tibet is also flourishing. Data shows that rural network consumers in Tibet spend the most on diamonds, wellness teas, and women's clothing. Livestreaming e-commerce has also contributed to rapid growth in online sales of Tibetan agricultural products.

For example, at a recent celebration in Hangzhou marking the 30th anniversary of Zhejiang Province's support for Tibet, Zhejiang's internet influencers hosted a livestream event to promote agricultural products from Naqu, Tibet. Five prominent internet personalities were appointed as "promotion ambassadors" to aid in Tibet's rural support initiatives. They partnered with local Tibetan livestreamers to sell products like yak meat, yellow mushrooms, and dairy items. This event not only achieved high sales but also provided valuable sales skills to the Tibetan livestreamers.

Viewers on livestream platforms can now watch agricultural product sales broadcasts from Qiongdacun, a remote village in Dazi District, Lhasa. In this village, local resident Dawa Ciren quickly picks ripe tomatoes, stacking them in front of the greenhouse for sale. Tsering Choedron and several young college students manage the livestream sales, stacking tomatoes and other vegetables on a makeshift table of foam boxes.

With a tea table, a computer, and an upturned bucket as a stool, Tsering Choedron has created her own livestream setup. Her assistant, Tenzin Yangchen, helps by holding the phone, answering questions, and arranging products. Thanks to these efforts, they now sell over 2,000 orders of cherry tomatoes per day, totalling over 3,000 kilograms. She says that fast logistics has also been crucial to their success.

Meanwhile, other western regions of China with significant ethnic minority populations, such as Xinjiang, Guizhou, and Gansu, also achieved growth rates above 5 per cent. This growth is largely due to the Chinese government's emphasis on social stability, ethnic unity, prioritisation of ecological protection, and commitment to high-quality development.

Patriotic Mandarin speech competitions in Tibet seen as undermining of locals' mother tongue

14 November 2024, Tibetan Review

As Chinese President Xi Jinping's call for Sinicizing Tibet – and other ethnic minority areas of the People's Republic of China (PRC) – continues to gather pace, Mandarin speech competitions are being held at schools and monasteries across the territory. These are combined with tests of the participants' loyalty and patriotism towards the communist party of China state.

Seen by analysts as another play by Beijing to erase Tibetan language and culture, Mandarin speech competitions are now frequently held in monasteries and schools across Tibet, reported the Tibetan service of rfa.org Nov 13, citing two local sources.

The report noted that though there are many dialects of Chinese spoken in the country, as well as many other languages, including Tibetan and Uyghur, Mandarin is the official language and Beijing wants all citizens to use it, with little or no attention paid to preserving the other languages.

"The reality is that young children are being strongly forced into learning Chinese, which is having a significant impact toward the eradication of Tibetan language and cultural practices," the report cited the first source as saying.

On Nov 9 and 10, some 33 Tibetans competed in the National Common Language Speech Contest in Tibet's capital Lhasa. The competition was stated to have been so framed to encourage participation from farming and nomadic communities as well as young Tibetans.

As if to emphasize the sweep of the language-Sinicization drive, the contestants were stated to have been divided into five groups: farmers and nomads, infants, school-age children, young adolescents, and adults.

In October, a similar competition was stated to have been held in the southern Tibetan city of Shigatse, with the theme of "Being a loyal and sincere patriot of the new era."

In Nagchu (Chinese: Naqu) in northern Tibet, monks and nuns were reported to have been made to praise the Chinese Communist Party in Mandarin as a part of "national language" competitions.

The report said that since 2020, China had been imposing stricter restrictions on language rights in Tibet, resulting in the closure of private Tibetan schools and a heightened emphasis on Chinese-language education in the name of standardizing textbooks and instructional materials.

It added that in 2021, authorities also began forbidding Tibetan children from attending informal language classes or workshops during winter breaks. It was in that year, on Dec 28, that China's Ministry of Education, the National Rural Revitalization Bureau and the National Language Commission issued a plan to promote Mandarin. The stated aim was that by 2025, Mandarin will be spoken and understood in 85% of the PRC and 80% of its rural areas.

This has seen China set up a region-wide network of boarding schools for Tibetan children where they are taught primarily in Mandarin. They are also subjected to political indoctrination while being separated from their parents and homes in a bid to reduce their contact with their native Tibetan language and culture, the report cited activists as saying.

The report cited another Tibetan source as saying, speaking on condition of anonymity, that Tibetans residing in rural areas are now required to speak Mandarin and write in Chinese.

The report cited Chinese state media as saying the main objectives of these language competitions for Tibetans was to promote and encourage the use of the "national common language," improve the language proficiency of the general population, and showcase the achievements of language work throughout the Tibet Autonomous Region.

Chinese repression against Tibetan and other diaspora communities in Japan: HRW

09 November 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Rights watchdog Human Rights Watch (HRW) has released a new report stating that Chinese authorities are targeting and intimidating people from countries occupied by China who are living in Japan and engaging in activities deemed politically sensitive by the Chinese government.

According to the report released in October, the Chinese government's harassment of diaspora community, includes people from East Turkistan, Tibet, and Inner Mongolia living in Japan, appears aimed at deterring them from protesting against the Chinese government or participating in events that challenge Beijing's policies.

HRW interviewed 25 people from Hong Kong, mainland China, East Turkistan, Tibet, and Inner Mongolia who are living in Japan. All of them had been involved in peaceful activities, such as raising awareness about human rights abuses in East Turkistan or promoting Tibetan and Inner Mongolian culture, which the Chinese Communist Party views as threatening.

Protesters rally in Tokyo to support the victims of a fire in Urumqi, the capital of East Turkistan occupied by China, November 30, 2022 (Photo/ Hiro Komae/ AP)

Most of those interviewed said they had been contacted by Chinese police, who pressured them to end their activities in Japan. Some reported receiving calls from authorities through their relatives back home, while others were approached at the Chinese embassy in Tokyo.

The report states that several Tibetans said they faced pressure from the Chinese government after engaging in activities to promote Tibetan culture in Japan. One Tibetan individual told HRW that when they went to the Chinese embassy in Tokyo to renew their passport, embassy officials told them they needed to return to Tibet to do so. The person said they rejected the embassy's recommendation, fearing they would be detained or face punishment.

One person said they stopped participating in politically sensitive activities out of fear of retaliation, while another declined to be interviewed for the same reason. Several ethnic Uyghurs from East Turkistan said they were asked to share information about Japan's Uyghur community. The report stated that Chinese authorities have violated the rights of Chinese nationals who return home, citing the case of a 23-year-old Hong Kong woman who was arrested upon returning to Hong Kong for pro-democracy comments she made while studying in Japan.

The report aligns with broader patterns documented by Freedom House, which in 2021 identified China as conducting the world's most extensive campaign of transnational repression. The repression tactics span from direct renditions to digital threats and coercion by proxy, targeting political dissidents, human rights activists, and minority groups like Uyghurs, Tibetans, and Falun Gong practitioners globally.

According to Freedom House, the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) transnational repression is characterized by its expansive scope, technological sophistication, and deep reach into foreign jurisdictions. WeChat, a popular social media platform among Chinese users worldwide, has become a tool for Beijing to surveil and silence dissent, with reports of hacking and phishing attacks targeting diaspora members.

The report also highlighted China's use of its geopolitical influence to co-opt host countries into aiding its repression efforts. Countries such as Nepal and Thailand have reportedly assisted Beijing in detaining or monitoring individuals critical of the Chinese government.

HRW in its report called on the Japanese government to establish a system for residents to report incidents of transnational repression by the Chinese government, with appropriate privacy protections and asylum/protection mechanisms. The group also suggested Tokyo to coordinate with other countries and the UN to hold China accountable for these abuses.

October

China Tries to Blot out Tibetan Criticism of Mining Firm's Damage to the Environment

28 October 2024, The Diplomat, Duncan Barlett

Tsowo Tsering says sand mining is disrupting his community and endangers the international water supply. His supporters fear he risks jail for speaking out online.

Chinese censors are trying to prevent people from viewing posts that allege severe environmental damage in Tibet caused by sand mining.

A young Tibetan man named Tsowo Tsering initiated the online discussion with a video post, delivered in Mandarin. In it, he says he is speaking from Ngawa Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, in southwest China's Sichuan Province.

He shares video footage that he says proves the severe impact of activities by a Chinese mining company on his community. Tsowo Tsering claims that “large amounts of sand have been recklessly mined, leading to serious soil erosion in the surrounding areas. This endangers the foundations of residents’ homes.”

Tsering alleges that Anhui Xianhe Construction Engineering Company has been conducting large-scale sand extraction in the region since May 2023, under the pretense of road construction. Tsering states that the local Ecological Protection Bureau acknowledged the illegality of the mining operations but imposed only token penalties, allowing the destructive activities to continue.

The video has now been purged from Chinese platforms, but has been translated and transcribed on the website of Free Tibet.

The video focuses on the Tsaruma River, a tributary of the sources of Yangtze and Yellow Rivers. Tsowo Tsering says: “We have lived and flourished on this land for generations. The quality of the ecological environment concerns the health and life safety of our descendants.”

He warns that over time, environmental damage will become increasingly severe. “The consequences will be beyond imagination. When environmental damage reaches a certain level, the collapse of the ecosystem will be an irreversible disaster,” says Tsering. Within days of its posting, Chinese authorities not only removed the video but also shut down Tsering’s account and blocked all search terms related to his name on WeChat.

Free Tibet’s Advocacy Officer Tenzin Kunga told The Diplomat that Tibetans, as stewards of their homeland, have a duty to raise urgent concerns over environmental destruction.

“Chinese construction companies, in collusion with local authorities, exploit Tibet’s land without accountability,” said Kunga

“Brave Tibetan environmentalists, like Tsowo Tsering, risk their safety in speaking out, as authorities often imprison them under the guise of ‘inciting separatism.’ I fear Tsering may face the same fate as Tibetan community leader A-Nya Sengdra, who is in prison for his activism.”

The Tibetan government-in-exile based in India is frequently critical of what it sees as China’s irresponsible attitude toward the environment.

There is particular concern over the process of the extraction of natural resources, which may cause water pollution. Tibet’s rivers and glaciers are internationally important. Water that originates on the Tibetan plateau supplies vast swathes of Asia, including many millions of people in China and India. Online protests by local people are extremely rare. They are also difficult to verify, as China strictly tries to control the narrative around its administration of Tibet.

Foreign reporters are rarely allowed into Tibet, least of all to cover sensitive environmental issues. The official Chinese media always present the development of Tibet as being a boon for local people, and associate it with a journey from feudalism to modernization, under the auspices of the Chinese Communist Party.

Artificial Chinese Cordyceps Threaten Tibet’s Traditional Market, Livelihoods

22 October 2024, The Tibet Express

A growing crisis has been unfolding on the Tibetan Plateau, with the flooding of artificial cordyceps fungi, locally known as Yartsa Gunbu (summer grass, winter worm), from China severely impacting the livelihoods of Tibetan communities. According to various local media reports and commentaries online, this synthetic version of the precious medicinal fungus from China has been causing significant disruption to the traditional cordyceps market in Tibet and the lives of Tibetan households who depend on it.

While Chinese companies had been experimenting with cultivating artificial cordyceps in some places in Tibet for several years, it wasn’t until about three years ago that these products began aggressively entering the market. Initially, when only a few major Chinese enterprises were involved in production, they maintained prices comparable to natural cordyceps, minimising market disruption. However, the situation has changed dramatically.

Today, an estimated 200-300 Chinese companies selling artificial cordyceps in the market have driven prices to unprecedented lows. Whilst the natural harvest of the prized caterpillar fungus typically sells for 90,000 to 100,000 yuan per kilogram, the artificial version is being marketed for just 20,000 to 30,000 yuan. These companies aren’t just undercutting prices – they’re actively misleading consumers by marketing their products as authentic Tibetan cordyceps. Though produced by Chinese companies, some packages of the artificial fungus products carry fake labels claiming they have been sourced from premium cordyceps regions in Tibet like Nagchu, making it difficult for inexperienced buyers to distinguish the difference.

Despite the formation of a “Lhasa Tibetan Cordyceps Association,” local Tibetans report that the organisation has done little beyond making verbal promises. In April, authorities in Qinghai province issued warnings about the artificial cordyceps being an invasive species, threatening legal action against unauthorised cultivation. However, these warnings have had little practical effect.

The association even offered 2,000 yuan rewards for reporting fraudulent sales, but local Tibetans say that the provided contact numbers are fake, and no actual steps were taken.

Though the 27 September meeting in Xiling brought together deputy party secretaries from five provinces and cordyceps association executives, observers note that the meeting focused on general topics like cordyceps benefits and environmental protection whilst completely avoiding the critical issue of market fraud. Local Tibetans say that the discussions failed to address the urgent need for legal intervention to protect the authentic cordyceps market.

The artificial cordyceps producers claim they're helping preserve natural cordyceps, which they say is nearing extinction. When some private Tibetan traders attempted legal action in China, highlighting how the price collapse was harming their communities, they were asked to provide individual proof of damages from all 70,000 affected people – an impossible ask that effectively blocked any legal remedy.

The crisis has left many Tibetans unable to sell their natural cordyceps at sustainable prices, forcing difficult choices between selling at a loss or facing severe financial hardship. Whilst the artificial product lacks the potency and flavour of natural cordyceps, it continues to evolve, making it all the more difficult to differentiate, easily deceiving inexperienced consumers.

The situation is particularly devastating because cordyceps harvesting has become a crucial source of income for many Tibetan households, especially following China's forced-urbanisation and resettlement policies that have displaced nomadic families from their traditional pastoralist lifestyles. These displaced communities often return to their native areas during cordyceps season but now face a market severely undermined by artificial alternatives. Combined with climate change's impacts on natural cordyceps growth, the flood of artificial products has created a perfect storm that threatens both the economic survival of Tibetan communities and the future of this traditional trade.

Yartsa Gunbu, Ophiocordyceps sinensis (scientific name), has been used in Chinese and Tibetan traditional medicine for centuries to treat various ailments including heart, liver, and lung problems, as well as asthma. It is also believed to boost libido, which has earned it the nickname 'Himalayan Viagra.' The highly valued medicinal fungus can be consumed directly, added to food or liquids, or ground up for use in traditional medicine production.

China identifies over 4000 new tourism sites in Tibet's capital Lhasa

14 October 2024, Tibetan Review

In its relentless push to attract more, and ever more Chinese to visit western Tibet (or Tibet Autonomous Region, TAR), China has identified over 4,000 new tourism development sites in its capital Lhasa. However, there is so far little or no known study of tourism's impact on the territory's people, environment, society, and culture.

This bears relevance as the number of tourists visiting the region, who are overwhelmingly from China, exceeded 15 times the local population of 3.66 million as of last year.

Over 4,000 new tourism development sites have been identified in Lhasa since a survey began last October, reported China's official Xinhua news agency Oct 14, citing the city's culture and tourism bureau.

The report said most of these tourism resources are natural landscapes, which will attract more tourists and bring incomes to local residents.

The report noted that as an ancient city with a history of more than 1,300 years, Lhasa is among the cities in the People's Republic of China that have the most cultural relics and documents. From January to July, the autonomous region received over 42 million domestic and international tourists, up 16.65% year-on-year, the report said.

In 2023, TAR saw a record 55.17 million visitors throughout the year, a massive 83.7% increase compared to the previous years, reported China's state media. The region was stated to have earned a total tourism revenue of CNY 65.1 billion ($9.4 billion), reflecting a 60% increase from 2022. Only around 20,000 of the visitors were reported to be from countries other than China.

This year, by mid-2024, over 20 million tourists had visited TAR, with the vast majority being Chinese nationals, reported China's state media.

China reports more archaeological discoveries in Tibet

13 October 2024, Tibetan Review

Chinese archaeologists have discovered 301 immovable cultural relics, comprising sites of ancient culture, tombs, buildings, grotto temples, inscriptions and historical landmarks, in Shigatse city of Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), reported China's official chinadaily.com.cn Oct 11, citing the state Xinhua News Agency.

China is known to Sinicize even archaeological discoveries in Tibet and areas such as East Turkestan (Xinjiang) by falsely explaining them as belonging to their contemporary Chinese dynasties in post facto justifications of its current rule over these territories. Its false narratives seek to “prove” that Tibet and East Turkestan had been parts of China since ancient times.

The report did not say what exact discoveries had been made, which may entail giving the false explanation. It only said the discovery work was carried out in 18 counties and districts in Shigatse over the past few months as part of the second phase of the fourth national cultural relics census in TAR.

The report cited the cultural and tourism bureau of Shigatse as saying that 1,088 cultural sites had been surveyed in the city thus far, and their related data has been collected.

Phuntsok Darje, deputy director of the cultural relics protection and archaeological research centre at the bureau, has “highlighted the profound significance of the city’s cultural heritage and the diversity of those immovable cultural resources.”

The report said the ongoing cultural relics census in TAR will include a comprehensive review of the 4,277 immovable cultural relics identified and registered during the third census.

The report added that simultaneous efforts were being made to investigate, identify and register immovable cultural relics that weren’t recorded in previous censuses, including those discovered since 2012.

Chinese court rules in favor of Lhasa Public Security Bureau against Gonpo Kyi

08 October 2024, ITC

For more than two years, a Tibetan woman named Gonpo Kyi has been seeking the release of her falsely accused brother, Dorjee Tashi. Last month a Chinese court ruled against her, putting justice for her younger brother even further out of reach.

On September 24, 2024, Lhasa City’s Chengguan District Court dismissed all five counts of Gonpo Kyi’s complaint against the district’s public security bureau. Gonpo Kyi’s lawsuit, filed in March 2024, primarily claimed that the ten-day detention she endured for peacefully advocating for her brother’s release violated her rights.

Gonpo Kyi, also known as Gontey (Ch: Gongde), has been actively seeking justice since June 2022 for her younger brother Dorjee (Duoji Zhaxi), who received a life sentence in 2010 after being framed as a “secessionist” in the wake of the Chinese government’s crackdown on mass Tibetan protests in spring 2008 and is imprisoned in the notorious Drapchi Prison. Before Gonpo Kyi began openly advocating for her brother’s retrial in June 2022, she and other family members had exhausted all remedies to seek justice by appealing to authorities in Beijing for over a decade. With no success through appeals, Gonpo Kyi began to demand justice publicly through sit-ins in front of the Tibet Autonomous Region Higher People’s Court in Lhasa.

Gonpo Kyi stood outside the Tibet Autonomous Region Higher People’s Court in Lhasa on January 31, 2023, holding a sign that read, “Tibet’s higher people’s court perverts the law.”

Gonpo’s complaint

ICT obtained a copy of the Chengguan District Court’s ruling, dated Sept. 24, 2024. It says a case was filed on March 25, 2024, after Gonpo filed a complaint alleging unlawful actions by Chengguan District Public Security Bureau (PSB) by detaining her and violating her right to express herself. Accordingly, the court held a public hearing on June 27, 2024.

In her complaint, Gonpo claimed that the district PSB had broken the law by detaining her, that the monetary penalty on her should be withdrawn, and that a compensation of 4,368 Yuan (436.80 per day for ten days) should be given to her. Gonpo also claimed that her A4 sign and white cloth banner advocacy materials should be returned to her, and all her court expenses should be reimbursed by the district PSB.

Gonpo stated that it is her right to ask for a retrial of her brother’s case and that the A4 sign and white cloth banner—demanding Dorjee Tashi’s lawyers have access to documents and a retrial of Dorjee’s case—are her personal property and the PSB’s confiscation of the materials was illegal.

Unfair verdict

The court, in its 16-page-long verdict, ruled that the PSB’s detention of Gonpo Kyi was in accordance with Chinese law, the PSB’s defense that Gonpo’s activism (in the form of prostration, meditation, pasting flyers, lying down on the street) hindered the work of Tibet Autonomous Region Higher People’s Court is valid, the PSB’s ten-day detention of Gonpo Kyi is lawful, return of confiscated materials (A4 sign and white cloth banner) is not required, and Gonpo’s claim for monetary compensation is dismissed. Overall, the Chengguan District Court dismissed all of plaintiff Gonpo’s allegations and supported the defenses provided by the district public security bureau against her.

The comprehensive dismissal of all of Gonpo's claims underscores the difficulties individuals face when challenging actions of state security organs in the Chinese legal system, particularly in Tibet. The court's support for the public security bureau's actions reveals a low tolerance for public displays of dissent or advocacy, even when conducted peacefully and a wide latitude given to the authorities in suppressing activism.

Gonpo Kyi's advocacy

Since June 2022, Gonpo Kyi has been at the forefront of persistent efforts to seek justice for her brother. Her approach evolved from appeals to authorities in Beijing over a decade to more public forms of protest, including sit-ins in front of the Tibet Autonomous Region Higher People's Court in Lhasa. Gonpo and her family members' public advocacy for Dorjee Tashi reveals a growing frustration with the lack of progress through official channels and a willingness to risk personal consequences to draw attention to her brother's case. During her public advocacy for the past several years, the PSB subjected her to beatings, detentions, forcible removal from protest site and blocking her protest from public view, and threatened multiple times with severe consequences. Gonpo's last activism was on May 28, 2024, during which she held an A4 sign demanding justice to Dorjee Tashi in front of the Higher People's Court of the Tibet Autonomous Region in Lhasa. In another video clip from the same day, she shows bruises on her arm presumably from beatings by the security officers on site.

Gonpo in her most recent video statement after the court's ruling is defiant of the authorities and pledges to persist in seeking justice for her younger brother.

Translation of Gonpo's statement

"I have petitioned the court in Lhasa for a retrial of Dorjee Tashi's case in accordance with the law of the country, but they have refused to do it. The police detained, dragged, and beat me multiple times. I'm currently in ill health due to these beatings. My right to ask for a retrial of my brother is powerless. Until the Lhasa Court addresses my appeal, I will persist."

Gonpo Kyi and her husband, Choekyong, were seen holding a sign that read "Dorjee Tashi is not guilty" in front of Dorjee Tashi's Yak Hotel in Lhasa in early 2023.

Background on Dorjee Tashi

Dorjee Tashi, a prominent former Tibetan businessman, is currently serving a life sentence in Lhasa's Drapchi Prison, a facility notorious for its harsh conditions and alleged human rights violations. The International Campaign for Tibet previously documented the case of Dorjee Tashi and the Chinese authorities use of torture on him during pretrial detention. Dorjee was arrested in the aftermath of widespread protests across Tibet in spring 2008 challenging Chinese rule. He was subsequently arrested on suspicion of providing clandestine support to Tibetan protesters and alleged connections with the Tibetan exile community. The investigation into Dorjee's perceived political loyalties was unusually led directly by China's Ministry of Public Security, which in Dorjee's testimony, and subjected him to torture in an attempt to extract confessions about supposed political affiliations and foreign connections.

Although the initial political accusations against Dorjee were eventually dropped, he was later charged with "loan fraud." The Lhasa Intermediate People's Court sentenced him to life imprisonment and permanent deprivation of political rights in May 2010. In related cases, Dorjee's family members also faced legal consequences. His elder brother, Dorjee Tseten, received a six-year prison sentence, while relatives Dhugkar Tsering and Tsultrim were sentenced to five and two years in prison, respectively.

Investigation of Tibetan officials in historical Dechen reveals rampant corruption in Chinese bureaucracy

02 October 2024, ITC

Several senior officials in Dechen (Ch: Diqing) prefecture in present-day Yunnan Province have been investigated in recent months by China's anti-graft agency, an indication of the high levels of corruption among Chinese officialdom – or, perhaps, of political instability.

The officials under investigation are ethnic Tibetans, one of whom had served as governor while at least three others had served at the level of deputy governor of Dechen Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, the only Tibetan prefecture in Yunnan province. Two of them even headed the United Front Work Department (UFWD) of Dechen and nearby Lijiang, a prefecture-level city. Chinese state media announced that they have undergone investigation "suspected of serious violations of discipline and laws," the standard reasoning cited for all such investigations.

Corruption is endemic in Tibet under Chinese rule. Since the beginning of Xi Jinping's rule, striking against corruption has been one of his signature campaigns. Instead of effectively tackling the endemic socio-political problem, in the absence of real checks and balances or any form of transparency Xi's anti-graft campaign in fact serves the purpose of shoring up legitimacy for the Party and popular support for his indefinite rule.

Since April 2024, investigations have been started or actions taken against the following senior Tibetan officials from Dechen: Kalsang Namgyal (under investigation as of September 22, 2024), the head of the UFWD (as well as former deputy governor) of Dechen; Tashi Dhondup (under investigation as of August 30, 2024), member of the Standing Committee of Dechen and Secretary of the Political and Legal Committee; Feng Yuxiang (under investigation as of June 24, 2024), deputy secretary of the Lijiang City Party Committee and head of UFWD; Jangchup (Jiang Chu) (dismissed on May 19, 2024) executive vice governor of Dechen; and Qi Jianxin (dismissed on April 9, 2024), former governor of Dechen, who was dismissed from his then government position of Counselor in the prefecture after investigations were launched against him by the anti-corruption agency.

Namgyal spent all his professional career in Dechen, where he began working in 1991 in the finance bureau. Feng and Qi are both mentioned as being of Tibetan ethnicity despite using Chinese names; in the Kham and Amdo areas of eastern Tibet some Tibetans have been given Chinese names. Feng comes from Dechen and worked there before being transferred to Lijiang.

Tibetan officials from Dechen Prefecture under anti-graft scrutiny: (From left) Qi Jianxin, Jangchup, Tashi Dhondup, Kalsang Namgyal, and Feng Yuxiang

Historic Dechen

Dechen is in the southern part of Kham and covers an area of 9,189 square miles, making it larger than Israel and approximately the size of the American state of New Hampshire. It is currently divided into three administrative counties: Gyalthang (Xianggelila, formerly Zhongdian), Jol (Dechen), and Balung (Weixi). Until the formation of the prefecture in 1957, when it was renamed as Dechen, Gyalthang was the most well-known place in the region, and was part of the traditional trio of regions known in Tibetan as Baligyal (Bathang and Lithang, which are in current Sichuan, and Gyalthang). It was an important stop in the historical "Ancient Tea Horse Trading Route" for the lucrative tea trade to the Tibetan capital Lhasa and beyond.

At the end of 2022, Dechen's total population was listed as 371,700 with Tibetans being the largest community with a population of 134,800, accounting for 36.26% of the total population, according to Yunnan Government statistics.

Among the present-day Tibetan areas, Dechen is less well known internationally. In an attempt to attract Chinese tourists, on December 17, 2001 the authorities in China renamed the prefecture capital Gyalthang as Shangri-La City (Xianggelila) after the fictional land of Shangri-La in the 1933 James Hilton novel Lost Horizon.

Even though Dechen is at a great distance from Lhasa, it had close political and spiritual connections to Tibet and Tibetan rulers of the past. The fifth Dalai Lama had established Gyalthang's most famous monastery of Gaden Sumtsenling. The 65th Gaden Tripa (1801-1807), head of the Gelug lineage of Tibetan Buddhism, Gedun Tsultrim, was from Gyalthang. Like many other Tibetan Buddhists of Gyalthang, he began his spiritual education first in Gaden Sumtsenling and then went to Lhasa to study at Sera Monastery.

When the Chinese People's Liberation Army started occupying eastern Tibet, including Gyalthang, the people "clearly identified and aligned themselves with the government in Lhasa under the Dalai Lama's administration," according to scholar Dawa Lokyitsang, whose grandfather is from Gyalthang.

In June 2003, envoys of the Dalai Lama, led by special envoy Lodi Gyari, visited Gyalthang as part of the rounds of talks between Tibetan and Chinese officials. In his statement, Gyari said, "We have been impressed by efforts to protect the beautiful environment of Gyalthang as well as the living conditions of some of the families that we visited. However, we emphasized to the officials the importance of maintaining Tibetan religious, cultural and linguistic identity along with the material development. Our visit was too short for us to assess in an adequate manner how effectively the Tibetan language, culture, religion and identity are being preserved, protected and promoted in this Tibetan area."

Among contemporary prominent Tibetans from Dechen include the former head of the Central Tibetan Administration, Samdhong Rinpoche, who was born in Jol. He began his spiritual study in the Gaden Dechenling Monastery in Jol and did his further studies in Drepung Monastery in Lhasa. In fact, there were reports in the media in 2017 that the Dalai Lama had sent him on "a discreet visit to Kunming" which is the capital of Yunnan, in November of that year. Some other reports indicated that he had gone to Gyalthang, too. Within Tibet, Che Dalha (Qi Zhala), the former governor of the Tibet Autonomous Region, was born in Gyalthang and worked in the prefecture before being transferred to Lhasa in 2017.

Of particular interest is the fact that two of the officials being investigated were heading the UFWD. The UFWD is the key authority implementing policies aimed at controlling all aspects of Tibetan life under the People's Republic of China. Therefore, leadership of the UFWD at all levels is chosen through the utmost scrutiny and only the most trust-worthy individuals find a place in the organization. The current governor of Dechen Prefecture, Zhang Weidong, who is said to be a Tibetan, was also head of the UFWD in 2015.

In 2018, significant structural reforms were announced in the role of the UFWD and in 2022, Xi Jinping gave major guidelines during the UFWD conference.

The Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI), that oversees all such investigations against officials, including those in Dechen, is secretive at all levels. Only after charges have been levelled and sentencing finalized will we come to know the reasons for the investigations and dismissals of the Tibetan officials from Dechen.

Tibetan School Falls to China's Legal Pressure

02 October 2024, Khabarhub, Manoj Ghimire

In July, 110 students graduated from Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling School on the Tibetan Plateau in Golog prefecture, Qinghai province. Despite the celebratory occasion, tears marked their faces.

For months, authorities had sought reasons to close the school, exploring various legal avenues. Until this summer, they had been unsuccessful.

Eventually, despite the school's legal victories, the regional administration ordered its closure. Gen Jigme Gyaltzen explained that the school was shut down for not meeting the Qinghai Provincial Party Committee's vague standards for vocational schools.

The gate of closed school adorned with khatags tied by teachers and students/PHoto: tchrd

No further details were provided.

Founded in 1994 in the Golog Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, the Tibetan school gained international acclaim for its rich curriculum in Tibetan cultural and linguistic studies. It attracted youth from Tibet, Mongolia, and Inner Mongolia.

The school emphasized preserving Tibetan language studies, medicine, and Buddhist philosophy, receiving support from Finland and the Netherlands. Its rigorous curriculum included computer science, engineering, medicine, filmmaking, and physical education.

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights has similar terms, though China hasn't ratified it. While children under 18 were not present at Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling, former students face limited options for higher learning in Tibetan. Opportunities to study in Tibetan are dwindling from kindergarten to university.

At the Tibet Policy Institute's July roundtable, Shede Dawa of Tibet Watch highlighted the school's growth and its role in reconnecting students with their heritage, despite the region being referred to as an "open air prison."

The roundtable participants felt the impact of Dawa's upbringing in his sincere advocacy for peers facing academic repression.

Gazing at the scholars and locking eyes with the camera, he emphasized the school's founder's words: preserving the Tibetan language and script is vital for the Tibetan people's survival. Stories, cradled by linguistic exchange, ensure survival.

Dr. Lobsang Yangtso, from the International Tibet Network, admired the courage of alumni like Shede Dawa, who risk retaliation for speaking against the school's closure. "There are many others like him," she noted.

In recent years, human rights monitors have noted the gradual replacement of Tibetan textbooks with Chinese ones.

A 2010 cultural assimilation policy mandates that all schools in Tibet use Chinese as the primary language, starting from kindergarten. Dawa Tsering, director of the Tibet Policy Institute, explained the community's struggles:

"The Chinese government is closing monasteries and Tibetan schools as part of a broader strategy to eradicate Tibetan language and culture."

Tibetan activists argue that private schools are especially targeted in "patriotic education campaigns," making language instruction harder to monitor. Eight of the remaining 16 private Tibetan schools have been ordered to close, while the rest face allegations and administrative pressure.

The legal battle began with scrutiny of a logo used by the Pure Native Language Association, a student group at the school.

In 2018, Tibet Times reported that student leaders were sued for using images of a jewel and snow lion, symbols of refuge and unity. Allegations claimed the logo emulated the Tibetan national flag, banned in Tibet since the 1960s, providing grounds for an investigation.

For exiled Tibetans, the flag symbolizes freedom from oppression. To the Communist Party, it signifies separatism, leading to arrests and torture for possessing its image.

When initial suspicions yielded no results, the Communist Party adopted a new strategy to diminish the school's influence.

According to sources from the Central Tibetan Administration, Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling faced a series of legal challenges.

The Qinghai provincial government conducted a "search and interrogation" to find grounds for penalizing the school for hosting monks or nuns under 18, which is illegal under Chinese law.

If discovered, authorities reportedly forced these students to leave their monasteries and undergo "patriotic education."

Hundreds of Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling graduates have become researchers, government leaders, teachers, and entrepreneurs.

The school has been a source of Tibetan leadership since its inception. Founder Gen Jigme Gyaltzen, who left nomadic life to establish the school, was honored as a "Zhonghua Charity Worker" and received the "National People's Education Award."

Despite facing corruption allegations due to his roles in the Qinghai Tibetan Chamber of Commerce and Tibet Nomadic Management Office, he was cleared of all charges on June 28.

Editor-in-Chief of the Tibet Times, Pema Tso, noted that despite increasing challenges since the 2008 protests, the school community was "relieved" by a provincial court decision allowing its operation to continue.

However, the rule of law was ultimately subverted. On July 14, Gyaltzen announced the school's closure due to non-compliance with Qinghai Provincial Party Committee's vocational school standards, without specifying the violations.

The closure, revealed during the last graduation ceremony, created uncertainty for future scholars and professors. A former student's sister was arrested for allegedly spreading "misinformation" about the shutdown, and her whereabouts remain unknown.

Under international law, China must allow young Tibetans to pursue education in their preferred language. The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC), ratified by China in 1992, states that minority children have the right to use their own language.

When questioned about how states can show support for Tibetan youth deprived of their linguistic heritage, Tempa Gyaltzen Zamlha, Deputy Director of the Tibet Policy Institute, made a straightforward appeal: "Bring attention to the matter."

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights has similar terms, though China hasn't ratified it. While children under 18 were not present at Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling, former students face limited options for higher learning in Tibetan. Opportunities to study in Tibetan are dwindling from kindergarten to university.

Tibet Watch reports that Dzoge County recently ordered 300 young monks at Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery to disrobe and become lay students at government schools. An undisclosed source indicated that Dzoge County authorities plan to close the monastic school this month.

Ironically, while China shuts down Tibetan schools, it claims that the lack of education opportunities necessitates sending Tibetan children to distant boarding schools.

In June, Xi Jinping visited such a school in Qinghai's provincial capital, which included 800 Tibetan students from the same area as Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling.

Lhadon Tethong, founder of Tibet Action Institute, criticized this hypocrisy: "Claiming Tibetan children must live in boarding schools due to remote geography, while closing an acclaimed school in a remote region, exposes China's justification as a lie." On July 29, 100 academics petitioned the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights to pressure China to comply with international education standards.

When questioned about how states can show support for Tibetan youth deprived of their linguistic heritage, Tempa Gyaltzen Zamlha, Deputy Director of the Tibet Policy Institute, made a straightforward appeal: "Bring attention to the matter."

In Tibet, China's plans to hike retirement age sparks concerns

24 September 2024, RFA, Sonam Lhamo and Khando Yangzom

Tibetan government workers fear the move will limit their ability to retire early.

Government workers in Tibet are voicing concern over a plan to raise China's retirement age, saying the measure will force them to work later in life and put off plans to pursue business ventures, according to sources.

China's government announced plans earlier this month to raise the country's retirement age as part of its response to falling births and a rapidly aging population – the first significant reform to China's retirement system since it was established in the 1950s.

China has one of the lowest statutory retirement ages in the world for workers to receive pensions, set at 60 for men, at 55 for women in white-collar jobs and at 50 for female blue-collar workers.

Starting on Jan. 1, the retirement age will be gradually increased over 15 years, raising it to 63, 58, and 55, respectively.

The measure has broad implications for ethnic minorities like Tibetans, who rely on retirement to transition into private business or traditional livelihoods.

"Since this is a policy of the Chinese government, it will be applied in Tibet as well," said a Tibetan official, who like others in this report declined to be named due to fear of reprisal.

"Our options will be limited," he said.

In the Tibetan Autonomous Region, many Tibetan workers aged 50 are waiting to retire early, largely due to dissatisfaction with the extensive political indoctrination they must undergo and restrictions in government offices put in place by Beijing, one of the sources said.

"These conditions have made it increasingly unpleasant for them to continue working, so many no longer wish to go to the office," he said.

'Already a bad situation'

Several Tibetans, including six who work in local government offices in Tibet, told Radio Free Asia that the policy change would likely delay their post-retirement plans, including pursuing personal business ventures and engaging in other activities.

Others complained that it could worsen corruption related to retirement benefits and raise youth unemployment in Tibet.

"There are already rampant attempts to bribe officials to secure an early retirement or a favorable retirement package," said a source familiar with the matter.

"It's already a bad situation, and this may worsen it," he said.

Another Tibetan source noted that many Tibetans have been leaving their jobs in recent years, citing poor health or mental illness due to work-related stress.

"This wave of mass resignations has led to an influx of Chinese officials from other parts of China" who are vying for the positions, he said.

Meanwhile, unemployment is on the rise in Tibet and many Tibetan graduates are already finding it difficult to land jobs, the same source said.

"The increasing presence of Chinese officials in Tibet raises concerns about future prospects for Tibetans, especially the youth seeking employment," he added.

According to the new policy, early retirement will be permitted in special cases, including for those who work in physically demanding jobs or hazardous environments.

Also, employees who have reached the minimum insurance contribution period can retire up to three years early, depending on their situation.

China's Legal Warfare Closes a Beloved Tibetan School

18 September 2024, The Diplomat, Marie Miller

A private vocational school in Qinghai has been forced to close for unspecified violations. Critics see a continuation of Beijing's war on Tibetan language education.

Despite taking part in a momentous rite of passage, tears streaked the faces of the 110 students who graduated from Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling School, located on the Tibetan Plateau in Golog prefecture, Qinghai province, this July. For months, authorities had prodded any and all excuses to find violations, pursuing various legal avenues to shutter the school. Until this summer, they were unsuccessful.

Eventually, despite legal battles that ended in the school's acquittal, regional administration ordered the school's closure. In a speech before his students, Gen Jigme Gyaltsen indicated the school was closing because it was not in compliance with the Qinghai Provincial Party Committee's vague standards of vocational schools. Additional details were not disclosed. The 110 students that graduated in July will be the last the institution ever accredits.

The internationally acclaimed Tibetan school was first founded in 1994 inside the Golog Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture. Since then, its rich curriculum in Tibetan cultural and linguistic studies has drawn youth from across Tibet, Mongolia, and Inner Mongolia. The school's emphasis on the preservation of specialized Tibetan language studies, medicine, and Buddhist philosophy has garnered both private and public extraterritorial support, such as from Finland and the Netherlands. The school's rigorous curriculum was supplemented with computer science, engineering, medicine, filmmaking, and physical education.

During his testimony at the Tibet Policy Institute's July roundtable on the closure, Shede Dawa of Tibet Watch, a research network based in the United Kingdom, gestured to a projected image of Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling, tucked into shaded mountain foothills and rich with pine saplings. He noted the lengths these trees had grown since his years as a student there, where he was encouraged by his instructors to celebrate the arduous process of reconnecting with his own heritage in a region some scholars refer to as an "open air prison."

The room of roundtable participants felt the reverberations this upbringing has had in the careful sincerity of Dawa, a steady advocate for peers facing systematic academic repression. He gazed out over the scholars in front of him, locking eyes with the camera lens before insisting, in the words of the school's founder, that the preservation of the Tibetan language and script is a crucial means for the survival of the Tibetan people. People survive through stories, which are in turn cradled by linguistic exchange.

Dr. Lobsang Yangtso, program and Environment Desk coordinator for the International Tibet Network, expressed her admiration for the courage of alumni like Shede Dawa, who might now face retaliation for speaking up against the school's closure. "There are many others like him," she said.

In recent years, human rights monitoring networks have observed the gradual swapping out of Tibetan textbooks for those in the Chinese language. A cultural assimilation policy, which was formulated in 2010, deems that all schools in Tibet must legally use Chinese as the primary language, beginning at the kindergarten level.

Dawa Tsering, director of the Tibet Policy Institute and longtime policymaker with the Tibetan government-in-exile, contextualized the school community's ordeals: "Presently, the Chinese government is closing monasteries and Tibetan schools... These measures are part of a broader strategy to eradicate the Tibetan language and culture."

Tibetan activists claim, in fact, that private schools are particularly targeted in "patriotic education campaigns," as it is more challenging for the prefecture to monitor language instruction. Eight of the remaining 16 private Tibetan schools have been ordered to close by regional administrators, while those remaining are peppered by allegations and administrative pressure.

The legal warfare started small: scrutinization of a logo used by the Pure Native Language Association, a student organization that found its home in student leaders attending the school. In 2018, as reported by Dharamshala-based Tibet Times, these student leaders were sued and taken to court for using the images of a jewel and snow lion – would-be symbols of refuge, of a unified spiritual and secular life.

Allegations that the logo was meant to emulate emblems in the Tibetan national flag, which has been illegal in Tibet since the 1960s, offered fabricated evidence for an inquisition into the school. For the Tibetan community-in-exile, the flag represents a very simple notion: freedom from oppression, freedom of choice. To the Communist Party, the Tibetan flag is a sign of separatism – Tibetans have faced arrest and even torture in prison for simply keeping the flag's image on their mobile phones.

When the suspicions proved inconclusive, the Communist Party sought a different approach to scale back the institution's influence. The Central Tibetan Administration's sources noted the series of legal aggressions faced by Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling. The provincial government of Qinghai conducted a "search and interrogation" to determine whether they had grounds to punish the school for hosting monks or nuns under the age of 18, which is banned under Chinese law. If found out, multiple sources report authorities forcing these students to leave their monasteries and receive a "patriotic education."

Hundreds of graduates of Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling have gone on to work as researchers, government leaders, teachers, and entrepreneurs. The school, since its inception, has been a fount for Tibetan leadership – one that has now been tapped. In addition to the leaders the school has brought up, founder Gen Jigme Gyaltsen, himself having left nomadic life to found Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling, has received the title of "Zhonghua Charity Worker" at the National People's Political Consultative Conference. He was awarded by the state, a named recipient of the "National People's Education Award," and yet could not avoid the fire of corruption allegations on the pretext of his joint role as chairman of the Qinghai Tibetan Chamber of Commerce and Tibet Nomadic Management Office. On June 28, Gyaltsen published an article attesting that court proceedings had cleared him of all legal charges formally brought against him.

Editor-in-Chief of the Tibet Times Pema Tso observed that though the school had faced increasing challenges to its operation since the protests erupted across Tibet in 2008, the school's community had been "relieved" by a provincial court decision that allowed its operation to continue.

In spite of years spent patiently responding to the inquisition, the rule of law was nonetheless subverted in the state's final spear. The notice came on July 14. In an official announcement, Gyaltsen indicated the school was closing because it was not in compliance with the Qinghai Provincial Party Committee's standards of vocational schools. He provided no details on what provisions, exactly, the school had violated.

Its forced closure, announced to the community during its last graduation ceremony, generated uncertainty for the fate of future scholars. Access to the campus remains restricted, and the professors who had for so many years volunteered their time also face an uncertain future.

At least one Tibetan individual, the sister of a former student at the school, has been arrested by the Nagchu County police for allegedly disseminating "misinformation" regarding the school's shutdown. Her whereabouts have since remained unknown.

Under international law, China is obligated to permit young Tibetans to pursue education in their preferred language. The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC), which China ratified in 1992, states that "a child belonging to a ... minority ... shall not be denied the right ... to use his or her own language." The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights contains similar terms, although China has not expressly ratified its terms.

While children are generally considered to be people under 18, of which there were none at Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling, the former students face increasingly sparse options to engage in higher learning in their native tongue. The whittling of opportunities to engage in the Tibetan language extends from kindergarten to the university level.

Tibet Watch documents that the Dzoge County government recently ordered the disrobing of 300 young monks studying at the Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery – requiring the group to become lay students at government-run schools. An undisclosed source of Tibet Watch reported that Dzongse County authorities expect to close the monastic school this month.

Ironically, China has been shutting down Tibetan schools while claiming that a lack of education opportunities necessitates sending Tibetan children to study at faraway boarding schools. Xi Jinping himself visited such a boarding school in Qinghai's provincial capital in June. The school Xi visited included "800 Tibetan students from the same area of Golog" where Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling was located.

Lhadon Tethong, founder and director of Tibet Action Institute, expressed his sentiments on this political hypocrisy: "Claiming that Tibetan children must live in boarding schools due to Tibet's remote geography, while simultaneously closing down an acclaimed school serving children in one of the most remote regions, exposes China's primary justification for its coercive boarding system in Tibet as a lie."

The Tibetan community-in-exile is heeding the supplication of colleagues in the Tibetan Autonomous Region. On July 29, 100 academics – whose names are redacted in the published version for their safety – submitted an official petition to the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, urging that the high-level office increase pressure on the Chinese government to comply with international education standards outlined in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

When asked how Tibetans would like to see states express their solidarity for Tibetan youth being barred from their own linguistic roots, Tibet Policy Institute Deputy Director Tempa Gyaltsen Zamlha expressed a simple yet clear request: "Raise the issue."

China orders harsh crackdown on Tibetans ahead of 75th PRC anniversary

16 September 2024, Tibetan Review

Ahead of the country's national day on Oct 1, China's security chief has issued a call for tightening security in the Tibetan territories under Chinese rule during a four-day inspection tour last week.

Maintaining stability and guarding against independence activities are the top priorities for security personnel in Tibetan areas, the scmp.com Sep 16 cited Chen Wenqing, head of the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission (CPLC), the ruling Communist Party's top security body, as saying.

The CPCL acts as the overseer and coordinator of all legal enforcement authorities, including the Ministries of State Security, Public Security and Justice, as well as the Supreme People's Court and Supreme People's Procuratorate. Chen has said the security forces must "resolutely crack down on separatist and destructive activities".

He has said the security authorities must also "resolutely manage religious affairs, while resolutely protecting normal religious activities", so as to "prevent risks, crack down on crimes, and maintain stability."

Chen has made these remarks during his trip that included stops in the Tibet autonomous region (TAR) as well as the Ganzi (Tibetan: Kardze) Tibetan autonomous prefecture in Sichuan province.

The four-day tour, which ended on Sep 13, was stated to be Chen's first regional inspection trip since the party's policymaking third plenum in July, coming in the lead-up to China's National Day on Oct 1.

This year China will mark the day as the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China (PRC) and security is being tightened in the sensitive Tibetan territories which include Tibet Autonomous Region, Qinghai province, and areas that now constitute parts of Gansu, Sichuan, and Yunnan provinces.

During his trip, Chen was stated to have visited security units in the Tibetan cities of Lhasa and Chamdo, getting updates on operations in the region, the report said, citing China's official Xinhua news agency.

In Ganzi, he was stated to have presided over a meeting on "anti-secession work", and to have given instructions on maintaining stability.

With nearly 80 % of the prefecture's 1.1 million residents being Tibetan, Ganzi is stated to be the second-largest such community in the PRC, after the TAR.

Chen has also ordered security personnel to carry out more propaganda and education campaigns to increase awareness of national identity among the people of all ethnic groups.

The report said Chen had cast the Tibetan security net wider in recent years to include more surrounding regions with large Tibetan populations.

It noted that China's top judges and prosecutors had also made their rounds of TAR.

Zhang Jun, the president of the Supreme People's Court, had visited Tibetan courts last week and said that it was necessary to hand down tough punishment to keep up the pressure on "violent terrorism, ethnic separatism and other serious criminal crimes", the report noted.

Also, Ying Yong, head of the Supreme People's Procuratorate, had inspected public prosecutors' offices in TAR earlier this month.

He too was stated to have stressed the need for prosecutors to "harshly crack down on all kinds of separatist infiltration, sabotage activities and crimes endangering national security in accordance with the law".

China deems as separatist not only people who call for or campaign for Tibet's independence but also virtually anyone who criticize its policy towards the Tibetan people, as shown by its record of their imprisonments.

China's security chief convenes "anti-secession" meeting in Tibet

16 September 2024, ICT

China's top security official, Chen Wenqing, visited Tibet from September 10 to 13, 2024 during which he convened a meeting on "anti-secession and stability maintenance," indicating ongoing instability in Tibet and foreshadowing a possible increase in surveillance and restrictions.

China's top security official, Chen Wenqing, meeting security personnel in Lhasa, Tibet.

Chen, who is a member of Chinese Communist Party's powerful 24-member Politburo and Secretary of the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission (CPLA), went to Lhasa, Chamdo (Chinese: Changdu) and Kandze (Ganzi), according to Chinese state media.

"In Kandze, Sichuan, Chen Wenqing presided over a meeting on anti-secession and stability maintenance in Tibet," state media reported, mentioning that the discussions covered not just the officially designated Tibet Autonomous Region, but also the Tibetan areas in Sichuan, Yunnan, Gansu, and Qinghai.

"Leniency and severity"

Political activism among Tibetan Buddhists appears to have been a major focus during the trip. In the meeting in Kandze, state media quoted Chen as saying, "We must resolutely crack down on separatist and sabotage activities in accordance with the law, resolutely manage religious affairs in accordance with the law, resolutely protect normal religious activities in accordance with the law, always adhere to the combination of leniency and severity, always adhere to the combination of punishment and prevention, and use the rule of law thinking and the rule of law to prevent risks, combat crime, and maintain stability."

Chen further "stressed that the political and legal organs must fully implement the important instructions of General Secretary Xi Jinping on Tibet work and the Party's strategy for governing Tibet in the new era, continue to make maintaining stability the top priority, adhere to the overall coordination of the two major domestic and international situations and the two major issues of development and security, do a good job in anti-secession work, and effectively safeguard national security.”

Chen Wenqing visiting a police station of the Kandze County Public Security Bureau

Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission

The significance of this meeting is tied to the organization that Chen heads, the CPLA. According to political scientist Minxin Pei, CPLA “oversees the vast coercive apparatus of the party-state. Its main responsibilities include providing policy proposals on domestic security, supervising implementation of the party’s domestic security agenda, coordinating the actions of law enforcement and the judiciary, and ensuring the political loyalty of officials in law enforcement agencies.”

The CPLA’s importance can also be seen in its membership, which includes Wang Xiaohong, minister of public security; Zhang Jun, president of the Supreme People’s Court; and Ying Yong, procurator-general of the Supreme People’s Procuratorate.

Interestingly, both Zhang (Sept. 11 and 12) and Ying (Sept. 3 and 4) also visited Tibet around the time of Chen’s visit, highlighting the issue of security. Zhang told Chinese courts in Tibet that it is necessary to hand down tough punishment to keep up the pressure on “violent terrorism, ethnic separatism and other serious criminal crimes.”

Ying also stressed the need for prosecutors to “harshly crack down on all kinds of separatist infiltration, sabotage activities and crimes endangering national security in accordance with the law.”

In Lhasa and Chamdo, two other Tibetan towns he visited in addition to Kandze, Chen “inspected political and legal units and the frontline of duty to learn about maintaining security and stability, promoting the rule of law, and listened to reports on political and legal work in Tibet.”

Chen’s record

Chen, who is a former minister of State Security, is considered close to Xi Jinping and is part of a new team of national security leaders that was brought in after the 20th Party Congress in October 2022. He has assumed key role in advancing Xi’s security policies, making inspection trips to Tibet, Xinjiang (known to Uyghurs as East Turkestan). Chen has publicly supported the implementation of the Hong Kong National Security Law. In January 2024, Chen conveyed Xi’s message to a central conference on judicial, procuratorial and public security work urging for “efforts to resolutely safeguard national security, improve political acumen and political discernment, prevent and resolve major security risks.”

In August 2023, Chen convened a similar meeting on Tibet in Kanlho (Gannan) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Gansu Province. At the Kanlho meeting, Chen underscored the need for a comprehensive implementation of the party’s strategy for governing Tibet in the new era. He called for a forward-looking approach in work deployment, a concentrated focus on key tasks, diligent execution of work responsibilities, proactive risk prevention and control measures, and a firm commitment to sustaining long-term peace and stability in Tibet.”

At that time, Li Mingjiang, associate professor at the S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies at Nanyang Technological University in Singapore, told the Lianhe Zaobao newspaper that Chen’s visits (to Kanlho and before that to Xinjiang) were “a sign of [China’s] vigilance against new US policy trends regarding religion, education and other aspects of China’s ethnic minority regions, and they are worried that this may affect national unity and harmony.”

Reaction to the Resolve Tibet Act?

Chen’s visit to Tibet this time and the meeting on anti-secession could very well be connected to the latest law, popularly known as Resolve Tibet Act, passed in support of Tibet in the United States.

On July 12, 2024, the U.S. signed into law the “Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Disputes Act.” In its reaction the next day, China’s Foreign Ministry spokesperson mischaracterized the law as sending “a severely wrong signal to the ‘Tibet independence forces’” despite the law explicitly stating that the dispute between Tibet and China must be resolved peacefully through dialogue without preconditions, in accordance with international law.

China escalated its external propaganda efforts regarding Tibet, attempting to frame the law internationally as U.S. interference in “China’s internal affairs”. This stance directly contradicts the U.S. policy outlined in the law, which calls on China to “cease its propagation of disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, and Tibetan institutions, including that of the Dalai Lama”.

The law affirms Tibet’s unresolved status under international law and recognizes the Tibetan people’s right to self-determination; a universal collective human right provided for in both the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

Tibetan streamer faces censorship and detention by Chinese authorities

14 September 2024, Phayul, Tseing Dhundup

On 7 September, Gang Lhaja released his final video to date in Tibetan, expressing his frustration and disappointment regarding the situation (Screengrab/TCHRD)

A Tibetan language content creator and live-streamer Tashi Nyima, a.k.a Gang Lhaja, who was censored for his content, has reportedly been detained by local Chinese authorities.

On August 28, Gang Lhaja announced in a video posted on the Chinese social media platform KuaiShou that his live-streaming activities had been abruptly suspended following orders from local police. The restrictions primarily affected his series "Outdoor Livestream on The Plateau," which had gained significant popularity among Tibetan communities.

According to the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD), Gang Lhaja was arbitrarily detained from September 1 to 3 and reportedly beaten while in custody. On September 7, he released a video expressing his frustration and disappointment with the situation.

Gang Lhaja, who has over 75,000 followers on KuaiShou, is known for his efforts to promote the Tibetan language and culture through online games, quizzes, and educational activities. His content often draws from the "Chinese-Tibetan-English Dictionary of New Daily Vocabulary" by Khenpo Tsultrim Lodoe, a disciple of the renowned Nyingmapa master Khenchen Jigme Phuntsok.

Khenchen played a crucial role in reviving Tibetan Buddhism, culture and language in Tibet following China's Cultural Revolution, during which Mao Zedong attempted to eradicate remnants of traditional Tibetan culture. Under his guidance, numerous private Tibetan language schools were founded, including Sengdruk Taktse.

Before the police intervention, Gang Lhaja had planned an extensive tour across several regions of Tibet to promote the use of new Tibetan vocabulary. This tour has now been effectively cancelled due to the restrictions imposed on him. His censorship is part of a wider pattern of repression against Tibetan language and culture in China. Recent years have seen increased restrictions on Tibetan activists, scholars, and cultural figures. Private Tibetan language schools have been shut down, and Chinese has been imposed as the primary language of instruction in many areas.

Live-streaming industry in China and Chinese-occupied countries like Tibet is subject to strict controls from regulators such as the Cyberspace Administration of China (CAC) and the Ministry of Public Security. Vague regulations prohibiting content that "undermines social stability" or is "harmful to ethnic and territorial unity" have led to increased censorship.

China Launches Massive International Propaganda Effort on Tibet

13 September 2024, Bitter Winter, Lopsang Gurung

The ambitious "Xizang [Tibet] International Communication Center" started its work this month.

Wang Junzheng, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) Secretary of the so-called Tibet Autonomous Region, announced earlier this month that a "Xizang [the Chinese name for Tibet] International Communication Center" has been established.

This is not the first "International Communication Center" created by the CCP. The policy started in 2018 and is becoming a key feature of Beijing's international propaganda, part of which is now subcontracted to regional or provincial organizations.

On September 2, a conference on "Building a More Effective International Communication System Related to Tibet" was held in Lhasa in connection with the opening ceremony of the Xizang International Communication Center.

Secretary Wang explained that the aim of the Center is to reestablish "Chinese hegemony" in the international discourse over Tibet. He said that unfortunately so far "the main media and platforms for international information dissemination about Xizang [Tibet] are basically in the hands of the United States and the West."

In the West, Wang explained, "communication is subject to various restrictions, which objectively makes it difficult for us to fully assert our right to speak. The richness of China-promoted development of Xizang [Tibet] is sometimes not conveyed; and it is sometimes difficult for us to effectively refute the dirty water thrown on China."

Zhang Taofu, dean of the School of Journalism and Communication at Fudan University, said that, "In the powerful Western discourse system about Xizang [Tibet], China is only allowed to respond passively and is often in the passive position of being demonized and stigmatized."

The launching conference of the Xizang [Tibet] International Communication Center, Lhasa, September 2. From Weibo.

These claims are somewhat paradoxical. The CCP, which systematically suffocates any voice of dissent in Tibet, claims that there are “restrictions” about how Tibetan news are reported in the West. The new Center is generously supported and funded by the central CCP Propaganda Department and is expected in a few years to “seize the power in the international discourse about Xizang [Tibet],” Secretary Wang said.

August

Cataract incidences in ‘Tibet’ 60% higher than in rest of PRC amid lack of medical facilities

31 August 2024, Tibetan Review

At 14.6%, the incidence of cataracts is 60% higher in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) vis-à-vis the rest of the People’s Republic of China (PRC) due to high latitude, long-term exposure to harmful ultraviolet rays, and a lack of medical facilities, reported shine.cn, the website of the official Shanghai Daily newspaper, Aug 30.

Citing a team of local Shanghai eye experts who conduct a medical aid programme in TAR, providing free diagnosis and treatment there, the report said the disease is also the leading cause of blindness in the region.

The report also said eye diseases are more common in TAR than elsewhere in the PRC.

A team of 14 medical professionals from Guangzheng Eye Hospital Group travelled to Shigatse city in southern TAR to provide free screening and eye surgery to special school students, Tibet-aiding volunteers, and residents, the report said.

It was stated to be the seventh time the hospital had organized doctors’ trips to TAR to provide medical care to the locals.

Dr Feng Fei, vice president of Shanghai Xinshijie Zhongxing Eye Hospital, which collaborated with the ZEISS company and the Shanghai Chenguang Charity Foundation on this mission, has said that overall eye health was a matter of concern among people living on the Tibetan Plateau and needed more social support and awareness.

The experts were stated to have screened teachers and children at Shigatse Special School. Ten children with vision disorders needed further examinations and assessments. Follow-up assistance will be provided to these children so that they can receive medical care in Shanghai or Chengdu, the group has said.

Dr Feng has also said: “During this mission, we performed 20 complex eye surgeries. The majority of patients were elderly and needed cataract or fundus surgery. They were unable to undergo early treatment for a variety of reasons and had to live with eye problems for a long time, which had a significant impact on their lives and jobs.”

China’s top political advisor calls for ‘integration among all ethnic groups’ in Tibet

30 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Giving a fillip to President Xi Jinping’s Sinicization of ethnic minority regions drive, China’s top official on ethnic affairs has on Aug 27 called for the promotion of exchanges and “integration among all ethnic groups” and the strengthening of the “sense of identity with the motherland” while addressing a conference in Tibet’s capital Lhasa.

It is in this context that Wang Huning, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and Chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference, has urged efforts to deliver solid paired-up assistance for Xizang Autonomous Region toward the goal of building a modern socialist new Xizang, using the Chinese name for Tibet.

“Efforts should be made to promote exchanges and integration among all ethnic groups, improve people’s livelihoods, rally people’s support, and strengthen the sense of identity with the motherland, the Chinese nation, the Chinese culture, the CPC, and socialism with Chinese characteristics among officials and people of all ethnic groups," China's official Xinhua news agency Aug 29 quoted Wang as saying.

Addressing the fourth work conference on paired-up assistance for Xizang, and marking the programme's 30th anniversary, Wang has hailed "the notable achievements in the paired-up assistance work for Xizang over the past three decades," and "urged efforts to promote targeted, systematic and long-term assistance for the region, and elevate the comprehensive benefits yielded by the assistance work."

"Targeted, systematic and long-term assistance" obviously refers to reinforcing Beijing current renewed campaign and goal for the Sinicization of Tibet with regard to its ethnic, linguistic, and cultural identity.

For this purpose, Wang has emphasized, "It is imperative to improve the work regarding officials and talent dispatched to assist Xizang and strengthen the organization and leadership of the paired-up assistance work."

The conference was also stated to have awarded honorary titles to exemplary individuals who had participated in the paired-up assistance for Xizang, which totalled nearly 12,000 over the period of 1994 and 2022, dispatched in 10 batches at three-yearly intervals. The programme was stated to have involved the participation of 17 provinces and municipalities as well as dozens of ministries and state-owned enterprises of China, "bringing substantial investment, practical technology and essential talent to Xizang," said another Xinhua report Aug 28.

Xi demands all-out efforts to carry out reform tasks

29 August 2024, The State Council

Chinese President Xi Jinping on Thursday demanded all-out efforts to ensure the implementation of the country's reform tasks.

Xi, also general secretary of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the Central Military Commission, made the remarks while presiding over the sixth meeting of the Central Commission for Deepening Overall Reform, which he heads.

Noting that the further comprehensive deepening of reform enjoys a solid foundation and favorable conditions, Xi urged making good use of the existing reform achievements and experience.

"We must free our minds, seek truth from facts, move with the times, and take a realistic and pragmatic approach," Xi said.

The meeting was attended by Li Qiang, Wang Huning and Cai Qi, all members of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and deputy directors of the Central Commission for Deepening Overall Reform.

The meeting reviewed and adopted a plan for central Party and state departments to implement major reform measures set in a key resolution adopted last month at the third plenum of the 20th CPC Central Committee, and a guideline on upgrading pilot free trade zones.

The resolution put forward more than 300 reform measures spanning sectors such as the economy, culture and ecology, as the Party aims to further deepen reform comprehensively to advance Chinese modernization.

Thursday's meeting underscored the importance of upholding the CPC Central Committee's centralized, unified leadership over reform, and ensuring the proper order, pace and timing of reforms.

Efforts must be made to accelerate the implementation of landmark reform measures, enhance the consistency of reform policy orientation, and actively assess the impact of reform on economic and social development, according to the meeting.

It stressed enhancing investigation and research on major reform tasks, formulating implementation plans and strengthening the supervision, inspection and evaluation of work related to reform.

Highlighting the milestone and pioneering institutional innovations introduced by the country's 22 pilot free trade zones since the 18th CPC National Congress held in 2012, the meeting urged pursuing high-standard opening up and focusing on institutional innovations. It encouraged carrying out pilot reforms and conducting groundbreaking, integrated explorations in this regard.

The meeting also stressed fine-tuning policy mechanisms to facilitate trade, investment, capital flows, transportation and travel, as well as the secure and orderly flow of data.

Efforts are required to ensure both development and security and improve risk prevention and control capabilities, according to the meeting.

3 ways China is ratcheting up surveillance of Tibetans

17 August 2024, RFA

Authorities are hiring food delivery workers as auxiliary police to monitor Tibetans.

Since early August, Chinese authorities have dramatically boosted surveillance of Tibetans in the Tibetan capital of Lhasa by putting more police on the streets, cracking down on social media users and – in a new wrinkle – hiring food delivery workers to serve as auxiliary police officers, sources inside Tibet say.

The increased monitoring activities coincided with the start of a major annual festival, the Shoton Festival, on Aug. 4. Also known as a yogurt festival, it is observed when monks complete their annual religious retreats and involves the unveiling of a 500-square-meter thanka painting, performances of Tibetan opera and huge picnics.

"The government has been taking various measures to tighten its vigilance in response to sensitive situations in Tibet, but this August, it has suddenly taken even more drastic measures," said one source from inside Tibet.

Authorities are calling it a "summer public security crackdown and rectification operation," the sources said.

The precise reasons behind the stricter measures – which continue – are not known, but Beijing has steadily tightened surveillance in Tibet over many years. One source said the measures were to ensure stability for the government's commercial activities to stimulate economic growth.

That may be true on the surface, but comments from a senior security official point to a deeper motive. Zhang Hongbo, vice chairman of the Tibet Autonomous Region and director of the Public Security Department told state media that security forces would focus on national unity and fight separatism or secession.

Tibet was once an independent country, but Chinese forces invaded in 1950 and have controlled the territory ever since. The Dalai Lama fled into exile in India amid a failed 1959 uprising against Chinese rule. Since then, Beijing has sought to legitimize Chinese rule through the suppression of dissent and policies undermining Tibetan culture and language.

Authorities are hyper-sensitive to any hints of protest against Chinese rule or resistance to those efforts.

Here are three ways that authorities are boosting surveillance in Lhasa:

One: Greater police presence on the streets.

This includes plainclothes officers, and an increase in the number of traffic and police inspection points.

Lhasa's Public Security Bureau deployed more than 1,200 police officers, set up 65 inspection and traffic checkpoints and conducted inspections of more than 2,000 venues and 24,000 vehicles, according to a Chinese state media report on Aug. 5.

Two: Authorities have deployed civilians – mostly food delivery drivers – as auxiliary police officers.

Lhasa authorities launched a pilot program hiring delivery drivers from food delivery company Meituan to perform "voluntary patrol and prevention work," Chinese state media reported on Aug. 8 – although sources say the workers are essentially forced to do the work.

They are helping police to keep an eye on ordinary residents, including serving at night watchmen in certain areas.

The measure suggests China is using Tibet as a testing ground for its surveillance tactics because they are similar to civilian-police integration efforts China employs in border areas, said Sriparna Pathak, associate professor of China studies at the O.P. Jindal Global University in Haryana, India.

China has set up civilian-police integrated units in sensitive border areas of the Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region and the Tibet Autonomous Region, both in the far western part of the country. The units comprise civilians, policemen, militiamen and government officials working with People's Liberation Army soldiers to ensure security.

"China's efforts to rope in delivery riders for surveillance is in line with the effort to further consolidate its grip in Tibet," said Kalpit Mankikar, an expert at the New Delhi-based think tank Observer Research Foundation.

Hiring Meituan delivery workers for surveillance also signals a link between the Chinese government and private enterprises, showing how the government drafts companies to fulfill certain national objectives, Mankikar said.

Three: Crackdown on social media use among Tibetans.

In the past, Tibetans could sign up for social media with only a phone number.

But at the end of July, the government announced that social media users had to re-open their accounts and provide personal details, the sources said.

Re-registering involves providing a password connected to one's personal cell phone or identity card that is accessible to the government, one of the Tibetans said.

"If you do not have proper social media account registration, you will receive a summons from the government to re-register, and your phone will be examined," one of the sources said.

Authorities also began stopping individual Tibetans in Lhasa to check for use of virtual private networks, or VPNs, that allow users to get around China's internet restrictions, often dubbed "China's Great Firewall," two sources from inside Tibet said.

In early August, authorities in Lhasa arrested three people for using a VPN but released them with an administrative punishment, the Municipal Public Security Bureau said on its website.

The government said the latest measure was meant to protect personal data information, properly manage internet society and prevent telecommunication network fraud.

Lhasa police said Tuesday that it was inspecting the entire internet network and city streets for two days and nights to ensure public safety and security.

This comes on top of authorities' strict monitoring of Tibetans' use of social media, including Douyin, China's version of TikTok.

Authorities have banned Tibetans from using the Tibetan language on social media sites – part of an effort to undermine their language and assimilate into Chinese culture.

China has impoverished Tibetan villagers by force-relocating them as 'border guardians'

14 August 2024, Tibetan Review

China has moved thousands of people to new settlements on its frontiers, including in Tibet near the borders with India, Nepal and Bhutan, and elsewhere, calling them "border guardians." But their economic viability is highly questionable with the residents being dependent mostly on government subsidies and welfare, while some get paid a bit for border security-related jobs, according to a nytimes.com report Aug 10.

China's leader, Xi Jinping, calls such people "border guardians" and the villagers are essentially sentries on the country's front line. And the villages set up along Tibet's border give China's sovereignty a new, undeniable permanence along boundaries contested by India, Bhutan and Nepal, the report noted.

The build-up is seen as the clearest sign that Mr Xi is using civilian settlements to quietly solidify China's control in far-flung frontiers, just as he has with fishing militias and islands in the disputed South China Sea. The report has worked with the artificial intelligence company RAIC Labs, which scanned satellite images of China's entire land border captured by Planet Labs, to arrive at its findings.

Mapping through use of satellite images and comparing them with historical records reveals that China has put at least one village near every accessible Himalayan pass that borders India, as well as on most of the passes bordering Bhutan and Nepal, the report said, citing Matthew Akester, an independent researcher on Tibet, and Robert Barnett, a professor from SOAS University of London. Both have studied Tibet's border villages for years.

While the outposts are civilian in nature, they also provide China's military with roads, access to the internet and power, should it want to move troops quickly to the border. Villagers serve as eyes and ears in remote areas, discouraging intruders or runaways, the report noted.

The build-up of settlements has fuelled anxiety in the region about Beijing's ambitions. The threat of conflict is ever present: Deadly clashes have broken out along the border between troops from India and China since 2020, and tens of thousands of soldiers from both sides remain on a war footing, the report noted.

China has moved thousands of people to new settlements on its frontiers, including in Tibet near the borders with India, Nepal and Bhutan, and elsewhere, calling them "border guardians."

Of the new villages the report has identified in Tibet, one is stated to be on land claimed by India, though within China's de facto border, and 11 other settlements are in areas contested by Bhutan. Some of those 11 villages are stated to be near the Doklam region, the site of a prolonged standoff between troops from India and China in 2017 over Chinese attempts to extend a road.

A local government document reviewed by the report was stated to indicate that some villagers may be receiving around 20,000 Chinese yuan a year for relocation, less than $3,000. Besides, one resident reached by phone has said he earned an extra $250 a month by patrolling the border.

Still, it remains unclear whether the villages make economic sense. The residents become dependent on the subsidies because there are few other ways to make a living, Mr Akester, the independent expert, has said. Over the years, the government has pushed many nomadic Tibetans to sell their yaks and sheep, leave the grasslands and move into houses, but often without clear ways for them to survive. Instead of herding, residents have to work for wages, the report noted.

"The major problem is they are moving them from one lifestyle to another," Barnett has said. "They end up with no capital, no usable skills, no sellable skills and no cultural familiarity."

Residents were thus seen to have been forced to relocate, to be reduced to living in poverty. A documentary aired by the state broadcaster, CCTV, showed how a Chinese official went to Dokha, a village in Tibet, to persuade residents to move to a new village called Duolonggang, 10 miles from Arunachal Pradesh.

He encountered some resistance. Tenzin, a lay Buddhist practitioner, insisted that Dokha's land was fertile, producing oranges and other fruit. "We can feed ourselves without government subsidies," he has said.

The official criticized Tenzin for "using his age and religious status to obstruct relocation," the report said, citing a state media article cited by Human Rights Watch in a report.

In the end, all 143 residents of Dokha moved to the new settlement, the report added.

Brahma Chellaney, a strategic affairs analyst based in New Delhi, has said that in quietly building militarized villages in disputed borderlands, China is replicating on land an expansionist approach that it has used successfully in the South China Sea.

"What stands out is the speed and stealth with which China is redrawing facts on the ground, with little regard for the geopolitical fallout," Chellaney has said. "China has been planting settlers in whole new stretches of the Himalayan frontier with India and making them its first line of defence."

Also, the villages serve as propaganda: a display of Chinese strength and superiority in the region, Jing Qian, co-founder of the Center for China Analysis at the Asia Society, has said.

The relocation policy is also a form of social engineering, designed to assimilate minority groups like the Tibetans into the mainstream. Images from the villages suggest that religious life is largely absent. Buddhist monasteries and temples are seemingly nowhere to be found. Instead, national flags and portraits of Mr. Xi are everywhere, on light poles, living room walls and balcony railings, the report noted.

China's efforts to boost Tibet's economy benefit Han population, report says

06 August 2024, RFA, Lobsang and Tenzin Pema

But Tibetans believe the resulting economic marginalization could increase tensions in the region.

A road marker displays the 4,000-kilometer milestone along National Highway 318 which travels through western China's Tibet Autonomous Region, Oct. 15, 2011.

A Chinese government measure to boost the economy and improve the business environment of the Tibet Autonomous Region will benefit the large and growing Han population there, while Tibetans face increased economic marginalization, according to a new think-tank report.

Chinese officials have doubled down on expanding existing economic and technology development zones, or ETDZs, in Tibet, says a July 26 report by the Jamestown Foundation, a Washington think tank.

The zones are in keeping with the government's focus on urbanization, cross-border trade and a strategy to shift the Tibetan economy away from traditional sectors, such as agriculture and herding, and into export-oriented industries.

As such, the zones focus on urban centers such as Lhasa, Lhokha, Shigatse, Nyingtri and Chamdo – cities with large and growing Han Chinese populations. This means the Han will reap the economic spoils from the zones, while Tibetans are excluded, possibly straining relations between the two ethnic groups even more, the report says.

"Heavy subsidization, Han control of the Tibetan economy (except for in the agriculture and livestock sectors), and the marginalization of ethnic Tibetans could cause problems for both the local economy's prospects and are likely to deepen social tensions," Devendra Kumar, associate fellow at the Centre of Excellence for Himalayan Studies at the Shiv Nadar Institution of Eminence in Delhi, India, wrote in the report.

"The government's more recent initiatives could simply exacerbate the problems, particularly as the new parks and zones are focused on pockets of the rising Han population," Kumar added.

The report came around the time that the Chinese government announced that the Tibet Autonomous Region recorded economic growth of 6.1 percent during the first half of 2024, compared to over 8% during the same period in 2023.

Tibetans say Beijing's measures to spur the autonomous region's economy, such as the tech zones, have left them out in the cold because of ongoing economic marginalization.

Assimilationist policies

Tibetans have long been shut out of government and construction jobs, dominated by Han migrants. They are also hurt by Beijing's assimilationist policies that disadvantages them when competing for urban employment opportunities.

Government restrictions on Tibetans banning them from travel inside and outside the region and onerous requirements for travel and business permits limit business opportunities, said several Tibetans from inside Tibet, including three businessmen.

"Major business opportunities are given to Chinese individuals, and Tibetans are only occasionally assigned minor and small businesses," one of the businessmen said.

Han Chinese accounted for more than 12% of the population of 3.7 million people in the Tibet Autonomous Region, according to China's 2020 census data.

But the Han constitute a majority or a near majority in certain urban centers. They make up about 39% of the population in Chagyib district of Nyingtri, a prefecture-level city known as Nyingchi in Chinese.

About 57% percent of the population in Gar county in Ngari prefecture, according to 2019 figures from China's National Bureau of Statistics.

In June, Wang Junzheng, party secretary for the Tibet Autonomous Region, reportedly instructed officials at the Lhasa economic-technological development zone to support Tibetan products to be traded globally.

But with China's ongoing border tensions with India and trade limited to Nepal, experts said this would be far from easy.

And traveling for business to neighboring Nepal, a pro-China nation, is difficult, Tibetans said.

"In reality, traveling from Lhasa is very difficult for Tibetans," said a Tibetan businessman from Lhasa. "If Tibetans were allowed to freely export and do business, it would be beneficial."

'Labor work if they are lucky'

Instead, Tibetan businessmen serve as mere middlemen, buying from local Tibetans and then selling to Han Chinese businessmen in Tibet who export these products, the same businessman said.

For the past 15 years, the Chinese government has been trying to reset Tibet's economy, which has until now been driven largely by massive subsidies from the central government, Kumar said.

But the subsidies and large investment opportunities, which Chinese officials say are meant to improve the livelihoods of Tibetans, are mostly doled out to Han Chinese who live in Tibet, another Tibetan businessman from Lhasa told Radio Free Asia on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisal.

"If a business opportunity or plan involving a 100,000- yuan [US$14,000] investment is in place, a Tibetan will never receive that investment," he said. "It will be given to Chinese individuals, and local Tibetans may only get employed for labor work if they are lucky."

In the meantime, it will take a while before the establishment of the ETDZs as an economic strategy bears fruit, Kumar wrote in the Jamestown Foundation report.

"ETDZs are designed in part to support exports, but the TAR's external trade is currently limited to Nepal," he said.

For the past 16 years, the Chinese government has focused on developing tourism, mining and construction industries in the Tibet Autonomous Region, "but their potential to help shift to indigenous growth remains limited," Kumar said.

This is why provincial officials have embarked on initiatives that replicate the growth model of inland provinces, he said.

While tourism in Tibet might bring some temporary income to Tibetans, the cost of economic development far outweighs any minor benefit they receive, Lhade Namlo, an Australia-based researcher on Tibet and China, told RFA.

The likely negative impact of industrial development and mining activities on the environment and the long-term dangers posed to neighboring Southeast Asian nations, including India, cannot be ignored, he added.

China's ethnic policy chief says minority artists must focus on common national identity

05 August 2024, SCMP, Xinlu Liang

Pan Yue criticises one unnamed Tibetan-language film for not giving the Communist Party enough credit.

China's top ethnic policy official has criticised "self-centred" artworks about ethnic minorities and said that they should focus on the common national identity.

As an example, he criticised an unspecified Tibetan-language movie for only focusing on the spiritual world while not giving Communist Party credit for building the region's infrastructure.

Pan Yue, director of the National Ethnic Affairs Commission, made the remarks last month in a speech at a meeting of the Junma (or Steed) Ethnic Minority Literary Awards.

The speech was published on Friday at China Minzu News, an official outlet focused on Beijing's ethnic policies.

Pan, who is ethnically Han, said he had observed a "disconcerting trend" in recent years where ethnic minority artworks were swayed by "Western multicultural theories".

He said: "This is evident in narrative models that isolate individual social groups for development, in constructing a closed historical lineage for a single ethnic group, in the binary oppositions of urban versus rural, modern versus traditional, and centre versus periphery, as well as in cutting off the close connection with the historic progress of the entire country, and generate self-centred and exaggerated expressions." Pan criticised one film about a pilgrimage by Tibetan herders that illustrates how religious faith shapes their material and spiritual world.

"Did they not know that it is the Communist Party of China that has constructed the pilgrimage paths, repaired the Potala Palace and thousands of temples, as well as compiled the Tibetan Buddhist canon?" Pan said.

He did not name the film in question, but the content matches that of Zhang Yang's 2015 movie Paths of the Soul.

Although the director is ethnically Han, it is the highest grossing Tibetan-language movie ever released in China. It follows a group of Tibetan pilgrims on a monumental 2,000km (1,200-mile) journey to Mount Kailash, a sacred site in Tibetan Buddhism.

Pan also said: "The No 1 criterion for evaluating ethnic literature works is whether they contribute to strengthening the sense of community for the Chinese nation."

He also set out specific instructions on works related to different ethnic groups.

When writing about Tibet, it was acceptable to highlight its uniqueness, Pan said, but cautioned against portraying Tibet as an isolated "Himalayan cultural circle" adding that Tibetans had always "looked eastward".

Since 2014, policy towards ethnic minorities has been shaped around President Xi Jinping's slogan of the "community of the Chinese nation", which emphasises the wholeness of the nation rather than ethnic differences.

Beijing has been accused of widespread human rights abuses in regions such as Tibet and Xinjiang, but it says its policies there are designed to combat terrorism, separatism and extremism.

Pan said divisive narratives promoted by the West had introduced erroneous historical perspectives, creating false opposition and misrepresenting various ethnic groups and regions.

These included the deliberate creation of oppositions such as "Han versus non-Han", "nomadic versus agricultural", and "inner Asia versus China", he said. He criticised claims that groups such as the Manchus, Mongolians, Tibetans and Hui were not part of the Chinese nation, and criticised the portrayal of the southwestern provinces of Yunnan, Guizhou and Guangxi as "historically unclaimed lands" that "rebel against the country".

"It is vital to avoid narratives that stray too far from historical facts and the idea of unity," Pan said. "Importantly, it should be acknowledged that all ethnic minorities are co-creators of Chinese civilisation."

"Historical evidence shows that cultures fostering a sense of shared identity are well-maintained and developed, while those that undermine this unity tend to fade away over time."

Pan also said Western critics were twisting China's narrative of national unity into a notion of "ethnic assimilation".

He said efforts to modernise and improve areas inhabited by minorities had been mischaracterised as "resource exploitation", while attempts to preserve and safeguard folk culture were portrayed as "cultural eradication".

"If we fail to take action and develop alternative narratives, the true story of the Chinese nation may be forever overshadowed by these falsehoods," he said. He called on filmmakers and authors within minority communities to craft compelling stories that resonated with both personal histories and the collective national narrative promoted by the Communist Party.

Chinese Social media platform bans Tibetan language, Tibetans condemn decision

04 August 2024, The Economic Times

The Tibetans living in Tibet and other parts of the world have expressed their concerns as the Chinese social media platform Douyin banned all content in the Tibetan language. The Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) based in Dharamshala has strongly condemned this decision. Speaking to ANI, TCHRD Director, Tenzin Dawa, said that Douyin company's decision to ban content in the Tibetan language has made it impossible for Tibetan netizens who use these platforms to create content and make a living from these platforms.

Tenzin Dawa said, "Recently we came across several videos of Tibetan netizens inside Tibet expressing strong discontent over the recent ban by Chinese company Douyin in China. So, Douyin company has resorted to banning, removing and censoring all content that speaks in the Tibetan language and that relates to Tibetan culture in general because of the recent ban a lot of Tibetan netizens who use these platforms to create content, share their lifestyles or run businesses and make a living from these platforms are now completely made impossible to continue what they have been doing so far on this platform." She said that the Chinese constitution allows minority people to speak in their language and questioned the restrictions imposed against the language. Tenzin Dawa said, "The Chinese constitution guarantees the minority people to speak in their language but why it's suddenly restricted? Do they have an issue with us being Tibetan? We are even willing to pay the company some amount but want to continue in creating content in Tibetan language on its platform."

"So, these were some of the concerns that were being expressed through some videos that were shared among the Tibetan community. So, they are also saying if the company and the Chinese authorities don't allow Tibetans to speak in their language then they will collectively pool money and sue the company itself because the constitution itself guarantees Tibetan people speak their language and the actions that the company has carried out is illegal," she added. Douyin is not the only platform in Chinese cyberspace that has imposed a ban on the Tibetan language. Several other platforms like Bilibili or Talkmate where people can learn different languages have even banned the Tibetan language for quite some years. During the past couple of years, several other companies have made it difficult for Tibetans to share videos to showcase the Tibetan language, culture and traditions.

Tenzin Dawa said, "It's not happening with online platforms only but it's something that the Chinese government has been systematically doing especially under the guidance of Xi Jinping since he came to power with his aim to assimilate the restrictions on the Tibetan language as well as to completely eradicate Tibetan language and culture so it shows both offline Tibetans are being forced to speak Chinese." She further said, "Private Tibetan institutions are closed down and then online where people want to speak in their language are being censored so it clearly shows that there is a shrinking space for Tibetans inside Tibet."

Tibet is only provincial-region where road building is fully funded by Beijing

01 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) is the only provincial-level region in the People's Republic of China where road construction is fully funded by the central government, underlying Beijing's top priority in ensuring political stability and border security there. Given this reality, China's central government invested 325.1 billion yuan (about 45.6 billion US dollars) in road construction in TAR from 1953 to 2023, according to China's official Xinhua news agency Jul 31, citing the regional government's information office.

The total length of roads open to traffic in TAR currently stands at 123,300 km, with paved roads accessing 666 townships and 4,596 administrative villages, the report cited the information office as saying at a press conference.

TAR is the only provincial-level region in the PRC where road construction is fully funded by the central government, the report said.

"Over the past 10 years, Xizang has implemented 5,805 projects for rural road construction and built or renovated 58,700 km of rural roads," the report added, referring to the region by its pinyin name so as to give it a Chinese identity.

The report cited an official from the regional transportation department as saying the TAR will continue to promote the construction of the expressway network and accelerate the connectivity of all cities and key land ports.

July

Tibetan parents forced to enroll children at state-run residential schools

23 July 2024, RFA

Authorities shut down the monastery school they were attending in May.

Chinese authorities are requiring the parents of students who attend a Buddhist school in a Tibetan area of western China to enroll their children in state-administered residential schools, Tibetans with knowledge of the situation said.

Earlier this month, Radio Free Asia learned that Chinese authorities had closed down the Buddhist school of Lhamo Kirti Monastery in Dzoge county, Sichuan province, affecting about 600 students. Another school at Kirti Monastery in Ngaba county was also shut down, affecting 1,000 students.

Authorities said students at both schools had not attained the age at which they could receive monastic education — now set at 18 — though children as young as 5 or 6 years old previously were allowed to enroll in monastery schools, sources told RFA in the earlier report.

Now, more than 300 students, ages 6 to 14, at the Lhamo Kirti Monastery school must enroll in what critics of Chinese policies in Tibet call "colonial-style" boarding schools, where young Tibetans are separated from their families and taught a Chinese-language curriculum that promotes loyalty to the Chinese Communist Party, the sources said.

Efforts are being made to allow another 200 students, ages 15 to 18, to remain at and attend the Buddhist school, one of the sources said.

Tibetans and rights activists say dozens of such school closures in recent years are part of the Chinese government's systematic efforts to assimilate Tibetans by wiping out their culture, language and religion.

"Parents are currently required to send their children to state-administered residential schools and sign written agreements not to enroll them in any other schools or monasteries until they reach adulthood," said a Tibetan from Lhasa who declined to be identified so he could speak freely.

"This move was made under the guise of enforcing the compulsory education system established by the Chinese government," he said.

Tibetan as medium of instruction

Parents of Children at the Lhamo Kirti Monastery school must sign a document — a copy of which was obtained by RFA — confirming that their children are enrolled in a state-run boarding school in accordance with Article 16 of China's Law on the Protection of Minors.

That article states that parents who work in other places and can't perform their guardianship duty with respect to minors shall entrust other adults who have the ability to act as guardians with such duty.

The document sent to parents also specifies that once they receive the notice, they must prepare their children to attend a residential school beginning in September.

Though Tibetans have argued that sending their children to Buddhist schools does not violate Chinese law, government authorities have accused them of brainwashing the children with the curriculum taught in the Buddhist schools, sources said.

Unlike state-run boarding schools, Buddhist schools teach Tibetan literature, English and Buddhist philosophy as subjects using the Tibetan language as the medium of instruction.

Founded in 1986, the school at Lhamo Kirti Monastery – known among locals as Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery – initially offered three classes held in the monastery's hall and monks' residences.

In 1993, a separate school called Taktsang Lhamo Tibetan Culture school was established, but it faced interference from the Chinese government when officials ramped up restrictions on the study of the Tibetan language and Buddhist philosophy, ultimately leading to its closure.

The monastery's primary school later reopened and served novice monks under the age of 18 and children from nearby nomadic areas.

China Brings Official From Tibet to Lead Banker Crackdown

23 July 2024, BNN

China relocated an official from Tibet to lead its crackdown on the financial sector, indicating no let-up in its unprecedented efforts to clean up the industry.

Wang Weidong was named chief of the Central Financial Discipline Inspection and Supervision Work Committee, according to an article published Monday by the top graft buster's official newspaper. It marks the first reference to the special committee, which was newly set up within the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection, Caixin reported on Tuesday.

Wang pledged to strengthen political supervision and party building within the financial system as well "promptly discover deviations" and "vigorously implement rectification," according to the article.

Wang resigned in March from a supervisory post in Tibet. Prior to that, he held various roles at the National Government Offices Administration as well as the CCDI.

China has tightened its grip on the $66 trillion finance industry, labeling bankers as "hedonistic" and emphasizing the Communist Party's "centralized and unified leadership" of the sector. An anti-graft drive that was unleashed in 2021 has shocked the industry, bringing down more than 100 financial officials and executives last year alone.

The new financial corruption work committee suggests more permanent oversight of the industry. It follows an overhaul of China's financial regulatory regime last year that saw the creation of an enlarged regulator as well as two financial bodies that oversee the sector's development, ideology and discipline.

Authorities also pledged to improve its supervision mechanism for the financial sector at the Third Plenum last week, a twice-a-decade gathering where the top leaders map out long-term plans for the world's second largest economy. It will also formulate a financial law to strengthen regulatory responsibilities and accountability.

China shuts down 30-year-old Tibetan school in Amdo Golog

15 July 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Chinese authorities forcibly closed the renowned Ragya Gangjong Sherig Norbuling school in Golog Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Amdo (Ch. Qinghai) Province, according to multiple sources. The private institution, founded in 1994 by Ragya Jigme Gyalsten, was shut down ending a 30 year old Tibetan educational institution.

A video released on Saturday by the Dharamshala-based Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) showed the emotional closing ceremony of the school where students can be seen mourning and in tears during the closing ceremony held on Sunday morning.

According to a report by Tibet Times, a Tibetan-language media house based in Dharamshala, Chinese authorities concealed the true reasons for the closure of the school. They claimed that the search and interrogation were conducted to identify any monks or nuns under the age of 18, threatening severe punishment and fines if any were found.

On April 12, the school faced multiple lawsuits and pressures from the Communist Party Secretary of Golok and other officials who had been conspiring to close the school for many years. Additionally, a student association formed in 2018, dedicated to preserving the Tibetan language was sued for using the jewel and lion emblems from the banned Tibetan National Flag as their group's logo.

Screengrab of the closing ceremony of the Ragya Gangjong Sherab Norbuling school in Amdo Golog. The school's founder, Jigme Gyaltsen, faced false allegations of corruption and accepting bribes in his roles as chairman of the Snow Land Pastoral Association and the Qinghai-Tibet Trade Association. These charges were brought to trial, and on June 28, Jigme Gyaltsen was found not guilty of any crime. Observers say that the incident is part of a broader crackdown on Tibetan language and cultural education where Tibetan language is the medium of instruction. The closure of Ragya Gangjong Sherig Norbuling school follows a series of similar actions in recent years. In 2022, Chinese authorities in the so called Sershul County, Kardze (Ch. Ganzi) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, mandated the closure of all Tibetan private schools. According to information obtained by the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD), the authorities ordered that students be enrolled in government schools, where the medium of instruction is Mandarin, by April 20, 2022.

Tibetans express anguish over China's ban of Tibetan language on Douyin

09 July 2024, Phayul

Screengrab of Tibetans on social media criticising Chinese government's ban on Tibetan language and posts on Douyin

Tibetans in Tibet have voiced concerns and anguish over the Chinese government's decision to ban the Tibetan language and remove Tibetan language posts on Douyin, China's version of the popular social media platform TikTok. This decision has sparked widespread outrage among Tibetans, highlighting the ongoing struggle for cultural and linguistic freedoms online.

In a widely circulated video on X (formerly Twitter), a Tibetan netizen vehemently expressed discontentment over the deliberate ban and removal of Tibetan language posts on Douyin. "I question whether Douyin holds more power and authority than the nation and the legal system. Is Douyin more powerful than the state? What is the reality here? To clarify, the state's policies explicitly grant protection for cultural preservation and language promotion, a mandate supported by both the legal system and the government," he stated.

In another video, a Tibetan woman is seen lamenting the removal of Tibetan language posts on TikTok in China. "I am a native Tibetan speaker and cannot speak perfect Chinese. Why am I not allowed to post in my native language?" she questioned.

In another widely circulated recent video, a Tibetan man can be seen criticising China's ban on the use of the Tibetan language in live broadcasts. "An anchor confirmed the ban after speaking a few words of Tibetan and getting banned. Despite China's Constitution protecting national languages, TikTok discriminates against the Tibetan language," he remarked.

The ban on the Tibetan language in Douyin is part of a wider pattern of suppression and delegitimisation of the native language in Tibet. Over the years, the Chinese government has implemented various policies aimed at diminishing Tibetan cultural practices, including restrictions on religious freedom, language and instead the promotion of Mandarin over Tibetan in schools. This latest move is seen as an extension of these policies into the digital realm.

The Dharamshala-based rights group, Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD), has condemned this move, calling it "a flagrant violation of provisions enshrined in Chinese constitution as well as Regional Ethnic Autonomy Law, which promised but rarely granted meaningful autonomous powers to ethnic minorities including Tibetans,"

China clamps down on social media ahead of Dalai Lama's birthday

02 July 2024, RFA, Pelbar

Beijing sees the Tibetan Buddhist spiritual leader as a 'splittist.'

The Chinese government is intensifying already stringent social media restrictions on Tibetans to keep them from celebrating the July 6 birthday of the Dalai Lama, two Tibetan sources said.

Authorities already ban the possession of photos of the Tibetan Buddhist leader, who turns 89, and posting images of him or religious symbols on social media.

But during the past three weeks, authorities have more frequently and rigorously checked the cell phones of Tibetan travelers to ensure they have not downloaded any photos, said the sources who live inside the western region of China and who requested anonymity for safety reasons.

Police also have summoned individuals deemed suspicious to local offices to warn them not to contact family members living outside the Tibet Autonomous Region, they said.

Every year, authorities intensify their monitoring of Tibetans in the run-up to the birthday of the Dalai Lama, who has lived in exile in northern India since 1959 and is viewed by China as a “splittist” seeking independence for Tibet.

The Dalai Lama has maintained that he does not advocate independence but rather genuine autonomy to allow Tibetans to maintain their culture, religion and language under China’s rule, which has sought to Sinicize Tibetan-populated areas.

Knee surgery in US

This year, authorities are extra vigilant because Tibetans concerned about the Dalai Lama’s health following his recent knee replacement surgery in the United States may have downloaded his photo to their phones to pray for a speedy recovery, the sources said.

Chinese authorities turned down visa requests by some Tibetans who planned to travel to the U.S., after asking them if they were going to see the Dalai Lama there, sources in Tibet said.

Authorities have prohibited Tibetans inside the Tibet Autonomous Region and in Tibetan-populated areas of China’s western provinces from communicating with the outside world about the Dalai Lama’s birthday, the first source said.

The second Tibetan said whenever he travels from Lhasa to Shigatse, the region’s second-largest city, authorities now closely monitor his mobile phone.

“I am questioned about whether I possess a photo of the Dalai Lama or if I have been in contact with anyone,” he said.

In Golog Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in southeastern Qinghai province, Chinese officials and monastery heads have ramped up propaganda efforts, urging Tibetans to exercise caution and self-control on social media.

Despite the government’s strict measures, Tibetans in Tibet continue to celebrate the Dalai Lama’s birthday each year by posting poems and childhood photos of their spiritual leader.

Many also make traditional smoke offerings in the mountains and observe moments of silence.

June

TIBETAN MONK DETAINED AFTER WECHAT POST

28 June 2024, Free Tibet

A Tibetan monk was arrested a month ago in Chigdril County, Golok Prefecture, after criticising Chinese law on the social media platform WeChat.

According to a source, the 26-year-old monk, whose name has been kept confidential for security reasons, was arbitrarily detained on 26 or 27 May allegedly on charges of separatism. His location still remains unknown and his family was denied visits. The social media post for which he was arrested was a comment on WeChat against a county-level law, although it still is not clear which specific law he expressed criticism against.

The same source further stated that following his arrest, the Chigdril County Executive and the Head of the United Front Work Department visited his monastery and carried out a 10-day political education campaign for his estimated 100 fellow resident monks.

The monks, who were criticised by the visiting officials, were later notified by the Monastery Management Committee that they must refrain from posting any comments or likes on social media, or from sharing any information – in writing and voice message – that may go against the party-state and its political view of unity of nationalities. Their families and neighbours were also ordered to share this notification through social media.

The authorities are known to be currently carrying out more restrictions and investigations in the monastery with door-to-door visits to interrogate everyone.

Tibetan political prisoner hospitalized following severe illness

28 June 2024, RFA, Pelbar

Thupten Lodoe’s jailing was part of a larger crackdown on Tibetan writers and intellectuals.

A Tibetan writer and advocate for the preservation of the Tibetan language who is serving a nearly 4.5-year jail sentence for engaging in separatist acts and social disorder, is being treated at a hospital for a serious illness, two Tibetan sources said.

Thupten Lodoe, also known by his pen name Sabuche, is in his 30s and hails from Seshul county, called Shiqu in Chinese, part of the Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Sichuan province.

He was arrested in October 2021 and detained for six months before being sentenced to four years and five months in prison in June 2022 for writing articles deemed a threat to national security and unity.

Lodoe has been detained in a prison in Dartsedo, or Kangding in Chinese, where he has endured harsh conditions, including hard labor, inadequate food and poor living conditions, said the sources who requested anonymity for safety reasons.

Authorities said Lodoe is receiving medical treatment, but they did not disclose his illness or the hospital's location, the sources said.

Lodoe's arrest was part of a larger crackdown on Tibetan writers, intellectuals and cultural figures arbitrarily imprisoned in undisclosed locations, usually for long periods and with no disclosure of their whereabouts. Most were arrested after sharing their views or information about conditions in ethnic Tibetan areas under Chinese government rule.

Following his sentencing, his family was harassed by Chinese authorities, and his two children were barred from attending school.

Fluent in Tibetan, Chinese and English, Lodoe studied at a school established by the Panchen Lama, whose Buddhist spiritual authority is second only to that of the Dalai Lama, in Sichuan province.

Despite a job offer from the Chinese government, he chose to work independently as an author, writing extensively about the Tibetan language — which Beijing has sought to repress along with Tibetan religion and culture — and translating the American national anthem and poems by an ancient Persian poet into Tibetan.

Chinese police previously warned him to stop writing such articles, but he kept doing so, a friend of Lodoe told Radio Free Asia in an earlier report.

China Using 'Discriminatory Surveillance Technologies' To Target Muslim Minorities, Tibetans: US Report

26 June 2024, News18

The report, titled "2024 Trafficking in Persons Report: China," released on Tuesday, has assigned China a Tier 3 ranking, the lowest rating, citing extensive evidence of forced labor and other human rights abuses

The US State Department has released a report on human trafficking, raising serious concerns about China's treatment of ethnic and religious minorities.

The report, titled "2024 Trafficking in Persons Report: China," released on Tuesday, has assigned China a Tier 3 ranking, the lowest rating, citing extensive evidence of forced labor and other human rights abuses.

"The Government of the People's Republic of China (PRC) does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so; therefore the PRC remained on Tier 3," the report stated.

The report further highlights a systematic government policy of widespread forced labor, particularly targeting Uyghurs, ethnic Kazakhs, ethnic Kyrgyz, and other minority groups in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region (Xinjiang).

DETENTION UNDER 'VOCATIONAL TRAINING AND DERADICALIZATION'

These individuals are often detained under the pretext of 'vocational training' and 'deradicalization', the report stated.

"PRC authorities reportedly surveilled, harassed, threatened, attempted to discredit, and sought the extradition of Uyghurs, ethnic Kazakhs, and other forced-labor survivors seeking asylum abroad in retaliation for their contact with foreign media outlets," it stated.

Additionally, the report mentions that NGOs estimate that one in every 26 Uyghur and other ethnic minority individuals in Xinjiang is imprisoned under the Ministry of Justice's jurisdiction. This demographic makes up 33.7 percent of China's total formal prison population.

The US State Department's report underscores that the People's Republic of China's (PRC) "pervasive, state-sponsored labor trafficking" makes it less likely for the government to identify members of these minority groups as "trafficking victims."

OVER MILLION SUBJECTED TO MASS DETENTION AND POLITICAL INDOCTRINATION

The report also highlighted that since 2017, over one million Uyghurs, ethnic Kazakhs, ethnic Kyrgyz, and other minority groups have been subjected to mass detention and political indoctrination.

"The government continued to transfer thousands of detainees into forced labor in dozens of other provinces, according to NGO estimates and media reports," it added.

Citing PRC government documents, the US State Department report stated that local governments in China have at times arrested Muslims arbitrarily or based on spurious criminal charges and administrative violations, including violations of birth restrictions.

"The Ministry of Foreign Affairs continued to confiscate, cancel, or refuse to renew the PRC passports of Uyghurs and individuals from other mostly Muslim ethnic minority groups living abroad, including those with legal permanent resident status or citizenship in other countries, as a coercive measure to lure them back to Xinjiang and likely detain them within the camps," it added.

USING DISCRIMINATORY SURVEILLANCE TECHNOLOGIES

Furthermore, the report points out the use of discriminatory surveillance technologies, such as facial recognition and DNA sequencing, to monitor and detain predominantly Muslim Turkic minorities in Xinjiang. Similar technologies are reportedly used to collect DNA from ethnic Tibetans across Tibet.

According to the report, following their detention, many individuals are subjected to forced labor in factories producing a variety of goods, including garments, automotive components, footwear, and electronics, for both domestic consumption and international export.

"Despite phasing out of the internment camp system, forced labor in these industries likely continues under the auspices of former detainees who were transferred out of detention into forced labor at existing manufacturing facilities, and in the ongoing labor transfer program. Coercive conditions reportedly included threats of physical violence, confiscation of travel and identity documents, forcible drug intake, physical and sexual abuse, and torture, among others," it added.

China reiterates conditions for talks it does not want to hold with the Dalai Lama

21 June 2024, Tibetan Review

In response to a meeting he had with a bipartisan delegation of US lawmakers at his home in Dharamshala, India, on Jun 19, China has reiterated its conditions for holding talks with the Dalai Lama, Tibet's exile spiritual leader. The delegation had called on China to resume talks with the exile Tibetan leadership as sought in a Resolve Tibet Act bill that now awaits President Joe Biden's signature for becoming law.

Responding to the bill and the Dharamshala events, the Chinese foreign ministry has said Jun 20 that the Dalai Lama must "thoroughly correct" his political views as a condition for contact with what it called China's central government to resume.

"With regard to contact and negotiations between the central government of China and the 14th Dalai Lama, our policy has been consistent and clear," Reuters Jun 20 quoted Lin Jian, a spokesman at China's foreign ministry, as saying.

"The key is that the 14th Dalai Lama must fundamentally reflect on and thoroughly correct his political views," Lin has said at a regular ministry news conference.

Also, responding to the US bill, Lin has said, "We urge the United States to fully recognise the importance and sensitivity of Tibet-related issues and earnestly respect China's core interests," Lin has said.

"We should abide by our commitment on the issue of obstacles, refrain from any form of contact with the Dalai clique, and stop sending wrong messages to the outside world."

A ten-year-long series of talks between envoys of the Dalai Lama and the Chinese government ended on a bitter note in late 2010, with the latter accusing the former of seeking independence with their demand for genuine or meaningful autonomy in exchange for accepting China's sovereignty over the Tibetan homeland. China also made it clear that the only talks they will hold with the Dalai Lama would be concerned with the conditions for his "return" to China, including his personal status under Chinese rule. For that, it requires him to "admit" that Tibet was part of China since ancient times and to give up all his activities in support of the Tibetan people.

But the Dalai Lama's position remains that the only talks he can hold with China would be over the well-being of the Tibetan people as a whole; that Tibet was historically an independent country but would be willing to accept genuine autonomy under Chinese rule through a negotiated settlement, and that there is nothing to discuss as far as his own well-being is concerned.

China says Dalai Lama must 'thoroughly correct' his political views

20 June 2024, Reuters

The Chinese foreign ministry said on Thursday that exiled spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism the Dalai Lama must "thoroughly correct" his political views as a condition for contact with China's central government to resume.

Formal talks between China and the Dalai Lama, who fled to India in 1959 after a failed Tibetan uprising against Chinese rule, and his representatives have been stalled since 2010.

"With regard to contact and negotiations between the central government of China and the 14th Dalai Lama, our policy has been consistent and clear," said Lin Jian, a spokesman at China's foreign ministry.

"The key is that the 14th Dalai Lama must fundamentally reflect on and thoroughly correct his political views," Lin said at a regular ministry news conference. The Dalai Lama stepped down in 2011 as the political leader of the Tibetan government-in-exile, which Beijing does not recognise and views as a violation of China's constitution.

Yet China continues to chafe at any interaction he has with officials of other countries, including former U.S. presidents, even though the Dalai Lama says he is not seeking independence for Tibet.

The 88-year-old, whom China sees as a dangerous separatist in a monk's robes, remains the spiritual leader of the Tibetan people.

U.S. lawmakers are currently asking President Joe Biden to sign a bill aimed at pressing China to secure a negotiated and peaceful agreement on Tibet.

A group of U.S. lawmakers, who met the Dalai Lama in India on Wednesday, said they would not allow China to influence the choice of his successor. While Washington recognises Tibet as a part of China, the bill appears to question that position, analysts say. Beijing has rejected the Resolve Tibet Act, saying Tibet is part of China and brooks no interference from external forces.

"We urge the United States to fully recognise the importance and sensitivity of Tibet-related issues and earnestly respect China's core interests," Lin said.

"We should abide by our commitment on the issue of obstacles, refrain from any form of contact with the Dalai clique, and stop sending wrong messages to the outside world."

President Xi inspects Tibet Sinicization drive in Qinghai province

20 June 2024, Tibetan Review

Assimilating Tibet through Sinicization of education and religion and ensuring proper settlement of Chinese immigrants while also talking about ecological conservation appear to have been the main foci of Chinese President Xi Jinping's two-day inspection tour of Qinghai province, the bulk of the traditional eastern Tibetan province of Amdo (or Domey), which ended on Jun 19.

Xi, the general secretary of the Communist Party of China Central Committee, visited a middle school for Golok Tibetans and a Tibetan Buddhist temple, both in Xining, the provincial capital, reported China's official Xinhua news agency Jun 19 and the scmp.com Jun 20.

The Xinhua report said Xi learned about the efforts being made by the Tibetan Buddhist circle in carrying forward the fine traditions of loving the country and the religion, and in promoting ethnic unity and progress. The Tibetan Buddhist Hongjue Temple (Tsongkha Monastery) inspected by Xi has been key to Beijing's communication with a Tibetan Buddhist leader since it affirmed sovereignty over Tibet in 1951, said the scmp.com report. Chinese Princess Wencheng was stated to have stayed at the original site of the temple for one month when she entered Tibet as a bride of Tibet's King Songten Gampo in the seventh century AD.

Although Hongjue Temple was not the biggest Tibetan Buddhist temple in the city, it was the site of one of the most significant meetings between Communist Party's leadership and a Tibetan Buddhist leader in 1951 (Dec 15), the report quoted Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at the National Institute of Strategic Studies at Tsinghua University, as saying.

Xi Jinping's father Xi Zhongxun, then the Communist Party's deputy secretary of the Northwest Bureau and vice-chairman of the Northwest Military and Political Committee, was appointed by Mao Zedong to arrange the 10th Panchen Lama's return to Shigatse in Tibet, the report said, citing the Communist Party's archive.

"That was one of the most significant meetings that forged the friendship between Xi Zhongxun and the Panchen Lama that lasted for more than four decades," Xie has said.

The Xinhua report said Xi, who is also the chairman of the Central Military Commission, also learned about local efforts in advancing the education work through collaboration between the eastern and western regions and paired assistance, and in strengthening education on "forging a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation."

Focusing on Sinicizing the ethnic minority regions, especially in education by stressing mandarin Chinese learning and use and in religion, has been Xi's approach for homogenizing and strengthening the national unity of what constitutes the People's Republic of China.

Ethnic unity, a euphemism for encouraging the settlement of Chinese immigrants so as to Sinicize the demography of the Tibetan regions, has been a focus of Chinese government policy since the early days of the occupation rule.

President Xi sent a signal for ethnic unity as a plenary session of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China – to unveil economic and social development strategies for the coming decade – was set to convene next month, said the scmp.com report.

Xi also stressed continued efforts to advance the ecological conservation of the Tibetan Plateau and called on the province to promote high-quality development, said a Xinhua report Jun 20.

He met provincial party and government representatives on Jun 19 and stressed the province's "great mission" to preserve ecological security, said the scmp.com report, citing Xinhua.

Qinghai province shares the Tibetan Plateau with the Tibet autonomous region and is rich in petroleum, natural gas, and lithium, besides yielding numerous other minerals such especially as gold for China.

Former top Tibet official under probe for corruption

17 June 2024, RFA, Pelbar

Tibetans take to social media to welcome the move in a rare expression of public opinion.

Wu Yingjie, Communist Party secretary of the Tibetan Autonomous Region, attends a group discussion session held on the sidelines of the annual meeting of China's National People's Congress in the Tibet Hall of the Great Hall of the People in Beijing, March 6, 2019.

The Chinese Communist Party's former top boss in Tibet is being investigated for "severe violations of discipline and law," according to a statement from China's anti-corruption body, using a euphemism commonly used to describe corruption.

Wu Yingjie, former party secretary of the Tibetan Autonomous Region, is one of several top officials recently dismissed from the Chinese Communist Party amid a crackdown on officials past and present who have engaged in graft.

The move was praised by Tibetans on Chinese social media in a rare display of public opinion about such measures in China.

"It is very good that this man has been arrested," said one person. "This is good news for Tibetans," said another.

"This enemy of the Tibetans has been captured and it will eliminate harm from the Tibetan people," said a third.

In 2022, the U.S. Treasury Department imposed sanctions on Wu, 67, for his policies in Tibet that "involved serious human rights abuse, including extrajudicial killings, physical abuse, arbitrary arrests, and mass detentions" in the far-western region.

Additional abuses cited included forced sterilization, coerced abortion, restrictions on religious and political freedoms, and the torture of prisoners.

Wu, who now serves on the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, is the first former party secretary of the Tibetan Autonomous Region, or TAR, to be placed under investigation and the eighth ministerial-level official to face a probe since the Communist Party's National Congress in 2022.

The Central Commission for Discipline Inspection and the National Supervisory Commission announced the investigation on June 16.

Other officials under investigation include Dong Yunhu, chief of the Shanghai legislature; Sun Zhigang, a former medical reform official; Han Yong, former chairman of the Shaanxi Provincial Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference; Gou Zhongwen, former sports minister; Tang Yijun, former justice minister; Tang Renjian, agriculture minister; and Li Yuefeng, executive vice-chairman of the Central Committee of the Taiwan Democratic Self-Government League.

Tibetans react

Tibetans inside Tibet took to Chinese social media to express their scorn for Wu Yingjie, known for his crackdowns and repressive policies, a source inside Tibet told Radio Free Asia on the condition of anonymity for fear of reprisal.

More than 760 comments appeared on a WeChat channel in response to a story about Wu's investigation, all expressing support for the probe.

Members of the Tibetan community in Belgium hold a demonstration to mark the celebration of the 57th Tibetan Uprising Day in front of the European Union headquarters in Brussels, March 10, 2016. (Emmanuel Dunand/AFP)

But at least one activist predicted the investigation would do nothing to change the plight of Tibetans.

"Despite Chinese leader Xi Jinping's investigation of Wu Yingjie and other officials as part of the nation's anti-corruption campaign, there will be no positive impact on Tibet and its related issues," said Sangay Kyap, a Tibetan rights analyst.

Shortly after Wu was promoted to party secretary in 2016, he issued a statement stressing the need for officials to "expand positive propaganda" and to "thoroughly expose and criticize" the Dalai Lama, the spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism.

Wu also urged officials to "eliminate the negative influence" of the Dalai Lama's use of religion and to guide believers to treat religion rationally.

Under President Xi Jinping, Wu also intensified repressive measures in Tibet, including the establishment of Chinese-run boarding schools with a curriculum focused on the Chinese language that undermines Tibetan culture and language, said Bawa Kelsang Gyaltsen, representative of the Office of Tibet in Taiwan.

"Wu Yingjie had been the CCP party secretary for the region, implementing severe and oppressive policies in Tibet for over 20 years," he said, referring to the Chinese Communist Party.

Another official, Jiang Jie, 58, a former senior political advisor in the TAR, was also indicted on charges of taking bribes by the Supreme People's Procuratorate following an investigation, the body announced on June 14.

Prosecutors in Tianjin allege that Jiang, who is also a former vice chairman of the TAR's Regional Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, misused his various positions, including serving as mayor of Dongying in Shandong province and deputy head of the regional government, to unlawfully gain advantages for others in exchange for significant sums of money and valuables.

Xinjiang official expelled

In a related development, Li Pengxin, a former deputy secretary of the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, the region north of Tibet, has been expelled from the Communist Party and dismissed from public office for "serious violations of Party discipline and laws," official Chinese media reported Monday.

An investigation found that Li, 63, had lost his ideals and convictions, was dishonest about his problems, accepted money and valuables, took advantage of his former position to seek benefits for others, and was suspected of accepting bribes, according to a statement issued Monday by China's anti-corruption body and the National Commission of Supervision.

When Li was deputy secretary in Xinjiang from September 2016 to July 2021, he oversaw a crackdown on Uyghur educators, sending them to prison. At a meeting of party cadres in 2017, Li announced that prominent Uyghur scholar Tashpolat Teyip had been removed and replaced as president of Xinjiang University.

Afterwards, Teyip disappeared from public view, leading Uyghurs to believe he had been detained.

Uyghurs interviewed by RFA in 2018, after news about his disappearance came to light, said they believed Teyip was removed amid an unprecedented ideological purge in Xinjiang against so-called "two-faced" Uyghur officials. The term is used by authorities to describe Uyghurs who do not willingly follow directives and exhibit signs of disloyalty.

Chinese police arrest Tibetan for flying banned flag at his house consecration ceremony

04 June 2024, Tibetan Review

For flying the Tibetan national flag atop his newly built home as a part of its consecration ceremony, Chinese police in Pashoe (Chinese: Basu, or Baxoi) County of eastern Tibet's Chamdo City have taken away a Tibetan man last week, reported the Tibetan service of rfa.org Jun 3.

Rabgang Tenzin, a 51-year-old father of three, carried out the ceremony in the evening of May 28 and intended to take down the flag next morning. However, he forgot and failed to do it, the report cited three sources with knowledge of the situation as saying.

"The next day, the Chinese police arrested him, and his current whereabouts are unknown," one of the sources has said.

The yellow-bordered blue-and-red coloured Snowlion flag of Tibet with a rising sun in the centre is a ubiquitous presence at any Tibet protest event across the free world and is banned by China.

Following the arrest, Chinese police warned the local Tibetans against talking about the incident with "outside forces" or face arrest themselves, the report cited a second anonymous source as saying.

The report said Rabgang Tenzin is a farmer who occasionally engages in small-time business.

Local residents fear that Rabgang Tenzin's arrest could lead to his 10-year-old eldest son being expelled from the Pashoe County Elementary School, the report cited two other anonymous sources as saying.

Along with pictures of the Dalai Lama, Tibet's exiled spiritual leader, any display of the Tibetan national flag attracts swift crackdown and brutal punishment from Chinese authorities in Tibet.

May

EXCLUSIVE: Teen Tibetan Monk Takes Own Life After Being Forced to Leave Monastery

29 May 2024, RFA, Sonam Lhamo and Dorjee Damdul

A 17-year-old Tibetan Buddhist monk who was forced to leave his monastery and join a government-run school committed suicide after authorities said he could no longer wear his maroon robes, three sources with direct knowledge of the matter told Radio Free Asia.

Kunzang Longyang died in mid-April in Qinghai province's Drakkar County, the sources said on condition of anonymity, citing safety concerns.

The death comes as young Tibetan monks are facing immense pressure because of growing restrictions on practicing Buddhist religious and cultural traditions.

The restrictions include a requirement since 2018 that young monks below the age of 18 be removed from monasteries across the Tibetan region. Chinese authorities have said that young monks are too immature to think for themselves and should serve society instead.

Chinese authorities have long sought to restrict the size and influence of Tibetan Buddhist monasteries, traditionally a focus of Tibetan cultural and national identity.

"Even during their school winter and summer break, the young monks are not allowed to return to their monasteries or go on visits," one of the sources told RFA.

"Government officials send people to monitor if monasteries are allowing young monks to visit or return, and monasteries are threatened of severe consequences if they allow the children to return," the source said.

Depressed at school

Three years ago, Longyang was removed from Yulung Monastery in Drakkar County after Chinese government officials enforced the under 18 rule, the three sources said.

Afterward, Longyang was made to join a local school where he was told he couldn't continue wearing his monk's robe and would have to wear regular clothing while attending class.

At the school, he became severely depressed, stopped eating for many days and became ill, the source said.

"This happened several times and each time, school authorities called his family to take him home," the source said.

Initially, school administrators made some exceptions. Longyang wasn't required to be present throughout the school year, and he was allowed to wear his robes when he was at the school for examinations and inspections run by government officials, the three sources said.

The exceptions ended a few months ago when school authorities again mandated that Longyang and other young monks disrobe and stay permanently in school. This caused much distress for Longyang, the sources said.

"He was adamant that he would not take off his monk's robes," one of the other sources said. "He had said that if he would be permanently stripped of his robes and required to go to school in his plainclothes, then he would kill himself."

Longyang was again sent home from school in April, shortly after falling into depression following the recent announcement. That's when he took his own life, the sources said.

China issues manual banning activities related to Independence of Tibet

28 May 2024, Phayul

An image of the manual banning 20 activities that are deemed as advocating for independence of Tibet by China (Photo/Tibet Times)

The Chinese government has released a manual detailing 20 activities deemed illegal in connection with advocating for independence of Tibet. This directive marks a yet another incident of clampdown on expressions of Tibetan identity, cultural and religious practices inside Tibet.

According to a report by Tibet Times, the manual issued by the information department of Thinren County, is titled "A Picture Book of Information on 20 Illegal Actions Related to Tibet Independence." It outlines various activities considered illegal under Chinese law, including displaying the Dalai Lama's image and the act of self-immolation, a form of protest linked to Tibetan activism resorted by over 159 known cases of Tibetans who have self-immolated to protest against the Chinese illegal occupation of Tibet.

The manual also outlaws activities promoting the Tibetan language and environmental or protection of animals if it is perceived as an effort towards promoting separatism. It also prohibits entering other countries illegally and participating in religious activities in other countries.

The regulations extend to controlling information dissemination where Tibetans are prohibited from spreading, selling, or possessing books, images, videos, and soundtracks discussing Tibetan independence. The use of foreign media outlets, such as Voice of America, considered to encourage separatist sentiments by the Chinese government is also banned. Any online communication about Tibetan independence risks facing severe penalties, the new directives warned.

The manual targets religious practices and social gatherings, prohibiting Tibetans from participating in foreign religious activities or raising images of the Dalai Lama and Tibetan independence fighters. Traditional practices like incense offerings, setting animals free, and lighting butter lamps for selfimmolators or their families are banned. Even gathering to recite prayers during Tibetan auspicious events is forbidden if deemed supportive of independence.

The manual also includes prohibitions on believing Tibet is an independent country, and spreading or selling materials about Tibetan thoughts. It also bans collecting donations for what China deems separatist forces, discussing Tibet independence in schools, working with external so-called separatist forces, organising prayers for the Dalai Lama during Tibetan events, and inciting others under the guise of religious and traditional activities.

Observers and right groups have maintained that China's heavy-handedness is apparent through these vague and blanket laws that snubs any and all voices of dissent. Any activity that expresses the unique identity and voice are deemed as separatist activities and severely persecuted.

China to Punish Tibet Officials who Support Dalai Lama

28 May 2024, Naharnet

China will severely punish officials in Tibet who support the Dalai Lama, the exiled spiritual leader and Nobel laureate, the region's top Communist leader said according to state media reports Wednesday.

Chen Quanguo, Tibet's Communist party chief, vowed to root out officials who support the Dalai Lama and to quash separatist activities in the region, according to a front-page report in the Tibet Daily, the ruling party's regional mouthpiece.

"Party members, especially leading cadres, at all levels must safeguard the unity of the motherland," Chen was cited as saying.

"Cadres who harbour fantasies about the 14th Dalai Group, follow the 14th Dalai Group, and participate in supporting separatist infiltration sabotage activities, will be strictly and severely punished according to the law and party disciplinary measures."

The current Dalai Lama is the 14th to hold the title.

Chen's comments came after the head of an anti-corruption inspection team from the Communist party's internal watchdog said officials in Tibet must concentrate on fighting separatism and maintaining social stability, according to the state-run Global Times.

The Dalai Lama, branded a terrorist by Beijing, fled Tibet in 1959 after a failed uprising against Chinese rule and has lived in exile ever since.

More than 130 Tibetans have set themselves on fire since 2009 in protest at what they describe as Beijing's religious and cultural repression, according to Radio Free Asia, which is supported by the U.S. government.

China accuses the Dalai Lama of seeking to split Tibet from the rest of China and of fomenting unrest in the region.

The Dalai Lama won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989, catapulting him into the global spotlight, and in the decade that followed he was courted by U.S. presidents and Hollywood stars alike as he crisscrossed the world campaigning for greater autonomy for his homeland.

But a quarter of a century later some Western leaders are turning their backs on the Tibetan spiritual leader – sometimes reluctantly – under pressure from China, a rising power and the world's second-largest economy.

A summit for Nobel peace prizewinners set to take place in South Africa was cancelled last month after he was denied a visa, and during a visit to Norway government officials declined to meet him so as not to offend Beijing.

Surveillance ramped up after anti-dam protests

28 May 2024, Free Tibet

"Residents in Jomda county face patrols and house to house searches as CCP tries to "strengthen social control"

Our research partner Tibet Watch, has learned that two villages in Jomda County listed for relocation to make way for the Kamtok hydropower dam were subjected to house-to-house checks in March. The measures followed protests against the dam by residents of the neighbouring county of Dege in February.

According to a news report published on the official WeChat platform of Wopotoe Township, Dege County, between 13 and 14 March 2024, Huang Jun, Secretary of the Leading Party Group and Chamdo Municipal Bureau of Statistics, who also serves as the Deputy Director of Chamdo City, went to the villages of Chage and Zhouge of Wopotoe Township to oversee "the entry of thousands of cadres into thousands of villages, scrutinising the conflicts and potential security risks".

In February, a Tibet Watch source named both Chage and Zhouge among 12 villages that are set to be relocated to make way for Kamtok dam.

Information about all Tibetan farmers and nomads in Wopotoe Township – including the two villages Huang Jun visited – is expected to have been collected through door-to-door visits under the campaign of One household and One file (yī hù yī dǎng) – a household information management system that came into force in the Tibet Autonomous Region since last year.

The village-based party cadres conducted door-to-door "investigation, watching and interrogation" visits, which are also known to be used to extract opinion and political sentiments about the Chinese Communist Party and its policies from residents, and to coerce residents into complying with government orders.

The same news report added that in the name of "strengthening social control", the village-based cadres have been patrolling the villages, monasteries and other sensitive sites. This task has been carried out alongside members of the village-level party committees and the heads of the double-linked households in Wopotoe Township. The latter is a system of social control in which households are divided into groups of 10 to monitor each other's activities for the dual purpose of maintaining public security and ensuring poverty alleviation.

Informed supplied by Tibet Watch

China touts Tibet's tourism development, 'ethnic unity' on 73rd illegal annexation anniversary

27 May 2024, Tibetan Review

While the anniversary of China's illegal annexation of Tibet went seemingly unnoticed among the Tibetan diaspora, in Beijing, a press conference was held to commemorate the occasion. The people of Xizang (China's new name for the western half of Tibet proper which it demarcated as Tibet autonomous Region (TAR), if only in name) broke free from the fetters of invading imperialism, embarking on a bright road of unity, progress and development with all the other ethnic groups in China, reported China's official globaltimes.cn May 23. China has to this day not named any "invading imperialist" power it claims to have saved Tibet from.

The press conference was reported to have been addressed by Yan Jinhai, chairman of the TAR government, and Xu Zhitao, its vice chairman, with focus especially on "ethnic unity", a frequently used official euphemism for the insidious dilution of the ethnographic identity of Tibet, and on the region's development in tourism and clean energy. The officials have clearly avoided any mention of China's massive, environmentally devastating mining industry in the Tibetan homeland.

Over the past 73 years, under the strong leadership of the Communist Party of China (CPC), the region has strived to forge a new path for high-quality economic development, with people from different ethnic minorities living happily together. Tourism resources continue to attract visitors from both home and abroad, the report cited the TAR officials as saying at the press conference.

"Now, the various ethnic groups of Xizang residents are living in a favourable atmosphere of political stability, ethnic unity, religious harmony with improving living conditions. All of this is closely related to the agreement signed 73 years ago," Xiong Kunxin, a professor at Minzu University of China in Beijing, has said.

China compelled a Tibetan government delegation to sign at gun-point on May 23, 1951 a 17-Point Agreement which promised a form of "one country two system" policy for Tibet. China trashed that agreement in 1959 after a popular Tibetan uprising that started in capital Lhasa on Mar 10. China then unleashed a violent policy of Sinicization of the region along with its economic modernization and development.

The region will work on enhancing the range of tourist offerings and improving the efficiency of processing documents for foreign visitors entering the region, the report cited the two TAR government officials as saying on Thursday (May 23), "the 73rd anniversary of the Xizang peaceful liberation".

Yan – said to be a Tibetan from Qinghai province with Chinese name – has said that in 2023, the number of trips paid to the region reached 55.17 million from home and abroad, and the tourism revenue reached 65.1 billion yuan ($9 billion), up 83.7% and 60% respectively compared with the previous year, both reaching record highs. He has added that nearly 20,000 foreign tourists visited TAR in 2023 and the number of foreign visitors reached 4,300 in the first quarter of this year.

Referring to TAR as the "city of sunshine" where the annual sunshine time is 3,500 hours, Yan has said the region has a potential solar energy development capacity of 9.8 billion kilowatts, 1.7 billion kilowatts of hydropower resources, and 1.8 billion kilowatts of wind energy, excluding geothermal and pumped storage energy. The total installed capacity exceeds 10 billion kilowatts, all of which are clean energy sources, Yan has added.

The report cited Xu, an ethnic Chinese, as saying the region will enhance the range of tourist offerings and improve the efficiency of processing documents for foreign visitors entering TAR. He has said that initiatives focusing on language translation and e-payment systems will further enhance the appeal of TAR to international tourists.

He has also said TAR will open more direct flights to mainland cities and international markets, "which will attract more investment enterprises to enter the local cultural tourism market."

China's United Front ensures CCP control over Tibet

26 May 2024, The Sunday Guardian, Khedroob Thondup

The United Front Work Department has been instrumental in implementing policies aimed at controlling the religious and cultural life of Tibet.

The legacy of the Dalai Lama and the issue of his reincarnation are pivotal to the future of the Tibetan movement. The Dalai Lama's role transcends spiritual leadership; it embodies the cultural and national identity of Tibet. As the current Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso, advances in age, discussions about his succession have intensified, especially considering the geopolitical implications.

The Dalai Lama has historically been both a spiritual and political figure for Tibetans, and his reincarnation is a deeply religious process that is believed to be influenced by his own will and merit. However, the Chinese government has expressed its intent to control the reincarnation process, aiming to appoint a successor that aligns with its political interests and to assert sovereignty over Tibet. This has led to concerns that there could be two successors: one recognized by Tibetans and the other by the Chinese government.

The Dalai Lama's approach to his reincarnation and legacy is strategic, focusing on the sustainability of the Tibetan cause. He has emphasized the importance of democratic governance and the separation of the religious and political roles of the Dalai Lama, which was evident when he devolved political power to the elected Tibetan government-in-exile. This move was aimed at ensuring that the Tibetan struggle remains resilient and adaptable to future challenges.

The Dalai Lama's legacy is also preserved through his teachings and the values he promotes, such as non-violence, compassion, and dialogue, which continue to inspire and guide the Tibetan community and its supporters worldwide. His reincarnation will not only be a religious event but also a significant moment for the Tibetan struggle, potentially impacting the direction and nature of the movement.

The international community's response to the Dalai Lama's succession will also be crucial. The US has enacted the Tibet Policy and Support Act, which supports the right of Tibetans to choose their leaders without interference. This law, among other international stances, could play a role in legitimizing the Dalai Lama's successor and maintaining the momentum of the Tibetan movement.

In summary, the Dalai Lama's legacy and the circumstances of his reincarnation are indeed central to the Tibetan cause, influencing not only the spiritual continuity of Tibetan Buddhism but also the political and cultural resilience of the Tibetan people.

The relationship between China and Tibet has been complex and contentious, with the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan people often at the centre of this dynamic. The concept of "United Front" tactics refers to the range of strategies used by the Chinese government to integrate and manage different interest groups, especially those it considers potentially subversive or separatist.

In the context of Tibet, the United Front Work Department (UFWD) of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) has been instrumental in implementing policies aimed at controlling the religious and cultural life of the region. This includes efforts to manage the succession process of the Dalai Lama, a central figure in Tibetan Buddhism and a symbol of Tibetan identity and autonomy aspirations.

Historically, the Chinese government has sought to undermine the Dalai Lama's influence by promoting alternative religious leaders and restricting his ability to communicate with the Tibetan people. The CCP's approach has evolved from outright suppression to more subtle methods of co-optation and control. For instance, the Chinese government has asserted its right to approve the reincarnation of Tibetan lamas, including the Dalai Lama, which is a deeply spiritual matter traditionally decided within the Tibetan Buddhist framework.

Furthermore, the UFWD has been involved in orchestrating dialogues with Tibetan representatives, although these talks have often been criticized as insincere and unproductive. The Chinese government's narrative portrays the Dalai Lama as a separatist, despite his repeated calls for genuine autonomy within the framework of the Chinese constitution, rather than full independence.

The use of United Front tactics extends beyond the religious sphere, encompassing economic and social policies designed to integrate Tibet more closely with the rest of China. This includes infrastructure development, the promotion of Mandarin Chinese language over Tibetan, and the encouragement of migration from other parts of China to Tibet, which some argue dilutes Tibetan cultural and demographic characteristics.

In summary, China's United Front tactics in Tibet are multifaceted, aiming to consolidate control over the region while attempting to diminish the influence of the Dalai Lama and the traditional Tibetan way of life. These tactics have significant implications for the preservation of Tibetan culture, the autonomy of the region, and the rights of the Tibetan people.

Children Protest “Genocide Tourism” to Tibet

20 May 2024, Bitter Winter, Lopsang Gurung

A woman demonstrates the use of “urduo.” From Weibo.

When trains with tourists pass, the traditional stone-throwing ropes called “urduo” are used to express disapproval of the staged tours.

“Genocide tourism” is an expression used by the Uyghurs to oppose tours to Xinjiang where tourists visit villages where everybody smiles and dances under the watchful eye of the Chinese authorities. The reality is different, but tourists do not see it. It is the reality of concentration camp, repression, and physical and cultural genocide.

Tourism in Tibet is not much different. Domestic Chinese and some international visitors are only shown what the CCP wants to show. They may spend several days in Tibet, visit some monasteries, photograph some monks, and not understand at all that a cultural genocide is happening there, with Tibetan culture systematically denied and Buddhist religion allowed only if it accepts to serve as a propaganda mouthpiece of the regime and the Chinese occupation.

Protesting this state of affairs is difficult and exposes the protesters to long jail sentences. Or perhaps you will not go to jail if you are a child?

Children in the area around the prefecture-level city of Nagku, in Northern Tibet, have devised an original and moving form of protest. They use the traditional “urduo,” a rope or whip made of yak or goat hair. It is used by herdsmen to drive cattle but also to throw stones to show the road to the livestock or scare away wild animals.

The herdsmen’s children take the “urduo” when trains with tourists pass their area and whip the passing trains or throw small stones. They do not intend to hurt anybody; they just want to tell the tourists that staged tours are not welcome.

The CCP has now warned parents that they will be held responsible for the behavior of their children. It is a small incident, but it shows that even children share the indomitable spirit of the Tibetan resistance.

‘Tibet’ to supply clean electric power to 16 other provincial regions of PRC

19 May 2024, Tibetan Review

Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), which is roughly the western half of Tibet proper, will transmit two billion kWh of clean electricity to 16 other provincial-level regions of the People’s Republic of China (PRC) this year, reported China’s official Xinhua news agency May 19, citing the regional power company.

The report cited the State Grid Xizang Electric Power Company as saying clean energy is expected to help China’s central and eastern regions reduce the emission of carbon dioxide by 1.6 million tonnes and sulphur dioxide by 50,000 tonnes, respectively. “Xizang” or “Xizang Autonomous Region” is China’s name for TAR.

The report noted that the TAR boasts abundant solar, hydraulic and wind power resources, which enabled it to begin sending electricity to other provincial-level regions of the PRC for the first time in 2015.

As of 2023, the region had delivered more than 13.9 billion kWh of clean energy, reducing carbon dioxide emissions by 20.64 million tonnes, and creating economic benefits of about 3.7 billion yuan (about 520.8 million US dollars), the report added.

China subjects Tibetans to political education for protesting, rejecting paltry compensation for their pastureland

17 May 2024, Tibetan Review

For protesting against their ouster from their grassland and the payment afterward of a laughably paltry compensation for it, Chinese authorities in Markham County of Chamdo City, Tibet Autonomous Region, have subjected the affected Tibetan herdsmen to a series of political education sessions, according to the Tibetan service of rfa.org May 16. They also remain under threats of criminal prosecution as the local authorities have labelled their protest as political opposition.

Besides, area officials were preventing the Tibetan herdsmen from petitioning higher authorities in Chamdo for a fair compensation for their land, the report said, citing two sources with knowledge of the situation, speaking on condition of anonymity due to fear of retaliation from the authorities.

One source has said local authorities had misrepresented the facts by painting the herdsmen’s protests and pleas for a fair compensation as political in nature in their reports to the city and TAR authorities. And they used that as their justification for subjecting the Tibetans to political education sessions.

The herdsmen's grassland had reportedly been sold illegally to business owners by county officials early last year. However, no one knew anything about it until last month when the new owners sent people to remove the Tibetans and take over their pastureland. It led to the affected families, numbering 25 Tibetan families in Taktsha village in the county's Luoni Township, to submit petitions and hold protests. Four of the protesters were taken into custody on Apr 10, subjected to beating, and then let out on Apr 16.

The release was made with the announcement of a paltry compensation of just 3,000 yuan (US$415) per family, which the Tibetans rejected offhandedly.

The officials have reportedly branded the Tibetan herdsmen's actions as political opposition and subjected them to a series of political education sessions. More than 30 Chinese county officials from various departments at different levels of the county government conducted the political education over the past month, the report cited the sources as saying.

In addition, Chinese authorities are stated to have announced rewards for anyone providing information that could help them identify an individual who shared news of the land grab protest with outside parties. The political education sessions were stated to have begun on Apr 16 with the Luoni Township Party Committee organizing what was called a Chinese Communist Party discipline study and political education meeting before an array of over 30 Chinese officials. They were stated to include "members of the township party committee, all party members of directly affiliated branches, at-home cadres, temple management committees, police stations, health centres and school administrators."

After the meeting, members of what has been described as the "Chinese Working Affairs Committee" were stated to have visited each family to provide political education.

They were stated to have told the Tibetans that the Chinese government would address any problems they faced, but warned against committing the crime of sharing information with people living outside Tibet because it would compromise national dignity and reflect poorly on the Party.

But far from solving their problems, the local authorities have used what the report described as "political manoeuvres" to prevent the local Tibetans from appealing their case to the Chamdo city authorities.

The 1.5-km long, 1 sq-km land taken from the herdsmen is stated to be worth about 5 million yuan, (US$692,000).

However, the authorities' compensation offer totals only 75,000 yuan (at 3000 yuan per family). And even this was stated to be denied, with the Tibetans facing imprisonment, if they protested or refused to comply with the authorities' orders.

Tibetans undergo political education for protesting land grab

16 May 2024, RFA

Tibetans who protested the seizure of their pasture land by Chinese authorities in Markham county in April have been subjected to a series of political education sessions after they were accused of protesting for political reasons, two sources with knowledge of the situation said.

Area officials are also preventing the Tibetans from petitioning higher authorities in Chamdo, a city in the eastern part of the Tibet Autonomous Region, for fair compensation for their land, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of retaliation.

County officials have misled higher-ranking officials in Chamdo and in Tibet's capital Lhasa into thinking that the protest by Tibetan residents was political in nature, rather than an appeal against the land grab, said the first source.

"[They] have used that as an excuse to organize a series of political education sessions in the area," he said.

In early April, 25 Tibetan families from Taktsha village in Markham county learned their land had been sold without their knowledge to businessmen by county officials, when the new owners sent people to clear it.

Four Tibetans were arrested April 10 for protesting the land grab and later released on April 16, but they were beaten while in detention.

Chinese authorities in the Tibet Autonomous Region and in Tibetan-populated areas of nearby Chinese provinces often ignore residents' concerns about mining and land grabs by local officials, who routinely rely on force to subdue those who complain or protest, according to human rights groups.

Rejecting low compensation

In April, the Tibetans rejected 3,000 yuan (US$415) in individual compensation that was belatedly offered to them by Chinese authorities, saying the amount was too low for the pasture land that had been sold by Chinese county officials to businessmen in 2023.

Since then, the Tibetans have had to attend a series of political education sessions, with more than 30 Chinese county officials from various departments visiting the area over the past month, said the two sources.

Chinese authorities in Markham county also announced a reward for information that could help them identify an individual who shared news of the land grab protest with outside parties, the sources said.

"This is the first time we have seen such rigorous political education sessions and monitoring in the area, with so many levels of officials visiting the place to conduct group political education sessions and going door-to-door," said the second source.

On April 16, the Luoni Township Party Committee, where the village is located, organized a Chinese Communist Party discipline study and political education meeting with over 30 Chinese officials. They included members of the township party committee, all party members of directly affiliated branches, at-home cadres, temple management committees, police stations, health centers and school administrators.

"Following the meeting, members of the Chinese Working Affairs Committee visited each family in their homes to provide political education," the second source said.

They told the Tibetans that the Chinese government would address any problems they faced, but that they couldn't share information with people living outside Tibet because it would compromise national dignity and reflect poorly on the Chinese Communist Party, thereby constituting a criminal act, the second source said.

Police monitoring

Since the protest, around 10 policemen have been deployed to patrol the area day and night to monitor the Tibetans' activities, the sources said.

"Instead of addressing the core problem, Chinese authorities are using political maneuvers and have prevented local Tibetans from appealing their case in Chamdo," said the first source.

The first source said the land taken from the Tibetans is 1.5 kilometers (one mile) long and covers an area of 1 square kilometer (0.4 square miles), and is worth about 5 million yuan, or US$692,000.

Officials told the residents to accept their offer of 3,000 Chinese yuan each without protest or face imprisonment for noncompliance.

The Chinese police and Markham county officials are now threatening the Tibetans by labeling the protests as political in nature and intimidating locals about likely consequences, given that protests of a political nature amount to a criminal offense, the sources said.

Tibetan singer arrested for song lamenting Dalai Lama's absence

14 May 2024, RFA, Pelbar and Tenzin Dickyi

Tibetan singer Gyegjom Dorjee performs 'Tearful Deluge of a Sorrowful Song' at a concert in Khyungchu county, Ngaba Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, in southwest China's Sichuan Province, Jan. 15, 2024.

"In this land where the Victorious One is absent,
Leaders exist, but false ones.
The Tibetans are bereft of direction,
Like a deer lost in the midst of a fog..."

A Tibetan performer who sang these lyrics, publicly yearning for the Dalai Lama and blasting Chinese leaders as "false," was arrested in early February in China's Sichuan province, two sources with knowledge of the situation said.

Gyegjom Dorjee, in his early 30s, sang "Tearful Deluge of a Sorrowful Song" alongside other artists at concert on Jan. 15, as part of pre-Losar, or Tibetan New Year, celebrations, said the sources on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisal.

The song alludes to life under Chinese government rule, likening Tibetans to "birds confined in a cage." The use of "Victorious One" refers to the Dalai Lama, seen by Beijing as a separatist. Even carrying a picture of the leader of Tibetan Buddhism is considered a crime.

In a video of Dorjee's performance, an audience of more than 100 Tibetans can be seen clapping and cheering uproariously at the end of his two-minute song. But nearly a month later, Dorjee was summoned to a police station in Khyungchu county, or Hongyuan in Chinese, in Ngaba Tibetan and Qiang Autonomous Prefecture, and subsequently arrested, the sources said.

Since then, his whereabouts remain unknown, they said. "The Chinese government said his song had political connotations and raised concerns about its lyrics," the first source told Radio Free Asia.

Security threat

Tibetan artists like Dorjee, who peacefully express disagreement or discontent with China's policies in the Tibetan Autonomous Region or Tibetan-populated areas of Chinese provinces, are branded by Chinese authorities as dangers to “national security” or “social stability.”

In particular, Tibetan writers, artists and singers who advocate for Tibetan national identity and culture or voice criticism of China’s governance often face detention.

A nomad with a passion for singing and engaging in traditional Tibetan cultural performances, Dorjee often has been called upon to perform at local events and festivals, the first source said. Following his arrest, Dorjee’s family tried to get information about the charge and his whereabouts from the Khyungchu police station, but police turned them away without providing it, said the second source.

“They were told Dorjee was being interrogated because of the provocative nature of his lyrics and thoughts, and that there were ‘political problems’ with his song lyrics and ideology,” he said.

‘Red-faced ones’

Dorjee’s lyrics also made references to “this place of inequities/injustice” and the discrimination suffered by the “red-faced” ones, using an old epithet used to describe Tibetans.

“The song expresses the common grievances held by the Tibetans against Chinese rule and criticizes the repressive policies of the Chinese party-state,” the Tibetan Center for Human Rights and Democracy said in a statement. “In the current climate of heightened repression, local Tibetans have little to no avenues to exercise basic human rights including the right to freedom of expression or peaceful dissent,” it said.

Some Tibetan artists have taken their protests against the Chinese government to an extreme.

In 2022, Tsewang Norbu, a well-known contemporary Tibetan singer, set himself on fire in front of the iconic Potala Palace in Lhasa to demonstrate his opposition to Chinese policies in Tibet.

Radio Free Asia later learned that Norbu’s act was an attempt to draw attention to his grievances, and that he succumbed to his injuries.

Students banned from speaking Tibetan in Sichuan schools

08 May 2024, RFA, Pelbar and Tenzin Dickyi

Chinese authorities have banned students in schools in a Tibetan-populated area in China’s Sichuan province from speaking their native language when they communicate among themselves and with their teachers, two sources from inside Tibet said.

Students and teachers at elementary, middle and high schools in Nyagchu county, or Yajiang in Chinese, are required to use only Mandarin to communicate, they said, insisting they not be identified for fear of their personal safety.

The measure is another blow to Tibetan culture and language, which the Chinese government seems intent on wiping out and replacing with Mandarin and Han Chinese culture. Last year, a ban was imposed on Tibetan language classes in schools in another part of Sichuan province, in the Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture.

Since 2020, the Chinese government has further tightened its restrictions on language rights in Tibetan, forcing the closure of private Tibetan schools in Tibet and intensifying Chinese-language education in the schools in the name of promoting uniformity in the use of textbooks and instructional materials.

In 2021, Chinese authorities also began prohibiting Tibetan children from participating in informal Tibetan language classes or workshops during their winter breaks.

Activists fear the moves could lead to the extinction of the language in the region and endanger its viability across the country.

Limiting home visits

Authorities also have restricted the number of holidays the schoolchildren can take to limit interactions in their native tongue between them and their families, the sources said.

“Traditional breaks like spring and summer holidays, which allowed for family time, have been eliminated, forcing children to remain in boarding schools for extended periods,” the first Tibetan said.

“This separation has contributed to a decline in the number of young Tibetans proficient in the Tibetan language in Nyagchu,” he said. Tibetans make up about 90 percent of the prefecture’s 1 million inhabitants.

In the past, the Chinese government-run boarding schools allowed Tibetan children to return home on weekends and provided longer breaks during the April-June period so they could help their families with the harvesting of caterpillar fungus – a source of income for many.

But now, the children are not being sent home for these breaks, significantly limiting their contact with relatives and leading to a decline in Tibetan language fluency among the younger generation of Tibetans in Sichuan’s Kardze prefecture, said the sources.

Tibetan parents previously sought out private schools where their children could learn the Tibetan language, but the imposition of the ban in Kardze has made finding such alternative options increasingly difficult, said the second Tibetan source.

Liu Pengyu, a spokesperson at the Chinese Embassy in Washington, told RFA he did not know the specifics of this development but added that the Chinese government protects the freedom of ethnic minorities. “In accordance with the law, the Chinese government protects the freedom of ethnic minorities to use and develop their own spoken and written languages, and the freedom of religious belief of the people of all ethnic groups,” Liu said in an email.

School closures

And yet in 2021, the Chinese government closed several private Tibetan schools, including Phende School and Chaktsa Tevey Private Elementary School in Za-Sersul county, Sengdruk Taktse School in Darlak, or Golog, county, three schools in Machen county, one school in Gadhey county, two schools in Chikdril county, and the Gedhen Buddhist School in Drago Monastery.

Each of Nyagchu county’s six towns and 10 villages has an elementary school, but these are now all residential schools – which activists term “colonial-style” and where they say Tibetan children are forcefully separated from their families and taught a Chinese-language curriculum.

It is critically important to introduce children to the Tibetan language during their formative years, said Sangye Tandar Naga, editor and department head of the Cultural Research and Publication Department at Library of Tibetan Works and Archives in Dharamsala, India.

“This early exposure is crucial because it becomes significantly more challenging for adults to learn the language later in life,” Naga told RFA Tibetan at a May 2-4 event in Dharamsala where over 24 Tibetan educators, writers and cultural scholars convened to develop strategies to preserve the Tibetan language.

The 7th Ling Rinpoche, the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama’s principal tutor, told RFA in an interview that the role of parents in teaching their children about the significance of preserving the Tibetan language is crucial to the language’s survival.

Tibet to provide financial aid to Nepal’s northern border districts for five years

03 May 2024, The Kathmandu Post

Ministry of Local Development is selecting projects needed in 15 districts bordering China.

China’s Tibet Autonomous Region is set to fund a five-year initiative in Nepal’s northern border districts, offering different kinds of logistical and material support, mostly for social and economic development projects.

Officials familiar with the development told the Post that the Tibetan government will provide 20 million yuan or around Rs370 million each year under the initiative for the next five years.

To execute the initiative, the first preparatory meeting was held in Lhasa on April 23 and 24. It was co-chaired by Kamal Prasad Bhattarai, joint secretary of the Ministry of Federal Affairs and General Administration of Nepal, and Baiman Yangzong, director general of the Foreign Affairs Office of China’s Tibet Autonomous Region, according to a statement issued by the Nepal’s Consulate General in Lhasa.

“The discussions were focused on the coordination mechanism of aid projects by the Tibet Autonomous Region, China to Nepal in terms of work schedule, selection modality of the projects, and the ways of implementation and monitoring,” said the statement. During his Nepal visit in November, Wang Junzheng, the CPC secretary for the Xizang (Tibet) Autonomous Region of China, had informed Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs Narayan Kaji Shrestha that Tibet would provide Nepal 20 million yuan for administrative reform and development needs in Nepal.

The Chinese assistance will be used for building schools and health posts, installing solar electricity, and funding other small projects in the northern 15 districts of Nepal, said a Nepali official who attended the meeting in Lhasa last week.

The 15 districts are Taplejung, Solukhumbu, Sankhuwasabha, Dolakha, Sindhupalchok, Rasuwa, Dhading, Gorkha, Manang, Mustang, Bajhang, Dolpa, Mugu, Humla and Darchula.

During the meeting, both sides agreed to hold the meeting of aid projects twice in the first half of the year, so as to focus on the projects’ arrangements, and twice in the second half of the year for the implementation and review of the implemented projects.

Furthermore, the two sides discussed enhancing support for improving the livelihood of the people residing in the border districts through various projects, according to the statement.

The next meeting in Kathmandu that is supposed to take place in May-June will select projects, according to Nepali officials.

The Ministry of Local Development is currently compiling a list of projects needed in the 15 districts that share a border with Tibet. Xizang is the new name for Tibet that China started using from last year.

The ‘Second Meeting of the Aid Projects to Nepal’ will take place on a mutually convenient date in May 2024, said the statement by Nepal’s Consulate General in Lhasa.

China has been implementing small-scale aid projects in the northern border districts of Nepal.

In the past, the Chinese government had provided each of these districts Rs3 million for the development of village development committees (VDCs), then local administrative units, in the districts. In 2014, in a deal between the two countries, China had agreed to provide 10 million yuan (USD 1.63 million) annually from 2014 to 2018 through the Tibetan government in areas like health, education and road sectors to improve the livelihood of the residents in those districts.

Later in 2018, the China International Development Cooperation Agency (CIDCA), China's external foreign aid agency, signed a cooperation agreement with Nepal's Ministry of Finance to provide development assistance in Nepal's northern district and agreement was signed in 2019 but no substantive progress has been made.

In April 2019, during the state visit of the then president Bidya Devi Bhandari to China, Nepal and China signed the Northern Area Infrastructure Development and Livelihood Improvement Project (NAIDLIP), where Beijing had pledged to provide funds for implementing the project, which was estimated to cost 20 million yuan.

According to the local development ministry, the project will support roads linking settlements, schools, health facilities, market centers within or among local units. The project also aimed to support agriculture and irrigation sector, surface or solar lifting irrigation, micro irrigation, commercial agro-veterinary, business promotion, solar dryer, dairy industry, cold storage and fruits or medical plant processing units, and solar energy. But the scheme was severely impacted by the Covid pandemic, said officials.

In October 2022, the Chinese government provided 14 excavators to 14 municipalities of 14 different districts bordering China. The Tibetan government also supported food supplies and other essentials worth over 200 million yuan to the 15 districts in the past five years.

April

Gonpo Kyi assaulted again, phone holding evidence of police brutality destroyed

24 April 2024, Phayul

Gonpo Kyi, the sister of Tibetan businessman Dorjee Tashi, who was wrongly sentenced to life by Chinese authorities, faced another instance of violence at the hands of Chinese authorities on April 19. The incident occurred following her latest protest outside the Tibet Higher People's Court in Lhasa, where she reiterated her demand for a fair retrial for her brother, according to research outfit, Tibet Watch.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

Gonpo Kyi (right) and her husband Choekyong holding a sign that reads 'Dorjee Tashi is not guilty' in front of Dorjee Tashi's Yak Hotel in Lhasa (Photo/ ICT)

Gonpo Kyi, who has been actively advocating for justice for her brother, documented her injuries sustained during the altercation with the authorities. She accused the police of confiscating and subsequently destroying her phone, which contained evidence of their misconduct.

In one of the videos obtained by Tibet Watch, Gonpo Kyi denounced the authorities for their actions, stating, "You robbed my mobile phone and broke it to conceal the evidence, illegally arrested me and illegally beat me." She highlighted the recurring pattern of her arrests and assaults each time she attempted to protest peacefully for her brother's cause.

Another video showed Kyi holding a pamphlet bearing the message "Dorjee Tashi is innocent!", while expressing her frustration with the authorities' refusal to grant her brother a fair trial, asserting, "You forcefully put a black hat on a white person [Dorjee Tashi]."

Despite facing detention and threats from the authorities, Gonpo Kyi remains steadfast in her pursuit of justice for her imprisoned brother. Dorjee Tashi was arrested in 2008 on charges of loan fraud, which his family vehemently denies.

In December 2023, Gonpo Kyi and her husband, Choekyong filed a lawsuit against the police over their ill-treatment. The duo has said that they were treated harshly during a protest outside the Higher People's Court in Lhasa.

On December 12 last year, Gonpo Kyi and Choekyong staged a sit-in outside the court, demanding a re-examination of Dorjee Tashi's case and access to visit him, a promise that they claim was previously made to them. Instead of addressing their demands, they were allegedly detained and subjected to violence by the authorities.

Gonpo Kyi spent a week in detention and became the focus of an international campaign calling for her release. In their lawsuit, the couple accused the police of arbitrary detention and physical assault. They also claim they were denied access to medical treatment for Gonpo Kyi's injuries sustained during the detention.

Released from Arrest, Tortured Tibetan Monk Committed Suicide

22 April 2024, Bitter Winter

One year after the tragedy, the family of Tenzin Dorjee revealed what happened to the learned teacher from Shelkar Monastery. There are Tibetans who decide to die through self-immolation to protest the cultural genocide of their people. For others, suicide is not a form of protest but the consequence of torture and terror. Only on April 15, 2024, the parents of monk Tenzin Dorjee from Nubling township, Dingri county, Tibet, informed human rights organizations that their son had committed suicide last year, on May 25, 2023. A learned 50-year-old monk of Shelkar Monastery from Dingri county, Tenzin Dorjee

It's the latest example of land taken by Chinese authorities in Tibet and in Tibetan-populated areas of nearby Chinese provinces for mining, farming or other use. Local officials routinely use force to subdue those who complain or protest.

Earlier this month, about 25 families were shocked when a Chinese businessman came to clear their land. They were told their land had been sold without their knowledge or any compensation.

After they protested, Chinese officials agreed to pay each family 3,000 yuan, or about US$415, each.

The resident said that the affected families must accept the compensation without protest, and it cannot be negotiated because the amount has been decided by higher authorities.

Other residents said that those who do not comply with the government's instructions on the matter could face imprisonment.

Authorities conveyed the details of the compensation plan at a meeting on April 16, requiring at least one representative of each of the affected families to attend.

"The people were unhappy about the compensation and rejected the low figure," said the first source, who explained that the pasture land is being dug out to clear all remaining grass.

Attendees were not allowed to bring their phones to the meeting, where authorities warned the families that it was forbidden to leak any information outside the country and reprimanded them for committing the "crime" of spreading news about the land grab and protesting it.

"They were told that internal problems can only be solved internally," a second resident said on condition of anonymity to speak freely.

"But if this information had not been widely reported, there wouldn't have been any talk of compensation, let alone the release of the four young men who were arrested and detained."

Additional reporting by Dolma Lhamo and edited by Tenzin Pema for RFA Tibetan

China expels teacher for pushing for students to use Tibetan language

17 April 2024, Pelbar, RFA

Tibetan language teacher Dhonyoe (C, front) is seen with students at Meruma Central Primary School in Ngaba County in southwest China's Sichuan province, in an undated photo.

A Tibetan language teacher in China's Sichuan province was interrogated and expelled by authorities after pushing for greater use of the Tibetan language in schools – a measure that has been banned in education institutions, two sources inside Tibet told Radio Free Asia.

Dhonyoe, who goes by only one name, was expelled in early April from Meruma Central Primary School in Ngaba county's Meruma township after he was interrogated several times by Chinese authorities, said the sources who requested anonymity for fear of reprisals.

His teaching license was also suspended, they said. "Dhonyoe was accused of teaching his students beyond the national education system and was repeatedly questioned by authorities in mid-March," said the first source.

The Chinese government-run boarding school has about 500 Tibetan students, studying in kindergarten to the sixth grade, and about 60 teachers. The school previously taught Tibetan language and used Tibetan as a medium of instruction, the sources said.

However, since 2018, with the movement of promoting uniformity in the use of textbooks and instructional materials, the Tibetan language has been replaced by Mandarin, which has been taught more intensively, they added.

"Dhonyoe is a well-respected Tibetan teacher in the community," said the second source. "He taught students the importance of the Tibetan language and Tibetan history, which is why he was expelled. Many students and their families were disappointed by his expulsion."

Heart-warming video

A video obtained by RFA shows students running to the school gate to greet and embrace Dhonyoe after he returned from one of the interrogation sessions he was subjected to in March.

Since 2020, the Chinese government has further tightened its restrictions on language rights in Tibetan, forcing the closure of private Tibetan schools in Tibet and banning Tibetan language teaching in various schools in Tibetan-populated areas, including in Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture.

Authorities have since intensified Chinese-language education in Tibetan schools in the name of promoting uniformity in the use of textbooks and instructional materials.

In 2021, authorities also began prohibiting Tibetan children from taking informal Tibetan language classes or workshops during their winter holidays, a move that local Tibetans and parents of affected children said would negatively impact the children's connection to their native language.

Earlier this year, in January, the Chinese Education Department issued a notice repeating this ban and ordering local authorities to intensify their supervision and investigation of supplementary lessons for Tibetan children and carry out strict disciplinary action against those violating the rule.

Translated by Dolma Lhamo and edited by Tenzin Pema for RFA Tibetan. Edited by Roseanne Gerin and Malcolm Foster.

Campaign Against "Cults" Launched in Lhasa—But What Is a "Cult" in Tibet? (Cyber News)

16 April 2024, Bitter Winter

Tibet was never known as a hotbed of "xie jiao." They may have achieved some success during the pandemic—or the CCP wants to label dissident Buddhists as "cultists."

The new regulation announced on Weibo.

On April 4, the Lhasa Public Security Bureau issued a strange document on repressing "xie jiao," a term that really means "heterodox teachings" and was originally used by Taoists in the Middle Ages to slander Buddhism, but is today translated by the CCP in languages other than Mandarin as "cults."

The document, whose translation we offer here below, would be perfectly predictable in other areas of China where fighting groups listed as "xie jiao" such as Falun Gong and The Church of Almighty God is a national security priority. The document incites Tibetans to inform on the activities of the "xie jiao" promising monetary rewards.

But why Lhasa? Tibet is not known as a hotbed of "xie jiao," and the problem of the authorities watching religion there is mostly to control dissident Buddhists. There are two possible explanations. One is that, as some reported to "Bitter Winter," the comparatively limited activities of Falun Gong and Christian-derivative groups listed as "xie jiao" in Tibet increased during the COVID-19 quarantine. The lockdown was particularly strict in Lhasa and very harsh on the local population. As it happened elsewhere, many turned to religion, including to its "illegal" varieties, with Falun Gong becoming especially popular for its offer of meditative practices boosting the immune system and protecting against the virus.

A more sinister explanation, however, is the expansion of the notions of xie jiao and "cults," which courts and public security increasingly use to crack down on groups that are not included in the semi-official lists of the xie jiao. More than one informant reported to "Bitter Winter" that Tibetans have been harassed and detained for having been found in possession of portraits of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, the 11th Panchen Lama, taken before he was kidnapped by the Chinese at age 6 in 1995. The CCP has installed Gyaincain Norbu as a false 11th Panchen Lama. "The police told me that those who honor and respect the real 11th Panchen Lama and reject the usurper Gyaincain Norbu are part of a cult," a woman told "Bitter Winter." Since the expression "Dalai Lama xie jiao" is also used, it is not impossible that Chinese authorities may also regard those who consider the Dalai Lama as the legitimate leader of Tibet as part of a "cult."

A translation of the Lhasa Public Security Bureau regulation follows:

"In order to severely crack down on and strictly prevent illegal and criminal activities of the xie jiao and create a harmonious and stable social environment, we are now collecting clues from the public about illegal and criminal activities involving xie jiao. The details are as follows:

1. Report content

(1) Clues involving illegal gatherings and activities of xie jiao.

(2) Forcing others to join a xie jiao or preventing others from quitting a xie jiao.

(3) Xie jiao create and spread superstitious heresies to deceive members or others into not accepting normal treatment, going on a hunger strike, self-harm (self-abuse), or committing suicide.

(4) Those who organize and use xie jiao to collect money; those who produce, print, operate, and transport xie jiao propaganda materials; those who use money as a tool to promote xie jiao.

(5) Promoting xie jiao to students in schools or other training institutions, or promoting xie jiao to minors through various study classes, summer (winter) camps, etc.

(6) Personnel involved in xie jiao organizations spread reactionary remarks, post, distribute, carry, privately hide, and produce clues to counter-propaganda materials such as xie jiao anti-propaganda slogans, books, leaflets, CDs, and various materials.

(7) Use communications and the Internet to promote xie jiao doctrines, produce and disseminate electronic pictures, books, publications, audio and video that promote xie jiao, and use social media such as QQ, WeChat, Douyin, and Weibo to promote xie jiao content.

(8) Using radio stations, illegally taking advantage of radio and television broadcasts, and LED electronic screens to promote xie jiao.

(9) Using e-commerce platforms to sell, buy, or mail xie jiao materials and items.

(10) Providing funds, venues, technology, tools, food, accommodation, transportation and other conveniences or assistance for xie jiao activities.

(11) Producing, mailing, and disseminating xie jiao pictures, flyers, slogans, newspapers, books, periodicals, audio tapes, video tapes, CDs, banners, logos, signs, flags, badges, clothing, utensils, souvenirs, and other items.

(12) Playing audio and video, shouting slogans, teaching, giving speeches, writing, spraying, posting, or hanging banners, slogans, or promoting xie jiao by throwing, distributing, or displaying materials.

(13) Going to regular religious venues to lure believers into xie jiao.

(14) Clues to other illegal and criminal activities of xie jiao.

2. Reporting method

(1) Dial the police hotline 110

(2) Call the police station in your jurisdiction or go to the police station to make a verbal report

(3) Report to the community police

3. Incentive measures

If the reporting clues are verified to be true by the public security organs, they will be rewarded as appropriate. The main award criteria are:

(1) If you discover clues about xie jiao activities, report to the police in a timely manner, and actively cooperate with the public security organs in carrying out investigation work, if found to be true, you will be rewarded with RMB 100 to RMB 1,000 depending on the circumstances.

(2) If a xie jiao member is found to be posting, distributing, or delivering xie jiao counter-propaganda and other illegal activities, and he or she is directly apprehended by the public security agency, to those who assist the public security agency in directly capturing the criminal suspect, a reward of RMB 1,000 to RMB 2,000 will be given, depending on the situation.

(3) Discover and report that training institutions, information consulting companies, etc., under the pretext of 'spiritual training,' 'leadership training,' 'spiritual practice,' etc., promote xie jiao, recruit people into illegal religion, and carry out mental control through teaching, speeches, etc., if the public security organ verifies that it is true, a reward of RMB 2,000 to RMB 5,000 will be given depending on the circumstances.

(4) Those who provide information about xie jiao members that have not been identified by relevant departments, or provide information about xie jiao members' gathering places, and such members are caught on the spot by the public security organs (more than 3 people) will be rewarded depending on the level of the personnel (leaders, backbones, general personnel, etc.) from 10,000 yuan to 20,000 yuan.

(5) Provide clues to major cases or insider, early-warning, and actionable information in order to successfully detect xie-jiao-related cases (events) with significant impact or effectively prevent large-scale gatherings of xie-jiao-related personnel and travel to Beijing, provinces, and cities, etc. If the case is verified to be true by the public security organ, a reward of RMB 10,000 to RMB 30,000 will be given depending on the circumstances.

4. Report identification and non-reward situations

(1) No reward will be given if the report is made anonymously, is false, or the report information is unclear and cannot be verified.

(2) If one person reports multiple reports, only one will be rewarded after verification.

(3) Multiple people report the same content. After verification, the first whistleblower will be selected to be rewarded (subject to the registration time of the accepting unit).

(4) No reward will be given if a criminal suspect surrenders before being reported.

(5) If the public security organs, People's Procuratorates, and People's Courts discover Un investigated criminal facts before the whistleblower during the case investigation, review, and trial, the whistleblower will not be rewarded.

(6) No reward will be given if the reported illegal and criminal acts have been already investigated and dealt with.

(7) These measures do not apply to staff of government agencies and administrative enterprises and institutions responsible for preventing and dealing with xie jiao.

5. Precautions

(1) The whistleblower must leave his or her real name and contact information. When reporting, pay attention to methods and personal safety, and properly retain information and evidence for subsequent verification and redemption of rewards.

(2) The reporting unit and staff will strictly keep the whistleblower's information confidential and protect the whistleblower's personal and property safety in accordance with the law.

(3) Within 30 days from the date of receiving the reward notification, the informant must go to the designated location in the reward notification with his or her valid ID to collect the reward. Failure to collect within the time limit will be deemed as automatic abandonment.

(4) The reporters should truthfully report the clues they know about illegal and criminal activities involving xie jiao. If, in the name of reporting, you make false accusations and frame others, fraudulently seek rewards, blackmail the person being reported, fabricate and disseminate false information, lie about reporting information, etc., the public security organs will investigate the legal responsibility of the perpetrator in accordance with the law.

Smuggled Protest videos offer a rare glimpse at resistance in occupied Tibet

13 April 2024, Waging NonViolence

Screenshots of videos depicting Tibetan monks and citizens protesting evictions and a hydropower dam – against a background photo of Derge and the Drichu river.

Under the cover of darkness, the monks were evicted. Amid the freezing temperatures of late February, they knelt, prostrated and wept before a group of Chinese police officers, their sacred red robes ablaze against the black state uniforms.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

In videos captured and sent out of eastern occupied Tibet – an act that in and of itself can warrant jail time – monks and citizens pleaded to protect a life-sustaining river, to preserve their ancient monasteries and to save the tight-knit communities of Derge, in the mountainous Kham region. But by day, and by night, outside of the monasteries and inside the town centers, monks, nuns and residents were arrested one by one. In the following weeks, the list of alleged crimes would run long, but on Feb. 23 more than a thousand Tibetans were arrested for protesting.

Drimey, a Tibetan in exile who has asked to be identified by his first name only, watched these videos in horror. Monks are highly respected in Tibet, but what he saw – desperate people begging on their knees – was saddening, almost denigrating, to someone from a highly reverent culture. Hailing from the town of Wongpo Tok (one of the sites of the arrests), Drimey crossed the Himalayas on foot in 1999 to pursue Tibetan and religious studies not accessible in his home under occupation. Now, he is watching from afar as his community is criminalized, his town is submerged and his religion is desecrated.

"I have known those mountains and those roads," he said through a translator. "I have known everything." About a week before the arrests in early February, just across the mountain from Wongpo Tok, some 300 people gathered outside the Derge County Seat – home to the Chinese Communist Party's provincial office – to protest the construction of the Kamtok Hydropower project. Slated to straddle the banks of the Drichu River, the headwaters of Asia's 3,915-mile Yangtze River, the hydropower dam will not only strangle the river's winding route but forcibly displace thousands of Tibetans. According to a 2019 report from the International Campaign for Tibet, the hydropower project is one of 25 dams set to carve through the Tibetan plateau and generate "clean" electricity.

A parallel situation is also unfolding in Amdo county where the Chinese government recently announced plans to relocate the historic Atsok Monastery and surrounding communities to make way for another large-scale hydropower project. Tibetans told Radio Free Asia that in the wake of this news, residents gathered at the monastery to pray while monk leaders were told to accept the relocation plan and promise not to protest.

"These huge dams are not for Tibetans," said Dr. Lobsang Yangtso, the programme and environment coordinator at International Tibet Network, a global coalition of Tibet-centered organizations based in Berkeley, California. "It's a colonial mentality where these resources are to be consumed by mainland China.”

Tibet has a long history of nonviolent resistance dating back to 1959, around 10 years after China’s occupation. Under extreme repression, the country’s monasteries have become a driving force behind nonviolent actions including peaceful demonstrations and poster campaigns that, in recent years, have become less frequent given the grave consequences. While it’s largely unknown how the February protests were organized, videos sent out of the country have offered a rare glimpse into nonviolent resistance in occupied Tibet in 2024. In video clips, Tibetans can be seen peacefully gathering, chanting and, in some instances, holding up two thumbs – a gesture that expresses an appeal for pity. In others, Tibetans are shown waving the Chinese national flag. According to Tenzin Norgay, a research analyst at International Campaign for Tibet, this was an attempt to show that they are not separatists, as they are likely to be labeled, but simply expressing their concerns and desire to be heard.

That desire for discussion is internationally known as free, prior and informed consent, or FPIC – a right enshrined in the U.N. Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples and applicable to Tibetans. While this is an imperfect process in much of the world, China has among the highest levels of development-related displacement despite resettlement being labeled as 100 percent voluntary. In the same way that protest is silenced and information restricted under Chinese occupation, “consent” is usually achieved without consultation and through coercion. True FPIC is an “absolute luxury,” said Norgay, and there are few mechanisms through which Tibetans can voice their concern or opposition to state projects and policies.

Globally, hydropower projects from Honduras to the Philippines have been a violent frontline for environmental defenders. According to a 2019 study drawing data from the Global Environmental Justice Atlas, resistance to hydropower projects is met with a similar pattern of violence as other extractive industries, including oil and mining. In 2009, six women in Tibet were shot during demonstrations against a hydropower project according to the Tibetan government in exile, now based in Dharamshala, India. In Derge, more recently, some of the charges enumerated by the Chinese government in the wake of these recent demonstrations include fines and imprisonment for protesting against government initiatives, distributing pamphlets and shouting slogans.

“When we think of environmental defenders, there is no more visceral scene than hundreds of Tibetans begging on their hands and knees to protect their environment knowing full well that they’re risking arrest and imprisonment,” said Topjor Tsultrim, the communications coordinator at Students for a Free Tibet, an organization that works in solidarity with the Tibetan struggle. “It’s the same issue and the same mindset as defenders in the Amazon coming up against the impossibly large forces of government or corporations.”

In Derge, as internet access became even more restricted and cell phones were confiscated, arrested Tibetans – including those who had simply enquired about their loved ones – were told to bring their own bedding and tsampa (a barley flour staple). The sheer number of arrests in a single day meant detainees could not be imprisoned in local jails but were sent across occupied Tibet and into China’s Sichuan province. Jail conditions are poor with overcrowded cells, scarce food and, in the winter, a cold that can strike to the bone. In these conditions, one-on-one interrogations are constant and physical violence – such as beatings, thrashings and, in extreme cases, torture – is used as a tactic to elicit information.

According to reports out of Tibet, several detainees were beaten so badly they required hospitalization. The goal of these interrogations is to single out the alleged organizers, Norgay said, and it’s likely officials already have. While there are no specific figures, most detainees are believed to have been released in late March, except for a village official and the administrator of the Wonto monastery.

“The Chinese authorities don’t like organizers so I’m expecting they will get around 10 years in prison, maybe even more,” he said. “They are thought of as the ringleaders who are basically revolting against the state.”

Despite the repression that followed these protests, Tibetans – both in the occupied country and in exile – know what is at risk should the hydropower project continue. The Wongpo Tok of Drimey’s memory is one of summertime wildflowers, free-flowing rivers and peaks that stretch towards the sky. It is a place where the farmers cultivate their crops twice a year, where the nomads herd their cattle across the grasslands and where every family has more than a hundred yak and geese. Monasteries are centers of language, culture, religion and education. Lamas are venerated, mountains revered. The Drichu River is a source of life. For Drimey, the community of Wongpo Tok is pleasant, prosperous and alive. But relocation, Drimey said, will destroy the community, as well as knowledge of the land, mountains and waters passed down from one generation to the next.

“People have a strong attachment to the land,” Drimey said. “If it goes underwater, they will lose everything forever.”

For many communities across Tibet, everything has already been lost. In recent years, Chinese policies operating under the guise of “poverty alleviation” or “ecological restoration” have been leveraged to displace thousands of Tibetans from their ancestral homelands. Two years ago, more than 17,000 people were resettled nearly 250 miles from their community as part of the state’s “very high-altitude ecological relocation plan.” The policy, introduced in 2018, stipulates that by 2025, 130,000 Tibetans will have been relocated. Bused en-masse to government-constructed housing akin to “boxes,” according to Norgay, forced resettlement means the loss of traditional farming knowledge, the erasure of nomadic ways of life and the unmooring of a strongly Buddhist people from the center of their faith.

“Tibetan towns are built around monasteries,” Tsultrim said. “They are the heartbeats of the community.”

According to reports, the Kamtok Hydropower project is expected to submerge six monasteries, including Wonto, the scene of some of the arrests. These monasteries, long protected and preserved by monks and lamas, are not only the spiritual center of a community but also home to Tibetan Buddhist murals dating back to the 13th century. After China fully occupied Tibet in 1959 and throughout China’s Cultural Revolution, more than 97 percent of monasteries and nunneries were destroyed, according to the 10th Panchen Lama, writing in 1962. The destruction of these ancient monasteries is more than a cultural and religious loss – it’s another means of dismantling what it is to be Tibetan.

“For the state, a dam is an important symbol of modernity,” Norgay said. “But for local Tibetans, these cultural artifacts – monasteries and murals – signify their identity.”

At the heart of that identity is a way of life that for centuries has preserved the delicate balance of the Tibetan plateau and what is often known as the “Third Pole.” Glaciers in Tibet act as a water storage tower for Asia, holding the third-largest store of water ice in the world. This glacial melt then feeds some of south and southeast Asia’s largest rivers, including the Ganges and the Mekong, which around 1.5 billion people rely upon.

Large-scale dams across Tibet, including the potential Kamtok, also drain the Tibetan plateau to generate electricity. But Tibet is a country on the frontlines of climate change, perhaps more so than any other, as temperatures are rising two to four times higher than the global average. Because of that, glaciers are melting rapidly, threatening the future water supply while below-average rainfall has already impacted China’s current hydropower generation despite the constant construction of more dams.

This investment in hydropower, as well as solar and wind, is part of China’s plan to transform itself from the world’s largest emitter of greenhouse gasses to a leader in climate change action. By 2030, the Chinese government plans to peak carbon emissions and become carbon neutral by 2060. Alongside clean energy investments, the government has been quietly mining the plateau for minerals such as gold, copper and lithium, which are essential to the green transition. These extractive processes – protected by checkpoints, prohibited for Tibetans and often undertaken at night – can pollute the soil, air and water, said Yangtso from the International Tibet Network.

Given that Tibet largely exists in a media blackout and the consequences of sending even a photo out of the region are dire, it’s difficult to monitor the environmental impacts of these projects. But the plundering of resources – from water to lithium – also raises the question: Is climate change mitigation under occupation simply a greenwashing of human rights abuses?

“There’s no value of the Tibetan people and no respect for traditional knowledge or the ecosystem,” Yangtso said. “The Chinese government just wants to exploit the natural resources as much as possible. They see Tibet as a solution for their global climate goals.”

At an international level, the recent protests and human rights abuses have not gone unnoticed. Tibetans in exile, from northern India to London, protested in solidarity with those arrested. Thousands more across Europe and the U.S. joined for Tibetan Uprising Day, which commemorates the lives lost during the 1959 protests against China’s occupation. Thanks to the efforts of organizers, a new bipartisan House resolution recently recognized the 65th anniversary of the Tibetan Uprising Day and condemned the human rights violations in Derge.

While there is some uncertainty as to whether the Kamtok Hydropower Project will be constructed, organizations have continued their advocacy work through petition writing and lobbying Western governments to pressure China. Meanwhile, the videos captured in Tibet, which people knowingly risked personal safety to send outside of the country, have circulated on social media and in international news. It is this assertion of autonomy under occupation that has not only revealed the cost of protest under repression but served as a reminder that – despite the consequences – there remains power in dissent.

“This dam may be built, they may get arrested, but one thing within their control is to get this news out into the world,” Tsultrim said. “To show people that this is the reality of what’s going on inside China’s occupied Tibet, this is the reality for Tibetans.”

Historic Tibetan Buddhist monastery is being moved to make way for dam

12 April 2024, Pelbar, Tenzin Pema and Gai Tho, RFA

Atsok Monastery in Dragkar county, Tsolho Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, in western China's Qinghai province, in an undated picture.

Authorities have begun relocating a 19th-century Tibetan Buddhist monastery in China that is expected to be submerged under water after the completion of the world's tallest 3D-printed hydropower dam, two sources from the region told Radio Free Asia.

The expansion of the Yangqu hydropower station on the Yellow River – known as the Machu River among the Tibetans – in Qinghai province was started in 2022 and will be completed later this year.

For the past two years, monks from Atsok Gon Dechen Choekhorling Monastery in Dragkar county, or Xinghai in Chinese, have petitioned authorities to rescind relocation orders issued by China's National Development and Reform Commission, or NDRC, a Tibetan source said, insisting on not being identified to protect his safety.

But in April 2023 the government's Department of National Heritage declared that the artifacts and murals inside the monastery were of "no significant value or importance" and that its relocation would proceed, he said.

Chinese authorities have announced to local residents that they will fund the costs of dismantling and reconstructing the monastery, and performing ceremonies and rituals at the relocated area, the sources said.

However, many of the murals and surrounding stupas cannot be physically moved and so will be destroyed.

Tibetans also believe that the place is sacred: That it has been made holier over 135 years of prayers and practice by generations in the same venue.

Disregard for cultural heritage

The dam's construction, Tibetans say, is yet another example of Beijing's disregard for their culture, religion and environment.

Videos obtained by RFA showed a relocation ceremony being held earlier this month outside Atsok Monastery while authorities addressed local residents from a stage flanked by trucks and cranes on both sides.

"The resettlement work could begin with the government's approval and the support of the local population," a local Chinese official can be heard saying in one video.

Other footage obtained by RFA show scores of Tibetan residents praying and prostrating themselves on the road and in the fields before stupas near Atsok Monastery in what sources said was their way of "bidding farewell to this ancient monastery that has been their place of devotion for generations of Tibetans."

The monastery, founded in 1889 and named after its founder Atsok Choktrul Konchog Choedar, is home to more than 160 monks. In 2021, the government issued an order forbidding monks under the age of 18 from enrolling or studying and living in the monastery.

And while authorities have announced that the monks and residents of nearby villages will be relocated to Khokar Naglo, near Palkha township, no alternative housing has been built for the monks, the sources said.

Seizing land

Tibetans often accuse Chinese companies and officials of improperly seizing land and disrupting the lives of local people, sometimes resulting in standoffs that are violently suppressed.

In February, police arrested more than 1,000 Tibetans, including monks, who had been protesting the construction of a dam in Dege county in Sichuan's Kardze Autonomous Tibetan Prefecture, that would submerge at least six monasteries and force several villages to be moved.

The NDRC said the Yangqu dam will force the relocation of 15,555 people – nearly all ethnic Tibetans – living in 24 towns and villages in three counties – Dragkar, Kawasumdo and Mangra. Dragkar county sits in Tsolho, or Hainan in Chinese, Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in the historic Amdo region of Tibet.

They warned the head of the monastery and residents that they "will be punished for any disturbance caused," the sources said.

The Yangqu hydroelectric plant – expected to generate about 5 billion kilowatts of power annually to Henan province – is an expansion of the Yangqu Dam that was first built in 2010 and began operating in 2016 as a 1,200-megawatt hydropower station.

The expanded hydropower dam is expected to be the world's tallest structure built with 3D printing, as detailed by scientists in the Journal of Tsinghua University.

The first section of the dam, said to be over 150 meters (about 500 feet) tall, is scheduled to become operational this year, and the entire project operational the following year.

Chinese police mass killing: Over 20 lives lost in peaceful protests in Lhasa, Tibet

11 April 2024, Tenzin Lhadon, The Tibet Post

Lhasa Norm Lhasa Normal School (ལྷ་ས་འཁྲུག་རྒྱུ་མཐོ་སྒྲིལ་སྡེ་སློང་སྐྱེད་སྡེ།), Lhasa, Capital of Tibet. (Photo:file)

Emerging sources say that armed Chinese police in Lhasa, the capital of Tibet, have cracked down over 500 Tibetan students who were demonstrating peacefully in the school; over 20 students were beaten to death; of them, two were killed on the spot by police using truncheons; several of them were trampled to death as they tried to escape police pursuit; and four students jumped from a building to protest the closure of the school.

Approximately 500 Tibetan students at Lhasa Normal School (ལྷ་ས་འཁྲུག་རྒྱུ་མཐོ་སྒྲིལ་སྡེ་སློང་སྐྱེད་སྡེ།), located approximately 7 km from the central city of Lhasa, the capital of Tibet, peacefully staged a sit-in in the school playground on March 16, 2024, to protest the school's closure for four months, the extreme controls imposed on students, and demand to see the principal, but they were met by hundreds of armed Chinese police, emerging sources said. Chinese police, with arms and truncheons, inhumanely tortured the peaceful student demonstrators for staging protests over their school closure for over two months; two students were killed on the spot; four students jumped from the building; and several other students were trampled as they tried to run among the students when chased by the police brutality of beatings, resulting in the total death of more than 20 students, the sources stressed.

This incident came after the closure of Tibetan colleges and universities in Tibet by the government of China, began on March 14, 2008, after thousands of Tibetans from all three traditional Provinces of Tibet staged peaceful protests against the Chinese repressive policies towards Tibetan people in Tibet, which were violently repressed by armed police, causing the killing, injuring, and arrests of several hundred Tibetans, many of whom were facing heavy long-term imprisonments, said a source seeking to remain anonymous for fear of arrest and torture.

The source told TPI that "the closures of Tibetan colleges and universities have become an 'old fashion'" and have been going on for the last 16 years, which usually happen for a month or two months; the college implemented the measure every year, but this year imposed a four-month closure, causing anger among students for missing one semester, resulting in mass student protests."

Before school crackdowns, a group of students approached the school principal with a petition signed by 120 students concerning the closure for four months, which was not only rejected and angrily tore up but also sanctioned severely after school officials, led by the principal, raided from class to class to find all the signatories of the petition, the source continued. The students then appealed to the state-owned Chinese media to raise the issue, which obscured all the students seeking resolution to the problem, which led, with no other options, to turn to overseas media, resulting in immediate alert and wider campus sweeps by Chinese police, putting all colleges and universities in the region under tighter control, the sources stressed.

The sources further added that "students are currently under tightened police control, under constant surveillance, and arbitrarily arrested for having contact with the outside world, as well as forced to swipe their faces and punch their cards to better track their daily movements by schools."

The sources further stated that "the revelation of this year's prolonged closure initially came from a female student at the school, who disclosed the information with "western media," which led to her arrest by the police and her whereabouts remaining unknown, which triggered a large-scale mapping exercise subsequently conducted by both the school and police involving thousands of Tibetan students."

The New Tang Dynasty TV, run by the Falun Gong new religious movement, also reported in detail and stated that "some students tried to request the principal to reduce the closure time, but they were threatened, with the principal claiming that if they continued to protest, the police would be called in to arrest the students for "Anti-state Crime" or "espionage crime"."

"Following the events, more than thirty students were detained, allegedly linked to their use of the internet to access Gmail for university applications, escalated by the national mailbox's frequent failure to receive crucial correspondence, and monitored extensively by the school, employing CCTV cameras and forcing an app installation named "Canteen Map Net" on their phones to track activities and movements, the report continued.

"This surveillance and tracking measures extend to daily location tracking through the app, with students obligated to provide detailed whereabouts; failure to comply results in late-night calls from school authorities, often involving police inquiries, and persecution of the students in Lhasa by the CCP, which triggered one brave decision to expose the truth to foreign media, hoping to rally international support for the students' rescue," it concluded.

China blocks popular Tibetan-language blog

08 April 2024, RFA

The Chinese government has shut down a popular Tibetan-language blog, angering residents of Tibet and members of the Tibetan exile community who rely on it for access to Tibetan content.

In a statement issued on April 2, the administrator of Luktsang Palyon, or "Tibet Sheep" in English, said the website and its related WeChat blog had been blocked by authorities for alleged copyright infringement and that he has filed a formal appeal for authorities to restore it.

"The government has completely blocked access to Luktsang Palyon," said the administrator, who did not want to be named for safety reasons.

Over the past few years, Chinese authorities have ramped up efforts to restrict the use of the Tibetan language, with clampdowns on related blogs, schools, websites, social media platforms, and apps, as Beijing pushes ahead with assimilation policies in Tibet.

Collage of logos of the popular online Tibetan-language blog Luktsang Palyon and a screenshot of its April 2, 2024, statement announcing its closure by Chinese authorities and its subsequent appeal for restoration of the blog. (Citizen journalist)

Even though the administrator has formally requested that authorities reverse the order, there's little hope that the situation will change, said a person inside Tibet who is familiar with the matter and who also declined to be named.

If restored, Luktsang Palyon will ensure the rights of writers are upheld, but if the request is declined, it will "fully comply with the decision of the government," the administrator said in a statement.

The platform also emphasized the importance of copyright protection and the authenticity of the content published on its blog.

Established in March 2013, Luktsang Palyon has focused on topics related to Tibetan language and culture, and has built up a loyal community of readers as a source for writings by Tibetans both inside and outside Tibet.

It has published about 10,000 pieces of educational content, Tibetan articles and stories, music lyrics, Tibetan-Chinese translations and audio content.

"Shutting down this platform is a matter of significant loss and concern for the Tibetan scholarly community as it has been a constant source to access content," said Beri Jigme Wangyal, a literature professor and author at the Central University of Tibetan Studies in Varanasi, India. Authorities have blocked other Tibetan-language online platforms in recent years.

In 2022, the China-based language learning app Talkmate and video-streaming service Bilibili removed the Tibetan and Uyghur languages from their sites following a directive issued by Chinese authorities. Later that same year, the creators of a popular Tibetan-language short video-sharing app called GangYang shut it down, citing financial reasons.

ལུག་ཁྲོང་དཔལ་ཡོན་གྱི་ཁྱིམ་གནིམ། 羊兄乐园的家园 བོད་སྐད་ཡིག་ལམ་ནས་དེ་གོ་གོ་
འཛོལ་ལུག་ས་པོ་ཞིག་བསྐྱར་ཆེད་དུ་ཐུག་པར་གསུམ་དུ་འབད་བཞིན་ཡོད་ 致力于创建更
美好的藏文网络生活

The Tibetan-language platform Luktsang Palyon served as a vital hub for content from Tibetans inside and outside Tibet. (Citizen journalist)

Rights groups, however, said the move was likely prompted by a Chinese government order to close the app as authorities ratcheted up efforts to restrict Tibetans from using their own language.

Lone Tibetan Protester Calling for Return of Dalai Lama Detained Incommunicado in Ngaba

08 April 2024, TCHRD

Chinese authorities have detained incommunicado a Tibetan monk from the local Kirti Monastery for staging a peaceful solo protest against repressive policies in Ngaba (Ch: Aba) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Sichuan Province, in the Tibetan province of Amdo.

On 26 March, a Tibetan monk named Pema was arbitrarily detained and subjected to incommunicado detention by the local Public Security Bureau Officers for staging a peaceful solo protest by holding a portrait of the Dalai Lama on the stretch of a road known to the local Tibetans as 'martyrs road' in Ngaba County. Local witnesses reported hearing Pema shouting slogans calling for the "Return of His Holiness the Dalai Lama to Tibet" and "Religious Freedom in Tibet," among others.

Pema, who is in his 50s, is a native of Soruma village in Ngaba County. He is the son of Toepa and the cousin of political prisoner Gendun Choephel, who was incarcerated during the 2008 protest. Pema serves as a primary teacher at the Kirti Monastery while pursuing higher Buddhist studies. He is widely known in the monastery as Gen Pema (English: Teacher Pema).

Following Pema's arbitrary arrest, Chinese security forces have intensified their control and restrictions in Ngaba County, especially in Soruma village and Kirti Monastery.

A source informed TCHRD that "prior to deleting his WeChat account, Chinese authorities contacted individuals on his contact list, seeking information about their identities. His personal WeChat is now inaccessible and has been deleted."

On several occasions, Pema has confronted the local police authorities for pressuring young monks to be enrolled in state-run schools and forcing them to stop attending the Kirti monastic school.

March is considered a 'politically sensitive' month by Chinese authorities because of the 10 March anniversary of the Tibetan National Uprising Day that led to the exile of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and thousands of Tibetans since 1959. The annual sessions of the National People's Congress (NPC) and the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC) are also held the same month, leading to heightened restrictions in all parts of Tibet. The Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) is gravely concerned about Pema's fate and whereabouts. His current location remains a mystery, and we call for his immediate and unconditional release. Chinese authorities must also disclose Pema's whereabouts and condition to his family members without delay and guarantee his physical and mental well-being.

Wang Junzheng instructs central media in Tibet to promote Tibet propaganda

08 April 2024, International Campaign For Tibet

On April 8, Wang Junzheng, secretary of the Party Committee of the Tibet Autonomous Region, convened a meeting with the heads of Chinese central media operating in Tibet. During the session, Wang emphasized the importance of implementing CCP General Secretary Xi Jinping's directives on the promotion of ideological work and cultivation of a favorable public opinion for a "socialist modern New Tibet." Throughout the discussion, representatives from the Chinese central media outlets in Tibet shared insights and exchanged practices regarding propaganda and reporting. Wang Junzheng commended the central media for its correct political direction and conducting extensive, multi-faceted propaganda campaigns. Highlighting the significance of the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China and the 65th anniversary of Tibet's democratic reform, Wang stressed the pivotal role of the Chinese state media in shaping public perceptions and narratives.

While the party secretary gave his political instructions to the Chinese media operating in Tibet, the Foreign Correspondent's Club of China coincidentally issued a damning report of media freedom in China on April 8. The FCCC's report "Masks Off, Barriers Remain" states in its findings that:

- Almost all respondents (99%) said reporting conditions in China rarely or never met international reporting standards.

- Four out of five (81%) respondents said they had experienced interference, harassment or violence.

- 54% of respondents were obstructed at least once by police or other officials (2022: 56%), and 45% encountered obstruction at least once by persons unknown (2022: 36%).

- A majority of respondents had reason to believe the authorities had possibly or definitely compromised their WeChat (81%), their phone (72%) or placed audio recording bugs in their office or home (55%).

- Almost a third (32%) of respondents said their bureau was understaffed because they have been unable to bring in the required number of new reporters.

- 82% of respondents reported they had interviews declined by sources who stated they were not permitted to speak to foreign media or required prior permission.

- More than a third (37%) of respondents said reporting trips or interviews already confirmed were canceled last minute because of official pressure (2022: 31%).

-49% of respondents indicated their Chinese colleague(s) had been pressured, harassed or intimidated at least once (2022: 45%; 2021: 40%).

CPC launches education campaign on Party discipline

07 April 2024, The State Council The People's Republic of China

The General Office of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee has issued a circular to launch a Party-wide campaign on CPC discipline education.

During the campaign, running from April to July, CPC members will be studying the newly revised Party regulations on disciplinary action, to strengthen their discipline awareness and always remain loyal, clean and responsible, according to the circular.

Stressing that the education should focus on integrating into everyday work and be consistently implemented, the circular urges discussions among Party members on the study, as well as efforts to use typical violation cases as cautionary lessons so that Party members will understand the bottom line and respect the rules.

The circular also calls on Party committees at all levels to meticulously carry out the education, and warns against pointless formalities.

China denies knowledge of monk it arrested for protesting with Dalai Lama portrait

06 April 2024, Tibetan Review

Chinese police have arrested a Tibetan Buddhist monk in Ngaba (or Ngawa, Chinese: Aba) county of Kardze (Ganzi) prefecture in Sichuan province last month when he staged a lone protest against government policies, carrying a portrait of HH the Dalai Lama, Tibet's exiled spiritual leader, reported rfa.org Apr 5, citing both local and exile sources. It is not clear what slogans the monk, who has been named simply as Pema, shouted. China calls the Dalai Lama a separatist leader even though he only seeks meaningful autonomy for his homeland and has persecuted people for possessing his photos and other publications. The monk was stated to have staged his protest march along the road the local Tibetans refer to as the Pawo Road (Martyrs' Road), after a number of protest self-immolation took place on it since or after the year 2009. The arrest was stated to have been made almost immediately after Pema started his protest march. His condition and whereabouts remain unknown, with the authorities refusing to provide any information to his family.

The monk is stated to be a student of Buddhist philosophy, while also teaching students at the preliminary Buddhist study section, at the local Kirti Monastery, with the county's Suruma Village being his birthplace. The county police, when rung up for information, have denied any knowledge about the monk, even though at least two local Tibetans have confirmed his arrest, speaking on condition of anonymity for safety reasons. The report said that earlier, another Buddhist monk, Tenzin Khenrap, 29, was arrested in Jul 2023 in Nyagchu (Yajiang) county in the same prefecture after they found a photo of the Dalai Lama in his mobile phone, besides other books and documents published outside Tibet. His whereabouts have continued to remain unknown. Before that, in Jun 2023, Lobsang Thabkhey, 54, a librarian in the same monastery, was arrested, accused of republishing books brought out by exile Tibetan establishments, and for maintaining contact with people outside the region.

And well before that, in Feb 2023, Tsultrim, a Tibetan man from Tsaruma township in the prefecture's Ngaba's Kyungchu county, was arrested after Chinese police found pictures of the Dalai Lama on his mobile phone. The local Chinese court later jailed him for two years, the report said.

China-ruled Tibet is second least free country, territory in rights group's annual survey

01 April 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Mar01'24) – With an abysmal -2 out of 40 for Political Rights and just 2 out of 60 for Civil Liberties, China-ruled Tibet has scored a total of zero out of 100 for "Freedom" in the international rights group Freedom House's latest annual survey of Freedom in the World released Feb 29. With a score like that, the group has ranked the occupied territory as "Not Free". In fact, it ranked just above the territory of Nagorno-Karabakh (-3) in this year's global ranking.

Nagorno-Karabakh has been in the news recently due to the violent conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan over territorial sovereignty.

The "zero" rating is Tibet's worst in at last eight years. It had an overall score of 1 in Freedom House's 2023 survey report, noted Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet on its savetibet.org website Feb 29.

China itself has scored -2 for political rights and 11 for civil liberties, so that its overall score is 9; it is therefore also ranked as "Not Free."

Those that ranked above Tibet but with a total score of less than 10 are: Syria (1), South Sudan (1), Turkmenistan (2), Eastern Donbas (2), Crimea (2), North Korea (3), Eritrea (3), Western Sahara (4), Equatorial Guinea (5), Tajikistan (5), Sudan (5), Central African Republic (5), Afghanistan (6), Azerbaijan (7), Somalia (8), Saudi Arabia (8), Myanmar (8), Belarus (8), Gaza Strip (8), Libya (9), and China (9).

The group's 2024 report has highlighted Hong Kong and Tibet as "among the least free places on earth" due to the "exercise of unchecked power."

Yana Gorokhovskaia, research director for strategy and design at Freedom House, has said: "In Tibet last year, the CCP (Chinese Communist Party) separated over a million children from their families and put them in state-run boarding schools, where ... Chinese language and culture was forcefully inculcated."

The rights group's 2024 survey covers the situation of freedom in 210 countries and territories.

The freest countries or territories in the Asia-Pacific region, in comparative terms, New Zealand (99), Japan (96), Australia (95) and Taiwan (94). And the worst in the region are China (9), Myanmar (8), North Korea (3) and Tibet (0).

Both Myanmar and Tibet have lost one point since last year's report.

The annual report gives each country – and many disputed territories – a score from 1 to 100 using 25 specific indicators based on the provisions of the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and then declares them "free," or "partly free", or "not free." Globally, the report said, the "breadth and depth" of the decline in freedoms last year was significant, with political rights and civil liberties having diminished in a total of 52 countries and improved in only 21.

Adrian Shahbaz, the vice president of research and analysis at Freedom House, said at the launch of the report that it was the 18th straight year of declines, noted rfa.org Feb 29.

Freedom House noted that flawed elections and armed conflict contributed to the 18th year of democratic decline. However, by drawing strength from diversity, protecting dissent, and building international coalitions to support their own norms and values, democratic forces can still reverse the long decline in global freedom, it added.

March

Former Tibet official from China awaits sentence for decades-long corruption

22 March 2024, Tibetan Review

Ji Guogang, a Chinese official who has held various senior positions in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) since 2013, including as the former vice-chairman of the Standing Committee of the Regional People's Congress, has pleaded guilty for corruption at a trial held in Chengdu, Sichuan Province, on Mar 21, and will be sentenced later, reported China's official chinadaily.com.cn.

Ji, 61, has pleaded guilty to accepting bribery amounting to about 44 million yuan ($6.11 million) and abuse of power in a trial held by the Intermediate People's Court of Chengdu, the report said.

The report cited prosecutors from the Chengdu People's Procuratorate as saying that from 2002 to 2022, Ji utilized his positions, including as deputy director of the Fixed Asset Investment Department of the National Development and Reform Commission and head of the Xizang Development and Reform Commission, to facilitate entities and individuals in obtaining project approvals and equity transfers. In exchange, he, either directly or through his relatives, has accepted money and property totalling more than 43.98 million yuan.

Also, from 2016 to 2021, while serving as the president and legal representative of the Xizang Development Investment Group, he engaged in favouritism, abuse of power and has caused particularly significant losses to State interests, the report said.

He has been tried for the crimes of bribery and abuse of power and the verdict will be announced later.

Ji was stated to have joined the Chinese government in 1983 and become a Communist Party of China member a year later.

The report further said he previously worked at the National Development and Reform Commission and its predecessor institute from 1983 to 2012. He became the head of the Xizang Development and Reform Commission in Jan 2013 and concurrently served as the vice-chairman of the Standing Committee of the Xizang Regional People's Congress from Nov 2016 until Dec 2022.

He was placed under disciplinary and supervisory investigation in Nov 2022 and expelled from the Party and removed from his public posts in May 2023, the report added.

He was approved for arrest in Jun 2023 and prosecuted three months later.

China's Tibet offers college exam takers a spot if their parents invest $400,000

21 March 2024, Reuters

Tibet is luring investors from elsewhere in China with a promise to let their children take university entrance exams there in return for an investment of at least $400,000, an unusual move to exploit what is considered an easier scoring system.

With a population that is 90% ethnic Tibetan, the region has one of China's lowest college entry barriers, a key edge for the millions of students who take the competitive "gaokao" entrance exams each year, hoping to secure lucrative white-collar jobs.

The plan has sparked debate on Chinese social media, however, with some posters arguing it would be unfair to students from the mountainous region, while others supported it.

"What about the enrolment rate of kids born in Tibet?" asked one user on the popular Weibo platform.

Amid growing concern as the exam approaches in early June, the education ministry issued a notice on Wednesday vowing to crack down on "gaokao migrants", as students seeking to benefit from such a plan have been dubbed.

Reuters telephone calls to the Tibet government to seek comment went unanswered.

Finding jobs has become harder as the world's second-largest economy slows, with the jobless rate hitting a record 21.3% last June among those aged 16 to 24, which includes college students.

Tibet, with a gross domestic product that is less than 2% of the richest province, Guangdong in the south, said this week the qualifying investment of 3 million yuan ($417,000) would have to stay untouched for five years.

China's differing college admission criteria can reflect preferential policies meant for ethnic minorities.

In 2023, a student in Tibet scoring at least 300 out of 750 on the entrance exam would have qualified for an undergraduate place at more than 1,200 universities nationwide.

By comparison, those taking the exam in Beijing would have needed a score of 448.

With qualifying scores partly linked to overall exam performance, an influx of exam takers from provinces with better education resources threatens to drive up Tibet's minimum scores and hurt regional candidates.

China promoting Mandarin in parts of Tibet: Report

21 March 2024, Hindustan Times

The report added that Tibetans face restrictions not only on their right to freedom of assembly, but also on expressing opinions or criticism against the "repressive and unjust government policies, both online and offline"

"Even as China ended its draconian zero-Covid policy measures in 2023, Tibetans continue to face escalating crackdowns on freedom of expression, religion and belief," the Dharamshala-based Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy said in a report.

The annual report released on Wednesday stated that despite numerous calls from the international community to halt its forced assimilation policy, Chinese authorities imposed Chinese-medium education in Tibetan schools and amended local regulations in Tibetan areas to promote Mandarin Chinese.

The Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) is a registered non-profit human rights organisation based in Dharamshala, Himachal Pradesh. The annual report was prepared by TCHRD's trilingual research team, working in Tibetan, Chinese and English. The team compiled and analysed information from a wide variety of sources on the human rights situation in Tibet in 2023.

The report added that Tibetans face restrictions not only on their right to freedom of assembly, but also on expressing opinions or criticism against the "repressive and unjust government policies, both online and offline". Under the guise of maintaining social stability, Chinese authorities exercise direct supervision and censorship over all online platforms.

"The right to freedom of religion and belief faced further restrictions as Chinese authorities introduced more repressive regulations to exercise total control over the establishment, management and activities of the religious activity sites. Despite the relaxation of zero-Covid restrictions, it made no difference to Tibetan Buddhists, who continued to face restrictions in undertaking religious pilgrimages," the report further.

According to the report, Tibetan detainees continue to face a litany of human rights violations. Those arbitrarily, preventatively or forcefully detained underwent unjust sentencing and torture, resulting in custodial deaths. Incommunicado detention in undisclosed locations without due process also remained a regular practice, leading to lasting health issues and premature deaths among political prisoners upon release.

Tenzin Dawa, executive director of TCHRD, said, "In 2023, China was re-elected to the UN Human Rights Council, the United Nation's premier rights body responsible for protecting and promoting human rights globally. This re-election demonstrates how authoritarian states like China manipulate, obstruct and exploit the international human rights system by waging systematic campaigns to weaken and eviscerate the UN's ability to enforce global compliance with international human rights standards."

"The injustices and human rights violations in Tibet underscore the urgent need to address the human rights abuses in Tibet perpetrated by Chinese authorities. The Chinese government must release all Tibetans detained for merely exercising their human rights and political freedoms in the political, economic, social, cultural or any other areas of public life," she said.

2024 Two Sessions show China will continue plans to Sinicize Tibet

19 March 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

The just-concluded annual Chinese political meetings known as the Two Sessions have shown that President Xi Jinping and his administration are turning China into an increasingly ideological security state and continuing their plans to "Sinicize" Tibetan Buddhism, as well as all other aspects of Tibetan life.

National leaders' references to Tibet

This year's annual meetings of China's National People's Congress (NPC) and the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), held between March 4 and March 11, 2024, saw the Chinese leaders unitedly supporting the approach that puts ideology above all other aspects of people's lives. On Tibet, there were some focus from the top leadership, both directly and indirectly, all furthering plans to change the Tibetan identity into that of a Chinese one.

The Chair of the CPPCC Wang Huning, in his report on March 4, 2024, made a direct reference to Tibet. In the fifth point of his report outlining the CPPCC work in the past year, Wang said, "Studied and implemented the Party's strategy for governing Tibet in the new era and the Party's strategy for governing Xinjiang in the new era, and carried out 10 research and inspections in Tibet, Xinjiang, and Tibet-related counties in Sichuan Province on promoting the sinicization of Tibetan Buddhism and promoting the sinicization of Islam in Xinjiang. Strengthened the exchanges, exchanges and integration of various ethnic groups, historical interpretation, publicity and education, and strengthen in-depth research on the awareness education of the Chinese nation community in colleges and universities." [1]

The reference to Tibetan Buddhism is consistent with the Chinese Communist Party's call for the Sinicization of all religions, including Tibetan Buddhism, at the 19th Party Congress in 2017 and the subsequent 2019 five-year plan to Sinicize Buddhism launched by the state-backed Chinese Buddhist Association. Sinicization refers to the process of forcing non-Chinese groups to assimilate into Chinese culture and become loyal to the CCP. Xi Jinping made structural changes in 2018 in the party-state system by putting the notorious United Front Work Department (UFW) in charge of overseeing the implementation of religious policy. Placing a mass organ of the CCP above the state administration has been a regular occurrence recently in several policy fields, especially in discipline inspection.

In his report to the NPC on March 8, 2024, Chair Zhao Leji mentioned the "Law on Ecological Conservation of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau" that was passed in 2023 that "provides legal guarantees for ecological conservation and sustainable development of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau." [2] Zhao added, "we pushed the parties concerned to overhaul relevant normative documents." Zhao also mentioned that this year they will hold a symposium to commemorate the 40th anniversary of the Law on Regional Ethnic Autonomy, which became effective on Oct. 1, 1984 and is the foundational legislation that purportedly provides rights to Tibetans and others considered "ethnic minorities."

Zhao Leji interacting with Tibetan delegates to the 13th NPC in Beijing in 2018

Chinese Premier Li Qiang did not make a direct reference to Tibet in his work report to NPC on March 5, 2024. [3] However, the report included plans that will have an impact on the Tibetan people. Li said, "We will support old revolutionary base areas and areas with large ethnic minority populations in accelerating development, strengthen development of border areas, and advance the program for boosting development and raising living standards in border areas." In Tibet, this program for boosting development had a political agenda and included rural revitalization initiatives that primarily meant intensifying the slaughter rate of yaks and sheep. A fast-spreading viral infection had started in 2018 in China and resulted in the deaths of almost half its hogs, either from disease or compulsory culling to contain the viral spread. As China urgently needed to boost meat supply, and with obvious sources of pork imports, including the USA, off the agenda for political reasons, yak meat from Tibet became a target. The process was put within the strategy for promoting rural revitalization.

Li added, "We will, with a focus on forging a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation, uphold and improve the system of regional ethnic autonomy, promote interaction, exchange, and integration among all ethnic groups, and speed up the modernization drive in ethnic minority regions."

Confirming the concerns about the CCP's intention to Sinicize Tibetan Buddhism, Li also said, "We will adhere to the Party's basic policy on religious affairs, ensure that religions in China must be Chinese in orientation, and provide guidance to religions so that they can adapt themselves to our socialist society.”

President Xi Jinping did not address the plenary sessions of both the NPC and the CPPCC, but he did address meetings of delegations, though none of them were Tibetan. During the “Two Sessions” in 2021, Xi participated in the deliberations of the Qinghai delegation and even recalled his visit to Yushu after the earthquake of 2010.[4]

Spotlight on economic disparity in Tibet

Although not intended by the Chinese authorities, this year’s Two Sessions put the spotlight on the critical fact that Chinese policies on Tibet have failed even on non-political fields like the economy. Tibet has not become economically self-reliant even after more than six decades of Chinese claims of development.

Specifically, a statement by the Tibet Autonomous Region Governor Yan Jinhai reveals that TAR, which China claims has found the “the right path for economic growth,”[5] only survives economically even in 2024 because of Beijing’s subsidy. During the open group meeting of the Tibetan delegation to the NPC on March 6, Yan appeared proud of “high-quality economic development” but revealed the reality when he said, “central government fiscal subsidies to Tibet have cumulatively reached over 1.7 trillion yuan ($236 billion), which makes up 90.3% of Tibet government finances.”[6]

Yan added, “Last year alone, the central government’s fiscal transfers to Tibet exceeded 250 billion yuan ($34.7 billion), which per capita equals over 100,000 yuan ($13,890). This is the highest out of all China’s 31 provinces, regions and municipalities.”

Previous Chinese official statements have confirmed this lamentable economic condition of the TAR. In 2015, they said that from 1952 to 2013, subsidies to the TAR reached 544.6 billion yuan, accounting for 95% of its finances.[7]

It is estimated that financial aid from the central budget totaled 1.24 trillion yuan from 1980 to 2018, making up 91 percent of its finances.[8]

In 2015, Tibet watcher Andrew M. Fischer wrote, “Analysts and scholars – including Chinese economists and social scientists – have long been critical of Beijing’s development strategy in Tibet. A heavy dependence on state subsidies to maintain high levels of economic growth cause economic inefficiencies and social inequalities.”[9] The fact that this situation continues even in 2024, nine years later, indicates that fundamentally the Chinese authorities have failed to provide stable economic development in TAR.

Fischer also states that Qinghai, which contains most of the Tibetan area of Amdo, is the next most subsidized province under the People’s Republic of China.

Stability, development, ecology and strong borders as focus areas for 2024

While the Two Sessions were taking place, Wang Junzheng, the TAR party secretary, outlined the Chinese leadership’s plans for this year. Participating in People’s Daily Online’s “My Message to the Two Sessions” program, Wang said on March 6, “In 2024, we will adhere to Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era to govern the overall work in Tibet, fully and accurately implement the Party’s strategy for governing Tibet in the new era, focus on the ‘four major issues’ of stability, development, ecology, and strong borders, and strive to promote Tibet continues to take new steps towards long-term peace and stability and high-quality development.”[10]

Similarly, participating in the TAR delegation meeting on March 6, Wang emphasized implementation of the party’s decisions to achieve the party’s goals of “long-term stability and high-quality development”; the former a perennial goal and the later a goal since the 20th Party Congress in October 2022. Wang’s discourse, with keywords such as “grassroots governance,” “rural revitalization” and “people’s livelihood,” indicates the party’s continued focus on Tibet’s rural areas and tweaking the governance model.[11]

Beijing leaders at this year’s Tibet-related meetings

On March 6, the TAR delegation to the NPC held a plenary meeting, which was attended by Zhang Guoqing, a member of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and a vice premier. Zhang is, interestingly, a delegate to the 14th NPC assigned to the TAR and had also participated in the TAR delegation meeting in the 2023 Two Sessions, too.

State media also reported that Huang Runqiu, minister of Ecology and Environment, and Sun Yeli, minister of the Ministry of Culture and Tourism, attended the TAR delegation meeting this year. However, there is no report that Pan Yue, vice minister of the Central United Front Work Department and director of the National Ethnic Affairs Commission, who attended last year’s TAR delegation meeting, did so this year.

Drinking death of a Tibetan party leader raised at Qinghai delegation meeting

Chinese state media reported that on March 6, at the open group meeting of the Qinghai delegation, Chen Gang, Qinghai party secretary, had to respond to queries concerning the revelation of a senior provincial Tibetan leader’s death due to excess drinking during a Chinese Communist Party-organized event in December 2022. As the International Campaign for Tibet reported in May 2023, in the evening of Dec. 11, 2022, Dorjee, the party secretary of Tsojang prefecture and a member of the Qinghai Provincial Party Committee, died following a drinking stint with fellow cadres. The issue raised much public concern.[12] Chen is reported to have said, "This incident, which seriously violated the spirit of the central government's eight regulations, is a 'sore spot' and 'injured spot' for Qinghai cadres." [13]

Cai Qi, member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and secretary of the Secretariat of the CPC Central Committee, attended the Qinghai delegation meeting on March 7, state media reported.

Increased surveillance of Tibetans expected

On Feb. 27, 2024, days before this year's Two Sessions, China's National People's Congress approved the revision to the Law on Guarding State Secrets, introducing a clause that gives officials the leeway to deem any information as a state secret. [14]

Article 64 of the amended law states, "Organs and units are to apply work secrets management measures and employ the necessary protective measures for matters generated or obtained by organs or units in the course of performing their functions that are not state secrets but would cause a definite adverse impact after leaking. Provisions on the management of work secrets are to be provided separately."

"Leaking state secrets" has been one of the spurious charges used by China to detain and control Tibetans. The amended law would only make it easier for the authorities to exploit it in their "stability management" of Tibetans. It is possible that the authorities will use this law against those Tibetans in Derge who are highlighting the negative impact of the hydropower dam project in their area, some information of which has been circulating in the international media. This law will take effect on May 1, 2024.

China still not confident in Tibet

Despite all their claims in meetings during this year's Two Sessions and all the coercive measures they've used to control the Tibetan people for the past several decades, the Chinese authorities still lack the confidence that the Tibetan people support their initiatives. Therefore, in the period before the Two Sessions, the timing of which also fell during the anniversary of the Tibetan National Uprising, there was a noticeable escalation of security measures in areas of Tibetan residence.

In the Tibetan capital Lhasa, a virtual meeting was held by the Lhasa City Stability Maintenance Command on Feb. 26[15] "to do a good job of maintaining stability and security during the two sessions." County leaders, temple management committees and various stability maintenance units were instructed to attend the security meeting.

This meeting appears to focus on suppressing dissent and tightening control rather than addressing genuine security concerns. There was emphasis on political vigilance with focus on "enhancing political position" and aligning thoughts with party directives. The officials were asked to investigate issues like submission of petitions and to nip them in the bud.

Similarly, on Feb. 29, Chen Yongqi, deputy secretary of the TAR Party Committee and executive vice chairman of the TAR government, addressed a meeting in Chushul (Qushui) county in Lhasa City, where he emphasized that everyone "must conscientiously implement the work arrangements of the autonomous region Party committee and the work requirements of the district stability maintenance headquarters, always regard maintaining stability as the first task, implement detailed work measures, and tighten the responsibilities, highlight key areas, strengthen emergency drills, implement operating procedures, resolutely ensure social harmony and stability during the national Two Sessions, and strive to create a good social environment for economic and social development." [16]

Interestingly, an article in the CCP theoretical journal Seeking Truth (Qishi) on March 16, 2024, attributed to the Tibet Autonomous Region Party Committee, says, "Casting a firm sense of Chinese national community is the main line of China's ethnic work, and also a strategic task of Tibet's work."

[17] The article continues, "The Party Committee of the Autonomous Region has firmly established the overall concept of national security, insisting on maintaining stability as its first task, keeping the alarm bells ringing and vigilance constant, and, by means of a scientific mechanism and the concepts of normalization and the rule of law, doing the work of maintaining stability on a daily basis and at the grass-roots level, so as to constantly make the cornerstone of security and development more stable and secure."

Even though independent foreign journalists are not given permission to report from Tibet, a report by a Japanese newspaper from Sichuan's capital Chengdu reveals how Tibetans there had to undergo tightened state control in the period before the Two Sessions. In the middle of February, the Japanese journalist visited the area in Chengdu where Tibetans reside and reported, "heavily armed police officers could be seen stationed at every corner of an intersection, keeping a watchful eye on Tibetan monks and residents." [18]

Tibetan quarter in Chengdu under tight surveillance on uprising anniversary

16 March 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Mar16'24) — As Tibetans and supporters across the free world commemorated the 65th anniversary of their national uprising on Mar 10, there was total blackout on information from Tibet itself as China greatly tightens security ahead of the occasion each year. The security situation was the same in the Tibetan quarter of Chengdu, capital of China's Sichuan province, according to the japannews.yomiuri.co.jp Mar 16.

The report said: "In one area of Chengdu, Sichuan Province, a line of shops sells Tibetan Buddhist altar objects and Tibetan-language books. During a visit in mid-February, heavily armed police officers could be seen stationed at every corner of an intersection, keeping a watchful eye on Tibetan monks and residents."

It added that there were many surveillance cameras. The report found that upon entering a shop for Buddhist objects, there were noticeably more signs written in Chinese than in Tibetan, a result of China's ongoing Sinicization drive.

The report quoted a monk shopping in the store as saying in a low voice, "We have to preserve our religion and culture."

Chengdu is home to a large community of Tibetans, with at least 30,000 permanent Tibetan residents and up to 200,000 Tibetan floating population, according to a report by China's official Xinhua news agency back on Mar 14, 2012 cited in a wikipedia page on Sichuan.

Seen as a gateway to Tibet and located about 2.5 km south west of the city centre, two other Chengdu landmarks in the area appear to have been the reason for the growth of the Tibetan Quarter, said echinacities.com on its page on Chengdu's Tibetan Quarter – Gateway to Tibet. These are stated to be the Kangding Hotel and the South West University of Nationalities. The university offers courses delivered in Tibetan language, and many Tibetan students take advantage of this, it said.

Tibetan prisoner released with disabled leg after forced labour.

14 March 2024, Free Tibet

A Tibetan prisoner named Ludup was released from prison last month with injuries after being made to carry out forced labour during his three-and-a-half-year prison sentence.

A source confirmed Tibet Watch: "Ludup's leg sustained serious damage from the re-education-through-forced labour transformation and his leg is crippled these days. Ludup currently stays at home but he is regularly summoned, interrogated, and given political re-education by Meruma Township police authorities."

Ludup, 54, was arrested in Ngaba County in June 2020, 12 years after he carried out a protest in front of Kirti Monastery in Ngaba on 16 March in 2008, the year that saw unprecedented spate of freedom protests erupt across Tibet.

The same source told Tibet Watch that the authorities had neither informed his family where and which court oversaw his trial, nor were they given any notice about what he was charged with.

Ludup spent the years 2008 to 2020 hiding from the police, who resorted to publishing a public notice calling the townspeople of Meruma in Ngaba to inform them about Ludup and a few other Kirti monks. The notice described them as having participated in an "illegal protest movement."

Following his arrest and trial, he served his sentence in Deyang Prison in Huang Xu Town of Deyang City, Sichuan Province.

Ludup on a wanted order issued by the Public Security Bureau of Ngaba Prefecture

Having lost his identity card during his hiding and a new one not yet reissued, he currently faces difficulties in accessing medical care at hospitals. This is in addition to him being under surveillance and restricted from meeting families and friends even during the Tibetan new year.

54-year-old Ludup (ལུདུཔ།), known by lay name Rinchen Goedoe (རིན་ཆེན་དགེ་ལོ་འདོད།), was enrolled at Kirti Monastery at a very young age, and hails from Samsang family (བསམ་བཟང་ཆང་།) in village number four of Meruma Township (མེ་རུ་མ་རུ་ཆེན་གླི་པ།) in Ngaba County.

Three years on, whereabouts of Tibetan poet is a mystery

14 March 2024, RFA

Gendun Lhundrub was arrested by Chinese police in December 2020.

More than three years after the arrest of a popular Tibetan writer and poet in northwestern China, police have not provided any details about his whereabouts, his sentence or his well-being, despite repeated appeals by his family for information, two sources told Radio Free Asia.

Gendun Lhundrub, a former monk at Rongwo Monastery in Rebgong county of Malho Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in China's Qinghai province, was detained on Dec. 2, 2020.

Authorities did not cite any reasons for his arrest, which followed a long period when police monitored his activities for signs of dissent and opposition to Chinese policies, RFA learned at the time.

Chinese authorities frequently detain Tibetan writers, artists and singers who promote Tibetan national identity and culture or who have criticized China's rule of the western region.

They scrutinize their writings for content considered as "endangering national security" or constituting an "act of separatism," thereby deeming them threats to the ruling Chinese Communist Party.

Lhundrub's relatives have made repeated requests to authorities in Rebgong county to find out where he is and whether he has been sentenced, said one source from inside Tibet.

"However, they have not received any response to their queries," said the source, who declined to be identified for safety reasons.

Whenever the family wants to send items to Lhundrub, officials at the Chinese government's Rebgong county office tell them to leave the items with them, and they will forward them to Lhundrub, he said.

"His well-being is also unclear as no one has been allowed to meet him," the source added.

Additionally, officials have shared no details or documentation as proof of Lhundrub's sentence, both sources said.

Long list

Lhundrub is among those on a long list of well-known Tibetan writers and poets arrested by authorities. In 2016, Tibetan language advocate Tashi Wangchuk was arrested and tortured. He was released in 2021 after being held for two years in pre-trial detention and serving part of a five-year prison sentence.

Gendun Lhundrub was born in 1974 in Rebgong in the traditional Amdo region of Tibet in the northeastern part of the Tibetan Plateau.

He became a monk at a young age and enrolled in the Rebgong Dargye Monastery. He later studied at the Rebgong Rongpo Monastery, Labrang Tashi Kyil and Serta Labrang.

Starting in 1994, he wrote poetry. In October 2022, he released an anthology of poems called "Khorwa," and wrote on the website Waseng-drak that writers and artists require freedom to express their thoughts and emotions without restriction, RFA learned from sources that year.

Lhundrub's collection of poems, which include "Black Rosary," "Melody of Life" and "White Book," and his literary skills are highly regarded by Tibetans around the world.

Tibet boarding schools: China accused of trying to silence language

10 March 2024, BBC News

Tibetan educational sociologist Gyal Lo can speak Mandarin Chinese fluently - but he would rather not.

He has spent the last few years telling the world about Beijing's sweeping educational reforms in Tibetan areas, and would prefer not to use the language of people he identifies as colonial oppressors.

China has expanded the use of boarding schools - for children as young as four - and replaced Tibetan as the main language of tuition with Chinese.

Beijing says these reforms give Tibetan children the best possible preparation for their adult lives, in a country where the main language of communication is Mandarin Chinese.

But Dr Gyal Lo disagrees - he believes Beijing's real aim is to undermine the Tibetan identity, by targeting the very youngest in society.

"They've designed the curriculum that produces a population that will not be able to practise their own language and culture in the future," he said.

"China is using education as a tool to minimise Tibetans' social capacity. No one will be able to resist their rule."

Overseas human rights organisations have for decades been highlighting alleged abuses carried out by China in Tibet - but not much over recent years.

The focus has shifted to Beijing's treatment of Muslim Uyghurs, in China's north-western region of Xinjiang, and the pro-democracy protest movement in Hong Kong.

But activists say Chinese officials have been busy in Tibet too.

Over recent years, the Chinese government has closed village schools - and private ones teaching Tibetan - and expanded the use of boarding schools. These have been in operation for many decades in a number of Chinese regions that are thinly populated - but in Tibetan areas, they appear to have become the main means of education.

Campaigners estimate that 80% of Tibetan children - perhaps one million pupils - are now taught in boarding schools, from pre-school-age onwards.

In a statement to the BBC, the Chinese embassy in London said this policy was necessary.

"Due to a highly scattered population, children have to travel long distances to get to school, which is very inconvenient," it said.

"If schools were to be built in every place the students live, it would be very difficult to ensure adequate teachers and quality of teaching. That is why local governments set up boarding schools."

But opponents say this kind of schooling creates psychological trauma for children who are forcibly separated from their families, who are pressured to send their children away.

"The most challenging aspect of my life was missing my family," said one Tibetan teenager, who attended a boarding school for several years, until she was 10.

She has since fled Tibet and now lives in India. The BBC spoke to her after making contact through a campaign group.

"There were many other children who missed their families and cried too," she said. "Some of the younger ones often woke up in the middle of the night crying, and would run to the school gate."

The BBC spoke to other Tibetan exiles who had heard similar complaints from their relatives still living back home.

Dr Gyal Lo has his own story, about two of his grandnieces, who were sent away to boarding school when they were just four and six.

After observing them at a family dinner, he realised that they felt awkward speaking their mother tongue.

"The way they were sitting there made me think they weren't comfortable sharing the same identity as their family members. They were like guests," he said. It prompted the sociologist, who was then working at the Northwest University for Nationalities in Lanzhou, to visit 50 Tibetan boarding schools to see if other children were the same. They were.

Dr Gyal Lo compares these boarding schools to those that were once operated in the United States, Canada and Australia.

Native children were taken away from their families in a process of assimilation that has now been discredited.

"These kids are completely cut off from their cultural roots, and the emotional connection between their parents, their families and their community," he said. The second major change to the education system concerns the Tibetan language, a rich oral and written tradition going back more than one thousand years.

China has replaced Tibetan as the main language of tuition with Mandarin Chinese.

The Chinese embassy said ethnic minorities in China had "the freedom to use and develop their own spoken and written languages".

But the student the BBC spoke to said only Chinese was encouraged at her school.

"All the classes were taught in Chinese, except for the Tibetan language class. Our school had a big library, but I didn't see any Tibetan books there," she said.

This policy appears to run contrary to international human rights law, according to Professor Alexandra Xanthaki, a UN special rapporteur on cultural rights.

She said parents had the right to send their children to a school that used the language of their choice.

"This means that just one or two hours where it's being taught as a foreign language is not enough," she said.

Just over a year ago, Prof Xanthaki and two other UN rapporteurs wrote a letter to China detailing a series of complaints about its educational reforms in Tibet.

The letter suggested China was trying to "homogenise" ethnic minorities, so they would become more Chinese, with Mandarin seen as the vehicle to achieve that goal.

Dr Gyal Lo remembers an argument he had with the vice-president of a university in Yunnan province, where he went to work after Lanzhou. It illustrates how Chinese is valued above other languages.

"He came to my office one day and said, 'you're producing Tibetan articles, but not Chinese articles'," recalled the sociologist.

"It made me uncomfortable and angry. I told him I don't want produce Chinese articles." The administrator turned red and stormed out.

Shortly after that incident, in 2020, Dr Gyal Lo fled China and now lives in Canada, from where he campaigns to highlight the educational changes taking place in Tibet.

Beijing is vigorously resisting the narrative put forward by activists like him. It has launched a propaganda campaign to convince the world that its reforms are beneficial.

It has also tried to discredit those who say otherwise. Prof Xanthaki was accused by China of spreading fake news. Dr Gyal Lo has been targeted too. His authority to speak on this issue has been questioned in Chinese state media.

Despite that, he remains undeterred, if pessimistic about the future for Tibetan language and culture, and the region's young people.

"Our children are becoming an alienated generation. Many will not be able to fit in either Chinese society or Tibetan society."

China's continued crackdown targets Tibetans who might have sent out Dege dam protest videos

08 March 2024, Tibetan Review

While China released a few dozen Tibetans on Feb 27 after the arrest of more than 1,000 in Dege County of Kardze prefecture in Sichuan province some days earlier, the crackdown continues with those who may have sent out video clips of the hydroelectric power dam protest being especially targeted, said the Tibetan service of rfa.org Mar 7. The report said a monastery administrator and a village official had been transferred to a large, prefecture-level detention centre located in the county.

The Tibetans had protested peacefully and submitted petitions against the project, as it was going to submerge the ancestrally inhabited homes of around 2,000 of them, as well as centuries-old monasteries with priceless artefacts, including murals which would be destroyed. China has made it clear that the project will continue.

Tenzin, the senior administrator of the 13th century Wonto Monastery in Wangbuding township and a village official named Tamdrin were transferred to the larger detention centre on Mar 3, the report said. It said the two were among those severely beaten by the Chinese police after their arrest.

The report said around 40 Tibetans were released on Feb 27 with stipulations forbidding them from communicating with outsiders. Besides strict restrictions have been imposed on the entry and exit of people at the monasteries as well as at the villages on both sides of the Drichu (Chinese: Jinsha) river over which the dam will be built.

Meanwhile the authorities are continuing to arrest more people. In particular, the crackdown targets people who posted videos of the arrests and protests that took place in February, the report said.

"The police are regularly checking people's WeChat and TikTok accounts for any evidence of them having shared the videos and for communication with the outside world," one anonymous source has said. "There's severe restrictions on movement on either side of the river and no internet connection."

Widespread, daily searches and interrogations are reportedly being carried out in attempts to find people who might have posted the widely shared videos of black-uniformed Chinese police restraining petitioning monks, who could be seen kneeling and crying out, the report said.

The police are stated to be monitoring the monks and local Tibetans very closely, with the situation in the county resembling an "open prison as they are exercising extreme control," the report cited a second source as saying

"The monks and local people are very angry that they were arrested and subjected to beatings and torture for making peaceful appeals," the source has added. "They say that if the government really forces them to move, there may be violent protests."

The Gangtuo Dam is part of a plan announced in 2012 by China's National Development and Reform Commission to build a massive 13-tier hydropower complex on the Drichu. It would be located at Wontok (Gangtuo) in Dege county. The total planned capacity of the 13 hydropower stations is 13,920 megawatts.

China's claim of no 'mass incidents' in 'Tibet' last year rejected

07 March 2024, Tibetan Review

China has claimed Mar 6 that there were no "mass incidents" last year in Tibet, a euphemism for protests. But it was obviously referring only to the situation in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), which is roughly the western half of the occupied Himalayan country. It has also vowed to continue the Sinicization of Tibet and its Buddhist religion.

There were no "mass incidents" last year, Reuters Mar 6 cited a senior Tibet official as saying at a briefing on the sidelines of China's annual parliamentary session being held in Beijing.

"Last year no serious mass incidents, political incidents, or violent terrorist acts occurred," the report quoted Yan Jinhai, the region's second-ranked official and government chairman, as saying during a scripted press conference where questions were selected in advance.

Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) has rejected Yan's claim. "Yan's statement is inaccurate and misleading. He's forgetting the thousands of Tibetans who courageously attended a Tibetan Buddhist teaching in Tsoe (Hezuo City, presently under Gansu province) last September, despite a government ban. He's also ignoring the more than 1,000 Tibetans China arrested over peaceful protests in Derge (Dege County, presently under Sichuan province) just last month," ICT president Tencho Gyatso has said Mar 7.

She has also said: "Tibetans have resisted for over 65 years and will continue to resist to protect their religion, language and identity. China has failed to win over the Tibetan people. If China really wants no more protests in Tibet, it should respect Tibetans' basic freedoms."

Like other parts of Tibet, the TAR has a long history of protests against Chinese rule, including one which started in capital Lhasa in 2008 and which at once engulfed most of the Tibetan Plateau region. China's massive armed repression led to massacres of Tibetans and imposition of prison-like controls and restrictions across the land. This in turn led to a spate of protest self-immolations across Tibet since 2009, with the exile Tibetan administration saying 157 of such reported protesters have been confirmed so far. The tight security measures, including a highly intrusive surveillance network, tight information control, and strict movement restrictions still remain in place.

"We have always regarded maintaining national unity and strengthening ethnic solidarity as the focal point of Tibet work," Reuters quoted Yan, an ethnic Tibetan with Chinese name who previously served in neighbouring Qinghai province before being transferred to Lhasa in 2020, as saying.

"We will always adhere to the principle of firmly ... curbing extremism, resisting infiltration and fighting criminality," Yan has said, adding that spoken and written Mandarin Chinese had become "comprehensively widespread" across Tibet, thanks obviously to the Sinicization drive.

He also vowed to "continue advancing the Sinicization of Tibetan Buddhism" and stressed Tibet's "high-quality economic development" in recent years, which improved living standards for many of its 3.6 million residents, the report added.

Over 1,000 people, including monks, arrested for opposing Dege hydropower dam project in Tibet

07 March 2024, Down to Earth

Experts claim monasteries have been put under lockdown; dam will be environmentally detrimental. Over 1,000 citizens and monks of Tibet have been arrested for protesting against a hydropower dam project on the Drichu river in eastern Tibet.

The arrests come in the backdrop of protests that began on February 14, 2024 when 300 Tibetans demonstrated at the Dege County Hall against the proposed hydropower project construction and seeking withdrawal of relocation from the vicinity.

On February 20, the authorities inspected Yena and Wonto monasteries during the preparation for their demolition. A video released by Radio Free Asia showed monks prostrating themselves before the visiting Chinese officials to plead with them to halt the construction of the dam, said a release from the International Tibet Network (ITN).

The Chinese authorities on February 22, arrested more than 100 Tibetans including monks. More arrests followed on February 23, when more than 1,000 people were held, the ITN noted.

RTYC-Delhi organised protest in India's capital to oppose forced relocation of historic monasteries & households in Tibet for dam construction. Photo: Tibetan Youth Congress / X (formerly Twitter)

Speaking with Down To Earth (DTE), Lobsang Yangtso, a senior environmental researcher from ITN, said, "At least six monasteries are under lockdown and monks and residents were physically assaulted."

Yangtso said that internet connectivity has been restored after a brief shut down.

The Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD), a non-profit Tibetan human rights organisation based in Dharamshala, India, has alleged that the decision to announce relocation of Tibetans was strategically aligned with Tibetan New Year to divert public attention and minimise potential unrest. The organisation, in a media release on their website, have said that use of police force was done to intimidate, suppress and arrest Tibetans. The police used water bullets and electric weapons, causing injuries leading to hospitalisation of many, the organisation noted.

"Currently, at least 13 hydropower stations exist solely in the upper reaches of the Drichu on Tibetan land. Six of these are massive dams with a power generation capacity exceeding a million kilowatts," it observed.

TCHRD said the Chinese government is accelerating constructions of new dams on major rivers located in Tibet such as Drichu. The move is resulting in significant damage to the fragile natural environment and displacing thousands of Tibetans in the process, the statement said.

Two major landslides in recent years have affected the flow of Drichu river, it added.

"The Chinese government's construction of large dams in areas known to be ecologically vulnerable, driven by purely economic motives, demonstrates a complete disregard for the safety of both Tibet's environment and its people," said Nyima Woesser, researcher at TCHRD, in the statement.

UN rights chief says China committing violations in Xinjiang, Tibet

05 March 2024, Reuters

U.N. human rights chief Volker Turk on Monday called on China to implement recommendations to amend laws that violate fundamental rights, including in the Xinjiang and Tibet regions.

Rights groups accuse Beijing of widespread abuses of Uyghurs, a mainly Muslim ethnic minority that numbers around 10 million in the western region of Xinjiang, including the mass use of forced labour in camps. Beijing vigorously denies any abuses.

"I also call on the government to implement the recommendations made by my Office and other human rights bodies in relation to laws, policies and practises that violate fundamental rights, including in the Xinjiang and Tibet regions," Turk told the U.N. Human Rights Council in Geneva.

China's diplomatic mission in Geneva did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

China seized control of Tibet in 1950 in what it describes as a "peaceful liberation" from feudalistic serfdom. International human rights groups and exiles, however, have routinely condemned what they call China's oppressive rule in Tibetan areas.

Turk, who said his office was engaged in "dialogue" with Beijing, also called for the release of human rights defenders, lawyers and other people detained for "picking quarrels and making trouble".

A report released in August 2022 by Michelle Bachelet, then U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights, hours before she ended her mandate, found that China's detention of Uyghurs and other Muslims may constitute crimes against humanity.

New report says Tibetans lack representation in China's leadership

04 March 2024, ICT

As the Chinese government's all-important "Two Sessions" get underway, Tibetans will be largely missing from positions of power.

In a new report released today, March 4, the International Campaign for Tibet tracks Tibetan representation in leadership at China's national level, as well as the provincial and sub-provincial levels in Tibetan areas.

The report finds that Tibetans are mainly in token positions, while real power in Tibet remains in the hands of non-Tibetans.

These findings conflict with China's claim that Tibetans have become "masters of their own destiny" since China's takeover of Tibet.

The report, "Underrepresented: Tibetans kept out of most leadership positions," arrives as Tibetans prepare to mark the 65th anniversary of their March 10, 1959 National Uprising, followed by the Dalai Lama's flight into exile seven days later.

ICT says in the report: "The fact that the Communist Party excludes Tibetans from real leadership positions in Tibet gives reason to believe that the party leadership does not trust Tibetans to support CCP rule if they had the choice and, to the contrary, that Tibetans would choose to abolish CCP rule, if they could."

Read ICT's report.

National leadership

The "Two Sessions" began today in Beijing with the annual meeting of China's top advisory body, the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference. China's legislature, the National People's Congress, was scheduled to open its meeting on March 5.

The Chinese government has used the Two Sessions to boast about the rights given to Tibetans and other so-called "ethnic minorities." However, ICT's report finds that the Political Consultative Conference has only one Tibetan at the vice-presidential level, who has held the position on and off since the 1970s. Five other Tibetans are on the conference's Standing Committee, which has a total of 299 members.

In the National People's Congress, only one Tibetan is among the 14 vice chairs. The Congress' 159-member Standing Committee also has just one Tibetan.

Tibetans are also largely missing from other leadership bodies at the national level. China's 20th Party Congress has only one Tibetan in its 205 member-strong Party Central Committee, one fewer than in the 19th Party Congress. No Tibetan has ever served in the Politburo or its real-power-wielding Standing Committee.

Leadership in Tibet

While China denies Tibetans leadership opportunities in Beijing, it also largely keeps them locked out of power in their own homeland.

No Tibetan has ever served in the highest-ranking position of Communist Party secretary in the Tibet Autonomous Region, which spans most of western and central Tibet. Qinghai, Sichuan, Gansu and Yunnan provinces, which include the rest of the territory of Tibet, also lack Tibetan party secretaries. There are some Tibetan party secretaries at the prefectural level in these areas, but the number has decreased since 2020.

Looking at the leadership of the security entities, including the public security bureaus—which are at the forefront of China's control and suppression of the Tibetan people—almost all are non-Tibetans, both at the provincial as well as the prefectural level. Almost all heads of the military leadership at all levels in Tibet are also non-Tibetans.

“Looking at the situation of Tibetans in Tibet in 2024,” ICT’s report says, “rather than having their future in their own hands, they continue to be second-class citizens in their own homeland.”

Read ICT’s report, “Underrepresented: Tibetans kept out of most leadership positions.”

Authorities urge ‘stability’ amid restrictions on Tibetans due to dam protests

04 March 2024, RFA

They tell residents and monastic heads that the building of the Gangtuo Dam will go ahead as planned.

Chinese officials have told local ethnic Tibetans and monastic leaders in Sichuan province to maintain stability following the arrest of more than 1,000 protesters over a hydropower dam, and made clear that the project would continue, two Tibetans with knowledge of the situation said.

If built, the Gangtuo Dam power station on the Driчу River could submerge several monasteries in Dege’s county’s Wangbuding township and force residents of at least two villages near the river to relocate, sources earlier told RFA.

“Chinese officials have held meetings in the Wonto village area where they ordered local Tibetans to comply with the government’s plans and regulations and called for the leaders of the local monasteries to mobilize the locals to toe the party line,” said one source who hails from Dege and now lives in exile.

On Feb. 25, Dege County Party Secretary Baima Zhaxi visited Wangbuding and neighboring townships to meet with Buddhist monastic leaders and village administrators, during which he called for “stability” and urged residents to comply with regulations or else be “dealt with in accordance with the law and regulations,” according to a local news report.

“As the stability maintenance period in March and the national Two Sessions approach, we must implement detailed stability maintenance measures to promote continued harmony and stability in the jurisdiction,” Zhaxi was quoted in the report as saying. The Two Sessions refers to China’s annual meetings of the National People’s Congress and of the Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference, being held this week in Beijing.

“We must continue to carry out the investigation and resolution of conflicts, risks and hidden dangers, and effectively resolve conflicts and disputes at the grassroots level, and nip them in the bud,” Zhaxi said.

Zhaxi’s visit comes ahead of Tibetan Uprising Day on March 10, a politically sensitive date that commemorates the thousands of Tibetans who died in a 1959 uprising against China’s invasion and occupation of their homeland, and the flight of their spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, into exile in northern India.

Keep building

Zhaxi also visited the dam construction site and told the leaders of the coordination team to adhere to their work orders and make arrangements for “the next step of work,” according to a local Chinese government announcement.

Zhaxi told residents about “the great significance and necessity of the construction of hydropower stations” and indicated that the government would “protect the legitimate interests of the masses to the greatest extent.”

“Abide by the law, express your demands in a legal, civilized and rational manner, and do not exceed the bottom line,” Zhaxi told locals during the on-site visit, according to the same news report. “Otherwise, you will be dealt with in accordance with the law and regulations.”

On Feb. 23, police arrested more than 1,000 Tibetans, including monks and residents in the county in Sichuan’s Kardze Autonomous Tibetan Prefecture, who had been protesting the construction of the dam, meant to generate electricity.

Authorities continue to heighten security restrictions in Dege county on the east bank of the Driчу River, called Jinsha in Chinese, and in Jomda county of Qamdo city in the Tibet Autonomous Region on the west bank of the river, said the sources who both live in exile and requested anonymity for safety reasons.

Strict surveillance

Residents are forbidden from contacting anyone outside the area, the sources said. Chinese officials continue to impose strict digital surveillance and tight restrictions on movement in Wangbuding after rare video footage emerged from inside Tibet on Feb. 22 of Chinese police beating Tibetan monks, before arresting more than 100 of them, most of whom were from Wonto and Yena monasteries.

Since then, authorities have carried out wide-scale rigorous interrogations of the arrested Tibetans, even as information from inside Tibet has been harder to come by amid a crackdown on the use of mobile phones and social media and messaging platforms to restrict communication with the outside world, sources said.

The protests began on Feb. 14, when at least 300 Tibetans gathered outside Dege County Town Hall to protest the building of the Gangtuo Dam, part of a massive 13-tier hydropower complex with a total planned capacity of 13,920 megawatts.

Over the past two weeks, Tibetans in exile have been holding solidarity rallies in cities in the United States, Canada, France, the Netherlands, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, Australia and India.

Global leaders and Tibetan advocacy groups have condemned China's actions, calling for the immediate release of those detained. Last week, Chinese authorities released about 40 of the arrested monks on Feb. 26 and 27, RFA reported.

China imposes lockdown on seven monasteries in Kham Dege

01 March 2024, Phayul

Chinese authorities have imposed lockdown on seven monasteries situated along the two banks of eastern Tibet's Driчу River in Kham Dege, reported Radio Free Asia, which cited a local Tibetan source from the region.

The seven monasteries restricted by the lockdown, include Wontod, Yena, and Khardho monasteries on the east bank of the river in Dege, and Rabten, Gonsar, Tashi, and Pharok monasteries on the west bank of the so-called Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR). Entry and exit in these monasteries have been severely restricted, with clamp down on movement and communication channels in the county.

Over February 22-23, more than 1,000 monks and local Tibetans were reportedly arrested following petitions and protests since February 14, urging authorities to halt a proposed construction of a massive dam project. While approximately 40 monks were released on February 26 and 27, the majority remain under arrest, undergoing brutal treatment.

The released individuals were primarily from Wontod Monastery, as reported by local Tibetan sources. These individuals have reportedly been warned against communicating with exile Tibetans and giving out information on the incident. Sources suggest that international media coverage of the mass arrests played a significant role in prompting the release of some Tibetans. Monks who required hospitalisation due to severe interrogation beatings were allowed to return to their monastery.

The construction of the Chinese Gangtuo Hydropower Station, planned for the upper reaches of the Driчу River in Tibet, poses grave threat to numerous Tibetan monasteries and villages nearby. This cascade hydropower station, deemed a "leading" project, endangers at least six Tibetan monasteries and two villages inhabited by Tibetan communities. Among those at risk of complete submersion due to the project is Wontod Monastery, established in the 14th century and known for its historical importance and remarkable Tibetan Buddhist murals and artworks.

China awards 12 top Tibetan Buddhist degrees in Tibet, compared to over 300 in India in last four years

01 March 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Mar01'24) – China reported Feb 28 that 12 monks had been awarded the degree of Geshe Lharampa following a sutra debate that day in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), apparently to make the point that religious freedom is respected and thriving there under its occupation rule. But compare to this the fact that in January this year, the same degree was awarded to more than 300 candidates in India at a ceremony attended by Tibet's exiled spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, at Bodh Gaya, India.

Given the fact that less than 3% of Tibet's population live in exile, including around half of them in India, the difference becomes startling, even though those 300 awardees at Bodh Gaya represented the number of graduates over the past four years.

In contrast, in Chinese ruled Tibet, a total of 189 Tibetan Buddhist monks had been awarded the degree of Geshe Lharampa since 2004, according to China's official Xinhua news agency Feb 28.

Geshe Lharampa is the highest degree in the exoteric teachings of the Gelug school of Tibetan Buddhism, equivalent to a doctoral degree in modern education, the report said while reporting the award. Hailing from TAR and Yunnan Province, the 12 monks attended the debate and award ceremony held at the Jokhang Temple in Tibet's capital Lhasa, the report said.

Yunnan, it should be noted, includes Dechen (Chinese: Diqing) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, which is part of independent Tibet's historical province of Kham.

There is a host of reasons why the number of Geshe Lharampa awards in Tibet is miniscule compared to that in India, including China's imposition of severe limits and multitudes of restrictions on the enrolment of monks in monastic study centres; the requirement for monks to undergo patriotism tests and studies as part of their admission process, curriculum, and examination; and arrest of monks for perceived separatist activities that include calling for respect for Tibetan people's human, religious, linguistic, and cultural rights.

Some Tibetans protesting against dam construction released after international coverage

01 March 2024, Phayul

Around 40 Tibetans have been released from among more than 1,000 people arrested by Chinese police for protesting against a dam project that threatens to submerge ancient monasteries and several villages, according to various sources.

Chinese authorities released about 20 monks each on Monday and Tuesday, said the sources who spoke on condition of anonymity for safety reasons. "One of the main reasons for the release of the Tibetans is the growing media coverage abroad of the mass arrests that have taken place," one source told RFA. International coverage including watch dog Human rights Watch has called for the release of those detained in the aftermath of the protests.

Some of the arrested Tibetans were beaten during the interrogations and later admitted to the hospital. They were also informed individually at the hospital that they would be allowed to return to the monasteries but authorities forbade them to communicate with outsiders, on Wednesday, the same source said. Chinese police have also imposed strict restrictions on the movement of monks to and from the various monasteries located on both sides of the Drichu River, the same person said.

"The Chinese authorities have long been hostile to public protests, but their response is especially brutal when the protests are by Tibetans and other ethnic groups," said Maya Wang, acting China director at Human Rights Watch. "Other governments should press Beijing to free these protesters, who have been wrongfully detained for exercising their basic rights." Reports say that at least 300 villagers travelled to Derge County in Sichuan province on February 14, to protest the building of the Kamtok (Tibetan: sKam thog, Chinese: Gangtuo) dam. Video footage shows villagers from the area of Wontoe protesting the dam's construction. The dam is the sixth in a proposed series of 13 on the Dri Chu River, known as Jinsha or the upper Yangtse River in Chinese.

Five major hydroelectric dams are already in operation or under construction along this stretch of the river, with an installed capacity of 8.6 gigawatts. By comparison, the world's most powerful hydro dam, the Three Gorges, lower down the Yangtse River, has a generating capacity of 22.5 gigawatts. All of this electricity is sent from Tibetan areas through the Ultra High Voltage "West to East" (xi dian dong song) transmission infrastructure, due to be completed by 2025.

Since 2017, Chinese authorities have relocated over 11,000 people from 7 townships in Gonjo and Markham counties bordering the Jinsha River for "poverty alleviation" reasons, according to official figures, for reckless state projects including the construction of dams.

The right to protection against forced eviction derives from the right to adequate housing as provided under the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, to which China is a state party. According to the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which monitors state compliance with the covenant, for evictions to be lawful they must be "solely to promote the general welfare in a democratic society," and carried out "in strict compliance with the relevant provisions of international human rights law and by general principles of reasonableness and proportionality."

These safeguards include, for example, that the government explores "all feasible alternatives" before eviction, and that it provides an opportunity for genuine consultation with those affected. Mass evictions carried out in Tibetan areas often have not met these basic standards, Human Rights Watch said.

February

Exclusive: Chinese authorities release dozens of Tibetans arrested for dam protests

27 February 2024, RFA

Tibetans (L) opposed to the dam project plead with

Chinese officials in Dege county, southwestern China's Sichuan province, Feb. 21, 2024. At right, protesters in New York demonstrate against the project in New York City, Feb. 24, 2024.

Around 40 Tibetans have been released from among more than 1,000 people arrested by Chinese police for protesting a dam project that could submerge ancient monasteries in a Tibetan-populated township of southwestern China's Sichuan province, sources from inside Tibet told Radio Free Asia.

Chinese authorities released about 20 monks each on Monday and Tuesday, said the sources who spoke on condition of anonymity for safety reasons. They were among a large group of monks arrested from Wonto Monastery, the sources said. However, after their release, authorities imposed strict restrictions on their contact with the outside world, the sources added.

Around 40 Tibetans have been released from among more than 1,000 people arrested by Chinese police for protesting a dam project that could submerge ancient monasteries in a Tibetan-populated township of southwestern China's Sichuan province, sources from inside Tibet told Radio Free Asia.

Chinese authorities released about 20 monks each on Monday and Tuesday, said the sources who spoke on condition of anonymity for safety reasons. They were among a large group of monks arrested from Wonto Monastery, the sources said. However, after their release, authorities imposed strict restrictions on their contact with the outside world, the sources added.

On Feb. 23, police arrested more than 1,000 Tibetans, including monks and residents, of Dege county in Sichuan's Kardze Autonomous Tibetan Prefecture, who had been peacefully protesting the construction of the Gangtuo Dam.

If built, the structure could submerge monasteries in Dege's Wangbuding township and force residents of at least two villages near the Drichu River to relocate, sources told RFA.

The fate of the monasteries on both sides of the Drichu, or Jinsha in Chinese, has been at the center of the protests staged since Feb. 14 by Buddhist monks and local Tibetans, who have expressed distress at the expected destruction of the centuries-old religious institutions, including Wonto Monastery, which dates back to the 13th century.

"One of the main reasons for the release of the Tibetans is the growing media coverage abroad of the mass arrests that have taken place," one source told RFA.

Some of the arrested Tibetans were beaten during the interrogations and later had to be admitted to the hospital. They were also informed individually at the hospital that they would be allowed to return to the monasteries on Wednesday, the same source said.

But authorities forbade them to communicate with outsiders, the sources said.

After the arrest of a number of monks from Wonto on Feb. 22 and Feb. 23, authorities prohibited all religious activities within the monastery, a second source said.

Chinese police have also imposed strict restrictions on the movement of monks to and from the various monasteries located on both sides of the Drichu River, the same person said.

Monastery murals

Besides the Wonto Monastery, the Yena and Khardho monasteries in Wangbuding on the east bank of the Drichu River and the Rabten, Gonsar, Tashi and Pharok monasteries in the Tibetan Autonomous Region on the west bank of the river may be affected by the building of the dam.

At China's 8th International Academic Symposium on Tibetan Archaeology and Art in Hangzhou in December 2023, postgraduate student Yao Ruiyi warned in a study that the hydropower station "will cause greater difficulties in the subsequent preservation and research of the Wangdui Temple murals," using another name for the Wonto Monastery.

"Therefore, the research and protection of Wangdui Temple murals is urgent," the study said.

The Gangtuo Dam is part of a plan that China's National Development and Reform Commission announced in 2012 to build a massive 13-tier hydropower complex on the Drichu. It would be located at Wontok (or Gangtuo, in Chinese) in Dege county, northwest of Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture. The total planned capacity of the 13 hydropower stations is 13,920 megawatts.

Foreign outcry

Representatives of the U.S. and Canadian governments as well as global rights groups and Tibetan advocacy groups have condemned China's arrest of the 1,000 dam protesters, calling for the immediate release of those detained and for the preservation of the cultural, religious and linguistic identity of Tibetans.

In a post to the social media network X on Monday, the U.S. Congressional-Executive Commission on China condemned "the reported violent repression of peaceful protests against the planned destruction of 2 villages and 6 monasteries by a hydropower dam project," referring to RFA's report on the mass arrests.

"Those detained must be released and the PRC must protect the cultural heritage of Tibetan Buddhist monasteries," the Commission said, referring to the People's Republic of China.

A day earlier, Uzra Zeya, the U.S. under secretary for civilian security, democracy and human rights and U.S. special coordinator for Tibetan Issues, also posted a message to X noting that the centuries-old monasteries “are home to hundreds of Tibetan Buddhist monks and contain irreplaceable cultural relics.”

“The U.S. stands with Tibetans in preserving their unique cultural, religious, and linguistic identity,” she wrote.

RFA reported on Feb. 14 that at least 300 Tibetans gathered outside Dege County Town Hall to protest the building of the Gangtuo Dam.

Tibetans in exile have been holding mass demonstrations in various parts of the world, including Dharamsala, India – home to the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama – and New York, Zurich and Toronto.

Tibetans protesting against dam construction face violence and detention

26 February 2024, Phayul

Chinese police in Kham Dege have reportedly been conducting harsh interrogations of Tibetans who were detained for protesting against a dam project, with some subjected to severe beatings requiring medical attention, according to sources cited by Radio Free Asia.

The protests, involving Buddhist monks and residents from Wangbuding township in Dege County, Kardze in Tibet, began on Friday. The detainees, who have been peacefully protesting since February 14 against the proposed construction of the Gangtuo hydropower dam on the Dri Chu River, have faced harsh treatment from authorities.

Sources speaking to RFA revealed that detainees were “slapped and beaten severely each time they refused to answer important questions. Many had to be taken to the hospital.” Among those affected was a monk from the Wonto Monastery who suffered severe injuries resulting in him unable to speak and bearing numerous bruises on his body.

Many of the arrested Tibetans are being held in different locations throughout Dege County, including police stations in upper Dege and an old prison, as there is no single facility capable of accommodating more than 1,000 individuals who are currently detained.

Reports indicate that detainees have been deprived of food, leading to several individuals passing out due to the lack of sustenance, particularly in the freezing temperatures. “In these detention centres, the arrested Tibetans were not given any food, save for some hot water, and many passed out because of the lack of food amid the freezing temperatures,” a source told RFA.

Furthermore, detainees were instructed to bring their own bedding and tsampa or barley, a Tibetan staple, indicating that their release is not imminent. “Each of the police units brought in from outside Dege have been tasked with controlling a community each and for carrying out strict surveillance and suppression of the people there,” a source told RFA.

“In the communities of Wonto and Yena, people have been restricted from leaving their homes and the restrictions are so severe that it is similar to what happened during the Covid-19 outbreak when the entire place was under lockdown,” said the same source.

Reports indicate that the authorities in Dege County have taken drastic measures to control the flow of information and suppress dissent. It has been reported that internet and phone lines have been severed, and individuals have had their phones confiscated forcibly. Additionally, there are allegations of spies being deployed among the populace to prevent the dissemination of information about the events unfolding in the region.

US Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues, Uzra Zeya posted on her official X (formerly known as Twitter) account wrote, “Deeply concerned by reports of the PRC’s mass arrests of Tibetans protesting construction of a dam that threatens displacement of villages & destruction of monasteries. China must respect human rights & freedom of expression and include Tibetans in the development & implementation of water and land management policies”.

Despite protests against dam construction in Tibet, Beijing is proceeding with its plans

26 February 2024, Asia News

Tibetan monks who took to the streets against Chinese authorities were arrested and mistreated in detention. Plans to build a hydroelectric power plant would see two villages and six monasteries submerged, which is why Beijing has issued an order to relocate residents, which the latter are resisting.

Dharamsala (AsiaNews) – Chinese police have begun questioning Tibetans arrested over the weekend for protesting the construction of a dam in Dege county, Sichuan province, on the border with Tibet.

Those taken into custody are being held at various locations in Dege County as no single site could detain more than a thousand individuals at once.

A source that spoke to Radio Free Asia (RFA) on condition of anonymity for personal safety said that the detainees were “slapped and beaten severely each time they refused to answer important questions,” while “Many had to be taken to the hospital.”

Another source added that some prisoners “passed out because of the lack of food amid the freezing temperatures.”

For their part, Chinese authorities imposed COVID-19-like restrictions, banning people from leaving their homes.

Local monks and residents began to protest peacefully on 14 February, after receiving a forced relocation order from Beijing due to the construction of the Gangtok (Kamtok in Tibetan) hydroelectric power plant.

For the project to be completed, the villages of Upper Wonto and Shipa, home to about 2,000 Tibetans, and six monasteries – three in Dege County and three in Chamdo (Changdu) township, must be demolished before they are submerged by water.

Several videos posted online show the monks prostrating themselves before Chinese officials (a gesture that Tibetans consider “awful”), urging them to review the decision and stop the demolition of their places of worship.

In particular, the monasteries in Wonto (which contain precious painted walls dating back to the 13th century) and Yena, the closest to the construction site, are home to about 300 monks and carry important religious and cultural value for local Tibetans.

Beijing, however, seems unwilling to stop the project. The 2,240-megawatt Gangtuo (Kamtok) hydroelectric power plant is located along the upper Yangtze River (Drichu in Tibetan and Jinsha in Chinese).

It is part of a broader plan by the National Development and Reform Commission to build dozens of the world's largest hydroelectric stations in the Three Parallel Rivers (Yangtze, Mekong, Salween) protected area in Sichuan, Yunnan, and Tibet, where they originate.

The area, which has long been targeted by China for clean energy production, is also a UNESCO Natural World Heritage Site.

According to Tibet advocacy groups, Beijing approved the construction of the dams while sending partial information to the UN agency about possible environmental damage.

Complaints by the local population and environmental activists seem to fall on deaf ears; in early December 2023, China announced that it had completed 50 per cent of the construction of the Yebatan dam, just south of the Gangtuo dam.

According to the Chinese government, the plant, in which Beijing has invested more than 33 billion yuan (US$ 4.6 billion), will be operational by the end of 2025 and will serve the region's social and economic development.

Buddhist monks among 100 held in China over dam protests

24 February 2024, Arunachal Times

Chinese security officials have arrested more than 100 Tibetan Buddhist monks and local people in the southwestern Sichuan province to quell protests against the construction of a massive dam that would submerge six Buddhist monasteries and force the relocation of two villages, a media report said.

In a rare act of defiance, residents have taken to the streets of Wangbuding township of Dege County in the Garze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture since 14 February to oppose the plan to build the 2,240-megawatt Gangtuo hydropower station on the Drichu river (Jinsha in Chinese).

The dam is located on the upper reaches of the Yangtze river, one of China's most important waterways, Radio Free Asia reported on Thursday.

The protests started on 14 February, when at least 300 Tibetans gathered outside the Dege county town hall to oppose the dam's construction, defying strict controls on public gatherings and extensive surveillance by authorities in Sichuan and Tibet regions.

The detentions reportedly occurred in the Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Sichuan, an area with a large population of ethnic Tibetans.

Some of the arrested protesters required hospitalisation due to rough treatment, the report said.

Police used water cannons, pepper spray and tasers to subdue the protesters.

Videos of protests showed monks prostrating before the officials, pleading with them not to resort to demolition when they inspected Yena and Wonto monasteries in preparation for their destruction.

The USD 4.6 billion Yebatan hydropower station, the largest hydropower project in the upper reaches of the Jinsha river, exceeded 100 metres in December last year, achieving a major milestone, state-run 'Global Times' reported earlier.

The total installed capacity of the power station is expected to reach 2,240 megawatts after completion, with a maximum dam height of 217 metres. It is the tallest hyperbolic arch dam project under construction in China, according to the report.

The protesting locals were particularly distraught over the construction of the hydroelectric dam, as it would destroy six monasteries, including the Wonto monastery, which includes ancient murals that date to the 13th century, the RFA report said.

Videos by citizens on the protests show Chinese officials dressed in black forcibly restraining monks, who can be heard protesting against the dam.

The construction of the Gangtuo hydropower dam will force the resettlement of Upper Wonto and Shipa villages, the Yena, Wonto and Khardho monasteries in Dege county, and the Rabten, Gonsar and Tashi monasteries in Chamdo township, the RFA report said.

The Wonto and Yena monasteries, located closest to the site of the planned project, together have about 300 monks and hold significant cultural and religious importance to the locals.

The Wonto monastery was severely damaged during China's Cultural Revolution. However, locals preserved its ancient murals and began rebuilding the monastery in 1983.

The number of monks who live and worship at the four other monasteries slated for destruction is not known, the report said.

About 2,000 people live in the two villages, and would be forced to relocate due to the dam project.

When asked about the protests at a media briefing here on Friday, Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Mao Ning declined to comment on the report, saying that she was not aware of the incident and it was not a diplomatic question.

Perched in the Himalayas, Tibet, also known as the Roof of the World, is the origin of some of the biggest rivers in the world, including the Brahmaputra, Indus, Sutlej, Yangtze, Mekong, and Yellow rivers.

In recent years, China has stepped up efforts to build massive hydropower projects in the Tibet Autonomous Region. It is also building the world's biggest hydroelectric dam over the Brahmaputra river in Tibet, close to the Arunachal Pradesh border. The dam, which one Chinese official said has "no parallel in history," is being built in Medog county of Tibet, where the Brahmaputra Grand Canyon is located. Medog is the last county in Tibet.

India and Bangladesh, the lower riparian states, have raised concerns over the dams on the Brahmaputra, known in Tibet as Yarlung Tsangpo. (PTI)

China's biometric surveillance in Tibet matures to integration projects (Cyber News)

23 February 2024, Rtv

The Chinese government in Tibet is linking the various biometric surveillance systems and databases. It's the next logical step after deploying so many of the systems to maintain control of the region.

It's unlikely that remote and sparsely populated Tibet is monitored in the same blanket fashion as China's Xinjiang region, but according to a new report what information has been collected is being tied into numerous biometric and other databases controlled by the autocratic government in Beijing.

The report was created by two public policy organizations that advocate for Tibet's restored independence – Turquoise Roof and Tibet Watch.

They say the Chinese government has, since 2021, required Tibetans to install the National Anti-Fraud Centre app, which government officials say has attack-prevention and -reporting functions.

Police reportedly have set up roadblocks and force travelers to download and enroll the app right there using facial recognition.

According to the report, the government has made downloading the software a legal requirement. Officials allege that they are only trying to reduce internet fraud in a region with a 2022 gross domestic product of US$29.7 billion.

The authors report interviewing Tibetan sources and nationals arriving in India as refugees. They also had access to "big data generated from official government sources, mobile digital forensics in the context of contemporary Tibet, and in-depth analysis of surveillance System Description Documents."

In other sections of the report, the authors refer to and quote an unnamed a "Tibetan refugee" from the Golog areas. It's unclear how many refugees were interviewed.

They say they conducted a "dynamic analysis" of the anti-fraud app on Windows and Android devices and found that data collected by the software "could extend beyond internet fraud detection." The app is capable of linking to "broader control mechanisms."

More broadly in Tibet, according to the report, Beijing has integrated "AI-driven systems fusing facial recognition with internet browsing and app-based monitoring" to DNA and GIS tracking data.

For example, there is the "'Tibet Underworld Criminal Integrated Intelligence Application Platform', a sophisticated big data policing platform." Researchers reportedly analyzed procurement notices to find that it "amalgamates data from various existing Public Security Bureau systems in the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) into a central Oracle database."

The authors say there are reports that people accessing offshore financial companies with their phones are picked up for an investigation.

Gonpo Kyi stages sit-in outside court for justice for imprisoned brother

21 February 2024, International Campaign For Tibet

Undeterred by multiple detentions, police manhandling and other forms of cruel treatment, Gonpo Kyi staged a sit-in again on Feb. 20, 2024 in front of the Higher People's Court of the Tibet Autonomous Region in Lhasa, seeking justice for her brother, Dorjee Tashi, who is serving a life sentence in Drapchi Prison.

After their last protest in front of the same court, Gonpo and her husband, Choekyong, were taken into detention on Dec. 13, 2023. Gonpo was released after around eight days of detention, while her husband was released after five days.

Unconfirmed reports indicate that the authorities of Lhasa had been attempting to expel Gonpo and her husband from Lhasa back to their native hometown of Labrang (Chinese: Xiahe) in Gansu Province to prevent them from staging further protests in front of the Higher People's Court.

In the latest video clip obtained by the International Campaign for Tibet, Gonpo can be seen sitting in front of the gate of the Higher People's Court on Feb. 20, holding a flyer and a portrait of Chinese leader Xi Jinping. In the clip, the flyer written in Chinese that Gonpo holds in her right hand reads: "Dorjee Tashi has not committed any crime." She also holds a portrait of President Xi Jinping in her lap supported by her left hand. The videographer states that the date of the video is Feb. 20, and the location is the Higher People's Court of the Tibet Autonomous Region.

Compared to her previous sit-ins, Gonpo holding a large portrait of Xi Jinping is a new tactic, presumably indicating she's appealing for intervention from China's top leader in accordance with the constitution to defend justice. Holding a portrait of Xi is also tactical as a safeguard against the police and officials forcibly removing her from the spot and putting her into detention again.

The International Campaign for Tibet will continue to monitor the status of Gonpo Kyi.

Dorjee Tashi

ICT has previously documented the torture of the renowned Tibetan businessman and philanthropist Dorjee Tashi during his pre-trial detention, as well as his family's tireless advocacy for justice.

Both the United States and the European Union have raised concerns about the arbitrary detention of Dorjee Tashi. Notably, the European Union called for his immediate and unconditional release, along with the release of others, during its statement on the occasion of International Human Rights Day, Dec. 10.

The United States also acknowledged the detention of Dorjee Tashi in its 2022 and 2021 State Department Country Reports on Human Rights Practices.

Read ICT's past coverage of Dorjee Tashi's imprisonment and his sister Gonpo Kyi's activism for justice.

Unprecedented Tibetan Protest Against Hydropower Station in Sichuan

19 February 2024, Bitter Winter

The construction of Gangtuo Power Plant compels thousands of Tibetans to relocate. It is about money but also contributes to destroying Tibetan culture and religion.

Something unusual and largely unprecedented took place on February 14 in Derge (Ch. Gengqing), the county seat of Dêgê County, part of the Garzê Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, in Sichuan Province. Hundreds of Tibetans gathered to protest and tried to block the entrance of the Dêgê County Government building, clashing with the police. There are also unconfirmed reports of arrests.

Derge is a Tibetan city and a renowned center of Tibetan religion and culture. It is part of Kham, one of the areas of historical Tibet that the Chinese did not include in the so-called Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) but added to another province, in this case Sichuan.

While the Tibetans of Kham would have ample reasons to protest against the destruction of their language, culture, and religion, what moved them to risk their liberty with an unauthorized demonstration was the refusal of the Chinese authorities to open a dialogue with the local population about Beijing's hydropower stations plan.

China is building between Sichuan and Tibet the largest hydropower system in the People's Republic and one of the largest in the world. A key part of this project is Gangtuo Power Plant, part of a 25-dams system on the Dri Chu (Ch. Jingsa) River, i.e., the upper stretches of the Yangtze River.

The dams are a huge multi-billion-dollar business, but apart from their controversial ecological impact, they come with a huge human cost for the local populace. Necessarily, villages are flooded and the population should be relocated. Old buildings, including monasteries and temples, are submerged and destroyed. Those who do not want to be relocated elsewhere organized the protest in Derge.

"Relocation here," according to the words of a local villager that were reported to a "Bitter Winter" correspondent, "does not mean that you are transferred to another nice village ready to welcome you. We are told that we will have apartments but they are not ready. Meanwhile, we are parked in camps that are kept under strict surveillance to prevent protest and are very similar to reeducation camps—although we have committed no crime."

Some villagers do not believe that the purposes of the dam project are simply about economy. In the words of one village leader that were reported to a "Bitter Winter" correspondent, "Of course it is about making money, and big money at that, but I am sure there is more. Tibetans compelled to relocate are separated from their history, from homes where their families may have lived for decades or even centuries, from all their visible cultural and religious points of reference. It is yet another way of destroying Tibetan identity in Kham."

Thanks to the X account of exiled Tibetan Sakar Tashi, videos of the protest were released and spread internationally (although they were quickly banned from Weibo in China). The independent YouTube channel "Yesterday" by citizen journalist Lu Yuyu, now living in exile in Canada after having served time in jail in China, also offered images of the protests.

Report claims Chinese authorities spying on exiled Tibetans (Cyber News)

18 February 2024, The Economic Times

The Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRS) released a report, followed by an organisation based in the North Indian hill town of Dharamshala, revealing Chinese authorities' surveillance of exile Tibetans to collect personal information.

While speaking to ANI, TCHRD's spokesperson, Tenzin Dawa, remarked that the whole process of the report took about two years, and they have tried to get in touch with around one hundred Tibetan people.

She further added, "The report is a collection of first-hand testimony collected from Tibetans from the diaspora who have been affected by transnational repression."

"We also have another section of secondary data that is a compilation of all existing articles or information that is publicly available in the news or media outlets," she added.

"China uses the spying data to infiltrate and undermine diaspora networks, potentially through disinformation campaigns and even as a basis for blackmail," she said while speaking to ANI.

Dawa Tsering further said, "The spying aspects are just one part of the findings of our report so the report that we have just released is actually one of the first to focus on the transnational repression led by the CCP on the Tibetan diaspora communities."

"In the international communities, there have been a lot of discussions on the kind of repression that's being faced transnationally by the so-called Chinese overseas, including the Uyghurs, Hongkongers, and Taiwanese, but there has been no sort of report dedicated to the kind of repression that the Tibetans in diaspora have been facing for so long," TCHRD's spokesperson added. As per the report, the TCHRD's spokesperson said, "TCHRD felt the need to first of all document these issues because transnational repression, is not new to the Tibetan community. The CCP has targeted the Tibetan diaspora, using family members back inside Tibet to control and sort of undermine the legitimacy or functionality of the Tibetan overseas organisations."

Commenting further on this issue, Dawa said,

"The protests that took place inside Tibet in the late 1980s and then following that, there was a huge uprising in 2008 inside Tibet and it was that particular uprising that the Chinese government viewed the Tibetans who were outside of Tibet as the insighters of the protest inside Tibet.

That's why they really think about the need to cut off any sort of communication or relationship between the Tibetans inside and outside Tibet. And then sending a spy and collecting personal information of Tibetans in the diaspora because they view it as a threat." the statement added.

While speaking to ANI, Dolma Tsering, deputy speaker of the Tibetan parliament in exile, said, "When you do lots of wrong things, you take others in the same way... They are hiding lots of things about what's happening in Tibet and in mainland China as a whole from the world.

"Tibet is cut off from the rest of the world. Why? Because they have lots of things to hide... The violation of not only human rights in the name of conserving nature, but also national parks are coming up," she added

Additionally, the deputy speaker remarked, "The centuries-old nomads are relocated because they want to make Tibet into a slaughterhouse to raise consumption for the tourism that is inflowing into China so they're hiding all these things but what do we have in exile? We are as transparent as we can be. We just have the truth with us."

"His Holiness has always welcomed the Chinese leadership to come and investigate what we are doing here. We are an open file to the world. Whatever we say to the world, what we do in the office, everything is transparent because we have a democracy, a rule of law and the people's will being taken into consideration, which is just the reverse in China. so there is nothing to spy on the exile government." the statement added

Deputy speaker further said, "Many of the time, our computers are being hacked. Whenever we do any kind of activity, the people who are in charge of those core groups will find all our emails were hacked but they will find nothing because whatever we say, you will find on our computers. We have nothing to hide. So I am challenging China to open the Tibet and we invite you here to investigate what we are doing here."

Journal retracts 18 papers from China due to Tibet and other human rights concerns

17 February 2024, Tibetan Review

TibetanReview.net, Feb17'24) – A genetics journal from a leading scientific publisher in the United States has retracted 18 papers from China in what is seen as the biggest mass retraction of academic research due to concerns about human rights violations, reported theguardian.com Feb 15. It followed a lengthy investigation of allegations that DNA samples collected, including from Tibet and Xinjiang, could not have been free or fair given the circumstances in which they occurred.

The articles were published in Molecular Genetics & Genomic Medicine (MGGM), a genetics journal published by the US academic publishing company Wiley. They were retracted on Monday (Feb 12) after an agreement between the journal's editor in chief, Suzanne Hart, and the publishing company, the report said.

This followed a review process that took over two years and in which investigators found "inconsistencies" between the research and the consent documentation provided by researchers.

The papers by different scientists are all based on research that draws on DNA samples collected from populations in the greater China territory of the People's Republic of China (PRC). In several cases, the researchers used samples from populations deemed by experts and human rights campaigners to be vulnerable to exploitation and oppression in the PRC, leading to concerns that they would not be able to freely consent to such samples being taken, the report said.

Tellingly, several of the researchers were associated with public security authorities in the PRC, a fact that "voids any notion of free informed consent," Yves Moreau, a professor of engineering at the University of Leuven, in Belgium, who focuses on DNA analysis, has said.

It was Moreau who first raised concerns about the papers with Hart, MGGM's editor-in-chief, in Mar 2021.

One retracted paper has studied the DNA of Tibetans in Lhasa, the capital of Tibet, using blood samples collected from 120 individuals. The research article was cited as saying "all individuals provided written informed consent" and that work was approved by the Fudan University ethics committee.

However, the retraction notice published on Feb 12 has stated that an ethical review "uncovered inconsistencies between the consent documentation and the research reported; the documentation was not sufficiently detailed to resolve the concerns raised."

Xie Jianhui, the corresponding author on the study, is from the department of forensic medicine at Fudan University in Shanghai, and has not agree with the retraction.

Several of Xie's co-authors are stated to be affiliated with the public security authorities in the PRC, including the public security authorities in Tibet.

Tibet is considered to be one of the most closely surveilled and tightly monitored regions in the PRC. In its most recent annual report, the campaign group Human Rights Watch said that the authorities "enforce severe restrictions on freedoms of religion, expression, movement and assembly" there, the report noted.

MGGM, seen as a mid-ranking genetics publication, is considered to be a relatively easy forum for publication, which may have been a draw for Chinese researchers looking to publish in English-language journals, David Curtis, a professor of genetics at University College London, has said.

MGGM primarily publishes studies on the medical applications of genetics, such as a recent paper on genetic disorders linked to hearing loss. The sudden pivot towards publishing forensic genetics research from China came as other forensic genetics journals started facing more scrutiny for publishing research based on DNA samples from vulnerable minorities in the PRC. Moreau has said. He argues that may have pushed more controversial research towards mid-ranking journals such as MGGM that do not specialize in forensic genetics.

The Wiley retractions was stated to have come days before a Chinese government deadline requiring universities to submit lists of all academic articles retracted in the past three years.

According to an analysis by Nature, nearly 14,000 retraction notices were published last year, of which three-quarters involved a Chinese co-author, the report said.

Tibetans in Eastern Tibet Protest Hydropower Station and their relocation

16 February 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

Hundreds of Tibetans staged protests outside the Derge (Chinese: Dege) county government's office in the Kardze (Ganzi) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Sichuan, on Feb. 14, 2024, calling for halt to a proposed hydropower station construction in their area, and to withdraw the order for relocation of Tibetans from the surrounding area because of this.

Videos of the Tibetans' protest were being circulated in the social media. A large group of Tibetans are seen peacefully protesting in front of a government office building and officials (mostly in civilian clothes) can be seen stopping the crowd from moving forward. Voice of America Tibetan reported that the Derge county officials informed the protesting Tibetans that nothing could be done on this at their level.

According to a source in exile, who is from Derge, the Tibetans who were protesting were from Wentuo town (Wentuo Zhen) in Derge county who were being asked to relocate to another place near Moshoe bridge in the same county. The exact location of Moshoe bridge could not be ascertained, but the source said some houses have already been built there to house the people.

Voice of America Tibetan service reported that the hydropower station was the Kamtok (Gangtuo) Hydropower Station. A posting about the protest on Chinese social media outlet Weibo also identified it as being Kamtok. ICT could not get independent confirmation, but this particular station is located over the Dri Chu River in the nearby Kamtok Township, Jomda (Jiangda) County, Chamdo (Changdu) City, TAR. Following the protest, one social media posting said the authorities have taken down the video circulating on Weibo. Radio Free Asia Tibetan reports that following the protests, Chinese authorities increased security measures and have been trying to identify protest organizers and participants, two sources inside Tibet said.

Several monasteries and dozens of villages in two townships in the county face the threat of relocation, according to Tibetan language media reports.

The International Campaign for Tibet is deeply concerned about the apparent disregard of local Tibetan's rights and the threat of relocation, connected to the construction of the hydropower station. ICT is calling on the Chinese authorities to respect the rights of peaceful protesters and to refrain from using violence or resort to arbitrary detention of those involved. Moreover, ICT is urging the international community to press on the Chinese government to respect international human rights standards.

The Chinese government continues to pursue blind and commercial infrastructure projects in Tibet that are designed and implemented without regard for environmental impacts or local community concerns. These projects, which include rail roads, highways, and power grids, combined with resource extraction projects such as hydropower dams and mining create economic and environmental costs that disproportionately impact Tibetans, ICT said.

Tibetan water security

Tibet is home to one-fifth of the world's freshwater supply. Glacial runoff from it forms rivers in almost every country across South and Southeast Asia, with an estimated 1.8 billion people dependent on this water's healthy, unimpeded flow.

The integrity of Tibet's ecology is critical to the Tibetan people's way of life and directly contributes to the stability and economic wellbeing of downstream countries in South and Southeast Asia.

However, large-scale water diversion projects and hydropower development are having dramatic downstream consequences, including lack of access to freshwater, economic disruption, and negative impacts on downstream ecosystems.

Chinese nationals moving into hitherto vacant 'border defence village' buildings in occupied Tibet

15 February 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Feb15'24) –Chinese nationals have started occupying the double-storeyed spacious buildings in some of the model "Xiaokang" border defence villages that had come up in occupied Tibet across India's north-eastern borders along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) since 2019, reported the indianexpress.com Feb 15. While the existence of such new villages so-close to the border is itself a matter of concern to India, it is unclear whether the new residents are civilian or military, the report said. The report cited senior Indian officials familiar with the matter as saying the Chinese had started occupying a couple of these village buildings in the new villages on the Tibetan side of the LAC across from Lohit Valley and the Tawang sector of Arunachal Pradesh over the last few months.

The report noted that China has been constructing 628 such "well-off villages" along India's borders with occupied Tibet, which China now calls "Xizang" to make clear the once independent Tibet no longer exists, including along Ladakh and Arunachal Pradesh for over five years now.

While the exact nature of these villages is unclear, the dwellings are understood to be "dual-use infrastructure" – for both civil and military purposes – and seen as a Chinese assertion of its territorial claims along the LAC. They have thus remained a concern for the Indian military, the report said.

It said that in the last few months, the hitherto unoccupied double-storeyed, large and spacious buildings constructed as part of these villages, had begun to be occupied by Chinese nationals over the last few months, and it was not clear whether these were civilian or military personnel.

The report cited sources as also saying the Chinese were building infrastructure all along the LAC bordering the northeast, even as the LAC remained far off from most inhabited areas or areas of importance except for Tawang and the Siliguri Corridor.

"They (the Chinese) have built sufficient infrastructure along the LAC at Tawang, but they are not stopping at that. Even in other areas such as Siang valley of Arunachal Pradesh, we have been seeing rapid development of Chinese infrastructure,” one official has said.

The official has added that the Chinese have consistently improved their existing infrastructure including improving their connectivity through passes, constructing roads and bridges and their model villages. China has also been seen constructing infrastructure, including border villages, in Bhutanese territory. India has decided to respond to these developments, including with Vibrant Villages programmes under which it plans to develop 663 border villages into modern villages with all amenities in the first phase. Of them, at least 17 such villages along the borders with occupied Tibet in Ladakh, Himachal Pradesh, Uttarakhand, Sikkim and Arunachal Pradesh, have been selected for development as a pilot project under the programme, the report noted.

In Arunachal Pradesh, villages in the eastern part of the state and in the Tawang region have been identified such as Zemithang, Taksing, Chayang Tajo, Tuting and Kibithu. Besides, three major highways are at different stages of construction: the Trans-Arunachal Highway; the Frontier Highway; and the East-West Industrial Corridor Highway. Besides, there are plans to improve connectivity to Tawang with the construction of at least two alternate axes – in addition to the existing one connecting Guwahati and Tawang.

Roads are being built on all sides of the state’s Dibang valley, which previously had roads just till a little ahead of Anini, the report noted.

“Work is underway to improve connectivity to the passes, establish laterals for inter-valley connectivity and on construction of helipads and advanced landing grounds at various locations in the state,” another official has said.

China Increasing Digital Surveillance of Tibetans (Cyber News)

10 February 2024, RTV

A new report by Tibetan activist groups and experts shows new evidence that the Chinese government is increasing digital surveillance of Tibetans through practices such as the mandatory installation of apps at police checkpoints or utilizing big data policing platforms supported by technologies from American tech firms.

Some analysts say these new findings provide a glimpse into Beijing’s security apparatus in Tibet. “The Chinese government’s apparatus in Tibet remains a black box in nature, but this report provides [the outside world] with a glimpse into how these systems work,” Greg Walton, senior investigator at U.K.-based security consulting firm

Secdev Group and one of the report’s authors, told VOA by phone.

The report from Tibet Watch and a Tibet-focused research network called Turquoise Roof found that authorities have been asking residents in Tibet to install an app called “National Anti-Fraud Center” on their smartphones since 2021.

According to some testimonies from Tibetans, police would routinely ask residents to install the security application on their smartphones at checkpoints while local authorities have been teaching the public how to download and use the app. Some Tibetans have expressed concern that the app may be used to track their movements and potentially access data on their phones.

“It looks like a surveillance app that tracks not only our movement but also has built-in automatic voice recording and photo-sharing functionalities,” an unnamed Tibetan man told Tibet Watch in 2023, according to the report.

Based on their analysis of the app, the report found that permissions that the app asked for from smartphone users could allow app operators to access sensitive user data or have control over certain device functionalities.

The report said the broad scope of permissions could let authorities conduct highly invasive surveillance, which is in line with measures that Chinese authorities typically use in regions like Tibet and Xinjiang to maintain public order.

“Our analysis suggests that data controlled by the Anti-Fraud app could connect into wider systems operated by the Criminal Investigation Bureau [and] the mandatory installation of the app at police checkpoints could serve as a platform for harvesting a dataset used for monitoring and controlling the population, particularly in suppressing dissent and cultural expression,” the report wrote.

In addition to the forced installation of the anti-fraud app, the report also investigated a big data policing platform used by Tibetan authorities called “Tibet Underworld Criminal Integrated Intelligence Application Platform.”

Their analysis of government procurement notices suggests the platform, which is developed on top of technology originating from American tech company Oracle, combines data from several Public Security Bureau systems in Tibet and is an instrumental part of Chinese authorities’ campaign to criminalize moderate cultural and religious expressions or language rights advocacy.

“The platform is presented as being designed to enhance the efficiency and effectiveness of law enforcement in Tibet,” the report wrote, adding that the platform can only be accessed through the Public Security Bureau’s internal network and authorities urge contractors to “replace the Oracle database” with a Chinese equivalent.

Walton from Secdev Group told VOA that the evidence suggests Chinese authorities’ law enforcement measures in Tibet are “more invasive” than the measures used in other parts of China. “The big data systems use machine learning to track Tibetans’ kinship networks or analyze their social networks to surface what the Chinese party-state defines as organized crimes,” he said.

Since the big data policing platform is built on top of technologies from Oracle, Walton thinks foreign companies have clear responsibilities to ensure their products are not used to assist the Chinese government’s effort to crack down on civilians or ethnic minorities.

“Human rights organizations have made clear the negative impacts that [big data policing system] driven by software sold by Oracle, [so] I think these companies should do human rights impact assessments to see what impact their software will have [when it’s used for policing purposes in China,]” he said.

Oracle did not respond to VOA’s requests for comment.

The report says that the Chinese authorities’ aim of using big data policing platforms in both Tibet and Xinjiang is to achieve “control and suppression through intelligence-led policing. Some researchers say the Chinese government’s crackdown on ethnic minorities is part of its overall effort to build up a “totalitarian social control state.”

“The Chinese government is developing these more modern social control mechanisms that are supposed to make all aspects of society controllable,” Maya Wang, Interim China Director at Human Rights Watch, told VOA by phone.

“Since the ethnic groups are at the short end of the Chinese state repression and social control when the surveillance systems are running in the background in Tibet or Xinjiang, they are also vetting people, and those who are considered politically unreliable are held in re-education camps or prisons,” she added.

In response to the report’s claim that Beijing is increasing digital surveillance on Tibetans, the Chinese embassy in the U.S. described the finding as “groundless accusations.”

“China is a country under the rule of law, and the privacy of Chinese citizens is fully protected by law, regardless of their ethnicity,” Liu Peng-yu, the spokesperson of the Chinese embassy in the United States, told VOA in a written response.

As Beijing increases its control over Tibet through digital surveillance, the report said these efforts are changing the way that Tibetans communicate and are creating a society-wide chilling effect across the region. “In many cases, this trend leads to a complete breakdown of contact,” the report said.

Some Tibetan activists say the digital surveillance architecture that the Chinese government is trying to “perfect” in the region will create a deep psychological impact on local residents, forcing them to practice self-censorship.

“Tibetans will be even more careful with what they say or what they write on their phones,” Tenzin Choekyi, a senior researcher at Tibet Watch, told VOA by phone, adding that communication between Tibetans in China and the diaspora community will likely become more difficult to maintain.

China could use anti-fraud app to monitor Tibetans – report (cyber News)

07 February 2024, BBC

A Chinese app aimed at preventing fraud could be used to monitor Tibetans, according to a new report. The investigation by Tibet research groups found the app could monitor users’ texts, internet browser histories and access personal data.

They also alleged some Tibetans were being forced to download the app.

Restrictions in Tibet have increased in recent years, say rights groups, tightening the screws on an already heavily controlled part of China.

Authorities have ramped up state surveillance and censorship in recent years, particularly during the pandemic.

Politically sensitive regions such as Tibet and Xinjiang have especially come under scrutiny. Beijing has long been wary of “secessionism” in these areas, but has stepped up crackdowns under leader Xi Jinping’s rule which has emphasised nationalist unity.

The new report, by research network Turquoise Roof and rights group Tibet Watch, centres on the controversial National Anti-Fraud Centre app which was rolled out in 2021.

While the report did not present any evidence that the app was actively targeting Tibetans, it said the app “aligns with extensive surveillance practices” and could aid the Chinese government’s efforts in controlling them.

The National Anti-Fraud Centre has been promoted as a scam prevention app which can detect potential fraudulent texts and calls, while allowing users to report scams and receive help quickly from authorities. China has been battling a wave of internet and phone scams in recent years.

Turquoise Roof conducted a forensic analysis of the app and says it found that some of its functions could be exploited for surveillance purposes.

The app can monitor incoming text messages, and access call logs and internet browser histories. It can also capture users’ inputs such as passwords, and take photos which would allow it to gather visual data on users and surroundings.

Its face recognition verification feature could also be used for large-scale harvesting of data to enhance tracking and monitoring of Tibetans, the report added.

One way is by forcing Tibetans to download the app. One refugee told Tibet Watch last year he was stopped at a police checkpoint while on his way home from school, and told to install the app on his phone.

Complaints about mandatory downloads of the app arose soon after its launch, when it was installed on an estimated 200 million phones.

Some local government agencies made it compulsory for employees, while others had to download the app in order to enrol their children into schools or apply for identification cards, reported the Financial Times.

The newspaper also spoke to users who said they were contacted by the police after the app detected they had visited foreign financial news websites, including Bloomberg.

Separately, Turquoise Roof uncovered from government procurement notices that Chinese authorities were maintaining a large database of Tibetan individuals deemed as a threat to stability. The database used software from US company Oracle.

They said it was "reasonable to hypothesise" that any data collected by the anti-fraud app could be used in this database.

The report called for the Chinese government to put in place greater privacy protections and to investigate claims of coercion to download the app.

It also called for international companies and governments to ensure they do not provide resources for China's mass surveillance programmes.

Beijing has wielded a tight grip on Tibet since it sent in troops in 1950 to enforce its claims of sovereignty over the region.

Activists say China limits Tibetans' freedom of travel by controlling their passports, and also heavily monitors their communications with the outside world. Tibet Watch has documented several cases of Tibetans detained for their messages on popular messaging platform WeChat, and instances where accounts and keywords deemed too politically sensitive were suspended or scrubbed.

Besides Tibet, China has famously employed mass surveillance techniques in Xinjiang to control the Uyghurs.

In 2019 Human Rights Watch found that authorities were using a surveillance platform and app to monitor the movements and data of people in Xinjiang.

That same year, an investigation by several Western newspapers found that border police were installing surveillance apps on the phones of visitors to the region.

January

Tibetan woman detained and beaten for social media posts critical of China

10 January 2024, RFA, Palden Gyal and Lhuboom

Known for her online rights advocacy and for criticizing Chinese authorities for discriminating against Tibetans, has been detained twice in three years. She is seen here in a photo dated September 2023.

A Tibetan woman known for outspoken criticism of China on social media was detained and beaten by police in western China's Qinghai province, sources inside the country told Radio Free Asia.

Tsering Tso, 39, was subjected to "administrative detention" for 15 days from Oct. 26 to Nov. 10, 2023, in the Kyegudo (or Yushu in Chinese) city detention center, where she was interrogated and beaten by the police, said the sources, who asked not to be identified for safety reasons.

It was the second time in three years she had been detained.

In two official letters issued by the Yushu Public Security Bureau, which were seen by RFA, authorities accused Tso of "falsely accusing the government and officials and spreading misinformation via at least 17 videos posted on her personal TikTok account and private social media accounts" between Oct. 8 and Oct. 15, 2023.

While in detention, at least a dozen policemen interrogated and beat Tso and broke her mobile phone, while forcing her to "reform her behavior," she said in a social media post on Nov. 17, 2023, following her release.

Since then, Tso's personal social media accounts on various platforms, including TikTok and Kaishou, have been closed down and can no longer be accessed, one source inside the country told Radio Free Asia.

Tso did not immediately respond to RFA's queries and requests for comment.

Calls to speak up

Tso has drawn police attention in the past for her postings on social media platforms.

In Nov. 2020, she was taken into custody at her home in the provincial capital Xining and brought by 10 officers to a detention center in Trika county, where she was held for 10 days before being released under continuing surveillance.

In a video seen by RFA, Tso had earlier called on Tibetan intellectuals and influencers inside Tibet to speak up and voice their criticism of the Chinese government's human rights abuses against Tibetans.

"From 2015 until now, for over a decade, I have been speaking up for the rights of the Tibetan people in Lhasa and Qinghai," she said. "Is it only me who understands the rule of law? Everyone has gone to school and received the same education I have. Is it only me who knows how to speak up?"

"Why don't the educated and the intellectuals speak up?" she continued. "If you speak up, you will be arrested. But if I am the only one speaking up, the impact of it will be much less. However, if everyone speaks up, it will be harder for local authorities to practice racial or ethnic discrimination and human rights abuses against Tibetans."

Tso, who operates a travel company through which she organizes tours in various parts of the country, including Lhasa, has also spoken about the hardships Tibetans face in starting and running businesses in their homeland.

In two videos obtained by the Dharamsala-based Tibetan Center for Human Rights and Democracy advocacy group on Oct. 16 and Oct. 19, 2023, Tso can be seen highlighting the difficulties in obtaining a license to run a small business and accusing local leaders of corruption and misusing their power for personal gains.

Speaking in Mandarin, Tso criticized the "feudalistic mindset" authorities and their determination to make it difficult for "hardworking and educated people from ordinary households to accomplish great deeds and realize their dreams."

Earlier in July 2023, Tso also shared a video taken inside the Lhasa railway station, where she said that when people left the building, authorities screened and questioned Tibetans and asked them to show additional documents, whereas the Chinese were allowed to pass through without scrutiny.

Tso pointed out that local Chinese authorities in Lhasa were violating national laws and discriminating against ethnic groups.

China in door-to-door drive to stop Tibetan children attending private lessons, practising religion

11 January 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan11'24) – Chinese authorities are carrying out random checks in residential areas and commercial establishments in several parts of Tibet to ensure that Tibetan children don't attend private Tibetan classes denied in their regular schooling or engage in religious practices during their ongoing winter break, reported the Tibetan service of rfa.org Jan 9, citing local Tibetan sources.

The move followed a directive issued by what the report called Chinese Education Department earlier this month, ordering local authorities to intensify their supervision and investigation of people violating the rule that has been in force since 2021, banning Tibetan children from taking supplementary lessons (in Tibetan language and culture), and to carry out strict disciplinary action against violators.

The 2021 rules issued by authorities in various Tibetan-populated provinces are said to prohibit Tibetan children from attending informal Tibetan language classes or workshops during their winter holidays.

The directive issued to local authorities require investigations to be carried out in residential areas and commercial establishments at various times of day and night, report said, citing sources from Tibet's capital Lhasa, Labrang Monastery in Gansu province, and Yushu Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Qinghai province.

In Lhasa, the local notice, issued on Nov 30, is said to make it clear that parents "must make sure the children are completely free from the influence of religion." They also must ensure that children "voluntarily distance themselves from places of worship" and that they must not participate in any religious activities.

In Qinghai's Yushu, the source has said, "In addition to random door-to-door investigations, local authorities are also carrying out surveys of the Tibetan children to find out what subjects are being taught to them in their out-of-school courses and where."

Its local notice, while emphasizing the continued ban on participation in religious activities, is said to make it clear that Tibetan children could only participate in supplementary classes and workshops taught by government-authorized individuals and organizations and on subjects approved by the authorities.

In Gansu's Labrang Monastery, home to the largest number of monks outside Tibet (Xizang) Autonomous Region, the source has said, "In the past, there was a strong tradition of providing supplementary, private tuitions to Tibetan children in the fields of Tibetan grammar, religion, math, and storytelling during their winter break."

But now, "only a few Chinese government-authorized organizations and individuals who carry out political re-education programmes are allowed to give [lessons] to Tibetan students."

The source has confirmed that in Gansu too, there is a stricter enforcement of the ban on study of Tibetan language and on Tibetan children participating in religious activities.

Given this latest development across the Tibetan regions, another Tibetan source has said: "With the prohibition of the study of Tibetan language, both in schools and in out-of-school programs, it has now become increasingly evident that young Tibetan children have lost touch with their native language and identity, a very alarming and concerning development.”

This is because under President Xi Jinping’s all-out Sinicization drive, schools across the Tibetan areas of what constitutes the People’s Republic of China have replaced Tibetan with Mandarin Chinese as the only language for teaching all subjects in all classes.

China sentences Tibetan man to 11 years for alleged spreading rumour

01 January 2024, RTV

According to the report, in July 2016, Lhakdor intended to board a flight from Kardze to Lhasa. During this journey, Chinese authorities conducted a search of his phone and discovered videos related to Tibet’s independence. Subsequently, he was apprehended on allegations of disseminating information under a controversial new Chinese crime of spreading rumours over the internet. Following his arrest, Lhakdor was taken to a local court situated in Palyul County, where he received a sentence of 11 years in prison. Notably, this sentencing occurred in the presence of his family members, as stated in the report.

An anonymous source inside Tibet told TT, “Lhakdor is known to be a frequent traveller and holds a strong sense of patriotism towards his homeland. His family members have only been permitted to visit him on one occasion since his arrest. Presently, there is a lack of clarity regarding his current location and the specific detention centre where he is being held. Despite requests for visitation rights, officials have consistently denied these requests.

As per the report, Lhakdor’s family managed to visit him only once during the seven years following his initial arrest. As of now, there is no information on Lhakdor’s location and the state of his health.

TIBET DIGEST 2024

FOUNDATION FOR
Non-violent
Alternatives
To inform and shape policy on Tibet and the region

BUDDHISM

www.fnvaworld.org
143, 4th Floor, Uday Park, New Delhi, 49
office@fnvaworld.org

Disclaimer: FNVA does not endorse "China's Tibet", "Tibet Autonomous Region of China", "Xizang" or any such phrase that denotes Tibet has been/is a part of China. Articles that contain such phraseology are news items from the Chinese state media and must not be confused as endorsement by FNVA

China deploys troops to enforce stringent new restrictions at biggest centre for Tibetan Buddhist study

27 December 2024, Tibetan Review

China has deployed hundreds of additional troops at the world's biggest centre for the study of Tibetan Buddhism located in Serthar (Chinese: Seda) County of Kardze (Ganzi) prefecture, Sichuan province, to enforce severe new restrictions in the coming new year, said the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) on its Tibet.net website Dec 27.

Some 400 Chinese troops from neighbouring Draggo (Luhuo) and other neighbouring counties arrived at the Larung Five Sciences Buddhist Academy on Dec 20. This was accompanied by a helicopter surveillance operation, signalling an intensification of monitoring activities at the academy, the report said. The report cited sources as saying the stringent new regulations will limit residency at the academy to a maximum of 15 years, required all monks and nuns studying in it to be officially registered, and drastically reduce the number of monks and nuns across the province to as low as 1,000.

The academy alone had around 10,000 officially registered residents before China launched a severe and massive crackdown on it in 2001, which continued over the following years, especially during 2016-17, forcibly evicting monks and nuns and destroying buildings, including residences.

The report said Chinese students are already reportedly being asked to leave the academy.

The academy and its monastery, founded in 1980 by Khenchen Jigme Phuntsok at his mountain retreat with support from the 10th Panchen Lama, sprawls over a mountainside in Serthar county.

The CTA report called the latest development an escalation in China's broader campaign to restrict religious freedom in Tibet, where traditional Buddhist institutions have faced increasing pressure under state policies aimed at controlling religious practice and education.

BUDDHISM

China's ideology tsar views Buddhism reincarnation exhibition in signal to Dalai Lama

25 December 2024, SCMP, Xinlu Liang

China's fourth senior official Wang Huning visits China Tibetology Research Centre, as officials vow national unity and ethnic solidarity

China's top political adviser has made a rare trip to view an exhibition about the reincarnation of Tibetan

Buddhas, a sign that Beijing is getting ready to face the Dalai Lama succession issue ahead of the exiled spiritual leader's 90th birthday next year, according to an analyst.

Wang Huning, China's fourth senior official and chairman of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), the country's top advisory body, led a group of its members to visit the semi-official China Tibetology Research Centre in Beijing on Monday.

The South China Morning Post has learned Wang is the most senior Chinese official to visit an exhibition on the reincarnation of the Living Buddha, which opened at the centre in 2014 and details the historical origins, evolution, norms and current state of the reincarnation system within Tibetan Buddhism. The centre's Museum of Tibetan Culture said the exhibit "clarifies that the reincarnation of various dalai lamas and other significant living Buddhas have historically required approval from the central authorities, and illustrates that Tibet has been an inseparable part of China since ancient times".

The CPPCC members accompanying Wang vowed to maintain national unity and ethnic solidarity, with a focus on "cultivating a strong sense of identity among all ethnic groups concerning the great motherland, Chinese culture, the Communist Party and socialism with Chinese characteristics," said the People's Political Consultative Daily, the official paper of the CPPCC.

Wang's visit also comes only a few months before the 14th Dalai Lama – the exiled spiritual head of Tibetan Buddhism – is expected to announce his succession plan.

Barry Sautman, an specialist on China's ethnic minorities at the Hong Kong University of Science and Technology, said that since the CTCRC was China's largest institution for Tibetan studies and Wang was a social scientist, the function of his trip could be to "become acquainted" with the centre's latest research.

"There is likely to be extensive preparation under way within Tibet-related central government institutions to deal with the issue of the Dalai Lama's succession," he said.

According to Tibetan Buddhist tradition, the Dalai Lama will reincarnate as a child whose identification requires searches and rituals, but there are concerns that his death may lead to social tensions in Tibet because of his poor relations with Beijing.

He indicated he would address the issue of his reincarnation after turning 90 years old, which is next July.

Reuters reported on Monday that the Dalai Lama, who underwent knee surgery in New York in June, recently reassured followers about his health.

"According to my dream, I may live 110 years," he said, speaking from his residence in Dharamsala in northern India.

The Dalai Lama has suggested the possibility of discontinuing his reincarnation to avoid intervention by China's government, but "the [Beijing] government has indicated, however, that it will adhere to the traditional succession process that applies to all tulkus [reincarnated lamas]," Sautman said.

"Central government officials concerned with Tibet thus need to be thoroughly acquainted with the process," he said, referring to the purpose of Wang's trip.

Beijing has labelled the Dalai Lama, a Nobel Peace Prize laureate, a "separatist" and alleges he incited unrest among Tibetans in the 1980s and during protests in 2008.

The People's Liberation Army (PLA) took control of Tibet in 1950. The Dalai Lama fled to India following a failed uprising in 1959 and has lived in exile since then.

On Monday, Wang viewed another exhibition that documents the CTCRC's contributions and research over the past nearly four decades, including establishing a "Chinese-characteristic Tibetan studies system" that explores aspects of Tibet and Tibetan regions in four other provinces, including politics, economics, culture and religion.

In June, a researcher at the centre said that although the Dalai Lama was outside China, his reincarnation remained under Chinese jurisdiction, and that it was "natural" for China's government to apply traditional principles to maintain control over Tibetan Buddhism. Efforts should be made to "promote the theoretical framework of the Chinese national community and tell the story of ethnic unity and progress in Tibet well. Political Consultative Conference members are urged to investigate and provide input on deep-seated issues affecting stability in Tibet, contributing to the creation of a harmonious and prosperous socialist modern Tibet," the CPPCC paper said.

Wang, who also leads the central working group on Tibetan works, has been "quite active" in visiting areas with a large Tibetan population, Sautman said, including trips to Garze and Aba in Sichuan with President Xi Jinping and a Tibet Aid Programme conference in August.

Serving as a key political theorist for China's leadership, Wang repeatedly emphasises developing theoretical frameworks to counter Western narratives on ethnic minority issues.

In Yunnan province in December last year, he advocated for a stronger theoretical system to foster a sense of a shared spiritual home among China's diverse ethnicities.

In May, he emphasised the use of archaeological artefacts and historical materials in Guangxi Zhuang autonomous region to deepen research on foundational issues concerning the Chinese national community.

Tibetan Buddhist scholar released from Chinese prison

22 December 2024, ANI

Prominent Tibetan Buddhist scholar, Geshe Rachung Gendun was released from Chinese custody after serving three and a half years in prison, reported Tibet.net.

However, his health severely deteriorated during his imprisonment. Gendun's release comes amid deep sorrow for his family, as his mother passed away on June 10 this year at the age of 85. Due to ongoing harassment by Chinese authorities, she was unable to receive proper medical treatment and tragically died without having the chance to see her son one last time.

Gendun, a monk at Kirti Monastery in Ngaba County, was arrested on the night of April 1, 2021, under unclear circumstances, and his whereabouts remained unknown for months. His family was denied access to information and visitation.

It was later revealed in July 2022 that he had been sentenced to three and a half years in prison for allegedly sending money abroad as offerings to the Dalai Lama and Kirti Rinpoche, the abbot of Kirti Monastery in India.

This recent imprisonment is part of a broader history of confrontations between Gendun and Chinese authorities. In 1998, he was detained during protests against China's "Patriotic Education Campaign" at Kirti Monastery, which severely restricted religious practices and led to the forced removal of young monks. Before his arrest, Gendun was pursuing the prestigious Geshe degree, the highest academic achievement in Tibetan Buddhism. He had studied complex philosophical texts and participated in challenging debate tours at various monasteries.

Geshe Rachung Gendun, born to the late Rachung Kuye and Norpo from Meruma's Third Division in Ngaba County, Tibet, grew up in the traditional province of Amdo. From a young age, he joined Kirti Monastery's Geden Lekshay Ling, where he received teachings from esteemed spiritual masters, including Geshe Jorge Aku Chozin, Aku Loye (Rako's Lobsang Sonam), and Geshe Lobsang Tashi, specialising in monastery rituals and practices.

Gendun's release has raised concerns about the continued suppression of religious freedom and cultural identity in Tibet, as well as the impact of Chinese policies on Tibetan monks and scholars. (ANI)

November

China's Panchen has concluded 5-month Tibet tour

27 November 2024, Tibetan Review

Gyaincain Norbu, the replacement 11th Panchen Lama reincarnation appointed by China to occupy the seat of Tibet's second most prominent religious figure, has completed a five-month tour of Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), according to China's official Xinhua news agency Nov 27. His tour this year has lasted one month less than last year's.

He was installed by China in 1995 after abducting and disappearing 6-year-old 11th Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, recognized and proclaimed by the Dalai Lama, Tibet's exiled spiritual leader.

Like the previous Panchen Lama, Gyaincain Norbu lives in Beijing, although the Tashi Lhunpo Monastery in Shigatse City, Tibet, is supposed to be his seat of authority.

The report said that during those five months, Gyaincain Norbu "performed regular duties, Buddhist rituals and social activities."

He was stated to have flown into Tibet's capital Lhasa from Qinghai on Jun 25.

From Jun 27 to Sep 9, he performed his duties as the president of the Xizang branch of the Buddhist Association of China, and carried out Buddhist rituals and social activities in the cities of Lhasa, Nagqu (Tibetan: Nagchu) and Nyingchi (Nyingtri), the report said, using China's Sinicized name for Tibet. He was earlier reported as re-elected to this post in September.

The report continued that from Sep 11 to Nov 25, Gyaincain Norbu "carried out a series of Buddhist rituals and social activities in the city of Xigaze, and presided over a meeting of the council of the Xizang branch of the Buddhist Association of China."

During his five-month tour in TAR, Gyaincain Norbu "performed head-touching rituals for nearly 70,000 monks and believers," the report added.

As the "11th Panchen Lama" Gyaincain Norbu is also a member of the Standing Committee of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, the PRC's top political advisory body, and also a vice president of the Buddhist Association of China.

Sacred buddhist mountain in China transformed into commercialized tourist destination

22 November 2024, Daily Mirror

Mount Putuo, one of Buddhism's four sacred mountains, has undergone a dramatic transformation under the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), evolving from a revered spiritual sanctuary to a commercialized tourist attraction. Once a site of profound religious significance dating back to the Tang Dynasty, the island now symbolizes the commodification of faith. With over 10 million tourists generating billions in revenue annually, religious activities are closely monitored by the Buddhist Association for China (BAC), the CCP's religious overseer. The peak of commercialization came in 2018 when the CCP sought to list the Mount Putuo Tourism Development Company on the stock market. The attempt was halted only after widespread Buddhist protests.

The once-sacred spaces now feature luxury spas, gift shops offering mass-produced religious souvenirs, and a pilgrimage route designed solely to maximize tourist numbers. The island's origin story has been rewritten to align with nationalist propaganda, positioning China as the rightful center of Buddhism. The pilgrimage routes, once a journey of spiritual significance, are now replaced by mass transportation options to accommodate the growing tourist traffic. Even religious items are sold as cheap trinkets, including "Guanyin cake," reducing the sacredness of Buddhist legends to a marketing ploy. Even more concerning is the CCP's historical revisionism. The island's history has been altered to minimize its connections with Japan and present China as the true center of Buddhism. State media increasingly portrays Tibetan Buddhist practices as inferior to Chinese traditions. This strategy aims not only to strengthen Chinese influence but to undermine Tibetan cultural and religious identity by delegitimizing Tibetan Buddhism.

The commercialization of Mount Putuo has had a profound impact on authentic Buddhist practice. Monks and pilgrims now find themselves marginalized in a space dominated by tourists. Rising entry fees and the overwhelming commercialization hinder the contemplative spiritual practices that once defined the mountain. This transformation is not an isolated incident but part of a broader CCP strategy to control Buddhist discourse and use religious heritage as a geopolitical tool. Despite being an officially atheist state, China now claims to be the global guardian of Buddhism.

China's recent announcement to host the "6th Buddhist Council" is a clear example of historical appropriation, attempting to align itself as the global custodian of Buddhism despite its atheist stance. Through strategic religious diplomacy, China strengthens ties with Buddhist-majority nations while whitewashing its human rights violations and undermining Tibetan Buddhism.

Through this religious diplomacy, China seeks to portray itself as the protector of Buddhism, using cultural soft power to expand its political influence across Asia. However, the reality at home is starkly different. While China projects an image of spiritual sophistication abroad, it continues to dismantle Buddhist institutions domestically. In Tibet and Xinjiang, the CCP has engaged in widespread religious repression, including the destruction of monasteries and the detention of religious figures, actions that directly contradict the image China seeks to project as Buddhism's protector.

Mount Putuo stands as a warning about the fate of religious heritage under authoritarian rule. The CCP's approach to this sacred site, disguised as cultural preservation, has stripped it of its spiritual essence. Once a sanctuary for pilgrims, it has become a stage for the Party's political agenda, driven by profit, power, and control. The manipulation of Mount Putuo and China's broader Buddhist diplomacy strategy illustrates how religious traditions can be reshaped for political gain. While this strategy may advance China's geopolitical interests, it also highlights the cynical ways in which the CCP manipulates religious heritage, claiming to preserve it while actively undermining its authentic expression.

China Moves Tibetan Buddhist Monastery Students To State Schools | Exclusive

22 November 2024, News18, Manoj Gupta

The Lhamo Kirti Monastery school was completely shut down as part of China's broader initiative to control the Tibetan education

The Chinese authorities recently transferred around 200 students from a Tibetan Buddhist monastery school in Sichuan province to state-administered residential schools, in what agencies have termed a sign of China's escalation on Tibetan Buddhism.

According to a note from top intelligence agencies, the Lhamo Kirti Monastery school was completely shut down as part of China's broader initiative to control Tibetan education. Four Tibetan youths were detained in Sichuan for resisting forced transfers from monastic schools to state-run schools. They then underwent political re-education before being compelled to enrol in a local government school.

"China aims to promote loyalty to the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) through state-run education. Over 1 million Tibetan children have been placed in state-run schools promoting Mandarin and Chinese cultural values. China has intensified control over Tibetan Buddhism through stricter restrictions, increased surveillance, and forced assimilation policies. China's actions aim to assimilate Tibetan identity and limit family contact," read the note.

Intelligence sources said, "China asserts control over the appointment of Tibetan religious leaders, including the Dalai Lama's reincarnation. The launch of the Tibet International Communication Centre was to reshape international narratives."

"China has intensified control over Tibet, targeting religious, educational, and environmental spheres to take them away from their roots and a situation like that of the Uighurs is being created. Arrests are being carried out for contacting outsiders in these areas and they are threatened that they will be sent to rehabilitation centres in case of non-compliance," sources said.

In September, Chen Wenqing, the head of the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission – the ruling Communist Party's top security body, visited the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and some of the 10 Tibetan autonomous prefectures across Yunnan, Sichuan, Gansu and Qinghai and reviewed security. He called for a resolute crackdown against separatists.

He also asked the local officials to maintain stability and guard against independence activities, the Hong Kong-based South China Morning Post reported.

In July, the US passed the Resolve Tibet Act, which enhances its support for Tibet and promotes dialogue between China and the Dalai Lama toward a peaceful resolution of the dispute over the status and governance of the remote Himalayan region.

Monastic schools in Ngaba targeted amid crackdown on Tibetan-language education

08 November 2024, ICT

In yet another assault on Tibetan language in eastern Tibet, Chinese authorities have forcibly removed younger monks from the Taktsang Lhamo Monastic School and pressed them into state-run schools over recent months.

China is implementing multiple laws and policies crafted over the years to forcibly convert Tibetans into so-called model Chinese citizens for the "Chinese nation." The sophisticated assimilation program is being rolled out gradually to avoid international condemnation and to support the untrue argument that Tibetan assimilation into Chinese culture is a natural process.

Taktsang Lhamo Monastic School closed

Taktsang Lhamo monastic school, located in Dzoge (Chinese: Ruò'ěrgài) County in Ngaba Prefecture, Sichuan, has been targeted by Chinese authorities for at least two decades. It was forcibly shut down multiple times in the past but reemerged each time as the focus of Chinese political policies and priorities shifted. Under Xi Jinping's rule, the school's continued survival is in doubt.

Main entrance to Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery

The monastic school, with its enrollment of over 500 minor monks, had remained relatively undisturbed by Chinese authorities in recent years. This cautious approach by the authorities was largely due to firm resistance from monks in the past, which even manifested as self-immolation protests in April 2013. Chinese legal and regulatory framework requires minor monks to be unenrolled from monasteries and mandates that every minor undergo the state-imposed mandatory schooling. While these policies have been firmly implemented in many parts of Tibet over time, the Taktsang Lhamo monastic school was able to operate normally, despite routine restrictions, until recently.

The Ngaba Plan

The cautious approach seems to have changed after the Ngaba (Aba) Prefecture Education Development Conference that was held on July 8, 2024. The conference focused on "new goals and tasks for promoting the high-quality development of education in the prefecture". The conference was focused on implementing the Ngaba Prefecture's 14th Five-Year Plan for Basic Education, the Sichuan Provincial five year education plan and the National Ethnic Affairs Commission of China's (NEAC) dictum on strengthening the sense of community of the Chinese nation.

NEAC broadly dictates that the "sense of community of the Chinese nation" be instilled and "to comprehensively strengthen national unity and progress and national common language and writing education, actively and steadily promote the integration of schools, mixed classes and mixed accommodation for all ethnic groups". The Sichuan provincial “14th Five-Year Plan” Education Development Plan states education is a major national and party strategy and the party’s education policy must be fully implemented for the overall development of the Party and country.

It further states that the CCP General Secretary Xi Jinping’s expositions on education should be fully implemented in all aspects of education development to serve the CCP’s governance and for the consolidation and development of the socialist system with Chinese characteristics.

Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastic School, which falls under the jurisdiction of Dzoge County in Ngaba Prefecture, Sichuan, is obligated to follow the provincial and national level policies of the Chinese administrative system. Prior to the closure of the school, 69 kindergarten schools had already been closed, 8 kindergartens had been merged and the categories of 33 kindergartens had been changed to fulfil “14th Five-Year Plan for Basic Education School Layout and Construction in Aba Prefecture” according to Ngaba Prefecture Ethnic and Religious Affairs Commission in July 2024.

With all kindergartens effectively closed in the prefecture, the focus seems to have shifted to the monastic schools in Ngaba. In July, another popular school, Jigme Gyaltsen Nationalities Vocational School, established over three decades in neighboring Golog Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Qinghai, was shut down in accordance with Qinghai provincial government and party instructions. Although not strictly a monastic school, Jigme Gyaltsen school had a unique blend of students from both the monastic and lay community.

Assimilation campaign

The consecutive closures of private Tibetan language and culture focused schools indicates that the Chinese authorities in Tibet have relied on a flexible approach to education policy; allowing local officials to adapt laws and policies to local conditions with the long-term goal of achieving complete sinification, in which Tibetan culture is eliminated. As a result, Chinese authorities invoke applicable laws to gradually and steadily meet the set goals at hand for uniformity in implementation under the label of universalization of education. Since Xi Jinping took over the General Secretary of the CCP in 2012, private Tibetan schools offering Tibetan language and culture education have been repeatedly targeted in implementation of state education policies in Tibet. Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastic School is the most recent target and most likely not the last.

Prior to Xi Jinping’s rise to the General Secretary of the CCP in 2012, the Central Committee of the Communist Party in May 1985 decided to change the education system. The Law of the People’s Republic of China on Compulsory Education and the Outline of China’s Education Reform and Development were promulgated in 1986 to implement the CCP central committee’s decision to universalize nine-year compulsory education. The compulsory education law was amended by the Standing Committee of China’s National People’s Congress in June 2006 making receiving the compulsory education an obligation in accordance with the law. The coercive education policy holds parents liable if they do not send their children to state-controlled schools and are subjected to legal regulation. In essence parents do not have the choice to send their children to an educational institution of their choice, which an emphasis on the preservation of Tibetan culture and the inclination of the children. While such education policy seems benign and fulfilling human rights obligations for the ethnic Chinese people. its implementation has had a different impact on the Tibetan people, especially given Tibet’s status as an occupied country. These coercive policies to “modernize education” and promote “national unity” have affected Tibetans’ traditional modes of learning and transmission of centuries-old knowledge, and most crucially denied parents and students the freedom to access culturally Tibetan education.

Effects of the Plan

For centuries, monasteries have served as critical centers of education for the Tibetan people, with children often beginning their monastic education as young as 5 or 6 years old, embarking on a lifelong journey of learning. Under the current environment of coercive implementation of education policies, parents who request to have their children stay in the monastery’s school are not only being denied but accused of brainwashing their children.

Students resisting transfer from their monastery schools to the government run boarding schools are detained, subjected to political education, captured and forced back into school, even if they are suicidal at the thought of returning to the “prison-like conditions” in the state boarding schools. For instance, four young monks from Taktsang Lhamo monastic school were detained on Oct 2. for “political re-education” after resisting transfer and then forcibly placed in a state boarding school after their release on Oct 6.

In a disturbing video from early September 2024, some men who are presumably government employees forcibly shove a young monk into a white car to enroll him in a state boarding school. The young monk was one of the 140 monastic students from Muge monastic school in Muge, Ngaba. In another disturbing incident, three young monks from the same Muge monastic school, who were forced into a state boarding school, attempted suicide by jumping into a river to escape from the school. They described the school as "prison-like," noting corporal punishment and insufficient food as reasons for their desperate action.

Will the school reemerge?

Since 1986, Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery provided specialized cultural education classes to young monks before they began formal Buddhist studies. In 1993, the Taktsang Lhamo Tibetan Cultural School was established specifically for young monks, but it was forcibly closed in 2003 by Chinese authorities. Later, the Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery established a Preliminary Buddhist Studies School, which was also forced to close.

Despite multiple restrictions placed on the monastery since the 2008 spring protests in Ngaba, the institution remained resilient, managing to keep the school open despite suffocating restrictions until July 2024. The monastic school demonstrated remarkable persistence, reemerging each time it was closed by Chinese authorities.

However, reemergence under the current political climate and coercive implementation of China's education policy has become increasingly difficult. The ongoing restrictions on educational institutions and state policies have created significant challenges for maintaining educational programs within the monastery with all the young monks forced into state run boarding schools to become Chinese.

Chinese scholars highlight Ramayan's footprints in China buried in Buddhist texts

03 November 2024, The New Indian Express

The Monkey King with human characteristics called Sun Wukong, has remained forages in the best-loved and most enduring Chinese literature and folklore.

China has had footprints of the stories of Ramayana cloaked in Buddhist scriptures for centuries, scholars here have said, bringing to the fore perhaps for the first time, the influence of Hinduism in the country's checkered history.

At a symposium on 'Ramayana- A Timeless Guide' organised by the Indian Embassy on Saturday, a host of Chinese scholars associated with longstanding research on religious influences, made candid presentations tracing the historical routes through which Ramayana reached China and its influence on Chinese art and literature.

"As a classic intertwining the religious and the secular world, the influence of Ramayana has grown ever more significantly through cross-cultural transmission," Dr Jiang Jingkui, Professor and Dean of the Institute for International and Area Studies of Tsinghua University said.

"China, too, has absorbed elements of this epic, which not only left traces in Chinese (majority) Han culture but was also reinterpreted and given new meaning in Chinese Xizang (Tibetan) culture," he said.

China officially refers to Tibet as Xizang.

"This cultural migration and adaptation demonstrate the openness and flexibility of Ramayana as a classic and worldly text," Jiang said.

"The earliest content related to Ramayana in China was introduced into the Han cultural sphere, primarily through Buddhist scriptures," he said.

While it was not fully incorporated as a complete work into the Han cultural sphere, parts of the epic were incorporated into Buddhist scriptures, he said, citing Chinese translations of Buddhist scripts in which key figures such as Dasharatha and Hanuman were noted as Buddhist characters.

"A famous example is that Hanuman was transformed into a Monkey King who obeyed Buddhist teachings, blending into classic Buddhist moral narratives," Jiang said.

The Monkey King with human characteristics called Sun Wukong, has remained forages in the best-loved and most enduring Chinese literature and folklore.

In his presentation, Pro Liu Jian of the National Institute of International Strategies of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, said many Chinese scholars agree that Sun Wukong can be traced to Hanuman, though some scholars say he is a 'domestic product'.

"Chinese scholars generally agree that the image of Sun Wukong comes from that of Hanuman. Therefore, Sun Wukong is not a domestic product, but a character from India," he asserted.

Speaking on the topic 'Footsteps of Ram in China', Prof Qiu Yonghuai, Chief expert and Deputy Director of China Centre for South Asian Studies of Sichuan University, in her presentation displayed photos of a wide variety of different Hindu deities in the museum Quanzhou, in China's Fujian province.

She even showed a photo of a Buddhist temple managed by a Hindu priest.

"It was primarily through Buddhism that Indian culture took its stronghold in China. This is the reason why in the history of Sino-Indian cultural relations, Hinduism occupies a negligible position," she said.

"Multifaceted Indian culture – both Buddhist and non-Buddhist – made its mark on Chinese soil," she added.

Jiang, in his speech also recalled how the famous seventh-century Chinese scholar Xuanzang who visited India, studied at Nalanda University and brought back a host of Buddhist scriptures providing detailed accounts of Ramayana stories he heard during his pilgrimage.

"However, due to the Hindu background of Ramayana and the predominance of Buddhism in China, the text was neither fully translated nor widely circulated within Han culture," he said.

The first Chinese translation of Ramayana from Sanskrit was done by Ji Xianlin in 1980.

"Ji's translation was a significant breakthrough for Chinese academia, providing Chinese readers with access to an Indian literary classic and establishing a new bridge for Sino-Indian cultural exchange," Jiang said.

"Ji dedicated nearly a decade to translating this vast work of twenty-four thousand verses, and his version has become a cornerstone for the study of Ramayana in China," he said.

Jiang added that Ramayana has a more extensive and longstanding history of influence in Tibet, where it was first introduced during the period of the Tubo Kingdom.

Through literary works and theatrical performances, Ramayana has not only become a subject of in-depth study among Tibetan scholars but has also gained widespread popularity among common people in Tibet.

This demonstrates the powerful vitality of Ramayana as a cross-cultural classic, he said Ramayana is not only an epic but also a profound exposition of the ideal personality and ideal society.

"Through the actions and words of Rama, as well as the establishment of the 'Ram Rajya', the epic presents multiple dimensions of the concept of 'Adarsh' (ideal) in Indian culture," he said.

In his address, Indian Ambassador to China Pradeep Kumar Rawat said Ramayana is believed to be the oldest poetic work of human civilisation.

"While the historians have not come to a definite conclusion about the time period when the Ramayana was written, there is astronomybased research finding that date Ramayana to about 7th Century B.C.," he said.

"The Ramayana has also transcended geographical boundaries, adapting itself to seamlessly merging into local cultural tapestry, while maintaining its core values," he added.

Several Chinese professors, including Yin-Xi-nan of Sichuan University, and Xue Yuyun of Gansu National University for Nationalities made presentations on the impact of Ramayana in China over the ages.

Ambassador of Thailand to China, Chatchai Viriyavejakul and Perulian George Andreas Silalahi, Deputy Ambassador of Indonesia, spoke of the impact of Ramayana in their countries.

China restricts young Tibetan monks in 'prison-like' schools

01 November 2024, UCA News

They are not permitted to leave the school grounds or meet their parents Tibetans have accused the pro-Beijing authorities in the region of housing hundreds of young Tibetan Buddhist monks in prison-like conditions at government-run boarding schools, says a report.

The students forcibly transferred from the Kirti Monastery schools in Sichuan province's Ngaba county are not even permitted to leave the school grounds or meet their parents, Radio Free Asia (RFA) reported on Oct. 31.

Young monks having a walk after classes at the Tibet Autonomous Region Buddhist College on May 31, 2021. (Photo: AFP)

"Since being forcibly removed from the monastery, the students have been denied contact with their parents and receive inadequate medical care when ill," RFA reported, citing an unnamed source.

"When parents request to meet their children, they are given various excuses about needing higher-level approval and ultimately face threats of imprisonment if they persist," the unnamed source added.

The students between the ages of 6-17 are taught exclusively in Mandarin, RFA reported.

Some of the students who attempted to escape the school were apprehended and are now being treated "like criminals" and forbidden from leaving the school grounds.

Over 1,000 young Tibetan monks were transferred from the Kirti Monastery to state-administered "colonial style" boarding schools in July.

The authorities closed another school at Lhamo Kirti Monastery in Dzoge county, affecting some 600 students.

The authorities had compelled parents to sign agreements ensuring that their children would be enrolled in government-run schools, where they would undergo state-approved "patriotic education." Pro-Beijing authorities in Tibet cite China's regulations on religious affairs which mandate that the students at monastic schools must be 18 or older, display patriotism, and be compliant with national laws.

Tibetan critics of China's communist-led government allege that these regulations are part of a broader policy to eradicate the use of the Tibetan language, suppress Tibetan culture, and enforce "patriotic education."

China's patriotic education policy mandates that the love of China and the ruling Chinese Communist Party be incorporated into work and study for all citizens.

The Chinese authorities in the region have also intensified surveillance and restrictions on Tibetans in Ngaba county following the school closures.

A high-ranking official from China's United Front Work Department is permanently stationed in Ngaba for several months, overseeing control measures over both the monastery and the local community.

The authorities have also unleashed a crackdown on any form of communication with the outside world, RFA reported.

In October, the authorities in Dzoge seized the phones of monks and teachers of Lhamo Kirti Monastery, accusing them of sharing the news of school closures.

In September, the authorities arrested four Tibetans, including two monks from Kirti Monastery, as well as two laypersons in Ngaba, accusing them of contacting Tibetans outside the region.

The Chinese government has claimed that the communication between Tibetans and their family members and friends abroad undermines national unity as a reason for communication restrictions, RFA reported.

Tibetans have denounced Beijing's surveillance, accusing the authorities of violating their human rights and trying to eradicate their religious, linguistic, and cultural identity.

October

China Escalates Crackdown on Tibetan Buddhism

11 October 2024, RTV

Beijing has intensified its campaign to assert control over Tibetan Buddhism, tightening religious and cultural restrictions. Recent high-profile visits by top Chinese officials signal a renewed crackdown, marked by harsher surveillance, school closures, and forced assimilation policies. Over one million Tibetan children have been separated from their families, while the Chinese Communist Party strengthens its grip on religious practices, including its controversial control over the Dalai Lama's reincarnation.

China's ongoing campaign to "sinicize" Tibetan Buddhism is deepening, with authorities pushing for greater control over religious and cultural practices in Tibetan regions. The United States Commission on International Religious Freedom's 2024 report highlights a growing suppression of religious freedom in Tibet. Tibetan Buddhist monasteries face tighter scrutiny, while security measures have been ramped up. Monks and nuns are subjected to indoctrination sessions and harsher penalties, as seen in the recent crackdown on the Tengdro Monastery.

A key part of Beijing's strategy is to assimilate Tibetan identity into the broader Chinese society. More than one million Tibetan children have been removed from their families and placed in state-run boarding schools, where they are taught in Mandarin and exposed to Chinese cultural ideals, further eroding Tibetan language and traditions. This move coincides with the closure of Tibetan-language schools, including the Jigme Gyaltsen Nationalities Vocational School, which had been operating for over 30 years.

Chinese authorities are also expanding their influence over the appointment of Tibetan religious leaders, requiring that all reincarnated Tibetan Lamas, including the Dalai Lama, be approved by the state. This interference has drawn sharp criticism from Tibetan communities and international human rights groups, who see it as a direct attack on the region's religious autonomy. The government's decision to close schools, suppress cultural practices, and tightly regulate religious affairs is part of a broader policy to secure its political dominance over Tibet. Recent visits by senior Chinese officials to Tibet and other Tibetan-inhabited areas underscore the state's commitment to consolidating control. Top officials, including Chen Wenqing and Ying Yong, have emphasized the need to "crack down on separatist activities" and manage religious affairs in line with the law. These visits have coincided with the expansion of military infrastructure in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), raising concerns over China's intentions in the strategically significant region.

In another bold step, China launched the Tibet International Communication Center in Lhasa in September 2024, a propaganda hub aimed at shaping international views on Tibet. The center aligns with the government's push to dominate the narrative on Tibet ahead of the 6th World Buddhist Forum, scheduled for October 2024, where China plans to further promote its policies to international Buddhist communities.

China detained Tibetan youngsters for resisting transfer from monastic to colonial boarding schools

09 October 2024, Tibetan Review

Chinese authorities in a Tibetan area of Sichuan province have detained and subjected to political education four Tibetan youngsters for resisting transfer from their monastic school to a secular one run by the Chinese government meant to Sinicize them, reported the Tibetan service of rfa.org Oct 8, citing local Tibetan sources.

The students, aged 15-18, had been attending a school run by the Lhamo Kirti Monastery in Dzoge (Chinese: Ruò'ěrgài) county in the province's Ngaba (or Ngawa, Chinese: Aba) prefecture before the Chinese government forced its closure in early Jul 2024. Parents were ordered to enrol their children in government-run schools. These "colonial style" schools teach all subjects in Chinese language with primary focus on studying the "Xi Jinping Thought on socialism with Chinese characteristics for a new era". This is meant to make Chinese of the Tibetan children under the Chinese president's Sinicization drive.

A total of 300 novice monk-students were transferred to such Chinese schools last month, and the remaining 300 on Oct 2.

The four boys were detained on Oct 2 and subjected to several days of "political re-education". They were then forced to attend a local government-run school after their release on Oct 6, the report said, citing two local sources who could not be named for safety reasons.

"Those who refuse to go to the government-run school are being detained," the report quoted another local Tibetan source as saying. "Many children were also forced to attend political education sessions", during which they are told of having been "negatively influenced by their parents and the monastery."

Monasteries have for centuries been the main centres of learning for the Tibetan people who enrol in them at as young as 5-6 years of age. China put an end to this practice with a new vigour from 2018 in a renewed campaign to Sinicize Tibet.

Not only do children learn everything only in Mandarin Chinese in these boarding schools but they are also reportedly denied contact with their families for long periods. As a result, they are said to find it difficult to communicate with their parents later on.

China's Sixth World Buddhist Forum to be held 15–17 October at Xuedou Temple, Ningbo

04 October 2024, BDG

The Sixth World Buddhist Forum will be held in China from 15–17 October at Ningbo, Zhejiang, on the eastern coast of China. Delegates from over 80 countries will be participating, with the theme for the conference being titled, "Hand in Hand for Coexistence," which emphasizes the Chinese emphasis on multipolarity and non-interference.

The Sixth World Buddhist Forum is a cornerstone of Chinese Buddhist diplomacy. The conference is being organized by Wang Bangjin, party secretary of Ningbo, and Jin Liping, municipal party committee supervisor. The previous, fifth session of the World Buddhist Forum was held at the coastal city of Putian, in China's Fujian province. The Forum will hold a grand opening ceremony at Ningbo's Xuedou Temple, in the temple's Longhua Square.

Xuedou Temple is part of the Xuedou Maitreya Complex. It has seen over a millennium of prosperity and decline, and was destroyed and rebuilt five times. The most famous abbot of the temple in recent memory was Master Taixu (1890–1947), the great reform-minded monastic and forefather of Humanistic Buddhism. In 1933, proposed that Xuedou Mountain become one of China's five renowned Buddhist mountains. (China Daily)

Zhejiang as a heartland of Chinese Buddhism

Ningbo is in Zhejiang Province, with the capital being Hangzhou. The latter has long been touted as a core historical and contemporary hub of Chinese Buddhism. Ningbo also houses the famous Ayuwang Temple (阿育王寺), or the Temple of Ashoka the Great. According to the Princeton University Art Museum, the Ayuwang Monastery is the subject of several legends, including being established in 282 during the Western Jin Dynasty by the foreign monastic Huida (惠達). Its most important artifact is a parietal bone of the Buddha Shakyamuni, which is presently stored in a stupa shaped reliquary in the temple's Relic Hall (sheli dian 舍利殿). (Princeton University)

The broader province of Zhejiang is core to China's vision and strategy for Buddhist diplomacy. Former Chinese president Jiang Zemin (1926–2022) visited Ayuwang Monastery with Chinese leader Xi Jinping in 2002, while Xi was still the provincial governor of Zhejiang. Four years later in 2006, the First World Buddhist Forum was held in 2006, during Xi's tenure as governor and party secretary of Zhejiang.

Sharing "Maitreya Culture" with the world

Ningbo is also described as the hometown of Budai, who is known in Chinese Buddhism as an incarnation of Maitreya (known stereotypically in the West as the fat laughing Buddha). The government of Ningbo Fenghua District has pushed Xuedou Mountain as the “distribution center” of “Maitreya culture”: a platform to explore the cultural essence of openness, tolerance, harmony and joy. The spirit of tolerance, kindness, wisdom, humor, and optimism contained in Maitreya culture shows a wealth of life wisdom that is closely connected with the traditional emphasis on harmony in Chinese culture and philosophy. “Maitreya culture is very helpful in solving people’s spiritual confusion and promoting social harmony,” said Wei Daoru, a researcher at the Institute of World Religions of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences.

Xuedou Temple. Image from Niraj Kumar

The open-air Maitreya Buddha or Budai stature on Xuedou Mountain, Fenghua, is part of the Xuedou Maitreya Complex. It holds the record of highest sitting posture for a sculpture in the world. In December 2013, a smaller iteration of this stature was moved to Lumbini Chinese Temple at the site of Lumbini, Nepal. This smaller Buddha statue was escorted to the Chinese temple by the Fenghua Cultural Mission, and was an integral event during the 6th Nepal China Festival.

“This Buddha was carefully customized and built by Nepal in Lumbini, which highlights the importance both sides attach to cultural exchanges,” Jin Jianfan, vice chairman of the Chinese Culture Promotion Association, had said. Xuedou Temple has held 16 “Xuedou Mountain Maitreya Cultural Festival” in a row, providing believers with a wealth of Buddhist cultural activities.

The opening ceremony of one of the sessions of the China-South Korea-Japan Buddhist Friendly Interaction Conference was also held on Xuedou Mountain, in October 2016. The purpose of these trilateral exchanges is to reaffirm of the “golden bond” of Buddhism that contributes to a harmonious relationship the three countries, and to explore ways in which the three nations can contribute to regional stability and harmony in the Asia-Pacific region. The conference was first held in 1995, and by 2022 it had been held 22 times.

Authorities transfer 200 Tibetan monastic students to state schools

02 October 2024, RFA

Tibetans oppose the measure, calling the new facilities ‘colonial-style’ boarding schools.

Chinese authorities on Wednesday transferred the remaining students at a shuttered Tibetan Buddhist monastery school in Sichuan province to state-administered residential schools, two Tibetans with knowledge of the situation said.

In early July, Radio Free Asia reported that authorities had closed down the Buddhist school of Lhamo Kirti Monastery in Dzoge county, known among locals as Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery, affecting nearly 600 students. They also required parents to enroll their children in state-administered residential schools.

Chinese officials transferred about 300 of the students to state-run boarding schools in September, said the sources, who declined to be named so they could speak about a sensitive issue.

And on Wednesday, the remaining 200-some students, aged 15 to 18, were forcibly admitted to similar state-run institutions, leaving the monastery school completely unoccupied, they said.

The measure is part of the Chinese government’s efforts to control Tibetan Buddhist education and assimilate Tibetan youth, activists say.

Tibetans opposed the transfer, saying the new facilities are “colonial-style” boarding schools where children are separated from their families and taught a Chinese-language curriculum that promotes loyalty to the Chinese Communist Party.

Authorities previously summoned the students’ parents for patriotic re-education sessions and had them sign agreements not to enroll their children in monastic schools before the legal age of 18, the sources said.

Established in 1986, the Lhamo Kirti Monastery school initially provided foundational education to young monks before their advanced studies in Buddhist philosophy.

After being temporarily closed in 2003, the school reopened under the name Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastic School, focusing on educating novices.

Authorities also shut down another school at Kirti Monastery in Ngaba county, Sichuan province, affecting 1,000 students, RFA reported in July.

September

China jails monk for Tibetan uprising voice message, online display of Dalai Lama speech

24 September 2024, Tibetan Review

China has jailed a Tibetan Buddhist monk in Qinghai province for displaying a speech of His Holiness the Dalai Lama on the back of his WeChat social media voice message meant to commemorate the Tibetan national Uprising Day of Mar 10 this year, reported the Tibetan language tibettime.net Sep 24.

The monk, Jampa Choephel, from Rebgong (Chinese: Tongren) County in the province's Malho (Huangnan) prefecture, was arrested from his monastic living quarter in the middle of Mar 2024 and was held in the detention centre at Gurathang in Lower Rebgong from Mar 22 onwards.

He was tried and jailed for one and half years last month. Following his sentencing the monk was taken to a provincial prison in capital Ziling (Xining) on Sep 22 to serve the remaining one year of his term.

Throughout the period his incarceration, which began with his arrest by the Rebgong city police, continued when the city people's procuracy charged him, and when the city people's court tried and sentenced him, no notice of any kind was given about him to his family.

On the other hand, his close family members were warned that the monk could be severely punished, that their visits to the Chinese government offices to seek information about his situation were by themselves severe criminal violations.

The report cited its source as saying Jampa Choephel was already always under close surveillance from the Chinese government; that on every Tibetan festive occasion, they kept spying on him from rooftops, walls and other places.

Jampa Choephel had travelled to India as a refugee in 1986 and studied for 10 years at the Buddhist Dialectics Institute in Dharamshala. He then returned home in 1996. He devoted himself to meditating and religious practices at Penkarthang Monastery in Lower Rebgong. Occasionally, he took part in events during major religious occasions. He is known for his skill in Tibetan script writing and is also conversant in English, both of which he would teach others, the report said.

Prominent Tibetan Buddhist monk sentenced to 3 years in prison

13 September 2024, RFA

Lobsang Thabkhey was arrested in June 2023 for publishing books from Tibetans in exile.

Lobsang Thabkhey, a Tibetan Buddhist monk at Kirti Monastery in southwestern China's Sichuan province, is seen in an undated photo. (Citizen photo)

A Tibetan Buddhist monk who worked as a monastery librarian was sentenced to three years in prison during a "secret" trial, two sources from inside Tibet told Radio Free Asia.

Police arrested Lobsang Thabkhey, 55, in June 2023 for allegedly engaging in "separatist activities."

They accused him of possessing and republishing books from the exiled Tibetan community and for having contact with people outside the region when he was in charge of the library at Kirti Monastery in Ngaba county in southwest China's Sichuan province.

Chinese authorities consider it illegal for Tibetans inside Tibet to contact people outside the region and engage with the exiled Tibetan community or the Tibetan spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, who China considers a "separatist."

While the specific charges leveled against Thabkhey are unknown, sources said they were likely related to previous charges of publishing "banned books" in Tibet and having contact with "external forces."

Thabkhey's family recently learned about the sentence, but authorities did not provide information about the date of the trial or the nature of the charges, said the sources.

According to China's Criminal Procedure Law, family members of those in custody must be notified within 24 hours of their arrest, except in crimes or cases deemed to be endangering national security where notification may obstruct the investigation.

Radio Free Asia contacted the Ngaba Public Security Bureau for confirmation, but an official there who did not provide his name said the office had no information about Thabkhey.

Prior to Thabkhey's 2023 arrest, police repeatedly summoned and interrogated him about his alleged "separatist activities," the sources said.

Thabkhey hails from Ngaba's Meruma township, which has been the scene of many protests and pro-Tibet political activities since 2008.

EXCLUSIVE: Area where Buddhist monastery stood now under water

12 September 2024, RFA, Tenzin Pema

Tibetans have decried the Chinese dam project as another example of disregard for their culture.

Rising waters from a new dam in central China have submerged the area where a 135-year-old Tibetan Buddhist monastery once stood, as well as a nearby village, according to experts who viewed satellite photos and two sources inside Tibet.

The Atsok Monastery, built in 1889, was demolished earlier this year to make way for the expansion of the Yangqu hydropower station in Qinghai province. Tibetans have decried the dam's construction, saying it is yet another example of the Chinese government's disregard for their culture, religion and environment.

After floodgates for the dam were closed around Aug. 10, reservoirs filled and water levels rose in upstream areas of the Machu River, or Yellow River in Chinese, experts who saw the satellite imagery said.

Satellite photos showed the complete submersion of the 18-hectare (44-acre) monastery area and nearby Chorten village and the partial submersion of adjacent farmlands of Yangchu village, said Y. Nithiyanandam, professor and head of the geospatial program at Takshashila Institution in Bengaluru, India.

"The water levels have risen by nearly 100 meters [328 feet] above the previous regular flow, submerging the villages. It is difficult to predict at this time whether the water storage has reached its threshold or may continue to rise," added Nithiyanandam.

Jacob Bogle, a private satellite imagery analyst, also said the images showed that water levels reached the elevation of the monastery on Aug. 16, and that by Aug. 31, the site was completely submerged.

The growing reservoir now reaches about 30 kilometers (19 miles) upstream, possibly flooding some of the farmland around the village of Thangnak town, Bogle said.

Spiritual place

Chinese authorities said they would fund the costs of dismantling and reconstructing parts of the monastery, but many of the murals and surrounding stupas cannot be physically moved and so were destroyed.

Tibetans believe that the place where the monastery stood is sacred, and that it had been made holier over 135 years of prayers and practice by several generations.

The Yangqu hydroelectric plant — expected to generate about 5 billion kilowatts of power annually to Henan province — is an expansion of the Yangqu Dam that was first built in 2010 and began operating in 2016 as a 1,200-megawatt hydropower station.

The expansion was started in 2022 and was completed this year. China's National Development and Reform Commission, or NDRC, said it would force the relocation of more than 15,500 people — nearly all ethnic Tibetans — living in 24 towns and villages in Dragkar, Kawasumdo and Mangra counties.

Dragkar county sits in Tsolho, or Hainan in Chinese, Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in the historic Amdo region of Tibet.

State media reports said on Aug. 14 that the dam had officially lowered its gate to store water, indicating that the construction had entered "the sprint stage before it is put into production and power generation."

Local Tibetan sources, who requested anonymity for fear of reprisals, told RFA they fear that the dam could cause further flooding and destroy their homes and farmland in the nearby Yangqu village.

China-appointed Panchen urges firm upholding of final party say on reincarnation issue

11 September 2024, Tibetan Review

The Chinese government Appointed "11th Panchen Lama reincarnation" Gyaincain Norbu has on Jul 18 called on the Tibetan people to firmly uphold the final say of the Communist Party of China (CPC) on the reincarnation issue while expressing strong opposition to secession.

Chairing a seminar on a themed exhibition of the reincarnation of Living Buddhas of Tibetan Buddhism, he stressed the need to firmly uphold the CPC Central Committee's final say on the reincarnation of Living Buddhas of Tibetan Buddhism and voiced strong opposition to secession, while calling for national unity, ethnic unity, and religious and social harmony, reported China's official Xinhua news agency Sep 10. It was stated to be one of several meetings he chaired during his ongoing months-long tour of the Tibetan areas of the People's Republic of China.

The report said that over the past few months, Gyaincain Norbu had performed his regular duties at the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) branch of the Buddhist Association of China, and carried out a series of Buddhist and social activities in Tibet's capital Lhasa.

He was previously reported to have visited Golog Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Qinghai Province, and Nagchu and Nyingri prefecture-level cities in that order, setting out from Lhasa and returning to it each time.

On Sep 3, he was unanimously "elected" the president of the TAR branch of the Buddhist Association of China at the first council meeting of the branch's 12th council. This was his "re-election" after his first "election" in 2021,

The report said that on Sep 1, Gyaincain Norbu concluded his Buddhist and social activities in Lhasa and arrived by train in Xigaze (Shigatse), "where he will continue with a series of similar engagements."

Shigatse is home to Tashi Lhunpo Monastery, the historical seat of the successive Panchen Lama reincarnations, although the 10th Panchen Lama and his supposed successor Gyaincain Norbu have spent very little time in it as China required them to live in Beijing under close supervision and guidance of the party's United Front Work Department.

As regards the 11th Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, his fate has continued to remain unknown ever since he was abducted, with his family, by the Chinese government in 1995, just days after he was recognized and proclaimed by the Dalai Lama, Tibet's exiled spiritual leader.

Gyaincain Norbu is currently also a member of the Standing Committee of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, China's top political advisory body, and a vice president of the Buddhist Association of China. The Panchen Lama is Tibet's second most prominent religious figure, although it cannot be said of Gyaincain Norbu.

China's World Buddhist Forum aimed at boosting soft power: experts

09 September 2024, RFA, Dickey Kundol and Tenzin Dickyi

State media says the October conference will 'promote world peace,' but real goals are political, critics say.

China will host a global Buddhist conference in October that experts and rights activists outside the country say is aimed at boosting its soft power in Asia and build on its narrative that it has greater influence over Buddhist-majority nations than India, the birthplace of Buddhism.

Monks, experts, scholars and representatives from about 70 countries are expected to attend the sixth World Buddhist Forum in mid-October in the eastern city of Ningbo, Chinese state media reported.

However, the Dalai Lama, perhaps the most prominent Buddhist leader in the world, is not invited. Regarded by Beijing as separatist, the Tibetan spiritual leader hasn't been invited to any of the past forums since the first one organized by China in 2006.

The goal of the conference, according to the state-run China Daily, is to "promote world peace, improve the well-being of all individuals, and gather wisdom and strength for building a community with a shared future for humanity."

But in fact, China has little interest in promoting or protecting Buddhism, and instead is trying to use the conference to achieve its political goals, Sana Hashmi, a postdoctoral fellow at the policy think tank Taiwan-Asia Exchange Foundation, told Radio Free Asia.

"China has been trying to forge religious diplomacy with countries that have Buddhism as their main religion," she said.

"It also wants to show that instead of India, which is the birthplace of Buddhism, China has more influence when it comes to Buddhism."

By organizing the forum, China is misleading the international community by creating the illusion that the state supports Buddhism, though there is no genuine protection or support for Buddhists within the country, said Shartse Khensur Rinpoche Jangchup Choeden, secretary general of the International Buddhist Confederation.

'Sinicizing' Tibetan Buddhism

The conference comes at a time when Beijing is ramping up efforts to "Sinicize" Tibetan Buddhism to bring its religious doctrines into line with Chinese Communist Party, or CCP, ideology and emphasize loyalty to the party and the state.

Although China's constitution states that its citizens "enjoy freedom of religious belief," in practice this is not the case. Officials routinely clamp down on religious expression by Tibetan Buddhists, Uyghur Muslims and Christians across the country.

The government officially recognizes Buddhism, Taoism, Islam, Protestantism and Catholicism, but requires clergy members to pledge allegiance to the CCP and socialism.

China will host a global Buddhist conference in October that experts and rights activists outside the country say is aimed at boosting its soft power in Asia and build on its narrative that it has greater influence over Buddhist-majority nations than India, the birthplace of Buddhism.

Monks, experts, scholars and representatives from about 70 countries are expected to attend the sixth World Buddhist Forum in mid-October in the eastern city of Ningbo, Chinese state media reported.

However, the Dalai Lama, perhaps the most prominent Buddhist leader in the world, is not invited.

Regarded by Beijing as separatist, the Tibetan spiritual leader hasn't been invited to any of the past forums since the first one organized by China in 2006.

The goal of the conference, according to the state-run China Daily, is to "promote world peace, improve the well-being of all individuals, and gather wisdom and strength for building a community with a shared future for humanity."

But in fact, China has little interest in promoting or protecting Buddhism, and instead is trying to use the conference to achieve its political goals, Sana Hashmi, a postdoctoral fellow at the policy think tank Taiwan-Asia Exchange Foundation, told Radio Free Asia.

"China has been trying to forge religious diplomacy with countries that have Buddhism as their main religion," she said.

"It also wants to show that instead of India, which is the birthplace of Buddhism, China has more influence when it comes to Buddhism."

By organizing the forum, China is misleading the international community by creating the illusion that the state supports Buddhism, though there is no genuine protection or support for Buddhists within the country, said Shartse Khensur Rinpoche Jangchup Choeden, secretary general of the International Buddhist Confederation.

Gyaltzen Norbu, the Chinese government-appointed 11th Panchen Lama, speaks during an opening ceremony of the third World Buddhist Forum in Hong Kong, April 26, 2012. (Kin Cheung/AP)

'Sinicizing' Tibetan Buddhism

The conference comes at a time when Beijing is ramping up efforts to "Sinicize" Tibetan Buddhism to bring its religious doctrines into line with Chinese Communist Party, or CCP, ideology and emphasize loyalty to the party and the state.

Although China's constitution states that its citizens "enjoy freedom of religious belief," in practice this is not the case. Officials routinely clamp down on religious expression by Tibetan Buddhists, Uyghur Muslims and Christians across the country.

The government officially recognizes Buddhism, Taoism, Islam, Protestantism and Catholicism, but requires clergy members to pledge allegiance to the CCP and socialism.

Far from showing that China is preserving Tibetan Buddhism or the Buddhist religion in general, the conference will showcase Beijing's efforts to assimilate Tibetans and other minority groups and erase their distinctive features and cultures, activists and experts say.

Yan Jue, president of the Buddhist Association of China that's organizing the conference, seemed to acknowledge as much. He said the sixth forum will "adhere to the direction of Sinicization of Buddhism" in China and "fully publicize and display the status of religious freedom in China."

'Key instrument'

The Buddhist Association of China is the official government body supervising Buddhist practice in China, which in turn is overseen by the United Front Work Department of the CCP's Central Committee.

The International Campaign for Tibet, a rights group, calls the association a "key instrument" in Beijing's strategy to assimilate and transform Tibetan Buddhism, especially when it comes to searching for and recognizing reincarnated lamas.

Beijing is using the association to "break down Tibetan Buddhism's unique characteristics and to change it into a tool of the Chinese state," the group says.

"Since 2020, under [President] Xi Jinping's leadership, the CCP has intensified efforts to Sinicize Tibetan Buddhism, assigning this task to the Buddhist Association of China, which organizes conferences and events that serve as tools of soft power manipulation," said Tenzin Dorjee, a Tibetan-American and Buddhist former commissioner at the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom. Tibetan writer and activist Tenzin Tsundue said the conference must shed light on severe restrictions imposed on Buddhist practices, particularly in Tibet and Mongolia, and oppose the CCP's "manipulation of Buddhism and religion for political gain."

China hosts meeting on reincarnation of Tibetan Lamas to reinforce government control

06 September 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Chinese government's conference on the historical norms and policy laws of Tibetan Buddhist reincarnation system in Lanzhou, September 3, 2024 (Photo/Tibet.cn)

In what is seen as furthering the Chinese government's claim on authority over reincarnation of Tibetan religious figures, the Chinese government convened a meeting in Lanzhou about policies and regulations for the "reincarnation of living Buddhas in Tibetan Buddhism" on Tuesday, according to Tibet.cn, a Chinese mouth piece.

The gathering, attended by about 50 participants, included high-ranking Tibetan lamas and Chinese experts, including monks from the official Buddhist Association of China. According to the report, the Chinese authorities reiterated that the recognition of reincarnations must adhere to the regulations imposed by the government, stressing that the selection of Tibetan Buddhist Lamas should involve the golden urn method—a controversial system that requires Chinese government oversight and approval, which is much touted in the Chinese government narrative.

Observers and Tibetan exile authorities have condemned Beijing over its claim and raised doubts that the sinister aim of the move is to seek legitimacy over their authority over the next Dalai Lama, the central figure in Tibetan Buddhism. While the Chinese government has repeatedly pushed the idea that future reincarnations, especially that of the Dalai Lama, must be done under the Beijing's jurisdiction, the Dalai Lama himself, the Tibetan people and many governments have rubbished the claim.

The Tibetan spiritual leader His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, who has been living in exile since China annexed Tibet in 1959, has long denounced China's attempts to control the reincarnation process. In a 2011 statement, the Dalai Lama declared that "responsibility for doing so (His Holiness's reincarnation) will primarily rest on the concerned officers of the Dalai Lama's Gaden Phodrang Trust". He vowed to leave clear written instructions regarding the selection of his reincarnation and emphasized that any successor chosen by China for political purposes should not be recognized stating, "I shall leave clear written instructions about this. Bear in mind that, apart from the reincarnation recognized through such legitimate methods, no recognition or acceptance should be given to a candidate chosen for political ends by anyone, including those in the People's Republic of China".

A day before the meeting in Lanzhou, on Tuesday the Chinese-appointed Panchen Lama, known widely as the "fake Panchen" was re-elected as president of the so-called Tibet branch of the Buddhist Association of China (BAC). Gyaincain Norbu was appointed as Panchen Lama by the Chinese government in 1995, six months after the abduction of the 11th Panchen Lama, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima who was recognised by the Dalai Lama.

The BAC, established in 1953, is a state-controlled body tasked with overseeing religious affairs, ensuring that Buddhist communities comply with state policies.

For Beijing, the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama must follow Chinese laws

06 September 2024, Asia News

The concept was reiterated this week at a meeting attended by 50 monks recognised by China, but which Tibet's spiritual leader has always opposed. The Dalai Lama could end the line of succession next year on his 90th birthday, excluding Beijing from controlling Tibetan Buddhism.

The reincarnation of Tibetan Buddhists must also follow Chinese law, this according to Chinese authorities, a notion reiterated at a recent seminar in Lanzhou, Gansu province, attended by about 50 monks recognised by the Chinese government.

This event has sparked fresh tensions with the Dalai Lama, the leader of Tibetan Buddhists in exile in India, who is expected to announce plans for his succession next year.

A pro-Chinese website, Tibet.cn, has reported that the seminar last Wednesday reiterated that policies for the "reincarnation of living Buddhas in Tibetan Buddhism" must be "compatible with socialist society". According to the High-Level Tibetan Buddhism College of China, a Beijing-based school that trains officially recognised monks, which organised the meeting, historical customs, including government approval, are "an important principle to be followed in the reincarnation".

As with all religions recognised in the country, the Chinese government demands that the clergy swear allegiance to the Communist Party of China (CPC); in the case of Tibet, the issue of reincarnation is intertwined with that of sovereignty over the territory. China fears that the death of the current Dalai Lama, who has opposed Chinese intrusion since 1950, could generate social unrest in the region.

Tibet's spiritual leader and Nobel Peace Prize laureate had said that he would address the issue of reincarnation at the age of 90, that is, in July next year.

According to Tibetan tradition, the Dalai Lama, upon his death, is reincarnated in a child. Over the centuries, the child was found through a series of searches and rituals. But Beijing now insists that reincarnation must follow Chinese rules.

To this end, Beijing has introduced the ritual of the Golden Urn, an ancient imperial practice taken up by the CPC and incorporated into official Chinese regulations since 2007.

With this method, in 1989 China identified a Panchem Lama, another important religious leader in Tibetan Buddhism who, according to tradition, approves the recognition of the next Dalai Lama.

But Tibet's current spiritual leader has stressed the illegitimacy of this process, and never recognised Beijing's Panchem Lama, hinting that he wants to end his line of reincarnation, to exclude Beijing from having a say in the matter.

For some time now, Chinese authorities have been organising meetings aimed at monks to "sinicise" Tibetan Buddhism and bring it under their control.

In March, a seminar like the one in Lanzhou was held in the capital, while in mid-October the World Buddhist Forum will meet in the eastern city of Ningbo. The Dalai Lama has not been invited to this event since its start in 2006.

Experts note that Beijing wants to show Asian countries that "instead of India, where Buddhism was born, it is China that has the most influence," said Sana Hashmi, a researcher at the Taiwan-Asia Exchange Foundation think tank, speaking to Radio Free Asia.

The goal is to convince the world that is preserving Tibetan Buddhism.

"Since 2020, under [President] Xi Jinping's leadership, the CCP has intensified efforts to Sinicize Tibetan Buddhism, assigning this task to the Buddhist Association of China, which organizes conferences and events that serve as tools of soft power manipulation," said Tenzin Dorjee, a Tibetan-American Buddhist, and a former commissioner at the US Commission on International Religious Freedom.

China's Panchen reappointed to head 'Tibet' branch of PRC's Buddhist authority

04 September 2024, Tibetan Review

The "Tibet" branch of the Buddhist Association of China (BAC) has a new president, and he is the Chinese government-appointed 11th Panchen Lama Gyaincain Norbu again. He is being groomed and has been mandated by China to Sinicize Tibet and Tibetan Buddhism.

On Sep 3, "Panchen Erdeni Chos-kyi rGyal-po" was unanimously "elected" president of the "Xizang" branch of the BAC at the first council meeting of the branch's 12th council, reported China's official Xinhua news agency Sep 3.

The meeting began on Sep 2 in Tibet's capital Lhasa. The BCA is the official government supervisory organ of Buddhism in the People's Republic of China (PRC). It is overseen by the United Front Work Department of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China (CPC).

The report said that earlier, on Jun 22, 2019 too, Gyaincain Norbu was unanimously "elected" to the same post, for the first time.

China expects him to play a leading role in Sinicizing Tibetan Buddhism, in the tough task of winning Tibetan loyalty to the CPC-ruled PRC, and in China's selection and appointment of the reincarnation of the current, 14th Dalai Lama.

To make a point of legitimizing his credentials for that role, the Chinese government media report said "Panchen Erdeni" is one of the most influential Living Buddhas in Tibetan Buddhism. It noted that he was born on Feb 13, 1990 in Lhari County of Nagqu City in Tibet Autonomous Region.

"On Nov 29, 1995, he was approved and confirmed by the State Council as the reincarnation of the 10th Panchen after a lot-drawing from a golden urn. He was then enthroned as the 11th Panchen Erdeni," the report added.

The report said nothing about the 11th Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, who was abducted by the Chinese government in May 1995, just days after being recognized and proclaimed by the Dalai Lama, and whose fate has continued to remain one of China's best kept secrets to this day.

August

Beijing-appointed Panchen Lama intensifies campaign against the Dalai Lama, promotes Xi's "rule of law"

31 August 2024, Phayul

The Beijing-appointed 11th Panchen Lama, Gyaltsen Norbu (Ch. Gyaincain Norbu), widely criticised as the "fake Panchen," "Chinese puppet," and "Chinese Panchen," recently led a "Three Consciousness Symposium" in Nagchu (Ch. Naqu) Prefecture within the so called Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR). This event, as reported by Bitter Winter, a magazine dedicated to religious liberty and human rights, marks another step in the Chinese government's efforts to assert control over Tibetan Buddhism.

While China's mainstream media covered his visit, they offered scant details on its true purpose. The symposium is part of the ongoing "Three Consciousness Campaign," initiated in Tibet in 2022. This campaign aims to re-educate Buddhist monks and nuns by promoting national consciousness, citizen consciousness, and the rule of law consciousness. In practice, these programs seek to enforce allegiance to Chinese rule in Tibet and to suppress "separatism" by compelling the monastic community to obey the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), the Central Committee, and President Xi Jinping without question. During the symposium, Gyaltsen Norbu urged monks and nuns to distance themselves from His Holiness the Dalai Lama, Tibet's exiled spiritual leader of Tibet, and to reject "separatist thoughts." He emphasised the need to promote "national unity" and to adapt Tibetan Buddhism to fit within a socialist framework.

In his keynote address, Norbu called on Tibetan Buddhists to study and implement the resolutions of the 20th National Congress of the CCP. This directive implies that Tibetan religious practitioners must align their spiritual beliefs with the political ideologies of the state, study Buddhism in a way that aligns with contemporary political responsibilities, and accept the "strict governance of religion"—which translates to the United Front's supervision of religious activities. Additionally, Norbu stressed the importance of Tibetan Buddhism playing a supportive role in CCP-led campaigns.

During his visit to the "Rural Revitalization Nagqu Progress" exhibition, Norbu praised the rapid development achieved under the leadership of the Communist Party of China, attributing this success to the cooperation of people from all ethnic groups who support the Party's policies. He also called for even closer unity among various ethnic groups under the leadership of Xi Jinping and the Party's Central Committee.

Following his visit to Nagchu, Gyaltsen Norbu concluded his tour with a visit to Nyingtri City on August 22 before returning to Lhasa on August 28.

Gyaltsen Norbu's appointment as the 11th Panchen Lama by the Chinese government in 1995 has long been seen as an attempt to control the selection of high-ranking Tibetan religious figures and to diminish the influence of the Dalai Lama. Despite years of efforts by China to gain legitimacy for Norbu among Tibetans, he remains widely unaccepted, with many Tibetans viewing him as lacking true religious authority.

The true 11th Panchen Lama, Gendun Choekyi Nyima, was recognised by His Holiness the Dalai Lama on May 14, 1995. Days later, Chinese authorities abducted Gendun Choekyi Nyima, and he has not been seen since. For Tibetans, Gendun Choekyi Nyima remains the legitimate Panchen Lama, while Gyaltsen Norbu is seen as merely a figurehead imposed by the CCP, of which he is a member.

Tibetan monks to visit Findlay

30 August 2024, The Courier, Leah Alsept

Tibetan monks will stop in Northwest Ohio next week as a part of their national tour of the United States.

Four monks from the Gaden Shartse Monastery will visit Findlay, Bluffton and Carey to share Tibetan culture and heritage, Buddhist chants, rituals for healing and practices for inner peace and compassion. The tour also serves as a fundraising initiative to construct a dormitory, also called a "khangtsen," at the monastery.

The Gaden Shartse Monastery was founded in Tibet in 1409 by Tsongkhapa, creator of the Gelug school of thought in Tibetan Buddhism. Gaden is one of the three "Seats of Learning" Gelug monasteries of Tibet. The monastery was rebuilt in India after China's invasion of Tibet. The monastery is known for its study and practice of Buddhist Sutra and Tantra.

Phukhang Khangtsen, one of 11 dormitories in the Gaden Shartse Monastery, currently has 120 rooms for its 450 monks, requiring many monks to share limited space and facilities. The tour aims to raise awareness and funds to support the monks and ensure they have the necessary accommodations to continue their spiritual life. Funds raised during the tour will support building 60 new rooms to improve living conditions for the monks.

China to hold World Buddhist Forum in October

30 August 2024, People's Daily Online

The sixth World Buddhist Forum is slated to take place in the city of Ningbo in east China's Zhejiang Province this October, with an aim to promote world peace, improve the well-being of all individuals, and gather wisdom and strength for building a community with a shared future for humanity.

First launched in 2006, the triennial forum has successfully organized five editions, and evolved into the largest and most influential multilateral platform for international Buddhist-related exchange and dialogue initiated by China.

The event will extend invitations to Buddhists, experts, scholars and delegates from about 70 countries and regions around the world.

The upcoming forum aims to delve into the essence of Buddhism, as well as its ideological connotations and practical values, in the meantime, promote communication and cooperation with various Buddhist communities, academic circles, cultural sectors and individuals around the world, said Master Yanjue, head of the Buddhist Association of China.

China-appointed Panchen promoted 'Three Consciousnesses' Sinicization of Tibet drive during Nagchu visit

28 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Although China's mainstream media gave little information on its 11th Panchen Lama Gyaincain Norbu's recent visit to the prefecture-level city of Nagchu (Chinese: Nagqu), Tibet Autonomous Region, it has now been reported that in one event, he presided over a symposium on China's so-called "Three Consciousnesses" campaign. The campaign is a tool for re-educating the Tibetan people, especially monks and nuns, to think and act like a party-loyal mainland Chinese.

The campaign, launched in Tibet in 2022, seeks to promotenational consciousness, citizen consciousness, and legal consciousness. In Tibet, these are used as euphemisms for supporting the Chinese rule, condemning "separatism," and laws designed to implement them under the rubric of the leadership of the Communist Party of China (CPC), its Central Committee, and General Secretary Xi Jinping.

Gyaincain Norbu toured Nagchu from Jul 31 to Aug 10, even as the fate of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, the Dalai Lama-recognized 11th Panchen Lama abducted by Beijing and whom he replaced in 1995, continues to remain unknown to this day.

In his keynote speech, Gyaincain Norbu has stressed that Tibetan Buddhists should study and implement the documents of the 20th National Congress of the CPC. This meant that the Tibetan monastics should "align their religious beliefs with political beliefs," "study Buddhism to match contemporary responsibilities," accept the "strict governance of religion" programme (ie, the United Front supervision of their activities), and play a supportive role in the CPC campaigns, bitterwinter.org, the website of a magazine on religious liberty and human rights, Aug 28 cited Gyaincain Norbu as having explained.

What is more, the Chinese appointed Panchen was stated to have stressed that the "three consciousnesses" education should be linked with all daily religious activities at the monasteries.

And he has called on the Buddhist monks and nuns in Tibet to distance themselves from the Dalai Lama and oppose "separatist thoughts," promote "national unity," and "adapt Tibetan Buddhism to a socialist society."

Also, while visiting the "Rural Revitalization Nagqu Progress" exhibition, he was stated to have congratulated "the swift progress due to the leadership of the Communist Party of China and the active efforts of people from all ethnic backgrounds who have chosen to support, appreciate, and follow the Party's direction."

He has "urged the various ethnic groups to unite even more closely around the Party's Central Committee, led by Comrade Xi Jinping."

The report, written under a pseudonym, did not cite a source for these information.

China misuses law to demolish historic Atsok Monastery for dam construction

16 August 2024, ITC

Until the beginning of this year Atsok Monastery, which was founded in 1889 in Dragkar, Tibet, was home to 160 monks. It has now been completely leveled on the orders of the Chinese government.

The Chinese government has demolished the 135-year-old Atsok (Ch: A'cuohu) Monastery in the northern Tibetan region of Amdo to make way for the construction of a hydroelectric dam. The monastery had previously enjoyed protected status as a cultural heritage site, but this status was unilaterally revoked by Chinese authorities in order to push the demolition forward.

Despite opposition by local Tibetans, work crews began to destroy the monastery in April this year and have now finished.

"We are deeply concerned about the destruction of yet another precious Tibetan Buddhist monastery. Atsok's cultural heritage status reflected the history of the monastery and its importance to Tibetan Buddhists, and revoking that status in order to destroy it underscores what Tibetans have known all along: China's attitude towards their religion, history, and culture oscillates from indifference to hostility," said the International Campaign for Tibet.

From a protected site to a pile of rubble

The National Development and Reform Commission (NDRC) of China, which officially approved the construction of the Yangkhil (Yangqu) dam in 2021, noted in the approval statement that the project had been suspended earlier after learning that it had "started construction without approval." It is being constructed in Dragkar (Xinghai) county in Tsolho (Hainan) prefecture.

The dam is reportedly the largest robot-built 3D-printed project of its kind. Upon completion, the 1200 megawatt Yangkhyil Hydropower Plant will reach 150 meters in height. It will provide the distant Chinese province of Henan with about 5 billion kWh of electricity every year, with China's energy needs thus being fueled by the destruction of Tibet's religious heritage and the displacement of Tibetan communities.

Efforts by the monks of Atsok Monastery and local Tibetans to resist the dam construction have been dismissed by the authorities. RFA reported that the monastic community there “have petitioned authorities to rescind relocation orders” for the past two years. Similarly, Tibet Watch reported that a Tibetan whose identity and whereabouts still remain unknown was taken away by the police following his social media post about the demolition.

In April 2023, the Chinese government revoked Atsok Monastery’s status as a county level cultural relic protection site in order to allow the demolition to proceed. In the public notice (see ICT translation below), Dragkar county authorities cited the People’s Republic of China’s Law on Protection of Cultural Relics and related regulations, claiming that the monastery’s main assembly hall and Maitreya Temple were modern imitations and did not qualify as true cultural heritage sites.

ICT could not find any evidence of prior consultations with the monastery before the decision. To the contrary, the Beijing-based Tibetan writer Tsering Woesser, in her social media posts, said the religious community criticized the revocation as a pretextual maneuver to facilitate the demolition of the monastery.

Neither China’s Law on Protection of Cultural Relics nor the Interim Measures for the Management of Cultural Relics Identification have provisions to revoke protected status.

ICT translation from Tibetan of the Dragkar County revocation of Atsok Monastery’s cultural relic protection site status.

Public Notice by the Dragkar County Bureau of Culture, Tourism, Radio and TV in invalidating the Relic Protection Division of Atsok Monastery

As prescribed by the “Law of the People’s Republic of China on Protection of Cultural Relics” and “Interim Measures for the Management of Cultural Relics Identification”, through the process of inviting experts to investigate at the actual site, read the documents, to meet and interview monks, nuns, and the religious believing public, to seek views from the relevant offices, to convene investigation meetings, both the existing main Assembly building and the Jampa Temple are modern classic constructions and do not meet the requirements of being recognized as a definitive cultural heritage construction. The proposal has been made to invalidate the status enjoyed by Atsok Monastery as a county level cultural relic protection site.

The County Bureau of Culture, Tourism, Radio and TV investigated and reported to the 22nd standing committee meeting of the county government, and an agreement reached. The county level cultural relic protection site status of Atsok Monastery in Dragkar County is being invalidated. Now it is being publicized to the society at large. The publicization period is from April 15, 2023 to April 21, 2023. During this publicization period, if there are differing opinions, please convey them in writing to the County Bureau of Culture, Tourism, Radio and TV.

Contact Telephone: 8582068

Displaced monks and communities

Starting in December 2021, Chinese Communist Party (CCP) and government officials began surveying the site for the “relocation” of the monastery and the displacement of Tibetan villages within the construction zone of the Yangkhil hydropower station. This station is being built at the junction of Dragkar County and Mangra (Guinan) County on the Machu (Yellow) River.

Alongside Atsok Monastery, 22 villages across seven towns in three counties—Dragkar, Beldzong (Tongde), and Mangra—are slated for complete displacement. According to the NDRC’s approval letter, dated November 29, 2021, the project will displace an estimated 7,573 people annually, clearing a total of 13,287 acres (80,691 mu) of land.

The plan dictates that Atsok Monastery will be relocated to a site approximately 3 to 4 kilometers away in the village of Khyokar Naklo. Despite the completion of the demolition, construction at the new site has not yet begun. Local Tibetans report that the monks are living in temporary shelters awaiting the monastery’s reconstruction at the new location, if it happens at all.

Atsok Monastery was by Atsok Choktrul Konchok, and it had previously faced Chinese government interference when the enrollment of minor novice monks was prohibited in 2021.

Following the heritage status revocation the Chinese government held a ceremony for the monastery’s “relocation” and warned local Tibetans against photographing or sharing images of the demolition and hydropower station construction online. Tibet Watch reported the detention of an unidentified Tibetan for sharing such images on WeChat, along with a photo of the Dalai Lama. A foreign tourist, Vera Hue, who visited the site to observe the developments was monitored and expelled by the police. In a letter to the Tibetan Review, Hue described the experience as “sad and disturbing,” highlighting the ongoing oppression and systematic silencing of Tibetan people under Chinese administration, which discourages foreign witnesses. Hue’s letter to Tibetan Review based in New Delhi, India, is reproduced in full here.

Witnessing the dismantling of dam-displaced Atsok Monastery in Tibet a sad, disturbing experience

I read your article (TibetanReview.net, Apr 13, 2024) about the relocation of Atsok Monastery in Dragkar Dzong (Ch. Xinhai), Amdo. I happened to be traveling around there in the area and it was easy to go (unlike Wonto monastery in Dege where it is said to be inaccessible and in lockdown) so I went to see for myself what is happening.

I arrived in Atsok monastery without any problems. It is a beautiful, isolated, "antique" as it was described, monastery surrounded by red danxia landforms and snow-capped mountains. But just before getting there, one sees several blue tents (by "civil administration to rescue disaster") stationed alongside the road and there is a lot of litter everywhere. I walked all over Atsok; it is not a big place anyway, and took many pictures to treasure this site that is not going to be here any longer. A small shrine was open; however, the main temple was unfortunately closed. I asked the monks if they could please open the door for me since, given the relocation, revisiting the place would be literally impossible, but I was told that the key-keeper was away. How heartbreaking, really. When I asked the monks if they had pictures on their phones from the temple interiors that they could perhaps show me, their reply was "the temple has regulations", and that they are not allowed to take pictures from the monastery and share it. Somebody showed me an odd video (bad quality) with aerial views of the area and that was all. Is there any book I can buy to read about the monastery and its history? No. Is there a webpage where I can read more about the monastery? No.

The place looked and felt unkept and abandoned and in a state of mess as people were dismantling houses and temples and loading stuff onto vehicles to be taken away. So where are they relocating to, I asked. To nearby Hainan (Tibetan Tsholo), was the reply.

After I finished my walk and was about to leave, I was suddenly stopped by five policemen who appeared in front of me out of the blue suggesting to follow them to the police station – which I refused to do. A stern-looking lama then came over and asked me in English who told me about Atsok Monastery and why I am there. They took pictures of my passport and me and my driver's car plates, and then called their leader and, thankfully, she told them to let me go. The police car followed us all the way back to the main road.

Then, upon returning to my hotel in Dragkar Dzong, 2 policemen and 1 policewoman came to my hotel room to interrogate me, as friendly as they could, about my visit to Atsok monastery and why I took pictures, asking not just a few questions to know more details about me, my background, my work and the purpose of my visit to Atsok monastery and how do I even know this monastery – as it is not on the map. And what am I doing in Xinghai? It's such a small place, how do I know it?

They stayed for over an hour writing a 3-page report while recording the whole discussion with two cameras.

Excuse me, but what is all this questioning about anyway, it is not a restricted area.

"We are relocating", said a policeman.

"Oh, really? Why?" I asked, but I got no reply.

When they were finally done, they even recommended me to befriend one of them on WeChat in case I needed further help – a common practice nowadays while traveling in Tibetan areas is that police staff may ask foreign visitors to befriend them on WeChat and unless one doesn't really mind doing so, one needs to find a polite way to decline it. Partial demolition of a structure of Atsok Monastery in Tibet. (Photo: Vera Hue)

When it was, at last, time for them to leave, they somehow tried to excuse themselves for taking up so much of my time and I smilingly showed them out saying "You are very welcome. See you later", because you see, foreigners staying in Dragkar Dzong must first register at the police station and afterwards go check in at a hotel, and then, later during the day, have the police staff pay them a visit in their hotel room for more paperwork and work-photos – at least that is my experience from all the times I've been to Dragkar Dzong.

Like in other Tibetan places, non-English speaking Tibetan and Chinese staff in police stations and hotels have hard time deciphering the details of my foreign passport and it takes them an awful lot of time to fill in a registration form. And so, here too, I filled in my registration form myself to save time.

My visit to Atsok monastery was a sad and disturbing experience. And yet another sobering and grounding eye-opener about the shocking reality Tibetan people are faced with on a daily basis in their own land under Chinese administration who doesn't really like foreigners anywhere near to witness it. To witness a normalised abuse, oppression and persecution that is systematically hushed, muted, dismissed out of hand altogether.

– Vera Hue, 2024

China coerces Kirti Monastery students into state-run boarding schools

05 August 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Chinese authorities in Ngaba (Ch. Aba) County, Sichuan Province, in the Tibetan region of Amdo, have reportedly seized Kirti Monastery School in July, following the closure of the Taksang Lhamo Kirti Monastery School, which had over 300 students enrolled in China's state-run boarding schools, according to Radio Free Asia (RFA). The authorities have mandated that over 200 students out of 900, aged 6 to 14, enrol in state-run boarding schools. The remaining students, who were sent home, were also instructed to enrol in state-run schools instead of monastery schools. Since May, authorities have prohibited the reopening of Kirti Monastery School and Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery School. Additionally, more than 300 students from Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery School were forcibly enrolled in state-run boarding schools. A source inside Tibet told RFA that some parents, who avoid sending their children to monastery schools due to health issues, have been assured by officials that the state-run schools will provide assistance for their children's livelihoods and health problems. However, officials have also forcibly taken children from their parents, claiming they were only being taken for health check-ups.

On July 8, the Educational Development Conference was held in Bharkham, Ngaba, where local officials, including Shu Zhiwen, emphasised the necessity of reforming Ngaba's education system. They advocated for a strategic closure of more monastery schools to increase enrolment in state-run boarding schools. A message circulated in social media groups underscored this directive, highlighting that Tibetan children aged six and above must be enrolled in state-run boarding schools to comply with compulsory education laws. The message warned that parents who fail to fulfil their responsibilities under Article 16 of China's Law on the Protection of Minors would face punishment.

Since 1994, Kirti Monastery and Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery School in Ngaba offered classes on Tibetan Buddhism. However, in 2003, these institutions faced interference from the Chinese government, which led to the closure of Tibetan Buddhist studies. Subsequently, the government introduced joint textbooks into the curriculum of monastery schools. As part of the current sinicisation of Buddhism initiative, officials have banned monks from enrolling in monastery schools. Additionally, officials frequently attend religious events to deliver political education, continuously creating obstacles during

July

China destroys monastery to expand world's tallest 3D-printed hydropower dam in Tibet

27 July 2024, Tibetan Review

After brushing aside heartbreaking pleas, protests and what not, Chinese authorities in Tsolho (Chinese: Hainan) Prefecture of Qinghai province have completed the demolition of a 135-year-old Tibetan Buddhist monastery ahead of the planned completion later this year of an expansion of the world's tallest 3D-printed hydropower dam. Very little has been done to fulfil the promise to rebuild the monastery elsewhere while its 160 monks are yet to see the promised alternative housing, said the Tibetan service of rfa.org Jul 27, citing sources from Tibet and exile.

Local Tibetans had pleaded for the demolition or relocation of Atsok Gon Dechen Choekhorling Monastery in the prefecture's Dragkar county (Xinghai) to be scrapped and the dam expansion plan cancelled out of consideration for their veneration for its sanctity and antiquity. Nevertheless, in Apr 2023, China's Department of National Heritage declared that the artifacts and murals inside the monastery were of "no significant value or importance" and so began the work for its relocation.

The report said an early July video footage shows that nothing has remained of the religious structure, with the monastery's main prayer halls and the many stupas that surround it completely razed to the ground.

The work of the expansion of the Yangqu hydropower station on the Yellow River (Tibetan: Machu) was started in the province in 2022 and will be completed later this year. Filling it would submerge the 19th century monastery's site.

The report said Chinese authorities have spoken of taking two to three years to rebuild the monastery elsewhere. "However, only a few tens of thousands of Chinese yuan have been allocated for the reconstruction, with no additional funds planned," the report quoted one of the sources as saying.

Meanwhile, the monastery's 160 monks continue to live in makeshift tin huts. Nothing has materialised of the alternative housing for them in Khokar Naglo near the county's Palkha township promised by the authorities, the report cited several sources as saying.

Tibetan have been prohibited from taking pictures of the site where the monastery stood only months earlier.

The Chinese authorities' only concern is seen to be focused on a successful completion of the hydropower dam's expansion.

Lu Gang, secretary of the prefecture party committee, visited the site on Jul 25, called the expansion plan a major project for the prefecture to build a "national clean energy industry highland", and told local authorities to ensure its gate closed completely when built to store water as scheduled for power generation, the report said.

Tibetans forced to remove religious structures outside their homes

25 July 2024, RFA

The measures come as Beijing intensifies efforts to assimilate Tibetans.

For the first time, Chinese authorities are forcing ordinary Tibetans to remove religious symbols and destroy such structures from the exteriors and roofs of their homes in several villages in a Tibetan area of Sichuan province, two sources with knowledge of the situation said.

Authorities also are prohibiting Tibetans in Sichuan province and elsewhere from organizing and participating in prayer sessions online, said the sources who requested anonymity for fear of reprisal. The measures come as Beijing intensifies efforts to assimilate Tibetans and adapt Tibetan Buddhism so that its tenets and practices conform with the ideology of China's Communist Party.

While authorities have demolished religious objects and structures at times at Buddhist monasteries in Tibet, this is the first instance of religious symbols at ordinary people's homes being destroyed.

Since the beginning of July, Chinese authorities have conducted searches of all homes in at least four villages in Ngaba county, said the sources, one of whom lives in exile and the other who is inside Tibet. They are forcing Tibetans to remove prayer flags hoisted on rooftops and to destroy religious objects, said the source from inside Tibet.

Among the objects being dismantled are concrete structures resembling chimneys outside homes where Tibetans perform Sang-sol, or incense offerings, to mark important religious and personal events in their lives, he said.

While authorities have not publicly disclosed the reason for their actions, Tibetans expect similar inspections in neighboring Tibetan areas, both sources said.

No online prayer sessions

Tibetans in Sichuan province and elsewhere are also prohibited from organizing any religious prayer sessions online in their social media messaging groups or chat groups, one of the sources said.

"Individuals who have initiated these prayer sessions have been summoned for interrogations by Chinese authorities," he said.

China has continued to restrict and control Tibetan religious practices and shown no willingness to resume formal negotiations about greater autonomy for the region with representatives of the Dalai Lama, the spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism, according to the most recent annual report by the U.S. Congressional-Executive Commission on China.

Beijing also bans Tibetans from observing significant cultural, religious and historical events such as Tibetan National Uprising Day and the Dalai Lama's birthday.

But Tibetans have defied these prohibitions, despite possible severe consequences.

During the Dalai Lama's birthday on July 6, monks from monasteries in the Ngaba area were confined to their compounds under police presence to enforce such restrictions, said the first source from inside Tibet.

With the birthday of Kirti Rinpoche, the head of Ngaba's Kirti Monastery, approaching in August, Chinese authorities have already implemented online restrictions and threatened Tibetans against posting any photos or well wishes, said the second source.

In March, Chinese police arrested Pema, a Tibetan monk from Kirti Monastery for staging a solo protest while holding a portrait of the Dalai Lama on the streets of Ngaba county.

Pema, who was working as a teacher for the preliminary Buddhist study section at the monastery, also shouted slogans against Chinese policies in Tibet during his protest and was immediately arrested.

China graduates 320 more monks and nuns to promote Sinicization of Tibetan Buddhism

12 July 2024, Tibetan Review

China says it has graduated 320 more monks and nuns this year from the Xizang Buddhism University in Lhasa with the mandate, among others, to promote the Sinicization of Tibetan Buddhism, bringing the total since its establishment in 2011 to more than 1,700. "Xizang" is China's term for Tibet truncated to the territory of Tibet (Xizang) Autonomous Region. The graduates "should learn to use the national language and script, infuse Tibetan Buddhism with excellent traditional Chinese culture, actively engage in doctrinal interpretation, promote positive thoughts in Tibetan Buddhist doctrine such as promoting equality and tolerance, poverty alleviation, and helping the needy, and jointly promote the Sinicization of Tibetan Buddhism," China's official chinadaily.com.cn Jul 12 quoted Drubkhang Thubtan Khaidrub, the head of the university, as saying.

Drubkhang, who is also the executive vice-president of the Tibet branch of the Buddhist Association of China, has also "emphasized the pivotal role the graduates will play in the healthy development of Tibetan Buddhism, encouraging them to continuously enhance their religious knowledge and moral values, and embrace diverse cultural experiences."

Drubkhang has made his remarks during the university's graduation ceremony on Jun 30 which saw the conferral of graduation certificates and academic titles, and the commendation of exceptional teachers and students, the report noted.

The report quoted graduate student Tenzin Yontan, a monk from the Gonsar Monastery in Driru county, Nagchu City, as saying during the ceremony that the graduates would engage in social development and progress, promote patriotism and dedication to Tibetan Buddhism, and contribute "every bit of our efforts to maintaining social stability, harmony and national unity".

The university was established by China outside the rigorous traditional Geshe degree programme to educate Tibetan monks and nuns to promote the Sinicization of Tibetan Buddhism and culture with focus on teaching Mandarin Chinese and the ideology of patriotic loyalty to the communist Party of China-state as the basis for learning Buddhism.

China's top leaders visit Tibet, seeking to assimilate Tibet's religion and children

10 July 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

Chinese President Xi Jinping and Chair of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference Wang Huning, China's two highest decision makers on Tibet, visited the Tibetan regions of Amdo and Kham. Xi and Wang called for the full implementation of the Party's policy to Sinify Tibetan Buddhism – essentially, converting it into a tool of the Chinese state.

Xi also visited one of the colonial boarding schools China has established in Tibet. This visit is significant, as it comes amid ongoing international criticism of a project aimed at separating Tibetan children from the language and culture.

Transforming Tibetan Buddhism

During their visits to Xining in Qinghai, Kardze (Ganzi) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, and Ngaba (Aba) Tibetan & Qiang Autonomous Prefecture in Sichuan, Xi and Wang asked Tibetans to regard themselves as Chinese and demanded loyalty to the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) from Tibetan Buddhists, instructing them to integrate their religious practices with the CCP's value system.

While these are standard CCP positions concerning Tibetan Buddhism, the timing of these visits appears connected to anxiety among Chinese leaders concerning the Dalai Lama's reincarnation. A "news tea party" was organized by the All-China Journalists Association on Tibet on June 27, 2024, purportedly on "65th Anniversary of the Democratic Reform in Tibet," and some staff from the Beijing-based China Tibetology Research Center (CTRC) were there to respond to questions.

Chinese state media reported that one reporter asked, "The 14th Dalai Lama, who will be 89 soon, has said that he will announce his reincarnation plan when he is about 90 years old. What attitude and policy will the Chinese government take in response?"

This is a reference to the Dalai Lama's 2011 statement on his reincarnation in which he outlined his timeline, saying:

"When I am about ninety I will consult the high Lamas of the Tibetan Buddhist traditions, the Tibetan public, and other concerned people who follow Tibetan Buddhism, and re-evaluate whether the institution of the Dalai Lama should continue or not. On that basis we will take a decision. If it is decided that the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama should continue and there is a need for the Fifteenth Dalai Lama to be recognized, responsibility for doing so will primarily rest on the concerned officers of the Dalai Lama's Gaden Phodrang Trust. They should consult the various heads of the Tibetan Buddhist traditions and the reliable oath-bound Dharma Protectors who are linked inseparably to the lineage of the Dalai Lamas. They should seek advice and direction from these concerned beings and carry out the procedures of search and recognition in accordance with past tradition. I shall leave clear written instructions about this. Bear in mind that, apart from the reincarnation recognized through such legitimate methods, no recognition or acceptance should be given to a candidate chosen for political ends by anyone, including those in the People's Republic of China."

China claims Tibetan religious rights protected, but reiterates right to appoint next Dalai Lama

09 July 2024, Tibetan Review

China's foreign ministry has added its voice to Beijing's criticism of US Secretary of Antony Blinken's statement of greetings on the Dalai Lama's 89th birthday on Jul 6, while its official media also took exception to his support for Tibetan people's right to freely choose their religious leaders.

Noting that Blinken's statement reaffirmed US commitment to supporting efforts to preserve Tibet's linguistic, cultural and religious heritage, China's foreign ministry spokesperson Lin Jian has urged the United States Jul 8 to stop supporting or endorsing in any way the "Tibet independence" forces and their anti-China and separatist activities."

Addressing a regular press briefing, Li has maintained that "Xizang" affairs are China's internal affairs which brook no interference by any external forces, referring to Tibet by its colonial redefinition.

"The rights and freedoms of all ethnic groups in Xizang, including the freedom of religious belief and the freedom to use and develop their own spoken and written languages, are fully protected," China's official Xinhua news agency Jul 8 quoted Lin as claiming.

Condemning the 14th Dalai Lama as “not a pure religious figure, but a political exile engaged in anti-China separatist activities under the cloak of religion” for the umpteenth time, the report, which also appeared on China’s military website eng.chinamil.com.cn Jul 8, also quoted Lin as calling on the US to “stop supporting or endorsing in any way the ‘Tibet independence’ forces and their (Dalai group’s) anti-China and separatist activities.” Meanwhile, an opinion piece carried by China’s official chinadaily.com.cn Jul 8 took particular exception to Blinken’s statement for stressing that Tibetans should have the “ability to freely choose and venerate religious leaders without interference”. It accused the US of being fearful of losing “a long-term agent on the “Xizang” front after the Dalai Lama passes away” to offer a disingenuous explanation that the recent US passage of the Resolve Tibet Act and the high profile bipartisan Congressional delegation’s recent visit to Dharamshala just after that last month.

China targeting Tibet’s monasteries to student-populate their colonial-style boarding schools

04 July 2024, Tibetan Review

In what is seen as a part of an ongoing campaign to coerce the Tibetan people to be more loyal to the party-state of China than in their devotion to Buddhism under President Xi Jinping’s call to Sinicize the ethnic minority areas, authorities in two counties in a historically Tibetan-inhabited prefecture in Sichuan province have closed down two monastic schools and ordered their students to be enrolled in the much-criticized government-run residential schools to undergo mandarin-Chinese education.

Officials said young monks in training at Kirti Monastery in Ngaba (Chinese: Aba) county and Lhamo Kirti Monastery in Dzoegé (Ruo’ergai) county in the province’s Ngaba prefecture had not attained the age at which they could receive monastic education, reported the Tibetan service of rfa.org Jul 3, citing local Tibetans speaking anonymously for safety reasons.

Apparently, the move is part of China’s strengthening of the enforcement of its rule that those aged below 18 years cannot be enrolled in monasteries. Tibetan Buddhist monasteries have historically enrolled children as young as 5-6 years of age.

The order was stated to have been issued by provincial authorities in April, requiring the monasteries to send their novice and young monks under the age of 18 to government-run residential schools.

The order was stated to have been enforced this month with the parents being warned not to send back their young children to the monasteries after the summer break. The monasteries are now stated to be patrolled by police to enforce the order. Also, security personnel are stated to be posted at monastery gates to prevent parents from entering them.

The order is said to have affected some 1,000 novice monks at Kirti Monastery and 600 at Lhamo Kirti Monastery, who all must now attend Chinese government-run residential schools whose curricula are said to be designed to assimilate them as Chinese.

These “colonial-style” boarding schools have been widely condemned for separating the children from their families and depriving them of their UN recognized right to a Tibetan cultural educational upbringing.

The report cited experts as saying the measures are part of the Chinese government’s systematic efforts to Sinicize Tibetan Buddhism by making Tibetans more loyal to the Chinese Communist Party and its political agenda than to their own religious doctrine.

The report said Chinese authorities have also forbidden young novice monks from entering Ngaba Nangshug and Gomang monasteries in Sichuan province and Labrang Monastery in Sangchu county in neighbouring Gansu province, indicating a widening and general enforcement of the order.

China closes 2 Tibetan monastery schools, sends novices to state boarding schools

03 July 2024, RFA, Pelbar

The move is aimed at making Tibetans more loyal to China than to Buddhism, experts say.

Chinese authorities have closed Buddhist schools at two monasteries in Tibetan-populated areas of western China and forced hundreds of novice monks to attend state-run boarding schools that teach a curriculum in Mandarin, Tibetans with knowledge of the situation said.

Officials said young monks in training at Kirti Monastery in Ngaba county and Lhamo Kirti Monastery in Dzoge county — both located in Sichuan province — had not attained the age at which they could receive monastic education, the sources said.

Chinese authorities have now set that age at 18, though children as young as 5 or 6 years old previously had been allowed to enroll in schools at monasteries, they said.

This month, authorities pressured parents not to send their young children back to the monasteries – now patrolled by police – after summer break, said the sources from inside Tibet who declined to be named for fear of retribution.

Instead, the roughly 1,000 novices at Kirti Monastery and 600 novices at Lhamo Kirti

Monastery must now attend government-administered residential schools.

Tibetan rights activists and U.S. lawmakers call such educational institutions “colonial-style” boarding schools, where Tibetan children are separated from their families and taught a Chinese-language curriculum.

The measures are part of the Chinese government’s systematic efforts to Sinicize Tibetan Buddhism by making Tibetans more loyal to the Chinese Communist Party and its political agenda than to their own religious doctrine, experts say.

To this end, Chinese authorities also restrict the entry of new monks into monasteries, interfere in religious activities especially around politically sensitive dates, require Buddhist monks to translate texts from Tibetan to Mandarin, and force monasteries to display portraits of party leaders.

All the young monks between the ages of 6 and 15 joined Kirti Monastery in Ngaba county voluntarily and did not violate any Chinese laws by doing so, though Chinese authorities suspect that the head lama ordered their admission, one source said.

But this April, provincial authorities ordered the monastery to send novices and young monks under the age of 18 to government-run residential schools, he said.

In response, monastery administrators said the government had to bear responsibility for educating the youngsters. Otherwise, they would not expel them from the school.

Authorities also met with administrators at Lhamo Kirti Monastery and demanded that all 600 students be enrolled in government-run schools, another source said.

Security personnel guarded the entrance to the monastery to prevent parents from entering, he added.

Chinese authorities also have forbidden young novices from entering Ngaba Nangshug and Gomang monasteries in Sichuan province and Labrang Monastery in Sangchu county of neighboring Gansu province.

China now asserts ‘natural’ authority to identify Dalai Lama reincarnation

01 July 2024, Tibetan Review

As the Dalai Lama reincarnation increasingly dominates the international discourse on Tibet, and as the exile Tibetan spiritual leader himself nears his designated approximate time for making his decision on the issue, China has sought to drive home the point that this matter falls within the rubric of its “natural” authority, speaking through its state employed academics.

Beijing has “natural” authority in identifying the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama, the scmp.com Jun 30 cited state-backed analysts as saying at a Beijing forum Jun 26.

The justifications of the analysts, tasked by the party leadership to “construct narratives” to support its decisions on the matter, range from the outlandish to outright falsehood, resting entirely on the fact that China controls Tibet. The atheist-lack of legitimacy of the Communist Party of China-state to take decision on such a profoundly religious matter is very obviously ignored.

Laxianjia, deputy director of the Institute of Religious Studies at the China Tibetology Research Centre (CTRC), has referred to Beijing’s measures related to the “reincarnation of living Buddhas in Tibetan Buddhism”, passed in 2007.

“Although the Dalai Lama is currently outside China, his reincarnation is still part of the Gelug tradition and under the jurisdiction of the Chinese government, as most temples are located within China,” Laxianjia has said, referring to the dominant school of Tibetan Buddhism to which he belongs.

“Therefore, it is only natural that the Chinese government would implement [the 2007] system and apply these principles to ensure control over Tibetan Buddhism.”

Laxianjia has also claimed that his field research showed that the general public in Tibet were not as reverential towards the 14th Dalai Lama as they had “become more aware of his political identity and his political moves abroad”, though they did acknowledge that his 13 predecessors had made significant contributions to the development of Tibetan Buddhism.

While the Dalai Lama has constantly sought to establish contact with Beijing towards the resolution of the issue of Tibet, seeking a negotiated genuine autonomy for his homeland, China’s so-called experts on Tibet have blamed him for the lack of communication with Beijing.

“There has been no progress in this regard for many years because the Dalai Lama himself has not understood or implemented the central government’s requirements. Instead, he seeks to achieve Tibetan independence, semi-independence, or de facto independence through negotiations,” Zhang Shigao, director of the Institute for Contemporary Tibetan Studies at CTRC (China Tibetology Research Centre) has said.

The report said the Jun 26 forum, which aimed to address 65 years of reforms in Tibet, was attended by several Chinese and international media outlets.

The forum has sought to justify China’s use of the name “Xizang” for Tibet, noting that the latter was being “wrongly” applied to include historical Tibetan territories that are now outside Tibet Autonomous Region.

A slew of Tibet policy bills passed by the United States in recent years had referred to the area as "Greater Tibet", a term long advocated by the 14th Dalai Lama, and Beijing made the change to avoid any misunderstanding, Liang has maintained.

Truth be told, the term "Greater Tibet" does not occur in any of the Tibet policy bills passed by the US. Exile Tibetans use the name "Tibet" to refer to the historically three traditional provinces of Tibet, around half of which now make up the Qinghai Province or parts of the Chinese provinces of Gansu, Yunnan and Sichuan.

29 Buddhist nuns awarded "Chi Ram Pa" diploma in China's Xizang

01 July 2024, People's Daily Online

A Buddhist nun shows her diploma at the graduation ceremony at Tibet Buddhism University in Lhasa, southwest China's Xizang Autonomous Region, June 30, 2024. A graduation ceremony was organized by the Tibet Buddhism University here on Sunday, awarding the "Chi Ram Pa" diploma (master's degree) to 29 Buddhist nuns. (Xinhua/Tenzing Nima Qadhup)

June

China has 'natural' say in choosing next Dalai Lama, Tibet experts tell Beijing forum

30 June 2024, SCMP

Beijing has "natural" authority in identifying the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama, Chinese state-backed analysts have said, with a year to go before the Tibetan spiritual leader is expected to announce his own decision on it.

Laxianjia, deputy director of the Institute of Religious Studies at the semi-official China Tibetology Research Centre (CTRC), referred to Beijing's measures related to the "reincarnation of living Buddhas in Tibetan Buddhism", passed in 2007.

They contained three principles in the selection and approval process: historical inheritance, religious rituals and approval by the central government, he told a forum in Beijing last week.

"Although the Dalai Lama is currently outside China, his reincarnation is still part of the Gelug tradition and under the jurisdiction of the Chinese government, as most temples are located within China," Laxianjia said, referring to the Gelug – or "Yellow Hat" – sect of the exiled Dalai Lama.

"Therefore, it is only natural that the Chinese government would implement [the 2007] system and apply these principles to ensure control over Tibetan Buddhism."

Laxianjia also said his field research showed that the general public in Tibet were not as reverential towards the 14th Dalai Lama as they had "become more aware of his political identity and his political moves abroad", though they did acknowledge that his 13 predecessors had made significant contributions to the development of Tibetan Buddhism.

Tibetans regard the Dalai Lama as the living incarnation of the Buddha. The sitting Dalai Lama, who will be 89 this week, has hinted that he will address the issue of his reincarnation when he turns 90.

He previously suggested terminating the institution of the reincarnated Dalai Lama, but also said Beijing should have no say in this. Beijing insists that the process must follow Chinese law.

Tibet was seized by the People's Liberation Army in 1950, a year after the Communist Party won the Chinese civil war. The Dalai Lama has lived in exile in India since fleeing a failed uprising against Chinese rule in 1959.

Beijing has blamed him for past unrest among Tibetans in China – in the 1980s and 2008 – and there have long been concerns if his death could be another flashpoint for such social tensions.

Experts at the forum in Beijing on Thursday also blamed the Dalai Lama for the lack of communication with Beijing.

"There has been no progress in this regard for many years because the Dalai Lama himself has not understood or implemented the central government's requirements. Instead, he seeks to achieve Tibetan independence, semi-independence, or de facto independence through negotiations," said Zhang Shigao, director of the Institute for Contemporary Tibetan Studies at CTRC.

The panellists also argued that Beijing's use of the name "Xizang" instead of "Tibet" in English-language articles was a way to exercise its sovereignty over the autonomous region on China's Western border.

"Xizang" is the pinyin, or Chinese romanisation, of the Mandarin script for "Tibet".

Liang Junyan, a researcher at CTCRC, said the term "Tibet" had taken on "more political connotations", and Beijing had the "right to modify this name to avoid generating ambiguity".

Liang said the name "Tibet" was misleading, as it was too broad and inaccurate from a geographical perspective. The Tibetan language is spoken not only in the autonomous region, but also in neighbouring provinces including Sichuan, Yunnan, Qinghai and Gansu, she argued.

Chinese state media has dramatically increased its use of the term "Xizang" since the State Council, China's cabinet, published a white paper in November on official policies related to the region. The shift has drawn intense criticism outside China.

Thursday's forum, which aimed to address 65 years of reforms in Tibet, was attended by several Chinese and international media outlets.

Liang also pointed to several US congressional bills related to Tibet as the basis for Beijing's adoption of the term "Xizang".

A slew of Tibet policy bills passed by the United States in recent years had referred to the area as "Greater Tibet", a term long advocated by the 14th Dalai Lama, and Beijing made the change to avoid any misunderstanding, Liang said.

On June 12, the US Congress passed a bill aimed at boosting support for Tibet and countering what it sees as Chinese "disinformation" about the region's history, people and institutions. It has been forwarded to US President Joe Biden to sign into law. The Dalai Lama, a Nobel Peace Prize laureate, is regarded by Beijing as a "separatist" seeking independence for Tibet, a claim he denies.

He arrived in New York last week to receive medical treatment, days after meeting a seven-member US congressional delegation at his monastery in the Himalayan town of Dharamsala in northern India.

The bipartisan delegation, including former House speaker Nancy Pelosi, said they would not allow China to influence the choice of Dalai Lama's successor and would pressure Beijing to resume talks with him.

In response, China's foreign ministry said that its policy was "consistent and clear" – that in order to resume contact and talks with Beijing, the 14th Dalai Lama "must thoroughly reflect on and completely correct his political propositions".

The remark came on the heels of Chinese President Xi Jinping's visit to Qinghai province, where he emphasised the importance of national unity, particularly at a significant Tibetan Buddhist site.

China's Panchen visits Jokhang Temple in 'Chinese city of Lhasa'

29 June 2024, Tibetan Review

China said Jun 28 that the replacement 11th Panchen Lama Gyaltsen Norbu it has imposed on the Tibetan people after abducting into oblivion the one already recognized and proclaimed by Tibet's exiled spiritual leader the Dalai Lama in 1995 had visited Tibet's most sacred temple in capital Lhasa that day.

Sinicizing Tibet by prefacing everything Tibetan with "Chinese" or "China's" has long been Beijing's preoccupation in its publicity works and its official Xinhua news agency headlined the news of the visit as "Panchen Rinpoche visits revered Jokhang Temple in Chinese city of Lhasa."

The report cited "historical records" to note that the Buddha statue to which Gyaltsen Norbu bowed three times, offered a ceremonial scarf, and on which he applied gold powder "was brought to the temple by Princess Wencheng of the Tang Dynasty (618-907)."

He was then stated to have "led sutra chanting at the temple, praying for peace, prosperity and people's well-being, joined by over 100 monks from the Jokhang Temple and the Tashilhunpo Monastery," followed by performing "a head-touching ritual."

The report did not quote him on any subject, but noted that he is a member of the Standing Committee of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, the country's top political advisory body, vice president of the Buddhist Association of China, and president of the association's "Xizang" branch.

Xizang is China's name for Tibet, which it recently decided not to use anymore to make clear its further push towards Sinicizing the occupied territory.

The report said Gyaltsen Norbu had arrived in Lhasa on Jun 25 and "will perform his duties at the Xizang branch, carry out social research, and attend a series of religious activities." It did not say how long the visit will last.

China restricts key Buddhist event citing security concerns

28 June 2024, UCA News

The annual Dhokham Jang Gunchoe or Great Winter Debate Session was shortened from usual two-week length to only one week

Ngodup Palden, an exiled Tibetan, speaks during an interview in Dharamsala in India on Feb. 19. Chinese authorities view Buddhism as a threat to its sovereignty. (Photo: AFP)

Authorities in a Tibetan-populated county in China have shortened the duration of a key week-long debate on Buddhist philosophy and have reduced the number of monks who could attend the event. China's Sichuan province authorities reduced the duration of the annual Dhokham Jang Gunchoe or Great Winter Debate Session, Radio Free Asia (RFA) reported on June 27.

Traditionally, thousands of monks from Tibet's three monastic universities – Drepung, Gaden, and Sera – attend the event held in the eleventh month of the Tibetan calendar.

"They received permission, but authorities reduced the duration and the number of participants, citing security concerns," an unnamed source familiar with the incident told RFA.

Reportedly, the monastery and its supporters had petitioned the authorities for permission to conduct the gathering after their earlier request in 2023 was rejected.

The event took place at the Za Bhum Nyingma Monastery from June 19-25 under tight restrictions in Sershul county in Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in the Sichuan province's northwest.

Authorities had shortened the event from its usual two-week length to only one week and had reduced the number of participants from 7,000 to 3,200, RFA reported citing unnamed sources.

"Authorities also scrutinized monks and nuns attending the event to ensure they were free of political affiliations," multiple unnamed sources said.

Reportedly, armed police were stationed at the Zabum Nyingma Monastery and patrolled the surrounding mountains during the gathering.

Meanwhile, lay people who had traveled from far away to witness the discussions and debates at the monastery were held up at checkpoints, RFA reported citing unnamed sources.

Allegedly, the restrictions are an example of how China has sought to control and limit religious activities in Tibet, RFA reported.

The authorities have set up police stations in or near monasteries, subjected monks, and nuns to "patriotic re-education," and kicked Buddhist clergy members out of Buddhist institutes, RFA reported.

Chinese authorities have viewed Buddhism as a threat to its sovereignty and have engaged in implementing various restrictive policies that throttle Tibetan language, culture, and beliefs.

Earlier in April, Chinese authorities distributed a manual containing 10 bans on traditional practices related to the Dalai Lama's death to monasteries in Gansu province in China's northwest.

The manual reportedly listed 10 rules that Buddhist clergy should follow and disrupts the process of recognizing the Dalai Lama's reincarnation, which has been a contentious issue with the Chinese authorities.

REPORT: Sinicization drive pervades China's religious repression in Tibet

27 June 2024, Tibetan Review

In the name of regulations for implementing Sinicization, China officially controls all aspects of religious life in occupied Tibet and is guilty of serious violations of human rights of believers there, according to the US State Department in its 2023 Report on International Religious Freedom which was released on Jun 26. In Particular, the report criticizes China's ongoing campaign to Sinicize Buddhism under which much of the violations take place.

Across the People's Republic of China (PRC), authorities continue to arrest "thousands" of people a year for practicing their faith in ways that undermine the primacy of the Chinese Communist Party, the report says.

With regard to the situation in Tibet, the reports says the "CCP [Chinese Communist Party] regulations stipulate official control of all aspects of Tibetan Buddhism, including the recognition of lamas, religious venues, groups, personnel, and schools."

And, as in previous years, there were "forced disappearances, arrests, physical abuse, and prolonged detentions without trial of monks, nuns, and other persons due to their religious practices."

Releasing the report with Secretary of State Antony J Blinken, The US Ambassador-at-Large for International Religious Freedom Rashad Hussain has referred to the Chinese government's "decades of persecution of religious communities", including Tibetan Buddhists.

Dwelling on the Sinicization drive under which Tibetans are deprived of their religious freedom and human rights, the report says: "The government continued carrying out its 2019-23 five-year plan to Sinicize Buddhism in China by emphasizing loyalty to the CCP and the state. The Sinicization plan included Tibetan Buddhism, with the involvement of the state-run BAC (Buddhist Association of China). Regulations promulgated in 2020 and 2021 further formalized administrative procedures for Sinicizing all religions, including Tibetan Buddhism, in order to 'follow the path of socialism with Chinese characteristics,' 'correctly handle the relationship between national law and canon,' and place more ideological controls on the training, selection, and monitoring of clergy." Focusing on Tibetan Buddhism specifically, the report says: "Authorities continued to require Buddhist monasteries to translate texts from Tibetan to Mandarin in what observers said was an effort to erase the Tibetan language. Authorities also continued to force monasteries to display portraits of CCP leaders and Tibetans to replace images of the Dalai Lama and other lamas in their homes with portraits of CCP leaders, including former Chairman Mao Zedong and General Secretary and PRC President Xi Jinping. Images of the Dalai Lama were banned, with harsh repercussions for owning or displaying his image. Repression, including arbitrary surveillance, increased around politically sensitive events, religious anniversaries, cultural events with religious components, and the Dalai Lama's birthday. Authorities cancelled or curtailed lay attendance at religious events, including some that had received advanced official approval."

Noting that the regulations regarding religion are issued by the CCP's United Front Work Department (UFWD), the report notes that this body's Bureau of Ethnic and Religious Work manages religious affairs through the State Administration of Religious Affairs (SARA) in carrying out the Sinicization drive.

"The UFWD controls the selection of Tibetan religious leaders, including lamas. Regulations stipulate that, depending on the perceived geographic area of influence of the lama, relevant administrative entities may deny permission for a lama to be recognized as reincarnated (a tenet of Tibetan Buddhism), and that these administrative entities must approve reincarnations. The UFWD claims the right to deny recognition of reincarnations of high lamas of 'especially great influence'."

The regulations also stipulate that all reincarnate lamas must be reborn within China, with the CCP maintaining a registry of officially recognized reincarnate lamas.

The report further notes: "UFWD regulations allow citizens to take part only in officially approved religious practices; these regulations assert CCP control over all aspects of religious activity, including the managing of religious venues, groups, personnel, and schools. Through local regulations issued under the framework of the national-level Management Regulation of Tibetan Buddhist Monasteries, governments of the TAR (Tibet Autonomous Region) and other autonomous Tibetan areas control the registration of monasteries, nunneries, and other Tibetan Buddhist religious centers. The regulations also give the CCP formal control over building and managing religious structures and require monasteries to obtain official permission to hold large-scale religious events or gatherings."

The report continues to highlight the disappearance of Tibet's second most prominent religious figure, saying, "The whereabouts of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, recognized as the 11th Panchen Lama by the Dalai Lama and most Tibetan Buddhists, remained unknown since his 1995 forced disappearance by Chinese authorities. Nyima was six years old at the time he and his family were reportedly abducted."

Welcoming the latest report's release, Ms Tencho Gyatso, president of the International Campaign for Tibet, has said, "The suppression of religious freedom in Tibet, including the efforts by the Chinese government to control the succession of His Holiness the Dalai Lama are core issues for the survival of Tibetan civilization and its future."

She has said that given the gravity of the worsening situation in Tibet, the shedding of spotlight on Tibet in this year's report was welcome "as this is needed more than ever today."

The report notes that a little more than half of Chinese people are atheists or religiously unaffiliated, while 18.2% are Buddhists, 5.1% Christians, 1.8% Muslims and 21.9% followers of folk religions.

US report highlights China's policy of controlling all aspects of Tibetan Buddhism

26 June 2024, International Campaign For Tibet

A US State Department report on religious freedom in Tibet says, "CCP [Communist Party of China] regulations stipulate official control of all aspects of Tibetan Buddhism, including the recognition of lamas, religious venues, groups, personnel, and schools."

The State Department's 2023 Report on International Religious Freedom, released June 26, 2024, says that as in previous years, there were "forced disappearances, arrests, physical abuse, and prolonged detentions without trial of monks, nuns, and other persons due to their religious practices."

Secretary of State Antony J. Blinken and Ambassador-at-Large for International Religious Freedom Rashad Hussain released the report at an event at the State Department. International Campaign for Tibet's Bhuchung Tsering was among a select group of people invited to attend the launch. Ambassador Hussain referred to "decades of persecution of religious communities" and included Tibetan Buddhists among them.

"The suppression of religious freedom in Tibet, including the efforts by the Chinese government to control the succession of His Holiness the Dalai Lama are core issues for the survival of Tibetan civilization and its future,” Tencho Gyatso, president of the International Campaign for Tibet, said. “I welcome the spotlight put on Tibet in this year’s State Department religious freedom report as this is needed more than ever today.”

Focus on Sinicization of Tibetan Buddhism

The report says, “The government continued carrying out its 2019-23 five-year plan to Sinicize Buddhism in China by emphasizing loyalty to the CCP and the state. The Sinicization plan included Tibetan Buddhism, with the involvement of the state-run BAC. Regulations promulgated in 2020 and 2021 further formalized administrative procedures for Sinicizing all religions, including Tibetan Buddhism, in order to “follow the path of socialism with Chinese characteristics,” “correctly handle the relationship between national law and canon,” and place more ideological controls on the training, selection, and monitoring of clergy.”

Further, the report says, “Authorities continued to require Buddhist monasteries to translate texts from Tibetan to Mandarin in what observers said was an effort to erase the Tibetan language. Authorities also continued to force monasteries to display portraits of CCP leaders and Tibetans to replace images of the Dalai Lama and other lamas in their homes with portraits of CCP leaders, including former Chairman Mao Zedong and General Secretary and PRC President Xi Jinping. Images of the Dalai Lama were banned, with harsh repercussions for owning or displaying his image. Repression, including arbitrary surveillance, increased around politically sensitive events, religious anniversaries, cultural events with religious components, and the Dalai Lama’s birthday. Authorities canceled or curtailed lay attendance at religious events, including some that had received advanced official approval.”

Role of Infamous United Front highlighted

The report expands on the role of the infamous United Front Work Department of the Chinese Communist Party in denial of religious freedom to the Tibetan people. It says, “CCP regulations regarding religion are issued by the CCP’s United Front Work Department (UFWD). The UFWD’s Bureau of Ethnic and Religious Work manages religious affairs through the State Administration of Religious Affairs (SARA).

“The UFWD controls the selection of Tibetan religious leaders, including lamas. Regulations stipulate that, depending on the perceived geographic area of influence of the lama, relevant administrative entities may deny permission for a lama to be recognized as reincarnated (a tenet of Tibetan Buddhism), and that these administrative entities must approve reincarnations. The UFWD claims the right to deny recognition of reincarnations of high lamas of “especially great influence.” The regulations also state no foreign organization or individual may interfere in the selection of reincarnate lamas, and all reincarnate lamas must be reborn within China. The CCP maintains a registry of officially recognized reincarnate lamas.

“UFWD regulations allow citizens to take part only in officially approved religious practices; these regulations assert CCP control over all aspects of religious activity, including the managing of religious venues, groups, personnel, and schools. Through local regulations issued under the framework of the national-level Management Regulation of Tibetan Buddhist Monasteries, governments of the TAR and other autonomous Tibetan areas control the registration of monasteries, nunneries, and other Tibetan Buddhist religious centers. The regulations also give the CCP formal control over building and managing religious structures and require monasteries to obtain official permission to hold large-scale religious events or gatherings.”

As in previous years, the report highlights the continued disappearance of the Panchen Lama, saying, “The whereabouts of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, recognized as the 11th Panchen Lama by the Dalai Lama and most Tibetan Buddhists, remained unknown since his 1995 forced disappearance by Chinese authorities. Nyima was six years old at the time he and his family were reportedly abducted.” You can read the full text of the Tibet section of the report here.

Xi visits Tibetans and temple in western China, calls for ethnic unity

20 June 2024, SCMP, Hayley Wong and William Zheng

Chinese President Xi Jinping has issued a call for national unity at a Tibetan Buddhist heritage site as Tibet again becomes a point of contention in relations with the United States.

The Chinese leader visited a middle school for Golok Tibetans and the Tibetan Buddhist Hongjue Temple in the northwestern province of Qinghai on Tuesday, state news agency Xinhua said on Wednesday.

Both sites are in the provincial capital Xining. The historic temple has been key to Beijing’s communication with Tibetan Buddhist leaders since 1951.

Xi’s inspection was reportedly focused on local efforts to deepen education to forge “a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation” and strengthen “love for both the country and the religion” of Tibetan Buddhism, as well as education support from more developed eastern provinces.

Xi met provincial Communist Party and government representatives on Wednesday and stressed the importance of cultivating national unity in the “province with concentrated ethnic minorities”, according to Xinhua.

He told leaders in Qinghai to “adhere to the direction of sinicisation of religion in our country, and strengthen the management of religious affairs, especially the management of religious venues”.

He also stressed the province’s “great mission” to preserve ecological security as the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau “has a rich and diverse but fragile ecosystem”.

The president said provincial leaders should “accelerate the construction of a world-class salt lake industrial base and make [the province] a national clean-energy industry highland, an international ecotourism destination and a green and organic agricultural and livestock product export base”.

The province shares a vast plateau with the Tibet autonomous region and has a wealth of petroleum and natural gas. It also has the country’s largest salt lake area, which contains mineral resources – like potassium and lithium – that are widely used in industries such as high-efficiency agriculture and new energy.

The president sent the signal for ethnic unity as a plenary session of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China – to unveil economic and social development strategies for the coming decade – is set to convene next month.

His trip comes as tensions simmer between the US and China over the issue of Tibet.

The US Congress passed a Tibet policy bill last week which would channel funds to boost Washington’s support for Tibet and counter what it calls “disinformation” from China about the region’s history, people and institutions.

A seven-member US congressional delegation met the 14th Dalai Lama, the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader whom China has described as carrying out “anti-China separatist activities under the cloak of religion”, in India on Wednesday and said they would not allow China to influence the choice of his successor and would pressure Beijing to resume talks with him.

In response, China’s foreign ministry said on Thursday that its policy was “consistent and clear” – that in order to resume contact and talks with Beijing, the 14th Dalai Lama “must thoroughly reflect on and completely correct his political propositions”.

The Dalai Lama, who fled China during the Tibetan Uprising in 1959, will turn 89 next month. Beijing has blamed him for bouts of ethnic unrest in Lhasa, the Tibetan capital, in the 1980s and again in 2008, upheaval that human rights groups blamed on the government’s repressive religious policies.

The Dalai Lama was born in Qinghai, where about half those living in the sparsely populated and remote inland province are non-Han Chinese, and most of the non-Han Chinese are Tibetan.

Xi last visited the province three years ago, when he described the northwestern province as “a strategic key place in maintaining stability in Xinjiang and Tibet”.

Although Hongjue Temple where Xi visited this time was not the biggest Tibetan Buddhist temple in the city, it was the site of one of the most significant meetings between Communist Party’s leadership and a Tibetan Buddhist leader in 1951, said Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at the National Institute of Strategic Studies at Tsinghua University.

Xi Jinping’s father, Xi Zhongxun, then the Communist Party’s deputy secretary of the Northwest Bureau and vice-chairman of the Northwest Military and Political Committee, was appointed by Mao Zedong to arrange the 10th Panchen Lama Erdeni Chokyi Gyaltsen’s return to Shigatse in Tibet, according to the Communist Party’s archive.

The Panchen Lama is considered the most revered religious leader of Tibet after the Dalai Lama.

Xi Zhongxun met the 10th Panchen Lama at Hongjue Temple on December 15, 1951, to discuss details of the Panchen Lama’s return trip as part of a treaty signed by Beijing and Tibet that year.

“They spoke for three hours in the temple, discussed a series of important matters, including the further implementation of the agreement on the peaceful liberation of Tibet and the specific arrangements for the 10th Panchen Lama’s visit to Tibet,” Xie said.

“That was one of the most significant meetings that forged the friendship between Xi Zhongxun and the Panchen Lama that lasted for more than four decades.”

A Qinghai official said the temple still kept Xi Zhongxun and the Panchen Lama’s meeting room untouched as a memorial to mark a historic friendship between the party leadership and Tibetan religious leaders.

Besides the senior Xi’s meeting with the Panchen Lama, Hongjue Temple has been a key historical gateway of communication and interaction between China’s central government and Tibetan Buddhist leaders, according to an ethnic and religious affairs researcher from the Chinese Academic of Social Sciences.

“When Princess Wencheng travelled to Tibet to marry the then Tibetan king Songtsen Gampo, she made a stop at Xining for a month to get herself ready for the higher altitude in Tibet around 641 AD. The stop later became Hongjue Temple,” the researcher said.

Dalai Lama's Remarks On Reincarnation Are A Slap On Xi Jinping's Face: Tibet Watchers

18 June 2024, Strat News Global, Tripti Nath

"I am not thinking of reincarnation."

This simple remark by the Dalai Lama is being interpreted by Tibet watchers as a slap on Xi Jinping's face and a clear message to China to mind its own business.

The Dalai Lama, the Tibetan spiritual leader who turns 89 on July 6, was responding to questions from journalists visiting Dharamshala on reincarnation. His interaction with journalists took place a day before a high profile US delegation, including former US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi arrived to meet him. The meeting is scheduled to be held at the main Buddhist temple in Dharamshala on Wednesday.

Responding to questions on his successor, the Dalai Lama replied: "I am not thinking of reincarnation. The important thing is as long as I am alive, I should use my energies to help as many people as I can."

The Chinese embassy spokesperson in New Delhi promptly took to X to demand that the Tibetan spiritual leader adhere to their laws, rituals and conventions in this regard.

Claiming that the Chinese government implements the policy of freedom of religious belief, the spokesperson said "The 14th Dalai Lama himself was found and recognized following religious rituals and historical conventions, and his succession was approved by the then central government. Therefore, reincarnation of living Buddhas including the Dalai Lama must comply with Chinese laws and regulations and follow religious rituals and historical conventions."

Veteran Tibet watchers in Delhi said that while the Dalai Lama's remark may appear innocuous, it was actually a slap on the face of Chinese President Xi Jinping and a stern reminder to the Chinese to keep off issues related to reincarnation.

Tenzin Lekshay, Spokesperson of the Central Tibetan Administration in Dharamshala, responded to the Chinese embassy spokesperson's post by drawing his attention to a translated version of an address on the theme of reincarnation by the Dalai Lama in September 2011.

The text was accompanied with a black and white picture of the Dalai Lama taken at the time of his official enthronement ceremony in Lhasa, Tibet, on February 22, 1940.

In his 2011 speech, the Dalai Lama touched upon how the Dalai Lamas have functioned as both the political and spiritual leaders since 1642, and warned about "an obvious risk of vested political interests misusing the reincarnation system to fulfil their own political agenda."

Vijay Kranti, Delhi based journalist and Tibetologist who first met the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala in 1972, and has been documenting Tibetan culture and life for half a century, says, "By making this assertion on reincarnation, the Dalai Lama has given a clear signal to Xi Jinping to keep off issues related to his reincarnation or that of any Tibetan reincarnated Lamas known as Tulkus in Tibetan Mahamaya Buddhism. The Chinese designs on attempting to usurp the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama, is well known."

The Dalai Lama's remark was thus a slap on Chinese President Xi Jinping's face, he said.

He also trashed the statement of the Chinese Embassy spokesperson, claiming that the 14th Dalai Lama was approved by the Central government.

"This is complete rubbish, a lie and a mischievous and shameless way of rewriting History. The fact is that the Chinese representatives present at the Dalai Lama's dethronement ceremony in Lhasa had no special privileges. Nor did they have any status better than that of other foreign guests or dignitaries present at the Potala Palace.

"It is laughable that the Chinese Communist Party that is notorious for condemning and destroying religion, is suddenly trying to become champion of religious rituals related to reincarnation."

Vijay who also heads the Centre for Himalayan Asia Studies and Engagement (CHASE), a Delhi based think tank, drew attention to Order/5 issued by the Chinese government in 2007.

The order, later made into law, gives exclusive rights to the Communist Party of China to search, identify, instal and educate the new reincarnations of all Tibetan incarnate Lamas (Tulkus).

In the 90s, the Chinese attempts to instal reincarnates of Panchen Lama and Karmapa, failed miserably. While the whereabouts of the real Panchen Lama are not known till date, the Karmapa escaped from Chinese control.

The recent three resolutions passed by the US Congress unanimously have made it crystal clear that China has no role in selecting and installing either the Dalai Lama or any other incarnate Lama, he added.

Beijing uses Chinese Buddhist group to transform Tibetan Buddhism: report

02 June 2024, RTV Online

The International Campaign for Tibet (ICT), the world's largest Tibet support group based in Washington, released its report on Wednesday that exposed the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) strategy of using a Chinese Buddhist group to transform Tibetan Buddhism in China's image.

The report titled 'Buddhist Association of China Takes A Leading Role In China's Attempts To Control and Forcibly Reshape Tibetan Buddhism' mentioned that, since the takeover of Xi Jinping President of China, the Buddhist Association of China (BAC) has become a key tool in assimilating and transforming Tibetan Buddhism. Especially concerning the search for and recognition of reincarnating lamas. The BAC has a special Tibetan Buddhism Working Committee, which oversees the implementation of CCP directives in Tibetan monasteries.

The report documents a change in the charter of BAC to fit the CCP's political agenda. According to the report, " In 2020, it was amended to include "Sinification of Buddhism in China" as one of its objectives and to "support the leadership of the Communist Party of China and the socialist system, study and implement Xi Jinping's Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era, and adhere to the direction of the Sinification of Buddhism in China." According to the report, the BAC has adopted an extreme political tone, leaving no stone unturned in pushing forward the CCP's agenda. The BAC is forced to form a party-oriented committee within the BAC, even when the decisions of the BAC are made by local religious leaders. It has been strengthening its institutional foundation in recent years, which includes five-year plans and shaping monastic training to meet political goals, the report says.

The report further elaborates that the CCP has introduced measures, regulations and initiatives to exercise control over the recognition of centuries-old traditions related to the future reincarnation of the Dalai Lama.

May

Beijing uses Chinese Buddhist group to transform Tibetan Buddhism: report

30 May 2024, ANI

The International Campaign for Tibet (ICT), the world's largest Tibet support group based in Washington, released its report on Wednesday that exposed the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) strategy of using a Chinese Buddhist group to transform Tibetan Buddhism in China's image.

The report titled 'Buddhist Association of China Takes A Leading Role In China's Attempts To Control and Forcibly Reshape Tibetan Buddhism' mentioned that, since the takeover of Xi Jinping President of China, the Buddhist Association of China (BAC) has become a key tool in assimilating and transforming Tibetan Buddhism. Especially concerning the search for and recognition of reincarnating lamas. The BAC has a special Tibetan Buddhism Working Committee, which oversees the implementation of CCP directives in Tibetan monasteries.

The report documents a change in the charter of BAC to fit the CCP's political agenda. According to the report, " In 2020, it was amended to include "Sinification of Buddhism in China" as one of its objectives and to "support the leadership of the Communist Party of China and the socialist system, study and implement Xi Jinping's Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era, and adhere to the direction of the Sinification of Buddhism in China."

According to the report, the BAC has adopted an extreme political tone, leaving no stone unturned in pushing forward the CCP's agenda. The BAC is forced to form a party-oriented committee within the BAC, even when the decisions of the BAC are made by local religious leaders. It has been strengthening its institutional foundation in recent years, which includes five-year plans and shaping monastic training to meet political goals, the report says.

The report further elaborates that the CCP has introduced measures, regulations and initiatives to exercise control over the recognition of centuries-old traditions related to the future reincarnation of the Dalai Lama. (ANI)

China cracks down on Tibetans during holy month

28 May 2024, RFA, Pelbar and Sonam Lhamo

Authorities are preventing worshipers from visiting temples and performing religious rites.

A Tibetan monk prays in the rain as he circumambulates clockwise around Tsuklakhang, also known as Dalai Lama's Temple complex, in Dharamsala, India, March 12, 2024.

Chinese authorities have instructed Tibetan students, government workers and retirees to refrain from engaging in religious activities in Tibet's capital Lhasa during the Buddhist holy month of Saga Dawa, four sources said.

The Saga Dawa festival occurs during the fourth month of the Tibetan lunar calendar and runs from May 9 to June 6 this year.

For Tibetan Buddhists, it marks the period of Buddha's birth, enlightenment and parinirvana – the state entered after death by someone who has attained nirvana during their lifetime.

During the holy month, thousands of religious pilgrims visit temples and walk sacred kora routes around Lingkor and Barkhor streets in Lhasa, encircling the revered Jokhang Temple.

The ritual kora – making a circumambulation around sacred sites or objects as part of a pilgrimage – holds immense significance for Tibetan Buddhists who believe that virtuous deeds performed during Saga Dawa are magnified based on their location.

A video obtained by Radio Free Asia showed heavy police presence surrounding the Barkhor area – the heart of the capital with its famed pilgrimage circuit – on May 22, the eve of the 15th day of the fourth month of the Tibetan Lunar calendar, considered one of the holiest days during Saga Dawa.

Since the start of Saga Dawa, Chinese police have tightened security around key religious sites, including Potala Palace, Jokhang Temple, and the Barkhor area, the sources told RFA.

The measures illustrate the deterioration of religious freedom in Tibet under the Chinese government's suppression and Sinicization of Tibetan Buddhism – a policy that seeks to bring the religion under the control of the Chinese Communist Party.

Police everywhere

While devotees were seen on pilgrimage on the other days of Saga Dawa, the 15th day on May 23 saw heightened restrictions, with police stationed along the pathways leading to the Sera, Gandhen and Drepung monasteries, said the sources who declined to be named out of fear of retribution by authorities.

"There isn't any place where you don't see police and interrogation stations," one of the sources told RFA.

The Chinese government has increased the number of police checkpoints in and around Lhasa, and authorities have been interrogating Tibetans spontaneously, the person said.

Individuals who do not have a shenfenzhang, or Chinese resident identity card, are prohibited from visiting temples, leading to the heightened restrictions now in effect, said a second source.

"During our visits to circumambulate the holy sites, Chinese police regularly inspect everyone's identity cards and engage in arguments," said a third source.

"Having to engage in disputes with the Chinese police takes an emotional toll on us, and this is one of the reasons why many are afraid of engaging in religious activities as often as they'd like," he said.

Facial recognition technology is pervasive at key pilgrimage sites and authorities regularly frisk Tibetans making pilgrimages, said a fourth source.

Flag-raising festival

Additionally, during the Ngari Flag Raising Festival in Purang county, called Pulan in Chinese, of Ngari Prefecture in the Tibetan Autonomous Region, Chinese authorities increased security as people gathered on May 23 for the annual ceremony, and banned the use of drones during the event, according to the sources.

The annual tradition of hoisting a large central prayer flag pole in front of Mount Kailash in Tibet began in 1681 during the time of the 5th Dalai Lama. In a government notice dated May 16, the Pulan County Public Security Bureau in Talqin said the use of drones and other aircraft during the Saga Dawa flag raising festival was prohibited and that violators would be punished.

Tibetans who attended the event were subjected to extensive questioning and coerced into agreeing to uphold social order and refraining from causing discord, said one of the sources.

Police instructed people not to share photos or videos of the festival on social media, he said.

April

Controversy Erupts as China Restricts Tibetan Buddhist Practices in Dalai Lama's Name

12 April 2024, Yuvraj Tyagi, Republic World

China has distributed a training booklet with directives curbing Tibetan Buddhist rituals, particularly those associated with the Dalai Lama's passing. China has distributed a training booklet with directives curbing Tibetan Buddhist rituals, particularly those associated with the Dalai Lama's passing.

The Chinese government's recent actions in eastern Tibet have raised alarms internationally, with critics decrying what they see as a blatant violation of religious freedoms. A training booklet distributed to Tibetan monasteries has ignited controversy, particularly its directives aimed at curbing religious rites and rituals associated with the Dalai Lama's passing. The booklet, intercepted by reliable sources, outlines stringent prohibitions against Tibetan Buddhist monks engaging in what the Chinese government deems as "illegal" religious activities. These directives include restrictions on commemorating the death of the Dalai Lama, and prohibiting any activities that may "undermine national unity" or "endanger social security."

The document was translated by Google Lens. Critics argue that such measures represent a clear infringement on the religious rights of Tibetans, particularly given the Dalai Lama's status as the exiled spiritual leader of the Tibetan people. Furthermore, the directives aim to suppress expressions of Tibetan identity and cultural heritage, posing a threat to the unique religious practices and traditions of Tibetan Buddhism. Historical context and Tibetan struggle for autonomy The Chinese government's actions in Tibet must be understood within the broader historical context of Tibet's relationship with China and the Tibetan people's struggle for autonomy. Following the proclamation of the People's Republic of China, Tibet was formally reincorporated into the country in 1951, under what the Chinese government termed the "Seventeen Point Agreement." However, tensions between the Tibetan government and the People's Republic of China escalated, culminating in the 1959 Tibetan uprising and the subsequent exile of the Dalai Lama. Since then, Tibetans have faced ongoing repression and cultural assimilation policies imposed by the Chinese government, leading to widespread international condemnation. The Tibetan diaspora and human rights organizations have long criticized China's policies in Tibet, referring to the events of 1950 as a "Chinese invasion" rather than a "peaceful liberation," as claimed by the Chinese government. The dissolution of the Tibetan government and social structures following the 1959 uprising marked a turning point in Tibetan history, with Tibetans continuing to advocate for autonomy and religious freedom. Tibet's contribution to the Indian Army Tibetans have a long history of resistance against Chinese rule, and this history intersects with their contributions to the Indian Army. During the time of the Great Game, the British Indian Army began employing Tibetans as spies, intelligence agents, and even covert militia in northern India and Tibet proper. This strategic partnership continued into the modern era, with Tibetans playing significant roles in the Indian Army. At the time of Indian independence, the northern mountain-covered region of India remained the most isolated and strategically overlooked territory of the subcontinent. As tensions between India and China rose, particularly during the Cold War era, Tibetans became instrumental in intelligence gathering and military operations along the Indo-Tibetan border. The American Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and the Indian Intelligence Bureau (IB) established Mustang Base in Mustang, Nepal, which trained Tibetans in guerrilla warfare. These efforts culminated in the formation of the Special Frontier Force (SFF), a covert paramilitary unit composed primarily of Tibetan refugees. The SFF played a crucial role in various military operations, including the 1971 Indo-Pak war and the Kargil conflict of 1999.

Former CIA officer John Kennet Knaus credited IB Chief Bhola Nath Mullik for the formation of the SFF, highlighting the close collaboration between Indian and Tibetan forces. Additionally, thousands of Tibetans received training from the United States Army Special Forces, partly funded by the federal government of the United States, further emphasizing the strategic importance of Tibetan contributions to Indian military efforts. Despite the geopolitical complexities surrounding Tibet's status and its historical ties with India, Tibetans continue to serve with distinction in the Indian Army, embodying the spirit of resilience and sacrifice in defence of their adopted homeland. As tensions between India and China persist, the contributions of Tibetans to the Indian military remain a testament to their unwavering commitment to freedom and democracy.

China Gives Monks a List of Things They Can't Do After The Dalai Lama's Death

10 April 2024, CTA

Authorities lay out instructions in a training manual for Tibetan Buddhist monks.

-by Radio Free Asia

In the event of the Dalai Lama's death, Buddhist monks are banned from displaying photos of the Tibetan spiritual leader and other "illegal religious activities and rituals," according to a training manual

Chinese authorities have distributed to monasteries in Gansu province in China's northwest, a source inside Tibet and exiled former political prisoner Golok Jigme said. The manual, which lists 10 rules that Buddhist clergy should follow, also forbids disrupting the process of recognizing the Dalai Lama's reincarnation, said the source from inside Tibet who requested anonymity for safety reasons. Tibetans believe they should determine his successor in accordance with their Buddhist belief in reincarnation, while the Chinese government seeks to control the centuries-old selection method. The 14th Dalai Lama, 88, fled Tibet amid a failed 1959 national uprising against China's rule and has lived in exile in Dharamsala, India, ever since. He is the longest-serving Tibetan Buddhist spiritual leader in Tibet's history. The manual, which was seen by Radio Free Asia and was issued to monks in Kanlho Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in the historical Amdo region of Tibet, is the latest effort by Beijing to crack down on the religious freedom of the Tibetan people, experts and rights groups say. Click here to read more.

March

Tibetan monk who criticized China's policies released from prison

07 February 2024, RFA

A Tibetan monk who criticized China's restrictive policies in Tibet and was convicted of "inciting separatism" has been released after four and half years in prison.

Rinchen Tsultrim was released from Mianyang prison in Sichuan province on Feb. 1 after completing his prison term, two sources told Radio Free Asia.

Tsultrim was a monk at the Nangzhig Monastery in Sichuan's Ngaba county when he was taken into custody in 2019. He was secretly detained for more than a year and sentenced in a closed trial in 2021. Before his arrest, he had written favorably on the language rights of Tibetans and had praised the previous incarnation of the Panchen Lama, Tibetan Buddhism's second-most important spiritual leader behind the Dalai Lama.

He posted the writings on his website and had received at least three warnings from Chinese authorities before he was detained.

Separatism, or "working to split the country," is an accusation often leveled by Chinese authorities against Tibetans opposing the assimilation of Tibet's distinctive national and cultural identity into China's dominant Han culture.

Scores of monks, writers, educators, and musical performers have been arrested under the charge in recent years.

Particular targets of censors and police are images of the Dalai Lama shared on mobile phones and calls for the preservation of the Tibetan language, now under threat from government orders to establish Chinese as the main language of instruction in Tibetan schools.

While in prison, Tsultrim was refused permission to meet with his family, and contact was restricted to brief phone calls once a month, sources told RFA at the time.

There were also reports that Tsultrim was subjected to torture, forced labor and political indoctrination while in prison.

The two sources, who requested anonymity for safety reasons, refused to discuss the current condition of Tsultrim's health, citing fear of repercussions. They said that he remains under "constant surveillance."

China 'pressuring' eminent monks and admin in Tibet to denounce Dalai Lama

07 February 2024, The Tribune

With Losar (Tibetan new year) approaching, China is allegedly pressuring eminent monks and monastic administrators in the Tibetan Autonomous Region to denounce the Dalai Lama.

Tibetan government-in-exile sources said that the Chinese authorities in Tibetan-populated areas of Tibet visited at least 35 Buddhist monasteries and urged eminent monks to "deeply expose and denounce" the Dalai Lama and safeguard the "unity of the motherland". They visited the monasteries in Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture from January 11 to 17, according to a statement issued by the United Front Work Department, which oversees the Chinese Government's domestic and external influence operations.

Tibetan New Year, known as Losar, falls on February 10, the same day as China's Lunar New Year, the biggest holiday of the year. A report of the Tibetan government-in-exile says that the Chinese authorities accuse the Tibetan spiritual leader, who lives in exile in Dharamsala, of trying to split the Tibet Autonomous Region and other Tibetan-populated areas in China's Sichuan and Qinghai provinces from the rest of the country.

However, the Dalai Lama does not advocate for independence but rather a "middle way" that accepts Tibet's status as part of China. He urges greater cultural and religious freedom, including strengthening language rights that are guaranteed for ethnic minorities under China's constitution.

The Tibetan government-in-exile says that Chinese officials visited well-known monasteries in the area, including Palyul, Yarchen Gar and Katog, which are associated with the Nyingma School of Vajrayana Buddhism. The Chinese officials urged Tibetan monks to promote the “five identifications” that President Xi Jinping had repeatedly said was required of all Chinese citizens and minority groups. These are identifying with the motherland, Chinese nation, Chinese culture, Chinese Communist Party and socialism with Chinese characteristics.

The Tibetan government-in-exile said that Tibet watchers criticised the move as disingenuous and an effort to put pressure on the Tibetan monastic community to toe the Chinese Communist Party’s line. “The Chinese Government’s practice of extending greetings and monetary gifts to Tibetan monks and nuns on important occasions and holidays are actually tools of deception,” said Dawa Tsering, director of the Tibet Policy Institute, official think tank of the Central Tibetan Administration in Dharamsala. The Tibetan government-in-exile alleged that in their New Year message to Tibetan Buddhist leaders in Palyul county, the Chinese authorities also ordered head monks to carry out an “in-depth, systematic study and political education” of the “party’s religious work theories and principles and policies”.

China claims ‘no idea’ on monk it arrested for republishing books from exile Tibetan community

06 February 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Feb06’24) – Chinese authorities in the historically Tibetan region of Sichuan Province had arrested a Buddhist monk in Jun 2023 for having republished books from the exile Tibetan community and also for having contact with people outside the country, reported the Tibetan service of rfa.org Feb 5, citing belated information from two unnamed local Tibetan sources.

It was not clear what books were republished and what the nature of the contacts were.

The report said the whereabouts of the monk, named as Lobsang Thabkhey, 54, remained unknown. He was reported to have served as the librarian of Kirti Monastery in the province’s Ngaba (Chinese: Aba) county when he republished and disseminated the books in question. The witnesses have spoken on condition of anonymity for safety reasons.

The Ngaba police station, on being contacted by Radio Free Asia, has claimed ignorance about the monk. This was despite the fact that he was stated to have been summoned several times by Chinese police before his eventual arrest.

China maintains especially tight control on information and channels of communication in the Tibetan areas in the name of fighting separatism, making it all the more difficult even to people within the country to get timely and proper information on developing situation.

Thabkhey is said to originally belong to the county’s Meruma township.

February

Exclusive: Chinese authorities release dozens of Tibetans arrested for dam protests (check if its duplicate)

27 February 2024, RFA

Tibetans (L) opposed to the dam project plead with Chinese officials in Dege county, southwestern China's Sichuan province, Feb. 21, 2024. At right, protesters in New York demonstrate against the project in New York City, Feb. 24, 2024.

Around 40 Tibetans have been released from among more than 1,000 people arrested by Chinese police for protesting a dam project that could submerge ancient monasteries in a Tibetan-populated township of southwestern China’s Sichuan province, sources from inside Tibet told Radio Free Asia.

Chinese authorities released about 20 monks each on Monday and Tuesday, said the sources who spoke on condition of anonymity for safety reasons.

They were among a large group of monks arrested from Wonto Monastery, the sources said. However, after their release, authorities imposed strict restrictions on their contact with the outside world, the sources added.

Around 40 Tibetans have been released from among more than 1,000 people arrested by Chinese police for protesting a dam project that could submerge ancient monasteries in a Tibetan-populated township of southwestern China’s Sichuan province, sources from inside Tibet told Radio Free Asia.

Chinese authorities released about 20 monks each on Monday and Tuesday, said the sources who spoke on condition of anonymity for safety reasons.

They were among a large group of monks arrested from Wonto Monastery, the sources said. However, after their release, authorities imposed strict restrictions on their contact with the outside world, the sources added.

On Feb. 23, police arrested more than 1,000 Tibetans, including monks and residents, of Dege county in Sichuan's Kardze Autonomous Tibetan Prefecture, who had been peacefully protesting the construction of the Gangtuo Dam.

If built, the structure could submerge monasteries in Dege's Wangbuding township and force residents of at least two villages near the Drichu River to relocate, sources told RFA.

The fate of the monasteries on both sides of the Drichu, or Jinsha in Chinese, has been at the center of the protests staged since Feb. 14 by Buddhist monks and local Tibetans, who have expressed distress at the expected destruction of the centuries-old religious institutions, including Wonto Monastery, which dates back to the 13th century.

"One of the main reasons for the release of the Tibetans is the growing media coverage abroad of the mass arrests that have taken place," one source told RFA.

Some of the arrested Tibetans were beaten during the interrogations and later had to be admitted to the hospital. They were also informed individually at the hospital that they would be allowed to return to the monasteries on Wednesday, the same source said.

But authorities forbade them to communicate with outsiders, the sources said.

After the arrest of a number of monks from Wonto on Feb. 22 and Feb. 23, authorities prohibited all religious activities within the monastery, a second source said.

Chinese police have also imposed strict restrictions on the movement of monks to and from the various monasteries located on both sides of the Drichu River, the same person said.

Monastery murals

Besides the Wonto Monastery, the Yena and Khardho monasteries in Wangbuding on the east bank of the Drichu River and the Rabten, Gonsar, Tashi and Pharok monasteries in the Tibetan Autonomous Region on the west bank of the river may be affected by the building of the dam.

At China's 8th International Academic Symposium on Tibetan Archaeology and Art in Hangzhou in December 2023, postgraduate student Yao Ruiyi warned in a study that the hydropower station "will cause greater difficulties in the subsequent preservation and research of the Wangdui Temple murals," using another name for the Wonto Monastery.

"Therefore, the research and protection of Wangdui Temple murals is urgent," the study said.

The Gangtuo Dam is part of a plan that China's National Development and Reform Commission announced in 2012 to build a massive 13-tier hydropower complex on the Drichu. It would be located at Wontok (or Gangtuo, in Chinese) in Dege county, northwest of Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture. The total planned capacity of the 13 hydropower stations is 13,920 megawatts.

Foreign outcry

Representatives of the U.S. and Canadian governments as well as global rights groups and Tibetan advocacy groups have condemned China's arrest of the 1,000 dam protesters, calling for the immediate release of those detained and for the preservation of the cultural, religious and linguistic identity of Tibetans.

In a post to the social media network X on Monday, the U.S. Congressional-Executive Commission on China condemned "the reported violent repression of peaceful protests against the planned destruction of 2 villages and 6 monasteries by a hydropower dam project," referring to RFA's report on the mass arrests.

"Those detained must be released and the PRC must protect the cultural heritage of Tibetan Buddhist monasteries," the Commission said, referring to the People's Republic of China.

A day earlier, Uzra Zeya, the U.S. under secretary for civilian security, democracy and human rights and U.S. special coordinator for Tibetan Issues, also posted a message to X noting that the centuries-old monasteries "are home to hundreds of Tibetan Buddhist monks and contain irreplaceable cultural relics."

"The U.S. stands with Tibetans in preserving their unique cultural, religious, and linguistic identity," she wrote.

RFA reported on Feb. 14 that at least 300 Tibetans gathered outside Dege County Town Hall to protest the building of the Gangtuo Dam.

Tibetans in exile have been holding mass demonstrations in various parts of the world, including Dharamsala, India – home to the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama – and New York, Zurich and Toronto.

Tibetans protesting against dam construction face violence and detention

26 February 2024, Phayul

Chinese police in Kham Dege have reportedly been conducting harsh interrogations of Tibetans who were detained for protesting against a dam project, with some subjected to severe beatings requiring medical attention, according to sources cited by Radio Free Asia.

The protests, involving Buddhist monks and residents from Wangbuding township in Dege County, Kardze in Tibet, began on Friday. The detainees, who have been peacefully protesting since February 14 against the proposed construction of the Gangtuo hydropower dam on the Dri Chu River, have faced harsh treatment from authorities.

Sources speaking to RFA revealed that detainees were “slapped and beaten severely each time they refused to answer important questions, Many had to be taken to the hospital.” Among those affected was a monk from the Wonto Monastery who suffered severe injuries resulting in him unable to speak and bearing numerous bruises on his body.

Many of the arrested Tibetans are being held in different locations throughout Dege County, including police stations in upper Dege and an old prison, as there is no single facility capable of accommodating more than 1,000 individuals who are currently detained.

Reports indicate that detainees have been deprived of food, leading to several individuals passing out due to the lack of sustenance, particularly in the freezing temperatures. “In these detention centres, the arrested Tibetans were not given any food, save for some hot water, and many passed out because of the lack of food amid the freezing temperatures,” a source told RFA.

Furthermore, detainees were instructed to bring their own bedding and tsampa or barley, a Tibetan staple, indicating that their release is not imminent. “Each of the police units brought in from outside Dege have been tasked with controlling a community each and for carrying out strict surveillance and suppression of the people there,” a source told RFA.

“In the communities of Wonto and Yena, people have been restricted from leaving their homes and the restrictions are so severe that it is similar to what happened during the Covid-19 outbreak when the entire place was under lockdown,” said the same source.

Reports indicate that the authorities in Dege County have taken drastic measures to control the flow of information and suppress dissent. It has been reported that internet and phone lines have been severed, and individuals have had their phones confiscated forcibly. Additionally, there are allegations of spies being deployed among the populace to prevent the dissemination of information about the events unfolding in the region.

US Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues, Uzra Zeya posted on her official X (formerly known as Twitter) account wrote, “Deeply concerned by reports of the PRC’s mass arrests of Tibetans protesting construction of a dam that threatens displacement of villages & destruction of monasteries. China must respect human rights & freedom of expression and include Tibetans in the development & implementation of water and land management policies”.

Despite protests against dam construction in Tibet, Beijing is proceeding with its plans

26 February 2024, Asia News

Tibetan monks who took to the streets against Chinese authorities were arrested and mistreated in detention. Plans to build a hydroelectric power plant would see two villages and six monasteries submerged, which is why Beijing has issued an order to relocate residents, which the latter are resisting.

Dharamsala (AsiaNews) – Chinese police have begun questioning Tibetans arrested over the weekend for protesting the construction of a dam in Dege county, Sichuan province, on the border with Tibet.

Those taken into custody are being held at various locations in Dege County as no single site could detain more than a thousand individuals at once.

A source that spoke to Radio Free Asia (RFA) on condition of anonymity for personal safety said that the detainees were “slapped and beaten severely each time they refused to answer important questions,” while “Many had to be taken to the hospital.”

Another source added that some prisoners “passed out because of the lack of food amid the freezing temperatures.”

For their part, Chinese authorities imposed COVID-19-like restrictions, banning people from leaving their homes.

Local monks and residents began to protest peacefully on 14 February, after receiving a forced relocation order from Beijing due to the construction of the Gangtok (Kamtok in Tibetan) hydroelectric power plant.

For the project to be completed, the villages of Upper Wonto and Shipa, home to about 2,000 Tibetans, and six monasteries – three in Dege County and three in Chamdo (Changdu) township, must be demolished before they are submerged by water.

Several videos posted online show the monks prostrating themselves before Chinese officials (a gesture that Tibetans consider “awful”), urging them to review the decision and stop the demolition of their places of worship.

In particular, the monasteries in Wonto (which contain precious painted walls dating back to the 13th century) and Yena, the closest to the construction site, are home to about 300 monks and carry important religious and cultural value for local Tibetans.

Beijing, however, seems unwilling to stop the project. The 2,240-megawatt Gangtuo (Kamtok) hydroelectric power plant is located along the upper Yangtze River (Dri Chu in Tibetan and Jinsha in Chinese).

It is part of a broader plan by the National Development and Reform Commission to build dozens of the world's largest hydroelectric stations in the Three Parallel Rivers (Yangtze, Mekong, Salween) protected area in Sichuan, Yunnan, and Tibet, where they originate.

The area, which has long been targeted by China for clean energy production, is also a UNESCO Natural World Heritage Site.

According to Tibet advocacy groups, Beijing approved the construction of the dams while sending partial information to the UN agency about possible environmental damage.

Complaints by the local population and environmental activists seem to fall on deaf ears; in early December 2023, China announced that it had completed 50 per cent of the construction of the Yebatan dam, just south of the Gangtuo dam.

According to the Chinese government, the plant, in which Beijing has invested more than 33 billion yuan (US$ 4.6 billion), will be operational by the end of 2025 and will serve the region's social and economic development.

China's Panchen gets an earful on perfecting his role to help Sinicize Tibet, Tibetan Buddhism

25 February 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Feb25'24) – China's politburo leader on ethnic minority and religious affairs has on Feb 21 met with its replacement 11th Panchen Lama Gyaincain Norbu in Beijing and called on him to step up in carrying out his role to help assimilate Tibet and its religion in the mould of Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era. Shi Taifeng, a member of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and head of the United Front Work Department of the CPC Central Committee, extended greetings for the Spring Festival and the Tibetan New Year to "Panchen Rinpoche" and all Tibetan Buddhism believers in the meeting, reported China's official Xinhua news agency Feb 21.

While acknowledging the achievements made by "Panchen Rinpoche" over the past year, Shi expressed the hope that the former could conscientiously study Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era, and maintain a high degree of unity with the CPC Central Committee with Comrade Xi Jinping at its core ideologically, politically and in action, the report said.

Shi has also expressed hope that the "Panchen Rinpoche" could uphold the principle of developing Tibetan Buddhism in the Chinese context, and actively contribute to advancing the adaptation of Tibetan Buddhism to the socialist society.

In his turn, the "Panchen Rinpoche" has said he would continue to improve political standards and religious knowledge, inherit and carry forward the patriotic and religious tradition of the Tibetan Buddhist community, and resolutely safeguard national unity and ethnic solidarity.

But Gyaincain Norbu's status as the "Panchen Lama" remains controversial at best. He is not recognized by mainstream Tibetan Buddhists as he was recognized under the supervision and control of the atheist, even anti-religious CPC and installed by it months after kidnapping and disappearing the 6-year-old candidate Gedhun Choekyi Nyima who had already been recognized and proclaimed by Tibet's exiled spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, in 1995. His fate or whereabouts have continued to remain unknown to this day.

Gyaincain Norbu lives in Beijing, although the Tashi Lhunpo Monastery in Shigatse City of Tibet is supposed to be his seat monastery.

Buddhist monks among 100 held in China over dam protests

24 February 2024, Arunachal Times

Chinese security officials have arrested more than 100 Tibetan Buddhist monks and local people in the southwestern Sichuan province to quell protests against the construction of a massive dam that would submerge six Buddhist monasteries and force the relocation of two villages, a media report said.

In a rare act of defiance, residents have taken to the streets of Wangbuding township of Dege County in the Garze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture since 14 February to oppose the plan to build the 2,240-megawatt Gangtuo hydropower station on the Drichu river (Jinsha in Chinese).

The dam is located on the upper reaches of the Yangtze river, one of China's most important waterways, Radio Free Asia reported on Thursday.

The protests started on 14 February, when at least 300 Tibetans gathered outside the Dege county town hall to oppose the dam's construction, defying strict controls on public gatherings and extensive surveillance by authorities in Sichuan and Tibet regions.

The detentions reportedly occurred in the Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Sichuan, an area with a large population of ethnic Tibetans.

Some of the arrested protesters required hospitalisation due to rough treatment, the report said.

Police used water cannons, pepper spray and tasers to subdue the protesters.

Videos of protests showed monks prostrating before the officials, pleading with them not to resort to demolition when they inspected Yena and Wonto monasteries in preparation for their destruction.

The USD 4.6 billion Yebatan hydropower station, the largest hydropower project in the upper reaches of the Jinsha river, exceeded 100 metres in December last year, achieving a major milestone, state-run 'Global Times' reported earlier.

The total installed capacity of the power station is expected to reach 2,240 megawatts after completion, with a maximum dam height of 217 metres. It is the tallest hyperbolic arch dam project under construction in China, according to the report. The protesting locals were particularly distraught over the construction of the hydroelectric dam, as it would destroy six monasteries, including the Wonto monastery, which includes ancient murals that date to the 13th century, the RFA report said.

Videos by citizens on the protests show Chinese officials dressed in black forcibly restraining monks, who can be heard protesting against the dam.

The construction of the Gangtuo hydropower dam will force the resettlement of Upper Wonto and Shipa villages, the Yena, Wonto and Khardho monasteries in Dege county, and the Rabten, Gonsar and Tashi monasteries in Chamdo township, the RFA report said.

The Wonto and Yena monasteries, located closest to the site of the planned project, together have about 300 monks and hold significant cultural and religious importance to the locals.

The Wonto monastery was severely damaged during China's Cultural Revolution. However, locals preserved its ancient murals and began rebuilding the monastery in 1983.

The number of monks who live and worship at the four other monasteries slated for destruction is not known, the report said.

About 2,000 people live in the two villages, and would be forced to relocate due to the dam project. When asked about the protests at a media briefing here on Friday, Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Mao Ning declined to comment on the report, saying that she was not aware of the incident and it was not a diplomatic question.

Perched in the Himalayas, Tibet, also known as the Roof of the World, is the origin of some of the biggest rivers in the world, including the Brahmaputra, Indus, Sutlej, Yangtze, Mekong, and Yellow rivers.

In recent years, China has stepped up efforts to build massive hydropower projects in the Tibet Autonomous Region. It is also building the world's biggest hydroelectric dam over the Brahmaputra river in Tibet, close to the Arunachal Pradesh border. The dam, which one Chinese official said has "no parallel in history," is being built in Medog county of Tibet, where the Brahmaputra Grand Canyon is located. Medog is the last county in Tibet.

India and Bangladesh, the lower riparian states, have raised concerns over the dams on the

Brahmaputra, known in Tibet as Yarlung Tsangpo. (PTI)

China's biometric surveillance in Tibet matures to integration projects (Cyber. news )

23 February 2024, Rtv

The Chinese government in Tibet is linking the various biometric surveillance systems and databases. It's the next logical step after deploying so many of the systems to maintain control of the region.

It's unlikely that remote and sparsely populated Tibet is monitored in the same blanket fashion as China's Xinjiang region, but according to a new report what information has been collected is being tied into numerous biometric and other databases controlled by the autocratic government in Beijing.

The report was created by two public policy organizations that advocate for Tibet's restored independence – Turquoise Roof and Tibet Watch.

They say the Chinese government has, since 2021, required Tibetans to install the National Anti-Fraud Centre app, which government officials say has attack-prevention and -reporting functions.

Police reportedly have set up roadblocks and force travelers to download and enroll the app right there using facial recognition.

According to the report, the government has made downloading the software a legal requirement. Officials allege that they are only trying to reduce internet fraud in a region with a 2022 gross domestic product of US$29.7 billion.

The authors report interviewing Tibetan sources and nationals arriving in India as refugees. They also had access to "big data generated from official government sources, mobile digital forensics in the context of contemporary Tibet, and in-depth analysis of surveillance System Description Documents."

In other sections of the report, the authors refer to and quote an unnamed "Tibetan refugee" from the Golog areas. It's unclear how many refugees were interviewed.

They say they conducted a "dynamic analysis" of the anti-fraud app on Windows and Android devices and found that data collected by the software "could extend beyond internet fraud detection." The app is capable of linking to "broader control mechanisms." More broadly in Tibet, according to the report, Beijing has integrated "AI-driven systems fusing facial recognition with internet browsing and app-based monitoring" to DNA and GIS tracking data.

For example, there is the "'Tibet Underworld Criminal Integrated Intelligence Application Platform', a sophisticated big data policing platform." Researchers reportedly analyzed procurement notices to find that it "amalgamates data from various existing Public Security Bureau systems in the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) into a central Oracle database.”

The authors say there are reports that people accessing offshore financial companies with their phones are picked up for an investigation.

Gonpo Kyi stages sit-in outside court for justice for imprisoned brother

21 February 2024, International Campaign For Tibet

Undeterred by multiple detentions, police manhandling and other forms of cruel treatment, Gonpo Kyi staged a sit-in again on Feb. 20, 2024 in front of the Higher People’s Court of the Tibet Autonomous Region in Lhasa, seeking justice for her brother, Dorjee Tashi, who is serving a life sentence in Drapchi Prison.

After their last protest in front of the same court, Gonpo and her husband, Choekyong, were taken into detention on Dec. 13, 2023. Gonpo was released after around eight days of detention, while her husband was released after five days.

Unconfirmed reports indicate that the authorities of Lhasa had been attempting to expel Gonpo and her husband from Lhasa back to their native hometown of Labrang (Chinese: Xiahe) in Gansu Province to prevent them from staging further protests in front of the Higher People’s Court.

In the latest video clip obtained by the International Campaign for Tibet, Gonpo can be seen sitting in front of the gate of the Higher People’s Court on Feb. 20, holding a flyer and a portrait of Chinese leader Xi Jinping. In the clip, the flyer written in Chinese that Gonpo holds in her right hand reads: “Dorjee Tashi has not committed any crime.” She also holds a portrait of President Xi Jinping in her lap supported by her left hand. The videographer states that the date of the video is Feb. 20, and the location is the Higher People’s Court of the Tibet Autonomous Region.

Compared to her previous sit-ins, Gonpo holding a large portrait of Xi Jinping is a new tactic, presumably indicating she’s appealing for intervention from China’s top leader in accordance with the constitution to defend justice. Holding a portrait of Xi is also tactical as a safeguard against the police and officials forcibly removing her from the spot and putting her into detention again.

The International Campaign for Tibet will continue to monitor the status of Gonpo Kyi.

Dorjee Tashi

ICT has previously documented the torture of the renowned Tibetan businessman and philanthropist Dorjee Tashi during his pre-trial detention, as well as his family’s tireless advocacy for justice.

Both the United States and the European Union have raised concerns about the arbitrary detention of Dorjee Tashi. Notably, the European Union called for his immediate and unconditional release, along with the release of others, during its statement on the occasion of International Human Rights Day, Dec. 10. The United States also acknowledged the detention of Dorjee Tashi in its 2022 and 2021 State Department Country Reports on Human Rights Practices. Read ICT’s past coverage of Dorjee Tashi’s imprisonment and his sister Gonpo Kyi’s activism for justice.

Unprecedented Tibetan Protest Against Hydropower Station in Sichuan

19 February 2024, Bitter Winter

The construction of Gangtuo Power Plant compels thousands of Tibetans to relocate. It is about money but also contributes to destroying Tibetan culture and religion.

Something unusual and largely unprecedented took place on February 14 in Derge (Ch. Gengqing), the county seat of Dêgê County, part of the Garzê Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, in Sichuan Province. Hundreds of Tibetans gathered to protest and tried to block the entrance of the Dêgê County Government building, clashing with the police. There are also unconfirmed reports of arrests.

Derge is a Tibetan city and a renowned center of Tibetan religion and culture. It is part of Kham, one of the areas of historical Tibet that the Chinese did not include in the so-called Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) but added to another province, in this case Sichuan.

While the Tibetans of Kham would have ample reasons to protest against the destruction of their language, culture, and religion, what moved them to risk their liberty with an unauthorized demonstration was the refusal of the Chinese authorities to open a dialogue with the local population about Beijing’s hydropower stations plan.

China is building between Sichuan and Tibet the largest hydropower system in the People’s Republic and one of the largest in the world. A key part of this project is Gangtuo Power Plant, part of a 25-dams system on the Dri Chu (Ch. Jingsa) River, i.e., the upper stretches of the Yangtze River.

The dams are a huge multi-billion-dollar business, but apart from their controversial ecological impact, they come with a huge human cost for the local populace. Necessarily, villages are flooded and the population should be relocated. Old buildings, including monasteries and temples, are submerged and destroyed. Those who do not want to be relocated elsewhere organized the protest in Derge.

“Relocation here,” according to the words of a local villager that were reported to a “Bitter Winter” correspondent, “does not mean that you are transferred to another nice village ready to welcome you. We are told that we will have apartments but they are not ready. Meanwhile, we are parked in camps that are kept under strict surveillance to prevent protest and are very similar to reeducation camps—although we have committed no crime.”

Some villagers do not believe that the purposes of the dam project are simply about economy. In the words of one village leader that were reported to a “Bitter Winter” correspondent, “Of course it is about making money, and big money at that, but I am sure there is more. Tibetans compelled to relocate are separated from their history, from homes where their families may have lived for decades or even centuries, from all their visible cultural and religious points of reference. It is yet another way of destroying Tibetan identity in Kham.”

Thanks to the X account of exiled Tibetan Sakar Tashi, videos of the protest were released and spread internationally (although they were quickly banned from Weibo in China). The independent YouTube channel “Yesterday” by citizen journalist Lu Yuyu, now living in exile in Canada after having served time in jail in China, also offered images of the protests.

Report claims Chinese authorities spying on exiled Tibetans (Cyber)

18 February 2024, The Economic Times

The Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRS) released a report, followed by an organisation based in the North Indian hill town of Dharamshala, revealing Chinese authorities' surveillance of exile Tibetans to collect personal information.

While speaking to ANI, TCHRD's spokesperson, Tenzin Dawa, remarked that the whole process of the report took about two years, and they have tried to get in touch with around one hundred Tibetan people. She further added, “The report is a collection of first-hand testimony collected from Tibetans from the diaspora who have been affected by transnational repression.”

“We also have another section of secondary data that is a compilation of all existing articles or information that is publicly available in the news or media outlets,” she added.

“China uses the spying data to infiltrate and undermine diaspora networks, potentially through disinformation campaigns and even as a basis for blackmail,” she said while speaking to ANI.

Dawa Tsering further said, “The spying aspects are just one part of the findings of our report so the report that we have just released is actually one of the first to focus on the transnational repression led by the CCP on the Tibetan diaspora communities.”

“In the international communities, there have been a lot of discussions on the kind of repression that's being faced transnationally by the so-called Chinese overseas, including the Uyghurs, Hongkongers, and Taiwanese, but there has been no sort of report dedicated to the kind of repression that the Tibetans in diaspora have been facing for so long,” TCHRD's spokesperson added. As per the report, the TCHRD's spokesperson said, “TCHRD felt the need to first of all document these issues because transnational repression, is not new to the Tibetan community. The CCP has targeted the Tibetan diaspora, using family members back inside Tibet to control and sort of undermine the legitimacy or functionality of the Tibetan overseas organisations.”

Commenting further on this issue, Dawa said,

“The protests that took place inside Tibet in the late 1980s and then following that, there was a huge uprising in 2008 inside Tibet and it was that particular uprising that the Chinese government viewed the Tibetans who were outside of Tibet as the insighters of the protest inside Tibet.

That's why they really think about the need to cut off any sort of communication or relationship between the Tibetans inside and outside Tibet. And then sending a spy and collecting personal information of Tibetans in the diaspora because they view it as a threat.” the statement added.

While speaking to ANI, Dolma Tsering, deputy speaker of the Tibetan parliament in exile, said, “When you do lots of wrong things, you take others in the same way... They are hiding lots of things about what's happening in Tibet and in mainland China as a whole from the world.

“Tibet is cut off from the rest of the world. Why? Because they have lots of things to hide... The violation of not only human rights in the name of conserving nature, but also national parks are coming up,” she added

Additionally, the deputy speaker remarked, “The centuries-old nomads are relocated because they want to make Tibet into a slaughterhouse to raise consumption for the tourism that is inflowing into China so they're hiding all these things but what do we have in exile? We are as transparent as we can be. We just have the truth with us.”

“His Holiness has always welcomed the Chinese leadership to come and investigate what we are doing here. We are an open file to the world. Whatever we say to the world, what we do in the office, everything is transparent because we have a democracy, a rule of law and the people's will being taken into consideration, which is just the reverse in China. so there is nothing to spy on the exile government.” the statement added

Deputy speaker further said, “Many of the time, our computers are being hacked. Whenever we do any kind of activity, the people who are in charge of those core groups will find all our emails were hacked but they will find nothing because whatever we say, you will find on our computers. We have nothing to hide. So I am challenging China to open the Tibet and we invite you here to investigate what we are doing here."

Journal retracts 18 papers from China due to Tibet and other human rights concerns (Repeat?)

17 February 2024, Tibetan Review

TibetanReview.net, Feb17'24) – A genetics journal from a leading scientific publisher in the United States has retracted 18 papers from China in what is seen as the biggest mass retraction of academic research due to concerns about human rights violations, reported theguardian.com Feb 15. It followed a lengthy investigation of allegations that DNA samples collected, including from Tibet and Xinjiang, could not have been free or fair given the circumstances in which they occurred.

The articles were published in Molecular Genetics & Genomic Medicine (MGGM), a genetics journal published by the US academic publishing company Wiley. They were retracted on Monday (Feb 12) after an agreement between the journal's editor in chief, Suzanne Hart, and the publishing company, the report said.

This followed a review process that took over two years and in which investigators found "inconsistencies" between the research and the consent documentation provided by researchers.

The papers by different scientists are all based on research that draws on DNA samples collected from populations in the greater China territory of the People's Republic of China (PRC). In several cases, the researchers used samples from populations deemed by experts and human rights campaigners to be vulnerable to exploitation and oppression in the PRC, leading to concerns that they would not be able to freely consent to such samples being taken, the report said.

Tellingly, several of the researchers were associated with public security authorities in the PRC, a fact that "voids any notion of free informed consent," Yves Moreau, a professor of engineering at the University of Leuven, in Belgium, who focuses on DNA analysis, has said.

It was Moreau who first raised concerns about the papers with Hart, MGGM's editor-in-chief, in Mar 2021.

One retracted paper has studied the DNA of Tibetans in Lhasa, the capital of Tibet, using blood samples collected from 120 individuals. The research article was cited as saying "all individuals provided written informed consent" and that work was approved by the Fudan University ethics committee. However, the retraction notice published on Feb 12 has stated that an ethical review "uncovered inconsistencies between the consent documentation and the research reported; the documentation was not sufficiently detailed to resolve the concerns raised."

Xie Jianhui, the corresponding author on the study, is from the department of forensic medicine at Fudan University in Shanghai, and has not agree with the retraction.

Several of Xie's co-authors are stated to be affiliated with the public security authorities in the PRC, including the public security authorities in Tibet.

Tibet is considered to be one of the most closely surveilled and tightly monitored regions in the PRC. In its most recent annual report, the campaign group Human Rights Watch said that the authorities "enforce severe restrictions on freedoms of religion, expression, movement and assembly" there, the report noted.

MGGM, seen as a mid-ranking genetics publication, is considered to be a relatively easy forum for publication, which may have been a draw for Chinese researchers looking to publish in English-language journals, David Curtis, a professor of genetics at University College London, has said.

MGGM primarily publishes studies on the medical applications of genetics, such as a recent paper on genetic disorders linked to hearing loss. The sudden pivot towards publishing forensic genetics research from China came as other forensic genetics journals started facing more scrutiny for publishing research based on DNA samples from vulnerable minorities in the PRC. Moreau has said. He argues that may have pushed more controversial research towards mid-ranking journals such as MGGM that do not specialize in forensic genetics.

The Wiley retractions was stated to have come days before a Chinese government deadline requiring universities to submit lists of all academic articles retracted in the past three years.

According to an analysis by Nature, nearly 14,000 retraction notices were published last year, of which three-quarters involved a Chinese co-author, the report said.

Tibetans in Eastern Tibet Protest Hydropower Station and their relocation

16 February 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

Hundreds of Tibetans staged protests outside the Derge (Chinese: Dege) county government's office in the Kardze (Ganzi) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Sichuan, on Feb. 14, 2024, calling for halt to a proposed hydropower station construction in their area, and to withdraw the order for relocation of Tibetans from the surrounding area because of this. Videos of the Tibetans' protest were being circulated in the social media. A large group of Tibetans are seen peacefully protesting in front of a government office building and officials (mostly in civilian clothes) can be seen stopping the crowd from moving forward. Voice of America Tibetan reported that the Derge county officials informed the protesting Tibetans that nothing could be done on this at their level.

According to a source in exile, who is from Derge, the Tibetans who were protesting were from Wentuo town (Wentuo Zhen) in Derge county who were being asked to relocate to another place near Moshoe bridge in the same county. The exact location of Moshoe bridge could not be ascertained, but the source said some houses have already been built there to house the people.

Voice of America Tibetan service reported that the hydropower station was the Kamtok (Gangtuo) Hydropower Station. A posting about the protest on Chinese social media outlet Weibo also identified it as being Kamtok. ICT could not get independent confirmation, but this particular station is located over the Dri Chu River in the nearby Kamtok Township, Jomda (Jiangda) County, Chamdo (Changdu) City, TAR. Following the protest, one social media posting said the authorities have taken down the video circulating on Weibo. Radio Free Asia Tibetan reports that following the protests, Chinese authorities increased security measures and have been trying to identify protest organizers and participants, two sources inside Tibet said.

Several monasteries and dozens of villages in two townships in the county face the threat of relocation, according to Tibetan language media reports.

The International Campaign for Tibet is deeply concerned about the apparent disregard of local Tibetan's rights and the threat of relocation, connected to the construction of the hydropower station. ICT is calling on the Chinese authorities to respect the rights of peaceful protesters and to refrain from using violence or resort to arbitrary detention of those involved. Moreover, ICT is urging the international community to press on the Chinese government to respect international human rights standards.

The Chinese government continues to pursue blind and commercial infrastructure projects in Tibet that are designed and implemented without regard for environmental impacts or local community concerns. These projects, which include rail roads, highways, and power grids, combined with resource extraction projects such as hydropower dams and mining create economic and environmental costs that disproportionately impact Tibetans, ICT said.

Tibetan water security

Tibet is home to one-fifth of the world's freshwater supply. Glacial runoff from it forms rivers in almost every country across South and Southeast Asia, with an estimated 1.8 billion people dependent on this water's healthy, unimpeded flow.

The integrity of Tibet's ecology is critical to the Tibetan' people's way of life and directly contributes to the stability and economic wellbeing of downstream countries in South and Southeast Asia.

However, large-scale water diversion projects and hydropower development are having dramatic downstream consequences, including lack of access to freshwater, economic disruption, and negative impacts on downstream ecosystems.

China arrests Tibetan monk for possession of Dalai Lama photo

15 February 2024, RFA

An unidentified monk holds a picture of the Tibetan Buddhist spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, in his room in Labrang Monastery in Xiahe county, western China's Gansu province, in 2012.

A Buddhist monk in a Tibetan-populated area of Sichuan province was arrested last July for possessing a photo of the Dalai Lama and since then his whereabouts have remained unknown, two sources from inside Tibet told Radio Free Asia.

Chinese authorities arrested Tenzin Khenrap, 29, in July 2023 on a charge of having a portrait of the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader on his mobile phone, along with other books and documents published outside Tibet. Khenrap, whose pen name is Dhong Rangchak, is from Nyagchu county in Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture.

China regards the Dalai Lama and Tibetans who live in exile abroad as separatists, and being caught with a picture of the spiritual leader or having contact with Tibetans abroad is considered an act of separatism and a punishable offense.

Authorities in China maintain a tight lockdown on the flow of information in and out of the country's Tibetan regions, and it can often take weeks or months to learn of arrests and other incidents inside Tibet.

After his arrest, authorities detained Khenrap in Sichuan province, known as Kham in Tibetan, but his current location and circumstances are unknown, said the sources who requested anonymity, citing safety reasons.

Authorities also revoked access to his social media accounts, they added.

Chinese authorities have not allowed Khenrap's immediate family members to meet with him since his arrest or provided information on where he is being detained, one of the sources said.

"Khenrap's mother remains very worried about her son, and her health has deteriorated since his arrest last year," said the source.

The monk, who speaks fluent Tibetan and Mandarin, is known for intensely following developments about Tibetans' struggle against Chinese-government repression and for writing articles online, the same source said.

Khenrap was a student at several monasteries in Sichuan province, including Lithang Gonchen, Sershul, and Nalendra, which was the single largest monastery founded by popular Tibetan religious teacher and activist Tulku Tenzin Delek and which served as the primary institution for his increasing network of branch monasteries, monks and activists, the two sources said.

Tulku Tenzin Delek was 65 when he died under mysterious circumstances on July 12, 2015, while serving a life sentence following what rights groups and supporters called a wrongful conviction on a charge of bombing a public square in Sichuan's provincial capital of Chengdu in April 2002.

Widely respected among Tibetans for his efforts to protect Tibetan culture and the environment, he was initially sentenced to death, but his term was later commuted to life imprisonment.

Chinese authorities maintain a tight grip on Tibet, restricting Tibetans' political activities and peaceful expression of cultural and religious identity. Tibetans frequently complain of discrimination and human rights abuses by authorities and policies they say are aimed at eradicating their national and cultural identity.

In Feb. 2023, Chinese authorities arrested Tsultrim, a Tibetan from Tsaruma township in Ngaba's Kyungchu county, after they discovered pictures of the Dalai Lama on his mobile phone.

He was detained until April, after which he was sentenced to two years in prison by the People's Court of Ngaba, a Tibetan region in southwestern China's Sichuan province, also known as Aba in Chinese.

Chinese nationals moving into hitherto vacant 'border defence village' buildings in occupied Tibet

15 February 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Feb15'24) –Chinese nationals have started occupying the double-storeyed spacious buildings in some of the model "Xiaokang" border defence villages that had come up in occupied Tibet across India's north-eastern borders along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) since 2019, reported the indianexpress.com Feb 15. While the existence of such new villages so-close to the border is itself a matter of concern to India, it is unclear whether the new residents are civilian or military, the report said. The report cited senior Indian officials familiar with the matter as saying the Chinese had started occupying a couple of these village buildings in the new villages on the Tibetan side of the LAC across from Lohit Valley and the Tawang sector of Arunachal Pradesh over the last few months.

The report noted that China has been constructing 628 such "well-off villages" along India's borders with occupied Tibet, which China now calls "Xizang" to make clear the once independent Tibet no longer exists, including along Ladakh and Arunachal Pradesh for over five years now.

While the exact nature of these villages is unclear, the dwellings are understood to be "dual-use infrastructure" – for both civil and military purposes – and seen as a Chinese assertion of its territorial claims along the LAC. They have thus remained a concern for the Indian military, the report said.

It said that in the last few months, the hitherto unoccupied double-storeyed, large and spacious buildings constructed as part of these villages, had begun to be occupied by Chinese nationals over the last few months, and it was not clear whether these were civilian or military personnel.

The report cited sources as also saying the Chinese were building infrastructure all along the LAC bordering the northeast, even as the LAC remained far off from most inhabited areas or areas of importance except for Tawang and the Siliguri Corridor.

"They (the Chinese) have built sufficient infrastructure along the LAC at Tawang, but they are not stopping at that. Even in other areas such as Siang valley of Arunachal Pradesh, we have been seeing rapid development of Chinese infrastructure," one official has said.

The official has added that the Chinese have consistently improved their existing infrastructure including improving their connectivity through passes, constructing roads and bridges and their model villages. China has also been seen constructing infrastructure, including border villages, in Bhutanese territory.

India has decided to respond to these developments, including with Vibrant Villages programmes under which it plans to develop 663 border villages into modern villages with all amenities in the first phase. Of them, at least 17 such villages along the borders with occupied Tibet in Ladakh, Himachal Pradesh, Uttarakhand, Sikkim and Arunachal Pradesh, have been selected for development as a pilot project under the programme, the report noted.

In Arunachal Pradesh, villages in the eastern part of the state and in the Tawang region have been identified such as Zemithang, Taksing, Chayang Tajo, Tuting and Kibithu. Besides, three major highways are at different stages of construction: the Trans-Arunachal Highway; the Frontier Highway; and the East-West Industrial Corridor Highway. Besides, there are plans to improve connectivity to Tawang with the construction of at least two alternate axes – in addition to the existing one connecting Guwahati and Tawang.

Roads are being built on all sides of the state's Dibang valley, which previously had roads just till a little ahead of Anini, the report noted.

"Work is underway to improve connectivity to the passes, establish laterals for inter-valley connectivity and on construction of helipads and advanced landing grounds at various locations in the state," another official has said.

China Increasing Digital Surveillance of Tibetans (Cyber)

10 February 2024, RTV

A new report by Tibetan activist groups and experts shows new evidence that the Chinese government is increasing digital surveillance of Tibetans through practices such as the mandatory installation of apps at police checkpoints or utilizing big data policing platforms supported by technologies from American tech firms.

Some analysts say these new findings provide a glimpse into Beijing's security apparatus in Tibet. "The Chinese government's apparatus in Tibet remains a black box in nature, but this report provides [the outside world] with a glimpse into how these systems work," Greg Walton, senior investigator at U.K.-based security consulting firm Secdev Group and one of the report's authors, told VOA by phone.

The report from Tibet Watch and a Tibet-focused research network called Turquoise Roof found that authorities have been asking residents in Tibet to install an app called "National Anti-Fraud Center" on their smartphones since 2021.

According to some testimonies from Tibetans, police would routinely ask residents to install the security application on their smartphones at checkpoints while local authorities have been teaching the public how to download and use the app. Some Tibetans have expressed concern that the app may be used to track their movements and potentially access data on their phones.

"It looks like a surveillance app that tracks not only our movement but also has built-in automatic voice recording and photo-sharing functionalities," an unnamed Tibetan man told Tibet Watch in 2023, according to the report.

Based on their analysis of the app, the report found that permissions that the app asked for from smartphone users could allow app operators to access sensitive user data or have control over certain device functionalities.

The report said the broad scope of permissions could let authorities conduct highly invasive surveillance, which is in line with measures that Chinese authorities typically use in regions like Tibet and Xinjiang to maintain public order.

"Our analysis suggests that data controlled by the Anti-Fraud app could connect into wider systems operated by the Criminal Investigation Bureau [and] the mandatory installation of the app at police checkpoints could serve as a platform for harvesting a dataset used for monitoring and controlling the population, particularly in suppressing dissent and cultural expression," the report wrote.

In addition to the forced installation of the anti-fraud app, the report also investigated a big data policing platform used by Tibetan authorities called "'Tibet Underworld Criminal Integrated Intelligence Application Platform."

Their analysis of government procurement notices suggests the platform, which is developed on top of technology originating from American tech company Oracle, combines data from several Public Security Bureau systems in Tibet and is an instrumental part of Chinese authorities' campaign to criminalize moderate cultural and religious expressions or language rights advocacy.

"The platform is presented as being designed to enhance the efficiency and effectiveness of law enforcement in Tibet," the report wrote, adding that the platform can only be accessed through the Public Security Bureau's internal network and authorities urge contractors to "replace the Oracle database" with a Chinese equivalent.

Walton from Secdev Group told VOA that the evidence suggests Chinese authorities' law enforcement measures in Tibet are "more invasive" than the measures used in other parts of China. "The big data systems use machine learning to track Tibetans' kinship networks or analyze their social networks to surface what the Chinese party-state defines as organized crimes," he said.

Since the big data policing platform is built on top of technologies from Oracle, Walton thinks foreign companies have clear responsibilities to ensure their products are not used to assist the Chinese government's effort to crack down on civilians or ethnic minorities.

"Human rights organizations have made clear the negative impacts that [big data policing system] driven by software sold by Oracle, [so] I think these companies should do human rights impact assessments to see what impact their software will have [when it's used for policing purposes in China,]" he said.

Oracle did not respond to VOA's requests for comment.

The report says that the Chinese authorities' aim of using big data policing platforms in both Tibet and Xinjiang is to achieve "control and suppression through intelligence-led policing. Some researchers say the Chinese government's crackdown on ethnic minorities is part of its overall effort to build up a "totalitarian social control state."

"The Chinese government is developing these more modern social control mechanisms that are supposed to make all aspects of society controllable," Maya Wang, Interim China Director at Human Rights Watch, told VOA by phone.

"Since the ethnic groups are at the short end of the Chinese state repression and social control when the surveillance systems are running in the background in Tibet or Xinjiang, they are also vetting people, and those who are considered politically unreliable are held in re-education camps or prisons," she added.

In response to the report's claim that Beijing is increasing digital surveillance on Tibetans, the Chinese embassy in the U.S. described the finding as "groundless accusations."

"China is a country under the rule of law, and the privacy of Chinese citizens is fully protected by law, regardless of their ethnicity," Liu Peng-yu, the spokesperson of the Chinese embassy in the United States, told VOA in a written response.

As Beijing increases its control over Tibet through digital surveillance, the report said these efforts are changing the way that Tibetans communicate and are creating a society-wide chilling effect across the region. "In many cases, this trend leads to a complete breakdown of contact," the report said.

Some Tibetan activists say the digital surveillance architecture that the Chinese government is trying to "perfect" in the region will create a deep psychological impact on local residents, forcing them to practice self-censorship.

"Tibetans will be even more careful with what they say or what they write on their phones," Tenzin

Choekyi, a senior researcher at Tibet Watch, told VOA by phone, adding that communication between Tibetans in China and the diaspora community will likely become more difficult to maintain.

China could use anti-fraud app to monitor Tibetans – report (Repeat)

07 February 2024, BBC

A Chinese app aimed at preventing fraud could be used to monitor Tibetans, according to a new report. The investigation by Tibet research groups found the app could monitor users' texts, internet browser histories and access personal data.

They also alleged some Tibetans were being forced to download the app.

Restrictions in Tibet have increased in recent years, say rights groups, tightening the screws on an already heavily controlled part of China.

Authorities have ramped up state surveillance and censorship in recent years, particularly during the pandemic.

Politically sensitive regions such as Tibet and Xinjiang have especially come under scrutiny. Beijing has long been wary of "secessionism" in these areas, but has stepped up crackdowns under leader Xi Jinping's rule which has emphasised nationalist unity.

The new report, by research network Turquoise Roof and rights group Tibet Watch, centres on the controversial National Anti-Fraud Centre app which was rolled out in 2021.

While the report did not present any evidence that the app was actively targeting Tibetans, it said the app "aligns with extensive surveillance practices" and could aid the Chinese government's efforts in controlling them.

The National Anti-Fraud Centre has been promoted as a scam prevention app which can detect potential fraudulent texts and calls, while allowing users to report scams and receive help quickly from authorities. China has been battling a wave of internet and phone scams in recent years.

Turquoise Roof conducted a forensic analysis of the app and says it found that some of its functions could be exploited for surveillance purposes.

The app can monitor incoming text messages, and access call logs and internet browser histories. It can also capture users' inputs such as passwords, and take photos which would allow it to gather visual data on users and surroundings.

Its face recognition verification feature could also be used for large-scale harvesting of data to enhance tracking and monitoring of Tibetans, the report added.

One way is by forcing Tibetans to download the app. One refugee told Tibet Watch last year he was stopped at a police checkpoint while on his way home from school, and told to install the app on his phone.

Complaints about mandatory downloads of the app arose soon after its launch, when it was installed on an estimated 200 million phones.

Some local government agencies made it compulsory for employees, while others had to download the app in order to enrol their children into schools or apply for identification cards, reported the Financial Times.

The newspaper also spoke to users who said they were contacted by the police after the app detected they had visited foreign financial news websites, including Bloomberg.

Separately, Turquoise Roof uncovered from government procurement notices that Chinese authorities were maintaining a large database of Tibetan individuals deemed as a threat to stability. The database used software from US company Oracle.

They said it was "reasonable to hypothesise" that any data collected by the anti-fraud app could be used in this database.

The report called for the Chinese government to put in place greater privacy protections and to investigate claims of coercion to download the app.

It also called for international companies and governments to ensure they do not provide resources for China's mass surveillance programmes.

Beijing has wielded a tight grip on Tibet since it sent in troops in 1950 to enforce its claims of sovereignty over the region.

Activists say China limits Tibetans' freedom of travel by controlling their passports, and also heavily monitors their communications with the outside world.

Tibet Watch has documented several cases of Tibetans detained for their messages on popular messaging platform WeChat, and instances where accounts and keywords deemed too politically sensitive were suspended or scrubbed.

Besides Tibet, China has famously employed mass surveillance techniques in Xinjiang to control the Uyghurs.

In 2019 Human Rights Watch found that authorities were using a surveillance platform and app to monitor the movements and data of people in Xinjiang.

That same year, an investigation by several Western newspapers found that border police were installing surveillance apps on the phones of visitors to the region.

Tibetan monk who criticized China's policies released from prison

07 February 2024, RFA

A Tibetan monk who criticized China's restrictive policies in Tibet and was convicted of "inciting separatism" has been released after four and half years in prison.

Rinchen Tsultrim was released from Mianyang prison in Sichuan province on Feb. 1 after completing his prison term, two sources told Radio Free Asia.

Tsultrim was a monk at the Nangzhig Monastery in Sichuan's Ngaba county when he was taken into custody in 2019. He was secretly detained for more than a year and sentenced in a closed trial in 2021.

Before his arrest, he had written favorably on the language rights of Tibetans and had praised the previous incarnation of the Panchen Lama, Tibetan Buddhism's second-most important spiritual leader behind the Dalai Lama.

He posted the writings on his website and had received at least three warnings from Chinese authorities before he was detained.

Separatism, or "working to split the country," is an accusation often leveled by Chinese authorities against Tibetans opposing the assimilation of Tibet's distinctive national and cultural identity into China's dominant Han culture.

Scores of monks, writers, educators, and musical performers have been arrested under the charge in recent years.

Particular targets of censors and police are images of the Dalai Lama shared on mobile phones and calls for the preservation of the Tibetan language, now under threat from government orders to establish Chinese as the main language of instruction in Tibetan schools.

While in prison, Tsultrim was refused permission to meet with his family, and contact was restricted to brief phone calls once a month, sources told RFA at the time.

There were also reports that Tsultrim was subjected to torture, forced labor and political indoctrination while in prison.

The two sources, who requested anonymity for safety reasons, refused to discuss the current condition of Tsultrim's health, citing fear of repercussions. They said that he remains under "constant surveillance."

China 'pressuring' eminent monks and admn in Tibet to denounce Dalai Lama

07 February 2024, The Tribune

With Losar (Tibetan new year) approaching, China is allegedly pressuring eminent monks and monastic administrators in the Tibetan Autonomous Region to denounce the Dalai Lama.

Tibetan government-in-exile sources said that the Chinese authorities in Tibetan-populated areas of Tibet visited at least 35 Buddhist monasteries and urged eminent monks to "deeply expose and denounce" the Dalai Lama and safeguard the "unity of the motherland". They visited the monasteries in Kardze

Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture from January 11 to 17, according to a statement issued by the United Front Work Department, which oversees the Chinese Government's domestic and external influence operations.

Tibetan New Year, known as Losar, falls on February 10, the same day as China's Lunar New Year, the biggest holiday of the year. A report of the Tibetan government-in-exile says that the Chinese authorities accuse the Tibetan spiritual leader, who lives in exile in Dharamsala, of trying to split the Tibet Autonomous Region and other Tibetan-populated areas in China's Sichuan and Qinghai provinces from the rest of the country.

However, the Dalai Lama does not advocate for independence but rather a "middle way" that accepts Tibet's status as part of China. He urges greater cultural and religious freedom, including strengthening language rights that are guaranteed for ethnic minorities under China's constitution.

The Tibetan government-in-exile says that Chinese officials visited well-known monasteries in the area, including Palyul, Yarchen Gar and Katog, which are associated with the Nyingma School of Vajrayana Buddhism. The Chinese officials urged Tibetan monks to promote the "five identifications" that President Xi Jinping had repeatedly said was required of all Chinese citizens and minority groups. These are identifying with the motherland, Chinese nation, Chinese culture, Chinese Communist Party and socialism with Chinese characteristics.

The Tibetan government-in-exile said that Tibet watchers criticised the move as disingenuous and an effort to put pressure on the Tibetan monastic community to toe the Chinese Communist Party's line. "The Chinese Government's practice of extending greetings and monetary gifts to Tibetan monks and nuns on important occasions and holidays are actually tools of deception," said Dawa Tsering, director of the Tibet Policy Institute, official think tank of the Central Tibetan Administration in Dharamsala. The Tibetan government-in-exile alleged that in their New Year message to Tibetan Buddhist leaders in Palyul county, the Chinese authorities also ordered head monks to carry out an "in-depth, systematic study and political education" of the "party's religious work theories and principles and policies".

China claims 'no idea' on monk it arrested for republishing books from exile Tibetan community

06 February 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Feb06'24) – Chinese authorities in the historically Tibetan region of Sichuan Province had arrested a Buddhist monk in Jun 2023 for having republished books from the exile Tibetan community and also for having contact with people outside the country, reported the Tibetan service of rfa.org Feb 5, citing belated information from two unnamed local Tibetan sources.

It was not clear what books were republished and what the nature of the contacts were.

The report said the whereabouts of the monk, named as Lobsang Thabkhey, 54, remained unknown. He was reported to have served as the librarian of Kirti Monastery in the province's Ngaba (Chinese: Aba) county when he republished and disseminated the books in question. The witnesses have spoken on condition of anonymity for safety reasons.

The Ngaba police station, on being contacted by Radio Free Asia, has claimed ignorance about the monk. This was despite the fact that he was stated to have been summoned several times by Chinese police before his eventual arrest.

China maintains especially tight control on information and channels of communication in the Tibetan areas in the name of fighting separatism, making it all the more difficult even to people within the country to get timely and proper information on developing situation.

Thabkhey is said to originally belong to the county's Meruma township.

January

Blanket ban reported imposed on new admissions at a monastery in Tibet

04 January 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan04'24) – China has forbidden the admission of new monks at a monastery in the prefecture-level City of Chamdo in Tibet Autonomous Region as it continues to tighten religious activities under its ongoing Sinicization campaign, reported the Tibetan service of rfa.org Jan 3.

The Gelug Tibetan Buddhist monastery of Khyungbum Lura in Markham County currently has more than 80 monks and local residents have expressed fears that the new restriction may render it extinct eventually.

China already has a decades-long policy that limits the number of resident-monks in each monastery across Tibet, with those to be enrolled being required to be above 18 years of age and certified by the local police and government religious authority as pro-Communist Party of China patriots.

This is the first time Chinese authorities have prohibited the enrolment of monks of all ages, though previously only minors, or those below the age of 18, were restricted from joining the monastic order in Tibet, the report said, citing a local source speaking on condition of anonymity for safety reasons.

The monastery was rebuilt by its former monks and local residents in early 1980's after it was destroyed by the invading Chinese People's Liberation Army at the turn of the second half of the last century.

The report cited two local sources as saying Chinese authorities had also installed a local administrator at the monastery to oversee its operations, replacing the senior monks who traditionally carried out that function. And they are said to have threatened to shut down the site if the monks failed to comply with the new rules and regulations on religious activities that are currently in operation.

"Without the regular intake of new monks, the move will lead to the eventual decline and closure of the monastery in the future, leaving local Tibetans with no nearby places of worship during important religious ceremonies and nobody to turn to carry out important prayers and rituals, particularly on the death of loved ones," the sources have been quoted as saying.

The rules and regulations include "Regulations on Religious Affairs", a set of rules on religious activities, personnel and sites updated in Nov 2017 and enforced by the National Religious Affairs Administration (NRAA).

There is also an "Administrative Measures for Religious Clergy", adopted by the State Administration of Religious Affairs (SARA) in Jan 2021, which requires religious personnel to support President Xi Jinping's plans for the "Sinicization of religion," for "adaptation of religions to China's socialist society", and to work in accordance with the country's national interest and ideology.

The NRAA, formerly the SARA, is an external name used by the United Front Work Department (UFWD) of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China. It was formerly an executive agency directly under the State Council of the People's Republic of China which oversaw religious affairs in the country. SARA was merged into the UFWD in 2018. The names of the former agency were retained by the UFWD as external names under the system called "one institution with two names"

TIBET DIGEST 2024

FOUNDATION FOR
Non-violent
Alternatives
To inform and shape policy on Tibet and the region

TIBET'S ECOLOGY & RIVER WATERS

www.fnvaworld.org
143, 4th Floor, Uday Park, New Delhi, 49
office@fnvaworld.org

Disclaimer: FNVA does not endorse "China's Tibet", "Tibet Autonomous Region of China", "Xizang" or any such phrase that denotes Tibet has been/is a part of China. Articles that contain such phraseology are news items from the Chinese state media and must not be confused as endorsement by FNVA

Nagchu champions glacier protection on plateau

23 December 2024, People's Daily Online

Xu Qiangqiang, an assistant researcher at the China Academy of Sciences' Northwest Institute of Eco-Environment and Resources, measures the size of the Dongkemadi Glacier using a laser radar in Nagchu, Xizang autonomous region, in October. (Palden Nyima/China Daily)

TIBET'S ECOLOGY & RIVER WATERS

Nagchu city, in the northern part of the Xizang autonomous region, is the origin of many major rivers in Asia, including the Yangtze, the Nujiang and the Lancang rivers, making it a core area for building a water ecological security barrier in Xizang and a strategic guarantee base for water resources in China.

With joint efforts made by the government and the public in Nagchu, Xizang's largest and the country's second-largest prefecture-level area, the city reflects a beautiful picture of harmonious coexistence between humans and nature.

The Yangtze River's main source is the Jangchu Diruk Glacier in the Amdo section of the Three-River-Source National Park. To protect the ecological environment of the river source area, a regular working mechanism has been established by the local government and residents. Currently, the construction work in the Northern Tanggula Mountains area of the park, where the glacier is located, is 90 percent complete.

Nagchu has effectively shouldered the political responsibility for the ecological protection of the river park. It has promoted the construction of the Northern Tanggula Mountain area, implemented ecological protection and restoration in the source areas of rivers, and comprehensively established protective measures for river sources, among many other duties.

Hu Chunyu, deputy head of the Nagchu water conservancy bureau, said the primary measures Nagchu has taken to protect the river are the implementation of a strict water management system, controlling total water usage, and ensuring efficiency.

Hu said the city has also cracked down on activities that encroach on river and lake areas, including sand mining, garbage dumping, and unauthorized construction, and has widely promoted ecological protection through educational campaigns to raise public awareness.

"Through governance, illegal activities that harm water ecology have been effectively curbed, leading to a significant improvement in the water quality of rivers and lakes," said Hu, adding the city has laid a good foundation for creating an ecological civilization, but it still faces some difficulties and shortcomings.

Ecological civilization is a concept promoted by China's central leadership for balanced and sustainable development that features harmonious coexistence between humanity and nature.

"The water quality management system in Nagchu is not yet perfect. Soil erosion is severe, and effective wetland protection and restoration measures are lacking," Hu said.

"This year, the measures we have taken mainly focus on strengthening supervision and law enforcement, establishing a sound water environment monitoring system and intensifying the overall monitoring and evaluation of the water environment," he added.

According to the Xizang Department of Natural Resources, the glacier resources in Nagchu cover approximately 6,800 square kilometers, almost 2 percent of its administrative area.

The general volume of water in the glaciers stands at about 8.8 billion cubic meters.

Painstaking efforts

As central and regional authorities attach increasingly greater importance to the glaciers, Nagchu may realize a more improved ecological aquatic environment.

Over the past few decades, Chinese researchers have been strictly monitoring the changes in the glaciers on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, and they work together with the local government to resolve environmental issues such as glacier melting.

Since its establishment in 2005, researchers at the Tanggula Mountain Cryosphere and Environment Observation and Research Station of the Xizang Autonomous Region, part of the China Academy of Sciences' Northwest Institute of Eco-Environment and Resources, have been working hard in the icy environment, walking on glaciers and in snowfields at an altitude of over 5,500 meters.

They conduct long-term observations and make continuous recordings of the geological, hydrological, meteorological, and permafrost conditions in the source area of the Yangtze.

Xu Qiangqiang, an assistant researcher at the institute, said his team has regularly conducted comprehensive assessments and health checkups of the glaciers in the area using advanced observation and mapping techniques in Nagchu over the past few years.

Xu said Nagchu is implementing an integrated protection strategy, adhering to the systematic management of mountains, waters, forests, fields, lakes, grasslands, sands, and ice.

"The approach of prioritizing natural restoration and combining natural recovery with artificial restoration in the system management has proved to be very effective. They are upholding ecological protection redlines, including large ice caps and small-scale glacier clusters, and designating them within the ecological protection red line," he said.

Xu also said for important snowcapped glaciers, they are implementing protection measures to curb human disturbances.

"Additionally, Nagchu is restricting tourism and mountaineering activities in certain glacier areas such as the Ganglung Changmar Glacier," he added.

"Aside from necessary scientific research and resource surveys, all tourism activities are prohibited, and checkpoints have been set up on roads leading to the glaciers to advise tourists to turn back."

According to Xu, there are about 200,000 glaciers worldwide, with the largest located on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, which has roughly 100,000 glaciers.

Knowledge to share

"The Qinghai-Tibet Plateau is known as the water tower of Asia, because the melting ice feeds the major rivers in South Asia and Southeast Asia. If these glaciers continue to shrink, the upstream regions will face water shortages," said Xu, adding this will have a significant impact on downstream areas, including water for hydroelectric power stations, residential use, and farm irrigation.

Xu noted that the methods used by the Chinese government to protect the nation's waters are worth sharing with the rest of the world, and he outlined four specific points.

First, China is a global leader in emissions reductions and green energy, and is committed to achieving carbon neutrality. Second, scientists and local agencies are collaborating to artificially increase snowfall to replenish glaciers and reduce losses. Third, China has been restoring grasslands for many years to improve the surrounding ecological environment of glaciers because grasslands reduce the impact of light-absorbing impurities as glaciers melt. Finally, the country is carefully managing the development of glacier tourism, recognizing the importance of water protection and implementing restrictions as needed.

In a move to protect glaciers in Xizang, the region's legislature adopted a law dedicated to the effort in late July.

The law, which took effect on Oct 1, provides specific guidelines for governments and relevant departments in glacier areas. It introduced a responsibility system and performance evaluation mechanism for glacier protection goals, and established punitive measures for violations.

"The regulation will effectively protect glacier resources, ensure the ecological safety of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, and contribute to the preservation of the plateau's flora, fauna, and landscapes," said Zhao Guiying, deputy director of the Legislative Affairs Commission of the Standing Committee of the People's Congress of Xizang.

Tibet Adopts Clean Energy For Centralised Heating

13 December 2024, The Rising Nepal, Zhan Xun

Winter has arrived, and Tibet, China, has entered its coldest season of the year. In the past, due to Tibet's high altitude and cold weather, coal burning was commonly used to provide centralised heating for buildings. However, with advancements in technology, Tibet's clean energy power generation now accounts for 99 per cent of its total energy production, reducing the annual consumption of standard coal by approximately 4.73 million tons. This shift has significantly contributed to reducing carbon emissions. Tibet has now achieved nearly 100 per cent clean electricity supply, making it the province with the highest proportion of clean energy power generation in China.

This year, Tibet launched seven pilot projects for centralised heating using clean energy under a concessionary model. The Chinese government has invested $521 million to construct and upgrade centralised heating facilities in Tibet, covering a total area of 6.22 million square meters. Once completed, these facilities will provide eco-friendly and cost-effective heating for 200,000 Tibetans. Moreover, pilot programmes for centralised heating have been initiated in areas over 5,000 meters above sea level. With further investments and technological advancements, more Tibetans are expected to benefit from convenient, comfortable, and affordable heating solutions.

The Chinese government has introduced a concessionary model in Tibet to support this initiative. This approach involves private capital in the construction of urban centralised heating systems based on clean energy. To ensure the scalability and efficiency of this initiative, the Tibet Autonomous Region government selected seven counties and districts, including Lhasa, Nyingchi, Nagqu, and Ngari, as pilot locations. The clean energy centralised heating system adopts a "heating + domestic hot water" model, addressing both household heating and hot water needs. In Coqên County, Ngari Prefecture, the pilot program is already in full swing, and the remaining six counties and districts are expected to implement the system by January 2025, around the Chinese Lunar New Year.

A notable highlight is the implementation of centralised heating in regions above 5,000 meters, where the climate is especially harsh. For example, Shuanghu County and Nyima County in Nagqu Prefecture are such extreme high-altitude areas, where winter temperatures can drop as low as -40°C, and freezing conditions persist for up to nine months a year. Pumajiangtang Township, the highest-altitude township in China, located in Langkazi County of Shannan City and bordering Bhutan, has also begun a centralised heating pilot project this year. Covering an area of 13,914.38 square meters, the project is set to be completed by the end of this month. Heating equipment has already been installed for 723 households in 14 villages, providing residents with a warm and comfortable living environment. Meanwhile, 830 households in 11 other villages will benefit from an advanced heating system based on "solar photovoltaic + energy storage + heat pump air heaters."

These social developments and advancements in Tibet are underpinned by the rapid growth of clean energy, driven by the upgrading of the Tibetan power grid in recent years. As of September 2024, the Chinese government has invested nearly $12.2 billion in upgrading Tibet's power grid. Tibet's total installed clean electricity capacity has reached 7.176 million kilowatts, nearly doubling in the past 12 years. A new comprehensive energy system has been established, dominated by hydropower and complemented by geothermal, wind, and solar energy.

Currently, Tibet's electricity supply serves over 3.5 million people, with power supply reliability reaching 99.48 per cent. Voltage compliance rates in rural areas stand at 97.50 per cent, and rural power supply reliability has reached 99.52 per cent. Even during the busiest harvest periods, electricity supply in rural areas is guaranteed.

Furthermore, after meeting its own electricity demand, Tibet has gradually established channels for transmitting surplus power during the abundant water season. Tibet not only possesses the world's most advanced ultra-high-altitude, ultra-high-voltage DC transmission technology but also excels in large-scale renewable energy grid integration, thanks to the collective efforts of Chinese engineers and scientists. Feng Jianguo, Chief Engineer of the Housing and Urban-Rural Development Department of the Tibet Autonomous Region, stated that they would summarise experiences from the pilot projects to develop replicable and scalable project implementation models. Coupled with supportive policies in subsidies, taxes, pricing, land use, and financing, Tibet's centralised heating system is expected to achieve full coverage in the near future.

Himalayas: Arunachal government deploys central forces to counter dam protestors in Siang Valley

10 December 2024, Down to Earth, Anupam Chakravartty

The Siang, known as the Yarlung Tsangpo in Tibet, near Yingkiang town in Upper Siang district, Arunachal Pradesh. Photo: Anupam Chakravartty

The Arunachal Pradesh government has deployed a team of Central Armed Police Force (CAPF) close to the proposed site of the 12.5 GW Siang Upper Multipurpose Project (SUMP), touted to be India's largest dam, according to an official document. The move, to conduct a survey for a pre-feasibility report (PFR) on SUMP, has angered locals opposed to the dam.

Several women from villages close to the proposed site on the Siang river, the transboundary main channel of the Brahmaputra, continue to guard the site, opposing the dam and any survey over the river. According to a letter issued to the Circle Officer, Redo-Perging subdivision on December 6 by Deputy Commissioner (DC) of Siang district, PN Thungon, a team of CAPF is expected to be stationed in Riew village, in the purview of conduct of a PFR regarding the SUMP.

"Therefore, you are requested to initiate necessary action for repair and maintenance of Government Primary School, on self-help basis," the DC stated in the letter. A source in Boleng confirmed the development but added that the CAPF is yet to be deployed.

Residents from Pareng and several other villages have been guarding a portion of the Siang, shouting slogans of 'No Survey, No Dam'.

Bhanu Tatak, legal advisor of the Siang Indigenous Farmers' Forum (SIFF), told Down To Earth that the deployment of the CAPF goes against a Gauhati High Court order that cancelled proposed dams on the Siang.

"The people of the Siang valley have been against dams on the river for over four decades. Our people have been peacefully protesting against the surveys by any government agency or a dam developer. People do have the right to protest against this decision in order to protect their homes and hearths," Tatak, whose organisation represents the interests of farmers from Arunachal's Adi community, added.

In 2022, the Gauhati High Court cancelled all 44 dams proposed on the Siang river. The petition had alleged that Arunachal Pradesh government took upfront payments by means of Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) and Memorandum of Agreement (MoA) for over 230 dams across the Himalayan state and a Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) enquiry against the MoA. In July 2022, even the Arunachal Government told the high court that all 44 dams had been cancelled by the state.

In 2017, however, central thinktank NITI Aayog floated a new plan for a 1 GW dam on the Siang, which went through several changes. Recently, Arunachal Pradesh Chief Minister, Pema Khandu highlighted that a projected power generation capacity surpassing 13,500 megawatts with 26 per cent equity share, will receive 12 per cent free power. "The damming of the Siang river, known as Yarlung Tsangpo in its upper reaches by our neighbouring country [China] poses significant threats, including flash floods and water scarcity. These risks could have devastating consequences for downstream areas in the Siang region and beyond," he later stated in a social media post.

Although Khandu has maintained that there is unanimous support for the dam among the people in the Siang valley, SIFF and several students' organisations have accused the Arunachal government as well as the dam developers for not conducting any consultation.

Tibetan area in Sichuan hit by second forest fire in last 20 days

09 December 2024, Tibetan Review

Forest fire is raging in a historically Tibetan area of Sichuan province again, making it the second such reported incident in the last 20 days and after a catastrophic one which continued for days in the middle of March last year, all at different places.

The latest fire started at around 3:20 pm Dec 9 in Chengxiang Village of Hekou (Tibetan: Chukha)

Township, located in Yajiang (Nyagchu) County of the Garze (Kardze) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, reported China's official Xinhuanews agency Dec 9, citing the headquarters of forest and grassland fire prevention and control of Yajiang.

The report said no casualties had been reported. Rescuers were stated to have rushed to the site for rescue operations.

Earlier, Xinhua reported Nov 18 that a fire broke out at around 6 pm Nov 17 in Angui Village, located in Yajiang County.

The report said the fire site had an average slope of 60 degrees and an altitude of 3,500 metres and that rescue and containment operations were ongoing.

Last year, a forest fire erupted in Petse (Baizi) Village in the same county in March and rapidly spread to other areas due to sudden increases in wind speed. While no casualties or damage to infrastructure were reported, a Xinhua report said Mar 17 that in the nearby Jiaonibao Village, 21 houses were burned.

A total of 5,908 villagers belonging to 1,360 families in two Towns and one Township were reported to have been evacuated as a safety measure.

The disaster was stated to have struck a severe blow on the livelihood of the local Tibetan people: destruction of the forests' prized matsutake mushrooms.

November

Global warming accelerates upward expansion of the alpine tree line in the Himalayas: study

19 November 2024, Global Times, Leng Shumei

A latest study by researchers from Institute of Tibetan Plateau Research (ITP), Chinese Academy of Sciences (CAS), indicates that, against the backdrop of warming climate over the last 200 years, Abies spectabilis (Himalayan fir) in the mixed forests of Nepal's Sagarmatha National Park and Annapurna Conservation Area is expanding to higher altitudes at a faster rate compared to Betula utilis (Himalayan birch) in the same area. The findings point to accelerating successional dynamics with late-successional species rapidly outcompeting pioneer species, offering insight into future forest succession and its influences on ecosystem services.

The study was conducted by a team led by researcher Liang Eryuan from the State Key Laboratory of Tibetan Plateau Earth System, Environment and Resources, ITP, CAS. It was published online in Nature Plants on Monday, the Global Times learned from the ITP.

Understanding how climate change influences succession is fundamental to predicting future forest composition. Global warming is expected to accelerate species succession at their cold thermal ranges, such as alpine tree lines. In the study, the team examined how interactions and successional strategies of the early-successional birch and the late-successional fir affected tree line dynamics by combining plot data with an individual-based tree line model at tree lines in the central Himalayas, read the study.

The team found that firs showed increasing recruitment and a higher upslope shift rate ( $1.1 \pm 0.2$  meter per decade) compared with birch ( $0.6 \pm 0.3$  meter per decade) over the last 200 years. Spatial analyses indicate strong interspecies competition when trees were young. Model outputs from various climatic scenarios indicate that firs will probably accelerate their upslope movement with global warming, while birch recruitment will decline drastically, forming stable or even retreating tree lines, according to the study.

Shalik Ram Sigdel, the first author of the study and associate researcher at the ITP, told the Global Times that the alpine tree line, the uppermost limit of continuous distribution of upright trees, is strongly constrained by environmental factors such as low temperatures, making it highly sensitive to global warming. It serves as an ecological transition zone for studying species succession.

Vegetation succession refers to the recovery process of plant communities after disturbances over a long-time scale or the formation and development process on bare ground. Succession theory is one of the core research topics in vegetation ecology, forming the basis for predicting vegetation dynamics under different future climate scenarios and guiding the restoration of degraded ecosystems, according to Sigdel.

Fossil records confirm that birch has been distributed in the Himalayan region for 2.5 million to 5 million years. Dendrochronological analysis indicates that in high-altitude forests composed of a single tree species, the maximum age of birch can exceed 450 years. As a pioneer species following glacial retreat, the succession process of birch should belong to the long-term succession type. However, it remains unclear whether climate warming will accelerate this succession process.

Since 2010, the research team has discovered mixed forests where birch and firs coexist at the tree line in Nepal's Sagarmatha National Park and Annapurna Conservation Area, providing a natural experimental platform for studying forest community succession under warming conditions.

"Birch is sensitive to moisture, and the water stress caused by warming limits its growth and regeneration. In contrast, firs are sensitive to temperature, and warming within a certain threshold range is beneficial for their growth and regeneration. Therefore, against the backdrop of climate warming, firs demonstrate greater competitiveness than birch," said Liang Eryuan, the corresponding author of the study.

Liang emphasized that climate change is significantly accelerating the species succession process at the alpine tree line in the Himalayas.

Through tree line model simulations, the research team further found that with ongoing warming, the ascent of firs will continue to accelerate, while the decline in birch regeneration will lead to a decrease in population density, further restricting the tree line ascent. In high-emission scenarios, there may even be a retreat of the birch tree line, indicating that under warming conditions, firs may rapidly replace birch as the pioneer species, accelerating the succession process. This finding has important implications for the prediction of future forest composition, structure, and ecosystem functions.

China's dam projects in Tibet pose environmental and social risks, new report reveals

17 November 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundop

The report, titled "The Risks of China's Dangerous Dam-Building in Tibet: The Impacts of China's Move Upstream on the Machu/Yellow River", details extensive damage already caused by infrastructure projects on the Machu (Yellow River) and the Yarlung Tsangpo. It highlights potential severe consequences for local communities and downstream nations.

A joint report by Tibet Watch and Turquoise Roof has revealed concerning details about China's large-scale hydropower projects in Tibet, ignoring warnings from its own scientists about severe seismic and environmental risks.

One significant issue noted is construction on permafrost zones of the Tibetan Plateau, a region second only to the Arctic in permafrost coverage. The thawing permafrost, worsened by heavy infrastructure, releases methane—a potent greenhouse gas—into the atmosphere, with no mitigation policies from China in place.

The report provides new evidence of the displacement of entire Tibetan villages and the destruction of ancient monasteries to make way for dam projects. One notable example is the Yangkhil (Yangqu) hydropower station, where local Tibetans were forced to dismantle their own homes. An important monastery, previously designated as a protected heritage site, was removed from the list by Chinese authorities before being demolished. These actions have led to widespread social upheaval, disrupting the cultural and spiritual lives of Tibetan communities.

China has started large-scale fish farming in reservoirs created by the dams. Non-native rainbow trout, marketed as salmon, are bred in huge numbers for Chinese consumers. This practice, already criticized in China, threatens local ecosystems and risks the spread of invasive species, as noted by Chinese scientists.

Before demolition began, an aerial view of Kiosk Monastery, a 19th-century Buddhist monastery located at a bend of Machu river in the south region of the Tibetan plateau. Photo obtained in April 2020, from Tibet Watch

The report also disputes China's claims of a green energy transition, showing that many solar and hydropower projects are tied to coal-fired power plants. This reliance on coal undermines the narrative of a shift towards renewable energy, revealing a slower transition than China claims.

China's dam projects in Tibet also affect downstream nations. The report highlights risks for millions depending on the Yangtze, Mekong, and Yellow Rivers across Southeast Asia. Farmers and fisherfolk in Cambodia, Vietnam, Laos, and Thailand could face disruptions due to changes in water flow and less sediment, which is crucial for agriculture. The report calls for international intervention, urging action to protect both Tibetan communities and millions reliant on these crucial river systems.

Regulations provide extra protection for glaciers

11 November 2024, China Daily, Palden Nyima and Daqiong

The glaciers of the Xizang autonomous region will receive better legal protection with the implementation of regulations that came into effect on Oct 1.

This legislation marks a crucial step toward preserving the rich glacier resources of Xizang, one of China's most glacier-abundant regions.

The Xizang Development and Reform Commission highlighted the necessity of these regulations, adding that the protection of glaciers is not only vital for Xizang but also holds significance for the ecological security of the entire Qinghai-Tibet Plateau and the nation.

According to Sodron, director of XDRC's department of resource conservation and environmental protection, existing policies and regulations concerning glacier protection were deemed inadequate, lacking effective oversight and management mechanisms. "The formulation of the Xizang Autonomous Region Glacier Protection Regulations is a targeted response to address these shortcomings and provides clear and comprehensive guidelines for glacier protection efforts in Xizang," she said.

The regulations delineate specific responsibilities for departments, protection planning strategies, rights confirmation through investigation, classification of management frameworks, safeguard measures, ecological environment protection protocols, disaster response strategies and monitoring mechanisms.

Key provisions stipulate that governments at or above county level must integrate glacier protection initiatives into economic and social development plans, while township authorities are mandated to oversee glacier protection within their jurisdictions.

The regulations categorize glaciers into those within natural reserves, national parks, nature reserves, ecological protection red lines and areas outside designated regions. Specific directives outline tailored protection measures.

The regulations impose penalties on construction units or permit holders engaging in activities such as infrastructure development or resource extraction in glacier-adjacent areas without proper mitigation measures. Violators face fines ranging from 20,000 yuan ($2,800) to 100,000 yuan, underscoring the stringent enforcement embedded mechanisms within the legislation.

In recent months, research from scientific institutions such as the Chinese Academy of Sciences' Northwest Institute of Eco-Environment and Resources and the Institute of Tibetan Plateau Research has underscored the alarming rate of glacier retreat, attributing it to the escalating impacts of global climate change. These revelations further emphasize the urgency of robust glacier protection measures.

He Xiaobo, head of the Tangula Mountains Cryosphere and Environment Observation and Research Station of Xizang, said that the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, known as the "Roof of the World", plays an irreplaceable role in ecological security.

"Glaciers, as crucial components of the plateau's ecosystem, serve not only as the source of many major rivers in Asia but also play a vital role in regulating regional climate and maintaining biodiversity," he said.

Based on the Second Chinese Glacier Inventory, China has 48,571 glaciers, with approximately 82 percent in a state of retreat, He said, adding that this poses challenges to water resource management and the health of ecosystems in the country. There are more than 21,800 glaciers in Xizang, representing 45 percent of glaciers distributed in China. They cover nearly 23,800 square kilometers, He added.

China speaks of greater protection for Tibet's glaciers, citing their alarming retreat

04 November 2024, Tibetan Review

Citing research from scientific institutions that underscored alarming rate of glacier retreat, China said Nov 4 that glaciers of Tibet autonomous region (TAR) will receive better legal protection with the implementation of regulations that came into effect on Oct 1, reported the official chinadaily.com.cn Nov 4. But if China's record on acting or, rather, not-acting on Tibetan public complaints about environmentally devastating – even illegal – resource extraction works being carried out in their local areas is anything to go by, this may be yet another lip service on an otherwise grave issue.

The ground reality is that such kinds of laws are just not seen being implemented in Tibetan areas where it has been the victims who suffered crackdown and punishment for complaining or protesting against the violations of such laws.

Just recently, a 29-year-old Tibetan youth named Tsongon Tsering in Ngaba (or Ngawa, Chinese: Aba) county of Sichuan Province was detained and ousted from the country's social media last month after he filed official complaints and made a social media expose of an environmentally devastating, illegal sand-mining being carried out by an internationally prominent Chinese building company in his Tsaruma village of Khyungchu (Hongyuan) County.

The authorities admitted the sand-mining work was both illegal and environmentally destructive. But the company was let off with only a token fine on the basis of an official report filled with falsehood, according to the online complainant.

The Tsaruma River, on whose bed the devastating sand-mining work was taking place, is linked to the Drichu (Yangtze) and Machu (Yellow) River systems, two of China's most important.

The chinadaily.com.cn report said the necessity of these regulations was highlighted by the Tibet Development and Reform Commission (TDRC), adding that the protection of glaciers is not only vital for the TAR but also held significance for the ecological security of the entire Tibetan Plateau and the People's Republic of China (PRC).

The report cited Sodron, director of TDRC's department of resource conservation and environmental protection, as saying existing policies and regulations concerning glacier protection were deemed inadequate, lacking effective oversight and management mechanisms.

"The formulation of the Xizang Autonomous Region Glacier Protection Regulations is a targeted response to address these shortcomings and provides clear and comprehensive guidelines for glacier protection efforts in Xizang," she has said, using the Sinicized name for TAR.

The report said the regulations imposed penalties on construction units or permit holders engaging in activities such as infrastructure development or resource extraction in glacier-adjacent areas without proper mitigation measures. Violators face fines ranging from 20,000 yuan ($2,800) to 100,000 yuan, underscoring the stringent enforcement mechanisms embedded within the legislation.

As regards the urgency for the more stringent regulations, the report said that in recent months, research from scientific institutions such as the Chinese Academy of Sciences' Northwest Institute of Eco-Environment and Resources and the Institute of Tibetan Plateau Research had underscored the alarming rate of glacier retreat, attributing it to the escalating impacts of global climate change. These revelations further emphasize the urgency of robust glacier protection measures, the report said.

He Xiaobo, head of the Tangula Mountains Cryosphere and Environment Observation and Research Station of TAR, has said the Tibetan Plateau, known as the "Roof of the World", plays an irreplaceable role in ecological security.

"Glaciers, as crucial components of the plateau's ecosystem, serve not only as the source of many major rivers in Asia but also play a vital role in regulating regional climate and maintaining biodiversity," he has said.

Based on China's Second Chinese Glacier Inventory, the PRC has 48,571 glaciers, with approximately 82% in a state of retreat, adding that this poses challenges to water resource management and the health of ecosystems in the country.

There are more than 21,800 glaciers in TAR, representing 45% of glaciers distributed in the PRC; they cover nearly 23,800 square kilometres, He has added.

October

Lead pollution in a remote Tibetan glacier reveals far-reaching human activities

24 October 2024, U.S. National Science Foundation

The Tibetan Plateau's glaciers are among the world's most remote and untouched places. Researchers say these ice fields provide water for millions of people and play a vital environmental role.

Now, geoscientists funded by the U.S. National Science Foundation have tracked pollution in the form of lead in the glaciers. The findings are reported in the journal Nature Communications Earth and Environment.

The Tibetan Plateau is often called the "Roof of the World." It's the highest and largest plateau on Earth. In a study of the Guliya Ice Cap there, Franco Marcantonio of Texas A&M University and his colleagues discovered that significant lead pollution of the ice cap began in 1974, with the highest levels between 2000 and 2007.

The team measured lead isotopes in samples dating to 36,000 years ago. The ice serves as a historical record, giving scientists a way of comparing levels of modern lead contamination to those of pre-industrial times.

"Even though Pb [lead] has been used by ancient civilizations for millennia, it was not until the Industrial Revolution and later, when leaded gasoline was introduced ... in the 1920s, that the emission of Pb from human activities skyrocketed," state the scientists in their paper. "By the 1980s, emissions surpassed their natural and pre-industrial contribution by about two orders of magnitude."

The Tibetan Plateau "is considered to be a pristine place due to the very low industrial activity in the region," write the researchers. Nonetheless, lead found its way there, and its history of human use was captured in the Guliya Ice Cap.

"This study advances our understanding of the breadth and timing of environmental impacts from human activities," says Margaret Fraiser, a program director in the NSF Division of Earth Sciences.

Researchers Catch Humans Living on the Tibetan Plateau Evolving in Real Time

23 October 2024, Extreme Tech, Adrianna Nine

Tibetan women who have most successfully delivered children appear to have cardiovascular traits that help their bodies utilize the plateau's scarce oxygen. Most discussions about evolution tend to focus on the past. But humans, like any other extant species, are engaged by default in a game of natural selection, in which the traits that help us thrive also help us produce offspring with those traits. In studying communities living on the Tibetan Plateau, researchers from the United States and Nepal have caught that process happening in real time.

Averaging 16,000 feet above sea level, Asia's 970,000-square-mile Tibetan Plateau is the definition of high elevation. Extreme altitudes like this can make it tough to breathe, thanks to the lower atmospheric pressure, thinner air, and weak oxygen levels. Every breath delivers less oxygen to the blood than one would find at sea level, making life on the Tibetan Plateau physiologically difficult.

But it appears that Tibetan communities are evolving to meet the challenge. In a paper for the journal Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, researchers note that native ethnic Tibetan women who have most successfully delivered children also possess unique cardiovascular traits that help their bodies take advantage of the plateau's scarce oxygen. The women's astonishing heart strength was accompanied by high saturations of oxygen in hemoglobin, or the red blood cell protein responsible for carrying oxygen from the lungs to other parts of the body.

The researchers spent time at the Tibetan Plateau—their "natural laboratory," as they call it—speaking with 417 women aged 46 to 86. All of these women lived at a minimum of 3,500 meters (11,483 feet) and consented to interviews and biological data-sharing related to their pregnancies, births, genetics, and personal health. Together, these 417 women reported 2,193 pregnancies, which resulted in 2,076 livebirths. Those who had higher rates of livebirths (compared with fewer or lost pregnancies) had higher concentrations of oxygen within the bloodstream, as well as higher rates of oxygen transport to and from bodily tissues.

Importantly, the women who'd experienced more successful births did not possess blood that was more viscous (thicker) than those with lower livebirth rates. As blood viscosity increases, so does strain on the heart, implying that the body is struggling to keep up with the region's low-oxygen conditions. Instead, the women's blood was of normal viscosity, supporting the notion that Tibetan populations are evolving to thrive in their high-altitude environment.

"This is a case of ongoing natural selection," Cynthia Beall, the study's corresponding author and a professor emerita at Case Western Reserve University, said. "Tibetan women have evolved in a way that balances the body's oxygen needs without overworking the heart."

Small areas of Tibetan Plateau may have outsize impact on East Asia's spring rains

16 October 2024, SCMP, Zhang Tong

Up to a quarter of the heaviest rainfall may be the result of gravity waves created in small pockets of mountainous terrain

Small areas of the Tibetan Plateau may have an outsize influence on East Asia's climate by increasing spring rainfall by up to a quarter, researchers say.

The Tibetan Plateau, often referred to as the "Water Tower of Asia", is crucial to the hydrological cycle, feeding major Asian rivers such as the Yangtze, Yellow River, Indus, and Ganges.

Researchers have previously drawn a link between atmospheric conditions above the plateau and persistent springtime rainfall in East Asia, which occurs between March and May.

However, it is often hard to produce accurate forecasts and even advanced models systematically underestimate precipitation.

But a research team led by Professor Xu Xiangde, a member of the Chinese Academy of Engineering, has concluded that current climate models overlook the impact of small-scale mountain ranges covering an area ranging from a few to tens of kilometres.

These mountains are like wrinkles on the plateau but they play an important role in interacting with near-ground airflow and generating the gravity wave that is produced when airflow passes over mountainous terrain and creates ripples that trigger a chain reaction.

Thanks to advanced prediction tools, they are now known to have a number of effects on the climate around the plateau, but their influence on spring rains in East Asia is still poorly understood.

Beyond blocking and diversion, the southwesterly flow is influenced by a gravity wave generated by small areas of the plateau.

"Our research indicates that these gravity waves lead to an uplift in circulation on the southern side of the plateau," Xu said.

"This uplift reduces lower atmospheric pressure and intensifies the southwesterly monsoon, thereby increasing the moisture transport from the Indian Ocean and the Bay of Bengal to downstream East Asia.

"The southwesterly monsoon acts like a high-speed highway, where an increase in vehicle speed (airflow) means more goods (moisture) are transported in the same amount of time."

Using the state-of-the-art Weather Research and Forecasting Model with data from 2000 to 2017, the team conducted simulations that found rainfall would drop by around a quarter without the influence of gravity waves.

This study was published in the peer-reviewed journal Science China Earth Sciences last October, marking the first international revelation of this effect, which is vital for climate modelling and forecasting the spring rains that can cause heavy flooding.

According to the paper, gravity waves are most pronounced in winter and early spring, while in summer the transport of moisture is primarily influenced by the plateau's thermal properties.

Xu Xin said the research team is still improving their research on gravity waves. "As the Tibetan Plateau warms at more than twice the rate of other regions at the same latitude, this warming weakens wind speeds and hinders long-term climate observations of gravity waves," he said.

"Moreover, the difficulty of parameterising gravity waves in models persists as researchers continue to develop theories and explore advanced technologies for higher resolution characterisations of the plateau's small-scale terrain."

Warmer winters mean world's highest places may store less carbon

14 October 2024, New Scientist, James Dinneen

At high altitudes, global warming is having its strongest effect on winter temperatures – and that might mean soils there store less carbon than we expected

Climate change is raising winter temperatures faster than those of summer, especially in high-altitude areas. This "asymmetric" warming could spell trouble for the vast amount of carbon stored in soils there by altering microbial activity more than expected.

The planet's soils store more carbon than any ecosystem other than the oceans, and could store much more if better managed. But soil carbon is threatened by climate change. Researchers expect warmer temperatures will boost the amount of soil carbon lost to the atmosphere as greenhouse gases, largely due to changes in the behaviour of soil microbes. However, the scale of this warming feedback remains uncertain.

Ning Ling at Lanzhou University in China and his colleagues heated soils in an experimental grassland on the Tibetan plateau to test how different patterns of warming might change microbial activity. Some of the soils were kept at ambient temperatures, while others were exposed to a "symmetric" warming of 2°C throughout the year. A third group was exposed to warming of 2.5 to 2.8°C during winter and 0.5 to 0.8°C during the rest of the year, a more realistic simulation of actual warming patterns.

After a decade of this treatment between 2011 and 2020, the researchers tested microbial activity of samples from the different soils. They focused on two measures in particular: growth rate and an indicator of how the organisms are using carbon, known as carbon use efficiency. This has been shown to be a major determinant of the amount of organic carbon stored in soils.

"When a microbe eats carbon, it can do one of two things with it: it can break it down for energy and breathe that carbon as CO<sub>2</sub>, or it can use it to make new body structures," says Daniel Rath at the Natural Resources Defense Council, an environmental non-profit organisation based in New York. A higher growth rate means microbes are using more carbon, and higher carbon use efficiency means more of that carbon is being made into body structures, rather than respired as CO<sub>2</sub>, he says.

Ling and his colleagues found both warming patterns substantially reduced microbial activity. Soils under symmetric warming saw growth rate decline 31 per cent and carbon use efficiency decline 22 per cent relative to soil exposed to ambient temperatures. Under asymmetric warming, this effect was even stronger, with growth rate lowered by 58 per cent and carbon use efficiency lowered by 81 per cent relative to soils exposed to ambient temperatures. They ascribed the differences to factors including a change in the nutrients available to the microbes.

"Their findings suggest that soil carbon storage likely will decrease, reducing the capacity of terrestrial ecosystems to sequester carbon and degrading the soil's efficacy for nature-based solutions to climate change," says Yiqi Luo at Cornell University in New York.

Rath says the fact that current models don't take asymmetric warming into account means we are probably underestimating soil carbon losses due to climate change. However, he says the findings may only apply to soils from frigid ecosystems, and more research is needed to understand exactly what these changes in microbial activity mean for carbon. For instance, despite the significant change in microbial activity, the total amount of carbon stored in the soil didn't change over the course of the experiment.

Geologist Tracks Lead Pollution In A Tibetan Glacier, Revealing Global Impact Of Human Activities

10 October 2024, Texas A&M Today, Grant Hawkins

Researchers concluded that human activities have introduced the pollutant in some of the most remote and pristine regions of the world.

A collaborative research team involving Texas A&M University geologist Dr. Franco Marcantonio has examined the source of lead contamination in a Tibetan glacier, concluding that human activities have introduced the pollutant metal in some of the most remote regions of the world.

The team's findings, detailed in the paper titled "Source of lead in a Tibetan glacier since the Stone Age," were recently published in Nature Communications Earth and Environment, a high-impact journal in the field of earth and environmental sciences.

The Tibetan Plateau, a vast highland region in Asia, is often described as the "Roof of the World" because it's the highest and largest plateau on Earth, located mostly in southwestern China near the Himalayas and roughly four times the size of Texas. In their analysis of the Guliya Ice Cap within this region, Marcantonio and his colleagues – led by Dr. Roxana Sierra-Hernandez from The Ohio State University – discovered that significant lead pollution reached this area starting in 1974, with the highest levels of contamination occurring between 2000 and 2007.

By analyzing lead isotope ratios within Texas A&M's Williams Radiogenic Isotope Facility, Marcantonio said they were able to trace the main source of this pollution to emissions from Chinese gasoline, which contained lead until its phasedown after 2007.

"Lead is a neurotoxin, and its presence in remote areas like the Tibetan Plateau shows the vast reach of human impact on the environment," explained Marcantonio, a professor in the Department of Geology and Geophysics and holder of the Jane and Ken R. Williams '45 Chair in Ocean Drilling Science, Technology and Education. "By studying lead contamination in glaciers, we not only learn about the pollution itself but also gain valuable insights into atmospheric circulation patterns and the timeline of environmental changes."

To reach these conclusions, the team measured lead isotope ratios in ice samples from layers that dated back as far as 36,000 years. These ice layers acted as a historical record, allowing the scientists to compare modern lead contamination to levels from pre-industrial times while providing a clear picture of how human activities have affected the environment on a global scale.

The work, funded by the National Science Foundation, emphasizes the importance of understanding pollution in remote ecosystems, which could have serious health implications for both humans and wildlife. As Marcantonio continues his research, he plans to trace the movement of contaminant lead across different environments, including the oceans and even the human body.

"There's still much we don't know about how lead and other contaminants move through our environment," Marcantonio said. "By following these pathways, we hope to better understand how pollution spreads and impacts different ecosystems, which can ultimately help us find solutions to reduce contamination and protect human health."

September

National park in E China enhances biodiversity protection

29 September 2024, People's Daily Online

At Qianjiangyuan National Park, technician Jiang Yongqing carefully collected fallen seeds using a magnifying glass and tweezers. By analyzing the contents of withered leaves, including small tree branches, flowers, and fruits, researchers can gather data to support the scientific protection of the forest.

Jiang is a member of the Zhejiang Qianjiangyuan Forest Biodiversity National Observation and Research Station. The station employs four technicians, including Jiang, who are responsible for collecting samples in the wild, recording data, and monitoring changes in data on vegetation throughout its life cycle.

Qianjiangyuan National Park, situated in Kaihua county, Quzhou city, east China's Zhejiang Province, covers an area of about 252 square kilometers. It consists of three protected areas and the ecological areas that connect them.

The park is situated in a mountainous region with lush forests and diverse wildlife, earning the nickname the "natural water tower" of the Yangtze River Delta. Its exceptional ecological significance is highlighted by the pristine and distinctive ecosystem, conserving a vast expanse of untouched subtropical low-altitude evergreen broad-leaved forest vegetation in its purest form.

According to the latest research data, Qianjiangyuan is home to 2,234 species of higher plants, 449 species of large fungi, and 2,427 species of animals. It is a globally concentrated distribution area for the black muntjac and the Elliot's pheasant, two endangered species endemic in China that are under first-class state protection.

According to Yu Jianping, a senior engineer at the management bureau of the Qianjiangyuan National Park, the park has established a comprehensive biodiversity monitoring system, an unmanned drone inspection system, and installed infrared cameras. Qianjiangyuan is divided into 267 grids, each measuring 1km×1km. In each grid, two to three infrared cameras are set up to monitor wildlife.

Kaihua county has taken significant steps to protect biodiversity by establishing an environment and resources mobile court, an ecology, environment and resources case center, an ecological police center and a joint operations workstation.

Through a comprehensive approach that includes integrated restoration of mountains, waters, forests, fields, lakes, and grasslands, and the rescue and protection of rare and endangered species, Kaihua county is continuously restoring its ecological resources, preserving the habitats for wildlife.

In 2022, the park launched an ecological smart governance system, utilizing digital technology to enhance ecological protection. This system includes eight perception systems, such as drone-based disaster prevention inspections and wildlife identification, as well as 25 sub-scenes.

Together, they create a comprehensive monitoring and early warning system covering sky, space, land, and human activities. This system allows for continuous monitoring of the entire park, key ecological systems, and critical species, providing strong support for scientific research.

Artificial rain (snow) operations in Tibet fill the gap, and large drones fly over Shigatse

27 September 2024, Passionate Geekz

Passionategeekz reported on September 27 that according to the China Meteorological Administration, on the afternoon of September 24, a large drone equipped with cloud precipitation detection and artificial weather modification equipment flew into the clouds from Shigatse, Tibet Autonomous Region, and successfully carried out artificial Increase rain (snow) operations. Large-scale drones have become regular in weather modification operations in plateau areas, filling the gap in aerial weather modification capabilities in Tibet. According to reports, due to the high altitude, complex terrain, and changeable weather environment of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, it has long been difficult to carry out artificial rain (snow) operations by aircraft.

With the rapid development of large civilian drones in recent years, the China Meteorological Administration responded to local needs and applied them in plateau areas. Tengdun "Twin-tailed Scorpion A" artificial weather modification type and other large UAVs carrying out scientific experiments on air-space-ground comprehensive detection and rain (snow) enhancement based on large drones in the "one river and two rivers (Passionategeekz Note: Yarlung Zangbo River, Nianchu River, and Lhasa River)" basin on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau (hereinafter referred to as the "Test"), promote the regular operation of large-scale drones to increase rain (snow) in the "One River and Two Rivers" basin. Since 2023, with the strong support of the projects of the Department of Science and Technology and the Department of Finance of the Tibet Autonomous Region, the Weather Modification Center of the China Meteorological Administration has organized experiments in conjunction with the Autonomous Region Meteorological Bureau and other units. Targeting typical cloud systems in the plateau area, based on cloud precipitation observations with airborne equipment, Combining special air- and ground-based observation methods such as satellites, radars, raindrop spectrometers, and microwave radiometers, up to now, A total of 22 cloud precipitation observations and rain (snow) enhancement experiments were carried out using large UAVs, with a total flight time of 67 hours and a catalytic time of more than 25 hours.

Officials from the China Meteorological Administration said that during operations, large UAVs demonstrated characteristics such as high efficiency and flexibility, high flight ceilings, strong endurance and load capacity, and high safety. They were less restricted by terrain and responded quickly to mission needs; they were also equipped with high-precision sensors and equipment to enable precise positioning, monitoring and measurement of the work area. As of September this year, The meteorological department explored and initially established a normal operation service system for aircraft artificial weather modification on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau.

750 meters! Chinese researchers set new record for environmental science drilling on Tibetan Plateau

11 September 2024, Global Times, Leng Shumei

A team led by Chinese academician Fang Xiaomin from the Institute of Tibetan Plateau Research (ITP) under the Chinese Academy of Sciences (CAS) has reached 750 meters, during their environmental science drilling in the Qinghai-Xizang Plateau, or the Tibetan Plateau, setting a new record, the Global Times learned from the ITP on Tuesday.

The project is currently ongoing in the Lunpola Basin with the goal of drilling beyond 1,000 meters, marking the first initiative of its kind on the Qinghai-Xizang Plateau, according to the ITP.

The Lunpola Basin is situated in the central part of the Qinghai-Xizang Plateau, with an average altitude of 4,600 meters. It contains the most continuous Cenozoic strata of the Qinghai-Xizang Plateau dating back to 55 million years and is the first oil-producing basin in the core area of the plateau.

Numerous fossils, such as tropical palm trees, camphor trees, golden rain trees, split-belly fish and climbing perch, as well as water spiders, have been unearthed, along with multiple layers of ancient soils and volcanic ash. These findings provide a detailed record of the uplift of the central Tibetan Plateau and the historical changes in climate and ecological environment, making it one of the key areas for studying the co-evolution of tectonics, climate, biology and ecology.

In previous research, scholars have reconstructed the ancient elevation history of the Lunpola Basin using various methods, including the analysis of fossils as well as the oxygen isotopes found in ancient soil carbonates. However, significant debate remains concerning when the basin reached its present elevation. The comprehensive understanding of the co-evolution of tectonic, climatic, biological, and ecological processes has yet to be fully established.

In the past 20 years, Fang and his team have utilized the absolute dating of volcanic ash to establish a high precision paleomagnetic chronological sequence of the Cenozoic strata in the basin. They discovered that the Lunpola Basin has a distinct history of two phases of formation, evolution, and deformation: the early phase involved slow subsidence from approximately 42 million to 26 million years ago, while the later phase involved rapid uplift from about 26 million to 20 million years ago.

In the future, the research team plans to combine analyses from paleoclimate, paleobiology, and paleoecological environments, along with tectonics, sedimentology, and geochemistry, to reveal the history of the Asian monsoon's entry into the Tibetan Plateau over the past 40 million years, the co-evolution of climate, environment, and biodiversity in the heart of the Qinghai-Xizang Plateau, as well as the formation processes of hydrocarbon source rocks and arid salt lake deposits. This will provide important scientific evidence for simulating and predicting the impact of global warming across the plateau, in addition to protecting its ecological environment, and guiding the exploration and development of hydrocarbon and salt lake resources, according to the ITP.

Scientists find 1,700 viruses trapped in Tibetan Glacier

15 September 2024, News Nine, Aditya Madanapalle

The genetic variations in the viruses track closely with historic climate change on Earth.

Scientists have identified 1,700 species of viruses after carefully reconstructing strands of DNA recovered from ice core samples in the far northwestern Tibetan Plateau. While dormant viruses trapped for millennia within glacier ice being released and reintroduced into the environment by human caused climate change is an existential threat looming over the citizens of Earth, this story is about the valuable information on the history of Earth's climate, gleaned by the genetic analysis of the uncovered viruses. About three-fourths of the viruses found in the ice core samples are new to science.

Most of the viruses likely infected dominant microbes as against animals or humans, with the genetic material preserving information on the adaptations necessary to survive in extreme conditions during the variations because of the climate cycles of the Earth. As global warming threatens the Himalayan Glaciers, the knowledge embedded within the ice only increases in scientific value. The ice core sample preserved snapshots of virus evolution and behaviour over the previous 41,000 years.

A connection between viruses and climate change

The researchers were able to identify a distinct viral community that emerged about 11,500 years ago, just when the Earth was transitioning from the last Ice Age to a warm Holocene period. The researchers used sophisticated genetic sequencing techniques to look for signatures in the DNA, and discovered that most of the viruses were unique to the Guliya Snow Cap, with some overlap with species found elsewhere, indicating that viruses from as far away as the Middle East or even the Arctic made it to Tibet.

A paper describing the findings has been published in Nature Geoscience. Lead author of the study, ZhiPing Zhong says, "Before this work, how viruses linked to large-scale changes in Earth's climate had remained largely uninvestigated". Apart from providing valuable insights on the relationship between climate shifts and viruses on Earth, the techniques used by the researchers can help find microbes in the ice fields on Mars, or beneath the kilometres thick ice shells of potentially habitable moons of the Gas Giants, such as Enceladus and Europa.

After millennia apart, these Tibetan lakes are now linked and could merge by 2030

10 September 2024, SCMP, Zhang Tong

Tibet's largest inland lake, Siling, has spilled over into another nearby salt lake, Bange, for the first time in more than 4,000 years, after decades of rising water levels driven by climate change.

The Tibetan Plateau, known as "Asia's water tower", has more than 1,000 lakes and is the source of 10 major rivers in Asia that provide water resources to about 2 billion people in downstream countries.

Scientists monitoring the two lakes on the plateau – which are about 6km (4 miles) apart – say they could merge, and that might have significant implications for people living nearby.

A team from the Institute of Tibetan Plateau Research at the Chinese Academy of Sciences published their analysis of the changes at Siling lake in the peer-reviewed Science Bulletin in July.

Siling has significantly expanded in the past two decades. It covered an area of some 1,640 sq km (630 sq miles) in the 1970s, but by 2023 the lake had swollen to 2,445 sq km (945 sq miles), according to Lei Yanbin, a professor with the institute and lead author of the study.

Siling and nearby lake Bange – once a source of borax – have been part of separate watersheds with no hydrological connection for more than 4,000 years but potentially as far back as 8,200 years ago, when glaciers melted and sea levels rose.

"While Bange [lake's] water level decreased by about 1 metre [3 feet] over the last decade, Siling [lake's] rose by 4 metres [13 feet]," Lei wrote.

Siling spilled over into an ancient riverbed between the two lakes in September last year, breaking up a provincial road and forming a channel that was 200 metres at its widest and nearly 2 metres deep.

"The outburst flood ... will lead to the rapid expansion of Bange," Lei said in a statement released by the institute.

"Satellite data revealed that within a month of the overflow, Bange's area had increased by more than 10 per cent."

Lei said the immediate cause of the overflow was a continued rise in water levels over the past 20 years, noting that it had risen by more than 13 metres from 1998 to 2023. Increased rainfall in the area in August and September last year had pushed the water levels to the point where the lake spilled over.

He said rapid climate change on the Tibetan Plateau was driving the problem.

"From 1970 to 2014, the average annual temperature on the plateau rose at a rate of 0.35 degrees Celsius [32.63 Fahrenheit] per decade – twice the global average – accompanied by a marked unevenness in precipitation patterns, with increases in the plateau's interior and decreases on its southern and eastern edges," Lei said in a previous paper.

The impact of climate change is being seen across the Himalayan region. Song Chunqiao, a professor at the academy's Nanjing Institute of Geography and Limnology, has also studied watershed reorganisation on the Tibetan Plateau.

Song said there were 11 such events between 2000 and 2018, and the most severe one in 2011 had put the railway between Qinghai and Tibet at risk.

"Considering the ongoing trend of warming and moistening on the plateau, there is a pressing need for enhanced monitoring of potential watershed reorganisation areas – especially for sudden events like lake bursts and glacier collapses, which could lead to further geological disasters and ecological risks," Song said.

Lei's team also observed unprecedented expansion of lakes in the central Tibetan Plateau from 2017 to 2018, when the water levels of five lakes rose by between 1.4 metres and 2.8 metres.

Based on their modelling, the team expects Siling's water levels to continue rising – potentially by another 16.8 metres by 2100.

They said even under the most conservative scenario for emissions growth, the lake is predicted to expand and it could merge with Bange around 2030.

Lei said that change could affect people living near the lakes. He urged authorities to identify potential hazards from the expansion of inland lakes on the Tibetan Plateau caused by climate change.

"Real-time monitoring and early warnings for critical lake water level changes are needed to protect surrounding roads, bridges and villages from emerging threats," he said in the statement.

Torrential rains, deadly flooding hit Tibetan areas of Qinghai province

06 September 2024, RFA, Chakmo Tso and Dickey Kundol

Rights groups say the severe weather is the result of climate change.

Heavy rains in Tibetan areas of central China's Qinghai province have triggered severe flooding, destroying infrastructure and killing at least nine people and hundreds of livestock, three Tibetans from inside Tibet said.

The rains have drenched the area since Sept. 2, flooding roads, damaging bridges and causing landslides, they said. Chinese state media reported that heavy rains have inundated houses and swept away vehicles.

Tibet is experiencing heavier annual rainfalls and flooding than in the past, which some Tibetan rights groups say is due to climate change.

Six people died in Trelnag township of Serchen (Gonghe in Chinese) County in Tsolho Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, the sources said, insisting on not being identified to avoid reprisals from authorities.

Five of them died while traveling in a vehicle when a bridge collapsed, one source said.

Three others died due to a landslide in Honaguk village in Minhe county of Tsoshar (Haidong in Chinese) prefecture.

Some areas experienced severe hailstorms, which shattered windows and glass panes in the homes of nomads, the sources said.

Livestock dies

The flooding killed livestock as well. Nearly 400 cattle and sheep died in Tsekhok (Zekog) county in the Malho (Huangnan) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture.

Residents there needed help pulling dead cattle from the water and mud.

In Minhe district, houses were damaged, and highways and bridges were washed over, while grasslands were covered by mud.

As of Sept. 4, the Chinese government elevated the weather-damage alert for Qinghai from level 4 to level 3.

Chinese state media reported a level-one flood warning has been issued for Siling (Xining) city as well as Tathang, Kumbum and Tongkor counties. As a result, officials suspended bus transportation from Siling to these areas.

Roads and bridges connecting Tongkor and Siling have been severely damaged by the flooding, the sources said.

Additionally, roads leading from Dashi (Haiyan) and Kangtsa (Gangcha) counties of Tsojang (Haibei) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, and Themchen (Tianjun) county of Tsonub (Haixi Mongolian and Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture) to Siling (Xining) city have been cut off, making travel in and out of these areas impossible.

The areas have been hit by flooding before.

In 2022, five people died and over 2,000 head of livestock died due to flooding in parts of Qinghai province, including Mangra (Guinan), Serkog and Rebgong counties, as well as Labrang town in Sanchu (Xiahe) County of Kanlho (Gannan) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture of Gansu province.

August

Ghosts of the past: Global warming fears resurface as 41,000 years old viruses discovered in Tibetan glacier

28 August 2024, Down to Earth

A team of American and Chinese scientists has discovered as many as 1,705 genomes of viruses beneath the ice sheets in Tibet's Guliya Glacier. Many of these viruses are novel (like novel coronavirus) which means that their existence hasn't been chronicled in science so far.

With the latest discovery of glacial viruses in Tibet, the known collection of ancient viruses has skyrocketed. "After years of persistence, we successfully extracted and sequenced approximately 1,700 genomes of species-level virus operational taxonomic units from the ice core, expanding the known collection of glacier-preserved ancient viruses more than 50-fold," the research article titled A Decade-Long Journey into Glacier-Archived Ancient Viruses and Their Paleoclimatic Connections noted.

Scientists have told the press that the viruses differed significantly between colder and warmer eras, noting that a distinct community of viruses formed during these climatic shifts, at the end of the last ice age some 11,500 years ago. "This at least indicates the potential connection between viruses and climate change," said ZhiPing Zhong of Ohio State University, lead author on the research.

Also, co-author Lonnie Thompson highlighted the importance of research, describing it as 'a new tool that can answer basic climate questions that we couldn't have answered otherwise'.

The Guliya Glacier, which is located above 20,000 feet in the northwestern Tibetan Plateau, has historically been an active site for paleoclimate research.

Risks involved?

From a health perspective, excavating prehistoric ice sheets usually don't pose hazards for present-day human populations. This is because these long-dormant viruses mostly infected other microbes rather than animals.

However, researchers have found that the adaptations of these viruses could have compromised their hosts' ability to survive harsh weather conditions.

Also, these viruses haven't disintegrated biochemically even after major shifts in Earth's climate over millennia. Thus, in an adversely changing environment, it is widely believed that the melting of ice sheets can release viruses that can mutate and adapt to contemporary conditions.

Extreme weather risks rising as Tibetan Plateau gets hotter and wetter, scientists warn

23 August 2024, The Star

'Over half of Tibetan Plateau's glaciers may melt by 2100'

20 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Scientists have warned that the Tibetan Plateau is becoming warmer and wetter, raising the risk of extreme weather events.

The plateau is sometimes described as the "Asian water tower", because it is the source of many of the continent's major rivers including the Indus, Ganges, Mekong, Yangtze and Yellow River.

The researchers, led by the Chinese Academy of Sciences' Institute of Tibetan Plateau Research, presented a summary of their findings from ongoing work on Sunday.

The plateau will enter a super warm and humid phase that will see more than half the glacier mass melting in some areas and lake water levels rising by more than 10 metres (33 feet) by the end of the century, according to the researchers.

They said global warming meant that the amount of grassland and forest had increased by 6 and 12 per cent respectively over the last 15 years – but warned that these changes also carried an increased risk of extreme weather events.

Although the increase in vegetation will help prevent desertification, in the long run it will cause a shift in monsoon circulation, resulting in more heavy rainfall during the summer. These changes "could lead to significant shifts in the Asian monsoon circulation, potentially increasing the frequency of extreme weather events in China”, Yao Tandong, the leader of the research team, warned.

In a paper published in Nature in 2022, Yao warned that the rise in water levels was primarily occurring in the northern inland areas, but southern outflow regions – including the Indus and Ganges river basins, which are vital for agriculture in India and Pakistan – were experiencing a decline.

The researchers said these changes meant that more effective water resource management would be needed in downstream countries in future.

The China Meteorological Administration has previously warned that the total glacier area on the plateau may fall by 40 per cent by 2050, increasing the risk of severe storms and floods in downstream areas. The researchers have also mapped the distribution of active faults that could trigger major earthquakes along critical transport corridors and developed a disaster risk assessment system to support the construction of major infrastructure projects in the region.

The team has also discovered more than 3,000 new species and evidence that suggests the earliest human activity on the Tibetan Plateau may date back over 190,000 years, according to state news agency Xinhua.

Chinese scientists have warned that some low-elevation glaciers on the Tibetan Plateau may disappear permanently, which could significantly impact the plateau’s ecosystem. In fact, by the end of the current, 21st century, the loss of glacial mass in some regions of the Tibetan Plateau will exceed 50%, according to the scientists’ model predictions cited by China’s official Xinhua news agency Aug 20.

Over the past five decades, the plateau has witnessed rapid warming, with a temperature increase of about 0.4 degrees Celsius every 10 years, more than double the global average warming rate during the same period, the report noted.

Citing the example of Rongbuk Glacier at the foot of Mount Everest, Wu Guangjian, a researcher at the Institute of Tibetan Plateau Research, Chinese Academy of Sciences (CAS), has said, “the length and height of it are both shrinking.”

Wu has added that global warming has caused the rate of glacier evaporation to exceed precipitation, and that small glaciers at lower elevations on the plateau are melting more rapidly and are likely to disappear in the future.

The researchers, led by the Chinese Academy of Sciences’ Institute of Tibetan Plateau Research, have presented a summary of their findings from ongoing work on Aug 18.

The seriousness of the scientists’ warning lies in the fact that the Tibetan Plateau is the region with the most glaciers outside the polar regions. “Data shows that the glaciers on the plateau holds over 8 trillion cubic metres of water, providing essential water resources for more than 2 billion people downstream,” the report noted.

“The model shows that lake water levels in some areas of the plateau might rise by over 10 metres at the end of the century, which could enhance the plateau’s overall water supply capacity,” Yao Tandong, an academician at the CAS and the leader of China’s ongoing second scientific expedition and research project on the Tibetan Plateau has said.

“However,” Yao has added, “it also increases the risk of glacier collapses and glacial lake outburst floods.”

The scientists have noted that global warming meant that the amount of grassland and forest had increased by 6 and 12% respectively over the last 15 years. However, they have warned that these changes also carried an increased risk of extreme weather events. Although the increase in vegetation will help prevent desertification, in the long run it will cause a shift in monsoon circulation, resulting in more heavy rainfall during the summer.

These changes “could lead to significant shifts in the Asian monsoon circulation, potentially increasing the frequency of extreme weather events in China”, the scmp.com Aug 20 quoted Yao as saying.

In this project, Chinese scientists were stated to have used high-precision radar for the first time to obtain a continuous profile of snow and ice thickness at the summit of Mount Everest, as well as accurate measurements of its ice and snow depth.

Wu has warned that unless the world reaches a consensus on addressing climate warming and take action as soon as possible, “we will witness the disappearance of glaciers in more regions across the globe.”

Previously, the China Meteorological Administration had warned that the total glacier area on the Tibetan Plateau may fall by 40% by 2050, increasing the risk of severe storms and floods in downstream areas, noted the scmp.com report.

Scientists drill holes in world’s highest salt lake in Tibet for a glimpse into one million years of earth’s history

12 August 2024, Tibetan Review

An international research team has successfully drilled record boreholes in the world’s highest saltwater lake located in northern Tibet over Jun-Jul 2024 to collect sediment cores to study the Earth’s history, including climate change, dating back about a million years. Studying these may help future climate forecast efforts, reported uni-greifswald.de Aug 2 and China's official Xinhua news agency Jul 13.

Lake Namco (Tibetan: Namtso) is around 100 metres deep and lies at an altitude of nearly 4718 metres in Nagchu city-prefecture. Almost 1400 metres were drilled under the supervision of physical geographer Prof Dr Torsten Haberzettl from the University of Greifswald. The longest borehole reached a depth of over 500 metres.

The Xinhua report said the Namco drillingsurpassed the previous maximum depth of 153.44 metres in lake drilling on the Tibetan Plateau.

Namco is an enclosed lake that gathers information about rocks, soil, vegetation, rivers and human activities in the catchment, making the lake significant for environmental-changes research, it cited Wang Junbo, one of the leaders of the scientific expedition team, as saying.

The greifswald.de report said the sediments that are now available from these boreholes will be analysed and evaluated in detail by numerous international scientists over the coming years. The researchers from Greifswald hope to gain numerous insights into the climate of the past, the development of life in such a remote region and changes in the Earth's magnetic field.

Around 1400 metres of sediment cores were recovered from a floating drilling platform. These allow researchers to look back approximately one million years into Earth's history. In order to obtain such information, the sediment cores are divided into small slices, which are then analysed in the researchers' respective home laboratories - including in Greifswald, the report said.

The internationally funded drilling itself was stated to have mainly involved researchers from Germany, China, Switzerland and the UK, with the ideal drilling points determined in advance on the basis of seismic investigations funded by the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft (German Research Foundation, DFG). The scientists hope that their research will help to improve forecasts of the future climate. "Global climate change will have a major impact on Southeast Asia and therefore also on the people who live here. It is thus important to understand the climate of the past in order to make models about the future development of the climate more reliable. The sediment cores reveal which climate changes occurred in this region in the past, how quickly they took place and whether they led to changes in the ecosystems," Prof Haberzettl has explained.

Fast multiplying Tibet-Himachal glacial lakes could threaten lives, infrastructure

11 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Glacier sizes are rapidly reducing due to the impact of climate change in recent years, resulting in a gradual rise of moraine-dammed lakes in Himachal Pradesh in India and the Trans Himalayan Region of Tibet, posing a potential threat to human life and infrastructure further downstream, reported thehindu.com Aug 10, citing a recent study.

Moraine-dammed lakes are formed by the melting of retreating glaciers whose deposits of earth, rock etc, had fortified to prevent the water from flowing out. The number of glacial lakes in the Satluj river (Tibetan: Langchen Khabab) catchment area has almost doubled from 562 in 2019 to 1,048 in 2023, the report said, citing satellite data analysed in a recent study by the Centre on Climate Change of Himachal Pradesh Council for Science Technology-Environment (HIMCOSTE).

Of these 1,048 lakes, 900 are small, each spanning an area of less than five hectares, while 89 have an area between 5 hectares and ten hectares, and 59 are bigger than 10 hectares each, the report added. The catchment area of the Satluj basin was studied from upstream of Jhakri in Shimla district of Himachal Pradesh to the Mansarover Lake (Mapham Yutso) in Tibet in the Trans Himalayan Region from where the river originates.

"Over the years, the number of glacial lakes has been gradually increasing. In fact, as the frequency of small lakes with an area of less than five hectares has been rising, it indicates that the climate warming effects are more significant in the higher Himalayan region. The swift melting of glaciers and less snowfall during the winter could be reasons behind the rise in lakes," Mr SS Randhawa, a co-author of the study, and the principal scientific officer at HIMCOSTE, has said.

Randhawa has said it could be inferred from the basin-wise analysis that the number of lakes is much higher in the Tibetan Himalayan Region or the Upper Satluj basin, in comparison to the Spiti and Lower Satluj basins, indicating that the Upper Satluj basin is more susceptible to glacial lake formations.

The study, which analysed multi-spectral satellite images, suggests that the rise in glacial lakes in Himachal Pradesh's river basins can be disastrous downstream if the lakes burst their bounds for any reason, the report said. It was not clear from the news report whether similar danger existed on the Tibetan side of the Satluj basin where the number of such lakes is higher.

"Climate change has influenced the health of glaciers in the entire Himalayan region. As a result, the cryospheric cover over the Himalayan terrain is reducing. One of the ramifications of this is the development of high-altitude glacial lakes," Sunil Dhar, Dean of the Department of Environmental Sciences at the Central University of Jammu, has said.

"The number of such lakes has increased over the years and these lakes have become unstable due to the increase in the volume of water or due to the calving effect of adjoining glaciers, [creating] avalanche either of snow or rocks. These lakes have a potential of bursting out, and depending on the volume of water, velocity and the outburst spread, it can pose a threat to habitations and infrastructure in the downstream region," he has added.

2 dead, 17 missing after flash flood, mudslide in Tibetan area of Sichuan province

03 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Mudslide disasters have hit two nearby places in a Tibetan area of what is now part of China's Sichuan province over Aug 2-3, resulting in deaths and people missing, necessitating the dispatch of hundreds of people and equipment in rescue efforts. The first incident occurred on Oct 2 night in Ridi village in the province's Kangding City when "a sudden mountain torrent and landslide" destroyed homes, killing at least two people and leaving 12 missing, state broadcaster CCTV reported, quoting the Ganzi (Tibetan: Kardze) prefecture government. The disaster swept away part of the village.

The second disaster happened nearby at around 3.30am on Aug 3, when a sudden mountain flood and mudslide hit the Kangding-Luding section of the Yakang expressway, leading to the collapse of an expressway bridge between two tunnels.

Kangding (Dartsedo) is Tibet's historical gateway to China while Luding (Chagzam) is within Tibet in Kardze prefecture.

The bridge disaster sent three vehicles carrying six passengers plunging down the mountainous terrain. One person was rescued while the remaining five were missing as of noon on Aug 3, state news agency Xinhua reported, citing the government publicity department of Sichuan Ganzi Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture.

The Yakang expressway, connecting Ya'an in China in the east and Kangding in the west, opened in 2018. It shortens the car trip from provincial capital Chengdu to the resort city of Kangding by two hours, for a total journey of four hours. Bridges and tunnels make up 82% of the expressway.

While it remains to be determined whether poor quality of construction was responsible for the collapse of the Yakang expressway bridge, call for a crackdown on such projects have been growing recently in China.

"Three tragedies in a row! I was so shocked," scmp.com Aug 3 quoted a user as writing on social media platform Weibo. "China should launch a crackdown on tofu-dreg projects."

In Chinese, a "tofu-dreg project" is a phrase used to describe poorly constructed infrastructure. Such projects came under the microscope in 2008, when hundreds of students died in shoddily built school buildings during the Wenchuan earthquake in Sichuan. The third tragedy referred to the death of 38 people from the Jul 19 partial collapse of a highway bridge that plunged 25 cars into a rushing river in Shannxi province.

China is the world's largest emitter of the greenhouse gases that scientists say drive climate change and make extreme weather more intense, noted the AFP Aug 3.

China begins observation experiment on land-atmosphere interactions in Mt Everest region

03 August 2024, The Economic Times

China has begun an observation experiment on land-atmosphere interactions in the Mount Everest Region in Tibet to study the interaction between the land surface and the atmosphere, a crucial component of ecological and climate systems. A research team from the Aerospace Information Research Institute under the Chinese Academy of Sciences will conduct the observational experiment using unmanned aerial platforms at a site on the northern side of Mount Everest, called Qomolangma in Tibet, situated at an average altitude of approximately 4,200 metres (15,960 feet).

"In the Mount Qomolangma region, land-atmosphere interactions not only affect the climate of the Qinghai-Xizang Plateau and its surrounding areas but also have the potential to influence the global climate through complex climate feedback mechanisms and atmospheric circulation," said Jia Li, a researcher at the Institute.

Studying the Tibetan Plateau becomes imperative given the exponentially changing climatic conditions leading to faster melting glaciers and snow.

The International Centre for Integrated Mountain Development (ICIMOD), a regional intergovernmental organisation, brought out the 'Summary of the Hindu Kush Himalaya Assessment Report' in 2019 which stated there is ample evidence for elevation-dependent warming (EDW) in the HKH, especially in the Tibetan Plateau and its surrounding regions.

In 2023, ICIMOD also pointed out that 79 glaciers surrounding Everest have thinned by over 100 metres in just six decades, and the thinning rate has nearly doubled since 2009.

The state-run Xinhua news agency reported on Friday that the researchers from the Aerospace Information Research Institute will collect spatial distribution data on, among other things, the radiation flux between the land surface and the atmosphere in the Tibetan Plateau.

They will also integrate ground-station and remote-sensing satellite data to conduct multi-temporal and multi-spatial comprehensive observations, the report said.

However, this is not the first time that China has sent out a research team to the roof of the world. The Second Tibetan Plateau Scientific Expedition and Research carried out a ground-penetrating radar survey of snow depth along the north slope of Mount Everest in May 2022.

July

Over-10,000-year-old stone tool site in Tibet a rare find

22 July 2024, Tibetan Review

Chinese scientists have discovered a microblade technology site on the south bank of the Serling Tso lake (in Amdo county of Nagchu City), Tibet autonomous region, reported China's official chinadaily.com.cn Jul 22. The discovery, named the Niadi Site, is the earliest of its kind, adding to the historical timeline of early human activity on the Tibetan Plateau, the report said, citing a research team from the Chinese Academy of Sciences' Institute of Vertebrate Paleontology and Paleoanthropology.

Microblade technology is a period of technological microlith (tiny-blade-tool) development marked by the creation and use of small stone blades, which are produced by chipping silica-rich stones like chert, quartz, or obsidian. It was said to have come into widespread use over vast parts of northern Asia and northeastern Siberia in hunter-gatherer cultures during and after the Ice Age.

Migration to the Tibetan Plateau in that period may be closely linked to the long-term occupation of the region by humans and the formation of modern populations in Tibet, said China's official globaltimes.cn Jul 21, citing a report by the Science and Technology Daily.

This ground-breaking find fills a gap in the region's prehistoric cultural history and offers crucial insights into early human migration and adaptation on the plateau, the report said.

Significantly, the site has been dated to between 11,000 and 10,000 years ago. This time frame not only outlines the early activities of microblade technology groups in the heart of the plateau, but also provides an essential chronological marker for understanding the evolution of prehistoric human culture in the region.

In addition to the archaeological discoveries, the research team was stated to have integrated molecular biology findings, discovering that the migration of microblade technology groups into the Tibetan Plateau may be closely linked to the long-term occupation of the region by humans and the formation of modern populations in Tibet.

Tibet rain: Floods and landslides leave hundreds stranded

10 July 2024, Hindustan Times

Over 472 people, including local residents and tourists from outside the area, were trapped outside Chentang Township in the Shigatse area, says state media.

Hundreds of people were trapped in rural Tibet in recent days after heavy rainfall caused floods and landslides, Chinese state media reported on Wednesday.

At least 472 people, including local residents and tourists from outside the area, were trapped outside Chentang Township in the Shigatse area, state broadcaster CCTV said.

China is battling extreme weather across the country this summer, with the national weather agency expecting extreme heat to persist for much of the season.

Swathes of northern China have already been baked by heat waves this summer, while unseasonably torrential rains have triggered deadly floods and landslides across much of the south.

Climate change driven by human-emitted greenhouse gases makes extreme weather events more frequent and intense, and China is the world's biggest emitter. Continuous rainfall since Saturday in Tibet had left roads damaged, and "power and communications in the area of Chentang Township was cut off", according to CCTV.

Footage published by the broadcaster showed murky water tumbling down rocky hillsides, and large groups of people trekking along crumbled roads.

Large parts of one road appeared to have fallen into a river, while another one was covered in debris from a landslide.

CCTV said rescuers had been working for four days, and had successfully relocated 342 of the stranded people to nearby urban areas.

"Additionally, more than 130 tourists from outside this area, migrant workers and merchants remain temporarily stranded there due to road disruptions, rainy weather and insufficient physical ability to walk long distances," CCTV said.

An emergency communications network has now been set up in the area, according to the broadcaster.

Extinct humans survived on the Tibetan plateau for 160,000 years

03 July 2024, Science Daily, University of Reading

Bone remains found in a Tibetan cave 3,280 m above sea level indicate an ancient group of humans survived here for many millennia, according to a new study published in Nature.

The Denisovans are an extinct species of ancient human that lived at the same time and in the same places as Neanderthals and Homo sapiens.

Only a handful Denisovan remains have ever been discovered by archaeologists.

Little is known about the group, including when they became extinct, but evidence exists to suggest they interbred with both Neanderthals and Homo sapiens.

A research team led by Lanzhou University, China, the University of Copenhagen, Denmark, the Institute of Tibetan Plateau Research, CAS, China, and involving the University of Reading studied more than 2,500 bones from the Baishiya Karst Cave on the high-altitude Tibetan Plateau, one of the only two places where Denisovans are known to have lived.

Their new analysis, published today (Wednesday, 3 July) in Nature, has identified a new Denisovan fossil and shed light on the species' ability to survive in fluctuating climatic conditions – including the ice age – on the Tibetan plateau from around 200,000 to 40,000 years ago.

Dr Geoff Smith, a zooarchaeologist at the University of Reading, is a co-author of the study.

He said: "We were able to identify that Denisovans hunted, butchered and ate a range of animal species. Our study reveals new information about the behaviour and adaptation of Denisovans both to high altitude conditions and shifting climates. We are only just beginning to understand the behaviour of this extraordinary human species."

Dietary diversity

Bone remains from Baishiya Karst Cave were broken into numerous fragments preventing identification.

The team used a novel scientific method that exploits differences in bone collagen between animals to determine which species the bone remains came from.

Dr Huan Xia, of Lanzhou University, said: "Zooarchaeology by Mass Spectrometry (ZooMS) allows us to extract valuable information from often overlooked bone fragments, providing deeper insight into human activities."

The research team determined that most of the bones were from blue sheep, known as the bharal, as well as wild yaks, equids, the extinct woolly rhino, and the spotted hyena.

The researchers also identified bone fragments from small mammals, such as marmots, and birds.

Dr Jian Wang, of Lanzhou University, said: "Current evidence suggests that it was Denisovans, not any other human groups, who occupied the cave and made efficient use of all the animal resources available to them throughout their occupation."

Detailed analysis of the fragmented bone surfaces shows the Denisovans removed meat and bone marrow from the bones, but also indicate the humans used them as raw material to produce tools.

A new Denisovan fossil

The scientists also identified one rib bone as belonging to a new Denisovan individual.

The layer where the rib was found was dated to between 48,000 and 32,000 years ago, implying that this Denisovan individual lived at a time when modern humans were dispersing across the Eurasian continent.

The results indicate that Denisovans lived through two cold periods, but also during a warmer interglacial period between the Middle and Late Pleistocene eras.

Dr Frido Welker, of the University of Copenhagen, said: "Together, the fossil and molecular evidence indicates that Ganjia Basin, where Baishiya Karst Cave is located, provided a relatively stable environment for Denisovans, despite its high-altitude.

"The question now arises when and why these Denisovans on the Tibetan Plateau went extinct."

Taming the Dri Chu: China's Derge Dam Threatens Tibetan Culture and Communities

01 July 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

The people of Derge, a town in eastern Tibet, have risen up in opposition to the planned Kamtok (Ch: Gangtuo) hydropower project in their region. China's move to build the dam despite local opposition is indicative of the Chinese government's willingness to disregard negative impacts on Tibetan communities upstream in order to provide energy to the Chinese towns downstream.

This report expands on the Derge (Dege) situation and delves further into some of the systemic dangers of China's dam-building spree on the Dri Chu (Jinsha) [1] river. We hope to elucidate the stark contrast between the Tibetan people's deep-rooted connection to their ancestral lands and cultural heritage in Derge and beyond, and China's authoritarian approach that views the displacement of Tibetans and the erasure of their civilization as an acceptable cost for serving the interests of the Chinese state.

Much has already been reported regarding the feared submergence of Wontö monastery and the displacement of upwards of 10,000 Tibetans due to the planned Kamtok Dam.[2] These fears reflect the familiar pattern of dislocation throughout Tibet, as recently reported by Human Rights Watch.[3]

Since 2016, the Chinese government has intensified its efforts to forcibly relocate Tibetan populations under the guise of policy initiatives euphemistically labeled as “extremely high-altitude ecological relocation” and “targeted poverty alleviation.” These programs are thinly veiled pretexts for the coercive displacement of Tibetans, facilitating the exploitation of Tibet’s abundant natural resources. The implementation of these policies has resulted in the involuntary resettlement of hundreds of thousands of Tibetans from their communities, paving the way for the unimpeded extraction and utilization of Tibet’s rich natural endowment, including minerals and water resources.

Read more here.

June

Urgent action needed to save Hindu Kush Himalaya, the world’s ‘water tower’

30 June 2024, SCMP, Shyam Saran

Heatwaves across Asia are underscoring the immediate and severe impact of climate change. My country India is grappling with record-breaking temperatures, with some parts of northern India exceeding 50 degrees Celsius. China is also bracing for an unusually hot summer, which follows 2022’s worst heatwave on record with abnormally high temperatures lasting over 70 days.

This extreme weather coincides with alarming findings from the annual Snow Update Report by the International Centre for Integrated Mountain Development (ICIMOD). The report shows snow levels are almost a fifth below normal in the Hindu Kush Himalayan region this year, with experts advising water officials to initiate drought management and pre-emptive emergency water supply strategies.

The disastrous impact of climate change is seen first on mountains, and this puts downstream countries on the frontline of the crisis, particularly the eight that make up the Hindu Kush Himalaya – Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, China, India, Myanmar, Nepal and Pakistan – which encompasses the highest mountain ranges in the world.

The Hindu Kush Himalaya, known as the world’s “water tower”, is a single ecological unit, divided by political boundaries but unified by natural assets such as mountains, rivers and biodiversity. Importantly, it is the source of 10 large Asian river systems – the Amu Darya, Indus, Ganges, Brahmaputra, Irrawaddy, Salween, Mekong, Yangtze, Yellow River and Tarim – serving two billion people.

Protecting these assets, such as by slowing glacier melt, is therefore critically important – but impossible without regional collaboration.

Another recent ICIMOD study confirms the region is undergoing unprecedented, and likely to be irreversible, change. Glaciers are melting at an alarming rate, and based on current projections, scientists predict that two-thirds may disappear by the end of the century. The 79 glaciers that surround Mount Everest, for example, have thinned by over 100m in just six decades, and the rate of thinning has nearly doubled since 2009.

Regional collaboration is imperative in dealing with this crisis. Natural disasters caused by climate change are increasing in frequency and intensity, and disproportionately affect populations suffering from poverty and deprivation. National boundaries cannot protect the countries of the Hindu Kush Himalaya from these, irrespective of where events may have originated.

If deforestation takes place in the upper reaches of the mountain ranges, the rivers which flow across several countries will be affected through higher siltation and increased run-off. Glacier melt affects not only the countries near the mountains but also the densely populated Indo-Gangetic Plain.

Moreover, natural disasters such as flooding or extended warm weather are often followed by the spread of water or airborne diseases.

Countries in South Asia previously made efforts to present a common position on climate change, at the Cop16 UN climate conference in 2010. Countries from the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) had adopted an action plan for climate change, which listed several measures to deal with the challenge. Despite this initial promise, many agreed measures remain unimplemented.

Nevertheless, initiatives such as adaptation research centres and regional technology innovation networks show a willingness to address shared challenges. Revitalising this collaborative spirit is more crucial than ever.

Net zero, the carbon ambition consuming the world’s attention, is at best a naive hope, and at worst, a clever deflection. Net zero by 2050 does not mean zero emissions by that date. It means that in 2050 whatever emissions are being generated are matched by expanded natural carbon sinks, like forests and oceans, and the technological solutions that enable carbon to be sucked out of the atmosphere on a large scale, efficiently and economically.

Net zero therefore is a balance sheet concept that hides the uncertainties and even improbabilities of climate action. The largest natural carbon sinks are our forests and our oceans, both of which are being destroyed by rampant deforestation and waste dumping.

I do not see how in the next 25 years this will be reversed. Some countries in the region are doing all they can to reduce the impact of climate change. For example, Bhutan is the world's first "carbon negative" country, and conserving its rich forest lands is a feat for which it should be lauded. Others in our region should follow Bhutan's example, otherwise these efforts will be for nothing.

Political boundaries, territorial disputes and mutual suspicions are hindering regional cooperation. National security concerns often restrict vital data-sharing on water-induced disasters and glacial flood outbursts. But sharing such data can save lives and enhance regional cooperation.

Leaders and citizens must recognise that the fallout from the ecological crisis will far eclipse many of the divisive issues which currently demand our attention, while regional collaboration can yield significant environmental and economic benefits.

The region's ecological challenges necessitate an urgent call for regional collaboration. By working together, sharing knowledge and empowering institutions such as ICIMOD, countries can tackle climate change, protect shared natural assets and ensure a sustainable future for all. Embracing a unified approach to these transboundary issues is not just beneficial but essential for the region's survival and prosperity.

China's Climate Hegemony: Exploiting Tibet and Manipulating the Maldives

26 June 2024, Khabarhub

In recent years, China's aggressive pursuit of natural resources and geopolitical influence has taken an alarming turn, with Tibet and the Maldives becoming key battlegrounds in Beijing's strategy of environmental exploitation and water politics.

This aggressive approach not only threatens delicate ecosystems but also poses significant risks to regional stability and the sovereignty of neighboring nations. Tibet, often referred to as the "Third Pole" due to its vast glacial reserves, stands as the largest repository of fresh water outside the Arctic and Antarctic.

This ecologically sensitive plateau serves as the source for 10 major Asian river systems, making it a critical resource for billions of people across the continent. However, China's relentless pursuit of economic gain has led to unprecedented environmental degradation in this fragile region.

The Jiama copper-gold polymetallic mine, operated by China Gold International Resources, exemplifies the destructive impact of large-scale mining operations in Tibet.

Strengthening international legal frameworks to prevent the weaponization of water resources is also crucial. As China continues to leverage its control over Tibet's resources for geopolitical gain, the world must recognize the long-term consequences of these actions.

Despite a recent tailings dam failure in March 2023 that led to a year-long closure, the mine has resumed operations with plans for expansion.

This rapid return to business as usual, coupled with the construction of a new Phase III tailings dam, demonstrates China's prioritization of resource extraction over environmental concerns.

The environmental consequences of such mining activities are severe. Water contamination from heavy metals like copper, lead, and arsenic poses immediate threats to local populations and ecosystems.

The incident at the Guolanggou dam serves as a stark reminder of the ongoing risks, with the potential for future spills remaining a grave concern.

Beyond the immediate environmental impact, these mining operations are eroding Tibet's cultural and spiritual heritage.

The Jiama Valley, the birthplace of the first king of the Tibetan Empire, has been transformed from a sacred site into an industrial zone.

This desecration of holy lands prevents pilgrims from accessing sites of historical and religious importance, effectively severing Tibetans' connection to their ancestral heritage.

China's exploitation of Tibet's water resources extends beyond its borders, as evidenced by its recent "donation" of 3,000 metric tons of Tibetan glacial water to the Maldives.

This move, occurring simultaneously with the implementation of water conservation regulations in Tibet, reveals Beijing's cynical use of water as a geopolitical tool.

The timing of these water deliveries, coinciding with the Maldivian President's state visit to China and the signing of 20 agreements for financial and military assistance, underscores the transactional nature of China's "generosity."

This water diplomacy is part of a broader strategy to extend Chinese influence in the Indian Ocean region, leveraging the Maldives' vulnerability to climate change and its need for freshwater resources.

Meanwhile, Tibetans face increasing water scarcity due to Beijing's systematic water conservation campaigns.

The forced relocation of Tibetans from water-rich areas like Gangkar township to make way for Chinese water bottling facilities further illustrates the prioritization of commercial interests over the needs of local populations.

China's control over Tibet's water resources positions it as a potential "water hegemon" in Asia. With the capacity to influence eight major transboundary river systems, Beijing holds significant leverage over lower riparian states including Bangladesh, India, and Southeast Asian nations.

This control not only serves China's domestic economic interests but also provides a powerful tool for foreign policy manipulation.

Experts warn that China's dam-building spree, with numerous dams already constructed, poses an unprecedented threat to regional water security.

The potential for China to weaponize these water resources against neighboring countries cannot be overstated, as it could significantly impact agriculture, energy production, and overall economic stability in the region.

The environmental consequences of China's actions in Tibet extend far beyond its borders. The degradation of the Tibetan plateau, often called the "water tower of Asia," threatens the long-term water security of billions of people across the continent.

Climate change impacts, accelerated by China's damming and mineral extraction activities, are altering the delicate balance of this crucial ecosystem.

Moreover, the human cost of these policies is immense. Tibetans are being systematically marginalized in their own land, forced to relocate from ancestral territories, and denied access to their own water resources.

The cultural and spiritual erosion caused by these actions threatens the very identity of the Tibetan people.

China's exploitation of Tibet's resources and its water politics in the Maldives represent a dangerous form of environmental imperialism that demands urgent international attention.

The implications of these actions extend far beyond the immediate regions, threatening ecological balance, cultural heritage, and geopolitical stability across Asia.

The international community must demand transparency and environmental accountability for Chinese mining and damming operations in Tibet, support the rights of Tibetans to manage their own natural resources, and develop regional water-sharing agreements that ensure equitable access for all riparian states.

There is a pressing need to invest in alternative freshwater solutions for vulnerable nations like the Maldives to reduce dependency on Chinese "water diplomacy."

Failure to act now could result in catastrophic consequences for the environment, regional stability, and the lives of billions who depend on the water flowing from the "Roof of the World."

Strengthening international legal frameworks to prevent the weaponization of water resources is also crucial. As China continues to leverage its control over Tibet's resources for geopolitical gain, the world must recognize the long-term consequences of these actions.

The exploitation of Tibet and the manipulation of vulnerable nations like the Maldives are not just regional issues but global concerns that require a coordinated international response.

Only through concerted effort can we hope to protect the fragile ecosystems of the "Third Pole" and ensure a sustainable, equitable future for all nations dependent on Asia's vital water resources.

The time for action is now, before irreversible damage is done to both the environment and the geopolitical landscape of the region.

The international community must unite to challenge China's environmental imperialism, protect the rights of Tibetans and other vulnerable populations, and ensure the sustainable management of Asia's critical water resources.

Failure to act now could result in catastrophic consequences for the environment, regional stability, and the lives of billions who depend on the water flowing from the "Roof of the World."

China sends glacial water from Tibet to the Maldives, raising concerns

05 June 2024, RFA, Lobsang, Tenzin Pema and Tenzin Dickyi

Tibetans meanwhile are being told to save water as Beijing engages in water diplomacy.

China gifted 3,000 metric tons of Tibet's glacial water to the island nation of the Maldives in two separate batches in March and May – the same months it unveiled and implemented water conservation regulations at home.

The Water Conservation Regulations set limits on water usage within administrative regions and prioritizes water conservation work in Tibet and other parts of China.

They were issued by China's State Council on March 20, a week before it sent the first delivery of 1,500 metric tons of water in jugs to the Maldives, which is experiencing a scarcity of fresh water.

The regulations then went into effect on May 1, weeks before China donated the second batch of water jugs.

Maldives residents carry jugs of water distributed by Red Crescent and security personnel after a fire at a desalination plant affected water supplies in Malé, capital of the Maldives, Dec. 5, 2014.

China finalized the deal with the Maldives during a November 2023 visit by Yan Jinhai, chairman of the Tibet Autonomous Region, to the low-lying archipelago threatened by rising sea levels.

The Maldives has forged strong bilateral relations with China and is a beneficiary of the Belt and Road Initiative, under which it has borrowed more than US$1 billion from Chinese banks in the past decade, according to Western think tanks.

Maldivian President Mohamed Muizzu signed 20 agreements, including one for financial and military assistance, with Beijing during his inaugural state visit to China in January 2024.

The Maldives thanked the people of Tibet for their “generous donation,” which it expects will greatly support its island communities. Its freshwater resources are affected by erratic rainfall patterns and rising sea levels.

Water shortages in Tibet

But Tibetans inside Tibet said they face water shortages themselves because Chinese authorities have implemented systematic water conservation and management campaigns across various Tibetan villages and towns for over a decade.

This has occurred while authorities have restricted the availability of water and set limits on water usage at the local level.

“I have heard that China is donating bottled water from Tibet to other parts of the world for free for political gain,” said one source from the Tibet Autonomous Region, where Chinese authorities have carried out water conservation campaigns for over a decade.

“However, in Tibet, the local Tibetans do not have enough drinking water,” he said. “At times there isn’t enough water to even brush our teeth.”

On March 27, the same day the Maldives said it received the first batch of water, the Water Conservancy Bureau of Ngari Prefecture, or Ali in Chinese, the birthplace of key South Asian rivers, began a series of year-long events for the general public to promote water conservation.

In Nyingtri city, or Linzhi in Chinese, authorities have implemented the strictest water resources management system over the past several years and boast of its effectiveness.

“The water used to wash rice and vegetables can be used to mop the floor and water the flowers. ... Nowadays, water-saving behaviors like this have become a conscious action of many citizens,” said a 2023 announcement by the city government.

Meanwhile, Tibetans who have grown up on their ancestral land in Gangkar township in Dingri county, called Tingri in Chinese, are being forced to relocate to make way for the expansion of China’s water bottling facilities and industry, two sources said.

“Gangkar is known for its fertile pastureland and significant water resources from glaciers with 15 water springs in the region, which the local Tibetans have always relied on for their livelihoods,” said the first source.

Chinese authorities plan to move about 430 residents to take control of the water resources from the land, he said.

Weaponizing water

China’s move signals it is engaging in “water politics” and playing the long game for geopolitical gains in South Asia, experts said.

The Chinese government has projects underway to extract clean, clear and mineral-rich water to support the expansion of its premium mineral bottled water industry, they said.

Beijing also wants to control water flows to lower riparian states such as India, Nepal, Bhutan, Bangladesh, Thailand, Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos, to further its own aspiration of regional dominance, experts said.

“The imperative to address the threat of China weaponizing water in Tibet cannot be overstated,” wrote scholars Neeraj Singh Manhas and Rahul Lad in a March report titled “China’s Weaponization of Water in Tibet A Lesson for the Lower Riparian States” in the Journal of Indo-Pacific Affairs.

With approximately 87,000 dams built, China poses a historic threat, having already dammed most internal rivers, they add, while calling for proactive measures to implement enduring policies to protect these vital Tibet’s water resources.

Tibet is at the forefront of China’s “water wars” in the region, said Anushka Saxena, a research analyst at the Takshashila Institution, a public policy think tank in India.

Tibet’s eight major transboundary river systems have the capacity to turn China into “Asia’s water hegemon,” given that their water can be used for both domestic economic and foreign policy-related interests, as well as can be weaponized to cause harm to lower riparian states, she said.

"In that light, China's moves vis-à-vis export of water to Maldives cannot be isolated from the larger approach China is adopting to using Tibet's water resources," she added.

Tibetan lakes are estimated to expand 50% by 2100: Chinese study

03 June 2024, SCMP, Victoria Bela

By the end of the century, the surface area of some lakes in the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau could increase by more than 50 per cent – while other lakes around the world shrink – a new study has found.

The water volume of the lakes in the plateau in southwest China is estimated to expand by more than 600 billion tonnes, largely due to increased rainfall caused by climate warming, as well as the melting of glaciers.

If these predictions are correct, the researchers said it could have a massive economic impact on China, running into the billions.

"Our results suggest that by 2100, even under a low-emissions scenario, the surface area of endorheic lakes on the Tibetan Plateau will increase by over 50 per cent (around 20,000 sq km [7,722 square miles]) and water levels will rise by around 10 metres [32 feet] relative to 2020," the scientists wrote in a paper published in the peer-reviewed journal Nature Geoscience on May 27. Endorheic lakes, also known as closed lakes, do not have an outlet to drain into. The team from China, Wales, Saudi Arabia, the United States and France said that this would correspond to a fourfold increase in water storage compared to what the area experienced over the last 50 years.

If steps are not taken to mitigate this, "more than 1,000 km of roads, approximately 500 settlements and around 10,000 sq km of ecological components such as grasslands, wetlands and croplands," will become submerged, the team said.

The Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, known as the "Water Tower of Asia", is the highest and largest plateau in the world and is home to more than 1,000 lakes with large reserves of water in both liquid and ice form.

"[It is] one of the regions that is most vulnerable to climate change, acting as an early warning signal for the wider effects of global warming," the researchers wrote.

While large lakes in other parts of the world have been experiencing a decline in water storage due to both rising temperatures and human activity, lakes in the plateau have actually been expanding in recent decades due to warmer and wetter conditions.

This has mostly been driven by increases in net precipitation. While melting glaciers also contribute to this phenomenon, the researchers said the glaciers that remain have "limited storage".

As part of the study, the team developed a simulation model for the period of 2021 to 2100 incorporating climate drivers with field surveys and remote sensing, all set to different socioeconomic scenarios to examine the future impact of increasing water storage in the plateau.

In the northern part of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, a twofold increase in total lake area is expected – the largest increase across the plateau. Lakes in the southeast, northwest and central parts of the plateau will also see significant expansion.

In fact, even though the southern part of the plateau used to see a shrinking trend in lake changes, it also began expanding in 2021, the team found.

The largest lake in the Tibet autonomous region, Selin Co (Siling Lake), could see an increase in water volume of around 66 billion tonnes – about an 800 sq km increase in lake area.

Despite the northern parts of the plateau being projected to experience the largest increase in water storage, roads in the northeast – where there is more human activity and infrastructure – will be the most vulnerable to inundation.

Looking at the researchers' middle socioeconomic scenario, they estimated that inundated roads could directly lead to an economic loss of 20 billion yuan to 50 billion yuan (US$2.7 billion to US$6.9 billion) by the end of the century.

This "is a serious threat that should be considered in future rail and road planning," the team said.

Many villages and livestock pens are located next to lakes in the plateau, and by the end of the century, 615 human settlements could be inundated by water.

More than 500,000 livestock could also be disturbed, and the inundation of grassland could lead to less livestock production "severely affecting the livelihoods of local pastoralists and further exacerbating poverty levels," the researchers wrote.

The team pointed to an incident in 2011 where a lake in the plateau's Hoh Xil Nature Reserve "burst", leading to a blockage of the migration route for Tibetan antelope.

"Loss of cropland could disrupt food production, affecting both local food security and the regional agricultural economy," the paper said.

The team found that several lakes are also expected to merge together as their area expands, which could also threaten infrastructure and ecology.

Plus, as the lakes' area expands, the team said there is a "growing concern about increased emissions of greenhouse gases, including carbon dioxide and methane, into the atmosphere".

This could create a feedback loop, as increased emissions would cause more warming, which would in turn cause further lake expansion in the plateau.

"The expanding lakes pose challenges to existing and planned infrastructure and communities and requires urgent implementation of effective adaptation and sustainable management strategies to mitigate socioeconomic repercussions," the team said.

"Our study serves as a scientific guide for future planning and provides valuable insights to avoid the devastating consequences of the impending lake expansion."

China Gold's Jiama mine in Tibet resumes operations

02 June 2024, RTV

China Gold International Resources announced that the Phase II processing plant at its Jiama mine in Tibet, China, has resumed operations after being halted for over a year.

The copper-gold mine was suspended on March 27, 2023, due to a tailings overflow at the Guolanggou dam, which the company has since repaired and reinforced.

With approvals granted by Tibet government as well as relevant departments of the Chinese government, the Phase II processing plant is now operating with a daily processing capacity of 34,000 tonnes.

The Phase I plant, which has been running at a rate of 6,000 tonnes during the production ramp-up phase, will cease operations. The plant was allowed to resume in December following approval from the municipal government.

"We are proceeding cautiously in resuming operations and ramping up productions. The root causes of the overflow have been thoroughly reviewed and the lessons learned will be applied in future operations," stated Junhu Tong, China Gold's chairman and CEO.

Meanwhile, the company is actively advancing the construction of the Phase III tailings dam, which it expects to complete and put into operation during the first half of 2026.

As detailed in its year-end 2023 release, the Chinese miner has set a production guidance of 95-98 million lb. of copper and 42,439-45,333 oz. of gold for the Jiama mine this year once it returns to production. This is in addition to the 106,097-112,528 oz. of gold forecasted at its CSH mine in Inner Mongolia.

May

Lakes on Qinghai-Tibet Plateau growing rapidly, study finds

30 May 2024, China Daily, Palden Nyima and Daqiong

Chinese scientists have found that over the past three decades, the area of lakes on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau has expanded by over 10,000 square kilometers and is continuing to grow, the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau Research Institute of the Chinese Academy of Sciences announced recently on its website.

The research carried out by the institute's environmental change and multisphere processes team, led by Zhang Guoqing, predicts that by the end of the 21st century, the lake area on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau will expand by approximately 50 percent, equivalent to about 20,000 square kilometers, under a low-emission scenario.

This expansion will increase water levels by an estimated 10 meters, resulting in a staggering increase in water volume of about 652 billion metric tons, which is four times the increase over the past 50 years.

The research is a pivotal advancement in the study of Qinghai-Tibet Plateau lakes. It was published in the esteemed international academic journal Nature Geoscience on Monday and is poised to provide crucial scientific guidance for future planning on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau.

Described as the "Asian Water Tower," the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau boasts the world's highest and most extensive plateau lake group, accounting for over 50 percent of China's total lake area.

Xu Fenglin, one of the authors of the published research paper and a doctoral student at the institute, said that the research highlights that lakes in the northern plateau are experiencing the most significant expansion and will potentially double in area under high-emission scenarios.

"The lakes in the central region of the plateau are projected to expand by over 50 percent, while lakes in the southern region, previously in a state of shrinkage, are anticipated to transition to expansion in the near future," Xu said.

"The expansion of lakes on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau will increase lake-atmosphere exchanges, potentially leading to an increase in greenhouse gas concentrations in the atmosphere, thereby exacerbating global warming."

Warmer Climate Risks Societal, Ecological Impact on Tibet

28 May 2024, The Mirage

While recent reports have stated that more than half the world's largest lakes, including lakes in the Tibetan plateau, are drying up, a paper in Nature Geoscience today (27/5/24 DOI 10.1038/s41561-024-01446-w ) suggests that, by the end of this century, land-locked lakes on the Tibetan Plateau are set to increase exponentially, resulting in major land loss and related economic, environmental and climatic impacts.

Climate and weather predictions suggest that increased rainfall due to climate change will enlarge these lakes, and see water levels rise by up to 10 metres.

The volume of water caught in these land-locked lakes is estimated to increase fourfold by 2100 according to the research by Dr Iestyn Woolway of Bangor University (UK) and colleagues in China, Saudi Arabia, USA and France.

The increased lake surface area will also mean the loss of critical land area, for agriculture, human habitation, critical road and rail networks and economic disruption.

Dr Woolway commented,

"Climate change is making the Tibetan Plateau greener and more habitable, attracting more people to higher altitudes due to better access to water. However, rising lake levels require urgent planning and policies to mitigate impacts on the region's ecology and population."

The resultant land loss could also lead to a change in the landscape, as lakes merge and the course of the rivers which feed and inter-connect the lakes are altered.

This could lead to increased greenhouse gas emissions and a positive feedback loop, amplifying climate change. An increase in freshwater, and in flow between lakes could also cause a change in ecology and affect wildlife. As an example, when the Zonang Lake in Hoh Xil Nature Reserve burst its banks in 2011, the Tibetan Antelope found their migration route blocked.

China sends second consignment of glacial water from Tibet to Maldives

25 May 2024, The Pioneer

China has gifted 1,500 tonnes of water from the Tibetan glaciers to Maldives, the second such donation in less than two months, a media report said on Friday.

This is the latest in the multiple grants and aid that China has promised the Maldives, especially since pro-China Mohamed Muizzu took over as the President in November 2023.

China's Xizang Autonomous Region has gifted 1,500 tonnes of mineral water to the Maldives government on Thursday. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs said that the donated water will be distributed to island communities, for use during times of drinking shortage, news portal Sun.mv reported. Earlier on March 27, the Maldives government had announced that it had received a similar consignment of 1,500 tonnes of water from China.

Foreign Minister Moosa Zameer, while speaking at a ceremony where Wang Lixin, the Chinese Ambassador to the Maldives, handed over the donation, said that China continues to remain a "good friend to the Maldives," especially during the challenging times and crisis.

The minister also expressed his gratitude to the people of Xinjiang Autonomous Region for the kind gesture and to the government and people of China for their continued support and goodwill. "Grateful to receive 1,500 tonnes of mineral water from the people of Xizang Autonomous Region, PRC. This generous donation will greatly support our island communities during water shortages. Thank you for your support and friendship," Zameer said on his official X handle late on Friday and tagged Wang while posting photos from the ceremony.

The Maldives has 26 atolls and its 1,192 islands are mostly composed of coral reefs and sandbars, a combination that makes groundwater and freshwater extremely scarce, and the problems are exacerbated due to climate change.

The country has tried between 2011 and 2015, a UN-funded 'Increasing Climate Resilience through an Integrated Water Resources Management Programme' but with limited success.

In December 2014, India carried out 'Operation Neer' during one of its worst water crises following a massive fire in the Male Water and Sewerage Company complex on December 4, 2014.

While announcing the earlier consignment in March, the government had said that the decision to provide Maldives with drinking water was reached during the official visit in November 2023 of China's Tibet Autonomous Region's Chairman, Yan Jinhai to the Maldives, when he met President Muizzu.

At that time, it was deliberated to donate water that is produced out of frozen water procured from glacial regions which are highly clean, clear, and rich in minerals. Moreover, Tibet (Xizang in Chinese) Autonomous Region is known to produce high-cost premium brands of water, the Maldives Foreign Ministry said then.

Previously, China had been exclusively known for its assistance in the urban and economic development of the Maldives. But since Muizzu assumed office,

China has been helping the country with the supply of defence equipment too.

Ancient DNA Unveils Western Tibetan Plateau's Past

23 May 2024, Mirage

Combining the recently sequenced data with previously published ancient genomic data, the evolutionary history of the populations in the western Tibetan Plateau over the past 3,500 years has now been reconstructed.

This study is a systematic, long-term genomic study of ancient populations in the western Tibetan Plateau. It is of great significance for the in-depth understanding of the history of interactions between ancient western plateau populations and ancient populations within the plateau and in neighboring South Asia and Central Asia, according to the researchers.

Genetic characteristics of ancient western plateau populations and their interactions with ancient populations within the plateau

Previously, the understanding of the genetic history of the ancient populations of the western plateau was extremely limited. Based on only one site dating back 2,300 years ago, researchers had speculated that genetic influence occurred between western plateau populations and Central Asians. However, the specific time, place, and extent of this influence were unknown. In this study, the researchers reconstructed the population evolutionary history in the western plateau over thousands of years using genetic information from various ancient Tibetan populations.

They showed that the ancient Ngari populations of 3,500 years ago had genetic components similar to the populations of the southern plateau and did not carry additional genetic components from Central Asia or South Asia.

This genetic composition has been stably maintained in northwestern Ngari Prefecture for more than a thousand years: The genetic composition of the late Gebusailu and Laga populations of 2,300 years ago is almost the same as that of the Gebusailu population of 3,500 years ago. In other words, the Ngari population during this period mainly carried the genetic components of ancient populations in the southern plateau, while genetic components from Central Asia and South Asia were introduced much later. After that, starting from 2,300 years ago, Central Asian components appeared in some sites in northwestern Ngari Prefecture, but until 150 years ago, the proportion of Central Asian components was still less than 15%. Overall, local Ngari genetic components remained dominant from 3,500 to 150 years ago.

The researchers also found complex population interactions and migrations within the plateau. The genetic components of ancient populations in the southern and western parts of the plateau 3,500 years ago were very similar, indicating that population migration and expansion from south to west may have occurred earlier.

In addition, compared with the population in northwestern Ngari, populations from 1,800 to 1,600 years ago from the Kongque River to the upper reaches of the Xiangquan River in southeast Ngari were further influenced by ancient populations from the southern plateau. This indicates that the southern plateau people may have begun to expand westward again before the Tubo Empire expanded westward in the early 7th century.

In summary, the interactions between the ancient populations of the southern and western plateau were far more complex than recorded in historical documents. As early as 1,800 years ago, multiple east-to-west human migrations between the two places had occurred, and a gradient of genetic components introduced by the expansions can be observed in these east-to-west populations.

Interactions between ancient populations in the western plateau and outside the plateau

Although Central Asian components began to affect some Ngari populations around 2,300 years ago, the proportion of Central Asian components in the genomes of these populations is low

Beginning 2,000 years ago, genetic components related to South Asia also affected the Ngari Prefecture region. Interestingly, the South Asian-related genetic components that affected the ancient Ngari populations came from mixed populations that settled in Central Asia. These populations are genetically related to Central Asians but are culturally typical South Asians. Previous research suggested that they were immigrants from the Indus Valley Civilization who settled in Central Asia.

This is the first identification of South Asian-related genetic components in ancient populations on the Tibetan Plateau, providing clues to the interactions between ancient populations on the plateau and those related to the Indus Valley Civilization.

In the 9th century AD, with the decline of the Tubo regime, descendants of the Tubo royal family established the Guge Kingdom in what is now Ngari Prefecture. It was not until the 17th century AD that the Guge Kingdom collapsed. As the continuation of the Tubo lineage, the Guge population is an important window into the genetic characteristics of the last Tubo people. An ancient human sample collected by the researchers from the Guge Cave showed the influence of Central Asian populations, and the proportion of Central Asian components was as high as 31%. This admixture event is estimated to have occurred around 1,353 AD, coinciding with the prosperity of the Guge Kingdom. This new result shows that in addition to its historical connections with South Asian kingdoms, the Guge Kingdom also had population interactions with people from Central Asian kingdoms.

Kinship practices in early western plateau communities

The researchers also examined kinship among individuals from early western plateau sites. At the Gebusailu tomb dating back 2,300 years ago, a second-generation family structure consisting of a father and two sons was discovered. At the same time, individuals at this site and the 1,800-year-old Pulanduowa site were mainly male, and the diversity of Y-chromosome haplotypes is evidently lower than that of mitochondrial haplotypes, indicating that both may have been communities dominated by paternal inheritance.

The 1,600-year-old Qulong sazha tomb includes a family line in which the second- and third-generation descendants are related by maternal kinship, suggesting the role of maternal kinship in the family line. Combined with the sex ratio and paternal and maternal genetic diversity, this pattern reflects a relatively balanced paternal and maternal inheritance structure.

Nevertheless, this study is a preliminary exploration of the kinship practices at early plateau sites, and future research with more samples will shed more light on the details and diversity of the community structure of ancient Tibetans.

Due to the high altitude and harsh natural environment of the western Tibetan Plateau, anthropological and archaeological research in this region is relatively limited. In particular, large gaps exist in previous research on the evolutionary history of early ancient western Tibetan Plateau populations and their interaction with ancient populations in neighboring areas. Using a combination of genetics and archeology, the researchers thoroughly investigated the evolutionary history of ancient populations on the western plateau over the past 3,500 years. While the major genetic components of the ancient western plateau populations show continuity, those populations had complex and frequent interactions with the ancient populations in the adjacent southern plateau region, Central Asia, and South Asia off the plateau.

Since the Tibetan Plateau is a bridge between East, Central, and South Asia, the results of this study are important for understanding the genetics of ancient populations on the plateau and those populations' interactions with ancient Central and South Asians.

China targets Tibet to establish world's largest national park system

23 May 2024, Tibetan Review

China will strive to establish the world's largest national park system by 2035, reported the official Xinhua news agency May 22. However, 70% of the candidate areas for achieving this goal are on the Tibetan Plateau, raising serious concerns about the plan's brutal implications for Tibetan farmers and nomads who are bound to be forced to relocate from their ancestral land.

The report said that in 2021, China established its first batch of national parks, spanning a protected land area of 230,000 square km. These included the Sanjiangyuan National Park, the Giant Panda National Park, the NCTLNP, Hainan Tropical Rainforest National Park and Wuyishan National Park.

Of them, the Sanjiangyuan National Park in Qinghai Province is fully within a Tibetan populated territory. Besides, a significant portion of the Giant Panda National Park is located in the historically Tibetan populated regions in Sichuan and Gansu provinces. These have entailed large-scale forced relocation and impoverishment of Tibetan farmers and nomads. And now, in order to achieve its 2035 goal, China has designated 49 candidate areas, covering around 1.1 million square km, as national park space, the report said, citing a spatial layout plan made public in 2022.

Notably, the Tibetan Plateau, which is the highest plateau in the world, has 13 candidate areas. They cover an area of about 770,000 square km and account for 70% of the total area of national park candidate areas, the report said.

One of these candidate areas is the Qiangtang Nature Reserve in Nagchu City, northern Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR). A section of the relocation of Tibetans from this area to southern TAR has been covered recently by China's official media.

Study investigates extreme precipitation events across diverse regions of the Tibetan Plateau

22 May 2024, Phys.org

Researchers have identified three distinct spatial types for summer extreme precipitation on the Tibetan Plateau: Northwest, Southeast, and Southern Himalayas types based on predefined thresholds for extreme precipitation. The study is published in the journal Science China Earth Sciences.

The Northwest and Southeast types are primarily influenced by anomalous signals in the mid-to-high latitude regions upstream of them, while their wave train shapes exhibit significant differences. The precursor signals of the Northwest type propagate predominantly from west to east along the latitudinal 40°N, whereas those of the Southeast type occur at higher latitudes, with anomalous signals originating from the north polar region and propagating in a northwesterly-southeasterly direction.

Spatial distribution of extreme precipitation thresholds and extreme precipitation indices in summer on the TP. Credit: Science China Earth Sciences (2024). DOI: 10.1007/s11430-023-1321-6

On the other hand, the Southern Himalayas type is mainly governed by localized subtropical anomalous circulation anomalies and exhibits little association with wave train activity from mid-to-high latitudes.

The identification of significant disparities in the characteristics of extreme precipitation events, along with their associated influence on circulation patterns and precursor signals on the plateau, could offer a more robust foundation for accurately predicting extreme precipitation events during the summer season in this region.

This study was led by Ding Zhiyuan, Dr. Ha Yao, and Dr. Zhong Zhong from the College of Meteorology and Oceanography at the National University of Defense Technology.

Occupying Tibet's Rivers

21 May 2024, Free Tibet

China's policy of constructing mega dams on Tibet's rivers and extracting its resources risks social and environmental catastrophe in Tibet and throughout Asia. This is according to a new report released today by Free Tibet's research partner Tibet Watch and research organisation Turquoise Roof.

Occupying Tibet's Rivers: China's hydropower 'battlefield' in Tibet is being released on the three-month anniversary of rare, large-scale protests in Dege County in eastern Tibet in February 2024.

That month, despite the risks to their safety, hundreds of Tibetans protested against the planned Kamtok hydroelectric dam. If it proceeds, the dam threatens the mass displacement of local residents and the flooding of their homes. It also threatens at least six Tibetan Buddhist monasteries, some of which contain invaluable 14th century Buddhist frescoes that survived the Cultural Revolution but are now threatened with destruction.

In response to these protests, police detained hundreds of Tibetans and beat protesters so badly that they were hospitalised. The local area was subsequently put under lockdown with paramilitaries deployed and no further communications with the outside world possible. No photos or videos have emerged from the area since the end of February. The second part of the report details the wider context, noting that the huge Kamtok dam is itself only one of 13 dams planned on the upper reaches of the Drichu (Ch: Yangtse) River and that China is forcing through construction of dams on all of the rivers originating in Tibet. The dams are part of a long-term plan to provide key Chinese industrial hubs such as Chengdu and Chongqing with water and electricity at the expense of rural Tibetans, who have been forced from their pastures in their millions to make way for extraction and energy projects. Eight of the world's largest river systems flow from glaciers on the Tibetan plateau and are a critical resource for the densely populated nations surrounding it. This now faces a tipping point as what was once one of the most undisturbed environments on Earth is now strangled by dams and threatened by increased instances of landslides and food insecurity due to the mass displacement of rural Tibetans who have stewarded its pastures for generations. For the first time, China's dam-building is now reaching upriver to the sources of Asia's great wild rivers in landscapes that were previously among the least disturbed habitats on earth. The planned Kamtok dam in the upper reaches of the Yangtze (Drichu in Tibetan risks a cascade of adverse consequences both on the plateau and downstream in China. The policy of dam construction is being driven directly by the Chinese government and driven by giant Chinese Communist Party-controlled energy conglomerates, including Huaneng and Huadian. The report highlights that Huadian signed a cooperation agreement with German multinational company Siemens Energy in March 2024. The report draws from a wealth of resources, including Tibetan sources, Chinese government announcements and procurement documents, satellite imagery and the knowledge of researcher and Tibetan environmental expert Gabriel Lafitte. It is accompanied by a 3D satellite map pinpointing key locations related to the Kamtok dam and the protests by the residents of Dege County. Occupying Tibet's Rivers concludes with a detailed series of recommendations to actors at every level from international governments and the United Nations to environmental and cultural rights groups, warning that due to China's extractive policies, "lives, livelihoods and irreplaceable Buddhist culture and landscapes of Tibet hang precariously in the balance."

China's Greed for Lithium is Killing the Tibetan Plateau

13 May 2024, Japan Forward, Pema Gyalpo

A vehicle is seen near a lithium smelter in Yichun, Jiangxi province, China March 30, 2023. (©REUTERS/Staff/File Photo)

Why did China invade Tibet? There are several reasons, one of which is because Tibet is very rich in natural resources. This fact is supported by Chinese sources. The rising demand for electronic vehicles has given rise to a new race for lithium mining across the globe. Lithium, primarily used in lithium-ion batteries, is considered a suitable replacement for fossil fuels.

China has huge deposits of lithium. It has long been indulged in the mining, processing, and exporting of lithium to the rest of the world. The recent discovery of lithium deposits in the Tibetan Plateau has attracted the attention of hundreds of lithium industries. This has threatened the ecological biodiversity of "the roof of the world."

A report titled "Tibet, a New Frontline of White Gold Rush in Global Race for Renewable Energy" was published in October 2023 by Turquoise Roof. According to the report, China's geologists have recognized that eastern Tibet has at least 85% of all reserves of lithium in China.

It further highlights that the Tibetan plateau has been assessed to hold at least 3.655 million tons of China's estimated 4.047 million tons of lithium. Electric vehicle manufacturers like Tesla and BYD are heavily reliant on Tibet's lithium exploitation, especially on hard rock lithium (spodumene) available in the region. New factories have been set up while existing factories have doubled their production of lithium.

Xi Jinping's Campaign

As per the Turquoise Roof report, lithium extraction and its processing involve waste generation, pollution, and highly energy-consuming processes. These further damage the local rivers and livestock.

The report further stressed that this large-scale exploitation of Tibet has been initiated and supported by Xi Jinping himself under his "Made in China 2025" campaign. During his visit to Qinghai Province in 2021, Xi called for the escalation of lithium extraction on a large scale. Apart from lithium, Tibet is home to the world's largest deposits of critical minerals used in various technologies in critical industries like pharmaceuticals and electronics.

Since the Chinese occupation of Tibet in the late 1950s, China began mining work in the Tsaidam Basin for chromium and bauxite. Its second biggest mining work was launched in the 1980s for the mining of gold in the river basin of Kham and Amdo. Following the discovery of large deposits of copper, Tibet saw an increase in mining in the 21st century. Recently, the discovery of huge deposits of lithium has attracted the world's largest electronic manufacturers from all across the globe. This has led to further exploitation of the natural ecology of the area. Lithium has long been used as the energy source in lithium-ion batteries.

Water and Soil Pollution

However, the continuous mining in the area has had a devastating impact on the ecology of the Tibetan Plateau, raising the pollution level. It not only polluted rivers and streams but, in several cases, even diverted their flow. This has severely affected the flora and fauna of the region. The government in Beijing seems least concerned about the negative effect of continuous mining across the Tibetan Plateau. Its whole focus is on making money.

Rivers have been affected the most, and they are far from recovery. The Tibetan Plateau is the origin of mighty rivers like Mekong and Yarlung Tsangpo (known as Brahmaputra in the Indian sub-continent). These rivers have been the living force for millions of people in Southeast Asia and South Asia.

Continuous mining activities along these rivers have badly impacted the essential minerals present in the water. This has led to a decline in fisheries, which are the primary source of food in the Southeastern nations. The economies of Cambodia, Thailand, Myanmar, Laos, and southern Vietnam are heavily dependent on the Mekong River fish.

The shortage of fish has created a situation like a food crisis in these countries. On the other hand, hundreds of people die every year due to the consumption of polluted water and infected aquatic animals from these rivers.

Pollution and waste from the Gyama Copper Polymetallic mine has poisoned the water flowing adjacent to the city of Lhasa. This has affected the health of thousands of local Tibetans in Lhundup County.

China's 'Dumping Ground'

Another problem is the contamination of soil. During lithium extraction, several chemicals come into contact with soil. Rivers and floods further aid this contaminated soil to reach agricultural fields, affecting the growth of crops. Apart from poisoning the nearby surface water, it also has severe effects on the groundwater.

In many cases, mine workers and surrounding inhabitants have been seriously affected and later diagnosed with various medical implications. Some have even died due to leaks of these chemicals and gases. In many parts of the Tibetan Plateau, hundred acres of vegetation and agricultural land have been impacted, further complicating the food security issues in the region.

China has made false promises at platforms like the Conference of Parties (CoP) summits and other environmental protection summits. Little has been achieved in maintaining ecological biospheres around Tibet.

On the contrary, Tibet has become a dumping ground for Beijing. Glaciers are melting, tens and hundreds of small rivers and streams have dried up, the air is polluted, and floods have become normal occurrences. Many critically endangered species are on the verge of extinction. The "roof of the world" is going through the biggest turbulence while Beijing is busy extracting "white gold."

Inside the exquisite Tibetan monasteries salvaged from climate change

01 May 2024, BBC, Tulsi Rauniyar

Extreme weather is threatening these intricate 14th Century Tibetan monasteries, but local people are rising to the challenge to preserve them.

Tashi Kunga stands before the Kag Choede monastery, built into the Dhaulagiri mountain range on the Tibet-Nepal border. The monk's carmine robes glint in the rain, as he recounts the ancient legend of Guru Rinpoche's battle with a demon.

The legend goes that centuries ago, a demon wreaked havoc on a monastery in Tibet. Guru Rinpoche chased it south to Upper Mustang in Nepal and defeated the demon following a ferocious battle, burying the demon's remains across the mountain range.

The

Lo Manthang's climate-ravaged monasteries have been meticulously restored by the local community (Credit: Tulsi Rauniyar) people of Mustang honoured the sacred grounds by building monasteries atop the demon's body parts.

"And right on the demon's heart, the capital of Lo Manthang [was built] in 1380," says Kunga, pointing towards the narrow alleys, ancient monasteries, and flat roofs adorned with prayer flags of one of the last medieval walled cities in the world.

For centuries, Lobas, the indigenous people residing here, have thrived in this remote region situated on top of the Tibetan Plateau. One thing that has remained constant is the monasteries, locally known as "Gonpas", the most treasured heritage of the region. But almost two decades ago, many of these monasteries, which date back to the 14th Century, started crumbling.

The ancient monasteries of Mustang, Nepal, have started crumbling due to climate impacts (Credit: Tulsi Rauniyar)

Experts sounded the alarm, attributing the collapse to the severe impacts of climate change. Data indicates a significant increase in the intensity of storms and rainfall across the region. Increased rainfall saturates the rammed-earth buildings, as moisture in the soil is drawn upward into the walls, leading to issues such as leaking roofs and rising damp.

"For us, Buddhists, the paintings and the artifacts in the monasteries are embodiments of the gods themselves, and we can't worship a half-damaged idol," says Kanga. "There was no one to repair it. Our heritage was slowly decaying away. We thought the deities were angry."

Buddhist monasteries have long been revered as the foundation of Tibetan culture, serving as a vital hub for the creation and safeguarding of both tangible artifacts and profound intellectual traditions. But as unprecedented weather patterns pose a threat to their cultural heritage, local community members have stepped up to restore them. Local people have gained diverse skills, from reinforcing walls to crafting metal statues and restoring paintings.

Over the past 20 years, a team of local Lobas trained by Western art conservationists have replaced the old, leaky roofs of the temples with round timbers, river stones, and local clay for waterproofing, and have restored the wall paintings, statues, sculpted pillars and the ceiling decorations, giving these centuries-old monuments a new life.

Luigi Fiegini, the lead art conservator at Lo Manthang, has spearheaded the restoration project. Transforming a community of farmers into conservators has been challenging, he says. Most of the Lobas had never held a pen or a paint brush before, and undertook extensive training before they began restoring the 15th Century paintings.

"But it all worked out," says Fiegini. "Tourists visiting Mustang were keenly interested in religion. So we felt these sacred artifacts needed preservation not only for their historical significance but also for sustaining livelihoods here."

The team, initially made up of 10 members, has grown to 45 conservators, mostly women, although there was initial reluctance to accept any women in the group. According to local tradition, women are prohibited from touching sacred objects. However, women did eventually take part in the Lo Manthang restoration project.

"It took years of discussion and negotiation with the local clergy and community, but we succeeded in including local women in the wall-painting conservation team," says Fiegini.

Married Tibetan women are typically responsible for cooking, cleaning, milking the animals, churning the butter and collecting yak dung for fuel. Tashi Wangmo, 40, used to spend her time herding yak, collecting and selling herbs, and doing various odd jobs, but it never provided much income. When she received the opportunity to pursue new training and earn a daily wage in the restoration project, she jumped at it.

"It enabled many of us [women] to break free from the limits of our homes, expand our skillsets, and find new opportunities," she says. "Otherwise, life remains stagnant for us, confined to the corners with little purpose or prospects."

Another female restorer Dolma Tsering, 42, wasn't there just to learn art or refine her painting skills. She believed that by participating in the monastery's restoration, she would earn spiritual merit and contribute to the promotion of Tibetan Buddhism through her work.

"Once you compare the faded, scraped-off outlines of deities and the vibrant expressions of revived figures, you will recognise the incredible scale of everyone's efforts. It has increased the cultural value of Lo Manthang," says Tsering. "And as women, we were able to play [a role] in it."

But the community continues to face challenges amid the onslaught of climate change. The Himalayas are particularly vulnerable to rising temperatures and climate impacts. When rainfall comes, it pours in abundance, but prolonged drought is also common. In 2023, heavy rainfall flooded many small rivers and brooks in Mustang, leading to widespread flood damage in neighbouring villages.

The roads facilitating easy transport in the region have also contributed to rapid population decline, with many Lobas moving to cities in search of economic opportunities, says Gurung.

Tashi Gurung stands out as a prime example of a farmer-turned-restorer who chose to remain in the region. He wasn't exposed to Tibetan Buddhist art as a child, but today he owns an art gallery in Lo Manthang.

His gallery showcases a remarkable array of thangkas, portraying the Buddha, his teachings, and various deities and other spiritual beings such as the bodhisattvas. His art sales not only sustain himself but also enable him to send his children to school.

Reflecting on his decision to stay, Gurung acknowledges the profound impact of monasteries on his life. "If it weren't for the monasteries, I might have followed my friends who left Mustang for better opportunities abroad," he says.

The restoration efforts have sparked a cultural renaissance, according to Fiegini. Numerous women and young people have received training in traditional craftsmanship, long-forgotten festivals have been revived, magnificent wall paintings restored for religious purposes, and monasteries and nunneries are thriving once again, he says.

"Om mani padme hum," the students at the Lo Monastic School chant the mantra that Tibetans use to invoke the bodhisattva of compassion, who is also Tibet's patron saint. Today, Kunga says, the danger imperilling the walled city of Lo Manthang and its age-old monasteries doesn't stem from mythological demons, but rather from the impacts of climate change.

"If we want to save our culture, we all need to join hands and save the monasteries because everything here spins around religion," says Tsering.

Wildfire destroys prized mushrooms, income source for Tibetans

13 April 2024, Tenzin Pema, Dorjee Damdul and Sonam Lhamo, RFA

A recent wildfire in a Tibetan-populated area of China's Sichuan province ravaged vast swathes of forests covered with pine and oak trees that nurtured a hidden treasure and an economic lifeline for residents – matsutake mushrooms.

The wildfire that broke out in March in Nyagchu county, or Yajiang in Chinese, in Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, forced 3,000 people from the traditional Kham region of Tibet to evacuate the area and burned down several houses. No human casualties have been reported.

But the fire destroyed about one-sixth of the county's matsutake output, Chen Wen, director of the Yajiang Matsutake Industrial Park, told Chinese media.

The mushrooms, which Tibetans gather to supplement their income and others use in dishes in Japan, South Korea and China, may not grow again in the burned area for at least 20 years, he said.

China is the world's largest producer and exporter of matsutake mushrooms, exporting US$30.3 million in 2022, while Japan is the top importer, bringing in US$24.7 million that year.

The primary places where the mushrooms grow in China are within the Tibetan plateau, including in Nyagchu county, which accounted for more than 12% of China's annual output, according to the Yajiang County Agriculture and Animal Husbandry Science and Technology Bureau.

A Tibetan forages for matsutake mushrooms in an undated photo.

Demanding and lucrative

Many families in Nyagchu – where Tibetans make up the majority of the county's population of over 51,000 – have for years braved the frigid mountain air to forage for the elusive mushrooms during the traditional harvest season between July and September.

Foraging matsutake is a demanding if lucrative job with harvesters often spending weeks at high altitudes in harsh weather conditions to search for the mushrooms, said an area resident. Some varieties are rare and require meticulous searching, while others grow underground and require careful removal, he said.

"In one day, you can make more than 2,000 yuan (US$300) during the harvesting season," said a source inside Tibet who requested anonymity for fear of reprisal.

Residents believe that the impact of the fire may force some Tibetans to abandon matsutake harvesting and seek alternative sources of income in other areas.

But at a recent press conference on the impact of the wildfire, Sichuan provincial representatives did not mention the disaster's potential effects on the livelihoods of Tibetans who rely on matsutake harvesting.

The fire also damaged the local ecosystem, killing birds and insects that play a role in the growth of the mushrooms, said an area resident, adding that the long-term ecological consequences of the blaze remain unclear.

"Nyagchu is renowned for its abundance of naturally grown matsutake, and the harvest is a crucial source of income for many Tibetan families in the county," said Washington-based Tsering Palden, a native of Nyagchu, who has sold the mushrooms in the past. Palden estimates that area households earn about 200,000 yuan (US$28,000) annually from selling the mushrooms.

'Oak mushrooms'

In Tibet, matsutake mushrooms are most commonly referred to as "oak mushrooms," or beshing shamo and besha for short in Tibetan, in a nod to their symbiotic relationship with evergreen oak trees in Tibet.

In his 2022 book "What a Mushroom Lives for: Matsutake and the Worlds They Make," Michael Hathaway, professor of anthropology at Simon Fraser University in Vancouver, Canada, describes how Tibetan villagers in Yunnan province hunt for them.

The villagers gather the mushrooms in the morning and return home when dealers arrive at a market or drive along the roads, buying them as they go, he writes. The dealers then sell their matsutake to other dealers, who arrange for them to be shipped across China and to Japan and South Korea.

The price of matsutake mushrooms had jumped over the past 40 years from the equivalent of about US$1 per pound (2.2 kg) in 1985 to US$70 per pound, according to Beijing-based Tibetan writer and poet Tsering Woesser.

The mushrooms have specific environmental requirements for growth and thrive in undisturbed, high-altitude forests with the right balance of sunlight and moisture, said the source inside Tibet.

"The fire has disrupted these conditions and may take years for the ecosystem to recover sufficiently to support matsutake growth," he added.

Earthquake of magnitude 5.5 strikes Tibet, says GFZ

13 April 2024, Reuters

An earthquake of magnitude 5.5 struck Tibet in western China on Saturday, the German Research Centre for Geosciences (GFZ) said.

The quake was at a depth of 10 km (6.2 miles), said GFZ, which initially recorded the magnitude at 5.7.

China, which seized control of Tibet in 1950, calls the region Xizang.

China's new gold deposit discovery in Qinghai, with 346 mining sites, is worth over $20 billion

09 April 2024, Tibetan Review

The occupied territories of East Turkestan (Xinjiang) and Tibet have yielded for the Communist Party of China state enormous, world-class deposits of oil, gas, and all sorts of minerals, including gold, lithium, copper, iron, and rare earth minerals. Most recently, Chinese researchers have announced a new gold discovery on the north and south edges of the Qaidam Basin in Qinghai Province, which constitutes the bulk of Tibet's historical northeastern province of Amdo (or Domey), with an additional 43.2 tons of gold resources.

The discovery marks a significant breakthrough in the area's gold exploration and its potential for forming a world-class gold deposit, reported China's official globaltimes.cn Apr 8.

The new gold discovery has an estimated value of more than 20 billion yuan ($2.77 billion), the report said citing the Science of Technology Department of Qinghai Province.

Exploitation will begin at once as China expects more deposit discoveries. As the latest achievement in the province's large-scale resource exploration project, the discovery reveals for the first time the deep-seated gold enrichment zone in the area, which is poised for immediate exploitation and boost local employment, the report said.

The discovery is part of the Tanjianshan Gold Mine and the Wulonggou Gold Mine, which are notable large-scale gold deposits in Qinghai Province, serving as sites that integrate research, exploration, and development, the report said.

Highlighting the Qaidam Basin's reputation as China's "Treasure Bowl", the report said the Qaidam Basin stands as one of China's significant hubs for energy and mineral resources.

The new finding revealed Qinghai Province's first discovery of a secondary ore enrichment zone in large gold mines, indicating the area's potential for forming a world-class gold deposit, set to benefit mining businesses, boosting their production capacities and local employment, the report said, citing chinanews.com.cn.

As a prominent province boasting a concentration of vital mineral resources, Qinghai has established 346 gold mining sites, with the largest Dachang Gold Mine located in Yushu Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, holding reserves equal to 108.63 tons, the report added.

This fungus that turns caterpillars into zombies is more expensive than gold. And it might go extinct because of it

09 April 2024, ZME Science

The Tibetan Plateau in the Himalayas is home to a fungus (Ophiocordyceps sinensis) that turns caterpillars into zombies. It's part of the same Cordyceps fungal group that inspired the video game and later the HBO series The Last of Us. The caterpillar fungus is believed to be an aphrodisiac and is known as yartsa gunbu by locals.

Describing its aphrodisiacal properties, ancient Tibetan texts mention that men who consume yartsa are promised "the delights of thousands of beautiful women." Others boast about the caterpillar fungus' benefits to the immune system, using it to treat coughs and "strengthening the lungs".

A dried sample of the ophiocordyceps sinensis, more commonly called the caterpillar fungus. Credit: David Wong

No scientific evidence has validated these claims thus far. Still, yartsa is in such high demand in some parts of the world that it is sold at a higher price than gold. For instance, a report from NPR reveals that people buy yartsa for as high as $2,000 per ounce in China where the fungus is also considered a status symbol.

"[Caterpillar fungus is] more likely to be found in a luxury shopping mall than a pharmacy. The perceived value of the resource is now so high that it's a fashionable gift or party favor among China's elite," according to a report from National Geographic.

The growth and harvesting of yartsa gunbu

The English translation of yartsa gunbu is "winter worm summer grass," to describe how the winter caterpillar becomes grass in summer.

During the summer season, the ghost moth caterpillars hibernate underground. This is when the airborne spores of O. sinensis invade their bodies, compelling them to climb upwards towards the soil's surface, where the fungus then kills and consumes them.

The fungus manipulates the insect's brain chemistry, forcing it to ascend to a height that optimizes the fungus's growth conditions and spore distribution. Once above ground, the caterpillar dies and appears mummified because its exoskeleton turns pale. With the arrival of the spring season, the fungus begins to come out of the heads of the dead caterpillars in the form of a long stalk.

This mind control ensures the fungus's life cycle continues. But for the locals of the Tibetan Plateau, this is just another harvesting season.

Once its stalk is visible on the ground, the world's most expensive fungus is ready for harvesting. Many households in the Tibetan Plateau depend on earnings from harvesting this fungus, sometimes known as the 'Viagra of the Himalayas'.

Geoff Childs and Namgyal Choedup, two researchers from Washington University in St. Louis (WUSTL) published a study in 2014 highlighting the sizable role yartsa plays in the Tibetan economy. Their research showed the good, bad, and ugly side of yartsa gunbu harvesting.

"With an eight-fold increase in value from ¥4,800 (~$32) to ¥40,000 (~$260) per pound yartsa gunbu has become the mainstay of household economies across the Tibetan Plateau. It fills an economic void in Tibetan areas of China that state-sponsored development projects, which tend to focus on infrastructure, do not always satisfy," the study authors note.

"Tibetans are using the cash to improve their standard of living, and in some cases are reducing dependency on agro-pastoral activities by becoming entrepreneurs. Profits pay for everything from school supplies and DVDs to solar panels and gold jewelry," they added.

However, it's not just Tibetans. Yartsa gunbu has also brought prosperity to people living in the Himalayan villages of Nepal, India, and Bhutan.

The dark side of caterpillar fungi

Unfortunately, the high economic value of yartsa has also led to violent conflicts in the Tibetan Plateau. For instance, in 2014, a clash between two groups in Tibet over access to yartsa gunbu harvesting resulted in two deaths. And this was just one of the many disputes in the region that revolve around the caterpillar fungus.

Harvester cleaning the caterpillar fungus. Image credits: Geoff Childs, 2012

"Earlier, we only had village meetings once or twice a year. Nowadays there are frequent meetings with more arguments between people, and more squabbles. People are becoming selfish," a local man told Childs and Choedup.

Moreover, people are overexploiting the Himalayan grasslands for yartsa, which is accelerating the loss of the only habitat where the fungus grows.

Ophiocordyceps sinensis is already an endangered species. If the situation continues like this, it may soon go extinct. A study published in 2018 warned that overharvesting and climate change are causing the demise of the fungus.

"A collapse of the caterpillar fungus system under ongoing warming and high collection pressure would have serious implications throughout the Himalayan region," the authors noted.

However, despite all these negative developments, there is still some hope. In their study, Child and Choedup also reveal the story of two Himalayan villages where people have devised strategies to achieve peaceful and sustainable harvesting of the caterpillar fungus.

Sustainable ways to harvest yartsa

The senior leaders in Nubri (a village in the highlands of Nepal) have developed a system that protects their yartsa. This system is based on religious and local beliefs that ensure stable income for all families in the village. By extension, it also prevents overexploitation of the caterpillar fungus.

Village leaders are central to the process. Each year, they decide on a date on which people are allowed to begin harvesting yartsa. From that date to the end of the harvesting season, each harvester must meet the leaders in person every week.

No villager is allowed to harvest before or after the scheduled harvesting season. If an individual violates this rule, they're heavily fined. Since the harvesting area is far from the village, a person can't harvest more than their quota and meet the leaders on the same day.

This system provides everyone an equal opportunity to collect the caterpillar fungus. The harvesters are also liable to pay taxes, and the funds are spent on development activities in the village.

Plus, the fungus is only harvested for a brief period. So yartsa and its natural environment have a whole year to recover from any loss incurred due to harvesting.

Moreover, Nubri people are prohibited from harvesting in certain sacred regions because of their religious beliefs. Such undisturbed areas become natural havens for O. sinensis spores.

However, Nubri isn't the only village that has a sustainable yartsa harvesting system. People in the Tsum Valley of Nepal also follow a similar strategy with some changes. For instance, every individual born in the valley has an equal right to collect yartsa. However, any outsiders, including tourists and men who were not born in Tsum but settled here after marriage are prohibited from harvesting.

This prevents conflicts and overexploitation of yartsa, enabling the locals to keep their sacred natural resources protected and under their control.

The harvesters in Tsum also have to pay taxes. However, this money is used not only for building basic infrastructure in the village. It also goes towards constructing lodges that cater to foreign tourists, creating an additional income stream for the locals.

"In the case of Nubri and Tsum, management practices that were devised independent of state interference may prove to be sustainable over the long run," Child and Choedup said.

The study has been published in The Journal of the Association for Nepal and Himalayan Studies.

The disappearing glaciers of the Himalayas

03 April 2024, Omair Ahmad, Kashmir Convener

As the Earth warms, frozen water in its many forms is affected. In mountainous regions like the Hindu Kush

Himalayas, one of the most visible signs of climate change is the impact on glaciers.

In the Hindu Kush Himalayan region – which includes the mountain ranges of the Pamirs, the Tien Shan and the Tibetan Plateau – the cryosphere is a vital source of freshwater. Approximately 2 billion people rely on the rivers that flow from these mountain ranges, with more than 240 million people living in the mountain areas. As well as providing a water supply for humans, livestock and wildlife in the region, freshwater originating in the cryosphere is essential for agriculture, hydropower, inland navigation, and spiritual and cultural uses.

While water flow is determined by a host of factors – including rainfall, groundwater and springs – the presence of the cryosphere has led to stable water flows across the Hindu Kush Himalayan region. But as the frozen water in glaciers, snow and permafrost is now melting at unprecedented rates, these flows are changing.

The Himalayan glaciers are receding

Glacier loss is difficult to project over the whole of the Hindu Kush Himalayas. Rates of glacial melt depend on a number of variables, including elevation and elevation-dependent temperature, precipitation and debris cover, among others.

On the whole, glaciers across the Hindu Kush Himalayas have lost mass since the 1970s. Unfortunately, given political sensitivities in the region, much satellite photography from before 2000 remains classified, and high-altitude field-based surveys are difficult. Nevertheless, the data that has emerged in recent years allows scientists to make general predictions for the region.

In the near term, by 2030, glaciers in the Hindu Kush Himalayan region are expected to lose between 10-30% of their mass. By 2050, this figure is expected to increase to 25-35%. In the long term, by 2080-2100, glacial mass loss is predicted to reach 35% in the Karakoram, 45% in the Pamir mountains, and as high as 60-95% in the eastern Himalayas if world governments fail to implement aggressive emissions-reduction policies. All of these figures are based on a moderate emissions scenario (RCP 4.5). Given different emissions scenarios and modelling methods, there is significant variation between longer-term projections.

There are thousands of glaciers in the Hindu Kush Himalayan region, and there will be anomalies in terms of glacial melt. The glaciers in the eastern part of the region are at a lower elevation on the whole than those in the western part, leaving them relatively more vulnerable to melting. In the Karakoram region, which hosts a number of high-altitude glaciers, there have even been some glacial surges, leading to discussion of a "Karakoram Anomaly".

The Himalayan region is warming faster than the global average

The Hindu Kush Himalayan region has the largest concentration of frozen water on Earth after the North Pole and South Pole, hence it is referred to as “the third pole”. Like the Arctic and part of Antarctica, the Hindu Kush Himalayan region is warming faster than the global average, and for similar reasons.

As ice cover melts, it exposes larger areas to solar radiation, thus allowing greater absorption of heat. Since ice reflects light, as the ground is increasingly exposed this leads to greater heating. The fact that many glaciers in the HKH region are covered with debris means this effect is less pronounced than in areas like the Arctic. Greater detail on exactly how and why this is happening can be found in the third chapter of the HKH Assessment conducted by the International Centre for Integrated Mountain Development (ICIMOD).

Unfortunately, the glaciers of the Hindu Kush Himalayas are facing another problem: black carbon. This is essentially soot from fires in the surrounding lowlands which rises in the air and settles on glaciers. Because of its dark colour, black carbon absorbs solar radiation faster. Black carbon and other short-lived climate pollutants – such as dust and aerosols – are produced by a range of human activities, including biomass burning, brick factories, and coal-based electricity plants. Not only do they darken the glaciers, these pollutants can also lead to warming of the air mass, leading to higher temperatures around the cryosphere and melting of its ice.

What happens when glaciers melt rapidly?

It is difficult to speculate how exactly the melting of the third pole’s glaciers will impact water flow and availability across the regions that depend on Himalayan rivers. This is because multiple factors influence water flow, including the stability of monsoons that are responsible for precipitation – both rain and snow – in the region.

One effect that can be predicted is an increase in glacial lake outburst floods (GLOFs).

While it is very difficult to predict individual GLOFs, it is clear that their frequency will go up as the climate warms. Since the 1990s, glacial lakes across the Hindu Kush Himalayan region have increased in both number and size. Given the regional disparity in elevation, the greatest increase has been in the eastern and central sections of the Hindu Kush Himalayas.

GLOFs can be devastating, as the resulting flash floods can devastate downstream habitations with little warning. Given the number of hydropower projects in the region, GLOFs can also pose a risk to long-term infrastructure such as dams.

The permafrost is melting

Not all frozen water in the Hindu Kush Himalayas is in the form of glaciers. Glaciers are often referred to as rivers of ice, as they are large frozen volumes of water that slowly flow. Where there is less flow, but the temperature remains below freezing, ice accumulates in the ground as permafrost. As a general rule of thumb, humid areas have more glaciers while arid areas have more permafrost. In the Hindu Kush Himalayan region, permafrost is found across around 1,000,000 square kilometres, whereas glaciers occur across around 90,000 square kilometres.

Within the Hindu Kush Himalayan region, study of the permafrost has been largely restricted to the Tibetan Plateau, beginning in the 1990s. Little research has been carried out in the rest of the region. The research on the Tibetan Plateau shows that the active layer of permafrost is thickening as the permafrost melts. This makes the ground less stable, leading to higher risk of landslides.

Policy recommendations

Three main policy recommendations emerge out of the latest, most detailed survey of the cryosphere in the Hindu Kush Himalayan region (the HKH Assessment) as part of the Hindu Kush Himalayan Monitoring and Assessment Programme conducted by the International Centre for Integrated Mountain Development (ICIMOD). First and foremost, the world must focus on lowering carbon emissions. The challenges of managing the cryosphere will only increase if the world warms at a faster rate. Second, the HKH Assessment recommends the expansion of observation networks and data-sharing agreements across the extended HKH region. Third, improvements in research and observation should be used to anticipate disasters such as GLOFs and avalanches, and put processes in place to minimise their impacts.

The data in this explainer is based on the HKH Assessment report. Any errors of interpretation are the author’s. Omair Ahmad is managing editor for South Asia at The Third Pole. He has worked as a political analyst and journalist, with a particular focus on the Himalayan region. He is the author of a political history of Bhutan, and a few novels. This article was originally published on The Third Pole under the Creative Commons BY NC ND licence.

Half-Stopped Factories Become Norm in Chinese Lithium Battery Industry

01 April 2024, East Money

Shanghai-based Chinese financial news site East Money recently reported that, “as the period of frenzied investment has passed, the Chinese lithium battery industry has been shrouded in the shadow of overcapacity and price wars. .. After the Chinese New Year, which is often the peak period for job hunting and employment, many battery companies reported suspensions of production, layoffs, and salary cuts." Below are some translated excerpts from the article.

The oversupply situation in the lithium battery industry has been reflected in all aspects of the entire supply chain. Some sources told the reporters that, in the new energy industry chain from top to bottom, no orders and half-stopped factories have become the norm. "The bosses themselves are looking to find a more stable job." Starting this year, even large companies are in danger. Other than the two "super players," CATL and BYD, the question is: how many battery companies can survive past spring?

The turning point for the lithium battery industry's sharp decline occurred in the fourth quarter of 2022. The trigger was that the sales growth rate of new energy vehicles began to slow down significantly, which was not expected by the industry. Because of this, since 2023, the battery industry has fought a fierce price war, and capacity utilization has further declined as well. Even for CATL, its 2021 manufacturing capacity utilization rate was as high as 95 percent, dropped to 83.4 percent in 2022, and further dropped to 70.47 percent in 2023, which is still much higher than the industry average capacity utilization rate – around 41.8 percent.

Right now, the lithium battery industry is still facing the challenge brought by the worsen high EV inventories as the result of the rapid expansion of new energy vehicles. In the meantime, the battery inventory of the energy storage industry is piling up too. No one knows when the lithium battery industry will emerge from the bottom. A new round of elimination in the market seems to be just starting.

March

Now China donates 1,500 tonnes of Tibet glacial water to Maldives amidst water crisis

27 March 2024, The Economic Times

In a bid to alleviate the acute water shortage in the Maldives, the government of China has donated 1,500 tonnes of drinking water sourced from glaciers in Tibet. This donation comes as part of China's ongoing support to the Maldives, especially since President Dr Mohamed Muizzu took office in November 2023.

The announcement was made by the Maldives government, stating that the drinking water shipment has successfully reached the archipelago nation. This decision was a result of discussions during the official visit of China's Tibet Autonomous Region's Chairman, Yan Jinhai, to the Maldives, where he met with President Dr Mohamed Muizzu last November, as confirmed by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

The donated water is produced from frozen water sourced from glacial regions, known for its cleanliness, clarity, and mineral richness. Tibet Autonomous Region is renowned for producing high-quality premium brands of water, further enhancing the value of this donation.

This is not the first instance of China's aid to the Maldives. In March, President Muizzu announced that the Maldives would receive free "non-lethal" military equipment and training from China's military under a newly signed agreement. This agreement followed President Muizzu's meetings with Major General Zhang Baoqun, Deputy Director of the Office for International Military Cooperation of China, and President of the Export-Import Bank of China, Ren Shengjun.

China's assistance to the Maldives has historically focused on urban and economic development. The Maldives, with its 26 atolls and 1,192 islands mostly composed of coral reefs and sandbars, faces extreme scarcity of groundwater and freshwater, exacerbated by climate change.

In December 2014, India conducted 'Operation Neer' during a severe water crisis in the Maldives following a massive fire in the Male Water and Sewerage Company complex. Indian aircraft delivered 375 tonnes of drinking water, and two Indian ships, INS Deepak and INS Shukanya, delivered around 2,000 tonnes of water, providing much-needed relief to the Maldivians.

"Two Indian Ships INS Deepak and INS Shukanya also arrived in Male and delivered around 2,000 tonnes of water alleviating the pressure faced by the Maldivians," it added.

The Maldives' strategic location, just 70 nautical miles from the island of Minicoy in Lakshadweep and 300 nautical miles from the mainland's western coast, gives it significant importance in the Indian Ocean Region's commercial sea lanes.

The Maldives Foreign Ministry has announced its plan to distribute the donated water as aid to various islands in the event of drinking water shortages, demonstrating China's continued support to the Maldives in times of need.

Most eastern Tibet dam protesters reported released, endured severe ill-treatment, beating

26 March 2024, Tibetan Review

Hundreds of remaining monks and other Tibetans detained by Chinese police in Feb 2024 for gathering to protest and petition against a major hydroelectric power dam complex being built in

Dege County of Kardze prefecture, Sichuan province, have been released. However, they have handed over two of them, still under arrest, for prosecution, while younger monks have been transferred to government-run schools, reported the Tibetan service of rfa.org Mar 25.

Tenzin Sangpo, senior administrator of the local Wonto Monastery, and a village official named Tenzin, arrested on Feb 23, are suspected of having led the protests last month against the Gangtuo Dam project, the report said.

They were among the several detained Tibetans previously reported to have been transferred to the larger, Dege County Detention Centre.

Sangpo and Tenzin have now been handed over to the government Procuratorate Office for criminal investigation and prosecution, the report cited local sources as saying, requesting anonymity for safety reasons.

However, their whereabouts, or the charges against them remain unknown.

"The local Tibetan people are worried that the government will accuse them of having instigated the February protests and being responsible for sharing information with the outside world," the report quoted one source as saying.

The report also said the released Tibetans had been subjected to severe ill-treatment and brutal beatings, which left some of them handicapped and hospitalized.

They were crammed into crowded cells and subjected to physical abuses and beatings.

The report cited a released monk as having said the detainees were fed such poor quality tsampa (roasted barley flour, a staple Tibetan diet) as to be fit only as animal feed.

"Some days, we were not given any water to drink," the monk has said. "On other days, when there was water, we were given very little."

He has said the Chinese police slapped the monks and made them run around the prison grounds as a form of punishment, and to have beaten them severely if they refused to do so.

"One monk was beaten so badly that he could not even speak," he has said. "He is now under medical treatment."

Besides, during interrogation, the Tibetans were pressured to incriminate each other, thereby traumatizing them emotionally, the report cited other local sources as say.

Meanwhile, villages and monasteries on both sides of the Drichu (Chinese: Jinsha) river have continued to be under close surveillance, with no outsiders being allowed to enter the township.

All the more than 50 younger monks of Wonto Monastery have been dispatched to the county government school after the protests, the report said.

Wonto and nearby Yena Monastery together had around 300 monks before the dam protest crackdowns.

The Gangtuo Dam is part of a plan announced in 2012 by China's National Development and Reform Commission to build a massive 13-tier hydropower complex on the Drichu. The total planned capacity of the project is 13,920 megawatts.

The project will submerge the ancestrally inhabited homes of around 2,000 Tibetans as well as centuries-old monasteries with priceless artefacts, including murals, dating back to the 13th century.

Nearly 3400 villagers evacuated as forest fire rages in eastern Tibet

17 March 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Mar17'24) — Nearly 3,400 Tibetans from a number of villages have been evacuated and more than 1200 firefighters deployed to fight a raging forest fire which started on Mar 15 evening in the eastern Tibetan County of Nyagchu (or Nyagchukha, Chinese: Yajiang) in Kardze (Ganzi or Garze) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Sichuan province, according to China's official media and other reports Mar 16-17. The fire soon spread to form three fire fields from south to north, reported the Chinese language chinanews.com.cn Mar 17. No damages to property, infrastructure, or human life have been reported so far.

The fire was reported to have broken out at around 17:00 on the 15th in Baizi Village in Nyagchu county's Golog (Xiala or Xi'eluo) Town. By about 15:00 on the 16th, the fire quickly expanded and spread due to sudden increase in wind power at the fire site.

The report continued that at 4 o'clock on the 17th, the Sichuan Forest Fire Corps and local professional fire-fighting teams approached the fire from the southwest and northeast sides of the fire to open a breakthrough, and put out open flames.

The report said that the three fire fields currently formed were at an average altitude of 2,600 metres, with the vegetation dominated by green hills and pine trees.

The Chinese language report continued: "Among them, the No. 1 fire site is located in the southwest of Yajiang County. There is a continuous fire line on the north and west lines of the fire site, developing toward the northwest; the No. 2 fire site is located at the northernmost side, has spread to Tongda Village in the east, and continues to develop in the northeast direction, which is the key direction of fire development; Fire Site No. 3 is located on the northwest side of Yajiang County, with continuous fire lines spreading."

A Level-4 emergency response has been activated by China's Ministry of Emergency Management, over 1200 firefighters from national and local fire rescue squads deployed, and eight helicopters mobilized to fight the fire as it quickly spread over multiple mountain ridges, said the chinanews.com.cn, the official Xinhua news agency, and scmp.com reports Mar 16-17.

So far, no casualties have been reported. The cause of the fire is still under investigation. The Lianghekou hydropower station in Yajiang is also unaffected, according to a Xinhua report Mar 17.

The scmp.com Mar 17 cited China's official CCTV broadcaster as saying a total of 3,396 villagers from a dozen villages have been safely evacuated. A photovoltaic power station in the region had not been affected, but communication with the hydroelectric station had been interrupted. Besides, a section of a highway that passes through the region has been temporarily closed, the report said, citing Xinhua.

The report cited a resident of provincial capital Chengdu, located 500km (311 miles) from the site, as saying the wildfires turned the sky orange on Mar 16.

"The sky suddenly turned frighteningly orange in Chengdu. It felt like an apocalyptic disaster movie," the city resident has said, declining to be named.

On the other hand, a Xinhua report March 17 cited local residents as saying the fire was not visible from the county seat and that water, electricity, and communication services had remained unaffected.

New study reveals plateau's evapotranspiration changes

17 March 2024, China Daily

Aerial photo shows the scenery at Mt Nyanpo Yutse in Tibetan autonomous prefecture of Golog of Northwest China's Qinghai province. Qinghai province, located in Northwest China, much of which lies on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, is the home to the headwaters of the Yangtze, Yellow and Lancang rivers. [Photo/Xinhua]

A recently published study has pointed to the growing trend of evapotranspiration over the past four decades on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau.

The study, led by Ma Yaoming, a researcher at the Chinese Academy of Sciences' Institute of Tibetan Plateau Research, offers a profound understanding of the water balance and climate impact in this ecologically significant area.

The research, based on data collected from 1982 to 2018, which was recently published in the journal Earth System Science Data, has revealed that the annual average evapotranspiration on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau over the past four decades stands at approximately 346.5 millimeters, equivalent to 930 billion metric tons of water transferred to the atmosphere annually from the plateau.

Evapotranspiration is the process in which water is transferred from the land to the atmosphere by evaporation from the soil and other surfaces, as well as by transpiration from plants.

Ma highlighted the pivotal role of evapotranspiration in the region's water balance, particularly given the prevalence of alpine meadows and the dominant arid or semiarid climate on the plateau.

Chen Xuelong, another co-corresponding author and researcher from the institute, emphasized the significance of the findings.

"The research not only confirmed an increasing trend in annual evapotranspiration, at approximately 0.96 millimeters per year, attributed to the warming and humidifying climate of the plateau, but also identified soil evaporation as the primary contributor, constituting over 84 percent of the total evapotranspiration," said Chen.

The implications of the study are far-reaching, with the data holding a pivotal value for water resource management, drought monitoring and ecological environment research and analysis, Chen said.

The research represents a monumental step forward in understanding the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau's hydro-meteorological dynamics and also underscores the critical role of evapotranspiration in shaping the region's ecological and climatic landscape.

The plateau boasts the world's highest inland lake cluster. With global warming, lakes expanded and ice periods were shortened, and the growing trend in evapotranspiration was clearly observed, according to a previous research essay by Ma.

As a result, the water cycle process has significantly accelerated, manifested by increased precipitation, with the melting of glaciers and snow and the thickening of the active layer of permafrost, and this leads to frequent natural disasters such as ice avalanches, glacier lake outbursts, river floods and mud slides, which could affect people's life and economic activities, Ma said in the essay, calling for effective measures, including strengthening the comprehensive observation and tests on multilayered land-atmosphere interactions.

Ma said the recent study highlighted the importance of shallow soil water in the intricate water and heat exchange processes between the ground and the atmosphere.

The findings of the recent research have been made publicly available through the National Tibetan Plateau Data Center and the Science Data Bank, providing a crucial resource for further scientific inquiry and policy development.

Tibetans demand China halt Derge dam work

16 March 2024, RTV

The Tibetan community in the region has demanded that the Chinese government stop the construction of a hydroelectric dam on the Dri Chu river in Derge town in Dege County in Sichuan in Southwest China. The Tibetan community in the region has demanded that the Chinese government stop the construction of a hydroelectric dam on the Dri Chu river in Derge town in Dege County in Sichuan in Southwest China. According to Tibetan leader Jamyang Bhutia, the chairman of the Regional Tibetan Youth Congress in Mirik in Darjeeling, over 1000 Tibetans were arrested in one day in Derge as there were unprecedented protests against the construction of the dam very recently. Bhutia said that the proposed Gangtuo hydropower station would force the displacement of thousands of people living in the area.

"The proposed dam would also cause significant environmental harm and destroy six monasteries, including the Wonto monastery founded in the 14th century, which has one of the finest examples of Tibetan, Buddhist murals, and is a great historical and cultural significance," Mr Bhutia said on the sidelines of a peace rally in Siliguri the community organised a few days ago to mark the 65th anniversary of the Tibetan people's uprising against China's occupation in Tibet in 1959.

People from the Tibetan community came in from the northeast zone, including nearby places like Darjeeling, Kalimpong, Mirik, Odlabari in the Dooars, Gangtok in Sikkim and Salugara in Siliguri, marched in the peaceful protest rally that started from Salugara and ended at Biswadeep hall on Hill Cart Road in Siliguri.

The protestors strongly condemned the "brutal crackdown" and urged the international community to call upon China to free the protesters and halt the construction of the dam.

"Tibet remains an occupied territory under tight military surveillance. Since 2008, over 160 Tibetans have self-immolated in protest against China's repressive policies. United Nations experts have raised alarms about the forced separation of one million Tibetan children from their families for assimilation into Chinese colonial boarding schools," Mr Bhutia said.

"As Tibet has consistently been ranked as one of the least free countries in the world by freedom houses with little to know information making its way out, Tibetans inside Tibet have shown extraordinary courage. Language, culture, history and identity are under threat in Tibet, but resistance is as strong as ever," he said.

How land conditions affect the Asian monsoon climate

13 March 2024, Earth.com

Researchers at Tokyo Metropolitan University have made significant strides in understanding the intricate dance between land conditions and the Asian summer monsoon climate.

Through meticulous numerical simulations, the team has shed light on the impact of land conditions on weather patterns. Specifically, variations on the Tibetan plateau, alongside constant maritime conditions, have been shown to distinctly affect these patterns.

The findings highlight the importance of land-atmosphere interactions, which vary significantly from year to year. They also reveal a surprisingly low dependency on maritime phenomena like El Niño.

Complex dynamics of Asian monsoons

The Asian monsoon system is crucial for billions of people, affecting vast regions of Asia and its adjacent oceans. The temperature contrast between the vast Eurasian landmass and the surrounding seas primarily drives this phenomenon.

Researchers understand that both land and sea significantly impact this system, but have found dissecting the individual effects of each to be a considerable challenge.

Notably, the team highlights the shorter duration of the "memory effect" on land, which contrasts with longer-lasting oceanic influences, yet remains critical for seasonal forecasting.

Interaction between the atmosphere and land

Led by Dr. Hiroshi G. Takahashi, the researchers delved into advanced climate models to analyze weather patterns across different years.

By comparing simulations with identical maritime conditions but varied land scenarios over the Tibetan plateau, they explored how air temperature and snow cover differences affect weather variability.

The innovative approach resulted in the "L-A coupling strength index." This index measures the interaction between land conditions and the atmosphere and its impact on the Asian monsoon.

Key findings and implications

The study revealed that the Tibetan plateau's land conditions' impact on the monsoon climate fluctuates significantly each year. Interestingly, the influence of sea surface temperatures often eclipses that of land-atmosphere coupling, depending on the year.

The researchers observed a correlation with a weaker Walker circulation, a key precursor to summer monsoons. Additionally, they discovered that El Niño had a negligible impact on L-A coupling.

Moreover, winter and early spring snow cover on the plateau appeared to have little effect on monsoon severity, suggesting a land-specific memory effect lasting about a month.

Towards better monsoon forecasting

The research opens up new avenues for dramatically improving seasonal forecasts in the Asian monsoon region. By enhancing our understanding of the role of land conditions, we can potentially make more accurate predictions. This would be a boon for the billions affected by monsoons annually.

As the team continues to unravel the complexities of the monsoon climate, the promise of refined forecasts brings hope for better preparedness and resilience against the whims of nature.

The work by Tokyo Metropolitan University highlights the crucial need for sophisticated land condition modeling to improve Asian monsoon climate predictions. With ongoing research, the expectation for better forecasting grows, providing optimism for the many who depend on monsoon rains.

The study is published in the journal Climate Dynamics.

Construction of mega dams in Tibet worries downriver nations

10 March 2024, Geographical

Mount Kailash in western Tibet. Image: Siriwatthana Chankawee/Shutterstock

Originating close to sacred Mount Kailash, high on the remote, western part of the Tibetan plateau, the Mapcha Tsangpo River, which means the Peacock River in Tibetan, flows away from the slopes of this holiest of mountains and into Nepal, where its name changes to the Karnali. One of the most important rivers to rush through Nepal, it provides reliable freshwater for millions of people and waters huge swathes of farmland. Continuing its southward journey, the river then enters India where it's a major tributary of the all-important Ganges River, which brings life to many hundreds of millions more people.

But, new satellite imagery appears to indicate that China has recently completed the construction of a huge new dam on the Mapcha Tsangpo River, very close to the politically important tri-junction border of Tibet, Nepal and India. And that has the governments of Nepal and India worried.

India and China are the two big powers of Asia, and they have long been uneasy neighbours. The 3440km long mountainous border between the two is ill-defined and long disputed. In 1962, China and India briefly went to war against one another along this border, and since then, there have been numerous skirmishes between the two sides, including in 2020, 2021 and 2022.

In the past few years there has been a spate of infrastructure construction along the India-China border by both sides. Much of this infrastructure, which has included road and airport construction, is intended for military use. But in the case of China, it has also included the construction of mega-dams inside the Tibet Autonomous Region, which could potentially allow China to control water flow into Nepal and India.

Work is thought to have started on the dam in 2021 and, according to a recent report in Newsweek who analysed satellite images of the site, the dam is now completed and filling up with water. The concrete dam, which is situated just 28km from the Nepalese border town of Hilsa (population 51,000) and 60km from the India border.

This is not the first mega-dam that China has built within Tibet, and it is very close to India. In 2021, China announced plans to link Tibet's river systems with the rest of the country, and that doing so would involve building a mega dam on the Yarlung Tsangpo River (which also originates close to Mount Kailash) at the eastern end of the Tibetan plateau along the disputed border with the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh. Once the Yarlung Tsangpo bores its way through the eastern Himalaya, it becomes the Brahmaputra River, which is a critical source of freshwater for inhabitants of northeastern India and Bangladesh. In a 2022 report for the United States Institute of Peace, Mark Giordano and Anya Wahal from Georgetown University's Walsh School of Foreign Service stated that 'The Brahmaputra would appear to be at the top of the list of conflict hotspots. The river is shared between four states, including the world's two most populous, China and India. Both have rapidly growing economies, and both are already among the most water-stressed in the world.'

In recent years India has protested the construction of mega dams upstream of some of its key rivers by refusing to purchase electricity from sites with Chinese investment, such as the Chameliya hydropower station in Nepal, built with Beijing's financial aid.

Online reports of fatalities due to flood damage to dam in Qinghai province denied

02 March 2024, Tibetan Review

Online reports suggested that dozens of people had died and thousands had gone missing after a dam was damaged by flooding recently in the previously earthquake-hit Maduo (Tibetan: Matoe) county in Golog Tibetan autonomous prefecture, Qinghai province, according to China's official chinadaily.com.cn Mar 3. However, the report also cited local officials as saying there were no casualties due to the incident.

There have been reports online since Feb 22 that the dam-damage and resulting flood had led to the deaths of dozens of people and the missing of thousands of people. Local authorities dismissed them as rumours, the report said.

The report also cited local authorities as saying the incident, which happened on Feb 18, had caused property damage to eight people and the deaths of 195 livestock, as well as damage to roads and water conservancy facilities. They have sought to stress that no one died from it.

The dam was stated to have been repaired on Feb 21.

Maduo county was earlier hit by a major earthquake on May 22, 2021. Highway bridges, roads and walls collapsed as a result of it. At least 20 people were killed, 300 were injured, and 13 were missing, according to a Radio Free Asia report at that time.

However, Chinese officials stated at that time that there were no deaths but that 19 people sustained minor injuries.

It was the strongest earthquake to hit the People's Republic of China since 2008, preceded by another unrelated earthquake that occurred 5 hours earlier in Yunnan province.

February

Breakthrough in Qinghai: Cloning of Tibetan Goats Promises a Sustainable Future for Local Breeding

26 February 2024, BNN

Chinese scientists have achieved a significant breakthrough in animal conservation by successfully cloning Tibetan goats, offering hope for the future of the Tibetan goat breeding industry and local communities on the Qinghai-Xizang Plateau.

The dawn of a new era in animal husbandry has broken over the windswept expanses of Qinghai Province, where Chinese scientists have achieved a significant breakthrough in the field of cloning. The successful birth of two live Tibetan goats, using the body cells of adult goats, marks a pivotal moment in the efforts to preserve this breed, known for its crucial role in the livelihoods of local communities on the Qinghai-Xizang Plateau.

A Leap Toward Sustainable Breeding

The cloning program, spearheaded by a dedicated team from Northwest A&F University, has not only demonstrated the viability of cloning as a tool for animal conservation but also raised hopes for the future of the Tibetan goat breeding industry. Utilizing cells from three rams and one ewe, the scientists were able to produce clones that were born healthy, with the first weighing in at 3.4 kg. This achievement is seen as a cornerstone in maintaining the breed's adaptability to the challenging plateau environment, a trait that is of paramount importance for the survival and prosperity of local farming communities.

Revitalizing Local Economies

The Tibetan goat is not just any livestock; it is a vital source of income for farmers and herdsman in the region, contributing significantly to the local economy through the production of cashmere and other products. The success of this cloning initiative is part of broader efforts that began in 2018, aimed at improving the breeding of Tibetan yaks and goats. By promoting superior goat varieties, the program seeks to support the income of local communities, enhancing both the quality and efficiency of the breeding industry in the region.

Looking to the Future

While the cloning of Tibetan goats represents a leap forward in science and animal conservation, it also opens up a dialogue on the ethical considerations and potential challenges that accompany such advancements. The success of these efforts hinges not only on the scientific community's ability to replicate desirable genetic traits but also on its capacity to address concerns related to biodiversity and the welfare of cloned animals. Nevertheless, as the program continues to evolve, it offers a beacon of hope for the sustainable development of livestock breeding on the Qinghai-Xizang Plateau, promising a brighter future for the local communities that depend on it.

Shifting Skies Over the Tibetan Plateau: A Future of Increased Precipitation

22 February 2024, BNN

Delve into the study revealing the projected increase in precipitation over the Tibetan Plateau amidst climate change uncertainties. Explore the global implications, challenges, and key findings shaping our understanding of climate dynamics.

Imagine standing on the vast, sprawling expanse of the Tibetan Plateau, the roof of the world, where the earth meets the sky at an average elevation of 4,000 meters. Here, in this region often referred to as the 'Asian Water Tower,' the future of millions of people and countless ecosystems hangs in the balance, swayed by the whims of precipitation patterns. A recent study led by Prof. ZHOU Tianjun from the Institute of Atmospheric Physics of the Chinese Academy of Sciences delves deep into these patterns, offering a glimpse into a future shaped by climate change.

The Heart of the Matter: Precipitation Projections

The study, published in Geophysical Research Letters, employs an innovative approach to tackle the longstanding question of how precipitation over the Tibetan Plateau will evolve in the face of global warming. Utilizing an inter-model empirical orthogonal function analysis under a high greenhouse gas emission scenario, the findings point towards a consistent increase in precipitation, particularly along the southern edge of the Plateau, throughout the 21st century. This revelation is significant, considering the critical role this region plays in the water cycle of surrounding areas.

However, the road to these findings was not straightforward. The research illuminated the substantial variability among models, underscoring the influence of model uncertainty. The increase in precipitation is predominantly attributed to enhanced vertical thermodynamic responses, with the vertical dynamical components playing a lesser role. This distinction is crucial for understanding the mechanics behind the projected changes and refining future models.

Wider Implications: Beyond the Plateau

The study's implications ripple far beyond the Tibetan Plateau, highlighting the intricate connections within our global climate system. One key factor influencing the region's precipitation patterns is the warming of the equatorial Pacific, which affects moisture transport to the TP. This underscores the global nature of climate impacts, where changes in one part of the world can significantly affect distant regions.

Moreover, the research sheds light on the importance of recognizing the diversity in climate model projections. These projections are influenced by variables such as climate sensitivity and the response of equatorial Pacific sea surface temperatures to global warming. The call for further investigation into the variability of these responses under different greenhouse gas emission scenarios is a reminder of the complexities involved in predicting our climate future.

Looking Ahead: The Path Forward

The Tibetan Plateau's future, as outlined by Prof. ZHOU and his team, is one of increased precipitation. Yet, this future is mired in uncertainties and complexities, reflecting the broader challenges of climate modeling and prediction. The study not only contributes valuable insights into the specific changes expected over the TP but also highlights the critical need for enhanced understanding and refinement of climate models.

As the world grapples with the realities of climate change, the findings from the Tibetan Plateau serve as a microcosm of the larger challenges at play. The balance between the thermodynamic and dynamical components of our climate, the global interconnectedness of climate impacts, and the inherent uncertainties in our projections are themes that resonate across regions and scales. The journey towards a deeper understanding of our changing climate continues, with each study like Prof. ZHOU's adding a piece to the puzzle.

Decoding Summer Rainfall Variations on Tibetan Plateau

22 February 2024, The Mirage

The Tibetan Plateau (TP), a complex high-altitude region with an average elevation of 4,000 meters, is widely recognized as the "Asian Water Tower" and "the third pole." Changes in precipitation over the TP significantly affect the water cycle in the surrounding areas, directly and indirectly affecting the lives of millions of people and ecosystems. Despite extensive efforts to project future precipitation changes over the TP due to global warming, there remains a considerable range in the magnitude of existing projections. The underlying physics causing this inter-model spread in precipitation projections over the TP remains unclear. Therefore, gaining insight into the precipitation response to global warming and identifying sources of uncertainty are critical to improving the reliability of these projections.

In a study published in Geophysical Research Letters on Feb. 1, researchers highlighted the persistent increase in precipitation throughout the 21st century, with the most significant changes occurring along the southern edge of the TP. However, they found substantial inter-model variability in precipitation projections, emphasizing that model uncertainty dominates the overall uncertainty in the medium and long term.

Led by Prof. ZHOU Tianjun from the Institute of Atmospheric Physics (IAP) of the Chinese Academy of Sciences, the researchers used an inter-model empirical orthogonal function analysis of projected precipitation changes under a very high greenhouse gas (GHG) emission scenario, referred to as "SSP5-8.5" in climate modeling.

The analysis showed that the leading principal component explains over 40%, and even 80%, of the total variance at regional scales. Moisture budget analysis indicated that the increase in precipitation is primarily driven by enhanced vertical thermodynamic (TH) responses to the increased water-holding capacity of the atmosphere, with a weak effect from the vertical dynamical (DY) term. However, both vertical DY and TH components contribute to the leading mode of inter-model spread in precipitation projections.

"The vertical TH component is significantly related to the climate sensitivity among the models involved in the phase-6 of the Coupled Model Intercomparison Project, suggesting that models projecting a warmer climate also tend to project a stronger TH term," said QIU Hui, first author of the study and a Ph.D. student from the University of the Chinese Academy of Sciences.

The researchers further revealed that the inter-model spread of the dynamic component is influenced by the equatorial Pacific warming pattern through the Walker Circulation change, which controls diabatic heating over the Marine continent and leads to atmospheric circulation changes that affect northward moisture transport to the southern TPs.

"Both the model weighting technique and the selection of high skill models with better performance of historical climate simulation have been traditionally used to increase the robustness of climate projection in previous studies," said Prof. ZHOU Tianjun, corresponding author of the study, "Our results enrich the research by highlighting that the diversity in CMIP6 models projecting precipitation changes over the TP is not only related to local model performance, but is influenced by the overall performance of climate models in the context of climate sensitivity and the response of equatorial Pacific sea surface temperature to global warming."

The researchers also examined the relationship between the thermodynamic term and climate sensitivity under scenarios with low (termed as "SSP1-2.6") and intermediate (termed as "SSP2-4.5") GHG emissions, and found similar results to scenarios with very high GHG emissions. They call for further research into the inter-model variability of the response of equatorial Pacific Sea Surface Temperature to global warming.

The spatial distribution of summer precipitation anomalies (units: mm day<sup>-1</sup>) in 2050-2099 over Tibetan Plateau under the SSP5-8.5 scenario. The dots denote regions where at least 80% of the models agree on the sign of change. The black line indicates the boundaries of the TP, where the elevations are above 2,500 m. The baseline climatology refers to the period from 1965-2014, and the mid- and long-term is from 2050-2099. (Image by IAP).

Lakes in Himalayan Plateau gradually transitioning to carbon sinks from sources: Study

04 February 2024, Times of India

NEW DELHI: Yearly carbon emissions from lakes in the Qingzang Plateau (QZP) or the Tibetan Plateau have declined with some lakes shifting from being carbon sources during 1970-2000 to becoming carbon sinks in the next two decades, new research has found. Researchers said the trend of decreasing carbon emissions in QZP lakes over the past five decades suggested that these lakes could assume an increasingly significant role in both regional and global carbon cycles in the context of ongoing global climate change.

The Qingzang Plateau, known as the Himalayan Plateau in India, is a vast elevated plateau located at the intersection of Central, South and East Asia and includes the Indian regions of Ladakh and Lahaul and Spiti.

While carbon sources release more carbon into the atmosphere than they absorb, carbon sinks absorb more carbon from the atmosphere than they release. The researchers, including those from the Chinese Academy of Sciences, China, said their study offers insights into the timing and degree of shifting in the yearly carbon dioxide (CO<sub>2</sub>) exchange flux for lakes in the QZP region. Their findings are published in the journal Environmental Science and Ecotechnology. The team found that between 1970 and 2000, the lake systems in the QZP had generally acted as carbon sources. However, from 2000 to 2020, some freshwater and saltwater lakes shifted from acting as carbon sources to small carbon sinks, with decreasing yearly CO<sub>2</sub> exchange flux. They also found that before 2000, the average temperature on the QZP from 1970 to 2000 was lower, aquatic plant and phytoplankton rates were relatively low, and the effect of respiration on carbon emissions was more pronounced. After 2000, however, the average temperature on the QZP was seen to show a rising trend. Further, the researchers found that the CO<sub>2</sub> absorbed through photosynthesis exceeded the CO<sub>2</sub> released through respiration, along with a reduction in the partial pressure of CO<sub>2</sub> (pCO<sub>2</sub>) at the water-air interface and water bodies became increasingly less saturated. All of these conditions were conducive for CO<sub>2</sub> entering water bodies, they said. They found that in recent decades, the yearly solar radiation on the QZP has generally declined. This will weaken the circulation of warm and cold water in the water bodies, known to cause a significant outflow of CO<sub>2</sub>, and therefore reduce CO<sub>2</sub> emissions, they said. Phytoplankton and aquatic macrophytes, too, are sensitive to light and a slight reduction will slow respiration processes and gradually decrease CO<sub>2</sub> emissions, they said.

January

Indian Tectonic Plate May Split Tibet in Two, Says New Study

25 January 2024, Greek Reporter

A new geophysical study suggests Tibet may be “splitting in two,” as the Indian tectonic plate is tearing underneath the Tibetan Plateau. The seismic analysis study of the Himalayas around southern Tibet was presented at the American Geophysical Union Conference in December last year, providing evidence that the Indian plate is disintegrating beneath the Eurasian plate. The Himalayas are a mountain range present in five countries, namely India, Pakistan, Nepal, China, and Bhutan. According to the Geological Society, the mountain range and the Tibetan Plateau have formed as a result of the collision between the Indian plate and the Eurasian plate which began fifty million years ago and continues to this day. Led by Lin Liu, Danian Shi, and Simon L Klemperer, the study began by examining the levels of helium present in the Tibetan springs. A new theory about the plates that lie underneath the mountain range was presented. Theories on the Indian ‘Splitting’ Tectonic Plate Existing theories posit that the Indian plate could be sliding beneath the Eurasian plate without much subduction, a process known in the practice of geomorphology as underplating.

Another theory is that the deeper sections of the Indian plate might be subducting, while the upper segments are resisting movement against the mass of Tibet. The complex movements make it difficult to discern the precise geological activities beneath the Himalayas.

This latest study, titled “Slab tearing and delamination of the Indian lithospheric mantle during flat-slab subduction, southeast Tibet,” claims that what is actually happening may be a peeling of the tectonic plate rather than a splitting. This is a fusion of the previous two theories.

The study offers evidence that the Indian plate is subducting while, at the same time, undergoing warping and tearing. This causes the upper half to peel away. It is a completely new perspective in the discipline of earth science and presents a challenge to previous assumptions.

The study concludes: “Our SRFs objectively map depths to distinct Indian and Tibetan lithosphere-asthenosphere boundaries across a substantial region of south-eastern Tibet.”

“The inferred boundary between the two lithospheres is corroborated by more subjective mapping of changing SWS parameters,” as per the study, “and by independent interpretations of the mantle suture from mantle degassing patterns and the northern limit of sub-Moho earthquakes.”

According to the study, “The southern limit of Tibetan lithosphere and subjacent asthenosphere is at 31°N west of 90°E but steps south by >300 km to ~28°N east of 92°E likely representing a slab tear.”

If the conclusions drawn from the study are in fact an accurate picture of what is happening, it would indicate that the upper part of the Indian plate would rise up and cause Tibet to heighten, while the lower half would sink down further into the earth’s mantle.

Jiusan Society Qinghai Provincial Committee: Study the ecological culture of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau and build an ecological civilization highland – Entertainment – China Engineering Network

25 January 2024, Breaking Latest News

Jiusan Society Qinghai Provincial Committee: Studying the ecological culture of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau and building an ecological civilization highland China News Service, Xining, January 24th (Zhang Wenke, Hu Guilong, Zhang Tianfu) – The Qinghai Provincial Committee of the Jiusan Society has emphasized the importance of studying the ecological culture of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau in order to build an ecological civilization highland.

Zhu Chunyun, the chairman of the committee, highlighted the need to understand the impact of natural factors on environmental evolution, as well as the correlation between these factors and human activities in the region's ecological evolution.

The Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, also known as the "Roof of the World" and the "Third Pole of the Earth," is of great ecological importance. It serves as the source of major rivers in Asia and is a crucial water supply area for over 2 billion people. Due to its sensitivity and fragility, the plateau's ecological environment requires careful protection.

In order to safeguard the Tibetan Plateau, China has taken significant steps, such as establishing the Sanjiangyuan National Park and enacting the "Qinghai-Tibet Plateau Ecological Protection Law of the People's Republic of China." However, there is still room for improvement in terms of ecological and cultural research.

Zhu Chunyun proposed strengthening research on the ecological systems of the plateau and establishing a unified ecological big data platform. He also recommended focusing on the exploration of ecological ethics and values embedded in traditional culture, as well as building a discipline system and research institute specifically focused on the ecological culture of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau.

The committee's suggestions aim to enhance the scientific understanding of the plateau's ecosystem and promote a more comprehensive approach to ecological and cultural research in the region. By doing so, they hope to contribute to the development of a sustainable and resilient ecological civilization highland on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau.

New discoveries show Tibetan Plateau remained inhabited over 50,000 years ago

24 January 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan24'24) – The hinterland of the Tibetan Plateau, reputed as the "roof of the world" or the world's third pole, had been inhabited since 50,000 years ago, rather than 40,000 years as previously known, reported China's official Xinhua news agency Jan 24, citing the latest archaeological study of a prehistoric cave site there. Over 10,000 cultural relics, including stone tools, bone artifacts, pottery fragments, bronze items, animal skeletons and plant remains, dating back to 53,000 years ago, have been unearthed at the Meilongdapu (or Melong Tagphug) cave site, reported China's official globaltimes.cn likewise, citing a state broadcaster CCTV report Jan 22.

The remains, dating from the Paleolithic Age to the early Metal Ages in an area of over 1,000 square metres of the cave, are located on a massif 4,700 metres above the sea level, making it the highest large-scale prehistoric cave site globally, and located in the westernmost Tibetan prefecture of Ali (Tibetan: Ngari).

Archaeologists from the Xizang Regional Institute of Cultural Relics Protection and the Institute of Vertebrate Paleontology and Paleoanthropology (IVPP) under the Chinese Academy of Sciences were stated to have carried out six years of excavation at the site since its discovery in 2018.

Zhang Xiaoling with the IVPP has said the oldest cultural remains in the cave were dated earlier than 53,000 years ago and may even be as early as 80,000 years ago, with the top layer dated 1,000 years ago.

The site is stated to consist of three caves aligned in a row, with the first one covering an area exceeding 1,000 square meters, the second at around 60 square meters, and the third, yet to be excavated, measuring about 25 square metres.

A total of 599 stone artifacts and 1,017 well-preserved animal fossils were found in the first cave. Cut marks on many specimens have shed light on ancient human survival strategies, said the globaltimes.cn report.

Aside from the diverse cultural artifacts, the walls of the first cave also revealed arranged red ochre rock paintings depicting vertical stripes, humanoid outlines, handprints and the sun, the report said.

The second cave was stated to date back to no later than 45,000 years ago and has yielded 8,136 stone artifacts and 952 animal fossils. In addition, a small amount of animal faeces and plant remains were unearthed. Archaeologists have described the cave as the primitive accumulation left by ancient people's lives.

The archaeological team has noted that the first and second caves preserve cultural deposits from multiple human occupations across different periods, suggesting intermittent habitation due to climate changes or cave collapses.

The third layer at the cave entrance of the first cave was stated to date back to 4,000 to 3,000 years ago, with a top layer dating back 1,000 years. These layers have yielded 1,170 stone artifacts, 622 pottery fragments and 4,350 animal bone fragments, the report said.

Besides, more than 30 Old Stone Age sites and six cave sites were also stated to have been found during a survey of the Gerze Basin where the site is located, with thousands of stone artifacts being collected and five cave rock paintings discovered.

Evidence of on-site stone tool production and pottery usage were stated to support the notion of early humans using caves as permanent dwellings in extremely cold and high-altitude environment.

Regarding the discoveries' historical importance, the report said: "The abundance of artifacts opens new avenues for exploring human migration patterns and cultural exchanges. The comparative study of stone-making techniques, types and functions at different periods brings new insights into human habitation of the plateau, the evolution of stone tool technology, changes in survival strategies and technological exchanges during the Old Stone Age.

"The diversity and complexity of the pottery have contributed to the understanding of the population composition and cultural interactions among different groups since the New Stone Age.

"The discovery of crop seeds such as barley and peas is particularly significant for studying the origin and diffusion of agriculture in extreme plateau environments and understanding the exchange of agricultural products and population movements at different altitudes."

The report further said: "Ongoing multidisciplinary research into animal and plant archaeology, paleoenvironmental studies, isotope analysis, ancient protein analysis and sedimentary DNA will provide further insight into the history of human survival in the high-altitude regions of the Qinghai-Xizang Plateau."

Nepal explores tapping flood-risk glacial lakes for clean power

23 January 2024, Context News

LANGTANG, Nepal - High in the Himalayas, two villages near Nepal's border with Tibet are getting power from an unusual source: a threatening glacial lake.

In this high-altitude region, climate change is accelerating the melting of mountain ice, with villages located below fast-filling glacial lakes facing a rising risk of catastrophic flooding.

But efforts to drain some of the excess water building up in the lakes, to lower surging disaster risk, also present an opportunity to boost clean power production, by installing small hydropower generators in the drainage channels.

Since 2017, 175 households in Langtang and Kyanjin, two villages in the high Kyanjin Valley, have been able to tap clean hydropower from efforts to drain the Kyanjin glacial lake for cooking, lights and other energy needs.

"We used to go three hours away from here to collect firewood" - something hard to find above the tree line, said 48-year-old Pasang Tamang, who runs a hotel in Kyanjin, a popular stopping point for tourists trekking in the mountains.

"Now we have electricity to cook food and boil water," she said.

The hydropower project, which cost $448,000, was paid for by the Hong Kong-based Kadoorie Charitable Foundation.

But expanding such smart solutions - which unusually cut both disaster risk and climate changing emissions - is proving challenging in Nepal with funding limited and work in high-mountain environments challenging and often costly.

Power from risk

Communities in the Himalayas - and other high mountain regions of the world - face growing risks from fast-filling glacial lakes, which can suddenly burst under pressure and send huge volumes of flash floodwater surging downstream.

More than 150 people were killed and 2,000 houses damaged after Lhonak Lake in the northeastern Indian province of Sikkim burst its banks in October last year.

Nepal has worked to lower the pressure in several of its most at-risk mountain lakes, including Tsho Rolpa and Imja, using canals to channel some water away.

It also has looked at generating power from glacial lake draining since at least 2016, when Dhananjay Regmi, a glacier expert at Tribhuvan University, recognised the possibility while leading work on efforts to reduce lake levels and cut disaster risk near Mount Everest.

Working with colleagues, he studied four Nepalese glacial lakes - Thulagi, Lower Barun, Lumding Tsho and Hongu-2 - and produced a study showing hydropower generation was possible as part of drainage efforts.

All four lakes were identified in a 2020 report by the International Centre for Integrated Mountain Development as having a high risk of bursting their banks. "There are two benefits to us: first, the risk of outburst will be reduced, and second, we get energy at the same volume throughout the year," Regmi told Context. He has focused in particular on Thulagi glacial lake, about 200 km (125 miles) from Kathmandu in Manang district.

The 2.5-km-long (1.55-mile) lake is 73 metres (240 ft) deep and holds 36 million cubic metres (1.27 billion cubic feet) of water, according to Regmi's 2017 report - enough to fill more than 14,400 Olympic swimming pools.

If it were to burst, the resulting floods could directly affect 166,000 people downstream and impact many more, with roads, bridges and larger hydropower projects in the region at risk, according to an unpublished analysis by Narendra Khanal, a geography professor at Tribhuvan University.

Losses could reach $415 million, the research found, if expected flood levels of 35 metres (114 feet) above the riverbed were reached, requiring replacement of the Marsyangdi and Middle Marsyangdi hydropower dams and putting their revenue at risk.

Channelling water out of the lake to hydropower generating equipment, could produce 50 megawatts (MW) of electricity year-round, he said, and lower the lake's water level by five to 10 metres (16.4 to 32.8 feet).

"When the water level is reduced, we don't have to worry about the lake bursting," Regmi said.

Funding dilemma

But finding money for such double-benefit projects and putting them into operation is not easy.

Nepal, working with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) is seeking $50 million from the Green Climate Fund, with co-financing from the government, UNDP and the private sector, to lower water levels and cut the risk of floods from the Thulagi, Lower Barun, Lumding Tsho and Hongu-2 lakes.

But the proposal does not include plans to also generate hydropower.

Chiranjeevi Chataut, the director general of Nepal's Department of Energy Development, said making such generation projects work in the high Himalayas is too challenging, one reason the country is not making plans for them.

Still, "if any private sector (applicants) are interested, we can discuss," he said.

Regmi admitted that working at high altitude could be difficult and costly, but said such generation could be helpful in regularising year-round hydropower supplies.

Nepal, for instance, in recent years has generated about 2,800 MW of hydropower nationally each year during the monsoon season, but only a third of that at other times of year, according to the Nepal Electricity Authority.

Deepak K.C., a climate change and resilience analyst for UNDP in Nepal, said tapping the country's high-mountain hydropower potential in combination with efforts to cut disaster risk would likely require more joined-up funding.

"Only the private sector can invest in that type of (power) project," he said. "Donor agencies don't invest in generating hydropower."

If the government goes ahead with a lake-lowering project at Thulagi, Regmi's team hopes to find private backing to build a demonstration hydropower project, to show generating clean power at high altitude can work.

Installing the project could have other benefits as well, Regmi said. For instance, putting in place a hydropower system would require establishing a cable in the mountains to transport equipment to the site.

That could then be turned into a cable car system to attract tourists, or for local transport, he said.

"The project can be done without environmental or ecosystem loss," he said.

Satellite Images Show China's Dam Threatening Neighbors' Fresh Water Supply

22 January 2024, Newsweek

China appears to have completed the construction of a new dam in the country's southwestern border regions, a project that could have far-reaching strategic implications for its southern neighbors India and Nepal, according to new satellite imagery.

Mapcha Tsangpo River, which translates from Tibetan as "peacock," is known as the Ghaghara in India and the Karnali in Nepal. It is a significant and perennial source of freshwater water supply to the populations in western Nepal and in the India's northern plains.

Beijing and New Delhi have sparred over China's dam building in the Himalayas before, including since the start of construction at the Yarlung Tsangpo river three years ago. The mega-dam project involves the world's highest major river, which begins in China's southwestern Tibet Autonomous Region and flows into India as the Brahmaputra.

Newsweek's analysis of imagery from Sinergise's Sentinel Hub website, which renders photographs captured by the Sentinel-2 satellite of the European Union's Copernicus earth observation program, found construction at Mapcha Tsangpo began in July 2021. The dam north of the town of Burang, in Tibet's Ngari prefecture, is now complete and visible in images taken this month from Earth orbit.

The concrete structure is roughly 18 miles north of Nepal's border town of Hilsa and approximately 37 miles east of the Indian border. Hilsa has roughly 51,000 residents, but Nepal's wider western region is home to more than 4 million people.

New dams coming up in the upper reaches of the Himalayas could impact the lives of millions in India who live in neighboring areas on the Nepalese border. Downstream from Nepal, Mapcha Tsangpo enters the plains of India, where it is known as the Sarayu, and passes through Ayodhya in the northern state of Uttar Pradesh. The city is considered the birthplace of the Hindu god Ram.

On Monday, Prime Minister Narendra Modi presided over the "Pran Pratishtha" consecration ceremony at the culturally and politically significant Hindu temple.

China's additional infrastructure in its sensitive border regions includes the new Ali Pulan Airport, a dual-use site that serves both civilian and military purposes, which officially became operational late last month, according to the Tibet region's civil aviation authority.

"India is naturally concerned about the potential long-term repercussions of Chinese activities for decades. Understanding China's hydro-behavior with other neighbors is crucial in deciphering its hegemonic approach that has gone unchecked as of now," said Sana Hashmi, a postdoctoral fellow at the Taiwan-Asia Exchange Foundation think tank in Taipei.

Beijing in 2017 stopped sharing hydrological information with New Delhi, only to later renew the data-sharing contract at a cost. Previously, in 2013, when then-Prime Minister Manmohan Singh visited Beijing, the two governments signed a memorandum of understanding wherein China committed to sharing hydrological data with India annually from May 15 to October 15, Hashmi told Newsweek.

"Despite the existence of an MOU to share flood data for the Brahmaputra during the monsoon season, there is not much progress," she said.

Omais Ahmad, managing editor for South Asia at The Third Pole, a specialist publication on environmental issues in the Himalayan region, told Newsweek that the case of the new dam in Tibet had shades of China's hydropolitics in the Mekong Delta of Southeast Asia.

"The best comparison of this is how China has tried to reshape hydropolitics in the Mekong. This is where it has increasingly argued that, as an upstream neighbor, it has rights that the downstream neighbors must respect, which goes completely against all of the international law on this," Ahmad said.

"It's not simply that the water flows through an upstream and that the upstream riparian doesn't have absolute rights over a river. There is the downstream riparian that has usage rights based on traditional usage," he said.

Ahmad added: "Unlike the Mekong, there are no regional water institutions like the Mekong River Commission in South Asia, so there is not even a space to engage."

The Chinese, India and Nepalese foreign ministries did not immediately return written requests for comment before publication.

A 2022 investigation by Indian news website The Quint said China had charged India over $19 million for data from three hydrological stations. Last fall, Hong Kong's South China Morning Post said the two governments were renegotiating the hydrological data-sharing agreement, which expired in 2023.

In 2019, Li Keqiang, China's late former premier, spearheaded a follow-up project to the South-to-North Water Diversion Project, an ambitious decades-long plan to transfer resources from the water-rich Three Gorges Dam on the Yangtze River to the country's arid northern regions including Beijing and Tianjin.

That project went into "full construction" this month, according to China's official news service Xinhua.

In 2021, China announced plans to link Tibet's river systems with the rest of the mainland, which would involve building a mega dam along the border areas with India.

The project at Yarlung Tsangpo, the fifth longest river in China, is another sticking point in China-India relations for its strategic potential to control freshwater access to the downstream Brahmaputra. The river located in the east of their long and disputed border is one of the most critical sources of fresh water for the inhabitants of India's northeastern region as well as in Bangladesh.

Mark Giordano and Anya Wahal, experts at Georgetown University's Walsh School of Foreign Service, argued in December 2022 that the water of the Brahmaputra could become a source of conflict between the two Asian giants.

"The Brahmaputra would appear to be at the top of the list of conflict hotspots. The river is shared between four states, including the world's two most populous, China and India. Both have rapidly growing economies, and both are already among the most water-stressed in the world," they wrote for the United States Institute of Peace.

In recent years, India has protested China's construction of hydropower projects by refusing to purchase electricity from sites with Chinese investment, such as the Chameliya hydropower station in Nepal, built with Beijing's financial aid.

Beijing is building yet another dam north of the Burang site, construction for which began in December 2022, according to Xinhua. The project could further control Tibet's river system upstream from the Mapcha Tsangpo.

"The total storage capacity of the reservoir is 4.0352 million cubic meters. The project development task is mainly for irrigation," China's state media said at the time.

Climate change in South China Sea will have global weather impact: experts

17 January 2024, RFA

Scientists forecast more drought and heavier rainfall in the region.

The impact of climate change in the South China Sea and its surrounding areas on the local and global weather system could be "profound," new scientific research has found.

The "unique characteristics" of climate change in the South China Sea and surrounding area (SCSSA) – such as the Indo-Pacific region, Southeast Asia, and the Tibetan Plateau – include rapid warming in key regions, leading to increased precipitation during the Asian summer monsoon and notable shifts in the frequency and origin of tropical cyclones, the researchers said in a study published in the Ocean-Land-Atmosphere Research journal on Tuesday.

The alterations in weather patterns within this region have a ripple effect on a global scale, influencing atmospheric circulation, oceanic currents, and the overall climate system, the researchers said.

The South China Sea, located in the eastern part of Southeast Asia, is a partially enclosed sea surrounded by various nations such as China, Vietnam, the Philippines, and Malaysia. Renowned for its diverse biological richness, it plays a crucial role in the worldwide climate system.

"Climate change in the South China Sea and its surrounding areas is very complex. It has a significant impact on shaping not only regional climates but also exerting far-reaching impacts on weather and climate patterns across the globe," said Song Yang, a professor at Sun Yat-sen University in Zhuhai, China.

The South China Sea is experiencing a significant rise in sea surface temperatures due to global warming, leading to more powerful typhoons and hurricanes with increased frequency and severity, resulting in catastrophic consequences, substantial loss of life and property damage in coastal areas.

Climate change has also disrupted rainfall patterns in the area, leading to extreme weather events like droughts or heavy rains, which significantly impact agriculture, water resources, and ecosystems.

This week's study highlighted the Hadley circulation's expansion, a key atmospheric pattern between the equator and subtropics, and a broader influence on the Madden-Julian Oscillation, an essential tropical atmospheric disturbance.

The researchers said that increased atmospheric convection over the SCSSA can result in abnormal descending air movements, leading to drought conditions and increased humidity in southern China, South Asia, and northern Africa during the boreal – or northern region – spring and summer.

The paper forecasts increased precipitation across South Asia, East Asia, and northern Australia, attributed to warmer sea surface temperatures, a heightened water vapor supply, and intensified circulations over the South China Sea.

The research also indicates that under various projected future scenarios, the impacts of climate change in the SCSSA on both local and distant weather and climate extremes are likely to intensify.

Last week, the United Nations' World Meteorological Organization (WMO) said the global temperature reached a record high in 2023, fast approaching the critical 1.5 degrees Celsius threshold above pre-industrial levels, a key upward limit in the 2015 Paris climate agreement to save the earth from devastating impacts.

Utilizing six leading international datasets, the WMO reported Friday a new annual average temperature of 1.45 C compared to the pre-industrial era

(1850-1900), with every month from June to December setting new records.

Notably, July and August were the hottest months ever recorded. Regional temperature breakdown was not provided.

Midway through last year, the Pacific Ocean region transitioned from the cooling effects of La Niña to the warming influence of El Niño. Since El Niño typically significantly impacts global temperatures after it peaks, 2024 is expected to be even warmer, according to scientists.

"While El Niño events are naturally occurring and come and go from one year to the next, longer-term climate change is escalating, and this is unequivocal because of human activities," said WMO Secretary-General Celeste Saulo.

Long-term monitoring of global temperatures, alongside other indicators like atmospheric greenhouse gas levels, ocean heat and acidification, sea level, sea ice extent, and glacier mass balance, provide insights into the changing climate, blamed primarily on fossil fuel usage.

TIBET DIGEST 2024

FOUNDATION FOR
Non-violent
Alternatives
To inform and shape policy on Tibet and the region

TIBET IN EXILE

www.fnvaworld.org
143, 4th Floor, Uday Park, New Delhi, 49
office@fnvaworld.org

Disclaimer: FNVA does not endorse "China's Tibet", "Tibet Autonomous Region of China", "Xizang" or any such phrase that denotes Tibet has been/is a part of China. Articles that contain such phraseology are news items from the Chinese state media and must not be confused as endorsement by FNVA

December

Condolences for President Jimmy Carter

30 December 2024, CTA

On learning that President Jimmy Carter had passed away, His Holiness the Dalai Lama wrote to Chip Carter, the President's son, at the Carter Center, today, to offer his condolences.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama and President Jimmy Carter together in 2002.

"President Carter lived a truly meaningful life, he wrote, with decades of untiring efforts to help the poor and downtrodden, to seek peaceful solutions to conflicts and to advance democracy and human rights throughout the world. To have remained active over the course of such a long life set an example to us all of how to live our lives in the service of others. The Nobel Committee recognised his contribution to the welfare of humanity when it bestowed the Nobel Peace Prize on him in 2002.

"In addition, the Tibetan people and I remain ever grateful to President Carter for his deep interest in and concern for the situation in Tibet and for undertaking initiatives to help alleviate the plight our people."

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Congratulates Eriko Yamatani on Becoming Chairperson of Japan's Parliamentary Tibet Support Group

30 December 2024, CTA

On 26 December 2024, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, on behalf of the Central Tibetan Administration and the Tibetan people, extended his heartfelt congratulations to Honourable Eriko Yamatani on her appointment as the chairperson of the Japan Parliamentarians Support Group for Tibet.

Sikyong wrote, "Your leadership and powerful advocacy for the Tibetan cause, as witnessed through our representative at the Office of Tibet in Japan, have been deeply encouraging. As a longtime member of the Support Group, your unwavering courage in speaking truth to power and standing firm against authoritarian forces has been exemplary. Your bold stance against repression and commitment to defending fundamental freedoms inspire hope and set an example for global leaders.” He further commended the pivotal role of the Japan Parliamentarians Support Group for Tibet in strengthening support and awareness for the Tibetan cause in Japan, expressing optimism about its continued progress under Yamatani’s leadership. Sikyong also highlighted the forthcoming World Parliamentarian Convention on Tibet, set to take place in June 2025, noting the vital role Yamatani’s leadership will play in ensuring its success.

TIBET IN EXILE

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Congratulates Eriko Yamatani on Becoming Chairperson of Japan’s Parliamentary Tibet Support Group.

Concluding his congratulatory message, Sikyong reaffirmed his intent to work closely with Yamatani and the Parliamentarians Support Group to advance shared commitments to justice, freedom, and human rights.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Congratulates Hiroshi Yamada on Appointment as General Secretary of Japan’s Parliamentary Tibet Support Group

30 December 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Congratulates Hiroshi Yamada on Appointment as General Secretary of Japan’s Parliamentary Tibet Support Group.

On 26 December 2024, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, on behalf of the Central Tibetan Administration and the Tibetan people, extended his heartfelt congratulations to Hiroshi Yamada on his appointment as the General Secretary of the Japan Parliamentarians Support Group for Tibet.

Sikyong expressed his gratitude for Yamada’s longstanding parliamentary interventions and advocacy for Tibet, noting, “Your consistent support through parliamentary initiatives and your dedication to the Tibetan cause have been deeply valued and inspiring. Your appointment as General Secretary brings great optimism to our struggle, especially during these critical times when robust parliamentary backing for Tibet is of utmost importance.”

Highlighting the significance of Yamada’s leadership, Sikyong underscored the importance of the upcoming World Parliamentarian Convention on Tibet, scheduled to take place in June 2025 in Japan. He expressed confidence in Yamada’s role in ensuring the success of this vital platform to strengthen global advocacy for Tibet.

In his congratulatory message, Sikyong also reaffirmed his trust in the Japan Parliamentarians Support Group for Tibet, under Yamada’s guidance, to remain a steadfast voice for Tibet in Japan and beyond.

Dalai Lama unlikely to visit Bodh Gaya this tourist season

28 December 2024, Times of India

Tibetan spiritual leader the Dalai Lama is unlikely to visit Bodh Gaya during the ongoing 2024-25 tourist season. Sources said the Dalai Lama would leave Dharamsala on Jan 3 and arrive in Bylakuppe, Karnataka, on Jan 5 for an extended stay.

The Dalai Lama's annual Bodh Gaya visit began in the 2018-19 tourist season and continued in 2022-23 and 2023-24. However, his visits were halted during the 2020-21 and 2021-22 seasons due to Covid pandemic.

"Usually, the visit of the Dalai Lama leads to an increase in the footfall of devotees and tourists, especially from European countries, Bhutan, Tibet, Nepal, Myanmar, Vietnam and the Himalayan regions, besides Indian states like Sikkim, Meghalaya and West Bengal. As it is almost clear that the Dalai Lama will not be coming, the most affected will be small businesses like footpath vendors, roadside tea stalls and eateries. These businesses enjoy a good season whenever the Dalai Lama visits," Bodh Gaya Citizen Forum president Suresh Singh said.

Hotel Association, Bodh Gaya president Jai Singh said, "Hotels and guesthouses usually receive advance bookings during the Dalai Lama's visit. However, this season, rooms are easily available as hoteliers have not received enough inquiries about bookings."

"In such a situation, stakeholders in Bodh Gaya tourism are now relying on the ongoing annual puja performances and the annual Bodh Mahotsav to conclude the 2024-25 tourist season on a positive note," he added.

Tourist Guide Association of Bihar president Rakesh Kumar said, "The annual puja schedule issued by the Bodh Gaya Temple Management Committee includes 41 events during the 2024-25 season, compared to 25 events in 2022-23 and 27 in 2023-24. This year's schedule will conclude with the five-day 1st Thailand Chanting Ceremony from March 17 to 21, which is expected to attract a good number of Thai devotees."

He added, "The 10-day Tipitaka Chanting from Dec 2 to Dec 12 witnessed participation from over 8,000 devotees hailing from India, Thailand, Cambodia, Laos, Singapore, Indonesia, Vietnam, Sri Lanka, Nepal, Bangladesh, Korea and several European and Asian countries."

Apart from the annual events, stakeholders in Bodh Gaya found some relief with the conclusion of the fortnight-long Pitripaksh Mela, which saw nearly 22 lakh devotees visiting Gaya to perform 'pindadaan' rituals. A considerable number of these devotees also visited Bodh Gaya for darshan at the Mahabodhi Mahavihara.

Gaya: The official website of the Dalai Lama has provided a nearly clear indication that the spiritual leader will not visit Bodh Gaya during the ongoing 2024-25 tourist season. According to the website, the Dalai Lama is scheduled to leave Dharamsala on Jan 3 and arrive in Bylakuppe, Karnataka, on Jan 5 for an extended stay. The website contains no mention of the spiritual leader's Bodh Gaya visit this season.

The Dalai Lama's annual Bodh Gaya visit began in the 2018-19 tourist season and continued in 2022-23 and 2023-24. However, his visits were halted during the 2020-21 and 2021-22 seasons due to Covid pandemic.

"Usually, the visit of the Dalai Lama leads to an increase in the footfall of devotees and tourists, especially from European countries, Bhutan, Tibet, Nepal, Myanmar, Vietnam and the Himalayan regions, besides Indian states like Sikkim, Meghalaya and West Bengal. As it is almost clear that the Dalai Lama will not be coming, the most affected will be small businesses like footpath vendors, roadside tea stalls and eateries. These businesses enjoy a good season whenever the Dalai Lama visits," Bodh Gaya Citizen Forum president Suresh Singh said.

Hotel Association, Bodh Gaya president Jai Singh said, "Hotels and guesthouses usually receive advance bookings during the Dalai Lama's visit. However, this season, rooms are easily available as hoteliers have not received enough inquiries about bookings."

"In such a situation, stakeholders in Bodh Gaya tourism are now relying on the ongoing annual puja performances and the annual Bodh Mahotsav to conclude the 2024-25 tourist season on a positive note," he added.

Tourist Guide Association of Bihar president Rakesh Kumar said, "The annual puja schedule issued by the Bodh Gaya Temple Management Committee includes 41 events during the 2024-25 season, compared to 25 events in 2022-23 and 27 in 2023-24. This year's schedule will conclude with the five-day 1st Thailand Chanting Ceremony from March 17 to 21, which is expected to attract a good number of Thai devotees."

He added, "The 10-day Tipitaka Chanting from Dec 2 to Dec 12 witnessed participation from over 8,000 devotees hailing from India, Thailand, Cambodia, Laos, Singapore, Indonesia, Vietnam, Sri Lanka, Nepal, Bangladesh, Korea and several European and Asian countries."

Apart from the annual events, stakeholders in Bodh Gaya found some relief with the conclusion of the fortnight-long Pitripaksh Mela, which saw nearly 22 lakh devotees visiting Gaya to perform 'pindadaan' rituals. A considerable number of these devotees also visited Bodh Gaya for darshan at the Mahabodhi Mahavihara.

Estonian Delegation Visits Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, Delivers Letter from Estonian Speaker

28 December 2024, CTA

A delegation of Tibet supporters from Estonia, led by Roy Strider, Coordinator of the Tibet Support Group in the Estonian Parliament, visited the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile on 27 December 2024. They met with Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang, and toured the parliament hall.

Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel was presented with a letter (Christmas card) from Speaker Lauri Hussar of the Estonian Parliament by Strider, along with gifts from MP Juku-Kalle Raid, Chair of the Tibet Support Group in the Estonian Parliament, and from the Parliament of Estonia.

Presenting the letter from the Estonian Speaker, Roy Strider remarked that it was a huge step in their support for the just cause of Tibet. A similar letter from the Estonian Speaker was presented to His Holiness the Dalai Lama earlier today during their audience with him, and a similar letter will be presented to Sikyong Penpa Tsering later as well.

During their meeting, Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel reflected on his first encounter with Roy Strider, his visit to Estonia, and the ongoing journey in advocating for Tibet. He emphasized the strong and unique relationship between Tibet and Estonia. Speaking about His Holiness the Dalai Lama's message of love, compassion, and kindness, the Speaker highlighted Kashag's initiative to celebrate His Holiness's 90th birthday next year as the "Year of Compassion." He also suggested the possibility of a related initiative or commemoration from the Estonian Parliament or the public to mark this special occasion.

The Speaker then provided an overview of the work undertaken by the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, emphasising how, with the blessing and guidance of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the support of India, the USA, Estonia, and other allies, the Central Tibetan Administration has successfully preserved and promoted Tibet's unique cultural heritage, language, and religion. He expressed his heartfelt gratitude to the supporters of Tibet in Estonia for their invaluable contributions and appealed for their continued support in the future.

Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang, in her address, emphasised that supporting Tibet is a stand for justice and truth. She underscored that their presence at the seat of the Central Tibetan Administration sends a clear message that Tibet is not isolated, as China seeks to portray. She also reaffirmed that His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration are not separatists, contrary to China's claims.

Speaking about the critical situation inside Tibet, the Deputy Speaker highlighted the Chinese government's practice of forcing Tibetan children into colonial-style boarding schools. This policy deprives them of their birthright to learn their language, culture, and religion, while subjecting them to indoctrination with communist ideology. She emphasised that this systematic effort to Sinicize Tibetan children is causing both psychological and physical harm.

The Deputy Speaker also expressed gratitude to the visiting guests from Estonia for their ongoing support of Tibet and for their visit to the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile.

-Report filed by Tibetan Parliamentary Secretariat

Dalai Lama's visionary leadership keeps Tibetan cause alive: CTA President

27 December 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The President of the exile Tibetan government, known officially as the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), Penpa Tsering, in an exclusive interview with ABC News, highlighted the enduring global focus on Tibet's struggle under the visionary leadership of His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

President Tsering attributed the resilience of the Tibetan cause to the Dalai Lama's visionary guidance, emphasising its significance despite decades of Chinese oppression. "We have never lost hope because of His Holiness the Dalai Lama's visionary leadership even if we are only about 130,000 or 140,000 Tibetans in exile. We have still kept the issue of Tibetans alive. That shows the enduring spirit of the Tibetan people," he said, addressing Tibetans in Tibet with a message of solidarity and resilience.

Speaking on China's efforts to control the selection of the next Dalai Lama, Tsering reiterated the CTA's firm stance against Beijing's interference in Tibetan spiritual matters. He warned that China's actions undermine the deeply rooted Tibetan Buddhist tradition. He further criticised the move, stating, "The reincarnation is very unique to Tibetan Buddhism. Lamas reincarnate to carry forward the unfulfilled responsibilities that they left behind in their previous life and it is the Lama that is going to be reborn. The Chinese government which does not believe in any religion wants to be responsible for the recognition of reincarnate Lamas. They are not bothered about the living 14th Dalai Lama but they are more concerned about controlling the yet to come 15th Dalai Lama."

Reflecting on the 2008 uprising in Tibet, where monks and laypeople demanded the Dalai Lama's return, President Tsering highlighted the enduring resistance. "The Tibetan resistance movement has persisted for decades. The 2008 protests saw participation from across Tibet, showcasing unity and resolve. Since then, 157 Tibetans have self-immolated, hoping to draw attention to their plight. Despite the lack of significant international intervention, we continue to inform the world about ongoing political, military, and economic developments inside Tibet. We remain optimistic about positive changes in China in the near future."

When asked about the Resolve Tibet Act signed into law by U.S. President Joe Biden on July 12, Tsering emphasised its significance and global implications. The act, which prompted sharp criticism from Beijing, reaffirms Tibet's unresolved status under international law. "The Chinese government claims sovereignty over Tibet, while we advocate for the Middle Way Approach, a non-violent, mutually beneficial solution. The Tibetan Resolve Act underscores that Tibet remains an unresolved issue under international law. It addresses four main issues, challenging China's narrative that there is no Tibet problem," he explained.

Discussing the ongoing stalemate in negotiations with China, President Tsering acknowledged limited progress. "While we maintain some contact, it has not yielded significant outcomes. With the recent change in government, we aim to engage the new administration and strengthen collaboration with like-minded nations. The passing of this act by Congress reflects growing international support for Tibet's cause," he explained.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama Sends Condolences on the Passing of Former Prime Minister Manmohan Singh

27 December 2024, CTA

His Holiness the Dalai Lama and Former Prime Minister Manmohan Singh in New Delhi, India on November 10, 2018. Photo by Tenzin Choejor

On receiving news that former Prime Minister Manmohan Singh had died, His Holiness the Dalai Lama has written to his widow Mrs Gursharan Kaur to express his sadness.

"I will remember him in my prayers," he wrote, "and offer my condolences to you and your family at this sad time.

"Whenever we met over the years I deeply appreciated his concern and good counsel. I felt he was like an elder brother to me.

"Your husband was motivated by a strong wish to help others. He made a significant contribution to India's development and prosperity, especially its economic growth, improving the lot of the Indian people. He was also a good friend to the Tibetan people.

His Holiness ended his letter: "We can rejoice that for 92 years he lived a truly meaningful life—an inspiration to us all."

Official Resolution of Solidarity Regarding the Critical Situation Inside Tibet

27 December 2024, CTA

Preamble

The Snowland of Tibet, renowned as the "Roof of the World," was an independent country for millennia with a rich and profound history. It emerged as a formidable sovereign power in Central Asia, expanding its spiritual and political influence under the governance of the Three Great Dharma Kings and successive Tsenpo rulers. Subsequently governed spiritually and temporally by the Sakya, Phagdru, Rinjung, Depa Tsangpa, and Gaden Phodrang, Tibet was an independent country characterised by its distinctive religion, politics, economy, language, culture and customs.

Around 1949, the Communist government of the People's Republic of China began its military invasion of Tibet, culminating in the complete occupation of the entire region by 1959 and compelling His Holiness the Dalai Lama, Tibet's spiritual and temporal leader, along with prominent religious figures from various Tibetan Buddhist traditions and approximately 80,000 Tibetans, to seek refuge in India. The Chinese Communist government's brutal occupation resulted in the deaths of over 1.2 million Tibetans, the pillaging and destruction of more than 6,000 monasteries, and widespread environmental devastation through aggressive mineral extraction, deforestation, and the damming and diversion of vital waterways across Tibet. Tibetans have been systematically stripped of their fundamental human rights, including freedoms of religion, movement, expression, press, and language. In blatant violation of international human rights law and the moral conscience of humanity, extrajudicial killings, arbitrary arrests, detentions, and imprisonments are routinely carried out as the Chinese Communist government continue to enforce repressive policies designed to eradicate Tibetan identity, culture, and language. Tibetans in Tibet continue to endure great suffering akin to a living hell. Over a million Tibetan children have been forcibly enrolled in state-run colonial boarding schools as part of a broader effort to sinicize Tibetan identity, religion, and culture. In May of this year, the Chinese government forcibly removed hundreds of young monks from Kirti Monastery and Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery, compelling them to attend government-run schools while subjecting their families and communities to intimidation. These measures reflect the ongoing policy of the Chinese government to dismantle Tibet's traditional monastic education system, rendering these generational institutions analogous to a stagnant pond severed from its upstream source.

On July 12 this year, the Ragya Gangjong Norbu Lobling School in Golog, Tibet, was forcefully shut down. The school was established in 1994 after obtaining approval from various departments of the Chinese government. The school had successfully graduated over 2,500 students for over three decades, with hundreds still pursuing their studies. The forced closure of this private school dedicated to fostering educated Tibetan individuals has not only caused deep distress to its teachers, students, and staff but also has caused profound sorrow among Tibetans in and outside Tibet as well as among individuals globally who admire and cherish the Tibetan culture.

Although assessing the actual situation in Tibet remains difficult due to the stringent restrictions imposed by the Chinese government, media reports from 2023 revealed the detention of over thirty six Tibetans, the enforced disappearance of six individuals, the deaths of three, and the sentencing of seven Tibetans within that year alone. The introduction of a new regulation, the "Administrative Measures for Religious Activity Venues," has further solidified the Chinese government's control over religious practices, intensifying the repression of the Tibetan people's religious freedom, human rights, and freedom of expression. Moreover, the Chinese government is actively pursuing policies of forced sinicization and cultural assimilation while intensifying repression under the pretext of social stability and security. Tibetans who voice their opinion on online platforms are subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention, and imprisonment, often without legal representation or protection. They are further subjected to beatings and torture, leading to the deaths of many. The Chinese government's implementation of repressive policies aimed at eradicating Tibetan religion, culture, and identity have raised serious concerns within the international community.

From June 13 to 15, 2024, a European Union (EU) delegation visited Lhasa, the capital of Tibet, and the Kongpo Nyingtri area. They toured various sites, including monasteries, residential schools, resettled households, and a prison. This visit was followed by the 39th EU-China Human Rights Dialogue on June 16. The EU issued a statement on June 17 urging the Chinese government to protect the religion, cultural heritage, and identity of the Tibetan people. The statement encouraged more visits from the international community and civil society organizations to Tibet. It also called for the immediate release of Go Sherab Gyatso, Tashi Dorje, and all other political prisoners while demanding an end to the ongoing repression of human rights in the region.

On July 4, 2024, a statement concerning the human rights situation in Tibet by the Helsinki Foundation for Human Rights was submitted to the 56th session of the United Nations Human Rights Council, convened in Geneva, Switzerland. The statement highlighted that multiple UN human rights bodies over the last two years had raised concern over the escalating human rights violations in Tibet, which included the forced enrolment of nearly a million Tibetan children in state-run colonial boarding schools and their separation from their families. It also underscored the dislocation of a large number of Tibetans under the coercive "labour transfer" policy and persecution of Tibetan environmental and human rights advocates, resulting in enforced disappearances and deaths due to torture in custody. The statement emphasised that Tibetans in Tibet are unable to engage freely with the UN mechanism, in particular, the Universal Periodic Review (UPR), due to a pervasive climate of fear perpetuated by decades of oppression. With a peaceful resolution to this dire situation possible through dialogue, the statement urged the Chinese government to take advantage of this opportunity. It further called upon the international community to press China, emphasising that, as a Permanent Member of the UN Security Council, China should fully respect the rights of the Tibetan people and address the root causes of the Sino-Tibet conflict.

Similarly, in the Australian Parliament, MP Lidia Thorpe raised concerns about colonial-style boarding schools in Tibet. On August 19, 2024, MP Deborah O'Neill addressed the Sino-Tibet conflict in the Australian parliament, expressing profound concern over the suffering endured by Tibetans. The parliamentarian condemned the Chinese government for unjustly and unlawfully ruling Tibetan regions through force, systematically oppressing the Tibetan people and denying them their fundamental freedoms and rights. The parliamentarian emphasized that every individual has the right to practice their religion, which must be respected. She then highlighted how the Chinese government's assimilationist policies in Tibet systematically erode Tibet's rich cultural heritage, depriving younger Tibetan generations of the opportunity to learn and cherish their tradition, a situation, she added, that must be confronted.

During its annual meeting on August 5, 2024, the American Bar Association (ABA) passed a resolution calling for the protection of human rights and the well-being of the Tibetan people in Tibet. Two days later, on August 7, the ABA urged the United States and UN member states to investigate the ongoing human rights violations in Tibet and to take action to safeguard the fundamental rights of the Tibetan people.

On September 6, 2024, a joint letter signed by 13 independent UN experts was published, addressing the Chinese government's crackdown on Tibetan protests against the construction of the Kamthok hydropower plant in Kham Derge, Tibet. Initially sent to China on July 8, 2024, the letter criticized the Chinese government for failing to engage in meaningful consultations and obtaining informed consent from the Tibetans affected by the dam project. It also condemned the use of force and the arbitrary arrests of hundreds of Tibetans who peacefully voiced their concerns. Moreover, the letter highlighted that the local Tibetans were prevented from reaching out to the outside world, thus violating their fundamental rights. The experts expressed concern over the irreversible environmental consequences of the dam's construction, stressing its potential impact on the climate of the Tibetan plateau and China. They called for a comprehensive independent assessment of the project's environmental and human rights ramifications. In urging a halt to such unlawful projects, the experts also requested a detailed report on the situation, including the human rights implications associated with the construction.

The Friends of Tibet (Hyderabad) convened a meeting centred on the themes "River of Tibet" and "Water Wars in Asia" on July 15, 2024. The meeting discussed how China is intimidating the Southeast Asian region by constructing dams on Tibetan rivers. The meeting emphasized that the Chinese government's unchecked damming and infrastructure projects in Tibet, referred to as the "Third Pole" and the source of the world's major rivers, have doubled the glacial melting, contributing to global warming and posing a direct threat to the lives and livelihoods people in neighbouring India and other South Asian countries. Similarly, on August 18, 2024, Chinese climate experts published a research paper indicating that the changing climate of the Tibetan plateau, known as the Water Tower of Asia, contributes to rising temperatures in Tibet. This warming trend could not only disrupt global and Asian monsoon cycles but also exacerbate climate change-related disasters in China.

China's extensive mining and river damming projects in Tibet have triggered several earthquakes in recent years. Heavy rainfall on June 20, 2024, caused severe flooding in Ngaba Trochu County, damaging homes and roads in Dokha Town and Khalung Village. Vehicles and personal belongings were swept away, resulting in significant property damage. On August 3, a landslide and flood in Rikyil Village, Gudrag Town (Dartsedo), led to casualties and widespread destruction of homes and infrastructure. In early September 2024, intense rainfall in Tsolho claimed the lives of six Tibetans in Serchen County's Trelnag Township, while landslides in Honaguk village in Minhe County (Tsoshar Prefecture) killed three people. In Malho Tsekhog County, around 400 livestock perished, with extensive damage to roads, bridges, and homes. With mudslides submerging grasslands, many local areas have suffered significant losses of both people and property. Similarly, other areas in Tsoshar, such as Kadho, Tsurghor, Tsawa, and Tsawug, experienced heavy rains, landslides, and floods, leading to similar devastation. China's aggressive exploitation of Tibet's natural resources has severely disrupted the region's ecological balance, resulting in a rising frequency of natural disasters, including heavy rains, storms, floods, earthquakes, and landslides.

The persistent enforcement of repressive policies aimed at eradicating Tibetan identity, culture, and the environment by the Chinese communist government since its invasion of Tibet has led to the March 10 uprising in 1959, a series of peaceful protests throughout the 1980s and 1990s, and the widespread pan-Tibet uprising in 2008. Since 2009, there have been 157 verified cases of Tibetans who have self-immolated in protest.

The Chinese government is not only making misleading assertions about the freedom and happiness that supposedly exist in Tibet but is also propagating disinformation about Tibet's historical status. On July 12, 2024, the President of the United States signed into law the "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act," which received overwhelming bipartisan support in both the U.S. House of Representatives and the Senate. This landmark legislation establishes a clear U.S. policy that refutes the Chinese government's claims that Tibet has historically been an integral part of China. The law affirms the Tibetan people's right to self-determination, among other critical provisions. In a parallel development, on June 10, 2024, the Canadian Parliament passed a unanimous motion acknowledging the right of Tibetans, as a people and nation, to self-determination and as such, free to practice their religion and culture. The motion also highlights and acknowledges the systematic policy of cultural assimilation being implemented by the Chinese government against the Tibetan people.

To summarize, the Chinese government's persistent enforcement of repressive policies has perpetuated the critical political situation in Tibet, leading to the deterioration of the well-being of both the people and the environment. Reflecting this reality, it is imperative that the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile once again adopt a resolution of solidarity, as it has consistently done in its past successive sessions, at the 8th session of the 17th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile.

Resolution

1. Reaffirms and expresses our utmost respect to the unwavering courage and resolve of the Tibetans in Tibet who have made supreme sacrifices for the cause of Tibet, its people and dharma while under the oppression of the Chinese government. We earnestly pray that under the blessed care of Avalokiteshwara, the Buddha of compassion, they may be reborn in the Land of Snow and achieve outstanding accomplishments for Tibet's religion, polity, and We also express our profound condolences to their families and relatives.

2. The Chinese government must immediately halt its repressive policies that violate fundamental human rights and ensure that Tibetans in Tibet are guaranteed their rights and freedoms.
3. We firmly oppose the Chinese government's sinicization policy involving the establishment of an increasing number of colonial style boarding schools that separate Tibetan children from their families, communities, and cultural We also condemn the forced closure of the Golok Ragya Gangjong Norbu School under unjust hardline policies. Tibetans in Tibet must be granted the freedom to practice their religion, culture, and language as per their aspirations.
4. We demand the immediate release of the Eleventh Panchen Lama, Jetsun Tenzin Yeshe Trinley Palsangpo, popularly known as Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, as well as all Tibetan political prisoners suffering under the oppression of the Chinese We call for accountability regarding their well-being and insist that their fundamental rights be guaranteed.
5. Historically, Tibet was never part of China, and was a sovereign independent We stand ready to engage in dialogue to resolve the Sino-Tibet conflict based on the mutually beneficial Middle Way Policy. If the Chinese side does not make genuine attempts toward a resolution, the Chinese government will be solely responsible for any critical situation that may arise in the future.
6. We express our deepest gratitude to the government and people of India for their boundless kindness and steadfast support to Tibetans in We also extend our heartfelt appreciation to governments, parliaments, especially the U.S. government and Congress, as well as to the non- governmental organisations, dignitaries, and individuals who continue to stand in solidarity with the just cause of Tibet during this critical time.
7. We express our solidarity with Tibetans inside Tibet who have endured and continue to endure immense suffering under the Chinese government's repressive policies since the Chinese Communist government's occupation of Tibet. We also admire and praise the determination, courage, and invaluable contributions of all brave Tibetans in Tibet, both living and martyred. Tibetans living in free countries must seize every opportunity to strengthen advocacy for Tibet and lobby for support in respective governments while collectively working for the just cause of Tibet and the preservation of its religion, culture, and language. And so be it adopted accordingly with the unanimous approval of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile on September 19, 2024.

*The above resolution was passed unanimously by the 17th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile at its 8th session on September 19, 2024.

No interest in reviving talks with Dalai Lama's envoys from China: US Congressional Commission on China

27 December 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

The Congressional Executive Commission on China (CECC) has highlighted the People's Republic of China's (PRC) persistent unwillingness to engage with representatives of the Dalai Lama,

The CECC's annual report, released on December 20, criticised the PRC's lack of interest to resume meaningful dialogue. "The Commission did not observe any interest from People's Republic of China (PRC) officials in resuming formal negotiations with the Dalai Lama's representatives, the last round of which, the ninth, was held in January 2010," the report stated.

The CECC's findings underline a decade-long impasse in Sino-Tibetan relations. Between 1982 and 2010, Tibetan and Chinese representatives engaged in nine rounds of dialogue aimed at resolving the Sino-Tibetan conflict. The final round of official talks took place in January 2010 in China. Although the Chinese officials made baseless allegations against the Dalai Lama, Lodi Gyari, the lead Tibetan negotiator, later said, "We do not see any reason why we cannot find a common ground ... if the Chinese leadership has the sincerity and the political will to move forward."

The Tibetan government-in-exile, officially known as the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), continues to advocate for peaceful dialogue. In a May 5, 2023, interview with BBC Hard Talk, CTA President Penpa Tsering revealed the existence of backchannel communications between Tibetan and Chinese counterparts.

President Tsering emphasised the importance of dialogue, stating, "If the Sino-Tibetan conflict needs to be resolved peacefully, then there is no way other than talking with the Chinese leadership." However, he clarified that these backchannel discussions have yet to progress to formal negotiations, with current efforts focused on building contact and trust.

Former CTA President Dr. Lobsang Sangay echoed this sentiment in a 2014 interview with Reuters, confirming that informal channels of dialogue remained open despite the lack of formal talks. However, repeated attempts by the Tibetan leadership to resume official negotiations have been rebuffed by the Chinese government.

In November 2021, China indicated it was open to discussions with the Dalai Lama but limited the scope to his “personal future,” explicitly excluding issues related to Tibet.

The Dalai Lama has long championed the Middle Way Approach, a strategy seeking genuine autonomy for Tibet within the framework of the PRC’s constitution. In a 2008 appeal to the Chinese people, His Holiness reiterated his commitment to this approach, referencing assurances from former Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping in 1979 that “except for the independence of Tibet, all other questions can be negotiated.”

Despite six rounds of renewed dialogue between 2002 and 2008, the Dalai Lama acknowledged the lack of tangible results on fundamental issues. However, he reaffirmed his unwavering commitment to dialogue, expressing hope for a mutually beneficial resolution that respects Tibet’s unique cultural and regional identity.

Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel Congratulates Taiwanese Labor Minister Hung Sun-Han

26 December 2024, CTA

Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, the Speaker of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, with profound gratitude and admiration extended his heartfelt congratulations to Minister Hung Sun-Han on his appointment as the Minister of Labor of Taiwan. He extended gratitude to him for being a steadfast supporter of Tibet for the past many years as a member of the Taiwan Parliamentary Group for Tibet.

The Speaker wrote, “We are confident that, with your wisdom, integrity, and determination, you will work for the benefit and welfare of your people. We are grateful for the work you have done for the Tibetan cause and for being a true friend of Tibet over the years. Additionally, we appreciate your participation in the 8th WPCT in Washington, D.C., and your recent visit to Dharamsala, where we had the privilege of discussing the misinformation spread by the Chinese government for political gain, as well as the need for stronger ties between the Taiwanese and Tibetan parliaments.”

“I am certain that you will continue to strengthen Tibet’s voice both in Taiwan and globally, making a significant impact on the advancement of Tibet’s cause. We also send our best wishes and prosperity for your future endeavours as the Minister of Labor,” he continued.

The Speaker concluded, “Once again, I express my deepest thanks to you and the members of the Taiwan Parliamentary group for Tibet for your unwavering support and for standing with the truth of Tibet. I look forward to working closely with you to fulfil our shared interests.”

-Report filed by Tibetan parliamentary Secretariat

(Archive Image) From Left to Right: Secretary General Sonam Dorjee, Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, Taiwanese Labor Minister Hung Sun-Han, and Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang.

The Congressional Executive Commission on China (CECC) Tibet Museum’s ‘Long Look Homeward’ Draws

26 December 2024, ICT

The Congressional Executive Commission on China (CECC) released its annual report on December 20, highlighting severe human rights violations in Tibet. The report indicates a lack of interest from Chinese officials in resuming negotiations with the Dalai Lama, with the last discussions occurring in January 2010. It details ongoing restrictions on Tibetan religious practices, particularly Tibetan Buddhism, including bans on worship during significant events and limited access to monasteries.

Focusing on ongoing human rights abuses by the government of the People’s Republic of China (PRC) and the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), the CECC focused on the complicity of US and foreign corporations with CCP oppression. Pinpointing the actions of Thermo Fisher Scientific, whose DNA sequencers had been used by police in Tibet and Xinjiang to compile DNA databases of Tibetans and Uyghurs, the commission expressed apprehension that the technology could be misused for organ transplantation practices considering the existing accusations of forced organ harvesting in the PRC.

The CECC maintains a comprehensive database of political prisoners in China, providing valuable insights into the state of human rights and religious freedom. Of the 2,764 records of prisoners known or believed to be detained, 1,686 contained information about their religious affiliation. Notably, Tibetan Buddhism represents the largest religious group among these prisoners. 678 prisoners are affiliated with Tibetan Buddhism, making it the most represented religious group in the database. The database also reveals significant information about the ethnic background of detainees. Out of 1,693 active detentions with available ethnic information, 790 are ethnically Tibetan. This data underscores the disproportionate targeting of Tibetans and practitioners of Tibetan Buddhism by Chinese authorities. The high number of Tibetan detainees, both in terms of religious affiliation and ethnicity, highlights the ongoing suppression of Tibetan culture, religion, and identity within China occupied Tibet.

The CECC also notes PRC officials and state, and Party controlled media continued use of the Mandarin Chinese – derived term “Xizang” instead of Tibet in English-language communications during 2024. The adoption of “Xizang” in English-language communications represents a strategic move by the PRC to influence the narrative surrounding Tibet on the global stage. By promoting this Chinese-derived term, the Chinese government aims to normalize its perspective on Tibet’s status and history in international discourse.

In the findings on Tibet (p. 241-255), the Commission highlighted violations of Tibetan language and cultural rights, restrictions on freedom of expression, continuing limitations on access to Tibetan areas, and constraints on religious freedom for Tibetans. The CECC specifically drew attention to the large-scale protests that erupted in February 2024 in Derge County against a planned hydroelectric dam on the Drichu (Jinsha) River, which threatens to flood villages and monasteries, including Wontoe Monastery, known for its well-preserved 13th-century murals. The commission noted that the planned displacement of Derge-area communities exemplifies a broader trend in Tibet, where Party and government officials impose resettlement plans without meaningful community engagement or participation in decision-making. Additionally, the report indicated that the Derge dam was not the only hydropower project endangering Tibetan communities; authorities in Dragkar (Xinghai) County began the forced relocation of monks from Atshog Monastery due to another dam construction.

CECC’s report further detailed the PRC’s ongoing efforts to restrict religious practices among Tibetans, particularly practitioners of Tibetan Buddhism as part of China’s broader “sinicization” campaign. Authorities issued prohibitions on various forms of worship and limited access to religious institutions, while also maintaining a system of residential boarding schools that threaten the intergenerational transmission of Tibetan culture and language. Overall, the CECC emphasized that these actions reflect a systematic approach by PRC officials to control and suppress Tibetan identity and rights within the region.

Press Statement from Tibetan Parliament on China’s Sanctions Against Tibetan and Uyghur Advocacy Groups in Canada

25 December 2024, CTA

PRESS STATEMENT

The People’s Republic of China (PRC) has recently imposed sanctions on the Canada Tibet Committee, the Uyghur Rights Advocacy Project, and 20 human rights advocates.

The Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile stands in solidarity with the members of the Canada Tibet Committee and the Uyghur Rights Advocacy Project, applauding their courage in speaking out against the atrocities and severe human rights violations committed by China.

We strongly condemn China’s decision to sanction these organisations and individuals. We call on China to immediately cease all forms of transnational repression designed to intimidate and silence those who courageously speak out for human rights at home and abroad.

Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

7,000 Visitors, Highlights Tibetan Freedom Struggle

25 December 2024, CTA

Tibet Museum’s ‘Long Look Homeward’ Draws 7,000 Visitors, Highlights Tibetan Freedom Struggle

The Tibet Museum’s traveling exhibition, “Long Look Homeward”, concluded its highly successful run across various venues in Bengaluru, captivating thousands of visitors and sparking meaningful conversations about Tibet’s history, culture, and its enduring connection with India. Through a series of interactive displays, educational talks, and cultural showcases, the exhibition explored key themes such as India-Tibet relations, the life and legacy of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, and the Tibetan struggle for freedom.

Launched in collaboration with local academic institutions, the exhibition traversed four key venues, reaching approximately 7,000 individuals, including students, faculty members, Tibetan community members, and visitors from all walks of life. Each event was designed to deepen understanding of Tibet's rich cultural heritage and its ongoing journey in the modern world.

The traveling exhibition began with a launch event at the Dalai Lama Institute for Higher Education's (DLIHE) academic centre during the institute's Tibet Week, where the exhibition attracted an eager audience of students, staff, and Tibetan scholars. A focal point of this event was a series of thought-provoking panels and documentaries on India-Tibet relations, the biography of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, and the Tibetan quest for freedom and justice. The exhibition offered an opportunity for students in the History Department and beyond to engage with Tibet's unique history in an academic setting, while also sparking conversation among Tibetan research scholars who attended in large numbers. The event's success was measured by the enthusiastic participation of 150 students, 30 staff members, and 25 Tibetan research scholars who engaged deeply with the exhibition's content.

The exhibition's next stop was Bangalore University, where it expanded its reach with a cultural collaboration between the Tibet Museum and the university's History Department. Inaugurated by dignitaries Dr. Jayakara S.M. and Chief Representative Officer Jigme Tsultrim, the event showcased a rich blend of traditional Tibetan cultural displays alongside thought-provoking talks. One highlight of this event was an interactive session led by Tibet Museum's Director Tenzin Topdhen, who delved into Tibet's numismatic heritage and how it reflects Tibetan independence. This event not only engaged students but also attracted the attention of the local Tibetan community, with 500 students, 50 staff members, and 50 community members attending the exhibition, ensuring a diverse and engaged audience.

Following the university's exhibition, DLIHE hosted a closing event, marking the end of Tibet Week. The event saw the participation of the Indo-Tibet Friendship Society (ITFS), with President of ITFS Gopi officiating the ceremony. As one of the major diplomatic organisations representing the Tibetan cause in India, the ITFS's involvement lent the exhibition added significance, offering visitors a chance to engage with the political aspects of the Tibetan struggle. Around 150 visitors, including ITFS members, Men-Tsee-Khang representatives, and members of the Tibetan diaspora, attended the event, further solidifying the exhibition's role as an important cultural and political dialogue platform.

Another significant exhibition was held at the Bangalore Tibetan Youth Hostel, coinciding with the global observance of Nobel Peace Prize Day. The exhibition here offered an intimate and culturally immersive experience, focusing on Tibetan traditions and values. It attracted around 450 visitors, including youth hostel students, members of the ITFS, and the Tibetan diaspora. The event provided a space for Tibetan youth to reflect on their cultural heritage, fostering a sense of pride and unity among younger generations.

The final leg of the exhibition was hosted at Dayananda Sagar University (DSU), where the interactive displays and animations captivated an even larger audience. The exhibition's two-day run at DSU reached over 5,000 students and faculty members, who explored themes of Tibet's political history, the process of identifying the reincarnation of the Dalai Lamas, and the long-standing relationship between India and Tibet. Through engaging multimedia, students were able to learn about the spiritual and political complexities of Tibetan identity, further expanding their knowledge of this rich and complex culture.

As the exhibition wrapped up its run in Bengaluru, it had successfully engaged a wide and varied audience across academic institutions, cultural hubs, and the Tibetan community, leaving a lasting impact on all who participated. The exhibition not only provided a deeper understanding of Tibet's history and the life of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama but also ignited critical discussions about Tibet's current political and cultural challenges. The event served as a powerful reminder of the enduring relevance of Tibet's heritage and its ongoing significance in contemporary global dialogues.

Through "Long Look Homeward", the Tibet Museum has not only brought Tibet's past to life but has also ensured that its future remains an active part of the global conversation on culture, identity, and politics.

Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel Educates Students at Leadership Workshop on the Evolution of Tibetan Democracy

25 December 2024, CTA

On December 24, 2024, Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel addressed the leadership workshop for school prefects and captains, organised by the Department of Education of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA). The workshop, which is scheduled to run from 23 December to 28 December, is being held at the Administrative Training Centre in Dharamshala.

In his speech, the Speaker discussed the evolution of Tibetan democracy, highlighting it as an aspiration of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, who entrusted the Tibetan people with the vision of a democratic system. Speaker Tenphel recounted the observations made by His Holiness during his visits to India in 1956 and China in 1954. During these visits, His Holiness noted the functioning of the Indian Parliament and the Chinese Communist Party's congress. The democratic framework of India, in particular, left a profound impact on His Holiness, shaping his vision for a democratic society that would be grounded in justice and fairness.

Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel Educates Students at Leadership Workshop on the Evolution of Tibetan Democracy

The Speaker went on to trace the development of Tibetan democracy, starting with the establishment of the Reform Committee and other key bodies by His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Tibet – important steps toward democratization. However, the advancement of Tibetan democracy was tragically interrupted by the unlawful occupation of Tibet by the People's Republic of China.

Further elaborating on the history, the Speaker recalled the solemn oath taken by representatives from the three traditional provinces of Tibet and the four religious schools of Buddhism at the sacred site of Bodh Gaya in 1960. This oath, which pledged unwavering loyalty to His Holiness the Dalai Lama, marked the formal beginning of Tibet's democratic journey in exile.

His Holiness, in his wisdom, instructed the Tibetans to elect three representatives from each of the traditional provinces and one from each of the four Buddhist schools. On 2 September 1960, these representatives took their oaths, officially becoming the first members of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, formerly known as the Commission of Tibetan People's Deputies. Since that historic day, 2 September has been celebrated as Tibetan Democracy Day, a symbol of the ongoing commitment to democratic principles within the Tibetan community.

Explaining the structure of Tibetan democracy, including the unicameral system of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel emphasised the added responsibilities of Tibetans as a diasporic community. He also discussed the roles and functions of the three pillars and autonomous bodies of the Central Tibetan Administration.

Khenpo Sonam Tenphel elaborated on the evolution of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, highlighting changes in its composition, duration, functioning, programs, and bi-annual sessions. He also covered key milestones, such as the adoption of the Charter of Tibetans in Exile in 1991. The current composition of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile includes 45 members: 10 representatives from each of Tibet's three traditional provinces – U-Tsang, Dhotoe, and Dhomey; two from each of the four schools of Tibetan Buddhism and the pre-Buddhist Bon religion; two representing Tibetan communities in North America and Europe; and one from Australasia and Asia (excluding India, Nepal, and Bhutan).

Reaching a significant milestone in the democratization process, the first-ever Kalon Tripa was directly elected by the Tibetan people in 2001. This was followed by a landmark moment in Tibet's history in 2011, when His Holiness the Dalai Lama formally transferred his political authority to the elected leaders, ensuring a future of full democratization for the Tibetan people.

Finally followed by a Q&A session, the Speaker concluded his address by advising the students who are the future of the Tibetan struggle to be aware of their responsibilities as Tibetans.

Co-convenor MP Tapir Gao of All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet Speaks on His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Indian Parliament

24 December 2024, CTA

Co-convenor MP Tapir Gao of All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet speaking in the Indian Parliament

On 16 December 2024, during the Zero Hour in the Indian Parliament, Shri Tapir Gao, Member of Lok Sabha from Arunachal Pradesh and Co-Convenor of the All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet (APIPFT), delivered a significant on His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

In his address, Shri Gao urged the Indian government to officially recognise the institution of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and to honour His Holiness with the Bharat Ratna, India's highest civilian award, in recognition of his global contribution to peace, non-violence, and religious harmony.

Shri Gao also highlighted the critical importance of India preparing for the eventual reincarnation and succession of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, particularly in light of China's efforts to unilaterally appoint its own 15th Dalai Lama.

These remarks were made in the context of rising concerns over China's interference in Tibetan religious matters and the potential consequences for both the Tibetan community and India. This address marks another important moment in the ongoing efforts of Indian parliamentarians to advocate for Tibet and strengthen India's commitment to the Tibetan cause.

Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, Speaker of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, on behalf of all Tibetan people, extended his deepest gratitude to Shri Tapir Gao, for taking Zero Hour in the Indian Parliament to deliver a speech about Tibet at the All-Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet's meeting on 17 December 2024 in Delhi.

Sharing a clip of his speech on his social media handle, Shri Tapir Gao wrote, "During Zero Hour today in Parliament, I urged the Government to recognize The Dalai Lama Institution, as the Chinese government's decision in 1959 to appoint the XVth Dalai Lama poses a grave threat not only to Buddhism but also to the Tibetan people and the future of Tibet. India and the world must act decisively to recognise the rightful successor, safeguarding both religious and cultural integrity, and ensuring global support for the cause. I also called for conferring the highest civilian honour, Bharat Ratna, upon His Holiness the XIVth Dalai Lama, in recognition of his unwavering dedication to peace, compassion, humanity, and universal brotherhood. This long-pending demand reflects the collective sentiment of the people, as His Holiness remains a true Messiah of Peace and a beacon of hope for the world."

China sanctions Tibetan and Uyghur advocacy groups in Canada

23 December 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

China has imposed sanctions on two Canadian organisations and 20 individuals connected to Tibet and East Turkestan (CH: Xinjiang) advocacy efforts. The Chinese foreign ministry announced the measures on Sunday, stating they took effect on Saturday.

The sanctions target the Canada Tibet Committee (CTC) and the Uyghur Rights Advocacy Project (URAP). The ministry stated it is freezing "movable property, immovable property, and other types of property within the territory of China" belonging to the organisations and individuals. Those sanctioned are also barred from entering China, including Hong Kong and Macao.

Sherap Therchin, the Executive Director of the Canada Tibet Committee (Photo/Screengrab)

Among those named are Sherap Therchin, executive director of the Canada Tibet Committee, and Samphe Lhalungpa, chair of the organization. Former Canadian diplomat Charles Burton and Margaret McCuaig-Johnston, both policy advisers at the Uyghur Rights Advocacy Project, are also on the list.

Speaking to The Globe and Mail, Therchin said, "This just makes it more formal. Members knew from the day they joined the organisation that they would no longer be permitted to visit or own assets there." He added, "Tibetans who speak out over issues such as mass relocation, environmental degradation, or the phasing out of the Tibetan language in primary education are met with repression. Having banned content on one's phone or merely contacting Tibetans in exile can result in detention."

The Canada Tibet Committee (CTC), in response to sanctions imposed by China, stated, "For 38 years, the CTC has advocated for Tibet within democratic, non-violent, and human rights frameworks aligned with His Holiness the Dalai Lama's Middle Way. These sanctions formalise the PRC's long-standing practice of denying diaspora Tibetans access to their homeland, but public participation in a democratic society is not a crime in Canada. We call on the Canadian government to protect those sanctioned and stand with our Uyghur and Canadian allies. This move strengthens our resolve to continue advocating for justice and an end to repression in Tibet."

The World Uyghur Congress issued a statement in response to the sanctions, saying, "These sanctions targeting two organisations actively advocating for Uyghur and Tibetan rights in Canada are clearly retaliatory. They aim to intimidate human rights defenders from these persecuted communities into silence." The statement added, "The WUC strongly condemns all acts of transnational repression by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), which seeks to silence human rights advocates. The WUC stands in full solidarity with the Uyghur Rights Advocacy Project and the Canada Tibet Committee.”

China’s measures come after Canada imposed sanctions earlier this month on eight former and current Chinese officials over human rights violations in East Turkistan (Xinjiang) and Tibet. Among those targeted by Canada were Chen Quanguo, former Communist Party chief of Xinjiang, and Wu Yingjie, former party head of Tibet.

China has denied allegations of human rights abuses in Tibet and East Turkestan (CH:Xinjiang), stating its policies aim to maintain stability and promote economic development. It has also called on Western nations to refrain from interfering in its domestic affairs.

Relations between Canada and China have been strained since 2018, when Canada detained Huawei CFO Meng Wanzhou at the request of the United States, and China detained two Canadian citizens on espionage charges. All three were later released, but tensions remain unresolved.

Dalai Lama Addresses Health Concerns Amid Succession Plans

23 December 2024, StratNews Global

The Dalai Lama's prediction of living for another two decades reassures followers, but greater clarity on his succession, including reincarnation details, may come when he turns 90 on July 6, 2025.

Department of Education Commences Leadership Workshop for School Prefects and Captains

23 December 2024, CTA

As Tibetan schools in India conclude their academic year for the winter break, the Department of Education (CTA) launched its leadership workshop for school prefects and captains earlier this morning at the CTA’s Administrative Training Centre in Dharamshala with a brief inaugural ceremony.

Education Kalon (Minister) Tharlam Dolma Changra, as the chief guest, graced the opening ceremony, offering profound insights into the experiences of educating Tibetan students and administering Tibetan schools.

A total of 43 student representatives from 16 different Tibetan schools, including two Nepal-based Tibetan schools, participated in the workshop. In addition, 16 teachers from these schools accompanied the students as counsellors and guardians throughout this six-day workshop.

Kalon Tharlam Dolma Changra addressing the gathering. Photo / Tenzin Phende / CTA

The event began with introductory remarks by Additional Secretary Tenzin Dorjee from the Education Department’s Academic Section. He provided an overview of the leadership workshop, emphasising that it aims to enhance the leadership skills of the participants while imparting other essential abilities in line with the objectives of the Basic Education Policy for Tibetans in Exile. He highlighted that the workshop also seeks to cultivate human qualities such as compassion and universal responsibility in the student leaders, while underscoring the importance of preserving Tibetan cultural and linguistic heritage, which is systematically undermined within state-run schools in Tibet.

In her keynote address, Kalon Tharlam Dolma Changra recalled the immense sacrifices and contributions made by the elder generations, under the leadership of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, in establishing a robust Tibetan exile community. “Always be grateful for the abundant opportunities and resources provided by our Tibetan schools, which are often unavailable even in prestigious local and private schools. You must uphold the responsibilities as Tibetans that come with these opportunities,” she said. The Kalon further encouraged participants to share what they learn in this workshop with their fellow students.

As a former school principal, Kalon Tharlam Dolma Changra specifically addressed the responsibilities of school prefects and captains. She emphasised that they must act as a bridge between teachers and students, helping to address issues such as inadequacies and disparity in treatment among students. She also disapproved of bullying in the school environment and advised everyone to adhere to school disciplines and maintain self-discipline. Additionally, the Kalon stressed the importance of good health for academic success.

In addition to these points, the Education Kalon expressed concern over the increasing number of children with special needs in Tibetan schools and implored school administrations and students to extend special services to support them.

The ceremony concluded with a vote of thanks from Under Secretary Dorjee Wangdue from the department's academic section.

Over the course of this leadership workshop, consultants and facilitators will explore various topics, including the importance of Tibetan language and culture, the evolution of Tibetan democracy in exile, SEE Learning, leadership and learning, conflict resolution, communication skills for leaders, the Education Department's scholarship programme, cyber safety and security, gender equality in schools, and career mapping. The programme will also include educational visits to the Dalai Lama Library and Archives and various CTA departments.

US Commission report highlights brutal right abuses in Xinjiang, Tibet, Hong Kong, etc

23 December 2024, Tibetan Review

The bipartisan, bicameral US Congressional-Executive Commission on China (CECC) has issued its 2024 Annual Report on Dec 20, providing "a detailed account of the People's Republic of China's (PRC) systematic abuses of human rights—most brutally implemented in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, Tibet, and Hong Kong", documenting "the widespread use of arbitrary detention and torture targeting ethnic minorities, human rights lawyers, and advocates for free speech, religious freedom, and an independent civil society."

Representative Christopher Smith (R-NJ) and Senator Jeff Merkley (D-OR), Chair and Co-chair of the commission, have said the report reflects the view of CECC Commissioners that the PRC's complicity in atrocity crimes and forced labor, and its efforts to use technology to coerce and control the Chinese people and undermine democratic freedoms globally, pose a distinct challenge to the United States' interest in maintaining universally recognized human rights norms and supply chains free of forced or prison labor.

In the section on Tibet, the report said the PRC continued to restrict, and seek to control, the religious practices of Tibetans, the majority of whom practice Tibetan Buddhism.

It said that as part of the broader policy of "sinicizing" religion, PRC authorities in Tibetan areas issued prohibitions on forms of religious worship, including during important religious events or around the times of politically sensitive anniversaries, limited access to religious institutions and places of worship, including Tibetan Buddhist monasteries and temples, and otherwise unduly restricted Tibetans' freedom of religion and belief.

It also noted that the PRC continued to assert control over the process of selection and recognition of Tibetan Buddhist reincarnated teachers, including the Dalai Lama.

The commission said it did not observe any interest from PRC officials in resuming formal negotiations with the Dalai Lama's representatives, the last round of which, the ninth, was held in Jan 2010.

Regarding its key findings, the report said the PRC authorities maintained a system of residential boarding schools in Tibetan areas that observers fear could constitute a serious threat to Tibetan society and the intergenerational transmission of culture and language.

It said large-scale protests broke out in Feb 2024 in Derge (Dege) county, Kardze (Ganzi) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Sichuan province, due to official plans for construction of a hydroelectric dam on the Drichu (Jinsha) River that will submerge at least two villages and six monasteries, one of which, Wontoe Monastery, contains well-preserved 13th-century murals. Security personnel detained approximately 1,000 Tibetans in connection with the protests; many were later released, but local authorities escalated surveillance and monitoring of local communities in the following months.

It also said that in contravention of international human rights standards, officials punished residents of Tibetan areas for exercising protected rights, including the expression of religious belief, expressing criticism of PRC policies, and sharing information online. Notable cases this past year were reported to include those of writer Pema, a monk and teacher at Kirti Monastery, who in a lone protest held a portrait of the Dalai Lama and called for the Dalai Lama's return to Tibet and religious freedom for Tibetans; Semkyi Drolma, detained for her participation in discussion groups about Buddhism on the social media platform WeChat, and later sentenced to one year and six months in prison for "leaking state secrets"; and Tenzin Sangpo, a senior monk at Derge's Wontoe Monastery detained in Feb 2024 as part of the anti-dam protests.

China's official media accused the commission of making groundless accusations against Beijing's internal affairs for political purposes.

"The rights and freedoms of the Chinese people, including all those living in Xinjiang, Xizang and Hong Kong, are fully protected," said a commentary by one Li Yaing on China's official chinadaily.com.cn Dec 23, using the Sinicized name for Tibet.

It claimed that the three regions had enjoyed good development momentum since the strict enforcement of the rule of law brought an end to the chaos orchestrated by the US, referring to protests for democracy, human rights, and independence which had majorly hit them at various times over the past 15 years or so.

Tibetan Leaders Advocate For Challenges Faced Under Chinese Rule in Delhi

22 December 2024, Rtv

The members of the 17th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile have been actively advocating for Tibet in New Delhi, highlighting the severe challenges faced by the Tibetan people under the Chinese Communist regime.

Photo: Central Tibetan Administration

The Tibetan parliamentarians, who met Indian parliamentarians from December 16 to 18, focused their efforts on raising awareness about the ongoing struggles in Tibet and sought support for their cause. Tibetans continue to face harsh repression under Chinese rule, including the suppression of their culture, language, and religion.

The Chinese Communist Party has implemented policies aimed at eradicating Tibetan identity, including restrictions on religious practices and the forced assimilation of Tibetan culture.

The situation is exacerbated by the detainment of Tibetan political prisoners, with notable cases such as the continued imprisonment of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, the 11th Panchen Lama, who disappeared into Chinese custody at the age of six.

In addition to cultural and religious repression, Tibetans have been subjected to severe human rights violations, with reports of torture, forced labour, and arbitrary detentions. The Chinese government's efforts to silence dissent have led to widespread fear among Tibetans, both inside Tibet and in exile. There are also growing concerns about the environmental impact of China's exploitation of Tibet's resources, which is contributing to global climate change, particularly through the diversion of water from Tibet's rivers and the destruction of its ecosystems.

The Tibetan parliamentarians have urged Indian leaders and the international community to support Tibet's struggle for autonomy and justice. They have called for China to engage in meaningful dialogue with Tibetan representatives, including His Holiness the Dalai Lama, under the Middle Way Policy, and to release all Tibetan political prisoners. They also seek international recognition of Tibet as an occupied nation with a distinct and sovereign history. (Source: ANI)

Parliamentarians Migyur Dorjee and Pema Tso Commence Official Periodical Visitation

22 December 2024, CTA

Parliamentarians Migyur Dorjee and Pema Tso Commence Official Periodical Visitation

As per the program of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, a parliamentary delegation consisting of parliamentarians Migyur Dorjee and Pema Tso began their periodical visitation program to Norgyeling Tibetan settlement of Bhandara in Maharashtra, Phendeling Tibetan settlement of Mainpat in Chhattisgarh, and Tibetan sweater sellers in the states of Maharashtra, Madhya Pradesh, and Chhattisgarh. They are scheduled to visit aforementioned settlements and places from 19 December 2024 to 4 January 2025.

On 19 December, two parliament members arrived at Nagpur airport from Delhi. Yeshe, the accountant from Bhandara Settlement Office, and driver Rinchen were there to welcome them at the airport.

Organized by Samten Yeshe, an executive member and cyclist for the Bharat Tibet Sahyog Movement (BTSM), a gathering was held at 4:40 PM that day at the Women's College in Nagpur. The meeting was attended by over 50 people, including BTSM National Advisor Ashok Mendhe, BTSM Maharashtra State President Prof. Vijay Kewalramani, Samta Sainik Dal's National Director Sunil Sariputta, along with other senior leaders, members, and the college principal and teachers.

During this event, the two parliament members expressed gratitude to the Indian government and people for their continued support and solidarity with Tibetans. They explained how Tibetans, under His Holiness the Dalai Lama's leadership, have preserved and promoted Buddhism, India's ancient wisdom tradition, for many centuries. However, since China's occupation of Tibet in 1959, they described the critical situation where the Chinese Communist government has been implementing policies to eliminate Tibetan religion, culture, language, and identity.

Many Indian Tibet supporters participated in the meeting and emphasised the brotherly relationship between India and Tibet, stating that as an elder brother, India must support its younger brother Tibet during these difficult times under Chinese oppression. They declared they would continue supporting the Tibetan cause until Tibet gains freedom and His Holiness and Tibetans can return to their homeland.

On 20th December, at the Nagpur Tibetan sweater market, they addressed the Tibetan sweater sellers about His Holiness the Dalai Lama's deeds, the work of the Central Tibetan Administration, including the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, and explained how the Middle Way Approach is the best policy combining wisdom and method to resolve the Sino-Tibetan conflict. They also emphasised the importance of preserving the Tibetan language, culture, and moral values for Tibetans living in free countries, especially given China's severe restrictions on Tibetan language use in Tibet. After a Q&A session, they departed for Chandrapur, arriving there around 3:30 PM.

-Report filed by Tibetan Parliamentary Secretariat

Dalai Lama set for extended stay at Bylakuppe Tibetan settlement

22 December 2024, Tibetan Review

Tibet's exiled spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, is to visit the Tibetan settlement at Bylakuppe in Mysuru district of Karnataka state for an extended stay. He will leave Dharamshala on Jan 2 and arrive at the settlement on Jan 4.

He will arrive at Tashi Lhunpo Monastery and spend significant time there, reported starofmysore.com Dec 21, citing the monastery's secretary Kelkhang Rinpoche.

Bylakuppe has the second-largest Tibetan Settlement in India, after Dharamshala. The Dalai Lama last visited it in Dec 2017, where he stayed for five days, the report noted.

No official engagements have been finalised beyond Jan 4. His Holiness will likely remain at Bylakuppe until the Tibetan Losar (New Year) festival in the last week of Feb 2025, the report added.

SFT France to continue protest as Musée Guimet refuses to rename exhibit to "Tibet"

21 December 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Activist group Students for a Free Tibet (SFT) in France announced plans on Thursday to intensify protests against Musée Guimet after the museum's director, Yannick Lintz, refused to rename its exhibit "Himalayan World" to "Tibet." The exhibit, which prominently features Tibetan cultural artefacts, has drawn criticism from activists accusing the museum of deliberately erasing Tibet's identity and heritage.

Representatives of SFT France, including Rigzin Genkhang, the Dalai Lama's representative in Brussels, and Pema Rinchen, President of the Tibetan Community of France, met with Lintz to press for the recognition of Tibet's identity. They demanded the accurate representation of Tibetan heritage in the museum's exhibit labels and catalogs, highlighting the ongoing suppression of Tibetan culture under Chinese occupation. However, Lintz refused to make changes, asserting that her decisions were not influenced by any "foreign power."

Facade of Guimet Museum (Photo/AFP)

Undeterred by the museum's stance, SFT France pledged to continue its campaign until the exhibit properly acknowledges Tibet. "The fight for the defence of Tibetan culture, and ultimately the freedom of the Tibetan people, involves preserving the memory of Tibet. It is clear that the Chinese dictatorship, as well as its supporters in France, have no place in this vital struggle. We wish to express our deep gratitude to all those who support us and actively participate in our actions. The fight continues, together!," the group wrote on their social media handle.

Yangchen, President of SFT France, emphasised the impact of their collective mobilisation. "

"I believe that this meeting happened because of the pressure and our collective mobilisation, and it is the result of our efforts. In the face of statements that we find to be demagogic, we will continue our struggle until our demands are met. We will step up our mobilisation and consider new actions, especially in light of the Guimet Museum's ties to the Beijing regime, as revealed by Radio France's investigation, among others," she stated.

The group has been staging weekly sit-ins, conducting social media campaigns, and distributing educational materials on Tibetan history and identity. Thursday marked their 12th protest outside Musée Guimet, which comes on the heels of their success in Paris, where public pressure led Musée du quai Branly to change its terminology from “Xizang” to “Tibet” for Tibetan artifacts.

Musée Guimet’s misrepresentation of Tibetan identity is not new. Tibetan writer Tsering Yangzom Lama, in an interview with Tibet Express, shared her experience of being misrepresented as “Chinese” after being shortlisted for the Guimet Prize. She promptly raised the issue with her publisher, insisting on a correction. Yangzom also noted that fellow Tibetan writer Tsering Dhondup faced a similar issue.

Dalai Lama’s office, Tibetan NGOs, CTA among top targets of cyber-attacks by China: Report

21 December 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) has launched a number of coordinated cyber espionage campaigns against the Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, Tibetan NGOs, media outlets, and the Central Tibetan Administration over the past 20 years, according to a report published on December 10 by the Tibetan Computer Emergency Readiness Team (TibCERT).

The report outlines that these cyberattacks have primarily targeted Tibetan NGOs, the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), media organisations, and the Private Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama (OHHDL). The methods used in these attacks include deceptive emails that appear to come from Tibetan organisations or human rights groups, as well as Distributed Denial of Service (DDoS) attacks and watering hole tactics. These efforts aim to disrupt operations, steal sensitive data, and interfere with the flow of information within the Tibetan community. Attribution of these attacks remains challenging. While technical evidence, including malware and attack patterns, suggests a shared origin for many of the campaigns, political attribution is more complex. Past cyberattacks have been linked to state-sponsored groups, such as the Chinese People’s Liberation Army’s (PLA) Unit 61398, which was named in the 2013 Mandiant APT1 report. These attacks are widely believed to align with the political goals of the Chinese government, focused on surveillance, censorship, and suppression of the Tibetan diaspora.

TibCERT’s report documents 63 public cases of cyberattacks, targeting organisations such as the Tibetan Women’s Association and Students for a Free Tibet as frequent targets. Tibetan activists, the CTA, and media groups also face consistent cyber threats. The attacks began in 1999, when the Tibetan community first established its online presence. Key events include the 2009 GhostNet operation, which affected government offices in 103 countries, including the Private Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and a series of attacks between 2018 and 2019 that exploited vulnerabilities in mobile devices, compromising both iOS and Android devices of key Tibetan figures.

The report identifies email attachments as the main method or pathway that attackers use to infiltrate a system or network which is responsible for 60% of incidents. Attackers have also used phishing campaigns and mobile malware to infiltrate systems and steal data.

In response to these threats, TibCERT has recommended several measures to strengthen digital security within the Tibetan community. These include implementing comprehensive digital security policies, raising awareness through training, and encouraging behavioural changes to enhance cyber resilience. Despite these recommendations, the report concludes that the threat of cyber espionage remains a significant concern, with the CCP continuing to intensify its cyber operations against the Tibetan community.

Japan’s parliamentary support group for Tibet elects new leadership

20 December 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

New Committee Members of Japan Parliamentary Group for Tibet with outgoing Committee Members, along with Dr. Tsewang Gyalpo Arya, the Representative of the Liaison Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Japan (extreme right top row) (Photo/tibet.net)

The Japanese Parliamentary Support Group for Tibet, which is the largest support parliamentary support group for Tibet, unanimously elected new leadership on Thursday. Member of Parliament Yamatani Eriko has been appointed as the new Chairperson, with Yamada Hiroshi taking on the role of General Secretary.

This leadership transition comes after the group experienced significant membership losses during the October elections. Nearly 30% of its members, including former Chairperson Shimomura Hakuban and former General Secretary Ishikawa Akimasa, lost their parliamentary seats after losing their seats in the election. Both outgoing leaders were members of the ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP).

Dr. Tsewang Gyalpo Arya, the Representative of the Liaison Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Japan, told Phayul that the elections to form a new committee were essential given the group's significant losses. "The new leadership, along with recently joined members of parliament, has pledged to rebuild the group's strength and intensify efforts for the Tibetan cause," he said.

Dr. Arya further told Phayul that the outgoing Chairperson Shimomura expressed confidence in his successor, Yamatani Eriko. "The newly appointed Chairperson has been a staunch supporter of Tibet. She visited Dharamshala in 2011 to meet His Holiness the Dalai Lama and has actively participated in the group's meetings over the years," Dr. Arya said. He also noted Secretary General Yamada Hiroshi's commitment to human rights and democracy.

He highlighted the pivotal role the Japan Parliamentary Support Group for Tibet plays in raising awareness about the Tibetan issue. "Our office shares a strong relationship with the group, as it works closely with Japanese parliamentarians and the government to inform the public about Tibet's causes and struggles," he added.

Expressing his gratitude, Dr. Arya thanked the outgoing leadership for their contributions and welcomed the newly elected Chairperson and General Secretary with traditional Tibetan white scarves. "I appraised the committee members of several pending issues and future projects while expressing my appreciation for their continued commitment to the Tibetan cause," he said.

Tibetan Youth Congress embarks on 15,000 km 'All India Motor Bike Rally' against China's "cultural genocide" in Tibet

20 December 2024, ANI

The Tibetan Youth Congress are carrying out a bike rally from the Bum-la Pass at the Indo-Tibet border in Arunachal Pradesh against the "cultural genocide" being carried out by China in Tibet.

This rally started on November 22, and will span 15,000 kilometres across more than 20 states in India.

Participants at All India Motor Bike Rally by Tibetan Youth Congress (Photo/ANI)

Today, on the 30th day of this rally, Gonpo Dhondup, President Tibetan Youth Congress, Dharamshala highlighted the main objectives of this rally which is to "expose the atrocities committed by the Chinese Communist Regime in Tibet and to oppose its illegitimate rule, which has persisted for over six decades."

"We aim to draw urgent international attention to the ongoing cultural genocide in Tibet, where China is implementing hard-line policies designed to systematically eradicate Tibetan culture and identity. These policies include the forced enrolment of Tibetan children into colonial-style boarding schools, restricting access to educational activities related to Tibetan culture, and imprisoning teachers and individuals who strive to preserve the Tibetan language," he added.

Further, the Dhondup urged the Indian government along with the international community to raise their voices in demanding that China put an end to this cultural genocide in Tibet.

"The forced closure of Tibetan schools and monastic institutions poses a significant threat to the preservation of Tibetan culture, language, and spiritual heritage. This blatant violation of rights and freedoms serves as a stark reminder of the Chinese government's relentless efforts to suppress Tibetan identity. Therefore, we call upon the Indian government, along with the international community and non-governmental organizations, to raise their voices in demanding that China put an end to this cultural genocide in Tibet," he said.

"For thousands of years, Tibet existed as an independent country, maintaining harmonious relationships with its neighbours through cultural and civilizational exchanges. However, following the unfortunate occupation of Tibet by the People's Republic of China in 1959, the historically peaceful Indo-Tibet border was shattered. Driven by its expansionist policies, the Chinese Communist Regime has instigated infiltration into Indian territory, posing a direct threat to India's border security and sovereignty. We call on the Indian government to adopt a resolution that supports the historical independent status of Tibet and recognizes the historical Indo-Tibet border," he added.

Notably, through this bike rally, we will be visiting Tibetan winter markets across India to promote awareness about the ongoing cultural genocide perpetrated by the Chinese Communist Regime in Tibet, as well as to emphasize the importance of unity against China.

Tibetan Youth Congress President also called upon the international community to exert pressure on China to cease its unlawful and ongoing actions aimed at erasing Tibetan culture and to respect the rights of the Tibetan people to preserve the cultural heritage.

He also thanked the Indian government for their solidarity and advocated for the Indian government to adopt a resolution supporting the historical independent status of Tibet to ensure long-term security for India.

Massive new Tibetan dictionary will help protect against Chinese encroachment

20 December 2024, The Christian Century,
Chakmo Tso

US Rep. Jim McGovern (right) looks on as Geshe Lobsang Monlam (second from right), and Sikyong Penpa Tsering (left) attend a ceremony for the presentation of the Tibetan Grand Monlam Dictionary to the Library of Congress on December 12. (Palden Gyal/Radio Free Asia)

A new 223-volume Tibetan dictionary containing definitions of over 300,000 words presented to the Library of Congress last week will play a key role in preserving the Tibetan language amid China's assimilation policies in the region, US lawmakers and advocates said.

The Monlam Grand Tibetan Dictionary project, which began in 2012 under the advice and guidance of the Dalai Lama, Tibetan Buddhism's spiritual leader, took 150 people working over nine years to complete. It is one of the largest dictionaries in the world.

The project was overseen by the Monlam Tibetan IT Research Centre in Dharamsala, India. The education software development firm founded in 2012 is funded by the Dalai Lama Trust, the Tibet Fund and the United States Agency for International Development. The dictionary is written entirely in the Tibetan script. All 223 volumes in hardback format were presented to the Library of Congress in Washington DC, on December 12 as a "gift to the US government and the American people."

A free digital version of the dictionary is available on various iOS and Android apps.

US Congressman Jim McGovern, a Massachusetts Democrat who was at the ceremony, called it "an incredible resource that will help preserve the Tibetan language for future generations" while highlighting China's attempts to phase out Tibetan, such as forcing Tibetan children to attend Mandarin-only boarding schools.

Geshe Lobsang Monlam, founder and chief executive officer of Monlam Tibetan IT Research Centre, said the project was a "true community effort."

It "involved the participation of many editors, scholars and heads of different Tibetan Buddhist religious traditions, which is why I take great pride in saying that this dictionary is truly representative of Tibetan culture," Monlam said at the event.

"It will benefit not just the Tibetan people in our preservation of our language but also others, including in the US and China, in imparting our ancient knowledge and culture," he said.

The dictionary was given to the Library of Congress because "Tibetans have shared a long friendship and shared values with the American people," he said. "We have also enjoyed the support of the US government in the preservation of our culture, language, and religious traditions."

"This dictionary serves as proof of the fruits of that relationship and support," he said.

Other speakers and guests at the event included Tibetan government-in-exile leader Sikyong Penpa Tsering, International Campaign for Tibet President Tencho Gyatso, and representative Namgyal Choedup of the Office of Tibet in North America.

The dictionary project began as an effort to bridge the gap between the modern and ancient by developing the vocabulary and terminologies necessary in the Tibetan language to keep pace with the changing world and technological advancements, Monlam said.

The dictionary preserves the unique lexicographical system in Tibetan while incorporating the standard principles and the practices of modern dictionaries from other countries, said Monlam, a Buddhist monk, scholar, and IT innovator.

The Monlam Tibetan IT Research Centre has been on the cutting edge of preserving the language. In 2023, it created software that uses AI to translate written and spoken Tibetan into English, Chinese, and other languages faster and more accurately than any existing translation software. Work on the dictionary is expected to continue for the next decade as the team continues to update it.

The Library of Congress's Tibetan Collection, established in 1901, is one of the largest in the West, including the entire corpus of Tibetan literature from the 8th century to the present. These include Buddhist and Bon-po philosophical texts and their commentaries, historical biographies, musical notations, the collected works of over 200 major Tibetan authors, bibliographies, and texts on linguistics, modern science, the social sciences, and modern literature.

The library's Tibetan Collection currently holds 17,000 treatises, 3,600 rare volumes, 57 different periodicals and over 15,000 photographic prints. — RFA Tibetan

US Congress extends 'Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act' for five more years

19 December 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The United States Congress has extended the 'Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act' (RATA) for an additional five years, ensuring its commitment to human rights and transparency in the so-called Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and other occupied Tibetan areas by China. The renewal, incorporated into the National Defense Authorisation Act (NDAA), will become law upon President Joe Biden's signature.

Originally signed into law in 2018, RATA mandates that the U.S. State Department to annually evaluate access to Tibet and imposes visa restrictions on Chinese officials responsible for denying Americans entry to the region. This landmark legislation marked a crucial step in challenging China's draconian policies in Tibet, where foreign visitors and media face stringent restrictions.

The key provisions of the renewed act include strengthening measures for rebuffing China's restrictions on American government officials, journalists, independent observers, Tibetan Americans, and tourists seeking entry to Tibet. The second provision mandates annual Department of Defense reports to include assessments of the People's Republic of China's (PRC) influence on the Tibetan Plateau, focusing on military and security developments. The final provision requires an analysis of the implications of the closure of the U.S. consulate in Chengdu, which previously monitored developments in Tibet whose responsibility has since shifted to the U.S. Embassy in Beijing, further from Tibet.

Several Members of Congress, including Senators Marco Rubio, Jim Risch, and Jeff Merkley, along with Representatives Michael McCaul and Jim McGovern, played pivotal roles in championing these provisions. Tenchoe Gyatso, President of the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT), praised Congress for its steadfast support. "Congress took a strong stand by including these provisions in the 2024 NDAA legislation in support of Tibet and self-determination across Asia," she stated.

"RATA is vital to continuing to bring light to the truth of how Tibet is treated by the Chinese government and ensuring that Chinese officials who try to cut Tibet off from the world are not allowed access to the United States. We hope that the President will swiftly sign the bill," she added.

All-Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet Adopts 12-Point Resolution on Tibet

19 December 2024, CTA

All-Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet Adopts 12 Point Resolution on Tibet.

The All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet (APIPFT) and the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile (TPiE) convened a meeting on 17 December 2024 to discuss key issues concerning Tibet.

Over 25 Members of Parliament from various political parties and both Houses of Parliament were present at the meeting including MP Bhartruhari Mahtab, Convener of the APIPFT, MP Tapir Gao, Co-convener of the APIPFT, MP Sujeet Kumar, MP Indra Hang Subba (SKM), MP Krishna Prasad Tenneti (TDP), MP Alfred Kanngam Arthur (INC), MP Dr Kadiyam Kavya (INC), MP Saleng A Sangma (INC), MP Mahesh Kashyap (BJP), MP Pratap Chandra Sarangi (BJP), MP Adv. Gowaal Padavi (INC), MP Dr A. Bimol Akoijam (INC), MP Sudhakar Singh (Rashtriya Janta Dal); MP June Maliah (All India Trinamool Congress), MP Harish Chandra Meena (INC), MP Amarsing Tisso (BJP), MP Kriti Devi D. Burman (BJP), MP Sangeeta Kumari Singh Deo (BJP), MP Manoj Tigga (BJP); MP Kamknya Prasad Tasa (BJP), MP Angomcha Bimol Akoijam (INC), MP Praniti Shinde (INC), MP Prabha Mallikarjun (INC), MP Bhoj Raj Nag (BJP), MP Rudra Narayan Pany (BJP), and others.

The event began with a welcome address by Shri Tapir Gao, Member of Parliament and Co-convener of the APIPFT. This was followed by a briefing on the latest developments in Tibet by Dolma Tsering Tekhang, Deputy Speaker of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile. Additional addresses were delivered by Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, Shri Sujeet Kumar, Rajya Sabha member and former Convener of APIPFT, and Shri Bhartruhari Mahtab, Lok Sabha member and Convener of the APIPFT.

Several other Members of Parliament also spoke during the event, highlighting various aspects of the Tibet issue. The meeting concluded with the adoption of a resolution on Tibet by the All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet.

Shri Tapir Gao, the Co-convener of the All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet, in his address welcomed reiterated his statement in the Indian Parliament during the Zero Hour urging the Indian government to recognise the institution of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and to confer him the Bharat Ratna. He also emphasised the importance of India preparing for the reincarnation and succession of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, especially in light of China's attempts to appoint its own 15th Dalai Lama, as stated today in the Indian Parliament.

Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang briefed on the latest developments in Tibet, highlighting the Chinese government's coercion of Tibetan children into colonial boarding schools in Tibet, aimed at depriving them of their birthright to learn their language, culture, and religion. She also addressed the self-immolation protests by Tibetans in response to China's human rights abuses, as well as the strategic policies implemented in China's ongoing Sinicization efforts in Tibet, among other issues.

Shri Sujeet Kumar, Rajya Sabha member and former Convener of the APIPT, in his address, recalled his past association with the BJD, which was founded by Shri Biju Patnaik. He highlighted that Shri Patnaik, a staunch supporter of Tibet, was one of India's foremost Chief Ministers, known for providing land for Tibetan settlement in the state of Odisha. Shri Sujeet Kumar expressed pride in his long-standing connection with Tibet and emphasised that India has never shared a border with China, but with Tibet, a fact supported by the historical name of the Indo-Tibetan Border Police (ITBP). He concluded assuring his steadfast support to the cause of Tibet.

In a heartfelt speech at the All-Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet (APIPFT), Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel highlighted the Forum's crucial role in uniting Indian political leaders in support of Tibet and its cause. He expressed deep gratitude for India's ongoing solidarity with Tibet, especially recognising the efforts of leaders like Shri Bhartruhari Mahtab and Shri Tapir Gao, who advocated for Tibet in the Indian Parliament. The speaker underscored Tibet's vital geopolitical and cultural ties with India, emphasising Tibet's historical role as a buffer state and its environmental significance.

Shri Bhartruhari Mahtab, the Convener of the APIPFT, emphasised the strong friendship between India and Tibet, underscoring Tibet's rich culture, religion, and language, which are under threat of destruction due to Chinese occupation. The Convener also reiterated the historical fact that India shares a border with Tibet, not China, asserting that the Line of Actual Control rightfully represents the Indo-Tibet Border.

During the meeting, several key agendas were discussed. One of the main topics was how to enhance outreach to various political parties on Tibet-related issues, including efforts to encourage members of the All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet (APIPFT) to raise Tibet's concerns in the Indian Parliament. Another important item was the planning of programs for the 90th birthday year (Compassion Year) of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, with the intention of organising events in collaboration with the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile (TPiE) to promote the values of compassion.

The event concluded with vote of thanks by Tashi Dekyi, Coordinator, India Tibet Coordination Office, New Delhi.

The following 12 points were adopted at the meeting.

1. Enhance reach out to different political parties.
2. Raise Tibet issues in the Indian Parliament by the members of All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet (APIPFT).
3. Programs to be organised during the 90th birthday of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama (Compassion Year), in collaboration with the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile (TPiE).
4. Recognise Tibet as an occupied nation with its own independent and sovereign past, backed by historical evidence.
5. Urge the People's Republic of China to engage in substantive dialogue with representatives of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, or democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community without preconditions, aiming to resolve the Tibet-China conflict through the Middle Way Policy and seek genuine autonomy within the PRC's constitution.
6. Climate Change Research: Call upon the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) to initiate scientific studies on the PRC's exploitation of Tibet's natural resources and its adverse effects on global climate change.
7. Human Rights Monitoring: Pressure China to grant independent human rights organisations access to monitor and report on the human rights situation in Tibet. Additionally, extend standing invitations to UN Special Rapporteurs, especially those focusing on freedoms of opinion and expression, peaceful assembly and association, and human rights defenders, to facilitate their visits to Tibet as soon as possible.

8. Release of Tibetan Political Prisoners: Urge the PRC government to unconditionally release all Tibetan political prisoners, including Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, the 11th Panchen Lama, whose whereabouts and well-being have been unknown since May 17, 1995.
9. Halt Oppressive Policies: Call on the PRC to cease its oppressive policies aimed at eradicating Tibetan culture, language, and religion.
10. Legislative Framework Against Authoritarianism and Disinformation: Establish a national legislative framework to combat China's networked authoritarianism and disinformation campaigns, which erode public trust in democratic institutions, increase political polarisation, and threaten regional and global stability.
11. To urge the legislators to express their concern and raise their voice over the human rights violations in Tibet at all the available platforms.
12. Any other matter with the permission of Chair.

ICT hails reauthorization of the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act in National Defense Authorization Act

18 December 2024, ICT

Three important provisions defending the rights of Tibetans were approved by Congress today with the passage of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA). The success of these provisions despite the obstacles posed by a divided Congress is a testament to America's ongoing support of the Tibetan people during their continued oppression by the People's Republic of China (PRC).

Trio of provisions

The first provision reauthorizes the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act (RATA), which provides a mechanism for the United States to rebuff China's restrictions on American government officials, journalists, independent observers, Tibetan Americans, and tourists seeking access to Tibet. The bill was originally passed in 2018 and has been renewed for another five years.

"Congress took a strong stand by including these provisions in the 2024 NDAA legislation in support of Tibet and self-determination across Asia," said Tencho Gyatso, President of ICT.

"RATA is vital to continuing to bring light to the truth of how Tibet is treated by the Chinese government and ensuring that Chinese officials who try to cut Tibet off from the world are not allowed access to the United States. We hope that the President will swiftly sign the bill," she continued.

The second provision provides for continued monitoring of the Tibetan Plateau in Department of Defense Annual reports. It adds an assessment provision on the influence of the PRC on the Tibetan Plateau through the Department of Defense annual reporting on Military and Security Developments.

The third requires reporting on the impact of the closure of the American consulate in Chengdu. The Chengdu consulate was tasked with monitoring developments in Tibet, and Beijing's closure of the consulate shifted this work to the embassy in Beijing, which is far removed from Tibet.

ICT thanks the Members of Congress and staff who worked hard on these provisions, including Senators Marco Rubio, Jim Risch, and Jeff Merkley, along with Representatives Michael McCaul and Jim McGovern.

Tibet advocacy group in Switzerland conduct awareness campaign on 35th anniversary of Dalai Lama's Nobel Peace Prize

17 December 2024, ANI

In commemoration of the 35th anniversary of Dalai Lama receiving the Nobel Peace Prize, the Voluntary Tibet Advocacy Group (V-TAG) in Switzerland organised a meaningful Tibet awareness campaign in Zurich. As per a press release by the Central Tibetan Administration, the event aimed to raise global awareness about Tibet's ongoing struggles and highlight Dalai Lama's enduring message of peace, compassion, and nonviolence.

The campaign sought to engage and educate the younger generation of Tibetans, fostering a deeper understanding of the critical issues facing Tibet today. V-TAG members organised a variety of interactive activities, including a quiz and a colouring competition, to promote creativity while sparking critical conversations about Tibet's current political and cultural challenges. These activities allowed participants to reflect on the importance of preserving Tibetan identity and culture amidst the ongoing repression.

Tibet advocacy group in Switzerland conduct awareness campaign on 35th anniversary of Dalai Lama's Nobel Peace Prize

In addition, books and images reflecting the teachings of the Dalai Lama were distributed throughout the event. Beyond raising awareness, the event highlighted the vital role of V-TAG in amplifying Tibet's cause on the global stage. As a grassroots organisation, V-TAG has been instrumental in rallying international support for Tibet, advocating for human rights, freedom, and the preservation of Tibet's cultural heritage.

According to the press release, the day served not only as a reflection on the Dalai Lama's Nobel laureateship but also as an opportunity to engage with the Tibetan diaspora, empowering them with the knowledge and tools to advocate for Tibet's future. The Tibet-China issue revolves around the status of Tibet, its political autonomy, and its cultural and religious rights. Tibet was historically an independent region, with occasional interactions with China, but it was incorporated into the People's Republic of China (PRC) in 1951.

Since then, Tibetans have sought greater autonomy, citing concerns over the erosion of their culture, religion, and political freedoms under Chinese rule. Central to the issue is the role of the Dalai Lama, the Tibetan spiritual leader, who fled to India in 1959 after a failed uprising. China views Tibet as an integral part of its territory, while many Tibetans, both in Tibet and in exile, advocate for "genuine autonomy" or even full independence.

Human rights abuses, religious repression, and the influx of Han Chinese settlers into Tibet further fuel the conflict. Despite international concerns and support for Tibet's cultural preservation, China's economic and political influence has made the issue difficult to resolve. The Dalai Lama continues to call for peaceful dialogue, though the situation remains a deeply contentious and unresolved dispute.

Sikyong Tsering Strengthens US-Tibet Ties in Washington Meetings

16 December 20224, DevDiscourse

Sikyong Penpa Tsering embarked on key meetings in Washington, DC, bolstering support for Tibet. Focused on international relations, he met with US officials, including Deputy Secretary Verma and Under Secretary Zeya, to advocate for Tibetan rights and autonomy amidst ongoing struggles with China over cultural and political issues.

In an effort to fortify international support for the Tibetan cause, Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration held pivotal meetings in Washington, DC. Among his significant engagements was a discussion with Richard R. Verma, the US Deputy Secretary for Management and Resources, as announced by the CTA.

Verma, who has a longstanding involvement with Tibetan affairs from his tenure as US Ambassador to India, expressed personal concern for the Dalai Lama's health, following his knee surgery. Their dialogue highlighted the enduring bonds between the US and Tibetan communities, with Verma reaffirming his dedication to Tibetan issues. This was succeeded by an hour-long meeting with Uzra Zeya, the US Under Secretary for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights and the Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues.

Expressing appreciation for Zeya's steadfast support, Sikyong underscored the importance of continued US backing. The meeting included Representative Namgyal Choedup, Alison Bartel, a Senior Advisor, and officials from the Bureaus of Population, Refugees, and Migration and Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor. The final series of discussions was with Senate Foreign Relations Committee staff, tackling pressing human rights concerns in Tibet and Tibet's quest for autonomy amidst ongoing conflict with China.

Political leader of Central Tibetan Administration, Sikyong Penpa Tsering meets US officials (Image Credit: Central Tibetan Administration). Image Credit: ANI

The series of strategic meetings by Sikyong in Washington amplifies the Central Tibetan Administration's diplomatic pursuits for global recognition of Tibet's cultural and political challenges. Central to these efforts is the complex Tibet-China conflict, intertwined with issues of sovereignty, rights, and national identity, drawing international attention and debate without resolution.

Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Concludes Official Visit to Nepal

15 December 2024, CTA

As per the program of the 17th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, a parliamentary delegation comprising parliamentarians Lopon Thupten Gyaltzen and Lhagyari Namgyal Dolkar successfully concluded their official periodical visit to Nepal from 30 November to 13 December 2024.

During their visit, the delegation met with Tibetans residing in various locations, including Kathmandu, Boudha, Jorpati, Phakshing, Jwalakhel Samdupling, and Phunling. They held discussions with Representative Tsepri Lopan Tulku Ngawang Chokdup and Tibetan Settlement Officers from Gyalsa Phakshing, Jwalakhel, Boudha, Jorpati, and Sha-Wa-Ra. Additionally, they participated in a closed-door meeting with local dignitaries.

Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Concludes Official Visit to Nepal

The delegation also conducted inspection visits to schools and offices under the jurisdiction of the Tibetan settlements and paid their respects to monasteries and lamas in the region. Their periodical visit to Nepal was successfully concluded on 13 December 2024.

This program was made possible by the generous support of the American people through USAID via NDI and SARD.

-Report filed by Tibetan Parliamentary Secretariat

Kalon Tharlam Dolma Changra Graces Commemoration of 35th Anniversary of Conferment of Nobel Peace Prize on His Holiness at Tibet House, Delhi

13 December 2024, CTA

Tibet House, Delhi, recently marked the 35th anniversary of the Nobel Peace Prize being awarded to His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama with an inspiring event that brought together dignitaries, scholars, and supporters to reflect on the theme of Universal Ethics.

The occasion was graced by the presence of Education Minister (Kalon) Tharlam Dolma Changra of the Central Tibetan Administration, who was invited as the Chief Guest. The event also featured notable Guests of Honor, including Shri Abhijit Halder, Director General of the International Buddhist Confederation, and Prof. Amar Jiva Lochan, Dean of Foreign Students at Delhi University.

The event began with a heartfelt tribute in the form of the Nobel Peace Prize Song, performed by the talented students of TCV Samyeling Day School, dedicated to His Holiness the Dalai Lama. This performance set a reverent tone for the gathering and underscored the significance of the occasion.

In her keynote address, Hon. Tharlam Dolma Changra expressed her deep gratitude to Ven. Geshe Dorji Damdul, Director of Tibet House, for organising the panel discussion on Universal Ethics, describing it as a fitting homage to His Holiness' remarkable legacy. She emphasised the importance of the "three Hs"—Heart, Head, and Hand—as fundamental elements for holistic education. These principles, she noted, are essential for nurturing the human values that are central to His Holiness' teachings.

She also highlighted the contributions of Professor Samdhong Rinpoche, former Prime Minister (Kalon Tripa) of the Central Tibetan Administration, who, in 2005, introduced the Basic Education Policy for Tibetans in Exile. This visionary policy prioritises the cultivation of inner human values, reflecting the wisdom of His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

A key focus of her speech was the Social, Emotional, and Ethical (SEE) Learning program, which equips both teachers and students with the tools needed to cultivate compassion, resilience, and ethical awareness. While acknowledging the importance of theoretical discussions on SEE Learning, she emphasised that true impact arises through its practical application in daily life.

In closing, the Chief Guest urged all attendees to make the commemoration of the Nobel Peace Prize Day meaningful by committing to embody the values promoted by His Holiness. She called on everyone to become messengers and torchbearers of His Holiness's vision, fostering a sense of collective responsibility for building a more peaceful, compassionate world.

Following the keynote address, certificates were presented to graduates of the Nalanda Diploma Course (4th Batch), the Certificate Course (2nd Batch), and the Tibetan Language Course (27th Batch). This moment of recognition underscored Tibet House's commitment to education and intellectual growth within the Tibetan community.

Additionally, the Publication Department of Tibet House announced the launch of three significant publications:

1. Tracing the Footprints of Je Tsongkhapa, an illustrated biography by Tibetan scholar Chukyi Gedun Palsang.
2. Research Paper Collections of the Conference on Theravada and Mahayana, a collection of academic papers presented by eminent scholars from the Pali and Sanskrit traditions.
3. A Special Edition of the News Bulletin detailing Tibet House's activities from April 2022 to December 2024.

The department also unveiled the winners of the Tibetan-language research paper competition, to be featured in the 12th edition of Zamatog Journal. Furthermore, Tibet House announced the completion of paper submissions by three scholars as part of its prestigious academic initiatives, including the Thonmi Sambhota Scholarship and the Sambhota Book Series.

The Thonmi Sambhota Scholarship has been instrumental in fostering academic excellence, with Pema Dorjee being the first recipient for his pioneering research on 'The Stupa and Its Technology: A Tibeto-Buddhist Perspective.' To date, 22 volumes have been published under this initiative, garnering strong support from the academic community. Between 2021 and 2023, three new scholarships were awarded, and the scholars are now preparing their final papers, which will soon be published as part of the Sambhota Series.

The highlight of the event was a profoundly insightful panel discussion on Universal Ethics chaired by Ven. Prof. Kaveri Gill of Shiv Nadar University. The panellists included Dr Nivedita Chalill, founder of ARTH: Counselling and Arts-Based Therapy, who shared her reflections on the practical application of Buddhist psychology; Dr Bharati Puri, Associate Professor in the Department of Humanities and Social Sciences at IIT Delhi, who explored the intersection of ecology and ethics; and Dr Nilza Wangmo, Visiting Faculty at the IGNCA, Ministry of Culture, who offered perspectives on universal ethics as inspired by the teachings of His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

The panel discussion was a resounding success, offering a vibrant platform to explore various dimensions of universal ethics, including its relevance to secularism, psychology, and environmental ethics. The speakers shared valuable insights resonating with the attendees, sparking thought-provoking conversations on integrating ethical principles into contemporary global issues.

The event concluded with a vote of thanks delivered by Tenzin Kunyap, Secretary of Tibet House, who expressed gratitude to all attendees, dignitaries, and speakers for their contributions. The day left a lasting impact, reinforcing the timeless vision of His Holiness the Dalai Lama while providing practical guidance on how to live according to the universal values he espouses.

MPs from New Zealand and Fiji Visit Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

13 December 2024, CTA

MP Joseph Mooney, Member for Southland (National Party, New Zealand); MP Ingrid Leary, Member for Taieri (Labour Party, New Zealand); MP Helen White, Member for Mt Albert (Labour Party, New Zealand); and MP Rinesh Sharma, Member of the Fijian Parliament, visited the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile on 11 December 2024.

The parliamentary delegation was warmly welcomed by Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang, who greeted them with traditional Tibetan ceremonial scarves. The delegation was then given a tour of the parliament hall.

MPs from New Zealand and Fiji Visit Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

Following the tour, the MPs held a meeting with Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang, MP Tsering Yangchen, and MP Tenzin Jigdal in the Standing Committee's hall.

During their meeting, important recent developments including the situation in Tibet which continues to raise concerns, as the region grapples with cultural erosion, human rights violations, and political suppression were discussed. Tibet, historically recognised as an independent region, remains a focal point in the ongoing conflict between its quest for autonomy and China's claims of sovereignty.

"The Indo-Tibetan Border serves as a reminder of its historical independence. However, since the 1950s, China has exercised control over the region, implementing policies that have significantly impacted Tibet's traditional way of life," noted the Deputy Speaker.

As the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), led by His Holiness the Dalai Lama, has been at the forefront of efforts to preserve Tibetan culture, language, and religion. The CTA advocates for global recognition of Tibet's autonomy and the protection of its heritage.

Discussing current challenges under Chinese rule, they discussed how Tibetans face increasing restrictions on their cultural practices, including the suppression of the Tibetan language and Buddhist traditions. Educational institutions in Tibet have reportedly been used to promote Chinese propaganda, further marginalising Tibetan identity. Environmental degradation in the ecologically vital Tibetan Plateau, known as the "Third Pole," has further compounded the challenges for local communities.

The international community has expressed growing solidarity with Tibet. Advocacy groups continue to promote Tibetan art, language, and religion to preserve its heritage.

Emphasising the need for multi-lateral pressure on China to address human rights violations and environmental concerns, they discussed efforts to amplify Tibet's voice include campaigns on global platforms, drawing attention to the plight of Tibetans and the ecological importance of the region.

-Report filed by Tibetan Parliamentary Secretariat

Department of Religion and Culture Secretary Attends Long-life Prayer Ceremony Offered to Kochhen Rinpoche

13 December 2024, CTA

Secretary Dhondul Dorjee of the Department of Religion and Culture, Central Tibetan Administration, attended the offering of long-life prayers to Kochhen Rinpoche at Ogyen Mindrolling Monastery in Clement Town, Dehradun on 12 December 2024.

The long-life prayers were offered by the members of exile Tibetans from Gonjo, a region in Dokham.

At 8:00 a.m., the reverent lamas and distinguished guests, accompanied by a procession of monks, escorted Kochhen Rinpoche from his residence to the courtyard in front of the temple. As Rinpoche was seated on the throne, the ceremony began with prayers.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

Thereafter, Gonjo Long-life Offering Committee offered Rinpoche with mandala and three sacred jewels: the representations of Buddha's body, speech, and mind, followed by offerings from reverent lamas, Khenpos, and representatives of monasteries and Tibetan civil societies.

Upon the completion of the long-life prayer ceremony, a gold medal was bestowed in recognition of Rinpoche's sacred religious contributions and his unwavering benevolence towards all sentient beings. Later in the evening, cultural performances were performed as a mark of celebration.

The offering was also attended by Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, Kalon Dolma Gyari, and Parliamentarians Geshe Atong Rinchen Gyaltsen, Ven Tenpa Yarphel, Khenpo Kada Ngedup Sonam, and Geshe Lharampa Gowo Lobsang Phende. Dehradun Tibetan Settlement Officer Dhondup Gyalpo, former Tibetan Parliamentarian Gyari Bhutruk, and representatives of various monasteries and Tibetan NGOs.

-Report filed by Department of Religion and Culture, CTA

Department of Religion and Culture Secretary Attends Long-life Prayer Ceremony Offered to Kochhen Rinpoche

Tibetan Youth Congress urges Nepal to reject China's interference in the Tibetans' Religious affairs

13 December 2024, Organiser

Tibetan activists from the Tibetan Youth Congress (TYC) in Dharamshala have strongly opposed China's plan to send the Chinese-appointed Panchen Lama, Gyaltsen Norbu, to Nepal. They urged Nepal to reject China's interference in Tibetan religious affairs and uphold its commitment to religious freedom.

Tibetan activists from Tibetan Youth Congress at McLeodganj in Dharamshala opposed China's decision to send Chinese-appointed Panchen Lama, to Nepal. The activists demanded Nepal to denounce Chinese interference in Tibet's religious affairs and freedom.

Tenzin Choekey and Tashi Thargyal, TYC Vice President, said, "The Tibetan Youth Congress is deeply alarmed by recent news of China's plans to send Gyaltsen Norbu (Chinese: Gyaincain Norbu), the Chinese-appointed Panchen Lama, to Nepal. This move is a blatant attempt by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) to interfere in Tibetan religious and cultural affairs and further its strategy to assert political control over Tibet by co-opting our religious identity." The activist said that Tibetans rejected this move by China and saw it as meddling in their affairs.

"Tibetans both in Tibet and in exile, unequivocally reject China's brazen interference in our religious traditions. The Chinese government's installation of Gyaltsen Norbu is a deliberate effort to replace our religious leadership with figures loyal to CCP. This action is part of China's broader agenda to undermine Tibetan unity and erode our distinct Tibetan culture and spiritual heritage," he said.

"We continue to revere his holiness the 14th Dalai Lama as our true spiritual leader and honour his recognition of the 11th Panchen Lama, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, who was abducted by the Chinese authorities on May 17, 1995, at the age of six. His whereabouts and well-being remain unknown and we call for his immediate release," he added.

The activists urged Nepal to not let China-appointed Lama to enter Nepal, as doing otherwise would mean an insult to the rich Buddhist history of Tibet.

"We urge Nepal, as a sovereign nation with a rich Buddhist heritage, to resist China's attempts to use its territory for furthering these repressive policies. If Gyaltsen Norbu is allowed to enter Nepal, the government of Nepal will undermine the country's rich Buddhist history and threaten to global integrity and international standing of its Buddhist institutions. Any such visit will be viewed as a dangerous signal that government of Nepal is willing to tolerate Chinese interference in religious affairs of geopolitical gain. Nepal must reject any form of Chinese government interference and reaffirm its commitment to religious freedom and human rights," the activist said.

Tibetan delegation meets Dutch officials to discuss Tibet crisis

12 December 2024, ANI

A delegation from the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, led by MP Yeshe Dolma and Geshe Lharampa Gowo Lobsang Phende, concluded a highly successful advocacy mission in the Netherlands on 10 December 2024, marking International Human Rights Day.

During the visit, Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile MPs met with key officials from the Dutch Foreign Ministry, including Kim Peters, Senior Policy Officer for the China desk, and Mariska Meijerhof, Human Rights Policy Officer.

The hour-long meeting provided an opportunity to brief Dutch officials on the escalating human rights violations in Tibet, touching on critical issues such as China's ongoing repression in Tibet, the status of the Panchen Lama, and the future of the Dalai Lama's reincarnation.

The Dutch officials expressed strong interest and pledged their support for the Tibetan cause. They assured the MPs that Tibet-related issues would be included in future foreign policy discussions, emphasizing the importance of addressing the human rights abuses taking place in Tibet.

The Tibetan MP's visit aimed to draw international attention to Tibet's ongoing human rights crisis and call for stronger global action. The MPs arrived in Amsterdam on December 9, where local Tibetan community leaders, including Representative Rigzin Choedon of the Office of Tibet Brussels and former Director of the International Tibet Campaign Europe, Tsering Jampa warmly welcomed them.

On 10 December, the Tibetan delegation visited the Amnesty International office in Amsterdam to brief staff on the worsening human rights situation in Tibet. During the meeting, the MPs highlighted the crucial role of international organizations like Amnesty in defending human rights globally. They warned that without decisive action, such organizations risk being undermined by powerful states, including China, who may use them for political purposes.

MP Yeshe Dolma and Geshe Lobsang Phende also called for an independent fact-finding mission to Tibet, urging that it take place regardless of China's approval. The meeting was constructive, with Amnesty International representatives promising to raise Tibet-related issues in future discussions.

During the visit, a joint protest was held at Dam Square in Amsterdam to mark International Human Rights Day. Tibetans, Uyghurs, Hong Kongers, and Southern Mongolians, all of whom suffer under Chinese Communist rule, gathered to raise awareness of their shared struggles. The protest was marked by passionate speeches from the Tibetan MPs, the President of the Tibetan Association in the Netherlands, and Tsering Jampa.

Representatives from the Uyghur, Hong Kong, and Southern Mongolian communities also delivered speeches, condemning Chinese oppression and calling for global solidarity in the face of human rights abuses. The protest culminated in powerful chants and demonstrations against the Chinese Communist Party, demanding an end to the systematic violations of human rights.

The successful advocacy mission in the Netherlands is a significant step in raising global awareness about the human rights violations occurring in Tibet. Through their meetings with key officials and participation in the protest, the MPs reinforced the importance of continued international pressure on China to address its actions in Tibet.

A Delegation from India Foundation Visits Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

12 December 2024, CTA

A Delegation From India Foundation Visits Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

A delegation from New Delhi-based independent research centre India Foundation visited the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile and met with Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel and Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang on 9 December 2024.

The delegation consists of Shri Suresh Prabhu, Lt. General Arun Kumar Sahni, Shri Shaurya Doval, Shri Ashok Malik, Prof. Sunaina Singh, Capt Alok Bansal, Rami Desai, Ngawang Gamtso Hardy, and Chitra Shekhawat.

During the meeting, Speaker of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile (TPiE) underscored the remarkable achievements of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) over the past 65 years, particularly in preserving Tibetan language, culture, and religion despite enduring exile.

The Speaker also praised His Holiness the Dalai Lama's vision for a democratic Tibet, which led to the formation of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile in 1960 and the election of the first Kalon Tripa (Prime Minister) in 2001. In 2011, His Holiness devolved political power to the elected leadership, establishing a fully functional democratic system.

The Speaker drew attention to the dire situation in Tibet, where Tibetans face political repression, environmental degradation, and systemic discrimination. He urged the Indian leaders to combat Chinese misinformation and report the truth about Tibet and its people.

The Deputy Speaker, in her address, welcomed the visiting guests and emphasised the CTA's role as the legitimate representative of Tibetans. She provided historical context, noting Tibet's once independent status and its diplomatic relations with neighbouring nations. She highlighted China's occupation of Tibet as the starting point of its aggression toward India and argued that resolving the Sino-Tibetan conflict is crucial to resolving the Sino-Indian border dispute.

The Deputy Speaker also spoke out against Chinese policies that restrict Tibetan freedoms, including the indoctrination of Tibetan children in Chinese-run boarding schools, and criticised the destruction of Tibetan language and religion. She called on nations that support China's One-China policy to reconsider their stance, pointing out that such support ignores historical realities.

In conclusion, the Deputy Speaker stressed the pivotal role India, along with the CTA, can play in resolving the Sino-Tibetan conflict and urged a reassessment of India's foreign policy toward Tibet.

-Report filed by Tibetan Parliamentary Secretariat

UN Forum: ICT highlights erasure of Tibetan identity through the PRC's educational policies

12 December 2024, ICT

Mélanie Blondelle speaking at the Forum on 28 November. (Photo: UN Web TV screenshot)

In a statement delivered yesterday at the 17th UN Forum on Minority Issues in Geneva, the International Campaign for Tibet expressed its deep concern over the Chinese government's systematic erasure of the Tibetan people's identity through its education policies.

The two-day Forum, held on November 28-29, 2024, focused this year on the topic of "Minority representation and self-representation in public spaces and discourses.” “Denying minorities a voice is the first step towards denying their wider rights,” stressed UN High Commissioner Volker Türk in his opening remarks, adding that it “creates space for ugly, false representations of minorities that perpetuates stereotypes, fuels prejudice and incite hostility.” This is exactly what China is doing with its so-called “minorities” such as Tibetans and Uyghurs. By portraying Tibetans as backward and in need being modernized, China perpetuates harmful stereotypes that undermine Tibetan identity while fueling resentment among Tibetans, who see these narratives as demeaning and dismissive of their rich cultural heritage.

Speaking at the forum under the item on “minority representation in education”, ICT’s Policy and Advocacy Officer Mélanie Blondelle detailed how schools in Tibet have increasingly been used as tool to assimilate Tibetan children – meaning molding them into the dominant Han Chinese culture. She highlighted how Tibetan children in state-run schools are primarily taught in Mandarin, with a curriculum that is culturally irrelevant and deeply misrepresentative of Tibetan history and heritage. This is exacerbated by the coercive boarding school system and the closure of private-run Tibetan schools (recently illustrated by the closure of the Taksang Lhamo monastic school).

“Education should value cultural diversity, not destroy it. Tibetan children deserve to grow up knowing who they are, where they come from, and to take pride in their heritage,” Blondelle concluded, urging China to respect its international obligations with regards to the rights of Tibetan children.

Created 17 years ago, the UN Forum on Minority Issues serves as a platform to foster dialogue and cooperation on matters concerning minority groups. This year’s session saw its highest attendance since its establishment, with over 690 representatives from minority communities, governments, NGOs, and UN bodies and agencies registered. While ICT rejects the term “minority” for the Tibetan people, the organisation uses the forum to advocate for the rights of the Tibetans.

Tibet was also in the spotlight in Geneva during an awarding ceremony of the International Contest for Minority Artists on November 26, where Tibetan artist Laowu Kuang was rewarded for his work deeply entrenched in the themes of memory, freedom and human rights. In his acceptance speech, he perfectly illustrated the lack of Tibetan language education in Tibet, explaining he was delivering his speech in Chinese as he could only receive Chinese education since he was a child, and that in his native village in Ngaba (Chinese: Aba) almost no Tibetan from his generation could speak in their mother tongue.

Read ICT’s full statement below or watch on UN Web TV (from 01:14:47).

ICT statement

17th UN Forum on Minority Issues

28-29 November 2024 – Geneva

Item 2: Minority representation in education

Statement by the International Campaign for Tibet

Mr. Chair,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

The International Campaign for Tibet would like to draw the Forum’s attention to the systematic erasure of the Tibetan people’s identity within China’s education system.

In recent years, education has been increasingly weaponized by the Chinese government as a tool for its assimilationist agenda in Tibet. In this context, Tibetan children in state-run schools are primarily taught in Mandarin, with a curriculum that lacks cultural relevance to them. They are presented with a distorted view of their culture and history, in which their way of life is denigrated as backward, their revered spiritual leader the Dalai Lama vilified, and their history manipulated to align with the ideology and interests of the Chinese Communist Party.[1] This is not education, but indoctrination aimed at severing young Tibetans from their very roots.

This is compounded by a coercive boarding school system that separates Tibetan children as young as 4 from their families and communities, alienating them further from their culture and traditions and leading to deep psychological trauma and loss of identity.

At the same time, private-run schools that still allowed parents to educate their children in their native language and culture have been increasingly forced to shut down. Monastic schools, once bastions of education and transmission of Buddhist heritage, have been particularly targeted.[2]

These policies constitute a grave violation of Tibetan children’s rights, as highlighted by multiple UN human rights treaty bodies and Special procedures. They also pose an existential threat to Tibet’s ancient and rich culture – a culture of compassion and harmony that is more relevant than ever in these troubled times.

Education should value cultural diversity, not destroy it. Tibetan children deserve to grow up in an environment that allows them to know who they are, and where they come from and to be proud of their heritage.

We therefore urge the Chinese government to respect the rights of Tibetan children guaranteed by international law, such as the UN Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, both of which China has ratified.

Thank you.

Senior Journalists Visit Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

11 December 2024, CTA

A delegation of senior journalists, coordinated by the India Tibet Coordination (ITCO), visited the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile and met with Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel and Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang at 2 PM on 9 December 2024.

The delegation consisted of the following senior journalists: Narendra Nath Mishra, Political Editor at Navbharat Times; Pradeep Thakur, Editor of Governance at The Times of India; Keshav Padmanabhan, Principal Correspondent at The Print; Chin Wei Lee, Correspondent at Central News Agency, Taiwan; and Saman Husain, Correspondent at The Indian Express.

Welcoming the delegation, the Speaker emphasised that, over the past 65 years of exile, the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) has successfully preserved the unique Tibetan language, culture, and religion, while also focusing on the welfare of the Tibetan diaspora. He further highlighted the long-held vision of His Holiness the Dalai Lama to establish a democratic system for Tibetans, which culminated in the founding of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile and the swearing-in of the first 13 Tibetan representatives on 2 September 1960.

Senior Journalists Visit Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

Following His Holiness the Dalai Lama's guidance, Tibetans elected their first Kalon Tripa (Prime Minister) in 2001, and in 2011, His Holiness devolved political authority to the elected leadership of the CTA, leading to the establishment of a fully functioning democratic system.

The Speaker also discussed the critical situation in Tibet, highlighting issues such as political repression, environmental degradation, and discrimination against Tibetans. He called attention to China's propaganda and misinformation campaigns and urged the visiting journalists to report the truth about Tibet and its people.

In her address, the Deputy Speaker welcomed the senior journalists and noted the significance of their visit to the CTA's seat. She expressed gratitude for their visit to the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile and underscored that the Central Tibetan Administration is the legitimate representative of Tibetans.

The Deputy Speaker shared historical insights, emphasising that Tibet was once an independent nation with a distinct identity and diplomatic ties with neighbouring countries. She argued that China's aggression toward India began with its occupation of Tibet, and that the resolution of the Sino-Tibetan conflict is key to resolving the Sino-Indian border dispute.

On the restrictions imposed on Tibetans by the Chinese government, the Deputy Speaker spoke about the systematic indoctrination of Tibetan children in Chinese-run boarding schools, where they are subjected to fear and Communist ideology. She also addressed the destruction of Tibetan language and religion, with policies aimed at eradicating Tibetan identity.

The Deputy Speaker further criticised countries that support China's One-China policy for business interests, without regard to the historical facts, and called on these nations to reconsider their stance against China's dictates.

Concluding her remarks, the Deputy Speaker emphasised the important role that India, with His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration in India, can play in resolving the Sino-Tibetan conflict by reassessing its foreign policy toward Tibet.

-Report filed by Tibetan Parliamentary Secretariat

Tibetan leader calls for independent Tibet as key to Sino-Indian border resolution

11 December 2024, Times of India

No Sino-Indian talks on peaceful resolution of the border issues will achieve its intended goal unless the two sides first decides to resolve the 'Akhand Tibet' matter, restoring freedom of life and liberty to millions of Tibetans, said Dolma Gyari, the acting Sikyong (president) of Tibetan govt in exile here on Tuesday.

Gyari, who is also the minister for department of security (defence minister) of the central Tibetan administration, says for a permanent peace with China, the only option is recognition of a unified Tibet as an independent state.

"In the 1914 Shimla accord, it was Tibet which had signed the pact with India where it acknowledged Arunachal as part of India. For a permanent resolution of the border conflict, China must recognize Tibet as an independent state," she said.

The Tibetan acting president's comments came during an exclusive interaction with a media delegation where she emphasised that the Tibet issue was central to all dialogues between India and China on the disputed borders.

On Tuesday, she also hosted a delegation of MPs from New Zealand and Fiji, celebrating the 35th anniversary of conferment of Nobel Peace prize to HH Dalai Lama. Former union minister Suresh Prabhu was a special guest on the occasion where the foreign delegation expressed solidarity with the Tibetan cause and also criticized human rights violations by China in the occupied territory.

"The Central Tibetan Administration believes that Arunachal Pradesh and any other territories disputed by China are inseparable and integral parts of India," said Gyari.

Expressing her confidence of resolution of Tibet issue under PM Modi, the minister observed that "India is going in the right direction. Today's South Block (MEA) understands better than what they did 10 years ago."

Dharamshala is also preparing for the celebrations next year of Dalai Lama's 90th birthday as the 'global year of compassion'.

35th Dalai Lama Nobel Peace Prize anniversary marked with New Zealand, Fiji MP guests

11 December 2024, Tibetan Review

-Tibetan communities across the free world commemorated the 35th anniversary of the conferment of the Nobel Peace Prize on His Holiness the Dalai Lama on Dec 10, joined by supporters from their host and visitor communities, with the main event being organized by the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) at the Tsuglakhang, the main Buddhist temple in Dharamshala, India.

The day was also celebrated as the 76th international Human Rights Day, marking the UN General Assembly's adoption and proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The statement of the Kashag (cabinet), delivered by the Department of Security Kalon (minister) Mrs Dolma Gyari, highlighted the CTA's plan for a year-long (Jul 6, 2025 to Jul 6, 2026) celebrations next year of a global Year of Compassion to mark the 90th Birthday of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. She said the focus will especially be on His Holiness's four principal commitments towards the promotion of human values and religious harmony.

The statement reaffirmed the CTA's commitment to finding a peaceful resolution to the Sino-Tibet conflict through the Middle Way Approach, "which seeks genuine autonomy for all Tibetans living in the traditional Tibetan areas to handle all its own religious, cultural, linguistic, education, health, and environmental affairs, as guaranteed by the Chinese Constitution and under the Law on Regional National Autonomy."

Like the Kashag's statement, the statement of the Tibetan Parliament in exile, delivered earlier by Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, highlighted His Holiness's enormous contributions towards the preservation of Tibetan culture, carrying forward the Tibetan national struggle and finding a solution for the issue, and the promotion of global peace and inter-religious harmony.

The gathering was also addressed by members of parliamentary delegations from New Zealand (Joseph Mooney, Ingrid Leary, and Helen White) and Fiji (Rinesh Sharma) who were especially invited for the occasion, as was Mr Suresh Prabhu, Chairman of the India Foundation, Delhi, and former Government of India minister.

The delegation member also addressed a press conference at which they expressed solidarity with the Tibetan struggle for freedom and human rights. Ingrid Leary said that while the New Zealand delegation members were from different political parties, they were united in their support for human rights and their respect for His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

Rinesh Sharma, opposition member in the Fijian parliament, said he would raise a discussion of the urgent situation in Tibet in parliament.

Those were not official delegations but a demonstration of individual commitments to human rights and an understanding of the Tibetan cause, it was explained.

The 28th Himalayan Festival was held over two days at a separate location, featuring performances by diverse ethnic and cultural groups from Himachal Pradesh and neighbouring states.

The day was also marked by the Buddhists living in Itanagar and surrounding areas in India's northeastern Tibet-border state of Arunachal Pradesh, organized by the Tawang Monastery and Itanagar Buddhist Culture Society.

Tarh Tarak, chairman of the Tibet support Group (TSGAP) in the state and vice-president of the state BJP unit, spoke as the chief guest to pay homage to His Holiness, reported arunachalobserver.org Dec 11. He has referred to the state's ethnic affinity with Tibet.

A number of other prominent public figures also addressed the gathering, including the state BJP general secretary Nalong Mize, the report said.

Protest in Vienna Unites Tibetans, Uyghurs, and Christians Against CCP Oppression

11 December 2024, Devdiscourse

On International Human Rights Day, a protest outside the Chinese Embassy in Vienna united Tibetans, Uyghurs, and Christians demanding an end to Chinese Communist Party oppression. Demonstrators called for global action against the ongoing human rights abuses and systemic oppression of marginalized communities in China by the CCP.

On International Human Rights Day, a significant protest unfolded outside the Chinese Embassy in Vienna as Tibetans, Uyghurs, and Chinese Christians united against ongoing oppression by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). The event, spearheaded by the Tibetan Community Organisation in Vienna, spotlighted widespread human rights abuses by the Chinese authorities

Leading the demonstration, Tibetan diaspora members waved flags and held banners condemning the CCP's persistent violations in Tibet. They voiced concerns over issues such as the demolition of monasteries, enforced relocation of Tibetan children, and what many called cultural genocide. The protesters urged global recognition of these atrocities and pressed for international intervention to halt Chinese repressive policies.

Uyghur activists stood alongside their Tibetan peers, highlighting the severe persecution faced by Uyghurs, including mass detentions, forced labor, and the destruction of religious sites. Joined by Chinese Christians, who protested against the state's control over religious practices, they collectively demanded an end to CCP tyranny and urged the world to hold China accountable.

Buddhists celebrate 35th anniversary of Nobel Peace prize conferment on HH 14th Dalai Lama

11 December 2024, Arunachal Observer

The Buddhists living in Itanagar and surrounding area celebrated 35th anniversary of conferment of Nobel Peace prize to His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama at Thupten Gatsel Ling Gonpa here on Tuesday, which was organized by Gaden Namgyal Lhatse Welfare & Charitable Society, Tawang Monastery and Itanagar Buddhist Culture Society (IBCS).

The 14th Dalai Lama (Tenzin Gyatso) was awarded Nobel Peace Prize on 10.12.1989 in recognition of his efforts to peacefully resolve Tibet conflict and preserve the cultural heritage of his people. The Nobel committee also cited his advocacy for tolerance and mutual respect.

In his acceptance speech at Oslo, the Dalai Lama had criticized China for using force against student protesters in Tiananmen Square in 1989. He also had emphasized the importance of non-violence and his desire to dialogue with China to resolve the situation. The Nobel committee chairman had said that the award was also a tribute to Mahatma Gandhi, who had championed nonviolence as the right way to achieve a peaceful society.

It may be recalled here that the 14th Dalai Lama had flee from Potala Palace on 17.03.1959 after China laid a siege in Lhasa followed by repression of Tibetans. The spiritual leader with his entourage had crossed McMahon Line on 31.03.59 and stepped into India at border post in Chuthangmu near Tawang where Assam Rifles personnel had received his holiness. He was taken to Tawang Monastery before proceeding to Himachal Pradesh to set up his Tibetan Govt in Exile headquarters in Dharamshala.

The Dalai Lama has remained in exile since then. The tragedy and defiance of the 1959 Tibetan Uprising is marked with events around the world on every March 10. While Tibet Support Groups were formed across the world, including in Arunachal Pradesh with Tarh Tarak as chairman and Core Group for Tibetan Cause headed by R K Khrimy as national convener, to make all out efforts for Tibetans across the world to return home safely to lead a dignified life .

Tarak, also state BJP vice president, speaking as chief guest, lauded the organizers and paid homage to HH for his kindness, faith and sense of gratification to be revered across the world for which he was conferred with Nobel Peace Prize.

Highlighting TSGAP activities, he assured continued support to freedom struggle and welfare of Tibetan community living in the state.

Advocating freedom of Tibet from the clutch of China, he said that Abotani group of Tibet had migrated about 500 to 1000 years ago and settled down in this state.

He said that HH has been consistently advocating non-violence, preservation of Tibetan art, culture and tradition which inspired millions of peoples globally. Justifying demand for freedom of Tibet, he urged the Govt to confer Indian highest civilian award 'Bharat Ratna' on HH.

Highlighting biography of HH, Ven Lobsang Tengyal said that he devoted his life for the welfare of the humanity, Tibetans in particular, for a peaceful resolution to their decades-old struggle for freedom.

Dr. Leiky Wangchuk, DOKAA assistant director Deden Norbu also addressed the gathering, including state BJP general secretary Nalong Mize, TSGAP team Anok Wangsa (advisor), Hiniem Tachu (VP), Nima Sange (secretary general), TMWC president Pema Darjee, IBCS secretary Pema Phuntso, Gomba in-charge Rinchin Norbu, followed by a traditional colourful cultural programme, according to TSGAP sources.

Arunachal Pradesh boasts of Tawang Monastery, a magnificent example of Mahayana Buddhism and largest monastery in India, which was founded in 17th century by Merak Lama Lodre Gyatso in accordance with the wishes of 5th Dalai Lama. Coincidentally, Chief Minister Pema Khandu, a Buddhist, belongs to Tawang district. And Golden Pagoda, also known as Kongmu Kham (in Tai-Khamti of Namsai language), is a Burmese-style Buddhist temple, built by present Deputy Chief Minister Chowna Mein, spread in 20 hectare area, was opened to public in 2010. Situated inside Pariyati Sasana Buddha Vihara, the World Tripitaka Foundation is currently developing it as first international Tripiṭaka center in India.

Tibetans and Tibet Activists Call On Nepal to Reject China's Illegitimate Panchen Lama Visit

11 December 2024, International Tibet Network

Tibet activists worldwide have expressed alarm at reports[1] that Gyaltsen Norbu (CH: Gyaincain Norbu), Beijing's illegitimate Panchen Lama, is due to attend the 9th South China Sea Buddhism Roundtable Conference in Nepal. 139 global Tibet Network [2] member organisations have called on Nepal's Prime Minister to repeal any agreement that he can visit stating that "allowing Gyaltsen Norbu to visit Nepal when he lacks recognition or standing among Tibetan Buddhists... would violate the wishes of Buddhists around the world."

By allowing this visit, the Nepalese government will be complying with China's efforts to not only legitimise Gyaltsen Norbu as a Tibetan Buddhist leader but also support China's soft power strategy to co-opt the religious and cultural identity of the Tibetan people to solidify political control over Tibet. The Chinese government appointed Panchen Lama, Gyaltsen Norbu, was named by Beijing in 1995, in complete contradiction to the centuries-old tradition in which the Dalai Lama identifies the Panchen Lama. The official 11th Panchen Lama, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima—the recognised reincarnation by the 14th Dalai Lama—has been missing since 1995 [3], when he was just six years old and was forcibly taken by Chinese authorities.

Chinese government officials have repeatedly made it clear that Beijing deploys Buddhism as a tool to achieve its political objectives of supremacy in geopolitical, military, and territorial issues as well as the legitimacy of its occupation of Tibet. [4]

China's public relations strategy to elevate Gyaltsen Norbu's status within the Buddhist hierarchy, portraying him as "the highest ranking figure in Tibetan Buddhism" and the "leader of Tibetan Buddhism is central to its longer-term efforts to control over key lineages, including that of the Dalai Lama, and Tibetan Buddhism more widely.

UN human rights experts and expert bodies have raised multiple concerns with China [5] about the disappearance of the official 11th Panchen Lama and Beijing's reincarnation rules, citing that interference "undermines, in a discriminatory way, the religious traditions and practices of the Tibetan Buddhist' community.

The coalition called on Prime Minister Khadga Prasad Sharma Oli to immediately repeal any agreement that Gyaltsen Norbu can enter Nepal, ensure that any future visits by Beijing-appointed Tibetan religious figures are refused, and for the Nepalese government to oppose China's interference in Tibetan Buddhist religious affairs. The global activists further urged Sharma Oli to call for the immediate release of the 11th Panchen Lama, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, and his family.

Pema Doma, Students for a Free Tibet: "This visit represents a serious escalation in China's decades-long effort to co-opt Tibetan Buddhism to legitimize its rule in Tibet. Tibetans in and outside of Tibet categorically reject China's interference in their sacred spiritual life just as they reject the Fake Panchen Lama and Chinese rule in their land. The international community must stand with Tibetans in calling for the freedom of the real Panchen Lama, Gendun Choekyi Nyima, who has been missing since he was recognized by the Dalai Lama nearly 30 years ago."

Tenzin Yangzom, International Tibet Network: "China's interference in Tibetan Buddhism cannot be tolerated and allowing Gyaltsen Norbu, China's illegitimate Panchen Lama to visit Nepal while the official 11th Panchen Lama, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, remains 'missing' for nearly 30 years will be seen as a complete violation of the rights of the Tibetan people and the Tibetan Buddhist community at large. Prime Minister Khadga Prasad Sharma Oli must consider the far-reaching, global implications of allowing this visit – implications that do nothing more than support China's ruthless attack on religious freedom – and refuse him entry to Nepal.

Tenzyn Zöchbauer, Tibet Initiative Deutschland: "Allowing the Chinese fake Panchen Lama, Gyaltsen Norbu, to participate in the 9th South China Sea Buddhism Roundtable Conference in Nepal would be a profound misstep. While the legitimate 11th Panchen Lama, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, and his family remain missing without any confirmation of their well-being, it is unconscionable to legitimize the Chinese Communist Party's violent suppression of traditional Buddhist practices by allowing such participation. The conference risks endorsing China's severe violations of religious freedom and its manipulation of the Buddhist leadership. Such an endorsement would be a grave mistake, lending credibility to the CCP's propaganda machine."

John Jones, Free Tibet: "As the birthplace of Siddhartha Gautama, the Buddha, and the home of thousands of refugee Tibetan Buddhists, it matters deeply how Nepal responds to Gyaltsen Norbu's planned visit. If it wishes to honour this responsibility, it should not be taking direction on Buddhism from the avowedly atheist Chinese Communist Party, whose own officials have been clear that they regard the appointment of Tibetan Buddhist lamas as strategic leverage to tighten their control over Tibet. The Government of Nepal should disinvite Gyaltsen Norbu and call for the release of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima. Defying Beijing may be awkward, but insulting the 500 million Buddhists around the world would be damning."

ICT testifies at European Parliament's hearing on EU-China human rights dialogue

10 December 2024, ICT

The International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) briefed Members of the European Parliament (MEPs) on the dire human rights situation in Tibet during a meeting of the European Parliament's Subcommittee on Human Rights last week.

The meeting, which took place on 4 December, focused on the state of the EU-China Human Rights Dialogue – whose latest round took place on 16 June and was preceded by a side-visit to the Tibet Autonomous Region.

From right to left Sarah Brooks (Amnesty International), Vincent Metten (ICT), Paola Pampaloni Deputy managing Director ASIA and Pacific at the EEAS, and MEP Satouri Chair of the Subcommittee on Human Rights.

Ineffective dialogue

"Despite the European External Action Service (EEAS)'s efforts, it is clear that the EU-China Human Rights Dialogue process has not provided meaningful results," EU Policy Director Vincent Metten stressed in his testimony, arguing China's human rights abuses have on the contrary intensified in recent years.

He called on the EU to consider reviewing the dialogue and exploring more assertive ways to press China on its human rights record. "The EU should prioritize real, measurable improvements in human rights rather than continuing ineffective dialogues that produce little to no tangible outcomes. The stakes for Tibetans, Uyghurs, Hongkongers, and all Chinese dissidents are too high for complacency," he said.

Worsening human rights situation in Tibet

Metten stressed that this review of the dialogue – which has been repeatedly called for by civil society organizations, including ICT in recent years – is especially urgent given the scale and severity of China's human rights abuses.

In Tibet, the Chinese government's assimilationist policies indeed not only violate the fundamental rights of Tibetans, but it also threatens Tibet's ancient culture and their survival as a distinct people Metten said, citing the coercive boarding schools system that alienates Tibetan children from their language and traditions; the forced resettlement of Tibetan nomads and rural population; and China's interferences in the succession of the Dalai Lama.

Metten also pointed to China's hydropower dam spree in Tibet, which poses a significant risk not only to the Tibetan civilization and environment but also negatively impact 1,8 million people downstream. Advanced copies of ICT's new report "Chinese Hydropower: Daming Tibetan culture, community and environment", published on 5 December, were distributed to MEPs.

Replying to a question on China's transnational repression, Metten finally emphasized the need of a common European definition and stronger cooperation to protect Uyghurs, Tibetans and other victims. Following is the full text of Vincent Metten's statement.

4 December 2024 Statement by the International Campaign for Tibet

Dear Chairman and Honorable Members of the Committee,

Thank you for inviting our organization to speak today.

A – A Critical Evaluation of the EU-China Human Rights Dialogue

We commend the efforts made by the EEAS to consult civil society organisations ahead of the dialogue, and their persistence to engage with their Chinese counterparts on human rights issues. ICT acknowledges the EU's determination to secure an official visit to Tibet in the margins of the dialogue and appreciates the fact that the EU expressed its concerns to China about the repressive policies imposed on the Tibetan people and the need to preserve and respect their fundamental rights, including their rights to select their own religious leaders.

However, after 39 rounds of dialogue and despite the EEAS efforts, it is clear that this process has not provided meaningful results and that there are significant concerns that need to be addressed urgently.

First, it is crucial to acknowledge that the EU's human rights dialogue with China has consistently failed to bring about any substantial change. In recent years, ICT and other organizations have expressed their growing frustration at the lack of concrete outcomes. While the EU continues to use the dialogue to raise its concerns about China's human rights record, – including its ongoing repression in East Turkestan, Hong Kong, Southern Mongolia and Tibet – the Chinese government has indeed remained largely unresponsive and has even intensified its repression further. Beijing does not acknowledge its human rights violations, refuses to allow independent monitoring, and continues to implement repressive policies without consequence. The absence of real political or legislative commitment from China to address these abuses raises serious questions about the utility of the dialogue.

Furthermore, the EU's current approach does not match the severity of the human rights situation in China and Tibet – I will come back to this a bit later. The EU has already suspended human rights dialogues with highly repressive countries such as Russia, Syria, Belarus, and Myanmar, because of their human rights abuses and violations of international law. China, with its documented repressive policies, could be added to this list.

As civil society groups have repeatedly suggested, it may be time for the EU and its new leadership:

- To reconsider the dialogue's effectiveness and consider setting clear, measurable benchmark for success in this dialogue;
- To explore alternatives forms of dialogue with Chinese civil society organizations;
- To deploy more assertive and public diplomatic measures;
- To improve the mainstreaming of human rights into other EU-China policies, in particular in the field of trade and investments;
- To continue to press China to give unfettered access to East Turkestan and to Tibet to foreign diplomats, independent experts and Members of the European Parliament;
- And finally, to sanction Chinese officials who are responsible of serious human rights abuses including in Tibet, east Turkestan, Hong Kong and mainland China under the EU Global Human rights sanctions regime.

B – Human Rights in Tibet: A Threat to Tibetan Culture and Identity

As it stands now, the EU-China Human Rights Dialogue falls short of addressing the gravity of the human rights situation in China. Today, the Tibetan people, the Tibetan culture and the very existence of the name "Tibet" are indeed seriously threatened by the assimilationist policies strategically implemented by the People's Republic of China (PRC), in particular under the leadership of Xi Jinping. Without a significant course change, the continuity of this ancient culture, the integrity of the Tibetan Plateau's environment, and the very survival of Tibetans as a distinct people is no longer guaranteed. Let me give you some examples.

Residential boarding schools

Firstly, up to one million Tibetan children are being systematically alienated from their language and culture in compulsory boarding schools. These educational policies, denounced by many UN human rights experts and bodies as well as by the European Parliament in an urgency resolution in December 2023, separate children from their families, forcing them to enroll in schools that teach dominantly in Mandarin. This program stands to undermine the transmission of Tibetan language and culture and severe Tibetan youth from their roots and identity.

Mass relocation programs

Secondly, according to Chinese government media sources, at least 1.8 million nomads have been settled into sedentary houses under various Chinese government policies. In areas of relocation, displaced Tibetans have not received compensation or assurances of income or employment for the future.

The Chinese government continues to pursue blind and commercial infrastructure projects in Tibet that are designed and implemented without regard for environmental impacts or local community concerns. These projects, which include rail roads, highways, and power grids, combined with resource extraction projects such as hydropower dams and mining create economic and environmental costs that disproportionately impact Tibetans and the Tibetan plateau.

Our organisation is about to release a report on "Chinese Hydropower: Daming Tibetan culture, community and environment" – some advanced copies are available in the room, please note the report is under embargo until tomorrow 2pm.

Government interferences in freedom of religion

Last but not least, the Chinese government interferes massively in the free exercise of religion and persecutes Tibetans who peacefully oppose this policy. Torture is routinely inflicted to silence, permanently injure, and even cause death when Tibetans are arbitrarily detained for peacefully expressing their opinion or practicing their religion. Contrary to Tibetan religious norms and in contravention of international human rights standards protecting freedom of religion or belief, Beijing has made clear its intention to control the succession of the Dalai Lama who will turn 90 next year – as it did for the Panchen Lama – and has adopted a number of laws and regulations to legitimize its interferences.

Conclusion

In conclusion, while the EU's commitment to engaging with China on human rights is commendable, it is high time for a reassessment of the methods and effectiveness of the EU-China human rights dialogue.

The situation in Tibet, along with the broader human rights crisis in China, demands stronger action. The EU should prioritize real, measurable improvements in human rights rather than continuing ineffective dialogues that produce little to no tangible outcomes. The stakes for Tibetans, Uyghurs, Hongkongers, and all Chinese dissidents are too high for complacency. Thank you for your attention.

Tibetan Government-in-Exile condemns Chinese atrocities on 35th anniversary of Dalai Lama's conferment of Nobel Peace prize

10 December 2024, ANI

On the 35th anniversary of the Dalai Lama's conferment of the Nobel Peace Prize, the Tibetan Government-in-Exile, through the Kashag, the highest executive office of the Central Tibetan Administration, strongly condemned the Chinese government's ongoing atrocities in Tibet. The Kashag emphasised the vital role of the Dalai Lama in safeguarding Tibetan culture, religion, and identity, asserting that the Chinese government's policies were systematically eroding these fundamental aspects of Tibetan life.

The Kashag highlighted the alarming consequences of China's policies, which aimed to forcibly assimilate Tibetans into the broader Han Chinese culture. According to the Kashag, by imposing Chinese as the primary language of instruction and forcibly placing Tibetan children into colonial-style boarding schools, the Chinese government seeks to sever Tibetans from their linguistic, cultural, and spiritual roots. These schools replace traditional Tibetan education with communist ideology, military training, and a heavy emphasis on loyalty to the Chinese state, thus undermining Tibet's rich cultural heritage.

In addition to the cultural assault, China's control over Tibetan monastic institutions is an increasingly grave concern. The Kashag stated that the Chinese government had imposed politically motivated regulations on Tibetan Buddhism, including the regulation of the reincarnation of lamas, furthering its policy of Sinicization. This relentless interference is undermining the spiritual and cultural foundations of Tibetan Buddhism, threatening the preservation of one of the world's great spiritual traditions.

The Kashag also expressed deep concern over China's exploitation of Tibet's natural resources, particularly through the construction of hydropower dams and large-scale infrastructure projects. The Kashag reaffirmed its commitment to non-violence and peaceful resistance in the face of ongoing repression in Tibet. It drew attention to the international community's growing concern over human rights abuses in Tibet, as reflected in statements from the European Union, the United Nations, and the G-7 nations. The Kashag urged continued global support for the Tibetan cause and called for greater international pressure on China to respect Tibetans' fundamental human rights and preserve Tibet's unique cultural and environmental heritage.

Statement on International Human Rights Violations in Tibet and China's Systemic Breaches of International Standards

10 December 2024, CTA

On this 76th anniversary of International Human Rights Day, the Department of Information and International Relations (DIIR), Central Tibetan Administration, solemnly reflects on the persistent and systematic violations of fundamental human rights confronting the Tibetan people under the occupation of the government of the People's Republic of China (PRC). Despite decades of sustained international advocacy, diplomatic pressure, and repeated scrutiny through various United Nations human rights mechanisms, the situation for Tibetans continues to deteriorate at an alarming rate. The PRC government's repressive policies in Tibet have systematically undermined the cultural, religious, linguistic, and civil rights of Tibetans, transforming the peaceful country into a landscape of pervasive political oppression, cultural erasure, and severe restrictions on basic freedoms of expression, assembly, and religious practice.

In its 2024 Freedom in the World report, Freedom House has designated Tibet with a global freedom score of zero after 65 years of Chinese occupation, marking Tibet's worst rating in at least eight years.

In recent years, the PRC government has strengthened the aggressive policies of Sinicization, and ideological control particularly aimed at Tibetan children and educational institutions. These measures include enrolling over a million Tibetan school-going children into state-run colonial-style boarding schools depriving them of the space and opportunity to learn the Tibetan language. These actions systematically eliminate Tibetan linguistic heritage, with schools banning Tibetan language use, closing private language classes, and interrogating and deposing teachers who advocate for cultural preservation. whose classroom instruction is exclusively Mandarin and communist ideology is forcibly taught.

For instance, this year in Tibet's Nyagchu County, schools have mandated Mandarin-only communication. Prominent Tibetan private schools, such as the Gangjong Sherig Norling school in Golog in Tibet's Amdo Province were systematically shut down, despite providing decades of cultural education. The psychological impact has been devastating, with multiple reported incidents of teenage students and monks attempting suicide due to the trauma of cultural separation and loss of traditional educational opportunities. The systematic blocking of Tibetan-language online platforms and the repeated arrest of language activist Tashi Wangchuk represent a calculated attempt to suppress cultural dissent and linguistic expression.

China's systematic suppression of Tibetan Buddhism has intensified, with authorities implementing a multifaceted approach to restrict religious practices and cultural expression. Tibetan Buddhism continues to be subjected to intense state control, with monasteries facing severe restrictions on enrollment, mandatory political education, and direct pressure to denounce influential religious leaders like His Holiness the Dalai Lama. Monks are routinely targeted, with some sentenced to prison for leading simple prayers or maintaining religious symbols. Young monks have become particularly vulnerable, being forced out of traditional religious education and prohibited from wearing religious attire, according to reports emerging from Tibet. These actions constitute a profound intrusion and violations into the spiritual and cultural lives of Tibetan communities. Given the interference, these actions constitute a profound breach of international religious freedom standards, violating fundamental protections outlined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights as well as the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Freedom of expression has been almost entirely criminalized in Tibetan regions. Tibetans face severe consequences for the most mundane expressions of cultural identity, including social media posts, sharing images of religious leaders, or singing songs with perceived political undertones. The surveillance apparatus is extensive, involving digital monitoring, increased police presence, and even co-opting food delivery workers as auxiliary police. Tibetans have been arrested for seemingly innocuous acts like leaving a Tibetan flag on a rooftop or communicating with people outside the region.

Tibetan activists, intellectuals, artists, and religious figures continue to be the primary targets of the Chinese authorities, facing harsh interrogations, physical beatings, denial of necessities, extended periods of detention, and severe restrictions on their personal freedoms. Multiple case studies illustrate the severity of these violations, such as the tragic death of Losel, a 38-year-old monk from Sera Monastery, who was arrested in May 2024, subjected to prolonged physical beatings, systematically denied medical care, and ultimately died in detention. Similarly, police interrogations of Tibetan dam project protesters involved severe beating of detainees, with individuals being slapped, denied food, and requiring hospitalization. Political prisoners like Thupten Lodoe, a language advocate, are sentenced to years in prison for writing articles "endangering national security." The case of Golog Palden, a Tibetan singer imprisoned for three years for performing a "politically sensitive song", further underscores the Chinese Communist regime's suppression of cultural expression. These actions directly contravene the UN Convention against Torture, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and China's own legal framework, which ostensibly protects individual rights.

Chinese authorities have consistently prioritized infrastructure and economic development over the fundamental rights and cultural practices of Tibetan people, as evidenced by large-scale displacement projects, environmental degradation, and violent suppression of local resistance. In Derge County, part of Karze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Sichuan Province, hundreds of Tibetans protested the Gangtuo Dam project in front of the county government office building on 14 February 2024. Over 1,000 Tibetans, including monks, were arrested and local monasteries were completely locked down by the police. Also, the 19th-century Atsok Gon Dechen Choeckhorling Monastery was demolished to make way for a hydropower dam, forcing 160 monks into makeshift tin huts. The pattern of oppression extends to environmental activism, as demonstrated by the detention of Tsogon Tsering, an activist who exposed illegal sand and gravel mining causing significant environmental damage to the Kyungchu River, and the arrest of four Tibetans in Markham County who dared to protest the seizure of their pastureland. These incidents are effectively transforming traditional Tibetan landscapes and communities through systematic displacement, economic marginalization, and brutal suppression of dissent.

The DIIR extends its deepest gratitude to the international community for their unwavering support in highlighting human rights violations in Tibet and calling out the PRC government to fulfil its international and domestic human rights obligations. In 2024, the international community demonstrated unprecedented solidarity in addressing human rights violations in Tibet, with 21 UN member states raising critical concerns during China's 4th Universal Periodic Review and 13 UN experts expressing extreme concern on China's crackdown against Tibetans' opposition to the construction of Kamtok hydropower station in Tibet's Derge County. Landmark legislative actions by the United States, Canada, Australia, and France highlighted systematic abuses perpetrated by the PRC government, including forced child separation through colonial-style boarding schools, forcible mass DNA collection, comprehensive cultural suppression, and religious persecution. This year, a coalition of 15 countries presented a joint UN General Assembly statement demanding urgent intervention to protect Tibetan linguistic, religious, and cultural heritage. These statements including those from the European Union and the G7 leaders reflect a growing international consensus that the survival of Tibetan identity is under critical threat, requiring a coordinated and decisive global response to resolve the Sino-Tibet Conflict in the long run and improve dismal Human Rights situation inside Tibet.

As a permanent member of the UN Security Council, China has a legal and moral obligation to uphold international human rights standards. The international community must continue to demand immediate accountability, calling for an end to these systematic violations of Tibetans' rights and their calculated strategy of cultural erasure that systematically undermines the fundamental human rights of Tibetan people. The resilience of Tibetan people in confronting these challenges stands in powerful contrast to the harsh methods employed by Chinese authorities, highlighting the profound human spirit of resilience and resistance against systemic injustice.

Students for Free Tibet observe World Human Rights Day, urge China to release Tibetan political prisoners

10 December 2024, ANI

Students For Free Tibet (SFT) have launched "Write for Rights" campaign: a powerful initiative to demand justice for Tibetan Political Prisoners while commemorating International Human Rights Day in Dharamshala on Tuesday.

The young Tibetan activists living in-exile gathered to observe the human rights day with an appeal to China to respect the human rights. Tibetan activists have urged general public to stand for the cause of Tibet and sign an online petition or post cards for the release of five Tibetan political prisoners.

They will send these post cards and online petitions to the Chinese Embassy. Every letter, email, petitions, voice in this campaign is call for justice and hope for those unjust imprisoned.

Tenzin Lekdhen, Campaign Director, SFT said, that they are commemorating the Nobel Peace Prize to Tibetan spiritual leader Dalai Lama and the World Human Rights Day. He said that they are demanding the release of five political prisoners. He said that they will send postcards to Chinese authorities, asking them to release these political prisoners unconditionally.

"Today is World Human Rights Day. It's a day that we also commemorate the Nobel Peace Prize to His Holiness, the Dalai Lama, and also the World Human Rights Day, where we try to highlight all the human rights atrocities that have been committed, all the genocide that have been committed by the regimes. So, today we are highlighting some of the Tibetan political prisoners that are currently in Tibet. So, today we are highlighting five of them," Tenzin said.

"We have range of them from environmentalists who have been detained and been jailed for 15 years for just trying to protect the rights of Tibetan environment. And also we have political prisoners who are writers who have spoken up, there are singers here. So, we have a range of political prisoners who we are trying to highlight, and not just highlight, but we have here an online petition here, and also here we have offline postcards that we are going to send to the Chinese embassies and the authorities and asking them and to release these political prisoners unconditionally," he added.

When asked whether China will listen to their voice, he responded, "They may or may not, but it's important that we do highlight these political prisoners or else their voice won't be heard. That's important for now."

Tenzin Passang, National Director, SFT - India, said that the people in Tibet have no basic fundamental human rights. She said that they have launched 'Write for Rights' campaign, where we urge the people to write postcards, emails, petitions, Twitter posts to call for the release of political prisoners.

She said, "Today as we commemorate the World Human Rights Day, and it is also the day that His Holiness got his well-deserved Nobel Peace Prize, and we celebrate this day, Day of Freedom, Day of Justice, Day of Rights and Peace, but we should also, we also know that our brothers and sisters back in Tibet have no basic fundamental human rights. They were deprived of that, and then that's why we are here highlighting and advocating for some of the political prisoners."

"We are highlighting five political prisoners here today. Some of them have raised their voice or fight for the environmental justice, or some for the language, some for identity and cultures. And that's why we are here with this campaign where we call it Write for Rights campaign, where we urge the general public to write postcards or emails or petitions, Twitter posts and social media like write everything to advocate for the political prisoners in Tibet and also write for your governors in your own countries or like Chinese authorities, Chinese embassies and write, ask them, demand them to release the political prisoners and give them their own, their justice that they deserve," she added. (ANI)

Tibetan admin in exile 'not concerned' by Trump's election. 'US support for Tibet is bipartisan'

10 December 2024, The Print, Keshav Padmanabhan

Central Tibetan Administration foreign minister emphasises that US Congress has passed several bills to endorse Tibetan autonomy, one of which was signed into law by Trump in 1st term.

The Central Tibetan Administration (CTA)—the administration in exile based in India—believes that the strong bipartisan support it enjoys in the US will not change under the incoming administration of Donald Trump.

Its minister of the Department of Information and International Relations, Norzin Dolma said Wednesday that they were not concerned about the "strength and consistency" of support from Washington D.C., regardless of the change in leadership.

"Support for Tibet is bipartisan and bicameral. The support has even been legislated upon by the US Congress. It is incumbent on the US to act on the Resolve Tibet Act," said Dolma in an interaction with media personnel here.

The minister added: "The changing global order would only expand awareness about the Tibetan cause. The growing awareness would help in achieving the 'Middle Way' policy of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, which looks after the interests of both Tibet and China."

The CTA was set up in April 1959 after the Dalai Lama fled Lhasa for India following China's suppression of the Tibetan uprising a month earlier. It looks after the administration and welfare of roughly 150,000 Tibetans living in exile across 130 countries. A large number of Tibetans, close to 80,000, live in India.

The Dalai Lama formulated the 'Middle Way' policy, which seeks meaningful autonomy for Tibet within China, including in areas of religion, culture, education and the environment. One of Tibet's largest supporters has been the US, where a number of acts have been passed and signed into law with regards to its "conflict" with China.

The latest was the Resolve Tibet Act, signed into law by US President Joe Biden most recently on 12 July, 2024.

"I share the Congress's bipartisan commitment to advancing the human rights of Tibetans and supporting efforts to preserve their distinct linguistic, cultural, and religious heritage. My administration will continue to call on the People's Republic of China to resume direct dialogue, without preconditions, with the Dalai Lama, or his representatives, to seek a settlement that resolves differences and leads to a negotiated agreement on Tibet," Biden said in a statement after signing the bill into law.

US support for Tibet

The US recognises Tibet as a part of China, but under the new law, the Department of State will be allowed to fund Tibetan non-governmental organisations to counter misinformation regarding the history and culture of the Tibetan people.

In June this year, a bipartisan delegation of US lawmakers, including former Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee Michael McCaul, visited the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala just before the bill was signed into law. China slammed US lawmakers over the Resolve Tibet Act, saying that it firmly opposed the anti-China "separatist activities" by the "Dalai group". It also strongly protested the June meetings.

Beijing has reacted aggressively to previous meetings between US officials and the Dalai Lama, going so far as to threaten Washington with repercussions before a meeting between the spiritual leader and then president Barack Obama in 2010. Obama met with the Dalai Lama multiple times during his two terms in office.

Trump, in his first term, was the first US president not to have met with the Dalai Lama in over three decades. Biden, too, had promised a meeting with the Nobel Peace Prize winner during his run for office in 2020, but did not manage it in his four years in the White House.

Earlier this year, the Dalai Lama travelled to the US for a medical procedure, but there was no scheduled meeting with Biden.

"His Holiness needed time to rest, recover and recuperate following his medical procedure in the US. It was not conducive for a meeting between President Biden and His Holiness during this period," Dolma explained during the interaction with the media.

The CTA minister added: "Both Trump and Biden as presidents have signed into law acts in support of Tibet. They have shown strong commitment to the cause of Tibet."

In December 2020, Trump signed the Tibetan Policy and Support Act (TPSA), which said only the Dalai Lama and his followers could decide on the issue of succession of the religious leader, and not the Chinese government.

Furthermore, the law stated that until a US consulate was opened in Lhasa, Tibet, no further Chinese consulates would be given authorisation to open in America.

Chairman of the Public Service Commission Karma Yeshi Successfully Concluded Week-long Outreach Tour

09 December 2024, CTA

The Chairman of the Public Service Commission (PSC), Karma Yeshi, successfully concluded his week-long outreach tour to engage with Tibetan college students, which took place from 1- 8 December. The tour aimed to inspire Tibetan youth to contribute to the Tibetan cause actively, preserve Tibetan culture, and engage more deeply with the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA).

On 2 December, Chairman Karma Yeshi addressed Tibetan students at the TCV Youth Hostel in Bengaluru. In his talk, he emphasised the importance of civil service, the role of Tibetan youth in shaping the future of Tibet, and the need to preserve the Tibetan language and culture. He encouraged the students to promote the Tibetan cause among their peers and to act as ambassadors for Tibet within their college communities.

The following day, Chairman Karma Yeshi participated in a Youth Leadership Workshop organized by the Tibetan Youth Congress at the Bylakuppe Tibetan settlement. During his presentation, he discussed the Central Tibetan Administration, the evolution of Tibetan democracy, and the vital role of Tibetan youth in shaping Tibet's future. The workshop included group exercises, where participants presented their reflections to the larger group. Karma Yeshi concluded the session by urging everyone to take greater responsibility for advancing the Tibetan cause.

On 4 December, the Chairman visited all the monasteries in Bylakuppe, strengthening his connection with the Tibetan religious and cultural community.

On 5 December, Karma Yeshi met with Tibetan college students in Mysore. He reiterated his message about the importance of unity within the Tibetan community and quoted the lyrics of a Tibetan song to emphasise the need for collective effort. The program concluded with an interactive Q&A session and a vote of thanks from the student leader.

On 6 December, Chairman Karma Yeshi visited the Dalai Lama Institute for Higher Studies and Mentseekhang Sowa Rigpa Medical College in Bengaluru, where he spoke to students about their role in promoting the Tibetan cause. He encouraged them to equip themselves with the necessary knowledge and skills to become ambassadors for Tibet, emphasising the importance of education, health, and activism for the community's future. The talk was followed by another Q&A session, where students could engage directly with the Chairman.

The final tour took place on 7 December at the TCV Tibetan Youth Hostel in Rohini, New Delhi. In this session, Karma Yeshi again emphasised the importance of working for the CTA and the Tibetan community's well-being. He also stressed the need for maintaining good health and dedicating time to promoting Tibetan history and culture. The meeting concluded with marking the successful conclusion of the outreach program.

The outreach program wrapped up on 8 December, with Chairman Karma Yeshi returning to Dharamsala. He was accompanied throughout the tour by Deputy Secretary Karma Thinley.

This outreach initiative was made possible by funding from USAID and the National Democratic Institute (NDI).

Indian government to recognise Bhoti (Tibetan) as one of the official language of Ladakh

09 December 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

The government of India has agreed to officially recognised "Bhoti" and Urdu as official languages of the Union Territory of Ladakh. This decision followed discussions between Ladakhi leaders and Indian government representatives at the Ministry of Home Affairs in New Delhi on December 3, according to the Kashmir Observer.

Bhoti, which experts say is essentially the Tibetan language (Bodyig), is used across the Trans-Himalayan region. Dialectic variants such as Ladakhi, Spiti, and Lahaul are spoken in regions in the Himalaya belt including Himachal Pradesh, Sikkim, Uttarakhand, Arunachal Pradesh, and parts of West Bengal.

The use of the term “Bhoti” for the Tibetan language has sparked debates in Ladakh in the past. Dr. Thupten Rigzin, a Ladhaki scholar on Bhoti Language Day in April told Radio Free Asia, “In older days, we used to say we were learning Bodyig, (Tibetan) not Bhoti. Some people seem unaware of the history, and some deliberately create confusion. The Tibetan race forms the foundation of all Himalayan regions. It’s vital for Ladakhis to understand Bhoti’s origins and historical importance.”

Groups like the Imam Khomeini Memorial Trust in Kargil have questioned the historical basis for the labelling. In a statement, the group asserted, “The so-called ‘Bhoti’ script is essentially the Tibetan script. The term has no historical or socio-cultural relevance to the languages spoken in Ladakh.”

The Tibetan script, Bodyig, was developed in the 7th century when the 33rd Tibetan King Songtsen Gampo sent Thumi Sambhota and other scholars to India. After studying Indian scripts, including Devanagari, Thumi Sambhota created the Tibetan script and grammar. This script facilitated the translation of Buddhist texts in Sanskrit and Pali from India into Tibetan, supporting the spread of Buddhism in Tibet first and later in to regions like Ladakh and the Trans-Himalayan areas.

Some observers including Tibetans have noted that using the term “Bhoti” instead of Bodyig undermines the recognition of Tibetan language and that such labelling of the Tibetan language are done for political and other benefits.

Austria: Tibetan youth in Europe empowered to lead advocacy efforts at Vienna workshop

09 December 2024, ANI

A three-day Tibetan Youth Leadership and Capacity Building Workshop, held in Vienna from December 6-8, 2024, focused on empowering young Tibetans in Europe to advocate for Tibet's rights and raise awareness about critical issues affecting their homeland.

According to a press release by the Central Tibetan Administration, the workshop, attended by 23 Tibetan youth from Germany, Switzerland, and Austria, aimed to equip them with the skills and knowledge necessary to advance Tibet advocacy in their communities and beyond.

The event was inaugurated by Representative Thinley Chukki from the Tibet Bureau in Geneva and Additional Secretary Tenzin Lekshay, the official spokesperson for the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA).

In her opening remarks, representative Chukki introduced the workshop's objectives, emphasising the importance of youth leadership in the global Tibetan movement. She expressed hope that the training would strengthen the capacity of young Tibetans to effectively advocate for their culture, identity, and rights.

Additional Secretary Tenzin Lekshay, in his keynote speech, highlighted the importance of a dual approach to advocacy. “While engaging policymakers is crucial, mobilising grassroots movements is equally vital. You must advocate not only to those in power but also to your peers, classmates, friends, and neighbours to inspire collective action,” said Lekshay.

He underscored that advocacy should be both top-down and bottom-up, with campaigns involving a diverse range of stakeholders, from local communities to high-level officials.

The workshop provided participants with in-depth knowledge on several key issues facing Tibet. Presentations covered the Chinese government's policies in Tibet, the growing transnational aggression of the People's Republic of China (PRC), and the alarming spread of state-run residential schools in Tibet.

These schools are part of a broader effort by the Chinese government to assimilate Tibetan children, undermining their cultural and linguistic identity. Experts discussed how this system mirrors colonial tactics, aiming to erase Tibet's unique heritage.

On the first day, attendees were introduced to Tibet advocacy strategies, including the growing role of social media in shaping public opinion and advancing campaigns. The focus was on leveraging digital platforms to advocate for Tibet on a global scale, providing a modern tool to complement traditional grassroots advocacy.

On the second day, former Tibetan political prisoner Phuntsog Nyidron shared her harrowing personal experience of imprisonment and torture under Chinese authorities. Nyidron's testimony was a poignant reminder of the ongoing human rights abuses in Tibet and a powerful call for action to stop the persecution of Tibetans. Her story served as a compelling example of the real-life consequences of Tibet's political struggles.

The workshop also featured a special address from Kelsang Gyaltsen, the special envoy of the Dalai Lama, who spoke about the importance of understanding the political and social situation in China and its impact on Tibet. He emphasised that Tibet's struggle is not just about Tibetans but about global human rights issues, urging participants to view their advocacy efforts as part of a broader movement for justice and freedom.

22nd North American Tibetan Associations' Conference Kicks Off in Washington DC with Sikyong Penpa Tsering's Keynote Address

09 December 2024, CTA

The first day of the 22nd North American Tibetan Associations (NATA) Conference was held at the NED Conference Hall on 8 December 2024 in the gracious presence of Sikyong Penpa Tsering. With more than 50 participants from 26 different Tibetan Associations in the United States, the proceedings began with Sikyong Penpa Tsering offering a ceremonial white scarf to the portrait of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. This was followed by members of the 17th Tibetan Parliament in Exile, Tenzing Jigme and Thondup Tsering, along with Representative Namgyal Choedup.

In his opening address, Representative Namgyal Choedup highlighted the significance of the conference, particularly in light of the profound changes in the U.S. political landscape. With the momentous occasion of His Holiness's 90th birthday approaching, he underscored the pivotal role of NATA participants in collaboratively designing and implementing programs and projects for the Goton celebration.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering, in his remarks, expressed gratitude to the National Endowment for Democracy (NED) for generously providing the venue for the conference. He commended NED for its longstanding support and friendship toward Tibet and the Tibetan cause.

Sikyong also touched upon the upcoming event organised by the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) to honour Speaker Emerita Nancy Pelosi for her unwavering support for Tibet. He recalled an instance when Pelosi, deeply revering His Holiness the Dalai Lama, remarked how fortunate everyone in the hall was to breathe the same air as His Holiness. This, Sikyong stated, is a testament to the profound respect and admiration His Holiness commands among global leaders and dignitaries. He emphasised how Members of the Tibetan Parliament and Sikyong himself are treated with the same respect and recognition as representatives of sovereign nations, a testament to the grace and stature of His Holiness.

Sikyong stressed the importance of adhering to the guidance and teachings of His Holiness, reiterating the need to honour his vision and values in all endeavours. Sikyong emphasised the critical importance of accurate numbers and data, particularly when engaging with foreign dignitaries. He noted that one of the most common questions posed by such officials is, "How many Tibetans reside inside Tibet and in the diaspora?" Sikyong referenced a recent meeting with the heads of the Departments of Home, Health, Finance, and Tibet Fund regarding household listings, highlighting how collaborative efforts across these departments can produce reliable data, especially concerning Tibetans in India.

For Tibetans residing abroad, Sikyong underscored the crucial role of regional Tibetan Associations, whose familiarity with their communities positions them uniquely to assist in data collection for household listings. He stressed that in the modern world, evidence and documentation are indispensable, and he appealed to representatives of Tibetan Associations in the United States to voluntarily issue formal statements on two significant matters: first, that the issue of the reincarnation of His Holiness the Dalai Lama lies solely in his hands; and second, that the Gaden Phodrang institution must remain intact.

In addition, Sikyong addressed reports regarding the Chinese-appointed Panchen Lama's potential visit to Nepal in mid-December. Sikyong highlighted China's persistent efforts to legitimise their appointed Panchen Lama among Tibetans by sending him to Tibet for extended periods, aiming to cultivate reverence for him within the Tibetan community. He further emphasised that similar, if not more aggressive, measures could be anticipated in the case of His Holiness the Dalai Lama's succession in the near future. Regarding the 90th birthday celebration (Goton), Sikyong elaborated on the Goton Committee, which is chaired by the Secretary of Kashag and includes representatives from each department of the Central Tibetan Administration. For the United States, he highlighted that the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) has already planned several programs. With Tibetan Associations across various regions preparing their own initiatives, Sikyong suggested that it would be beneficial for all associations and organisations to submit their program details to the CTA in Dharamsala. This would enable the creation of a comprehensive calendar of events for Goton (90th birthday celebration).

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Commences Official Engagements in the United States

08 December 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration commenced an official visit to the United States on 6 December 2024. Upon his arrival at Dulles Airport, he was received by Representative Namgyal Choedup and Tsultrim Gyatso, Chinese Liaison Officer at the Office of Tibet, Washington, D.C. Despite the cold weather and the long journey, Sikyong immediately immersed himself in a series of engagements.

Sikyong's demanding itinerary began with a luncheon hosted by the Office of Tibet in Washington, D.C. Among the notable attendees were Tencho Gyatso, the President of the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT), and Bhuchung K. Tsering of ICT's Research and Monitoring Unit. Although the luncheon maintained a casual atmosphere, the participants engaged in substantive strategic discussions, evaluating the current status of Tibetans and exploring potential developments under the Trump Administration.

Later, Sikyong met with Mary Beth of The Bridge Fund (TBF), a non-profit organisation dedicated to the preservation of Tibetan culture, language, and environment through community driven programs. For over 28 years, TBF has successfully implemented initiatives in Tibetan regions, fostering collaboration with local communities, including within the Tibetan Autonomous Region. As TBF approaches its closure, Mary Beth provided Sikyong with a comprehensive briefing on the organisation's achievements and projects in Tibet.

The day continued with a meeting between Sikyong and representatives from Baron, a prominent scholars, including Tashi and Suzette. Suzette, whose primary focus is the religious aspects of Tibetan Buddhism, expressed her desire to visit and explore Tibetan monasteries and nunneries within the Tibetan diaspora in India. She noted the growing interest in Tibetan Buddhism, particularly among individuals from China, and emphasised the significant role religion plays in fostering cross cultural connections. Sikyong offered his insights and recommendations to enhance her ideas. This engaging discussion was followed by a brief interview conducted by Namgyal Shastri from Voice of America (VOA).

On the second day of Sikyong's visit to the United States, the Office of Tibet in Washington, D.C., hosted a warm welcome reception in honour of Sikyong and the participants of the 22nd North American Tibetan Associations (NATA) Conference. The conference, scheduled to take place on 8 December at the NED Conference Hall, will bring together over 50 members, including the Presidents and Secretaries of 26 Tibetan Associations out of a total 36 Tibetan Associations across the United States.

Speaker Emerita Pelosi to receive Light of Truth Award for unwavering support of Tibet

08 December 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Speaker Emerita Nancy Pelosi will be honoured with the prestigious Light of Truth Award by the Boards of the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) for her unwavering commitment to the Tibetan people, their rights, and their struggle for freedom. The award will be presented to Speaker Pelosi on December 9 in the Speaker Nancy Pelosi Caucus Room (Cannon House Office Building).

Throughout her distinguished political career, Speaker Pelosi has been a tireless advocate for Tibet, demonstrating exceptional leadership in supporting Tibet. Pelosi's connection to Tibet dates back to 1989 when she became one of the first American politicians to meet with the Dalai Lama after he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. This moment marked the beginning of a profound, decades-long friendship between Pelosi and the Tibetan spiritual leader, and she has since visited Dharamshala, the seat of the Tibetan government-in-exile, three times to meet with the Dalai Lama and other Tibetan leaders.

One of Pelosi's earliest significant actions in support of Tibet came in 1991 when, as a member of Congress, she unfurled a pro-democracy banner in Tiananmen Square in Beijing to commemorate the victims of the 1989 massacre. This act of defiance served as a clear message to the Chinese government that the United States would not remain silent on human rights abuses, including those committed against Tibetans. Over the years, Pelosi has consistently condemned China's human rights violations, from the treatment of Uyghur Muslims in East Turkestan (Xinjiang) to the suppression of freedoms in Hong Kong and Tibet.

US Speaker Emerita speaking at the Tsuklakhang courtyard in Dharamshala in June 2024 in support of the Tibetan people (Photo/Mint)

In 2008, during the widespread protests in Tibet and the lead-up to the Beijing Olympics, Pelosi made a bold stand by leading a congressional delegation to Dharamshala. There, she met with the Dalai Lama, expressing her unwavering solidarity with the Tibetan people. Her visit was widely regarded as a powerful statement against China's repressive policies and sent a clear message that the international community was watching closely.

In 2007, Pelosi played a crucial role in the passage of the Tibetan Policy Act, which supports the preservation of Tibet's unique religious, cultural, and linguistic heritage. The Act reinforced U.S. policy on Tibet and set clear goals to promote Tibet's autonomy and human rights. Pelosi's leadership continued in 2015 when she visited Tibet, despite heavy monitoring by Chinese authorities. Even under such restrictions, she managed to meet with local Tibetans and listen to their stories of resilience and resistance.

During her advocacy for the Tibetan Policy and Support Act in 2020, Pelosi famously stated, "If we don't speak out for human rights in China because of commercial interests, then we lose all moral authority to speak out for human rights in any other place in the world."

Richard Gere, Chairman of the ICT Board, expressed his admiration for Speaker Pelosi, stating, "It is my great pleasure as Chairman of the Board of the International Campaign for Tibet that we will be honouring our old friend Nancy Pelosi. Having worked closely with her for many decades, it is clear to me that she has a genuine reverence for His Holiness the Dalai Lama as well as a deep and vast commitment to the just cause of Tibet and the Tibetan people. She is fearless."

Tencho Gyatso, President of the ICT, also lauded Pelosi's tireless efforts, stating, "We are so very lucky to have such steadfast partners in our work on behalf of the Tibetan people. Speaker Emerita Nancy Pelosi has been a tenacious voice for the movement since joining Congress. This is a well-deserved recognition of her many years of partnership with the people of Tibet and His Holiness the Dalai Lama. She has never failed to put her seat at the table to work for good. For all her work, we thank her."

The Light of Truth Award, established in 1995, is presented to individuals and organisations that have made outstanding contributions to the public understanding of Tibet and the plight of the Tibetan people. Previous recipients include Archbishop Desmond Tutu, Hugh Richardson, Congressman Benjamin Gilman, and other courageous individuals and groups that have supported the Tibetan cause.

REPORT: China's rampant dam-building spree could dislocate up to 1.2 million in Tibet

07 December 2024, Tibetan Review

China has built or plans to build hundreds of hydropower dams in Tibet and data on a sample of 193 of them betray a formula for irreparable damage to the Tibetan civilization, the environment, downstream nations, and the climate, said Washington-based Tibet advocacy group International Campaign for Tibet (ICT, savetibet.org) in a new report Dec 5.

Tibet's glacial peaks are the headwaters of the region's eight major rivers with transnational flows. The report's rigorous research and advanced GIS mapping details the Chinese Communist Party's rampant construction of 100s of hydropower dams. Its first-of-kind interactive map allows users to see the impact each dam will have on local populations, religious sites, and surrounding land covers, the group said.

The report also presents alternatives for developing truly sustainable, renewable energy, the group added.

"The scale and scope of the PRC's hydropower dam spree is both unbelievable and unconscionable," ICT President Tencho Gyatso has said.

"Beijing's disrespect for the Tibetan people's rights, its neighbours' fate, and the urgent moral and scientific demand to combat climate change could not be clearer. China must be stopped in its tracks and called to use its money, manpower, and innovation to advance solutions—not its political manoeuvring."

One of the report's key findings is that if completed, 1.2 million residents near the 193 dam project sites could be dislocated from their homes, communities, and livelihoods. Religious and sacred sites serving communities will also be destroyed.

This is because almost 80% of the dams studied in the report are large or mega dams (with over 100MW capacity).

However, 60% of these dams are either in proposal or preparation stages, presenting opportunities to change course, the report said.

The group calls on China to cease all planning, proposing, and construction, including projects underway, of large-scale hydropower dams in Tibet.

It calls on China to protect the right of the Tibetan people to participate in all development projects as per the 1986 UN Declaration on the Right to Development and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, including the right to free, prior, and informed consent. This would include an end to the forced dislocation of Tibetan communities.

The report calls on China to instead invest in properly sited and inclusively developed solar and wind power, as they do not carry the demonstrable environmental, climate, and social costs of hydropower. These projects should prioritize co-management, co-benefits, and maintenance of traditional ways of life, and in particular, they should correspond to the needs of the local Tibetan population, it added.

The report also calls on China to engage in multi-lateral transboundary water policy forums to establish a mutually beneficial management architecture and data sharing norms.

"Hydrological data and dam project plans should not be used as bargaining tools leveraged against downstream states."

Lower TCV school fails to attract Tibetan students living abroad, to shut down in December

06 December 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Lower TCV School, one of the pioneering institutions in the Tibetan exile education system, boasting 40 years of operation will close its doors in December following an unsuccessful attempt to convert it into a dedicated chartered school for Tibetan children living abroad. The decision was confirmed by Tibetan Children's Village (TCV) Head Office, citing low enrollment and operational challenges.

Earlier this year, TCV initiated the transition of Lower TCV School into a residential chartered school specifically for Tibetan children raised overseas. The project, launched in August 2024, aimed to provide these children with an immersive experience in Tibetan language, culture, and identity. However, despite significant investments of time, resources and energy, the initiative attracted only six students.

In a social media post, TCV expressed its determination to address the growing challenge of Tibetan children abroad missing out on cultural education, "With high hope and anticipation, Lower TCV School was prepared, ready, and opened...but sadly only 6 Tibetan children have enrolled... Although lots of time, money, and energy were put into this program, TCV has still not lost its hope in this pursuit, despite all odds."

Speaking with Phayul, TCV General Secretary Choeying Dhondup said that Lower TCV School will close after the winter vacation on December 18, 2024. 54 students from India currently enrolled in the school will be transferred to other TCV schools of their choice.

The six foreign students will integrate with students at Upper TCV School starting March 2025 but will reside in a separate hostel with enhanced facilities, including internet access. To encourage more participation, the annual parental contribution for overseas students has been reduced to $100 USD.

Choeying Dhondup elaborated on the decision, "There are only 64 students in Lower TCV School, supported by 24 staff members. The operational expenditure is high, and the infrastructure is deteriorating. Therefore, it was decided to transfer the children to other schools." He also hinted at potential future plans for the Lower TCV School campus, stating that the administration is considering "greater use" of the site, though no specific details were disclosed.

The closure of Lower TCV school reflects broader challenges faced by Tibetan schools in exile. Declining birth rates, ongoing migration to Western countries, and reduced numbers of Tibetan children arriving from Tibet have contributed to diminishing enrollment. Similar struggles have led to the recent closures of other Tibetan institutions, including STS Poanta Sahib and STS Dalhousie.

CTA President Penpa Tsering, during an earlier interview with Phayul, highlighted the need for systemic integration of Tibetan schools to ensure their long-term sustainability. He proposed consolidating schools to streamline administration, reduce costs, and enhance facilities.

"In terms of integration of schools, there are lots of questions on how we have to do it," Tsering said, emphasizing the complexity of balancing efficiency with the impact on staff and local communities. "One idea is to integrate schools zone-wise, starting with the Northeast, where most schools are under Sambhota. In Himachal Pradesh and Ladakh, many schools are TCV. We must resolve this issue collectively to sustain these institutions over the long run."

Indologist who helped Jawaharlal Nehru to train army in Tibetan at Ladakh during Sino-Indian War, no more

06 December 2024, CTA

Rashtrapati Award winner Suniti Kumar Pathak was a key figure in establishment of India-Tibetan studies at Visva-Bharati.

-by Snehomoy Chakraborty

Suniti Kumar Pathak, a scholar chosen by Jawaharlal Nehru to train the army in Tibetan at Ladakh during the Sino-Indian War, passed away at his Abanpally residence in Santiniketan.

Rashtrapati Award winner and Indologist Pathak was a key figure in the establishment of India-Tibetan studies at Visva-Bharati.

Manabendra Mukhopadhyay, the head of the Bengali department at Visva-Bharati and a researcher on Pathak's work, said Pathak was one of the foremost scholars on Indo-Tibetan relations, Buddhism and Indology.

"Pandit Nehru had taken Pathak to help the Indian army with translation and training in Tibetan, for strategic reasons during the 1962 war. Later, he sought Nehru's permission to come back to Visva-Bharati and further pursue a life in academics," said Mukhopadhyay.

“He was an authority on Tibetan, Pali, Sanskrit, Mongolian, Chinese and Prakrit,” he said, adding that Pathak had extensively travelled on foot in some of the remotest parts of the Himalayas, collecting field notes for his research and the 200-odd books he authored. Click here to read more.

Dalai Lama reflects on hardships and opportunities of exile at long-life prayer ceremony

06 December 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

His Holiness the Dalai Lama, wearing a hat from Kinnaur, addressing the congregation during the Long Life Prayer Offering in Dharamshala on Dec. 6, 2024 (Photo/Tenzin Choejor)

The people of Kinnaur, led by Khunu Gyabung Tulku Rinpoche, the chief organiser of the offering, gathered on Friday at Thekchen Choeling Tsuglakhang temple in Dharamshala to offer a Long Life Prayer (Tenshug) to the revered Tibetan spiritual leader His Holiness the Dalai Lama, wishing him a long and healthy life.

In his address, the Dalai Lama expressed heartfelt gratitude to the nunneries, monasteries, and the general public of Kinnaur for their ongoing devotion. He reflected on the significance of the Tibetan exile experience, stating, “Living in exile has offered us a unique opportunity. If we had remained in Tibet and followed our traditional ways, I personally would not have had the chance to engage with the scriptures as deeply as I have. Exile has allowed me to step away from the formal ceremonies and customs, enabling me to engage in a more meaningful way with the teachings. This exile has been beneficial for us in many ways. So, whether in Tibet or in exile, the devotion and faith of the Tibetan people have remained unwavering, and I continue to do my best, dedicating myself to my work with sincerity.”

His Holiness further elaborated on the paradox of exile, acknowledging both its hardships and the opportunities it has created, “While we are separated from our homeland, exile has also presented us with a chance to connect with people from all over the world. This has allowed me to share my teachings with not just Tibetans and the Himalayan people but with individuals from diverse cultures and backgrounds. What I teach is not limited to Buddhism alone. At its core, I believe it is important for all human beings to live with dignity, honesty, and kindness, cultivating a warm heart and good intentions to help others. This is the foundation of my teachings, and it is the reason why people, both believers and non-believers alike, appreciate them.”

The Dalai Lama emphasised that the essence of his message extends beyond religious doctrines, “In exile, I have had the privilege of meeting a wide variety of people. I teach them how to cultivate a peaceful mind, humility, love and compassion. By fostering harmony among all people, regardless of their beliefs, one can make one’s life meaningful. This is the message I hope to share with the world, and I believe it can benefit people everywhere, regardless of their faith or background.”

Today’s Long Life Prayer ceremony featured the visualisation of White Tara, the embodiment of the fulfilling wheel. The event concluded with an outpouring of devotion from the people of Kinnaur, who expressed their deep respect and admiration for His Holiness, as well as their ongoing prayers for his health and longevity.

Dharamshala facing potential drinking water crisis due to lack of rain

06 December 2024, Tibetan Review

It has not rained for the past more than two months while there is lesser snow in the Dhauladhar mountain ranges, potentially affecting the drinking water supply in the Dharamshala region, reported the tribuneindia.com Dec 5, citing sources in the state’s water supply department. The development has raised focus on suggestion that check dams be built for ensuring a more stable water supply system. The report cited sources in the Jal Shakti Department as saying that if it does not rain in the next one week or so, the residents of Dharamshala might have to face cut in drinking water supply.

The sources have also said that the problem is likely to become acute in the coming months due to lesser snow in Dhauladhar mountain ranges.

Drinking water for Dharamshala city is stated to be sourced from Bhated and Gajj rivers flowing from Dhauladhar mountain ranges. And the water discharge in Bhated river has reduced to about half while, thankfully, Gajj river still has enough water to sustain supply to Dharamshala city, the report cited the sources as saying.

The city’s daily water supply stands at nine million litres per day, with the majority of the drinking water schemes being gravity based and sourced from the two rivers.

The report cited local resident as saying they had not experienced such a long dry spell in their lifetime in the region.

Most of the water supply systems in the hill areas of Himachal Pradesh are sourced from surface water sources such as rivers and stream. Due to the changing rain patterns, experts have been suggesting that the Jal Shakti Department should rely on small check dams on rivers and streams as source for drinking water schemes.

The old designs of directly sourcing water from natural rivers and streams was facing challenges due to lesser snow in higher reaches of mountains and changing rain patterns, the report said.

Parliamentary Committee to Review the Rules and Regulation of Parliamentary Procedure and Conduct of the Business of Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

06 December 2024, CTA

Parliamentary Committee to Review the Rules and Regulation of Parliamentary Procedure and Conduct of the Business of Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

A committee comprising parliamentarians Geshe Lharampa Gowo Lobsang Phende, Youdon Aukatsang, and Lobsang Thupten convened earlier today to review the Rules and Regulations for Parliamentary Procedures and Conduct of Business of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, specifically focusing on the provisions related to the removal of dignitaries of the Central Tibetan Administration. The committee unanimously elected Geshe Lharampa Gowo Lobsang Phende as chair and Youdon Aukatsang as secretary.

This committee was formed following the decision of the 8th session of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile. After the first reading of the bill amendment during the 8th session of the 17th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, and based on a general consensus of opinions, it was agreed that a comprehensive review should be undertaken. This review aims to improve the existing regulation or, if deemed necessary, to create a new regulation with corresponding provisions, based on the feedback from that session and previous draft proposals.

Before commencing their work, committee members held a preliminary meeting with Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel and Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang to receive necessary guidance.

The committee is expected to submit its report, along with a draft proposing amendments to the relevant rules and regulations, to the Tibetan Parliamentary Secretariat by 11 March 2025.

Dr. Lobsang Monlam testify before US Commission on China in Washington D.C.

06 December 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Screen grab of Dr. Lobsang Monlam testifying at the US Congressional-Executive Commission on China

Dr. Lobsang Monlam, the founder and CEO of the Monlam Tibetan IT Research Center, testified on Thursday at a hearing of the U.S. Congressional-Executive Commission on China (CECC) in Washington, D.C. The hearing, titled "The Preservation of Memory: Combating the CCP's Historical Revisionism and Erasure of Culture," was chaired by Representative Christopher Smith and co-chaired by Senator Jeff Merkley.

In his testimony, Dr. Monlam addressed the grave challenges facing the Tibetan language and culture, both within Tibet and among the global Tibetan diaspora. He pointed to recent developments, such as the closure of Tibetan-centric schools like Ragya Ganjong Sherig Norbuling and the relocation of students to state-run institutions, as evidence of the Chinese government's ongoing policies of cultural assimilation.

"In Tibet, the policy of cultural assimilation of Tibetans by the Chinese government is systematically undermining Tibetan language and cultural identity," he stated. "One of the most concerning aspects of this is the imposition of Mandarin as the primary language of instruction in schools—even in those that claim to offer bilingual education. Additionally, an estimated 80% of Tibetan children are sent to state-run boarding schools where Mandarin is prioritised, further disconnecting them from their cultural heritage.”

Dr. Monlam also shed light on the difficulties faced by Tibetans in exile, particularly younger generations born outside of traditional Tibetan communities. “Many young Tibetans, born and raised outside of the communities in exile established for Tibetans, lack regular exposure to their native language, hindering their ability to learn and appreciate it. Limited post-education opportunities as well as opportunities for higher education in Tibetan further compel them to rely on other languages, increasing the distance from their cultural roots,” he explained.

He emphasised the diminishing Tibetan population, both within Tibet and abroad, has further compounded these challenges. While community-led efforts, such as Tibetan language schools, monasteries, and cultural institutions, are working to preserve the language, these initiatives often struggle due to limited funding and resources.

Dr. Monlam further highlighted the ongoing suppression of Tibetan culture within Tibet, which he described as a key factor contributing to the erosion of traditions and cultural disintegration. He also acknowledged the resilience of the Tibetan exile community, which has made notable efforts to safeguard Tibetan culture and language through educational institutions, the Central Tibetan Administration’s policies, and various grassroots initiatives.

Despite these efforts, Dr. Monlam called for more modern, strategic, and comprehensive tools to support Tibetan education, cultural preservation, and global engagement. He highlighted the work of the Monlam Tibetan IT Research Center, which has been instrumental in developing technology to preserve the Tibetan language. The organization has compiled the Grand Tibetan Dictionary, the most extensive Tibetan lexicon to date, and developed 42 software applications, including advanced tools for optical character recognition (OCR), machine translation, and AI-driven language models.

“These ground-breaking technologies have achieved remarkable success, garnering over millions of usages and effectively bridging linguistic and technological barriers within Tibet and the global diaspora,” Dr. Monlam said. “Looking ahead, the Monlam organization has an ambitious vision for the future. We are actively developing a foundational Tibetan/Culture-focused Large Language Model (LLM). As part of our commitment to education and ethical AI development, we are exploring the creation of an AI model based on His Holiness the XIVth Dalai Lama. This model could be used to develop educational resources, promote conflict resolution, and foster ethical decision-making in AI systems.”

Hollywood star Whitaker, well known for his charity work, visits Dalai Lama

05 December 2024, Tibetan Review

Hollywood actor, producer, and director Forest Steven Whitaker whose accolades include an Academy Award, a Golden Globe Award, a British Academy Film Award, and two Screen Actors Guild Awards, has on Dec 4 met with His Holiness the Dalai Lama at his exile residence in Dharamshala, India. He has also called on the exile Tibetans’ democratically elected political leader, the Sikyong, just ahead of the latter’s trip to the USA.

“It is a great opportunity to get a chance to see him again,” the Tibetan service of rfa.org Dec 4 quoted Whitaker, 63, as saying, after meeting with the Dalai Lama.

“I’ve been given a lot of blessings by the Tibetan people and, of course, by His Holiness today,” the report quoted Whitaker as saying, accompanied by his daughter Sonnet Noel Whitaker, 28.

“I have met him before but I was overcome with feelings when I saw him today. I just wished him better health and a long life and love. I think he is a symbol of peace.”

Whitaker had previously met with the Dalai Lama in Jul 2017 during an event hosted by Starkey Hearing Technologies in Eden Prairie, Minnesota. At that time, Whitaker moderated a panel discussion on “A Call for Compassion and Conscious Kindness,” in which the Dalai Lama was a participant, along with Starkey owner Bill Austin and Starkey’s chief philanthropy officer, Tani Austin, the report noted.

While in Dharamshala, Whitaker has also met with Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the executive head of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), on Dec 3. He also visited the Tibet Museum and Library of Tibetan Works and Archives, located within the CTA complex, Dec 4.

Whitaker has spent much of his time over the past decade dedicated to humanitarian work. In 2011, he was appointed the UNESCO Goodwill Ambassador for Peace and Reconciliation. UNESCO also appointed him, in 2014, its Special Envoy for Peace and Reconciliation.

In 2012, he founded the Whitaker Peace & Development Initiative (WPDI), which implements peace-building programmes in conflict affected communities throughout the world, with focus on training youths in conflict resolution and developing businesses in areas of conflict. WPDI’s programmes are currently operating throughout Africa, Mexico, and the United States.

He has won numerous doctorate and other awards as well in diverse other fields of his works.

Kyabje Kundeling Rinpoche Represents Tibetan Buddhism at World Interfaith Conference in the Vatican

05 December 2024, CTA

Kyabje Kundeling Tatsak Rinpoche addressing the gathering during World Interfaith Conference in the Vatican.

In the gracious presence of Pope Francis, the World Interfaith Conference organised by the Sree Narayana Gurukulam Trust, in collaboration with the Italy-based Pontifical Council for Inter-religious Dialogue, was convened on 29 and 30 November 2024 in the Vatican.

As a representative of the Tibetan Buddhists, Kyabje Kundeling Tatsak Rinpoche attended the conference alongside reverent spiritual leaders and priests from the world's major religious groups, public figures, and scholars.

During the meeting, Pope Francis, the head of the Catholic Church and sovereign of the Vatican City State, commended the organisers for this event and said, "The lack of respect for the noble teachings of religions is one of the causes of the troubled situation in which the world finds itself today." The Pope further stressed that good moral teachings should be practised to make a positive contribution to the world through harmonious cooperation among different religious traditions.

In his address, Kyabje Kundeling Tatsak Rinpoche introduced the noble commitments of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama and underscored the need to promote religious harmony during the World Interfaith Conference. Rinpoche further spoke about harnessing the spiritual power of different religions to address the multiple sufferings currently afflicting the world, working together towards world peace through deep and meaningful interfaith cooperation, providing moral guidance to the new generation of youth and empowering them to make positive contributions and create a more compassionate and harmonious future for all.

Moreover, during his one-on-one meetings with the Pope, Kundeling Rinpoche presented a book authored by His Holiness the Dalai Lama, as a memento.

The organising committee also extended their invitation to Kundeling Rinpoche to attend a religious conference that is scheduled for 2025 in England.

Symposium on Enhancing Tibetan School Education Begins in Dharamshala

05 December 2024, CTA

Symposium on Enhancing Tibetan School Education Begins in Dharamshala. Photo / Tenzin Phende / CTA

A two-day Symposium on Enhancing Tibetan School Education commenced earlier this morning in Dharamshala at the Hotel Norbu House to deliberate on further developing the quality of the existing Tibetan education system, formulating and strategising for future education-driven initiatives, and nurturing Tibetan students in line with the principles of Basic Education Policy for Tibetans in Exile.

Professor Ven Samdong Rinpoche, the former Kalon Tripa of Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), graced the opening ceremony of the symposium as its chief guest, along with Kalon (Minister) Tharlam Dolma Changra and Secretary Jigme Namgyal Namgyalkhang from the Department of Education (DoE).

The event began with a welcome address from Secretary Jigme Namgyal, who succinctly provided an introduction to the objectives of the Tibetan education system. "Education has been one of the top priorities of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama after coming into exile. Recognising its transformative importance, His Holiness emphasised the importance of providing the Tibetan children with traditional and modern quality education because it is the only way to develop a brighter future," said the Education Secretary and further elaborated on the subsequent establishment of Tibetan schools in exile.

"Today, we have 62 schools in India and Nepal under four different school systems." For this, the Secretary acknowledged gratitude to all the respective governments and supporters for their assistance in Tibetan education endeavours in exile.

“Out of the modest budget of the Central Tibetan Administration, we allocate around 30 per cent for the education of Tibetan children”, which he proudly affirmed that it surpasses the figures of some of the leading nations in the world. However, the Secretary disclosed the presence of a few shortcomings that impede the success of Tibetan education, which aims to foster students with “genuine human intelligence”. According to him, the objectives also include nurturing responsible Tibetans who are dedicated to advancing the Tibetan cause. He underscored the importance of such conferences in identifying solutions and devising strategies.

Following this, each participant of the symposium introduced themselves before the gathering. The participants consist of Kamala Makunda, Teacher, Centre for Learning, Bangalore; Karma Chungdak, Founding and Former Director, Sambhota Tibetan Schools Society; Krishna Kumar, Former Director, NCERT; Latika Gupta, Assistant Professor, DoE, University of Delhi; Geshe Lhakdor, Director of Library of Tibetan Works and Archives, Dharamshala; Neha Vaidya, Chief Operating Officer, iTeach Schools; Padma M. Sarangapani, Education Professor and Chairperson, CETE, TISS Mumbai; and Tenzin Tsenlek, Former Education Director, Tibetan Children’s Village.

With a brief self-introduction, Education Kalon Tharlam Dolma Changra presented an overview of the DoE and its key responsibilities with a particular spotlight on the undertakings of the CTA’s Education Council and Advisory Committee. The Kalon stated that all the members of this committee had made assessment visits to Tibetan schools beginning from 2019 to understand the ground realities and recognise ways to improve flaws in the system.

The Education Kalon voiced her concerns over two issues that came to the members’ attention after the visits. “One of the biggest concerns is the declining enrolment. In 2012, the strength (of students in Tibetan schools) was 23,684. Now, in 2024, it is 13,035, which declined more than ten thousand,” Kalon stated. Despite the DoE’s intensified efforts in improving Tibetan education standards through various workshops and other initiatives, the problem of this dwindling enrolment arises from three primary reasons: the cessation in the regular number of Tibetans coming from Tibet since 2008, the increase in Tibetans emigrating to west from Tibetan settlements in India, Nepal and Bhutan, and the falling birth rate of the exile Tibetan community.

The second concern, Kalon Tharlam Dolma said, is the number of Tibetan children with special needs. She revealed that 294 students under this category currently study within the four education systems: TCV, THF, STSS and Snowlion Foundation.

In his keynote address, Kalon Trisur Ven Samdong Rinpoche shared his profound insights on the Buddhist perspective of education and highlighted the pivotal roles of educators, parents, and school administration in achieving positive academic outcomes. Rinpoche further highlighted the complementary practices of hearing, contemplating, and meditating for dispelling ignorance in students’ minds and awakening their understanding, which he said is the fundamental purpose of education.

Kalon Trisur Ven Samdong Rinpoche, who has served as Principal at the Central Institute of Higher Tibetan Studies, Varanasi, as well as at the Central School For Tibetans, Dalhousie, remarked, “Merely hearing (information) is like temporarily borrowing someone else’s knowledge. Without deep contemplation, simply hearing something is insufficient. Therefore, it’s crucial to use contemplation to deeply understand what has been heard and ultimately internalise the knowledge through meditation.”

In addition, Rinpoche emphasised the importance of mutual engagement in the educational process, stressing that both teachers and students should view themselves as learners. He highlighted that true learning occurs when both parties actively participate in the process of growth and discovery. In particular, Rinpoche remarked that if students show shortcomings, it is the teacher’s responsibility to address these gaps, inspire curiosity, and ignite a passion for knowledge in the students’ minds, without which, education may become a burden to students. Finally, Rinpoche stressed the importance of Tibetan Buddhist teachings as a foundation for the immediate and long-term well-being of humans. He implored Tibetan youths to take responsibility for maintaining and propagating Buddhist learning and practice.

Before concluding the inaugural, Additional Secretary Tenzin Dorjee, Head of the Academic Section of the DOE, conveyed a vote of thanks.

Tibetans in France protests against Musée Guimet for 11th time

04 December 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Tibetan activists and supporters in France held their 11th protest outside the Musée Guimet on Sunday, intensifying their call for the museum to end what they describe as the systematic erasure of Tibetan identity. They denounced the renaming of the Tibetan exhibition to “Himalayan World” as a deliberate act of negating Tibet’s existence and cultural distinctiveness.

Tibetan protestors outside the Musée Guimet on December 1, 2024 (Photo/SFT)

The protest, organised by Students for a Free Tibet France (SFT France), was bolstered by the presence of Pema Doma, Executive Director of Students for a Free Tibet (SFT), who traveled from New York to stand in solidarity with the activists and the Tibetan community in Paris.

Addressing the crowd, Pema Doma highlighted the enduring struggle for Tibetan's survival and identity. "I was born in the United States to a daughter of refugees. When my mother was born, her father was a prisoner. He spent years in prison because he was fighting for the Tibetan people. Decades later, I find myself here in Paris, fighting the same battle for the protection of our Tibetan cause and our community," she said.

Pema also praised the resilience of the Tibetan diaspora and underscored Paris's significance as home to one of the largest Tibetan exile communities outside Asia. She expressed profound disappointment in Musée Guimet's director, Yannick Lintz, for renaming the museum's Tibetan exhibition to "Himalayan World." According to Pema, the change undermines Tibet's distinct cultural identity and panders to external pressures, likely from the Chinese government.

Pema firmly rejected attempts to dilute Tibet's historical and cultural significance. "Tibet has existed for thousands of years—over 10,000 years," she asserted. "The decision by Yannick Lintz to change the exhibition from Tibet to "Himalayan World" at Musée Guimet just to satisfy those who may be pressuring her shows that she is not fulfilling the duties of her responsibility to this museum, the Tibetan community in Paris, the French people, and millions of Tibetan people around the world."

She drew attention to the harsh realities facing Tibet today, emphasising the Chinese government's attempts to erase Tibetan identity through measures such as colonial boarding schools, where over one million Tibetan children are currently being raised under Chinese state control. "The Chinese government would not like Tibet, Tibetan people, language, religion, history, and culture to exist. The French should not be complicit in that mission."

Concluding her address, Pema called upon museum visitors to recognise and honour Tibet's existence. "Tibet should not be silenced and Tibet exists. No amount of propaganda will ever change the fact," she declared.

On their social media platform, SFT France reaffirmed their unwavering stance, demanding the immediate restoration of the name. "Tibet is not a geographical concept. It is a people, a nation, a memory, a civilisation. Each object in this collection carries the history of a people being silenced. We will not be silent. Tibet will remain Tibet," the statement read.

The protest campaign has gained additional significance following its victory at Paris's Musée du quai Branly, which reversed its use of the term "Xizang" to "Tibet" for its Tibetan artefacts after public protest.

Representative Tsering Yangkyi Makes Inspection Visit to Sunday School for Tibetan Language and Culture in London

03 December 2024, CTA

Representative Tsering Yangkyi of the Office of Tibet, London, made an inspection visit to the Sunday School for Tibetan Language and Culture in London on 1 December 2024.

The visit began with a brief overview of the school by Tenzin Zeydhan from the Office of Tibet. The Representative was introduced to the teachers, the parents' committee, and the classrooms of the school, which are named Potala, Yumbu Lhakhang, Norling, and Dranyen class.

Thereafter, the Representative examined each class, spending approximately 15 minutes and engaged with the students. She encouraged incorporating the Tibetan language in one's daily communications with fellow Tibetans and emphasised the role of parents in realising this effort. Further underscoring the continued existence of such Tibetan language schools in the West to ensure the preservation of Tibetan language and culture, the Representative implored parents to enrol their children in these schools. "More than reiterating one's devotion to His Holiness the Dalai Lama, it is imperative that we must demonstrate it through our actions," said Representative Tsering Yangkyi.

During the discussions with teachers, the latter shared that, despite the challenges, they were encouraged by hearing about the strong Tibetan language skills of students from England during their Summer School programs in Dharamshala.

The Representative commended the teachers for their dedication to teaching Tibetan alongside their regular work, calling it a significant contribution. She emphasised that their efforts are taking place at a critical time for the survival of the Tibetan language, a moment almost unprecedented in Tibetan history. She further urged them to continue striving to fulfil the noble wishes of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, especially as he ages, and encouraged everyone to contribute to the community's goals to the best of their abilities.

A member of the parents' committee, Khenrab, then delivered a vote of thanks before wrapping up the event.

Tibetan Artists Festival concludes with vision of forming Tibetan Arts Council

02 December 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

(L-R) Tsering Paljor, Ngawang Sherab and Jhola Techung performing 'Ngatso Bod kyi Drokpa' at the closing ceremony of the festival on Dec.1, 2024 (Phayul photo)

The Tibetan Artists Festival, a vibrant three-day celebration of Tibetan creativity and heritage organised by TibetWrites, concluded on Sunday night with a landmark announcement. During the closing ceremony, Bob Ankerson, President of the Tibet Fund, announced the formation of the Tibetan Arts Council, a transformative initiative aimed at empowering Tibetan artists and amplifying their voices globally.

He acknowledged TibetWrites' efforts to better understand the aspirations and needs of the Tibetan artist community, drawing parallels between their mission and that of the Tibet Fund. "Over the past several years, we have been supporting organisations such as Drung, TibetWrites, and Khadhok," he noted. Ankerson shared insights into the festival's brainstorming sessions, where participating artists identified challenges and opportunities in the Tibetan arts ecosystem. One of the top priorities was the establishment of a Tibetan Arts Council, envisioned as a free and open membership association for Tibetan artists and arts organisations.

"This council will be shaped and driven by the Tibetan artist community itself," Ankerson said, announcing the formation of an interim steering committee to map out the council's structure and an international advisory board comprising established Tibetan artists to guide its initiatives. "On behalf of the Tibet Fund, we look forward to facilitating the next steps of mapping out the specifics and then helping to support and raise funds for new initiatives in the coming years."

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

Bob Ankerson addressing the gathering during closing ceremony of the Tibetan Artists Festival in Dharamshala on Dec. 1, 2024

Reflecting on the significance of the festival, Ankerson expressed deep admiration for the participating artists, emphasising their critical role in keeping the Tibetan culture vibrant and creative as it evolves, adapts, and transforms over time. "We don't know what the next generations of Tibetan artists will create in 20 and 30 years but I am pretty sure, they will be inspired by your creations in the same way that many of you were once inspired by Rangzen Tsundue and Jhola Paljor," he remarked.

The event was also attended by President Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA). In his speech, President Tsering highlighted the remarkable progress the Tibetan community has achieved over the past 65 years under the blessings of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, including significant strides in the arts—ranging from writing and cultural performances to poetry and painting. He emphasised that if arts and creativity continue to play an active role in advancing the Tibetan cause, the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) is committed to supporting and fostering the artistic community.

He also acknowledged the panel discussions held during the festival, which he noted were a first in exile, expressing hope for continued positive progress. He lauded the festival as a valuable platform for raising awareness about the Tibetan cause, not only within the exile community but also among a broader global audience.

Bhuchung D. Sonam, who is responsible for the conception of the festival told Phayul, "I am very happy that we were able to organise the Tibetan Artists Festival. As far as I know, this is the first time something like this has been done. Bringing together nearly 30 artists from Canada, Australia, the US, and across India to a place like this for three days is, in itself, a great success. Many of the artists returned to Dharamshala after many years, and they recognised the potential of art as a significant cultural soft power. It has also inspired them to continue engaging in their creative pursuits, such as making music and writing books, when they return to their respective places,” he said.

Speaking on the eventual formation of the Tibetan Arts Council, Bhuchung highlighted the challenges faced by Tibetan artists scattered across different countries. “Right now, our artists are dispersed across various nations, functioning within diverse cultural backgrounds and political circumstances. This fragmentation causes us to lose valuable opportunities, including funding, to create a unified platform for showcasing our work,” he explained.

He noted the lack of awareness among artists about available platforms and resources. “Writers, artists, and musicians each have their own spheres, but many are unaware of the possibilities available to them. We hope the Tibetan Arts Council will eventually establish networks and systems to provide not just financial support but also other resources to raise awareness through the work of artists spread across different countries,” Bhuchung stated.

CM lauds pivotal role of Tibetans in preserving ancient Indian philosophy

02 December 2024, Arunachal Observer, Pradeep Kumar

The Tibetans have played a pivotal role in preserving ancient Indian knowledge, philosophy and Buddhist traditions. Their selfless efforts have ensured the survival of our rich cultural heritage, said Chief Minister Pema Kahndu while discussing future strategy for their settlement with Tibetan Settlement Officers.

Dharamshala-based Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), in Tibet.com, quoted CM Khandu as saying, “I had the opportunity to meet with Tibetan Settlement Officers and members of Tibet Support Group of Arunachal Pradesh (TSGAP)”. He assured all possible support to Tibetan community living in settlements, like Tenzingaon, Miao, Tezu and Tuting, which is doing rounds in social media platform.

The CM also lauded proactive role of TSGAP, particularly president Tarh Tarak and secretary general Nima Sange (who were in the team).

In appreciation, Kalsang Tseten wrote: “Thank you so much, Honorable Chief Minister of Arunachal Pradesh, Pema Khandu Ji, for your unwavering support for Tibet and the Tibetan cause. Your genuine dedication to the Tibetan people and your steadfast faithfulness to His Holiness the Dalai

Lama will forever be remembered and cherished by Tibetans worldwide.

“May the blessings of His Holiness empower you with wisdom and strength to continue leading Arunachal Pradesh with grace and vision, ushering in progress and prosperity for your state and its people. Your leadership is an inspiration, and we are deeply grateful for your enduring solidarity with Tibet”.

The TSGAP and Core Group for Tibetan Cause-India (CGTC-I) are off springs of 1959 Tibetan uprising and giving momentum to the case.

Facilitated by India Tibet Coordination Office (ITCO), the CBTC-I, had met in New Delhi’s Bureau of His Holiness The Dalai Lama, chaired by its national convener R.K. Khrimy, to mainly focus on its by-laws..

The meeting was attended by prominent figures, including Bureau of His Holiness The Dalai Lama representative Jigmey Jungney, CTA Information and International Relations department additional secretary Tenzin Lekshay, national co-conveners Ven. Lama Chosphele Zotpa, Delhi CGTC-I regional convener Pankaj Goyal, Surender Kumar and Arvind Nicose. .

After address of ITCO acting coordinator Tashi Dekyi and keynote address of Khrimy, all had indepth discussion on new and existing suggestions of members which generated a positive and energetic atmosphere, reinforcing the collective commitment to the cause of Tibet and the pursuit of truth.

The CGTC-I serves as the central apex body of all Tibetan Support Groups (TSGs) across India, dedicated to advocating for the restoration of basic human rights and freedoms for the people of Tibet.

Moreover, the TSGAP led by Tarak is meeting often besides visiting Tibetan settlement areas to take stock of prevailing situation and apprising the inhabitants on various ongoing initiatives to ensure their return to Tibet.

Tibetan uprising on 10 March 1959, which erupted in Tibet capital Lhasa following invasion of the People’s Republic of China (PRC) after the Seventeen Point Agreement was reached in 1951 that changed the course of political history.

The Tibetan protesters feared that the PRC might arrest their spiritual leader the 14th Dalai Lama. Though the uprising initially was peaceful protests, but clashes quickly erupted as the Chinese People’s Liberation Army (PLA) used force to quell the protests.

The 14th Dalai Lama escaped from Lhasa, while the city was fully retaken by Chinese security forces. Thousands of Tibetans were killed during the uprising. The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) began had given covert support to the rebellion and the rebellion had spread to Lhasa which had filled with refugees. Opposition to the Chinese presence in Tibet grew in Lhasa.

In mid-February 1959 the Central Committee of Chinese Communist Party's administrative office circulated an internal report in Xinhua News Agency on how "the revolts in the Tibetan region have gathered pace and developed into a nearly full-scale rebellion," in a "situation report" for top CCP leaders.

On 10.03.1959, the 14th Dalai Lama with members of his family and his Govt disguised in PLA uniform left Norbulingka palace and entered Lhuntse Dzong on March 26 when the Dalai Lama he sent a letter to Indian prime minister Jawaharlal Nehru explaining the political situation in Tibet and requesting asylum. The CIA also cabled Nehru's office seeking permission for the Dalai Lama's party to cross the border. In response, Nehru sent a detachment of the Assam Rifles to the border post in Chuthangmu near Tawang. The Dalai Lama and his entourage crossed the McMahon Line on March 31. The same day, Nehru made an announcement in the Parliament that the Dalai Lama should be treated with respect. He had reached Tawang and stayed in Tawang Monastery before proceeding to Dharamshala where the Govt had allowed to set up the Tibetan Govt in Exile headquarters.

About 80,000 Tibetans followed the Dalai Lama to India within the next year, but data put global Tibetans diaspora at around 1.5 lakh.

Young Tibetans Gathered for Europe V-TAG Strategy Meeting in Stockholm

01 December 2024, CTA

More than 30 young Tibetans, primarily members of the Tibetan Youth Association (V-TAG) from six regions (Sweden, UK, Norway, France, Belgium and the Netherlands) under the jurisdiction of the Offices of Tibet in London and Brussels, gathered in Stockholm, Sweden, for a three-day Europe V-TAG Strategy meeting and training. The meeting was organised by the Department of Information and International Relations (DIIR) of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) and was facilitated locally by the Tibetan Community in Sweden.

The meeting opened with a welcome address by Lobsang, president of the Tibetan Community in Sweden, followed by an inaugural speech from Tenzin Lekshay, Official Spokesperson and Additional Secretary for International Relations at the DIIR. Additional Secretary Lekshay highlighted the importance of empowering young Tibetans to advocate for the Tibetan cause, emphasising the need to build the capacities of the youth for future leadership in the Tibetan movement.

The first day featured a talk by Mattias Björnerstedt, Chairperson of the Swedish Tibet Committee, who discussed the challenges and opportunities for Tibetan advocacy in Europe. Drawing on his extensive experience with the Tibetan cause, Björnerstedt provided valuable insights into the current landscape and the future potential for European engagement.

Country coordinators from the V-TAG groups in the UK, Belgium, France, and the Netherlands also shared their reports, reflecting on past activities and outlining their plans for the future.

In the afternoon, Wangpo Tethong, Executive Director of the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT), Europe, led a training session on effective advocacy, engaging participants in group discussions aimed at strengthening their advocacy skills.

The day's sessions concluded with a cultural celebration, as participants enjoyed traditional Tibetan dances, showcasing the vibrant cultural heritage of Tibet.

Ven. Thupten Wangchen and Thupten Gyatso, members of the Tibetan Parliament in Exile from Europe; Thupten Tsering, Coordinator of the Office of Tibet, France; Tenzin Kunga, Secretary of the Office of Tibet, London; Tenzin Phuntsok, EU Coordinator of the Office of Tibet, Brussels; and Ngawang Choedhar, DIIR Project Officer attended the meeting. The meeting aims to further empower Tibetan youth (V-TAG) across Europe, providing them with the tools and strategies needed to continue their advocacy work for the Tibetan cause.

Tibetan government-in-exile flags 'colonial style' schools at UN forum

01 December 2024, Hindustan Times, Dar Ovais

UN advocacy officer from the Tibet Bureau Geneva condemned the Chinese government for what he described as a systematic campaign of cultural destruction that threatens the survival of Tibetan identity.

With the Dharamshala-based Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) repeatedly accusing China of forcibly enrolling Tibetan children in the colonial-style boarding schools in occupied Tibet, the critical schooling situation was also flagged at the recently held 17th United Nations Forum on Minority Issues at Geneva.

During the session on "minority representation in education", Phuntsok Topgyal, the UN advocacy officer from the Tibet Bureau Geneva condemned the Chinese government for what he described as a systematic campaign of cultural destruction that threatens the survival of Tibetan identity.

Notably, the officer disclosed that over 1 million Tibetan children have been forcibly enrolled in colonial-style boarding schools where Tibetan language instruction is banned, and Mandarin is enforced as the only medium of communication. He further detailed the demolition of sacred sites like Atsok Monastery and the relocation of Tibetan populations from their ancestral lands.

"The persecution is not limited to infrastructure and education," Topgyal said, adding, "Advocates for Tibetan cultural preservation face severe repression, with individuals like Tsering Tso detained for speaking out against ethnic discrimination. The removal of young monks from religious institutions signals a direct attack on the transmission of Tibetan traditions to future generations."

Earlier, the CTA had called for immediate intervention to the situation from the international communities, stating that China's continuation and strengthening of compulsory and colonial-style boarding schools across Tibet is resulting in cultural erasure and loss of Tibetan identity.

The CTA had in September said the recent reports from reliable sources in the Ngaba region of Tibet have raised serious concerns about China's educational policies and practices that are targeted at young Tibetan monks and nuns and pose a threat to the preservation of traditional Tibetan culture, religion, and way of life.

The UN Forum on Minority Issues meets annually for two working days allocated to thematic discussions pursuant to Human Rights Council resolution 6/15 of September 28, 2007, and resolution 19/23 of March 23, 2012. This year, the theme of the UN Forum was the representation and self-representation of minorities in public spaces and discourses.

Based on the dialogue and contributions of the participants a summary of the discussion of the Forum will be prepared by the Chairperson of the UN Forum, and the Special Rapporteur on minority issues prepares a report on the recommendations of the UN Forum to the Human Rights Council.

November

Inaugural Tibetan Artists Festival honours artists and intellectuals

29 November 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

Bhuchung D Sonam, Festival Director of the Tibetan Artists Festival delivering opening remarks on Nov. 29, 2024 (Photo/Tenzin Leckphel)

The Tibetan exile community came together on Friday morning to celebrate the inaugural Tibetan Artists Festival, a vibrant showcase of its rich artistic heritage by bringing together 30 exiled artists from around the globe that included writers, musicians, intellectuals and painters among others. The three-day festival organised by TibetWrites, a Tibetan-run publishing outfit, is the brainchild of Tibetan writer and poet Bhuchung D. Sonam.

The opening ceremony captivated the audience with soul-stirring performances by the Grammy-nominated artist Tenzin Choegyal and singer Sonam Dolma. Bhuchung D. Sonam, festival director and co-founder of TibetWrites, dedicated the festival to Tibetans living under Chinese colonial rule, particularly the artists, writers, poets, and filmmakers who continue to express their truths despite facing harassment, imprisonment, torture, and even death.

"For them, we want to dedicate this festival," Bhuchung said, emphasising the resilience and courage of those who create art under oppressive conditions to voice the struggles and aspirations of the Tibetan people.

Tsering Yangzom Lama, the acclaimed author of We Measure the Earth with Our Bodies, delivered a keynote address on 'Why Writing Matters' where she emphasised that, for her, art is an act of love and a testament to the beauty of Tibetan existence despite the pain of displacement and oppression. Lama recounted her experience at a Tibetan Writers' Retreat, where participants explored what it means to be Tibetan and also discussed solidarity with other marginalised communities, including African Americans, Palestinians, and Indigenous peoples, drawing parallels between their struggles and those of Tibetans.

Reflecting on her upbringing in Canada, Tsering critiqued the lack of education about Indigenous peoples and the prevalent stereotypes that frame them as relics of the past. She observed how, despite these challenges, Indigenous art is often aesthetically appreciated while the lives and histories behind the work are overlooked. However, years later Tsering noted significant shifts: protests for indigenous women's rights, renamed streets honouring indigenous heritage, and bookstores prominently featuring Indigenous literature. "There is a growing consciousness in Canada, America, Australia, and parts of Europe—a shift happening because of the labour of indigenous people but also the other communities who have been marginalised," she said.

Tsering highlighted how these movements benefit all communities by encouraging conversations about colonisation by amplifying silenced voices. She acknowledged the victories of marginalised groups and expressed hope for a similar awakening within Chinese society, even if it may take decades. “What I do know,” she said, “is that literature and art have reached parts of the world we never imagined before. This is due to the hard work of Indigenous writers, Black writers, LGBTQ writers, and others who persevered when no one was paying attention, ready for the moment the world finally listened.”

Reflecting on her interactions with readers worldwide, Tsering shared her surprise at how many people remain unaware of Tibetan stories. “As Tibetans, we often feel like we are shouting to the world, but many still don’t know our story,” she said. She underscored the power of art, not as a tool of persuasion but as a spiritual expression that speaks to the shared humanity of Tibetan people. “If art does what it does well, it will reach people, and the answer will be self-evident—that Tibetan people deserve the same rights as everyone else.”

Speaking to Phayul, Bhuchung D. Sonam, the festival’s director, shared that the idea for the Tibetan Artists Festival had been on his mind for six years. “We are a scattered community, spread across more than 30 countries, and so are our artists. We need to come together to understand what art is, its impact on society and politics, and how artists can contribute to the Tibetan freedom struggle. This gathering is a space to think collectively and help people realize the power of art,” he said, explaining the inspiration behind organising the festival.

The festival is supported by Tibet Fund, whose Regional Director, Sherab Wooser, told Phayul, “The Tibet Fund supports the Tibetan Artists Festival as it aligns with its mission to preserve and promote Tibetan culture. This festival provides a platform for traditional and contemporary Tibetan artists to showcase their work, ensuring Tibetan art thrives in exile. It encourages self-expression, innovation, and collaboration, helping artists reach wider audiences while maintaining a balance between tradition and modernity.”

The Tibetan Artists Festival runs until December 1 over the weekend, offering a dynamic mix of music, storytelling, and poetry, alongside engaging panel discussions, music concerts, and live art performances, highlighting the richness of Tibetan creativity and heritage. Notable participants include seasoned and emerging musicians, writers, and visual artists whose works reflect the nuanced experiences of Tibetan diaspora life.

Critical Schooling Situation in Tibet Raised at 17th UN Forum on Minority Issues

29 November 2024, CTA

The UN Advocacy Officer of the Central Tibetan Administration, Phuntsok Topgyal, speaking during the ongoing 17th United Nations Forum on Minority Issues.

The 17th United Nations Forum on Minority Issues is being held in Geneva with the participation of approximately 690 attendees, marking a significant increase in engagement compared to previous years, according to the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) Secretariat. The forum brings together a diverse group of experts, non-governmental organisations (NGOs), and individuals to address critical issues affecting national, ethnic, religious, and linguistic minorities worldwide.

This year’s forum explores four primary themes: representation in public spaces, education, media and culture. Discussions focus on the inclusion of minorities in public decision-making, the preservation of their history and heritage in educational systems, the role of media and cultural platforms in amplifying minority voices. Attendees are also assessing policies that ensure minority groups can engage fully in their own cultural activities and practices.

Earlier today on 29 November 2024, Phuntsok Topgyal, the UN Advocacy Officer from the Tibet Bureau Geneva, highlighted the dire situation in Tibet during a session on education. He condemned the Chinese government for what he described as a systematic campaign of cultural destruction that threatens the survival of Tibetan identity.

The UN Advocacy Officer disclosed that over 1 million Tibetan children have been forcibly enrolled in colonial-style boarding schools where Tibetan language instruction is banned, and Mandarin is enforced as the only medium of communication. He further detailed the demolition of sacred sites like Atsok Monastery and the relocation of Tibetan populations from their ancestral lands.

“The persecution is not limited to infrastructure and education,” Topgyal said. “Advocates for Tibetan cultural preservation face severe repression, with individuals like Tsering Tso detained for speaking out against ethnic discrimination. The removal of young monks from religious institutions signals a direct attack on the transmission of Tibetan traditions to future generations.”

The council is considering actions to hold the Chinese government accountable for its atrocities and ensure equal rights for Tibetan children to receive education in the Tibetan language.

The United Nations Special Rapporteur on Minority Issues has issued a formal call for contributions to the ongoing UN Forum on Minority Issues. Participants are invited to share their experiences, perspectives, and data related to challenges and opportunities concerning the representation and self-representation of minorities in public spaces and discourse.

The forum seeks to identify obstacles faced by minorities and highlight effective initiatives and good practices that promote their fair and equitable representation. Contributions from participants will inform the Chairperson's summary of the forum's discussions.

Based on the dialogue and input received, the Special Rapporteur will prepare a detailed report outlining the forum's recommendations, which will be submitted to the Human Rights Council. This initiative is part of a broader effort to strengthen the representation of minorities in line with international human rights standards.

Sikyong Visits Tibetan Institutions in Mundgod, Implores Residents to Uphold Tibetan Spiritual and Cultural Heritage

28 November 2024, CTA

Sikyong Visits Tibetan Institutions in Mundgod, Implores Residents to Uphold Tibetan Spiritual and Cultural Heritage

On 27 November 2024, Sikyong Penpa Tsering began official visits to Tibetan settlement and institutions in Mundgod following the completion of long-life prayers offering at Ganden Tritok Khang.

The engagements began at the STS School, where Sikyong delivered an inspiring speech to the students, emphasising the importance of Tibet as an ecological region vital to the health of the planet. Sikyong spoke about the critical role Tibet plays in preserving the global environment, particularly as the "water tower of Asia" and urged the students to be aware of their heritage and the unique position they hold as future leaders in preserving Tibetan culture and contributing to global sustainability.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

"Your education here is not just about learning academic subjects; it is about carrying forward the responsibility to safeguard our land, our culture, and our environment for future generations," Sikyong said, motivating the young students to stay committed to their studies and take pride in their identity.

After addressing the students, Sikyong visited Camp 3 and Rangzen Hall, where he met with community members and general public, further engaging with the Tibetan diaspora in the region. Sikyong's next stop was at the Ex-Servicemen Welfare Association, where he paid tribute to the martyrs of the Tibetan community, offering flowers in honour of their sacrifices.

Sikyong then proceeded to the branch Men-Tsee-Khang, the Tibetan medical and astro-science institute, where he had a brief visit, acknowledging the significant role the institution plays in preserving traditional Tibetan medicine and healing practices.

Later in the day, Sikyong visited STS School (Camp 1), where he interacted with young students.

Sikyong also took time to visit the Camp 1 and Sakya Monastery where he briefly toured the monastery, followed by a visit to the Nyingma Monastery where he inaugurated a newly constructed water tank, which will improve access to clean water for the monastery and surrounding area.

The final stop of his day-long visit was Gaden Lachi, where he addressed a gathering of monks organised by the Gaden Lachi Monastery. Speaking to the monks, Sikyong reiterated the importance of preserving the spiritual and cultural heritage of Tibet, emphasising the role of monastic institutions in nurturing wisdom, compassion, and resilience within the Tibetan community.

Tibetan advocacy alliance lobbies Indian MPs with three appeals

27 November 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Members of the Tibet Advocacy Alliance-India with Dr. Shashi Tharoor, MP from Kerala and Chairperson of the Committee on External Affairs in New Delhi (Photo/FNVA)

The Tibet Advocacy Alliance-India launched its advocacy week in New Delhi on Monday, aligning with the commencement of India's winter parliamentary session. This coalition comprises prominent civil society organisations, including the Tibetan Youth Congress (TYC), Tibetan Women's Association (TWA), National Democratic Party of Tibet (NDPT), and Students for a Free Tibet (SFT). The initiative is coordinated by the International Tibet Network (ITN) with support from the Foundation for Non-Violent Alternatives (FNVA).

As a unified platform of Tibetan NGOs, the alliance is dedicated to fostering strategic and coordinated advocacy efforts to strengthen Indian parliamentary engagement on Tibet-related issues. Now in its third phase, the advocacy week featured meetings with several prominent Indian parliamentarians, including Dr. Shashi Tharoor, MP from Kerala and Chairperson of the Committee on External Affairs; Shri Mohamad Haneefa, MP from Ladakh and Member of the Committee on Defence; Dr. Bimol Akoijam, MP from Manipur and Member of the Committee on Education, Women, Children, Youth, and Sports; Shri E.T. Mohammed Basheer, MP from Kerala and Member of the Committee on Social Justice and Empowerment and others.

Tenzing Dhamdul, a senior research associate at FNVA, told Phayul that the alliance presented three key appeals regarding Tibet during their advocacy: to recognise Tibet as an occupied nation, honour His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, and advocate for the preservation of Tibetan culture and language. Reflecting on their engagement with 12 MPs during the second phase of their campaign, Dhamdul noted that the meetings were met with a very positive and welcoming response. He added that this approach of openness and receptiveness is something Tibetans could also learn from.

He told Phayul that some parliamentarians had prior involvement in Tibet-related issues, while others were new to the cause. MPs familiar with Tibetan matters acknowledged the significance of the appeals, though they indicated that not all would gain traction. "Out of the three appeals, some MPs said one may not work, but we will still advocate for it," Dhamdul remarked. He further highlighted a point of consensus among the MPs: unanimous support for the second appeal—honouring His Holiness the Dalai Lama, who turns 90 next year. Additionally, the MPs expressed alignment with the third appeal, criticising China's colonial-style boarding schools for undermining Tibetan culture and language.

"The first appeal, however, appeared challenging for few MPs, as they needed to consider the Ministry of External Affairs' position and India's official stance on the matter," Dhamdul told Phayul. He explained that given India's historical position on Tibet during the tenures of leaders like Nehru and Atal Bihari Vajpayee, the MPs refrained from commenting extensively on the first appeal, deeming it too sensitive. "Nonetheless, some MPs acknowledged that India shares a border with Tibet, not China," he added.

When asked whether the week-long advocacy efforts would lead to policy-level changes, Dhamdul opined that the primary role of MPs is to cast their vote in favour or against during policy-making processes. "While there may not be immediate changes at the policy level, what MPs can contribute is fostering national fervor. We believe parliament serves as a crucial platform to engage and convince MPs on Tibet-related issues," he said. Dhamdul emphasised that ultimately, policy-level changes are necessary, and parliament remains one of the key instruments in achieving that.

Concluding his remarks, Dhamdul reflected on the past two days of engagement with MPs, noting how deeply welcoming India was to the exiled spiritual leader following Tibet's colonial occupation—a response he observed was not mirrored by nations like the US and Britain. "India extended its hand of support during the critical time, and this sentiment deeply resonated with me during these engagements," he said. Dhamdul also shared that some MPs acknowledged the historical blunder India made by accepting Tibet as a part of China.

G7 nations condemn China's human rights record in Tibet, East Turkestan, and Hong Kong

27 November 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Leaders of the G7 nations in Italy (Photo/Reuters)

The foreign ministers of the G7 nations, alongside the European Union High Representative, have expressed concerns over China's human rights record, particularly in Tibet, East Turkestan, and Hong Kong and urged China to abide by international legal commitment.

Their concerns were outlined in a collective statement following the second G7 Foreign Affairs Ministers' meeting, hosted under Italy's presidency on Tuesday. "We remain concerned by the human rights situation in China, including in East Turkestan and Tibet," the statement stated.

They expressed their unease regarding Beijing's ongoing suppression of freedoms and civil liberties in Hong Kong, pointing to the sentencing of 45 pro-democracy activists as a severe setback for democracy and the rule of law. "The sentencing of 45 pro-democracy politicians and activists marks a further deterioration of democratic participation and pluralism, which undermines confidence in the rule of law as enshrined in the Hong Kong Basic Law, and therefore Hong Kong's and the People's Republic of China's international legal obligations."

The ministers urged authorities of both China and Hong Kong to honor their international human rights commitments, stating, "We remain concerned by the erosion of civil society, human rights, and fundamental freedoms in Hong Kong."

The group reaffirmed their collective commitment to defending international law and promoting universal human rights. "We reiterate our commitment to foster respect for international law, including the Charter of the United Nations, to protect human rights and dignity for all individuals," the statement read.

This declaration builds upon the G7's earlier criticisms during their first Foreign Affairs Ministers' meeting in April, where similar concerns were raised about China's human rights practices in Tibet East Turkistan and Hong Kong.

The Group of Seven (G-7) is an intergovernmental organization made up of the world's largest developed economies: France, Germany, Italy, Japan, the United States, the United Kingdom, and Canada with the European Union participating as a non-enumerated member. Government leaders of these countries meet periodically to address international economic and monetary issues, with each member taking over the presidency on a rotating basis.

Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Led by Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel Continues Scotland Study Mission

27 November 2024, CTA

A delegation of the Tibetan parliament-in-Exile led by Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, and consisting of MP Dawa Tsering and MP Ratsa Sonam Norbu convened their second day of Scotland study mission with an engaging introduction to the Rules, Roles, and Functions of the Finance and Public Administration Committee by Cameron Garrett, Research & Policy Officer, and Ross Greer MSP. This was followed by a visit to observe the committee in session.

The committee hearing focused on Scotland's public finances, public service reform, the National Performance Framework, and public administration in government. A key agenda item involved gathering evidence from the Office of Budget Responsibility regarding Scotland's 2025/26 Budget. Later, the delegation received a briefing on the Equality and Human Rights Committee of the Scottish Parliament, followed by an observation of its hearing. Following this, the delegation participated in a thought-provoking discussion with Eleanor Byrne-Rosengren, Secretariat of the Cross-Party Group on Tibet, and Cameron Garrett, Research & Policy Officer, alongside Ross Greer MSP. The conversation centred on the committee's role in promoting equality and human rights and its contributions to fostering inclusivity.

The delegation also had the opportunity to meet Jamie Dunlop, Chief Executive of the Scottish Youth Parliament (SYP). The discussion revolved around the organisation's pivotal role in empowering young people to exercise their rights and amplify their voices to decision-makers. Jamie Dunlop elaborated on his responsibilities, which include overseeing the organisation's daily operations, acting as a liaison between the SYP board and staff, ensuring proper governance, and implementing strategic plans to drive youth engagement and participation in democratic processes.

The delegation later held a private meeting with the Co-Leaders of the Scottish Greens, Patrick Harvie, Lorna Slater, Maggie Chapman, Ariane Burgess, Gillian Mackay and Mark Ruskell.

The Scottish Greens, known for their historic contributions in government, discussed their efforts in climate action, renewable energy, and social justice. The meeting explored their parliamentary roles and strategies for raising the Tibetan issue within their legislative framework. Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel also addressed the critical situation in Tibet and provided insights into the evolution of Tibetan democracy in exile.

In the evening, the delegation observed the Stage 2 Proceedings of the Prisoners (Early Release) (Scotland) Bill in the Scottish Parliament. This emergency legislation session showcased the Parliament's ability to address urgent challenges with agility and precision.

From the public gallery, the delegation witnessed MSPs engaging in dynamic debates as they scrutinised, amended, and shaped critical legislation in real-time. It was an invaluable opportunity to observe Scotland's legislative process responding to crises with focus and adaptability.

The day provided a rich understanding of Scotland's governance structure, legislative processes, and the role of its committees in driving impactful decision-making. From dynamic parliamentary debates to meaningful discussions with key stakeholders, the delegation gained invaluable insights into how inclusive and participatory democracy operates in Scotland.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Attends the Enthronement Ceremony of the 105th Gaden Tri Rinpoche

27 November 2024, CTA

On 26 November 2024, Sikyong Penpa Tsering attended the enthronement ceremony of the Sharpa

Gyalpo Tsongkhapa, the founder of Gelug (yellow hat) school of Tibetan Buddhism.

Choeje Rinpoche Jetsun Lobsang Dorjee Pelsangpo as the 105th Gaden Tripa at Gaden Lachi.

With profound wisdom and insight, His Holiness the Dalai Lama, on 2 November, bestowed the responsibility of 105th Ganden Tripa to Sharpa Choeje Rinpoche as the regent of Jamgon Chokyi

On the day of the enthronement ceremony, the new Gaden Tri Rinpoche was ceremonially escorted to Gaden Lachi amidst a grand procession with incense and traditional welcome by the monks from the Gaden Shartse and Jangtse monasteries, along with distinguished guests and devoted followers. Rinpoche then conferred teaching on Tsongkhapa's lam-rim.

On the subsequent day, the entire Gelug school is scheduled to offer a long-life prayer to the 105th Gaden Tri Rinpoche.

TYC team embarks on bike rally to gather support for Tibet's cause

27 November 2024, The Arunachal Times, Prem Chetry

A team of 11 bikers and four volunteers of Tibetan Youth Congress (TYC) embarked on a motorcycle rally to garner support and create awareness for Tibet's freedom.

The rally was flagged from Bum-la Pass in Indo-Tibet border on 22 November by Bharat Tibet Sahyog Manch national general secretary Pankaj Goya. It will cover approximately 15000 km, passing through 22 states and a union territory.

The team arrived here in West Kameng district on Tuesday evening and went to the historic Khenzimane in Zemithang circle, the place where the 14th Dalai Lama set his feet during his escape from Tibet in 1959.

"The primary objective of the rally is to expose the atrocities committed by the Communist China in Tibet and to oppose its illegitimate rule," TYC president Gonpo Dondup, said.

"We seek to draw the attention of the international community towards the ongoing cultural genocide in Tibet, where China is implementing hard-line policies designed to systematically eradicate Tibetan culture and identity," Dondup said.

"These policies include forced enrolment of Tibetan children in colonial-style boarding schools, restricting access to educational activities related to Tibetan culture, and imprisoning teachers and individuals, who strive to preserve the Tibetan language," he said.

"Additionally, the forced closure of Tibetan schools and monastic institutions poses a significant threat to the preservation of Tibetan culture, language, and spiritual heritage. This blatant violation of rights and freedoms serves as a stark reminder of the Chinese government's relentless efforts to suppress Tibetan identity," he said, and called upon the international community to exert pressure on China to stop its unlawful activities aimed at erasing Tibetan culture, and to respect the rights of the Tibetan people.

He said that for thousands of years, Tibet existed as an independent country, maintaining harmonious relationships with its neighbouring countries. However, following the unfortunate occupation of Tibet by the People's Republic of China in 1959, the historically peaceful Indo-Tibet border was shattered, Dondup said.

He further urged the Indian government to adopt a resolution that supports the independent status of Tibet and recognise the historical Indo-Tibet border.

"In recent years, the Chinese government has intensified the exploitation of Tibet's rich mineral resources under the guise of developmental projects, endangering the environment of the Tibetan Plateau and threatening the survival of historically significant sites and monasteries. The damming projects on the Drichu River and other rivers in Tibet will have devastating implications on Tibetans and downstream countries. The massive damming initiatives and nuclear production, combined with the dumping of nuclear wastes and reckless development policies, are wreaking havoc on Tibet's environment, subsequently contributing to ecological imbalance worldwide," he added.

During the course of the rally, the bikers will visit Tibetan winter markets across India to create awareness about the ongoing cultural genocide perpetrated by China in Tibet as well as the importance of staying united against China. They will also engage with the members of parliament, members of the legislative assemblies, Tibet Support Groups and media, while also raising awareness among the Indian populace on the critical issues facing Tibet today.

New 5-year programme launched of US support for south Asia Tibetan communities

26 November 2024, Tibetan Review

The US government has on Nov 25 launched at Dharamshala a new five-year programme to support Tibetan communities in South Asia, with focus on "Strengthening Economic, Social, and Cultural Resilience of Tibetan Communities in South Asia". The event was held at the Tibetan Institute of Performing Arts.

The programme will be led by the US Agency for International Development (USAID) in partnership with New York-based Tibet Fund and the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), the elected leadership of the exile Tibetans.

The programme builds on decades of collaboration to support Tibetan communities, reflecting a shared commitment to their welfare, self-reliance, and cultural preservation, said the US Embassy, New Delhi, in a statement Nov 25.

The statement said the initiative seeks to empower Tibetan communities by fostering sustainable livelihoods, enhancing social resilience, and preserving Tibetan cultural heritage. It places the CTA at the forefront of development efforts, supporting its leadership in delivering locally driven solutions for its communities. Key programme activities include job training, entrepreneurship support, and skills development to promote economic independence, as well as preserving Tibetan language, arts, and traditions.

USAID Mission Director Steve Olive has said, "The US Government's commitment to preserving Tibetan culture and fostering economic independence is unwavering. This new initiative strengthens community bonds, deepens economic opportunities, and celebrates the rich cultural heritage of Tibetan communities. By working closely with the CTA and The Tibet Fund, we aim to empower Tibetans to build resilient and self-reliant communities for generations to come."

Applauding the US support, the executive head, sikyong Penpa Tsering, of the CTA has said: "USAID has been a longstanding, steadfast partner to the CTA for many years, playing a pivotal role in our development efforts. We are deeply grateful for this continued collaboration and remain committed to further strengthening the partnership to drive meaningful, lasting change in the Tibetan community. This new initiative is a powerful step forward, poised to significantly strengthen the economic, social, and cultural resilience of the Tibetan community in South Asia. It will not only strengthen our efforts towards preserving our rich cultural heritage and traditions but also empower future generations to thrive and shape a brighter, more sustainable future."

And Bob Ankersen, President of The Tibet Fund, has said, "We are committed to creating transformative opportunities for Tibetans, empowering them not only to preserve their cultural heritage but also to advance economically and socially in an ever-changing world."

By advancing economic opportunities, promoting sustainable development, and safeguarding cultural heritage, it reflects a shared vision for a future where Tibetan communities can thrive and maintain their unique identity, said the embassy statement.

USAID's Mission Director Steve Olive led Delegation Visits Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

26 November 2024, CTA

USAID's Mission Director Steve Olive led Delegation Visits Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

USAID Mission Director Steve Olive, accompanied by Mark Tegenfeldt, Office Director, GDO; Balaka Dey, Development Assistance Specialist, GDO; and Martha Van Lieshout, Team Lead, USAID/India DOC Team, visited the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile on 25 November 2024.

They were warmly received by Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang, who guided them on a tour of the parliament hall. This was followed by a meeting with the Deputy Speaker and members of the Standing Committee at the Standing Committee's hall.

Welcoming the delegation, the Deputy Speaker expressed her sincere gratitude to the United States and its people for their unwavering support of Tibet's just cause. She specifically acknowledged the U.S. for adopting numerous bills and resolutions in support of Tibet, as well as for its continued assistance to the Tibetan people in sustaining their democratic system and promoting their welfare through various ongoing programs under USAID.

The delegation's visit to Dharamshala underscored the fact that the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) is the legitimate representative of the Tibetan people worldwide. Their visit to the seat of the CTA would offer them a deeper understanding of its structure, initiatives, and other important aspects of its work.

Further discussing the recently held COP29 climate conference in Azerbaijan, the Deputy Speaker called for scientific research on the Tibetan Plateau under the framework of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC). She emphasised the significant role of the Tibetan Plateau in global climate patterns, pointing out its impact on climate change through the loss of pasturelands, the thinning of glaciers, and the flow of its rivers. She also urged for the inclusion of a representative from the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile at future climate conferences to raise awareness about Tibet's environmental crisis on the global stage.

As a former educator, the Deputy Speaker also underscored the importance of education for Tibetan children, particularly higher specialised education. She appealed for more seats to be made available to Tibetans in the Tibetan Scholarship Program (TSP) under the U.S. Department of State's Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs (ECA), which provides opportunities for Tibetans to excel in their chosen fields of study.

The meeting concluded with a discussion between the USAID Mission Director and members of the Standing Committee on various ongoing and upcoming programs and projects.

Central Tibetan Administration Hosts Symposium in Taipei on Building Common Ground with Key Allies

26 November 2024, CTA

The Snow Land Forum: 2024, titled "Symposium on Finding Common Ground", organised by the Tibet Religious Foundation of His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Taiwan (also called Office of Tibet), was held at National Chengchi University on 23-24 November.

Central Tibetan Administration Hosts Symposium in Taipei on Building Common Ground with Key Allies

This two-day event focused on the impact of U.S. legislation on Tibet and the prospect of international Tibet policy, addressing Tibet's position within the shifting global political landscape as China grows increasingly authoritarian under Xi Jinping. The symposium also explored democratic movements in China and its regions like Hong Kong, Southern Mongolia, East Turkistan, and Taiwan amidst rising tensions between Western democracies and authoritarian states.

Secretary Ngawa Tsegyam, Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama; Political Secretary Tashi Gyatso Shadrong, Cabinet Secretariat; Secretary Karma Choeying, Department of Information and International Relations; Secretary Dawa Tsering, Director of the Tibetan Policy Institute; Representative Kelsang Gyaltsen Bawa, Office of Tibet-Taipei; Jamyang Tsering, Editor of the CTA's Official Chinese Website; Tenzin Phentok, researcher at the Tibet Policy Institute; Tsultrim Gyatso, Chinese Liaison Officer Office of Tibet, Washington DC; Sangye Kyab, Chinese Liaison Officer to Europe; Dawa Sangmo, Chinese Liaison Officer to Australia; Dr Gyalo, a Tibetan Sociologist and activist; and others representing Tibetan NGOs attended the symposium from Tibetan side, along with numerous scholars and activists from Tibet's key allies, namely Chinese pro-democrats, Taiwan, East Turkistan, Hong Kong, and Southern Mongolia.

At the forum's opening ceremony, Secretary Karma Choeying of the Department of Information and International Relations highlighted that the Central Tibetan Administration has consistently presented Tibet's factual historical context on the global stage. The Secretary further pointed out that the recent U.S. legislation addressing the Tibet-China conflict not only challenges China's distortion of Tibetan history but also reinforces strong support for unconditional dialogue between the two sides. Secretary Karma Choeying reaffirmed the Central Tibetan Administration's firm commitment to resolving the Tibetan-Chinese conflict through dialogue based on the Middle Way Approach policy, emphasising that this policy is a crucial approach that is beneficial for both Tibetans and Chinese in the long term.

The morning session of 23 November discussed "Overview of Tibet's International Status and U.S. Legislation on Tibet", which was moderated by Professor Chen Mumin of National Chung Hsing University. The panellists of this session included Representative Kalsang Gyaltsen Bawa, Office of Tibet; Ming Chu-cheng, Professor Emeritus of Political Science at National Taiwan University; and Akio Yaita, CEO of the Indo-Pacific Strategy Think Tank. They discussed the impact of successive U.S. legislations on Tibet and their importance in shaping international support for Tibet.

During the session, Professor Chen emphasised that the Tibet issue is not only a regional concern but an international issue, reflecting the broader trend of identity politics that now drives global conflicts. Representative Kalsang Gyaltsen Bawa highlighted the significance of U.S. legislative actions, such as the "Promoting a Resolution to Tibet-China Dispute Act", which affirms that Tibet is not part of China and recognises the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) as the legitimate representative of the Tibetan people. He added, "This legislation has faced strong criticism from China, yet the international community's support for Tibet continues to grow."

CEO Akio Yaita compared the approaches of both political parties of the U.S. and stressed that aligning the interests of both Taiwan and Tibet with the U.S. foreign policy is crucial for their respective causes.

Furthermore, Professor Emeritus Ming Chu-cheng discussed the four main historical aspects of the Tibet cause: human rights, ethnicity, religion, and cultural identity. He criticised China's lack of respect for human rights, particularly religious freedom, which remains a fundamental concern for many democratic nations. He emphasised that China's distortion of universal human rights values and the ongoing oppression of Tibetans, including genocide, must be clearly addressed in global discourse and called for greater awareness of Tibet's unique cultural identity, which he believes is critical not only for Tibetans but for the broader international community.

The afternoon session, titled "International Support for Tibet and CTA's Chinese Outreach Work", saw participation from Hung Kuo-chun, Chief Operating Officer (COO) of Watchout, and CTA officials. COO Hung pointed out the historical and democratic parallels between Taiwan and Tibet, suggesting that both can learn from each other as they navigate their respective struggles for autonomy and international recognition.

Likewise, Jamyang Tsering, Editor of the CTA's Official Chinese Website, and Tsultrim Gyatso, Chinese Liaison Officer Office of Tibet, Washington DC, noted the growing international attention to Tibet cause, highlighting how global powers, including the U.S., UK, Canada, and Japan, have issued joint statements condemning China's persecution of Tibetans. Tenzin Phentok, a researcher from the Tibet Policy Institute, explained China's divisive strategy of geographically separating Tibet into the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and four other Tibetan-inhabited provinces. This division, she argued, seeks to undermine Tibetan unity and brainwash the international community into accepting Chinese sovereignty over Tibet.

Additionally, Sangye Kyab, Chinese Liaison Officer to Europe, shared insights into the evolving attitudes within China, noting that while some Chinese still support the idea of a unified China, younger generations are increasingly supportive of Tibetan self-determination. Dawa Sangmo, Chinese Liaison Officer to Australia, emphasised the importance of strengthening Tibetan-Chinese exchanges and coordination between Tibetan advocacy groups and international governments to further the Tibetan cause.

The session concluded with a call for continued international solidarity and strategic outreach, urging governments to take clear, decisive actions in support of Tibet. Speakers agreed that increased coordination between the Tibetan community and global powers is essential to counter China's attempts to isolate Tibet and erase its cultural identity.

Tibetan Parliamentary delegation concludes London mission with key advocacy meetings on Tibet's global cause

25 November 2024, ANI

A Tibetan parliamentary delegation, led by Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel and accompanied by MPs Dawa Tsering and Ratsa Sonam Norbu, visited the Office of Tibet in London on November 22, 2024, marking the conclusion of their four-day London Study Mission.

According to a press release by the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), the delegation was received by Tsering Yangkyi, the representative of Tibet in the UK, and the staff of the Office of Tibet, in what was a significant step in advancing the Tibetan cause in the global political arena.

According to CTA, the day's most pivotal event was a roundtable discussion with members of the Tibet Support Group (TSG), during which Speaker Tenphel shared the outcomes of the delegation's meetings with prominent UK parliamentary leaders, experts, and advocates for Tibet. A central theme of the discussion was the revitalization of the All-Party Parliamentary Group (APPG) for Tibet, a key platform for advancing Tibet's cause within the UK

Parliament. Speaker Tenphel highlighted the importance of greater cooperation between Tibet, Hong Kong, and Uyghur advocacy groups, all of which are united in their fight against oppressive regimes and their efforts to draw attention to human rights violations.

During the meeting, Speaker Tenphel emphasised the necessity of strengthening Tibet's presence on the UK's legislative agenda. He called for a coordinated push to ensure that Tibet is addressed more prominently within international forums, with a focus on securing policy reforms similar to the US Resolve Tibet Act, which would advocate for concrete actions on Tibet's behalf globally. The discussions also centred on enhancing international advocacy, challenging the Chinese government's portrayal of Tibet as a thriving region under its rule, and pushing for a more accurate depiction of Tibet's reality.

The China-Tibet issue centres on a complex political, cultural, and religious conflict between the People's Republic of China (PRC) and Tibet. Tibet, a historically distinct region with its own unique culture, language, and religious traditions, was incorporated into China in the early 1950s. While the Chinese government asserts that Tibet is an inseparable part of China, citing historical ties, many Tibetans, particularly those led by the Dalai Lama, have long called for greater autonomy or even full independence.

The situation took a dramatic turn in 1959 when a Tibetan uprising was violently suppressed by Chinese forces, leading to the Dalai Lama's exile in India. Since then, China has imposed strict control over Tibet, enacting policies aimed at integrating Tibetans into broader Chinese society. These measures include the promotion of the Chinese language, large-scale resettlement programs, and restrictions on religious practices, particularly Tibetan Buddhism. These actions have sparked widespread international condemnation, with critics accusing China of cultural suppression, religious persecution, and the marginalization of Tibetans in their own homeland.

Dharamshala: Tibetan monk transforming lives of slum children helping them through higher studies

24 November 2024, ANI

Lobsang Jamyang, a Tibetan monk who was born in Tibet but living in exile, is working hard to change the lives of slum children in Sarah village near Dharamshala, Himachal Pradesh through education.

The monk has changed the lives of hundreds of slum children who, until they met him, were either ragpickers or used to beg on the streets.

The Tong-Len Charitable Trust, which he started two decades ago with two UK volunteers, has made a significant change in the lives of those slum children, who now have become doctors, engineers, and journalists. The Dalai Lama Trust also provides them with every possible help.

Lobsang Jamyang, founder Tong-Len, opened up on their journey, and said they tried to save the lives of slum children, and now many of them have made good careers.

"Initially in 2004, we tried to save the lives of slum children, and then we planned to provide them with primary education. Gradually, they reached middle school and then high school. They are very talented, and they reached college. They are capable of higher studies, and we support them. Some of them have now become doctors and engineers, and many are doing nursing training. One of our students, Dr Pinki, is a great inspiration for many students, and some are preparing for the NEET exam. We are also supporting some students who want to get coaching for UPSC, and some are preparing for allied services. So there are many such students," he told ANI.

Mamta, one of the slum student, who was helped by the trust, and is now preparing for the SSCJL exam aiming to do a government job reflected on her journey.

Speaking to ANI, she said, "I am one of the first ten students of Tong-Len when it was started in 2004. This institute has transformed many lives. If I had not been here, then I would have gotten married because our community doesn't keep unmarried girls beyond the age of 18. My parents have faith now that our girl is capable of doing anything. I want to get a government job because, as per my knowledge, no one from our community is in the government sector, and I want to bring this change to our community."

Tong-Len was started in 2004 with just ten children, and at present, there are more than 340 students.

Tong-Len, which means 'Give and Take,' has recently celebrated its 20th founding anniversary on the 19th of November in the north Indian hill town of Dharamshala here.

Pinki, another child who used to beg in the streets during her childhood, has went on to become a doctor now.

"I have just completed my MBBS degree on July 24, and I am preparing for the FMG exam. I am looking forward to passing this exam so that I can practice as a medical practitioner in India. The entire journey from 2004 to 24 is quite challenging. The change is from the bottom to the top, not only in our education point of view but also in our lifestyle. There is a change in our thinking. There is a change in every field. It was a big challenge for Guru Jamyang to convince and guide our parents, and I am happy that our parents made the right decision at that time. Now many children from our community are appearing in competitive exams as they are capable of all this," she said.

Lakshmi, a 9th-grade student also praised the trust and said many of the students have achieved a successful life with the help of the trust.

"Many of the students of this organisation have achieved a successful life, and they are inspiring all of us. Some are doctors, engineers, and news reporters, and some are doing nursing training. We used to live in slums, and there were no basic facilities like food or water, but now there is a big change, and we are living in a social house here," she said.

Tibetan Sikyong's Portugal visit seen as groundbreaking

23 November 2024, Tibetan Review

The visit of the executive head, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, of the exile Tibetan administration to Portugal, which included meetings with cross-party parliament members, from Nov 12 to 14 has been hailed as groundbreaking. It was the first visit of an elected exile Tibetan political leader, after the Dalai Lama's 2001 and 2007 trips, said the Central Tibetan Administration on its Tibet.net website Nov 23. Calling it a "significant step forward in the 16th Kashag's outreach strategy towards opening new doors of political engagement with previously untapped nations," the report said the Tibetan Sikyong met with Members of Parliament from four political parties during his visit to the country's capital Lisbon.

The meetings were stated to have included those with Regina Bastos and Bruno Ventura from the Social Democrat Party, Rui Tavares from the LIVRE party, Paula Inês Alves de Sousa Real from the People Animals Nature party, and Rodrigo Saraiva from the Liberal Initiative (IL) party.

The Tibetan Sikyong was stated to have delivered a crucial message to European nations through these meetings, urging them to re-evaluate their China policies in light of the EU's de-risking approach toward Beijing. This was stated to carry special significance as Portugal had recently seen increased Chinese investment, contrary to broader trends in Europe.

Following those meetings, Rodrigo Saraiva of the IL announced a draft parliamentary resolution, calling for self-determination for the Tibetan people. This provoked an angry reaction from the Chinese embassy in Lisbon, which called on the party, without mentioning its name, to cease "support for separatist activities" and "interference in Chinese internal affairs".

"We urge a certain political party to stop using issues related to Xizang (the Sinicized name for the territory of Tibet) to interfere in China's internal affairs and not to provide support for anti-China separatist activities," the expresso.pt Nov13 quoted the Chinese embassy as saying.

The report noted that earlier, in May 2023, the IL had approved a vote of concern in the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Assembly of the Republic (AR), the unicameral parliament of Portugal, regarding the "29 years since the kidnapping of the 11th 'Panchen Lama' perpetrated by the People's Republic of China".

The Panchen Lama is Tibet's second most prominent religious figure. China abducted and disappeared him, at the age of 6, and his family just days after he was recognized by the Dalai Lama, Tibet's exiled spiritual leader, in 1995, and installed another boy in his place.

While in Lisbon, the Tibetan Sikyong has also held discussions with Dr Vera Jardim, the President of the Commission on Religious Liberty and former Minister of Justice. He had previously met the Dalai Lama during the latter's visits to Portugal in 2001 and 2007. He has also held talks with Professor Paulo Morais and Dr Batalha, two social and political commentators, based in Porto, Portugal's second largest city, after Lisbon.

Professor Morais was stated to have been actively involved in organising the Dalai Lama's above two visits to Portugal.

Tibetan Oracle delivers message of faith at WVSOM

21 November 2024, WVSOM

Noting a "special karma," the Nechung Oracle, Kuten-la, the official State Oracle of Tibet and spiritual advisor to the Dalai Lama, said his Nov. 19 visit to the West Virginia School of Osteopathic Medicine (WVSOM) wasn't a random circumstance. With the assistance of a translator, the Oracle told an audience of more than 120 that while strangers today, they were sharing the same space because they have a bond from a previous lifetime. He explained that in Buddhism, knowing who you are today requires reflecting on previous lifetimes.

Speaking during a public reception in his honor, the Oracle said he was honored to speak at WVSOM, where students learn to reduce suffering and show compassion and kindness. He called the reception “a special gathering in a special place.”

The Oracle said it’s important to consider the well-being of the body and mind but also the soul and spirit.

During the reception, the Oracle shared a prayer with the audience and conducted individual blessings, with most of those present lining up for a personal moment.

WVSOM President James W. Nemitz, Ph.D., in a live video message, welcomed the Oracle to campus. Dawn Roberts, Ed.D., associate dean for multicultural and student affairs, and Katherine Calloway, D.O., regional assistant dean for the South Central Region of WVSOM’s Statewide Campus, coordinated the reception.

The current Nechung Oracle is the Venerable Thupten Ngodup, who has been the medium of the Oracle since 1987. The Nechung Kuten-la was accompanied by Tenzin Rinchen, his personal assistant; Ganpat Purevdirj and Bayara Purevragchaa, both monks from the Nechung Monastery; Tenzin Chogyal, who organized the Oracle’s tour of the U.S.; and Tenzin Thomson, who served as the translator at WVSOM.

Kuten-la visited members of Congress during a stop in Washington, D.C., the weekend before the WVSOM reception.

Talking of world events, the Oracle told the WVSOM audience that human beings fall into three groups: those with faith and spirituality, atheists and those who don’t care about spirituality; and those who are anti-religion.

The Oracle was forced to flee Tibet for India in 1966 following the invasion of Tibet by the communist Chinese. Part of his mission in the U.S. is to represent the Tibetan Government-in-Exile.

The Oracle’s stop in Lewisburg was the result of Calloway’s visit in 2024 to India. In April, Calloway and four others — Megan Kelley and Sarah McQueen, WVSOM Class of 2025 medical students; Caroline LaFleur, M.D., of Medical Diplomats International; and Calloway’s 15-year-old daughter, Grace — visited Dehradun, Uttarakhand and Dharamshala, India, and met with the Dalai Lama.

Exile Tibetan delegation visits Westminster as PM Starmer seeks to cement China ties

21 November 2024, Tibetan Review

As Labour Prime Minister Sir Keir Starmer met with Chinese President Xi Jinping on the fringes of the G20 summit in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on Nov 18, and emphasised the importance of a “strong UK-China relationship” for both countries, a delegation from the Tibetan Parliament in Exile (TPiE) has visited London to meet with key lawmakers in the country, according to bbc.com Nov 18 and Tibet.net Nov 20-21.

Starmer’s was the first time a UK prime minister met the Chinese president in person since 2018, following a recent souring in relations under the erstwhile Conservative Party government. With China’s military support for Russia’s war in Ukraine having prompted criticism from the UK and other Western countries, the PM has said he wanted to “engage honestly and frankly” on areas of disagreement, including on Hong Kong, human rights and Russia’s war in Ukraine, said the bbc.com report.

In London, the TPiE delegation of Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel and member Dawa Tsering met with Sir Lindsay Hoyle, the Speaker of the House of Commons; Sir Geoffrey Clifton Browne, Chairperson of the Public Accounts Committee (PAC) of the House of Commons, other Members of Parliament (MPs), and some prominent figures over Nov 18-19, said Tibet.net reports.

The UK Speaker has appreciated the importance of resuming dialogue with China to address and resolve the Sino-Tibet issue.

Other meetings were stated to have been held with Baroness Julie Smith, Liberal Democrat spokesperson on Defence (House of Lords) and Member of the Federal Executive Committee; Lord David Alton, Member of the House of Lords; and Liberal Democrat Member of Parliament Sir Bobby Dean.

These engagements provided the delegation with valuable insights into the legislative processes of the UK Parliament. The Tibetan visitors explored how an idea evolves into a political party’s policy, its navigation through the House of Lords, and the procedural steps required for a bill to be introduced, debated, and ultimately passed into legislation by both Houses of Parliament. They offered opportunities for collaboration between the TPiE and the UK Parliament, said the Tibet.net report Nov 21.

Underlining the gravity of the situation in Tibet, marked by new Chinese policy measures that greatly heighten threats to the survival of the ethnic and cultural identity of the territory amid other severe human rights violations, Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel has appealed to the Speaker of the House of Commons to consider adopting a policy similar to the US Resolve Tibet Act.

That act, signed into law by President Joe Biden on Jul 12, rejects China's claim that Tibet has been part of it since ancient times, that its armed occupation and annexation of the territory in the middle of the last century was illegal under international law, and recognizes the Tibetan people's right to self-determination. The act requires the US to help counter China's official position on Tibet based on its "misinformation campaign" which underplays the territory's own rich culture and history of independence, and promote substantive dialogue without preconditions between the Government of the People's Republic of China and the Dalai Lama or his representatives.

Also, another delegation of TPiE members, made up of Geshe Monlam Tharchin, Kunga Sotop, and Choedak Gyatso, has concluded its Tibet advocacy effort in Luxembourg.

The trio met with Gusty Graas, Chair of the Foreign Affairs Committee in the Luxembourg Parliament and a member of the ruling party, on Nov 19 morning. They asked Graas to raise awareness and advocate for Tibet within the Luxembourgish Parliament. They emphasised that Tibet is an occupied nation, not a part of China, and called for action to counter ongoing Chinese propaganda, according to another Tibet.net report Nov 20.

They have also appealed for the adoption of a resolution on Tibet in the European Parliament and the appointment of a special coordinator for Tibetans within the European Parliament.

Graas has expressed concerns on the situation in Tibet and assured the Tibetan visitors that he would bring the issue to the attention of Luxembourg's Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The TPiE members have also visited the European Court of Justice as well as met with David Perreira, Executive Director, and Morgane Gury, Communications and Digital Marketing Manager, at Amnesty International, and briefed them about the gravity of the current situation in Tibet under Chinese rule.

Advocacy and Capacity Building to counter China's Transnational Repression in Europe

21 November 2024, TCHRD

The Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) conducted a seven-week long advocacy and capacity building activities aimed at countering China's transnational repression in Europe. Part of TCHRD's strategic actions to hold Chinese government accountable for spreading fear and disempowering exiled Tibetan activists and organisations, TCHRD's executive director Ms Tenzin

Dawa and manager Ms Phurbu Dolma held briefings and interactions with various stakeholders including parliamentarians, policy makers, public officials, human rights experts and other civil society members on the findings of TCHRD's report on transnational repression and discussed possible solutions. Workshops on the ways to counter transnational repression were organised to build the capacity of Tibetan civil society members in six European countries.

During the three-day advocacy program at the European Parliament from 24 to 26 September, Ms. Dawa had the opportunity to brief and hand over a three-page summary of the abovementioned report's key findings and its physical copies to 15 European Union policymakers and their parliamentary assistants in Brussels. Ms Dawa highlighted transnational repression as an urgent thematic issue and explained the harassment and intimidation faced by Tibetans in Europe, emphasising the need for government institutions and law enforcement agencies to raise awareness and establish dedicated mechanisms to protect those affected by transnational repression. While participating in the Tibetan Empowerment Program organised by the International Campaign for Tibet's Europe office in Brussels from 23 to 26 September 2024, Ms. Dawa led an hour-long presentation on China's transnational repression and shared findings from TCHRD's report with workshop participants, which included Tibetan activists from Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, Ireland, and the Netherlands. Ms. Dawa also shared the report's findings with representatives from the World Uyghur Congress and Amnesty International during a meeting held at the latter's office in Brussels.

On 9 October in France, the TCHRD team met with the French Senate Tibet Support Group at the French Senate and held discussions with key members, including Senator Jacqueline Eustache-Brinio, president of the French Tibet Support group, and executive secretary Thierry Munier.

In Switzerland on 23 October, Ms. Dawa met with Mr. Nicolas Walder, a member of Switzerland's National Council, to discuss the challenges faced by the Tibetan diaspora.

On 29 October, the TCHRD team along with Melanie Blondelle from the International Campaign for Tibet Europe held a closed-door meeting at Belgium's Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Brussels. The team advocated for increased protections for the Tibetan diaspora in Belgium. The team also engaged with Mr Stijn Willems and Mr Wannes Heirman, parliamentary assistants to MP Els Van Hoof, chair of the Foreign Affairs Committee, urging her office to organise hearings in the Belgian Parliament on Chinese transnational repression.

On 31 October, Ms. Dawa accompanied by Mr. Norbu Tsering, president of the Tibetan Community in the Netherlands, met with officers at the China Unit of the Ministry of the Foreign Affairs of the Netherlands.

In the UK, Ms. Dawa joined a virtual discussion organised by the 'Tackling Transnational Repression in the UK Working Group' on 5 November. The working group is currently working on joint policy paper submission to the UK government. Established in September 2024, the informal working group brings concerned parties together to research and monitor incidents and effects of transnational repression in the UK, support those affected by transnational repression, and identify and shape the development of a comprehensive institutional response to transnational repression in the UK.

Later that evening, MP Chris Law of the Scottish National Party hosted Ms. Dawa for a talk on China's transnational repression in the UK Parliament, attended by students, journalists, and researchers. The Labour MP for Stockport Mr Navendu Mishra also took part in the discussion and shared his thoughts. The UK-based Free Tibet organisation helped organise the talk.

Other stakeholders the TCHRD team met include Ms. Selina Morell and Ms. Caroline from the Society for Threatened Peoples with whom the team discussed transnational repression faced by Tibetans in Switzerland on 21 October. Opportunities for collaboration for an upcoming report on the issue were also explored during the discussion. Ms. Morell noted that TCHRD's capacity building workshops had enhanced awareness among Tibetans in Switzerland, many of whom were previously unaware of the extent of transnational repression.

In October, the team met with Mr. Thupten Tsering, Coordinator at the Office of Tibet in Paris and briefed him about transnational repression targeting Tibetans in France.

On 6 October, TCHRD's first awareness-raising and capacity-building workshop in Europe was held in Paris. A total of 20 participants, including members of the Paris-based Tibetan Community Association, Regional Tibetan Youth Congress, and Voluntary Tibet Advocacy Group (V-TAG) attended the one-day workshop on 'Countering China's Transnational Repression of Tibetan Diaspora Communities'. Ms. Dawa led the first session on the scope and nature of China's transnational repression, followed by Mr. Chabdak Lhamo Kyab who led a session on personal experience of China's growing transnational repression-in-exile. Mr Kyab is a writer, poet, former Tibetan parliamentarian, and Tibetan language teacher at INALCO in Paris. Mr. Hapee De Groot, Digital Protection Coordinator for Europe at Frontline Defenders, led a session on digital protection.

The workshop in Zurich on 20 October saw the participation of 40 participants from various local Tibetan organisations. Mr Eric Hsu, a researcher at the Taipei-based Doublethink Lab, led a session on 'Civil Society Best Practices for Countering Transnational Repression'. Ms. Selina Morell, China Program Manager at the Society for Threatened Peoples, discussed Switzerland's stance on transnational repression. A virtual session on resilience, well-being, and preventing burnout was conducted by TCHRD Research Director Ms. Tsering Tsomo, followed by an hour-long digital security session led by Mr. Lobsang Tseten of the Tibet Action Institute.

The workshop in Berlin on 26 October had participants from the local V-TAG group and Tibetan community association. Mr. David Missal, deputy managing director of the Tibet Initiative Deutschland, spoke on Germany's stance on transnational repression and strategies for effective engagement by local diaspora communities. Ms. Tsomo and Mr. Tseten led sessions on psychosocial well-being and digital security respectively.

On 3 November, the representatives of different Tibetan groups including executive members of the Tibetan community in Netherlands, V-TAG and International Campaign for Tibet Europe participated in the workshop. Mr. Michael Liu, a Ph.D. candidate at Leiden University, led a discussion on the United Front Work Department's role in perpetrating transnational repression. Other sessions included digital hygiene and psychosocial well-being.

The final workshop was held in London on 10 November with members of the Tibetan community. Ms Laura Harth, campaign director and lead on transnational repression at the Safeguard Defenders discussed developing a counter response to transnational repression. Safeguard Defenders is a human rights NGO that undertakes and supports local activities for the protection of human rights, promotion of the rule of law and enhancement of local civil society capacity in some of Asia's most hostile environments.

In September, with support from the Sydney-based Australia Tibet Council, TCHRD was able to brief and hand over a three-page summary on the major findings of the report on Chinese transnational repression to six parliamentarians: Dr Sophie Scamps (MP); Senator Jordon Steele-John, Senator Steph Hodgins-May, Senator David Shoebridge, Andrew Wallace (MP) and Senator Susan McDonald.

Ms Tsomo accompanied by the ATC's executive officer Dr Zoe Bedford also held a meeting with representatives of the Australian Federal Police (AFP) in Canberra during which they presented the major findings of the TCHRD's report and answered questions. Each officer was handed with a copy of the three-page summary of the report. The AFP officers were made aware of TCHRD's upcoming initiatives to educate and inform the Tibetan community in Australia on countering TNR or foreign interference and espionage as it referred to by Australian authorities. They were urged to increase outreach efforts to community organisations and members of new developments and trends regarding Chinese efforts to infiltrate and co-opt the Tibetan community in Australia. The AFP's factsheet on countering foreign interference and espionage translated into Tibetan by TCHRD is now available on the AFP's website.

Tibetan leader highlights Tibet's struggle, role of global advocacy

19 November 2024, ANI

As part of his ongoing official tour across Europe, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the political leader of Tibet's Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), addressed the Tibetan community in Barcelona and underscored the critical importance of continuing to raise global awareness about Tibet's political situation.

Tsering reminded the community that, despite the immense challenges Tibet faces, the international visibility of the Tibet cause remains strong, largely due to the tireless efforts of the Dalai Lama, as per a statement by the CTA.

Sikyong began by paying tribute to the Dalai Lama, noting that for over 65 years, the Dalai Lama has been the leading figure in keeping the Tibetan struggle alive on the world stage, as per CTA.

"Much of the international awareness of Tibet today is due to His Holiness' leadership, kindness, and wisdom," Sikyong said, acknowledging the Dalai Lama's pivotal role in shaping global consciousness on Tibet's plight.

One of the most significant aspects of Sikyong's address was his focus on international advocacy and the growing global recognition of Tibet's cause. He specifically highlighted recent developments such as the US government's adoption of the Tibet-China Conflict Resolution Act.

This landmark legislation, which calls for a peaceful resolution to the Tibet-China issue and greater international pressure on China to respect Tibet's cultural and religious autonomy, was a key milestone in the Tibetan freedom struggle.

Sikyong stressed that such successes are not the result of isolated efforts but are the product of years of tireless work by Tibetan support groups, activists, and international policymakers. Turning to the issue of dialogue with China, Sikyong expressed cautious optimism, but also tempered his comments with a realistic assessment of the current political landscape. He acknowledged that while the CTA remains committed to the Middle Way Approach-seeking genuine autonomy for Tibet within the framework of China-there is still uncertainty regarding the prospects for meaningful negotiations. He reiterated that the CTA's commitment to the Middle Way remains steadfast, but emphasised that Tibet's freedom struggle cannot solely rely on dialogue with the Chinese government.

Today, the Tibet-China issue remains unresolved. While the Chinese government maintains strict control over Tibet, Tibetans in exile continue to advocate for their rights, including through the work of the CTA, which functions as the Tibetan government-in-exile. Despite international pressure, the Chinese government continues to reject any form of independence or autonomy for Tibet.

Biden publicly mentions Tibet in final meeting with China's Xi Jinping at APEC

19 November 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The outgoing US President Joe Biden on Saturday publicly referenced Tibet during his final talks with Chinese President Xi Jinping, held in the presence of media on the side lines of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit in Lima, Peru.

Biden highlighted the progress achieved in military communications, discussions on artificial intelligence risks, and efforts to counter narcotics during their diplomatic engagements. Reflecting on their long standing relationship, he remarked, "For over a decade, you and I both have spent many hours together here and in China and in between. We spent a long time dealing with these issues. I think I once had to count up the number of hours you and I spent alone together. I remember being on the Tibetan plateau with you. I remember being in Beijing."

Outgoing US President Joe Biden meets with Chinese President Xi Jinping on the sidelines of the APEC Summit in Lima, Peru, on Nov. 16, 2024 (Photo/Reuters)

The final scheduled meeting between outgoing U.S. President Joe Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping included discussions on maintaining "stable, healthy, and sustainable” China-U.S. relations, despite the impending transition to President-elect Donald Trump’s administration. Xi emphasised Beijing’s readiness to engage with the new leadership, stating, “China is ready to work with the new U.S. administration to maintain communication, expand cooperation, and manage differences.”

With two months remaining before Trump assumes office, U.S. officials warn of heightened risks of conflict during the transition. Trump has pledged aggressive measures, including a blanket 60% tariff on Chinese imports under his “America First” trade agenda, which Beijing firmly opposes. Additionally, Trump plans to appoint prominent China hawks to senior positions, including U.S. Senator Marco Rubio—sanctioned by China—as Secretary of State, and Representative Mike Waltz as National Security Adviser.

Other key topics during the meeting included Beijing’s military manoeuvres around Taiwan. Biden called for an end to such activities, according to a White House statement. In response, Xi criticised Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te’s alleged “‘Taiwan independence’ separatist activities,” claiming they undermine peace and stability, according to China’s foreign ministry. Beijing regards Taiwan as part of its territory, while Taiwan, a democratic nation, rejects these sovereignty claims. The U.S. remains Taiwan’s most significant supporter and arms supplier, despite lacking formal diplomatic ties.

Parliamentary Delegation Continues Visitation Program in Arunachal Pradesh

18 November 2024, CTA

On 14 November 2024, at 9:00 AM, a delegation of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile consisting of Geshe Lharampa Atuk Tseten and Tenzin Jigdal departed from Mon Tawang. They visited the newly constructed 108 stupas at Mandala point and then proceeded to Thubten Do-Ngag Osel Dargye Ling Monastery, founded by Kyabje Drubwang Penor Rinpoche. At the monastery, they were welcomed by the Chakzoe and two teachers who gave them a detailed tour and explanation of the monastery.

This Guru temple was constructed to ward off obstacles, additionally providing significant benefits, including teaching Tibetan religion and culture to local children. The Tibetan Parliament members were the first official visitors of the Parliament to conduct an inspection of this site.

Parliamentary Delegation Continues Visitation Program in Arunachal Pradesh

In the afternoon, the two Parliament members visited Mon Dora Chenrezig Monastery. They were welcomed by the monastery’s Chakzoe and teachers, who served them tea and refreshments and provided a detailed introduction to the monastery.

Mon Dora Chenrezig Monastery was established after former Gaden Jangtse abbot Jetsun Lobsang Tsephel Rinpoche visited the area in 2018 for the inauguration of Dirang Monastery. Observing that the area was populated entirely by Buddhist and noticing that many children in this remote valley faced difficulties accessing good education, he decided to establish this monastery in line with His Holiness the Dalai Lama’s guidance. The monastery was inaugurated on 27 October 2022.

Since then, over a hundred children annually receive education, with the former abbot personally funding all expenses including teachers’ salaries, textbooks, and meals. Students take annual examinations, with top performers receiving prizes of Rs. 3,000 each, while all students receive Rs. 700 and textbooks. Additionally, Geshe scholars provide Buddhist teachings to local people during special occasions of the lunar month.

The Parliament members expressed their appreciation for the former abbot’s significant contribution to spreading Tibetan religion, language, and culture in the area, following His Holiness the Dalai Lama’s vision. They advised monastery officials to collaborate with the Tibetan settlement officer.

On 15 November, the two Parliament members departed for Shillong via Guwahati to continue their official tour.

Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Calls for Stronger Support for Tibet at India-China Relations Conference in Patna

18 November 2024, CTA

A Tibetan parliamentary delegation, consisting of Parliamentarians Tenpa Yarphel and Lupon Thupten Gyaltsen, attended a meeting titled 'Tibet Mukti Sadhana Aur Bharat-China Sambandh'. The event, organized by the India Tibet Friendship Society and the Jagjivan Ram Institute of Parliamentary Studies and Research (Patna), took place from November 16-17, 2024.

On November 16, 2024, an inaugural conference was held where the two members of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, MP Tenpa Yarphel and MP Lupon Thupten Gyaltsen, delivered speeches on the Tibet issue.

Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Calls for Stronger Support for Tibet at India-China Relations Conference in Patna

In his address, MP Lupon Thupten Gyaltsen emphasized several key points about what India's government and people can do to support Tibet. He highlighted Tibet's historical independence, referencing the 1914 Simla Convention during British rule and Tibet's participation as an independent nation at the 1947 Asian Relations Conference in Delhi. He stressed that before Tibet's occupation by China, the Indo-Tibetan border remained peaceful and did not require military deployment. He urged the Indian public to recognize that establishing Tibet as a peaceful buffer zone between India and China would benefit both countries and promote peace across Asia and the world.

The MP also emphasized the cultural and spiritual ties between Tibet and India, pointing out that Tibetan Buddhism, which originated from ancient Indian traditions, is integral to the Himalayan region's culture. He called for increased support from India to preserve Tibetan religion and culture during these critical times, stressing India's significant role as host to the world's largest Tibetan refugee population, as well as to His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration.

In closing, he proposed that His Holiness the Dalai Lama, one of the world's most respected leaders and a guardian of India's ancient spiritual wisdom, be awarded India's highest civilian honor, the Bharat Ratna. He argued that such an honor would bring immense pride to Tibetans, the Himalayan peoples, and his global followers.

The inaugural ceremony was attended by distinguished guests, including Dr. Sanjay Paswan, Former Union Minister; Professor Anand Kumar, Patron of the India Tibet Friendship Society; Dr. Ramachandra Purve, Former RJD President and Education Minister; Mr. Harendra Kumar, President of Bihar ITFS; and Mr. Pema Khando Bhutia, Regional Convener of CGTC-

Uphold Dalai Lama's values: Tibetan min

17 November 2024, The Tribune

Education Minister Kalon, Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), yesterday urged all Tibetan students to uphold the values of the Dalai Lama and pursue education with diligence.

In her message on the occasion Children's Day, the minister stressed the importance of preserving the Tibetan language. He implored students to make the most of the unique opportunity to study and use Tibetan throughout their school years, a privilege denied to children in Tibet. She emphasised that the mastery of the language was essential not only for their individual growth but also for the preservation of the Tibetan culture.

The minister encouraged students to approach their education holistically, through the three-fold process of learning, contemplation and meditation. "This method ensures that knowledge is not only acquired but also deeply understood and retained," she added.

The minister called for greater compassion towards students with special needs, emphasising the importance of kindness and inclusiveness. By treating others with empathy, students not only fostered a supportive environment but also developed personal qualities of compassion, aligning with the broader goals of education and the teachings of the Dalai Lama, she added.

Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel Launches Book on His Holiness the Dalai Lama's Four Commitments

17 November 2024, CTA

Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel launched a four-volume book on His Holiness the Dalai Lama's four principal commitments today at the Library of Tibetan Works and Archives (LTWA) in Gangchen Kyishong on 15 November 2024.

The books, published by researcher Kunchok Tenzin with support from the Kalsang Tibetan Traditional Art of Thangka Painting, explore His Holiness's core commitments. During the event, the speaker emphasized His Holiness's unwavering dedication to the Tibetan struggle and the welfare of the Tibetan people.

The book launch event was graced by Chief Guest Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, Special Guest Secretary Lobsang Jinpa of the Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and LTWA Director Geshe Lhakdor. Parliamentarians Lobsang Thupten and Tsering Lhamo also attended, along with members of the public.

Addressing the gathering, the Speaker emphasized the invaluable contributions of His Holiness the Dalai Lama to the Tibetan struggle, his efforts in preserving and promoting Tibetan culture and religion, and his commitment to protecting Tibet's environment, among numerous other accomplishments.

Speaking about His Holiness's video message at the 8th World Parliamentarians' Convention on Tibet, the Speaker shared how His Holiness highlighted that supporting Tibet goes beyond a political stance—it is a commitment to truth, justice, Tibet's unique culture of non-violence, its environment, and much more.

The Speaker also noted His Holiness's establishment of reform committees aimed at creating a just society in Tibet when he assumed leadership. Reflecting on his visits to China and India in 1954 and 1956, the Speaker pointed out that His Holiness observed two very different forms of government, with India's democratic system inspiring him to seek a similar system for Tibet.

The Speaker further highlighted His Holiness's profound commitment to democracy, which included the promulgation of Tibet's future constitution, the drafting and adoption of the Charter of Tibetans in Exile, the election of the Kalon Tripa by the Tibetan people, and the complete devolution of His Holiness's political authority to the leadership of the Central Tibetan Administration.

Speaking on the shared fate of the people from the three provinces of Tibet, the Speaker emphasized His Holiness's vision of a united Tibet, encompassing all three regions, and his unwavering dedication to realizing this goal. He called for a collective effort from all Tibetans to achieve this aspiration.

The Speaker also highlighted His Holiness the Dalai Lama's immense contributions in preserving Tibet's distinct cultural heritage, beginning with the establishment of Tibetan schools upon his arrival in exile in India. He praised His Holiness for maximizing the global benefit of Tibetan Buddhism, for bridging the gap between Tibetans inside and outside Tibet, and for building a robust network of international support for Tibet. Furthermore, the Speaker spoke on the introduction of the Middle Way Approach, which was subsequently adopted unanimously by the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile.

In closing, the Speaker commended the Kalsang Tibetan Traditional Art of Thangka Painting and its researchers for their dedicated work. He suggested that future discussions and deliberations be organized to further explore His Holiness's commitments and aspirations, offering deeper insights into his vision for Tibet and the Tibetan people.

-Report filed by Tibetan Parliamentary Secretariat

Tibetan Sikyong testifies in Catalan parliament commission as exile parliament outreach team concludes Baltic States visit

17 November 2024, Tibetan Review

The executive head, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) at Dharamshala, India, has on Nov 15 delivered what was stated to be a powerful testimony before an extraordinary hearing of the Commission of Foreign Affairs in the Catalan Parliament. His testimony in the parliament of the Spanish Autonomous Community set the tone for his overarching advocacy efforts across Europe over the recent past, said the CTA on its Tibet.net website Nov 17.

The hearing was stated to have been chaired by the Catalan Parliament deputy Francesc de Dalmaes, member of the Commission of Foreign Affairs, representing the Junts per Catalunya party.

The Tibetan Sikyong has briefed the hearing on the situation in Tibet today, highlighting the total of 157 known self-immolations by Tibetans protesting against the decades-long Chinese repression and occupation rule in their homeland.

He has explained that Tibet today is seeking autonomy, not independence, under a middle way policy envisioned decades ago by His Holiness the Dalai Lama, Tibet's spiritual leader living in exile.

He has referred to the Resolve Tibet Act that was signed into law by US President Joe Biden on Jul 12 this year, recognizing China's armed occupation and annexation of Tibet as illegal under international law and the Tibetan people's right to self-determination, while promising active US support in countering China's disinformation on the issue of Tibet.

The Tibetan Sikyong has asked the commission to consider adopting a similar position, including a resolution on the issue of the reincarnation of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, aligning with the US position on the issue.

This is in view of the fact that atheist China plans to install its own "reincarnation" of the current Dalai Lama when the time comes, totally throwing into wind the Tibetan Buddhists' well-established, centuries-old, and intrinsically religious practice and procedure on this matter.

Those who attended the hearing were stated to have included several prominent deputies in the Catalan Parliament, representing leading political parties, including Ennату Domingo and Agustí Colomines from the Junts per Catalunya; Anna Balsera from the Izquierda Republicana; and Andrés García Berrio from the Commons party.

The Tibetan Sikyong was stated to have been received earlier in the day by the parliament's President Josep Rull and parliamentary board members Glòria Freixa i Vilardell and Juli Fernandez Olivares.

Rull, in his remarks, has honoured the courage and determination of the Tibetan people and expressed solidarity with them as they continued to remain subjected to deteriorating human rights situation under the Chinese occupation rule.

The Tibetan Sikyong has afterwards visited the Blanquerna University to give a special talk on the human rights situation in Tibet, hosted by the International Relations Degree Director Onno Seroo. It witnessed an impressive turnout of students from international relations, law and across disciplines, along with professors and heads of global organizations, the report said.

* * *

Meanwhile, the delegation of Geshe Lharampa Gowo Lobsang Phende and Wangdue Dorjee from the Tibetan Parliament in Exile has concluded its Tibet advocacy tour of the Baltic States in Estonia on Nov 14.

The delegation's concluding day programme began with a meeting in the parliament building of Estonia, organized by Juku-Kalle Raid, the Chair of the Tibet Support Group in the Estonian Parliament and member of the Estonia's Foreign Affairs Commission. Those who attended it included MPs Henn Põlluaas, Kalle Laanet, Jüri Jaanson, Tõnis Lukas, and Tarmo Tamm, said another Tibet.net report Nov 17.

The Tibetan outreach and advocacy delegates were stated to have provided an update on the current critical situation in Tibet and were assured continued support for the Tibetan cause by the MPs.

They have also spoken to the high school students of Tallinna Reaalkool (Tallinn Secondary School of Science) and met with Ardi Hilpus, who had served as Estonian diplomat in Germany, Norway, Iceland, Bosnia and Herzegovina, North Macedonia, Montenegro, Serbia, and Russia.

The delegation's visit to the Baltic states of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia concluded with a dinner with three Estonian parliamentarians and the Chair of the Tibet Support Group.

Chinese officials counter Tibetan diplomatic efforts in EU with propaganda tour

17 November 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundop

In an apparent response to recent Tibetan diplomatic initiatives, Chinese state-backed "Tibetologists" have launched a European tour to promote Beijing's narrative on Tibet.

The delegation, organized by the Chinese State Council Information Office (SCIO), visited Latvia and Estonia between November 7-13, 2024, coinciding with visits by Tibetan parliamentarians to the same countries.

Two Tibetan parliamentarians with the Speaker of the Latvian Parliament. Also seen is official from the Office of Tibet in London (Photo/tibet.net)

According to International Campaign for Tibet, the Chinese delegation's tour appears strategically timed to counter growing support for Tibet in the Baltic region. Earlier this year, the Estonian Parliament hosted a hearing on "The Legal Status of Tibet," attended by 35 MPs and featuring testimony from Tibetan political leader Penpa Tsering. Experts at the hearing challenged China's historical claims over Tibet, with Professor Hon-Shiang Lau noting that Chinese imperial records never documented Tibet as part of China.

The propaganda push follows several diplomatic victories for the Tibetan exile government, including Penpa Tsering's meeting with French President Emmanuel Macron in May 2024. China has recently intensified its external propaganda efforts, launching the "Tibet International Communication Center" in Lhasa on September 2, 2024, as part of a broader strategy to reshape international perspectives on Tibet.

Political scientist Anne-Marie Brady characterizes the (SCIO) State Council Information Office as an extension of China's foreign propaganda office, highlighting Beijing's systematic approach to controlling the global narrative around Tibet rather than addressing underlying political issues.

SCIO has remained consistently engaged in propagating the Chinese narrative on Tibet. It orchestrated a series of 'Forums on the Development of Tibet,' with the first event in the series held in the Austrian capital of Vienna in 2007. The second was held in the Italian capital Rome in 2009, and the third was held in the Greek capital of Athens in 2011. Since the fourth forum, which was held in the Tibetan capital Lhasa in 2014 (the fifth and sixth were also in Lhasa in 2016 and 2019, the seventh in Beijing in 2023), the Tibet Autonomous Region has also been named as a co-organizer.

Tibetan Women's Association hosts tour in Dharamshala to highlight the plight of children, environment

16 November 2024, India Blooms

Tibetan Women's Association hosted an appealing tour from the north Indian city of Dharamshala on Thursday to highlight 'alarming situation for Tibetan children and the environment in Tibet.'

Tibetan women activists are going to Delhi on three bikes and the six-day journey started on Indian Children's Day and will end on November 20, World Children's Day, ANI reported.

An activist told the news agency: "We are organising this appeal tour from Dharamshala to Delhi and it is a six-day tour."

"We are starting it today on Indian Children's Day and will end in Delhi on the 20th of November, on World Children's Day," the activist told ANI.

"We are appealing to all Indians to help us to stop colonial boarding schools in China," the activist further said.

Tenzin Yingsel, project officer of TWA told ANI, "Today we have gathered here to start an appeal tour which starts today on November 14 which is Children's Day across India to November 20 which is celebrated as universal Children's Day to highlight the alarming situation for Tibetan children and environment of Tibet."

Yingsel said Tibetan children are forced by Chinese authorities to learn Mandarin.

According to reports, nearly one million Tibetan children, who are currently a part of the government-run colonial boarding schools, are taught Mandarin language and are deprived of learning the primary language.

"When we talk about children we talk about Tibet's environment also. Tibet is the highest and the largest plateau of Asia and it's the roof of the world it is the origin of seven major rivers of Asia and the situation regarding the environment is a matter of great concern for all the downstream countries including India, Bangladesh, and Pakistan." Yingsel said.

"Due to the large number of damming and illegal mining, it is causing harm to ecological balance. So we are organizing this event to make the people aware of the situation," Yingsel added.

Tibetans, Uyghurs welcome China-sanctioned Rubio for US Secretary of State

16 November 2024, Tibetan Review

The nomination by President-elect Donald Trump of Senator Marco Rubio as the top US diplomat has been welcomed by Tibetan and Uyghur activists on account of his track-record of being a harsh critic of China for its human rights record.

Rubio was named by Trump on Nov 13 as his choice to replace Secretary of State Antony Blinken, who has served through President Joe Biden's nearly four years in office. Considered a longtime foreign policy "hawk" when it comes to the Communist Party of China-government, Rubio's appointment is less controversial compared to those of several other prominent nominees of Trump who takes the presidency from Biden, come Jan 2025.

Son of Cuban migrants, Rubio would be the first sitting US Secretary of State to have been sanctioned by the Chinese government, noted rfa.org Nov 15.

China blacklisted Rubio on Mar 18, 2021 in retaliation for US sanctions on Chinese officials involved in the genocide of the Uyghurs and the crackdown in Hong Kong. This means, from among other things, that he is barred from visiting China.

While welcoming his nomination, Namgyal Choedup, representative of the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration in North America, has struck a note of caution. He believes it is too soon to say a State Department led by Rubio could lead to tangible change for Tibetans, though the nominee's sincerity to do the right thing is indubitable.

"Senator Rubio's deep understanding of Tibetan issues, his strong stance on Tibet and his significant role in sponsoring and advocating for two key Tibet-related acts passed by the US government are commendable," Choedup has said.

"While it is still too early to determine the exact impact he will have on Tibet, his unwavering support for the Tibetan cause is clear," the Tibetan envoy has added.

"With the new administration in place, we remain cautious, but we are optimistic, as the US government, Congress, and the American people have long been strong allies of Tibet," Choedup has added.

* * *

Referring to Rubio's track record on supporting Tibet, the report noted that in 2018, he co-sponsored the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act, which denies entry into the United States to Chinese officials who prohibit American citizens from entering Tibet.

He was also stated to have pushed for the Tibet Policy and Support Act. Passed by the US Congress on Dec 18, 2020, the act says any decision about the Dalai Lama's reincarnation rests solely with the Dalai Lama himself and the broader Tibetan community – and not with Beijing, which is seeking to install its own successor.

It also requires the US President to designate a Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues, whose role is to advocate for Tibet and ensure the US engages on issues affecting Tibetans.

Rubio was particularly vocal in his criticism of China on its genocidal Uyghur policy and actions.

"Marco Rubio has been a steadfast advocate for human rights, particularly for the Uyghur people enduring ongoing genocide," Rushan Abbas, the executive chair of the Munich-based World Uyghur Congress, has said, noting his "leadership role" in Congress passing the Uyghur Human Rights Policy Act and Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act.

"His advocacy has helped in holding Chinese officials committing Uyghur genocide accountable, highlighted Uyghur prisoners of conscience, protected American markets from Uyghur forced labor and defended religious freedom," Abbas has said.

Seeking to counter Tibetan outreach, China sends propaganda team to Europe

15 November 2024, ICT

Tibetan parliamentarians have been busy in Europe this month, where they've working to garner support for Tibet with visits to Latvia and Estonia, among other countries.

As it turns out, they aren't alone. The Chinese government has sent a team of state-supported "Tibetologists" to spread Chinese propaganda in European countries in an effort to counter recent visits by leaders from the Central Tibetan Administration.

Beijing's propaganda team

Chinese state media reported that a group of "Tibetologists" visited Latvia from November 7 to 10 and Estonia from November 10 to 13, 2024. Organized by the Chinese State Council Information

Office (SCIO), the group spoke about the "development achievements of Tibet in China in the new era, and the development results of education, medical care, ecological environment protection and other developments shared by the people of all ethnic groups in Tibet."

It is no coincidence that the visit by the delegation from China overlapped with the visit to Latvia and Estonia by a group of Tibetan parliamentarians from Dharamsala to these countries. Tibetan Parliamentarians Geshe Lharampa Gowo Lobsang Phende and Wangdue Dorjee were in Latvia during which they met the Speaker of the Latvian Parliament, Daiga Mieriņa, as well as MPs on Nov. 13, 2024. Currently, several Tibetan parliamentarians are visiting different countries in Europe.

The Chinese government is likely perturbed by the continuing support for Tibet among the Baltic countries. Political scientist Anne-Marie Brady, who specializes in Chinese domestic and foreign politics, contends that the State Council Information Office is just another name for the Chinese Office of Foreign Propaganda.

SCIO has remained consistently engaged in propagating the Chinese narrative on Tibet. It orchestrated a series of 'Forums on the Development of Tibet,' with the first event in the series held in the Austrian capital of Vienna in 2007. The second was held in the Italian capital Rome in 2009, and the third was held in the Greek capital of Athens in 2011. Since the fourth forum, which was held in the Tibetan capital Lhasa in 2014 (the fifth and sixth were also in Lhasa in 2016 and 2019, the seventh in Beijing in 2023), the Tibet Autonomous Region has also been named as a co-organizer.

Expert testimony

China would have been concerned that in January 2024, a hearing titled the "The Legal Status of Tibet" was held in the Estonian Parliament and attended by 35 Estonian MPs. During the hearing, Tibetan political leader Sikyong (Political leader in exile) Penpa Tsering testified in order to "give historical context to the Tibetan narrative, Middle-Way Approach and the importance of correcting historical facts of Tibet's independence before its invasion by the People Republic of China."

Two other people who testified at the hearing were Professor Hon-Shiang Lau, a research scholar of Chinese history who retired from the City University of Hong Kong; and Dr Michael van Walt van Praag, expert in intrastate conflict resolution and international law.

Professor Lau explained that – contrary to Chinese Communist Party claims on Tibet – Chinese imperial records, whether from the Chinese Ming dynasty or the Manchu Qing dynasty, never recorded Tibet as part of China. Dr. Michael van Walt van Praag informed the parliamentarians why “China has been looking to buy the legitimacy of its occupation of Tibet by insisting on its trading partner governments to declare ‘Tibet as an internal issue of China’ as a justification for denying Tibetan people the right to self-determination,” and explained how this position breaches international law.

Dharamsala’s official report said the “Estonian media gave the event excellent coverage’ to the hearing and the Sikyong’s visit.

Sikyong had also visited Latvia and on January 29, 2024 strategized with the Latvian Parliamentary Support Group for Tibet, while Estonian parliamentary delegations have also visited the Tibetan exiled leadership in Dharamsala as a visible symbol of their support.

Juku-Kalle Raid, the Chair of Tibet Support Group in Estonian Parliament, led a delegation to Dharamsala to participate in the 64th anniversary of Tibetan Democracy Day on September 2, 2024, and also read a message for the day from the Speaker of the Estonian Parliament. Raid had also led an Estonian parliamentary delegation to Dharamsala on April 25, 2024, and Tibet Support Group participating in the 35th birthday celebrations of the 11th Panchen Lama (under detention by China) during which he said, “The people of Estonia have consistently shown a deep admiration and affection for Tibet, and this enduring sentiment will continue to prevail.”

Battle over perception

China also sent similar “Tibetologists” groups to France and Norway at the end of September 2024. The visit to France by the Chinese officials was certainly connected to the meeting that Sikyong Penpa Tsering had with French President Emmanuel Macron on May 1, 2024. Sikyong had presented an autographed photo from the Dalai Lama to President Macron.

China’s Tibet policy has been a subject of international scrutiny ever since its invasion and subsequent occupation of Tibet in 1959. The Chinese government knows that there is a political problem in Tibet. But rather than working to peacefully resolve it, one of its approaches is to falsify the situation and employ various methods to control the narrative around Tibet, aiming to reshape its portrayal in global discourse.

Xi Jinping emphasized early in his tenure the importance of external propaganda in shaping China’s global image and narrative. On Aug. 19, 2013, during his address to the National Propaganda and Ideology Work Conference, Xi advocated for “innovation” in China’s external propaganda efforts, promoting the idea of effectively “telling China’s story.”

ICT expects further escalation by China in the future in an attempt to dominate the global conversation with China’s propagandistic narrative and storytelling. A new propaganda center called the “Tibet International Communication Center” was launched in Lhasa on September 2, 2024, marking a significant step in China’s ongoing campaign to reshape international public opinion on Tibet. TAR Party Secretary Wang Junzheng instructed resource integration and optimization of the external propaganda system and mechanisms to “build a foreign discourse system and narrative system related to Tibet” in accordance with the CCP central leadership’s order.

Education Kalon Highlights Urgent Need to Preserve Tibetan Language in Her Children’s Day Message

14 November 2024, CTA

As schools across India celebrate Children’s Day today, Kalon (Minister) Tharlam Dolma Changra of the Department of Education, CTA, extended her heartfelt greetings to all Tibetan students, encouraging them to uphold the values of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and to pursue education with diligence.

(File image) Education Kalon Highlights Urgent Need to Preserve Tibetan Language in Her Children’s Day Message

In her message for the occasion, the Education Kalon stressed the importance of preserving the Tibetan language and implored students to make the most of the unique opportunity to study and use Tibetan throughout their school years— a privilege denied to Tibetan children in Tibet. She emphasised that mastery of the language is essential not only for individual growth but also for the preservation of Tibetan culture.

Additionally, the Kalon encouraged students to approach their education holistically, through the three-fold process of learning, contemplation, and meditation. This method ensures that knowledge is not only acquired but deeply understood and retained. The Kalon also called for greater compassion toward students with special needs, emphasising the importance of kindness and inclusivity. By treating others with empathy, students not only foster a supportive environment but also develop personal qualities of compassion, aligning with the broader goals of education and the teachings of His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

Red-House Indie Film Festival to feature documentary 'Un-titled' on Tibetans in exile

14 November 2024, ANI

The Red House is presenting the second edition of the Red-House Indie Film Festival (RIFF), a three-day celebration of independent filmmaking.

From November 15-17, RIFF will showcase a diverse range of films from emerging and established independent filmmakers across the country, from all over the country with distinct voices and bold new ideas to showcase their films.

On the second day of the festival, November 16, a documentary named Un-titled, will be shown. Directed by Syed Ahmad Rufai and filmed in McLeod Ganj, the documentary explores the displacement of Tibetans from their homeland and their establishment of a government-in-exile in India, highlighting their resilience and resistance through poetry.

Notably, Tibet's struggle for autonomy remains a complex issue. Since China invaded Tibet in 1950 and its subsequent incorporation into the People's Republic of China, the region has faced sweeping changes in governance and society. Tibetan leaders, including the Dalai Lama, have consistently called for greater autonomy, citing threats of cultural erosion, religious restrictions, and human rights violations.

Earlier on November 8, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the political leader of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), urged Tibetans in exile to deepen their historical understanding of Tibet and its current challenges in order to strengthen their connection to the Tibetan cause.

He addressed people at the Kalimpong Tibetan settlement during his ongoing tour to engage with Tibetan communities and emphasised the importance of recognising Tibet's geopolitical significance, particularly its vital river systems and environmental challenges.

During his visit, Sikyong addressed students and highlighted the critical role of Tibet's history in shaping the community's struggle for autonomy. He noted the need for Tibetans to cultivate a stronger bond with their heritage and culture to preserve their identity amid mounting challenges.

Sikyong also visited key Tibetan institutions, including the Tibetan Mentseekhang, the Tibetan Old Age Home, and the Kalimpong Tibetan Opera Association. At a gathering of approximately 200 Tibetan residents, he reflected on the community's journey into exile, honouring the sacrifices of past generations and acknowledging the role of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and Indian Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru in establishing Tibetan settlements and schools in India.

Exile Tibetan parliament members interact with Lithuanian, Latvian lawmakers, others in advocacy drive

14 November 2024, Tibetan Review

A delegation of two members of the Tibetan Parliament in Exile (TPiE) held a series of meetings with lawmakers and other Tibet supporters in the Baltic states of Lithuania and Latvia over Nov 11 and 13, including with the Speaker of Latvia's Saeima, to garner support for a host of grave issues, said the TPiE in a Tibet.net report Nov 12-14.

The delegates, Geshe Lharampa Gowo Lobsang Pende and Mr Wangdue Dorjee, have raised awareness about the Chinese government's ongoing repression of Tibetan religious freedom and the Sinicization of Tibetan Buddhism and culture, and sought support for bringing an end to these repressions.

Following their initial arrival in Vilnius on Nov 10, the delegates held a breakfast meeting with Mr Dainius Zalimas, Member of the European Parliament and former President of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Lithuania, on the following day. Zalimas has expressed unwavering commitment to advocating for Tibet, despite the challenging political climate.

Zalimas has also committed to do his best to help establish the Tibet Intergroup in the European Parliament by working with like-minded MEPs. He has also promised assistance to the local Tibet Support Group in organising Tibet awareness events locally.

On the following day, the delegation has met with members of the Lithuanian Parliamentary Group for Relations with Tibet. The visit coincided with the period of political transition in the country following the recent general elections with a new parliament and a potential change in government. The outgoing chair of the group, Mr Andrius Navickas, has presided over the last meeting of the group in the outgoing parliament, which was held with the presence of the Tibetan visitors.

The MPs who attended it have also included Arunas Valinskas and Matas Maldeikis, both of whom were re-elected, and outgoing members Kestutis Navickas (former Minister for Agriculture) and Monica Navickiene.

Navickas has expressed hope that the group would be re-established in the new parliament with Arunas Valinskas at the helm while assuring full cooperation from the outgoing members. Valinskas has assured his continued support for Tibet for the next four years of the new parliament's term.

At the meeting, Professor Vytis Vidunas, Director of the House of Tibet, has recalled His Holiness the Dalai Lama's first visit to Lithuania with much gratitude and appreciation.

Professor Vidunas and Robertas Mazeika from the local Tibet Support Group have accompanied the TPiE members to the Tibet Square – a symbol of Lithuanian solidarity with the Tibetan people. The square was opened in 2010 with a blessing by His Holiness the Dalai Lama during his visit there. His Holiness last visited the square in 2018 and planted a tree to symbolise the friendship between the peoples of Lithuania and Tibet.

Arriving in Latvia's capital Riga on Nov 13, the TPiE delegation has met with the Speaker of the Saeima of the Republic of Latvia, Daiga Mieriņa, as well as Juris Vīlums, Chair of the Group for the Support of Tibet in the Saeima, and Aleksandrs Kiršteins, another MP.

Tibet Information Office Participates in seminar hosted by the Chinese Alliance for Democracy

13 November 2024, CTA

A two-day seminar hosted by the International Chinese Alliance for Democracy at the University of Sydney from 9 November brought together prominent Chinese democratic figures, scholars, and Taiwanese leaders to explore the potential role of Taiwan's democratic model in inspiring democratic movements within mainland China. The event also featured the participation of Dawa Sangmo, the Chinese Liaison Officer of the Tibet Information Office (also called the Office of Tibet).

Moderated by Dr Jingjing Zhong, Chairman of the Chinese Alliance for Democracy Australia, the seminar aimed to not only discuss democratic ideals but also develop practical strategies for uniting pro-democracy forces towards a common objective.

The chief guest Wang Dan, a prominent leader of the Tiananmen Square pro-democracy movement, delivered a powerful address on the importance of strengthening the Chinese democratic movement. He outlined six key strategies for achieving this goal, which included building a strong support base, engaging more actively in local and national politics, and fostering unity among pro-democracy forces. He also commented on Sino-Tibet relations, expressing admiration for the Tibetan government-in-exile and suggesting that Chinese democrats could learn valuable lessons from the Central Tibetan Administration's governance strategies.

In her talk titled "Sino-Tibet Civil Friendship and Its Path Forward," Chinese Liaison Officer Dawa Sangmo acknowledged Taiwan's democracy as a potential model for democratic reform in China. However, she emphasised the need for deeper collaboration between Chinese democrats and Tibetans, advancing their partnership to a "2.0 level." Given the close geographical and historical ties between China and Tibet, she argued that it is crucial to recognise Tibet's historical independence and its current status as an occupied territory. She also emphasised the support for the Middle Way Policy as a means to foster peaceful coexistence, advocating for mutual respect and constructive dialogue between the two regions.

The seminar was also attended by Chinese democrats from the US, including Liquan Chen, Vice Chairman of the Democratic Party of China National Committee; Xinmin Qing, Vice Chairman and Secretary-General of the International Chinese Alliance for Democracy; and Xiuhong Jing, Chairman of the Chinese Democracy & Human Rights Alliance. and it underscored a unified agreement on continued cooperation between democratic forces.

Asian Buddhist Summit 2024 Focuses on Strengthening Asia Through Buddhism

13 November 2024, CTA

Under the auspices of the Ministry of Culture, Government of India, the International Buddhist Confederation (IBC) hosted the First Asian Buddhist Summit 2024, themed "Role of Buddhism in Strengthening Asia". The two-day summit was held at the Ashok Hotel in New Delhi from 5 to 6 November 2024. His Holiness the Dalai Lama's written message for the summit was read by Ven. Shartse Khensur Jangchup Choeden, Secretary General of the International Buddhist Confederation.

The summit was inaugurated by Smt. Droupadi Murmu, the Honorable President of India, who attended as the chief guest. She was joined by Shri Gajendra Singh Shekhawat, Union Minister of Culture, and Shri Kiren Rijiju, Union Minister for Parliamentary Affairs and Minority Affairs. Their presence underscored the Indian government's commitment to fostering interfaith dialogue and exchange.

Mr. Tenzin Lekshay, Official Spokesperson and Additional Secretary of International Relations, Department of Information and International Relations of the Central Tibetan Administration, delivered a presentation on Tibetan Buddhism, elaborating on its historical and spiritual significance, and its continued relevance in today's world. He also discussed the teachings and global impact of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, emphasizing His messages of Buddhist values, science, and religion.

The summit saw the participation of many revered Buddhist leaders, including His Eminence Menri Trizin Rinpoché, Kyabje Ling Choktrul Rinpoche, Kyabje Kundeling Rinpoche, Venerable Mingyur Rinpoche, Venerable Yangten Rinpoche among others. Many senior monks, abbots, and spiritual heads from a wide array of Buddhist traditions across Asia attended the summit and, engaged in discussions on Buddhism's potential to address contemporary global challenges.

Throughout the two-day event, key discussions focused on the role of Buddhism in promoting social harmony, ecological sustainability, and fostering interfaith dialogue, all crucial in the context of Asia's diverse and complex societies.

The Asian Buddhist Summit 2024 underscored the importance of continuing the dialogue on Buddhism's role in strengthening the cultural, spiritual, and socio-political ties within Asia, with a focus on sharing wisdom for a peaceful future.

In total, the summit attracted over 700 attendees, including Buddhist leaders, monks, scholars, educators, and practitioners, reflecting the deep interest in Buddhist teachings as a force for peace and unity in the region.

China-linked group hacked Tibetan media and university sites to distribute Cobalt Strike payload

13 November 2024, The Record Media, Daryna Antoniuk

A China-linked state hacker group has compromised Tibetan media and university websites in a new espionage campaign, researchers have found – part of a series of attacks targeting the Tibetan community in order to collect intelligence for Beijing.

The websites of the digital news outlet Tibet Post and Gyudmed Tantric University were hacked in late May and remain compromised as of the time of writing. Researchers at Recorded Future's Insikt Group track the group behind the activity as TAG-112.

The Record is an editorially independent unit of Recorded Future.

According to a new Insikt Group report, TAG-112 has several overlaps with another Chinese state-sponsored group, Evasive Panda, which has been described as "highly skilled and aggressive."

Evasive Panda is also interested in targeting the Tibetan community and previously compromised the Tibet Post. Both threat actors have also manipulated hacked websites to prompt visitors to download a malicious file disguised as a "security certificate."

Despite these similarities, Insikt Group analysts believe TAG-112 is a separate hacker group, as it lacks Evasive Panda's sophistication and hasn't deployed custom malware. Instead, the group used Cobalt Strike, a legitimate cybersecurity tool designed to help security professionals simulate cyberattacks. The Cobalt Strike Beacon payload has been widely adopted by hackers to carry out real attacks.

TAG-112 is likely a subgroup of Evasive Panda, working toward the same or similar intelligence requirements, researchers said.

Both websites compromised by the group were "almost certainly" built with the Joomla content management system (CMS), which "if not maintained and updated... become[s] an easy target for cyber threat actors," the researchers said. The group likely exploited a vulnerability in the websites to upload the malicious code.

The Tibetan community in exile, along with other ethnic minority groups in China, has long been a target for various Chinese cyber-espionage groups. Beijing perceives these groups as subversive or separatist elements challenging the Chinese Communist Party.

It is highly likely that both TAG-112 and Evasive Panda will continue their targeting of ethnic, religious, and human rights-linked organizations that operate in or have a nexus to China, researchers said.

Earlier in March, Tibetans were targeted with corrupted language translation software in a cyber-espionage campaign linked to Evasive Panda. The attack affected Tibetans living in India, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Australia, and the U.S.

10th Young Tibetan Researchers Conference Held at Central Institute of Higher Tibetan Studies (CIHTS) in Varanasi

11 November 2024, CTA

10th Young Tibetan Researchers Conference Held at Central Institute of Higher Tibetan Studies (CIHTS) in Varanasi

The 10th Young Tibetan Researchers Conference was held for three days from November 9-11, 2024, at the Central Institute of Higher Tibetan Studies (CIHTS) in Varanasi, organised by the Tibet Policy Institute. This marks the first time the Tibet Policy Institute has organised the Young Tibetan Researchers Conference at CIHTS Varanasi. Over thirty young researchers are presenting and discussing their findings on topics spanning from Tibetan religion, ancient and modern history, anthropology and epigraphy, politics and society, grammar and literature, education and development, environment, and the exile community, showcasing diverse facets of Tibetan culture.

The chief guest at the inaugural ceremony was Prof. Lobsang Tenzin Raktoe, representing the Vice-Chancellor of CIHTS, along with Secretary Dawa Tsering, Director of the Tibet Policy Institute; Joint Secretary Tempa Gyaltsen Zamlha, Deputy Director; Prof. Jampa Samten of CIHTS; Prof. Tsewang Topla of Sarah College; Assistant Professor Lhakpa Tsering of CIHTS Tibetan Language Department; Geshe Lobsang Ngodrup, Head of Tibetan Studies Department at Dalai Lama Institute for Higher Education, Bangalore; Assistant Professor Lhamo Tso from Dalai Lama Institute for Higher Education, Bangalore; and over thirty other researchers and observers.

In his welcome speech, Tibet Policy Institute Director Dawa Tsering highlighted that the conference's primary goal was to address the limited participation of exiled Tibetans in international discussions on Tibet, in contrast to China's active presence at Tibetan studies conferences. He noted that China employs over 2,000 so-called Tibetan studies experts, who misinterpret history to claim Tibet as part of China and assert that Tibetan religion and culture originated in China. Secretary Dawa emphasised the need for meaningful discussions and scholarly publications on these critical topics.

The chief guest commended the Tibet Policy Institute for organising a conference that gathered many young Tibetan researchers, emphasising the importance of studying not only Tibet's past but also its future direction—examining Tibet's past, present, and future as a whole. He remarked on Tibet's precarious current situation compared to its history, noting that Tibet's continued existence and its religion and culture's relevance in academia are largely due to collective resilience.

During his opening remarks, Deputy Director Zamlha Tempa Gyaltsen noted that the 25 researchers presenting at the three-day conference represented institutions including CIHTS Varanasi, Sarah College of Higher Tibetan Studies, Dalai Lama Institute for Higher Education in Bangalore, Tibet Policy Institute, and Nepal. Additionally, four invited experts were present to provide guidance: Dawa Tsering, Director of Tibet Policy Institute, Prof. Jampa Samten, Prof.

Tsewang Topla, and Assistant Professor Lhakpa Tsering. He announced that the conference would feature a special session on developing unified research methodologies for both traditional and modern Tibetan studies, along with a dedicated session addressing China's use of the term "Xizang" for Tibet. The event will conclude with guided tours of some historical sites in the area.

-Report filed by Tibet Policy Institute, CTA

Tibetan Delegates Highlight Derge Dam Concerns on First Day of COP29 UN Climate Summit

11 November 2024, CTA

At COP29, the global climate summit that kicked off today in Baku, Tibetan representatives Dechen Palmo and Dhondup Wangmo are bringing much-needed attention to environmental concerns in Tibet. Representing the region's interests, they highlighted the potential ecological impacts of the Derge Dam project, a hydropower initiative poised to alter the landscape of the Drichu River and affect downstream communities reliant on its waters.

On the first day of COP29, Tibetan environmental researcher Dechen Palmo and Dhondup Wangmo launched a campaign to raise awareness of the environmental and cultural risks posed by the Derge Dam project. They distributed a brochure titled "Say No to the Derge Dam Project in Tibet: Protect the Drichu River, Community, and Heritage from Destruction" to attendees, government representatives, and environmental organisations.

The brochure outlines potential impacts of the dam on the Drichu River, which holds not only ecological significance but also cultural value for local communities in Tibet. "Our goal is to build support for the protection of the Drichu River and to prevent irreversible damage to Tibet's natural and cultural heritage," Dechen explained.

Dechen Palmo and Dhondup Wangmo's schedule at COP29 includes participation in government meetings, side events and visits to government offices and country pavilions. The delegates are focused on raising awareness about Tibet's vulnerable ecosystem, emphasising the urgency of addressing the impacts of hydropower development on the Tibetan plateau.

"The Derge Dam project is not just a local issue; it is part of a broader pattern impacting regional water security and biodiversity," Dhondup Wangmo stated. "We're here to advocate for sustainable approaches that respect both Tibet's unique environment and the people who depend on it."

By attending various discussions at different pavilions and government offices, the Tibetan delegation aims to foster international support for policies that protect Tibet's rivers and fragile ecosystem. With the Derge Dam at the heart of their advocacy, the delegates' presence at COP29 underscores Tibet's role as a critical water source and a frontline region in the struggle for climate resilience.

Through this publication and discussions at COP29's side events and pavilions, Palmo and Wangmo are advocating for sustainable alternatives and international cooperation to safeguard Tibet's environment and its vital water sources.

-Report filed by Tibetan Policy Institute, CTA

Vietnamese Buddhist Sangha meets Dalai Lama, with invite for Vesak celebrations next year

11 November 2024, Tibetan Review

A delegation of top Vietnamese Buddhist leaders led by Ven Thich Tam Tri, Member of the Supreme Patriarch Council of the Vietnam Buddhist Sangha (VBS), has called on the Dalai Lama at his exile residence in Dharamshala, India, on Nov 8. And it asked him to send representatives of Tibetan Buddhism to attend Vesak, the most significant Buddhist festival, in May 2025 in Vietnam, reported the ANI news service Nov 10.

The VBS is the only Buddhist sangha recognised by the Vietnamese government.

"We requested his Holiness to send a delegation from Tibetan Buddhism from Dharamshala to attend an important Buddhist event to be hosted by Sangha from 6th to 8th of May next year and he has approved our proposal," Ven Thich Nhat Tu, Vice President of VBS and Vice-Chancellor of Vietnam Buddhist University, has said.

He has further said: "We also requested his Holiness to authorise a Tibetan master to sign an MoU with VBS for long life cooperation between Tibetan and Vietnamese Buddhist. Apart from this we also requested him to allow us to translate some of his books so that Tibetan Buddhism can be read and viewed by more and more people in Vietnam and then we also requested him to live a long life for the benefit of people around the world."

The 45-member Vietnamese Buddhist delegation visited Dharamshala after attending the Asian Buddhist Conference in Delhi last week.

Vesak, the day of the full moon in the month of May, is the most sacred day to millions of Buddhists around the world. It was on the day of Vesak two and a half millennia ago, in the year 623 BC, that the Buddha was born. It was also on the day of Vesak that the Buddha attained enlightenment, and it was on the day of Vesak that the Buddha in his eightieth year passed away, the report noted, citing the United Nations.

The delegation was earlier received by the Secretary and Additional Secretary of the Department of Religion and Culture of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) at the Kangra Airport at Gaggal on Nov 7 and visited the Library of Tibetan Works and Archives and Tibet Museum in the CTA complex.

The other members of the delegation were stated to included Ven Thich Tam Duc, Deputy Director of Vietnam Buddhist Research Institute and Executive Committee member of VBS; Ven Thích Bồn Đạt, President of Vietnamese Buddhist Association in Canada; Ven Thich Le Nguyen, President of Vietnamese Buddhist Association in UK; Ven Dr Thich Dong Thanh, Vice-Chancellor of Buddhist University in Hue City, Vietnam; Ven Dr Thich Giac Hiep; Ven Ngo Tri Vien, member of VBS; Bikkhuni Dr Dieu Hieu, Deputy Head of Pali Department at Vietnam Buddhist University; and Bhikkhuni Dr Giac Le Hieu, Abbess of Vietnamese Temple in Korea.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Visits Tibetan Institutions in Kalimpong, Addresses Tibetans on Key Issues Concerning Tibet

11 November 2024, CTA

As part of his ongoing official visits to Tibetan settlements in exile, Sikyong Penpa Tsering visited Tibetan establishments in Kalimpong Tibetan settlement on 8 November 2024.

Sikyong kicked off his day-long engagement with visitations to Sed-Gyued Monastery and Zhekar Choede Monastery, followed by an address at the Sambhota Tibetan School, Kalimpong.

After a brief introductory opening by the school's Principal, Tsering Tsomo, Sikyong advised students to learn about Tibet's past histories and current status to reconnect themselves with the Tibet cause. Having said that, Sikyong shared his insights about the geopolitical status of the Tibetan plateau and the major roles that Tibet's river system plays in the livelihoods of riparian Asian communities. Sikyong further spoke about the environmental challenges that have disturbed the Tibetan plateau's fragile ecosystem.

Sikyong also held a Q&A session with the student before wrapping up his address.

Thereafter, Sikyong headed to Gaden Tharpa Choeling and Tsechen Thinley Dhargyeling monastery to pay obeisance. At the same time, he also toured the monastery's museum.

Later that afternoon, Sikyong visited the local Tibetan Mentseekhang branch, the local Tibetan Old Age Home, and the Kalimpong Tibetan Opera Association before addressing the gathering of around 200 Tibetan residents at the Mani Lhakhang.

In his address, Sikyong Penpa Tsering reflected on the Tibetan community's journey into exile, highlighting the efforts of the older generation and detailing how His Holiness the Dalai Lama, with the assistance from Indian Prime Minister Nehru, established Tibetan settlements and schools in India. He also discussed how His Holiness' travels to Asia in 1967 and Europe in 1973 led to the development of the Middle Way Approach, a concept rooted in concerns for Tibet's survival and cultural preservation, particularly following the destruction wrought by China's Cultural Revolution.

The Sikyong then traced the evolution of the Middle Way, noting His Holiness's presentation of the Five-Point Peace Plan to the U.S. Congress in 1979, with an emphasis on Sino-Tibetan dialogue. In 1988, His Holiness further articulated this approach during his address to the European Parliament, which became a turning point for the Tibetan exile community. The Sikyong emphasised that the Middle Way Approach continues to guide the community's efforts toward a peaceful resolution, aligned with His Holiness' vision for Tibet's future.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering emphasised the importance of Tibetans understanding their history and staying informed about the critical situation in Tibet, where increasing Chinese restrictions have strained family relationships and reduced the number of Tibetans leaving for exile since 2008. This has had a negative impact on Tibetan monasteries and schools in the diaspora. He also expressed concern about the broader geopolitical context, noting China's weakened economic position post-pandemic and rising youth unemployment, which could present opportunities for Tibet's advocacy.

The Sikyong highlighted the 16th Kashag's strategy of engaging with global allies, including Uyghurs, Southern Mongolians, Hong Kong activists, Chinese pro-democrats, and Taiwanese, to strengthen Tibet's international appeal. He stressed that advocating for Tibet in isolation is ineffective, and a united front attracts more global attention. Finally, he warned that without a deep understanding of their history, Tibetans risk losing their cultural identity and the legacy of His Holiness the Dalai Lama's efforts, urging the community to prioritise this knowledge for future generations.

Tibetan MPs meet Czech lawmakers to discuss Tibet's struggles under Chinese rule

10 November 2024, ANI

Tibetan Members of Parliament, Youdon Aukatsang and Tsering Lhamo held a series of significant meetings in Prague with Czech lawmakers and diplomats to raise awareness about Tibet's struggles under Chinese governance.

The high-level discussions focused on critical issues faced by Tibetans, such as the Chinese government's control over residential schools, the closures of Tibetan monastic and private schools, and the sensitive matter of Dalai Lama's reincarnation, an official press release by the Tibetan Parliament in Exile stated.

Hosted by prominent Czech government figures, the delegation's visit was supported by Eva Decroix, Chairperson of the Subcommittee for the Support of Democracy and Human Rights Abroad, and Jitka Seitlova, Vice President of the Senate, alongside other members of the Czech Parliament.

The Tibetan MPs shared a letter from the Speaker of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, underscoring the importance of Czech support for Tibet's rights and freedoms.

The Czech lawmakers voiced strong backing for the Tibetan cause, reaffirming their commitment to upholding Tibet's cultural and political rights. Recalling the historical friendship between the Dalai Lama and former Czech President Vaclav Havel, Czech officials emphasised their dedication to defending Tibet's unique heritage.

The meeting concluded with discussions on upcoming plans to celebrate the Dalai Lama's 90th birth anniversary in 2025, the press release stated.

In addition to these parliamentary discussions, the Tibetan MPs visited Sinopsis, a Czech-based organisation monitoring developments in China, including issues related to Tibet. It informed the delegation about an upcoming report on the succession of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, scheduled for release on December 10.

This report will examine the future of Tibetan leadership, particularly concerning the Dalai Lama's reincarnation, a topic that remains highly sensitive.

The Tibetan delegation also met with prominent Tibet advocates, Katerina and Martin Bursik, at their residence in Prague, where they discussed ongoing initiatives aimed at protecting Tibet's cultural and political rights.

The MPs then held further meetings with senior Czech officials, including Mr. Ondrej Chrast, Deputy Minister for Culture; Robert Rehak, Ambassador at Large and Special Envoy for Holocaust Issues, Interfaith Dialogue, and Freedom of Religion; and Ivana Grollova from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

These conversations focused on promoting international human rights, religious freedom, and cultural preservation, with a special emphasis on the Tibetan context.

Tibet's struggle involves complex political, cultural, and human rights issues within a region celebrated for its distinctive heritage and spiritual traditions. Since China's 1950 invasion, Tibet was integrated into the People's Republic of China, bringing significant transformations in governance, society, and daily life, stated the press release.

Driven by concerns over cultural erosion, religious repression, and widespread human rights abuses, many Tibetans, including the Dalai Lama, have long sought greater autonomy or independence.

The Chinese government maintains its position that Tibet is an inseparable part of China and views its policies in the region as essential for economic growth and modernisation. This stance has ignited persistent global debate and advocacy efforts, with supporters calling for the preservation of Tibet's culture and the safeguarding of its people's rights.

Consequently, Tibet remains a sensitive issue in international diplomacy and human rights discussions.

Tibetan MPs meet Czech lawmakers to discuss Tibet's struggles under Chinese rule

10 November 2024, The Print

Tibetan Members of Parliament, Youdon Aukatsang and Tsering Lhamo held a series of significant meetings in Prague with Czech lawmakers and diplomats to raise awareness about Tibet's struggles under Chinese governance.

The high-level discussions focused on critical issues faced by Tibetans, such as the Chinese government's control over residential schools, the closures of Tibetan monastic and private schools, and the sensitive matter of Dalai Lama's reincarnation, an official press release by the Tibetan Parliament in Exile stated.

Hosted by prominent Czech government figures, the delegation's visit was supported by Eva Decroix, Chairperson of the Subcommittee for the Support of Democracy and Human Rights Abroad, and Jitka Seitlova, Vice President of the Senate, alongside other members of the Czech Parliament.

The Tibetan MPs shared a letter from the Speaker of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, underscoring the importance of Czech support for Tibet's rights and freedoms.

The Czech lawmakers voiced strong backing for the Tibetan cause, reaffirming their commitment to upholding Tibet's cultural and political rights. Recalling the historical friendship between the Dalai Lama and former Czech President Vaclav Havel, Czech officials emphasised their dedication to defending Tibet's unique heritage.

The meeting concluded with discussions on upcoming plans to celebrate the Dalai Lama's 90th birth anniversary in 2025, the press release stated.

In addition to these parliamentary discussions, the Tibetan MPs visited Sinopsis, a Czech-based organisation monitoring developments in China, including issues related to Tibet. It informed the delegation about an upcoming report on the succession of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, scheduled for release on December 10.

This report will examine the future of Tibetan leadership, particularly concerning the Dalai Lama's reincarnation, a topic that remains highly sensitive.

The Tibetan delegation also met with prominent Tibet advocates, Katerina and Martin Bursik, at their residence in Prague, where they discussed ongoing initiatives aimed at protecting Tibet's cultural and political rights.

The MPs then held further meetings with senior Czech officials, including Mr. Ondrej Chrast, Deputy Minister for Culture; Robert Rehak, Ambassador at Large and Special Envoy for Holocaust Issues, Interfaith Dialogue, and Freedom of Religion; and Ivana Grollova from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. These conversations focused on promoting international human rights, religious freedom, and cultural preservation, with a special emphasis on the Tibetan context.

Tibet's struggle involves complex political, cultural, and human rights issues within a region celebrated for its distinctive heritage and spiritual traditions. Since China's 1950 invasion, Tibet was integrated into the People's Republic of China, bringing significant transformations in governance, society, and daily life, stated the press release.

Driven by concerns over cultural erosion, religious repression, and widespread human rights abuses, many Tibetans, including the Dalai Lama, have long sought greater autonomy or independence.

The Chinese government maintains its position that Tibet is an inseparable part of China and views its policies in the region as essential for economic growth and modernisation. This stance has ignited persistent global debate and advocacy efforts, with supporters calling for the preservation of Tibet's culture and the safeguarding of its people's rights.

Consequently, Tibet remains a sensitive issue in international diplomacy and human rights discussions. (ANI)

Tibetan environment activist highlights China's large-scale timber extraction

09 November 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Tibetan environment activist Padma Wangyal delivered an address at the "Rivers of the Sky: Glaciers of the Sky" exhibition, which is currently on display at the Central Tibetan Administration's Tibet Museum. The exhibition organised by Tibet Museum and researchers from the Tibet Policy Institute (TPI), highlights Tibet's major rivers and exposes China's exploitation of these vital resources as political tools.

Padma Wangyal, who has spent decades advocating for environmental preservation in both Tibet and Nepal, shared insights from his visits to Tibet between 1987 and 2008. He emphasized the extensive logging activities along Tibet's border with China, particularly in the region of Dhartsedo, where large-scale timber extraction has continued for decades. Citing figures from his observations, Wangyal reported that between 1987 and 1989, as many as 100 trucks transported timber out of Tibet on a daily basis. By 1996, this number had risen to 300 trucks, signalling an escalation in deforestation activities.

Reflecting on his experiences, Padma explained that his initial trips to Tibet were not focused on environmental research but on gaining a broader understanding of the conditions in his homeland. It was only after repeatedly witnessing the Chinese government's extensive deforestation and environmental damage that he became deeply concerned. "Prior to the 1980s, Tibet's road infrastructure was limited," he noted, "but since then, the Chinese government has built roads specifically to facilitate the large-scale extraction and transport of Tibetan timber." Wangyal referred to the Chinese authorities as "red thugs," a term he used to underscore his view of the communist regime's exploitative policies in Tibet.

Padma Wangyal speaking to the exile Tibetan media following his address at Tibet Museum exhibition (Phayul photo)

In response to the environmental destruction he witnessed, Padma initiated a tree plantation project in 2000 at Tsurphu Monastery, the seat of His Holiness the Gyalwang Karmapa in Central Tibet. Funded by His Holiness the Dalai Lama's Private Office, the project received additional support from then-German President Johannes Rau. "I was able to carry out the tree plantation project in Tibet by bringing two forestry experts from Germany, as I had no expertise in afforestation myself," he shared. The German experts provided training to local Tibetans and monastery monks on afforestation methods and sustainable vegetable cultivation around the monastery grounds.

Since 2009, Padma has been unable to return to Tibet. After retiring as an industrial baker in Germany, he dedicated himself to environmental and humanitarian causes, serving as the Khoryug Coordinator for monasteries in Nepal under the guidance of His Holiness the 17th Gyalwang Karmapa from 2009 to 2023. Wangyal also contributed to earthquake relief efforts from 2015 to 2018, furthering his commitment to community resilience and environmental protection.

The exhibition's inauguration, held on Friday morning, saw Tibetan Parliament in Exile Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering attend as the chief guest. Also present were Karma Choeying, Secretary of the Department of Information and International Relations, and Padma Wangyal's wife, Magda.

Tibetan parliament in-exile calls for UN research on 'damage that is being done by China' in Tibet

09 November 2024, The Sentinel

The Tibetan parliament in-exile has called on the United Nations to initiate scientific research into the implications of the damage that is being done by the China in Tibetan plateau.

The call was made during the launch of the Tibet Museum's latest exhibition, Rivers of the Sky, in Dharamshala, which aims to raise awareness on how environmental degradation in Tibet directly affects not only the region but also neighbouring countries, especially India.

The exhibition was inaugurated on Friday morning by Dolma Tsering, Deputy Speaker of the Tibetan parliament in-exile, who underscored the plateau's importance for worldwide climate patterns. "The impact is such that the monsoon fluctuation in India and Northeast Asia and the warming Europe. They are all impacted by the thinning of snow at the Tibetan plateau," Tsering told ANI.

"Therefore, we want the United Nations framework for climate convention to have a scientific research on how the Tibet's glaciers, how the Tibet plateau is significant for the survival of whole humanity... I am urging the United Nations to have scientific findings on what are the implications of the damage that is being done by the People's Republic of China."

According to Tibetan environmentalist Padma Wangyal, "There is a massive deforestation is going on in Tibet for the past few decades and it's affecting Tibet's environment very badly. Specially countries like India are directly affected by this environmental destruction in Tibet."

Deforestation has reportedly exacerbated the effects of climate change in Tibet, affecting water supplies and monsoon cycles critical to regional agriculture and ecosystem stability.

Tenzin Thubten, director of the Tibet Museum, emphasised the exhibition's message to the international community and China. He highlighted that the main content for 'Rivers of the Sky' was developed by renowned researcher Gabriel, but was curated to reflect the Tibet Museum's perspectives.

Thubten explained, "Of course, there are multiple objectives behind this particular temporary exhibition, but the main objective is to tell Chinese that your counter-narrative your policy towards Tibet is not working because for last 70 years, China has captured Tibet and tortured Tibetans in many ways but now this is in global ways, in terms of the rivers exploitation. It is not only for the 6 million Tibetan people, it is now to the 2 billion people who are directly dependent on the major rivers that flow from Tibet." (ANI)

'Rivers of the Sky' Exhibition Highlights Mismanagement of Tibet's Vulnerable River System Ahead of COP29

08 November 2024, CTA

The Tibet Museum of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) launched its temporary exhibition titled "Rivers of the Sky" earlier today, with the gracious presence of Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang.

This exhibition, which underscores the critical importance of Asia's lifeblood and the pressing challenges it faces, is specifically designed to draw the attention of the international community in the lead-up to COP29. It emphasises the growing vulnerability of these rivers in Tibet due to the combined impacts of climate change, environmental degradation, and the mismanagement of water resources.

The exhibition also sheds light on the Tibetan Plateau—often called the "Third Pole" for its vast glaciers and snow-capped mountains—which is confronting unprecedented environmental pressures. These include the rapid melting of glaciers and the over-exploitation of water resources through large-scale damming and diversion projects. It serves as a stark warning: if the mismanagement of these rivers continues unchecked, the consequences could be catastrophic. Both the delicate ecosystems that rely on these waterways and the millions of people who depend on them for survival are at risk. The time for action is now, and the international community must address these pressing issues before it's too late.

Tibetan environmentalist Padma Wangyal, who launched a tree plantation project at Tsurphu Monastery in Tibet in 2000 and has also served as Khoryug (environment) Coordinator for monasteries in Nepal, was featured during the exhibition's opening ceremony. Padma shared his experiences of witnessing large-scale extraction of wood from the Tibetan region to profit the Chinese state-owned enterprises and private companies during the ceremony and recalled how he received support from His Holiness the Dalai Lama and Germany's Green Party in realising his initiative to conduct a tree plantation inside Tibet.

Alongside Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang, the inaugural of this temporary exhibition was also attended by Auditor General Lhakpa Gyaltsen; Secretary Karma Choeying, Department of Information and International Relations; and Secretary Tenzin Legdup, Election and Public Service Commission; Additional Secretary Kunga Gyaltsen, Department of Religion and Culture; and Director of the Tibet Museum, Tenzin Topdhen.

Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang Meets Australia Tibet Council Delegation, Expresses Gratitude for their Support to Tibet

08 November 2024, CTA

As part of the Australia Tibet Council's (ATC) "Little Tibet" tour, a delegation led by ATC Executive Director Dr. Zoë Bedford visited the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile and met with Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang earlier today, 8 November 2024.

Welcoming the ATC delegation, Deputy Speaker Teykhang extended a warm greeting to the guests and emphasised the special bond shared between Tibetans and Australians. She praised the ATC for its unwavering advocacy for Tibet over the past decades and expressed deep gratitude for their continued support.

The delegation was briefed by the Deputy Speaker on the composition and structure of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, the roles and responsibilities of its parliamentarians, and the election process for selecting them.

The Deputy Speaker also thanked the ATC for bringing the delegation to Dharamsala, noting that learning about the Sino-Tibetan conflict and experiencing the work of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) first-hand would strengthen their commitment to the just cause of Tibet.

Highlighting the importance of spreading awareness about Tibet, the Deputy Speaker stressed the challenge of countering China's disinformation campaigns. She condemned China's expansionist mentality, describing it as one of the greatest threats to global democracy. She also spoke about His Holiness the Dalai Lama's long-aspired vision for a democratic system that ensures fairness and justice for Tibetans, as well as his gift of democracy to the Tibetan people.

The Deputy Speaker also drew attention to the critical situation inside Tibet, including the forced relocation of Tibetan children to colonial-style boarding schools and the self-immolations of Tibetans as acts of protest. She expressed her gratitude to the Australian Ambassador to the UN for reading a Joint Statement from a group of nations on 22 October 2024, which raised the issue of Tibet at the UN General Assembly and condemned China's refusal to address the UN's legitimate concerns.

To conclude the visit, the delegation was honoured with traditional Tibetan ceremonial scarves and mementos as a gesture of appreciation before being given a tour of the Parliament Hall.

Tibetan translation of Barbara Demick's "Eat the Buddha" launched in Dharamshala

07 November 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The Tibetan translation of Eat the Buddha: Life and Death in a Tibetan Town, a critically acclaimed book by American journalist Barbara Demick, was launched on Tuesday at the conference hall of the Library of Tibetan Works and Archives in Dharamshala. Organised by Tibet Times, a Tibetan media outlet, the event gathered researchers, scholars, activists, and members of the Tibetan community.

Originally published in 2020, Eat the Buddha chronicles the complex lives of Tibetans in Ngaba, a town at the center of Tibet's self-immolation protests against Chinese repression. Through intimate narratives, Demick captures the resilience, suffering, and quiet resistance of the Tibetan people, especially those from the Kirti Monastery community, who have endured some of the most severe restrictions and violence.

In her virtual message to the gathering, Demick expressed her gratitude to the Tibetan translator, Depo Tso, and editor, Atuk Kunchok, acknowledging their dedication to making these poignant stories accessible to Tibetan readers. She shared insights into her motivation and privileged access that enabled the creation of this book. "I was based in Beijing from 2007 to 2014 as the correspondent for the Los Angeles Times. As a registered journalist, my press card allowed me to travel anywhere in China, granting me privileges others didn't have. I felt obligated to use these privileges to the best of my abilities. I wanted to report from places that were hard for foreigners to access, and Tibet was one of them," she explained.

Since the book's release, Demick said she has had opportunities to discuss Eat the Buddha with young Tibetans, particularly those studying abroad. "I have had opportunities to speak about the book with young Tibetans, most of whom were highly educated university students living in the US and the UK. But I have been surprised that even they are not fully aware of the enormity of what was happening in Tibet from the 1950s onwards," she remarked. "This is why I am pleased that this book has been translated into Tibetan. I am hoping that the translation will be made accessible to the larger audience."

Depo Tso, who translated the book, shared how Eat the Buddha resonated with her on a personal level. "The book portrays historical accounts of Tibet, specifically self-immolations, which is something I relate to personally," she said, recounting the loss of her younger sibling, who self-immolated on January 6, 2012, alongside his friend Tsultrim. "He passed on that day, and his friend passed away the next day. Reading this book filled me with emotions, and I cried many times."

Depo Tso also reflected on the book's portrayal of the Cultural Revolution, a period that brought personal tragedy to her family. "During the Cultural Revolution, my grandfather, a Lama, was severely targeted. The Chinese authorities at the time were extremely strict with Lamas, and he was shot three times. He passed away, leaving my father, who was only three months old. Growing up, my father would narrate this story to me, and translating this book brought back those memories," she explained, noting the profound impact the book had on her.

Europe Tibet Advocacy in Germany: Tibetan MPs Discuss Critical Situation in Tibet with German MPs

07 November 2024, CTA

On the last day of the visit in Berlin, Tibetan MPs Youdon Aukatsang and Tsering Lhamo held a briefing on Tibet in the Committee Room, Paul-Löbe-Haus of the German Bundestag hosted by MP Michael Brand, Chair of the German Tibetan Parliamentary Group for Tibet.

Present at the meeting were MP Michael Brand, CDU Party and Co-Chair of Inter Parliamentary Alliance on China, MP Peter Heidt, FDP Party Spokesperson on Human Rights and Humanitarian Aid, MP Maria Klein-Schmeink, Green Party Spokesperson on Health Policy and MP Frank Müller, member of FDP working group on Foreign Policy.

In addition to the UN Advocacy Officer from the Office of Tibet Geneva, Phuntsok Topgyal and Dundup Donka, President of Tibetan Community in Germany, Kai Müller, ICT Germany Director and David Missal, Tibetan Initiative Deutschland joined us in this Briefing at the German Bundestag.

The two Tibetan MPs made a brief presentation on the current situation in Tibet focusing on China's genocidal policies aimed at wiping out Tibetan identity, culture and religion. Particular concerns were raised on the state controlled residential boarding schools, closure Tibetan private schools and monastic schools, and demolition of monasteries in the name of development.

Special appeal was made to the German MPs to pass a declaration in the German Parliament endorsing His Holiness the Dalai Lama's sole authority to determine his reincarnation particularly on the occasion of His Holiness the Dalai Lama's 90th birth anniversary. The Tibetan MPs reiterated that this would send a strong signal to the Chinese government to not interfere in the religious sphere of the Tibetan people.

Upon urging the German MPs to visit Dharamshala to show their solidarity with Tibet, one of the MPs shared his interest in visiting Dharamshala in early 2025.

Following the presentation, Tibetan MPs were taken on an hour-long tour of the German Parliament courtesy MP Michael Brand and his staff. Tibetan MPs departed for Prague on the same evening.

-Report filed by Tibetan Parliamentary Secretariat

His Holiness the Dalai Lama Extends Congratulations to the U.S. President-elect Donald Trump

07 November 2024, CTA

His Holiness the Dalai Lama has written to congratulate Donald Trump on his victory in the Presidential election.

"I have long admired the United States of America as the champion of democracy, freedom and the rule of law," His Holiness wrote. "The world places great hope in the democratic vision and leadership of the U.S.A. In these times of great uncertainty and upheaval in several parts of the world, it is my hope that you will provide leadership in bringing about peace and stability.

"The Tibetan people and I have been honoured to have received the support of respective U.S. Presidents and the American people, in our endeavour to protect and preserve our ancient Buddhist culture—a culture of peace, non-violence and compassion that has the potential to benefit humanity as a whole.

His Holiness concluded, "I wish you every success in meeting the many challenges that lie ahead in fulfilling the hopes and aspirations of the American people and in contributing to peace in the world."

Department of Education, Central Tibetan Administration Unveils New Children's Books for Tibetan Children

06 November 2024, CTA

On 6 November 2024, the Department of Education (DoE) of the Central Tibetan Administration released a series of children's books aimed explicitly at Tibetan children in both India and Nepal. This year, the DoE has published ten children's and five thick books, distributed free of charge. These books are available for download on the Department of Education's Tibetan language learning website and on the Issuu platform for anyone who wishes to access them.

These books are designed to enhance students' reading skills, memory, and concentration while offering fresh and creative inspiration. They aim to give children a broader understanding of various subjects and foster intellectual growth.

This initiative is supported and coordinated by USAID in partnership with The Tibet Fund.

Arunachal: TSGAP reiterates support to Tibetan cause

06 November 2024, The Sentinel Assam

A team of Tibet Support Group of Arunachal Pradesh (TSGAP), led by its president Tarh Tarak and secretary-general Nima Sange called on Penpa Tsering, the Sikyong of Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), the Dharamshala-based Tibetan government-in-exile, at Tenzingang Tibetan settlement in West Kameng district, and reiterated the group's solidarity and support to the Tibetan cause.

Tarak said that TSGAP will continue its support to the Tibetan freedom struggle and work for the basic welfare of the Tibetan community residing in Arunachal Pradesh. He also said that the TSGAP will organize a series of events to bring mass awareness about Tibetans and the Tibet issues.

While highlighting the relation between Tibet and Arunachal Pradesh before the independence, Tarak advocated freedom of Tibet from China to restore the aged-old barter trade between Arunachal Pradesh and Tibet.

"TSGAP team firmly believes that under the leadership of Sikyong Penpa Tsering, CTA will renew its call for finding a solution to the decades-old Tibet conflict with China through talks,” he said.

Tsering, who arrived here on Monday on a four-day state visit, especially West Kameng and Tawang, appreciated TSGAP for its support to the Tibetan cause and issue. Highlighting the CTA’s stand on the Tibet issue, the Sikyong of CTA said he would visit eastern part of Arunachal Pradesh in January next year.

Kalaktang MLA Tsetan Chombey, Tibetan settlement officer Rapten Tsering, and other officials of CTA were present during the interactive meeting.

The TSGAP team also met Speaker of Tibetan Parliament in-exile Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, Tibetan Member of Parliament in-exile Ven Geshe Lharampa Atuk Tsetan, TSO coordinator Tenzin Lhagyal and other senior officers of CTA here on November 3 and apprised them of the activities carried out by TSGAP and its future course of action on Tibetan cause, a press release said here on Tuesday.

DIIR Expresses Gratitude to 15 Countries for Their Statements on Human Rights Violations in Tibet at the 79th UNGA

06 November 2024, CTA

The Department of Information and International Relations, Central Tibetan Administration, is pleased to extend its profound appreciation to the United States of America, as well as to Australia, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Iceland, Japan, Lithuania, the Kingdom of the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, and the United Kingdom, for their collaborative efforts in issuing a joint statement during the recently concluded 79th General Assembly of the United Nations, which specifically addressed the ongoing violations of human rights by the People’s Republic of China in Tibet and East Turkistan.

Department of Information and International Relations Kalon Norzin Dolma remarked, “On behalf of the Department of Information and International Relations, Central Tibetan Administration and Tibetans in both Tibet and in exile, I acknowledge and appreciate the coalition of 15 nations led by Australia and their leaders who have courageously voiced their commitment to justice, human rights, and peace by raising the grave situation in occupied Tibet at the United Nations. This support is a meaningful step, yet we remain aware that significant work lies ahead to address the persistent challenges and human rights violations faced by Tibetans under the PRC government’s colonial occupation. Your collective support at the United Nations marks an important gesture. It reflects the ideals of international solidarity and action, and we look forward to ongoing, collective efforts toward achieving genuine peace and justice”.

In light of the considerable challenges presently confronting Tibetans within Tibet—including the detention of individuals for the peaceful expression of political views, restrictions on travel, coercive labour arrangements, the separation of children from their families in boarding schools, and the erosion of linguistic, cultural, educational, and religious rights—Tibetan people hold the view that assertive statements regarding China’s actions on international platforms could play a crucial role in alleviating these dire situations and mitigating the sufferings endured within Tibet.

Deputy Speaker Meets FNVA Trustee and Tibetan Researchers

05 November 2024, CTA

Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang met with Rebon Banerjee, Trustee of the Foundation for Non-Violent Alternatives (FNVA), on 4 November 2024 at the Deputy Speaker’s chamber. Three young Tibetan researchers accompanied Rebon Banerjee.

During their meeting, the Deputy Speaker encouraged three young Tibetan researchers to focus more on Tibet-related topics and leverage all available platforms to raise awareness about Tibet.

She also shared her experience attending one of the IPAC meetings, highlighting the importance of a unified message from Tibetans worldwide to reach a broader audience effectively.

The young researchers presented a brief overview of their work, outlining their research objectives and emphasising how well-conducted research, backed by accurate data, can help address miscommunication within the Tibetan community and in the broader international arena.

They further discussed with the Deputy Speaker how the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile and the Foundation for Non-Violent Alternatives could collaborate for more constructive outcomes and amplify the message, sharing their prior experiences in varied spheres.

They had a very fruitful meeting, followed by a guided tour of the parliament hall, where the Deputy Speaker provided an overview of the parliament's structure, evolution, and functioning.

Central Tibetan Administration Convenes Three-Day Communication Strategy Meeting

04 November 2024, CTA

The Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) convened a communication strategy meeting this morning at the Sager Science Center Hall, Library of Tibetan Works and Archives, in Dharamshala, from 4 to 6 November 2024.

In the afternoon, the meeting commenced with an opening address by the Guest of Honor, Mark Tegenfeldt, Director of the General Development Office at USAID, India, followed by remarks from Kalon Norzin Dolma of the Department of Information and International Relations (DIIR).

In her address, Kalon Norzin Dolma underscored the necessity of enhancing CTA's communication strategy to disseminate news and foster public awareness effectively. She emphasised that such meetings are essential for aligning the communication needs of the CTA.

Kalon Norzin Dolma identified three primary target audiences for CTA communications: the Chinese, the international community, and the Tibetan populace. She elaborated on the importance of adequately addressing these audiences and discussed the challenges the CTA faces in this regard. She encouraged participants and facilitators to engage in the three-day meeting to fully maximize its benefits.

Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang addressed the gathering, commending the organiser of this communication strategy meeting, including parliamentarians and staff. She urged all participants to extract the utmost value from the discussions, irrespective of language barriers.

Leela Mulukutla, Chief of the Party at the National Democratic Institute, welcomed all attendees and encouraged a more interactive engagement throughout the meeting.

Members of the Parliament Standing Committee present included Tenpa Yarphel, Lupon Thupten Gyaltsen, Tsering Yangchen, Tsaneytsang Dhondup Tashi, and staff from the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile and DIIR.

This meeting is organised by the National Democratic Institute and funded by USAID.

Pioneering Tibetan IT outfit unveils five new stages at Monlam Manifest 2024

04 November 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Geshe Lobsang Monlam, the visionary founder and the CEO of the Monlam Tibetan IT Research Center delivering opening remarks at Monlam Manifest 2024 at TIPA on Sunday (Photo/Tenzin Leckphel)

The Monlam Tibetan IT Research Center, a pioneering developer of Tibetan educational software, unveiled five new innovative stages as part of its ongoing technological journey at the Tibetan Institute of Performing Arts (TIPA) here on Sunday. This year's Monlam Manifest 2024 event drew a diverse audience of Tibetan IT enthusiasts, educators, and community leaders eager to witness the latest innovations.

The launch event introduced Monlam AI, the first of its kind in Tibetan AI, featuring five major tools: Monlam Translate App, Monlam Web Extension, Monlam Nyamrub (Collaboration), Monlam Keyboard, and Monlam Melong, also known as the Tibetan Large Language Model (LLM). These tools reflect the centre's commitment to making the Tibetan language digitally accessible and empowering Tibetan-speaking communities to thrive in the global digital space.

Geshe Lobsang Monlam, the visionary founder and CEO of the Monlam Tibetan IT Research Center, in his opening remarks, spoke of his hope for these tools to bridge technological gaps while preserving Tibetan identity. "Through Monlam AI, we are creating not only tools but a platform where the Tibetan language can thrive digitally," he said. "Our language and culture can now be represented in ways that make it accessible globally while staying rooted in our traditions."

The five tools aim to fulfill Monlam's core aspirations by making the Tibetan language and knowledge more accessible in the digital world. The 'Monlam Translate App' enables seamless translation across voice, text, and image formats, allowing users to translate Tibetan into English and other languages effortlessly. The 'Monlam Web Extension' further supports this goal by allowing Tibetan readers to browse the internet with real-time translations of complex concepts, thereby broadening access to educational resources. 'Monlam Nyamrub' (Collaboration) fosters community involvement by inviting Tibetan users to actively contribute to building Tibetan AI resources, creating a sense of ownership and participation in Tibetan digital progress.

The 'Monlam Keyboard', optimized for mobile devices, offers easy and accurate Tibetan typing, helping users communicate effectively and supporting digital literacy within the Tibetan community. Lastly, the 'Monlam Melong' (Tibetan Large Language Model, LLM), a key feature of Monlam's recent developments, captures the richness of Tibetan language and culture. Designed to mirror Tibetan values and knowledge, it allows users to interact with AI in a way that generates text and answers questions. Together, these tools represent Monlam's commitment to bridging technological gaps while preserving Tibetan linguistic and cultural heritage.

The event also celebrated Monlam's accomplishments, highlighting that over 43 software applications have been developed under the centre's guidance, with Geshe Monlam personally creating 37 of them. The Monlam Grand Dictionary alone has been accessed over 18 million times on iOS, with Android data expected to be even higher. Now comprising 223 volumes, the Monlam Grand Dictionary holds the distinction of being the largest dictionary in the world.

October

Chinese Liaison Officer Sangay Kyab Participates in a Conference Discussing Democratisation of China in Berlin

28 October 2024, CTA

The Chinese Liaison Officer from the Tibet Bureau in Geneva, Sangay Kyab, attended the "Joint conference of the people of Taiwan, Hong Kong, Chinese Liaison Officer Sangay Kyab Participates in a Conference Discussing Democratisation of China in Berlin Tibet, Uyghur, Mongolia and Inner Mongolia against the atrocity in China" held by Sino Euro Voice in Berlin, Germany.

It was co-organised by the UK Headquarters of China Democracy Party, the Federation for a Democratic China, the Taiwan Foundation for Democracy, and the Democracy Party of China.

The conference's inaugural featured Dr Jhy-Wey Shieh, the Taiwanese Representative to Germany, who delivered the opening remarks and emphasised the importance of unity and cooperation among the communities represented for fostering positive change in China. The Representative further expressed his gratitude to the Tibetan, Mongolian, and Uyghur communities for their solidarity and support for Taiwan in light of the increased aggression from the PRC in the Taiwan Strait.

In his address during the opening ceremony, Chinese Liaison Officer Sangay Kyab recounted His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama's immense contributions and shrewd guidance in promoting collaborations among the victims of the CPC's political repression while expressing his disappointment for the oversight in including a representative of White Paper Movement in this conference.

As the conference reflected on the Communist Party of China's 75 years of rule, Sangay Kyab provided a detailed account of the 75 years of repression in Tibet, dividing the period into four distinct phases. He noted that the Chinese government initiated major political campaigns in Tibet from 1949 to 1965, following a violent incursion. This was succeeded by the infamous Cultural Revolution, which lasted from 1966 to 1976. Kyab highlighted the CPC's promotion of mass immigration into Tibet from 1980 to 2012, alongside various sinicisation programs, marking the third phase of repression that led to numerous self-immolations, particularly after the 2008 pan-Tibet protests. He categorised the current period under Xi Jinping as the fourth phase, characterised by state policies aimed at erasing Tibetan identity, notably through the forced admission of over 1 million Tibetan children into colonial-style boarding schools. In the virtual talk section of the conference, Representative Kelsang Gyaltzen of the Office of Tibet in Taiwan delivered a talk, stressing that international discussion and attention over the Tibet cause has not yet diminished as many misperceive. In light of that, he elaborated on the recent enactment of the Resolve Tibet Act in the US.

Representatives from Tibet, Southern Mongolia, East Turkistan, Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Chinese pro-democracy activist groups participated in the conference.

A day later, at 10:30 in the morning on 25 October, participants of the conference held a protest in front of the Chinese Embassy in Berlin.

India Tibet Coordination Office Holds Tibet Awareness Program in Mumbai to Strengthen Advocacy for Tibet

28 October 2024, CTA

From left to right: Faculty Shri Arvind Nikose, Co-convenor of CGTC-I; Shri Santosh Rohidas Gharat, State Secretary (Political) of the Nationalist Congress Party (NCP), Maharashtra; Tashi Dekyi, Coordinator, ITCO; Principal Shri Kongere ji; Shri Bala Saheb Raste; and Teacher Suhas Shinde.

The India Tibet Coordination Office (ITCO) of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) organised a Tibet Awareness Program in Mumbai, engaging stakeholders across education, media, politics, and Tibet Support Groups to promote advocacy and solidarity with the Tibetan cause. The program aimed to strengthen advocacy and solidarity with the Tibetan cause, with events and meetings held across the city.

As part of the awareness initiative, "A Day for Tibet Program" was held at Shri Chhatrapati Shivaji High School in Navi Mumbai. Approximately 70 students, along with Principal Shri Kongere and faculty members, attended the program themed 'Why Tibet Matters to India'. The session was attended by chief guest Shri Santosh Gharat during which, ITCO Coordinator Tashi Dekyi shared insights on the historical, cultural, and geopolitical connections between India and Tibet in her address. The program highlighted the strategic relevance of Tibet, including environmental concerns and the importance of India's support for Tibet's cause. Students and teachers actively participated, making the session highly engaging and informative.

Likewise, an another advocacy meeting was held at Mehboob Studio with Bollywood producer Shri Raj Satyam and his nephew, Anish Vajjala. Tashi Dekyi, Coordinator of the ITCO, and Shri Raj Satyam discussed about creative ways to reach out the Indian masses; by making the Hindi cinema fraternity more aware about Tibet, and building mass mobilisation through them.

Coordinator Tashi Dekyi also met with Shri Shashi Ranjan, an actor, filmmaker, and producer at Sony Entertainment Television, at his office in Lokandwala, Andheri West. The discussion centred on integrating Tibetan narratives into media and entertainment projects to generate public awareness.

On the political front, the program involved an advocacy meeting with Shri Santosh Rohidas Gharat, National General Secretary of the Nationalist Congress Party (NCP), Maharashtra. Shri Gharat expressed his support for the Tibetan cause and assured his involvement in political advocacy efforts to raise awareness at the state and national levels.

Coordinator Tashi Dekyi also made a courtesy call on Shri Varsha Eknath Gaikwad, a Congress Member of Parliament from Mumbai, at her office. The discussion focused on encouraging parliamentarians to engage with Tibet-related issues. Shri Gaikwad expressed her willingness to support initiatives promoting human rights and the preservation of Tibetan cultural heritage, signalling strong political backing for the Tibetan cause. The Coordinator also addressed the challenges faced by the Tibetan Refugee Market in Mumbai. She was joined by representatives from the Tibetan sweater-selling community in the city during this meeting. This dialogue underscored the need for continued support to sustain the livelihood and rights of Tibetan refugees in Mumbai.

In conclusion, the Tibet Awareness Program in Mumbai, spearheaded by Coordinator Tashi Dekyi marked a significant step in mobilising support across diverse sectors. The involvement of educational institutions, media professionals, political figures, and Tibet Support Groups demonstrated a collaborative effort to strengthen the Tibet advocacy movement.

The positive response from participants indicates the potential for future engagements and partnerships. Moving forward, follow-up meetings with key stakeholders, enhanced media outreach, and sustained political advocacy will be essential to maintain the program's momentum. The program also underscored the need for continued education and awareness efforts to inspire support among younger generations.

BTSM protests against China

28 October 2024, Daily Excelsior

The Bharat-Tibet Sahyog Manch (BTSM) held a protest on Sunday, raising slogans against China and seeking boycott of Chinese products.

The demonstration, led by JKUT President Dr Vivek Sharma, demanded the complete liberation of Kailash Mansarovar and Tibet from Chinese control.

Dr. Sharma stated: "As civilians, we may not be able to fight at the border, but we can respond effectively by boycotting all Chinese products and encouraging others to do the same." He urged all members of society to support the boycott of Chinese goods and choose local products instead.

"Along with seeking the complete freedom of Tibet and Kailash Mansarovar, another objective of this protest is to encourage a boycott of Chinese goods in the market. While every citizen may not be able to go to war at the borders, it is our moral responsibility to embrace Swadeshi goods and demonstrate our patriotism," he said.

Rajinder Sadotra, General Secretary BTSM, said that use of Chinese goods is equal to helping China become economically stronger.

Others, who addressed the gathering, included Dr Vikrant Singh and Dr Rajesh Sharma, Vice President of BTSM; Vishal Sharma, Alok Mahajan, Mukesh Sharma and Dr Nitin.

Tibetan delegation in Europe raises awareness on repression by China in Tibet

27 October 2024, ANI

A parliamentary delegation from the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) has intensified its global advocacy efforts by engaging with key figures in Switzerland to discuss the urgent situation in Tibet, a statement from CTA said.

The delegation, comprising parliamentarian MPs Geshe Atong Rinchen Gyaltsen, Lobsang Gyatso Sithar, and Tenzin Choezin met with Mario Fehr, Minister of Security of Zurich Council and embarked to express gratitude for his support during Dalai Lama's recent visit and his ongoing commitment to the Tibetan cause, the statement added.

As per the statement, during the meeting, the MPs detailed the escalating repressive measures imposed by the Chinese Communist government, aimed at erasing Tibetan religion, culture, language, and identity. They presented a letter of appeal, signed by the Speaker of the Tibetan Parliament, along with a symbolic souvenir from the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile.

Minister Fehr acknowledged his long-standing connection with the Tibetan community since 1988, reinforcing the importance of international support against China's oppressive policies. In the afternoon, the delegation convened with members of the Tibetan Community of Switzerland and Liechtenstein, as well as representatives from Tibet support groups and NGOs, the statement said.

They explored strategies to enhance collective advocacy efforts and discussed the delegation's objectives in challenging Chinese oppression. The MPs underscored the necessity of unity within the Tibetan struggle, responding to questions and fostering a collaborative spirit among attendees, as per the statement.

Tibet, a region with a rich cultural and spiritual heritage, came under Chinese control in the 1950s following a military invasion by the People's Republic of China (PRC).

This event marked the beginning of a complex and often contentious relationship between Tibet and the Chinese government, which has led to significant international concern over various issues related to human rights, cultural preservation, and environmental degradation.

The meeting also included Thinlay Chukki, a Representative of the Tibet Bureau in Geneva, and Phuntsok Topgyal, UN Advocacy Officer of the Tibet Bureau, further emphasizing the coordinated effort to shine a spotlight on China's violations of human rights in Tibet.

Since the invasion, China has implemented policies that many observers characterize as politically repressive and culturally suppressive. These measures have included the restriction of religious practices, the imposition of Mandarin as the primary language of instruction in schools, and the repression of Tibetan cultural expressions.

China's actions have often been framed as part of a broader agenda to assimilate Tibetan identity into a unified Chinese national identity, which has fueled ongoing tensions both within Tibet and between Tibetans and the Chinese government.

Representative Dr Tsewang Gyalpo Arya Concludes his Maiden Tour to the Philippines

27 October 2024, CTA

Representative Dr Tsewang Gyalpo Arya of the Liaison Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama for Japan and East Asia concluded his one-week maiden official tour to the Philippines today after a series of interactions and lecture events on the Tibet issue in the regions surrounding Manila City.

The Philippines was one of the few countries that supported Tibet in the United Nations in the early 1960s to condemn Chinese occupation of Tibet and questioned the veracity of the 'liberation' of Tibet. The prestigious Ramon Magsaysay Award of the Philippines was awarded to H.H. the Dalai Lama in 1959 for his leadership in the preservation of Tibet's society, religion, and culture during a critical time.

Representative Dr Arya met with Hon. Congressman Adrian Amaton and discussed his schedule in the city. He updated the Congressman on the Tibet issue and the vision paper of the 16th Kashag of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA). While presenting a copy of the recent U.S. Resolve Tibet Act, he briefed the Congressman on the Act and requested the introduction of a similar bill in the Philippine parliament.

Congressman Adrian Amaton welcomed Dr. Arya and expressed pleasure meeting him and said that many people in the Philippines support the Tibet issue because Filipinos are freedom-loving people and Tibet represents a non-violent and justified struggle for freedom and justice. He advised continued efforts to negotiate with China for a peaceful resolution of the Tibet-China conflict.

Later, Representative Arya met with Hon. Wallace Chow, Representative of the Taipei Economic & Cultural Office in the Philippines, and discussed the situation in Tibet, Taiwan, and China. They agreed that freedom and democracy in China as important factors in resolving their issues with China and expressed solidarity to work for freedom and democracy around the world.

At the invitation of the University of the Philippines College of Mass Communication, Representative Arya visited the University, where he was received by Dean Fernando Paragas, Prof. Diosa Labiste, and the students. In his talk to the students, he briefly spoke of the early imperial power of Tibet, how Buddhism pacified the Tibetans, and how the Tibetans lived in peace under the leadership of successive Dalai Lamas until the Chinese communist invasion of Tibet in 1950. He talked about the historical distortion the CCP leadership is making to justify their claim on Tibet and warned the students of Chinese propaganda and disinformation.

Representative Dr. Arya visited the Philippine Palyul Tibetan Buddhist Dharma Center at Santa Mesa, where he met with the monks and explained the purpose of his visit to the Philippines and updated them on the workings of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), and shared with them the vision paper of the CTA.

Madam Susan Afan, President of the Ramon Magsaysay Award Foundation (RMAF), and Joy Alampay, Director of Ramon Magsaysay Transformative Leadership Institute, met with Representative Dr. Arya and discussed the Tibet issue and the four missions of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. The President and the members of the RMAF visited Dharamsala and had an audience with His Holiness last September. The President emphasized the importance of sharing His Holiness the Dalai Lama's vision for world peace in the region and celebrating the 90th birth anniversary of His Holiness next year through seminars and other events.

Because of the typhoon emergency warning, the two lectures planned at the University of the Philippines Asian Center Forum and Del La Salle Saint Benilde's School of Diplomacy and Governance Forum were done online. Dr. Arya spoke on the theme "The Tibetan Struggle: Search for Freedom and Justice" and "The Philippines and Tibetan Relations: Helming vibrant partnership amidst diversity" at the two forums.

Representative Arya thanked the government and the people of the Philippines for their support in the early 1950s and for awarding the prestigious Ramon Magsaysay Award to His Holiness the Dalai Lama in 1959. He said he appreciated and wanted to revive the Filipinos' bold and freedom-loving spirit.

Representative Dr Arya, in his presentation at the two colleges, elaborated on how Tibet has been an independent nation since ancient times and how the CCP has been trying to distort this part of history to legitimize its occupation of Tibet. He explained how the CCP is a threat to China, Asia, and the world and how the freedom-loving nations around the world should work together to free China from the CCP's authoritative regime.

Faculty members and students asked many questions about the situation in Tibet, Chinese religious interference, historical distortion, China's transnational repression and surveillance, His Holiness the Dalai Lama's reincarnation issue, and the whereabouts of Panchen Lama. As the questions exceeded the time limit, it was decided to answer through email.

The deans, faculty members, and students thanked Representative Arya for his presentation on the history and current situation of Tibet and requested such talks in the future. The University presented a certificate of appreciation to Dr Arya. Prof. Maricel Fernandez-Carag, in her closing remark, said that though Tibet and the Philippines are some 3662 km apart, we are united by the shared value of freedom and non-violence. "We need this international partnership to promote global citizenship education." She said. Some suggested starting Tibetan studies at the University and requested reading materials on Tibet. Representative Arya welcomed the idea of Tibetan studies at the University and promised to send reading materials on Tibet.

Tibetan rights group demands information on four missing detainees in Ngaba

25 October 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

A Tibetan human rights organization has raised alarm over the disappearance of four Tibetans, including two prominent monks, who were detained by Chinese authorities in Ngaba, Amdo.

The four detained Tibetans from Amdo Ngaba (Photo/TCHRD)

The Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) reported that two monks from Kirti Monastery in the Tibetan province of Amdo, Lobsang Samten and Lobsang Trinley, along with Tsering Tashi and Wangkyi, were arbitrarily detained in early September. Their current whereabouts and any charges against them remain unknown.

Lobsang Samten, 53, a monk holding the Karampa (Geshe) title for academic excellence, serves as the junior chant master at Kirti Monastery's Prayer College. Originally from Khangsar township in Chikdril County, Samten has been associated with the monastery since childhood. This is not his first encounter with detention, as he was previously held in 2011 alongside 300 other monks.

The second detained monk, Lobsang Trinley, also known as Drenpo, is in his forties and hails from Rong khangsar town in Ngaba County. He has been instrumental in organizing ritual ceremonies at the monastery.

A source speaking to TCHRD revealed the intensifying situation in the region: "There have been reports of members of the Haritsang family being arrested for maintaining contacts in India, though specific details remain elusive. In recent months, repression in the Ngaba region has intensified, with increased restrictions particularly aimed at Kirti Monastery and nearby villages.

"Arbitrary detentions and secret sentencing of Tibetans have become frequent. Local Tibetans are being silenced through intimidation, making it increasingly difficult for information to surface. Even those who are released from detention are prohibited from revealing the charges against them or where they were held, further obscuring the truth from the community."

Ngaba is a region in the Tibetan province of Amdo that has been the epicentre of self-immolation protests against Chinese government repression due to which the region became unfortunately known as the "self-immolation capital of the world."

This incident follows China's closure of two major Buddhist monastery schools in July this year, forcing approximately 1,600 novice monks into government-run boarding schools, marking what observers see as part of a broader campaign to assimilate Tibetan cultural and religious identity into Han Chinese culture.

TCHRD has issued a call for Chinese authorities to end these arbitrary detentions immediately and provide information about the status and whereabouts of the four detained individuals

Modi-Xi meeting at BRICS draws cautious optimism from Tibetan leader

25 October 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping held a bilateral meeting on the side lines of the BRICS summit in Kazan, Russia on Wednesday.

According to information released by India's Ministry of External Affairs, the two leaders discussed improving India-China relations and agreed to work on restoring ties that had deteriorated due to border confrontations and other issues. During the meeting, Xi Jinping told Modi that India and China should take a different approach regarding their relationship and cooperation.

The first meeting in five years between Modi and Xi comes after recent talks between India and China regarding the Indo-Tibet border issues and military deployment arrangements reached some agreement. The breakthrough in the patrolling arrangement comes four years after the Galwan Valley clash and signals a move towards de-escalation in a region where both countries stationed tens of thousands of troops.

Tibetan President-in-exile Penpa Tsering welcomed the diplomatic engagement between the two Asian powers in an interview with ANI where he lauded the development while maintaining a cautious perspective.

The democratically elected Tibetan leader said, "I think from the very beginning, when PM Modi came into the office, he tried his best to build relations with China. His Holiness, the Dalai, Lama and Tibetan people have always appreciated good relations between neighbours, between countries, and between people, and we believe in nonviolence and peaceful coexistence..."

He added, "So this (bilateral meeting between PM Modi and President Xi), I would say is a good development because any relationship that is improving, that is leading towards more peace is definitely appreciative..."

While acknowledging the benefits of improved India-China relations, Tsering expressed scepticism about China's reliability and said that "it is difficult to trust China."

China's repeated aggression and unprovoked belligerence against India, especially along the Indo-Tibetan border have strained relations between the two Asian giants, despite New Delhi's attempts to normalise ties and deescalate frictions over the years.

Over 140 global Tibet groups condemn Musée Guimet's cultural erasure of Tibet

25 October 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

A coalition of more than 140 Tibet advocacy organizations has confronted Paris's Musée Guimet over its controversial decision to replace references to "Tibet" with "Himalayan World" in its exhibitions, accusing the museum of complicity in China's cultural erasure efforts.

In a letter delivered Thursday to Museum President Dr. Yannick Lintz, the coalition demanded the institution restore the use of "Tibet" in its exhibitions, arguing that the current terminology effectively censors Tibet's distinct cultural identity and tacitly endorses China's occupation of the region.

"This is not just a matter of semantics," stated Rashi Jauhri of the International Tibet Network. "By prioritising China's propaganda over historical accuracy, the museum is actively betraying every patron that walks through its door."

The controversy displays ongoing tensions surrounding Tibet's cultural representation in international institutions. Tibet, which was invaded by China in 1950, is currently ranked among the world's most repressed regions by Freedom House, with severe restrictions on civil liberties and political rights under the repressive occupation of the Chinese authority.

Critics argue that by adopting the term "Himalayan World," the museum is conflating distinct cultural traditions of Tibet, Bhutan, and Nepal, effectively obscuring Tibet's unique heritage. The museum's approach appears to contradict the International Council of Museums' Code of Ethics, which emphasizes accurate representation and appropriate consideration of represented groups.

Tenzin Namgyal of Students for a Free Tibet France expressed particular concern about the museum's lack of engagement with the Tibetan community, noting that "Ms. Yannick Lintz's refusal to enter into dialogue with the Tibetan people" is especially troubling given their direct connection to the artefacts in question.

The campaign has gained additional significance following a recent victory at Paris's Musée du quai Branly, which reversed its use of the term "Xizang" in favour of "Tibet" for its Tibetan artefacts after public protest.

For Tibetan political leader, 'Middle Way' to autonomy is still core focus

24 October 2024, New Delhi Times

In the lobby of an upscale hotel in Prague, Sikyong Penpa Tsering talked about death — specifically, the eventuality that China's Xi Jinping will one day die.

"Nothing is permanent. Even our life is not permanent. We are born, and we have to die. So even empires rise and fall. Governments rise and fall. Xi Jinping will also have to die. So, these are inevitable," said Tsering, leader of Tibet's exiled government, the Central Tibetan Administration.

He said it casually, matter-of-factly, as if he wasn't talking about the potential downfall of the world's second-most powerful government and the inevitable death of its powerful leader.

"China is going to change. It has to change. There is no other choice," Tsering told VOA last week on the sidelines of the Forum 2000 democracy conference in the Czech capital Prague.

Sitting on a leather chair and wearing a black Tibetan vest and a blue button-down shirt, Tsering spoke about how this fundamental Buddhist idea of impermanence gives him hope for his homeland.

Reports say abuse has increased

China annexed Tibet in 1950, and since then human rights abuses in the region have steadily grown, according to reports from the U.S. State Department and rights groups.

Beijing claims the region has been part of China since "ancient times." It views the Central Tibetan Administration, or CTA, as a separatist organization and says that no government should allow the Dalai Lama — the spiritual and one-time political leader of Tibet — to visit.

But for Tsering, under the Buddhist concept of impermanence, everything in life — even Beijing's power and repression — is transient.

Although Tsering's hope abounds, so does his pragmatism. The prospect of an improved human rights landscape and more autonomy remains far-off. It doesn't help that the CTA and Beijing barely have an open communication channel, Tsering said.

"Even if we manage to re-establish contact, there's no possibility of anything really coming out of it," Tsering said. For now, the backchannel dialogue is for the long term, not the short term, the democratically elected leader added.

But in an ideal world, where Beijing was willing to engage with the CTA, among the top priorities would be human rights in Tibet, as well as the Middle Way Approach — the Tibet administration policy that would give the region increased autonomy while remaining part of China.

Those are among the issues Tsering sought to raise with political and civil society leaders at Forum

2000, an annual gathering on democracy human rights issues founded by former Czech President Vaclav Havel.

Advocating for 'Middle Way'

Although based in India, Tsering frequently travels the world to make his case for the Tibetan people. But he feels a particular kinship with the Czech Republic and other countries in Europe that once suffered under communism.

"They have experienced what our people are going through now," Tsering said. "That makes it easier for them to understand."

Tsering has about one and a half years left in his five-year term. He said he hasn't decided whether he'll pursue a second term, but one of his priorities for the next 18 months is to advocate for the Middle Way Approach.

The Middle Way Approach accepts Tibet's status as part of China but advocates for increased autonomy, like greater freedoms for religion, language and culture. It's an attempt to balance Beijing's concerns about Tibetan separatism and Tibetans' concerns about cultural preservation.

Tsering said he doesn't really understand why Beijing appears to be so opposed to the approach, since it doesn't call for independence.

'Dying a slow death culturally'

For years, reports from news outlets and rights groups have detailed Beijing's grave rights abuses in Tibet.

Chinese authorities are particularly repressive of any signs of dissent among Tibetans in the region, with more than 5,600 political prisoners formerly or currently jailed in Tibet since 1990, according to the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy.

Expressions of Tibetan Buddhism and Tibetan cultural identity are also restricted.

"We are dying a slow death culturally, because China is squeezing us out of our breath like a python, squeezing it out, slowly but surely," Tsering said.

Authorities have repressed the use of the Tibetan language, and the United Nations estimates that around 1 million children have been forcibly separated from families and sent to state-run boarding schools to assimilate into the dominant Han-Chinese culture.

"It's very clear that the Chinese government seeks to essentially hollow out and erase Tibetans' identities," Sophie Richardson, a visiting scholar at Stanford and the former China director at Human Rights Watch, told VOA.

China's Foreign Ministry did not reply to VOA's email requesting comment for this story.

Other human rights issues include Beijing's harassment of exiled Tibetan journalists and activists in a process known as transnational repression.

"It's essentially to prevent anybody from hearing an alternative version of their story or critique of their version. The Chinese government wants everybody to believe its version of history," Richardson said.

But when it comes to transnational repression, Tsering said he isn't a target.

"They don't threaten me because they know it doesn't make sense. I won't listen. If they threaten me, I'll be much worse," Tsering said. "If they ask me not to do something, I do it more because I know it hurts them."

Tibetan Parliament Continues Europe Tibet Advocacy in Switzerland

24 October 2024, CTA

On the 21 October 2024, a delegation comprising Tibetan Parliament members Geshe Atong Rinchen Gyaltsen, Lobsang Gyatso Sither, and Tenzin Choezin held a meeting with member of Swiss National Council from Geneva, Nicolas Walder.

During the meeting, they briefed him about the critical situation inside Tibet and urged discussion of human rights in Tibet as a condition for continuing the Free Trade Agreement between Switzerland and China. They also raised concerns about difficulties faced by Tibetans in Switzerland. The delegation presented him with an appeal letter signed by the Speaker of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile.

On the same day, the parliamentary delegation held a closed-door meeting in the morning with UN Member States' Missions from a number of countries. During the meeting, the delegation shared updates on the critical situation inside Tibet and the current policies and practices of the Chinese government aimed towards the eradication of Tibetan Language, Culture and Religion in both physical and online spaces.

The delegation also took this opportunity to thank the various missions for their recent mentions and recommendation's at China's UPR and expressed our gratitude to them on behalf of the Tibetan Parliament in Exile and from Tibetans inside Tibet and all over the world.

At the same time, the delegation stressed on the importance to continue to hold China accountable and requested the members present at the meeting to continue to raise their voices for Tibet at the UN and at the same time, creating spaces for Tibet at UN side-events.

In the afternoon of the same day, the parliamentary delegation held a closed-door meeting with various Special Rapporteur Secretariats. The delegations shared updates on the situation inside Tibet based on the mandates represented during the meeting and also shared our overall concern about the critical situation inside Tibet.

The delegation also thanked the staff present for the number of reports that they have published on Tibet which puts China on the spot and highlights the critical situation inside Tibet to the world.

The delegation was accompanied by Thinlay Chukki, Representative of the Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Geneva and UN Advocacy Officer Phuntsok Topgyal.

15-Nation Joint Statement Demands China Address Human Rights Abuses in Tibet and East Turkistan

24 October 2024, CTA

James Martin Larsen, Australia's Ambassador and Permanent Representative to the United Nations, delivers a joint statement on human rights abuses in Tibet and East Turkistan. Photo source: UN Web TV

James Martin Larsen, Australia's Ambassador and Permanent Representative to the United Nations, delivered a joint statement on behalf of a coalition of 15 countries, expressing serious concern over grave human rights violations in East Turkistan and Tibet, and calling for urgent action from China. The statement was presented during the general discussion on human rights at the 79th session of the United Nations General Assembly's Third Committee. Representing Australia, alongside 14 other countries including Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Iceland, Japan, Lithuania, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States, Ambassador Larsen highlighted grave concerns based on evidence gathered by the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) and other UN bodies. These findings point to large-scale arbitrary detention, family separations, enforced disappearances, forced labor, and systemic repression of Uyghurs and other predominantly Muslim minorities in East Turkistan. The assessment, released two years ago, described these violations as potentially amounting to crimes against humanity.

The statement also underscored growing concerns over human rights abuses in Tibet. United Nations human rights mechanisms have detailed arbitrary detentions for the peaceful expression of political views, restrictions on travel, forced labor, the forced separation of children from families in boarding schools, and the erosion of cultural, educational and religious rights and freedom in Tibet.

Ambassador Larsen noted that despite repeated international calls for transparency, China has dismissed these concerns and labeled the OHCHR's assessment as "illegal and void" during its Universal Periodic Review adoption in July 2024. China has yet to undertake a comprehensive human rights review of its policies in Xinjiang, with its problematic legal framework on national security and counterterrorism remaining unchanged, according to an OHCHR statement from August 2024.

The 15 nations called on China to uphold its international human rights obligations and fully implement the recommendations from the OHCHR and other UN mechanisms. These include the immediate release of individuals arbitrarily detained in both East Turkistan and Tibet and full transparency regarding the fate of missing persons. Additionally, the countries urged China to allow independent observers, including those from the UN, unfettered access to assess the human rights situation in these regions.

Concluding the joint statement, Ambassador Larsen emphasised that while no country has a perfect human rights record, all states must be held accountable to international standards. The coalition urged collective global responsibility in protecting and promoting human rights worldwide.

The joint statement reflects ongoing international pressure on China to address allegations of human rights violations in its territories, marking a significant moment in global diplomacy at the UN.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Addresses Seminar Titled 'Charting Tibet's Future' in Delhi

22 October 2024, CTA

On the evening of 21 October 2024, Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration delivered a keynote address during a talk session titled 'Charting Tibet's Future: The Resolve Tibet Act, Strategies in Exile, His Holiness the Dalai Lama's Legacy, and India's Role.'

From left to right: Shri Ashok Kumar Mehta, who facilitated the session, Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration, Shri Om Prakash Tandon and Shri Sujeet Kumar gathered at the India International Centre Annexe.

The event was hosted by the Foundation for Non-violent Alternatives (FNVA) in Lecture Room 1 at the India International Centre Annexe.

Among the distinguished speakers were Sikyong Penpa Tsering, who provided insights into the current state of Tibetan affairs, and Om Prakash Tandon, the founding trustee of FNVA. Major General Ashok Kumar Mehta facilitated the session, ensuring a constructive exchange of ideas, while Shri Sujeet Kumar, a former Member of Lok Sabha and former convener of the All-Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet (APIPFT), also participated in the discussion. The discussion focused on the significance of the Resolve Tibet Act and its potential impact on the future of Tibet and the Tibetan exile community. Sikyong elaborated on the strategies being developed by the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) to sustain and strengthen the Tibetan freedom movement in exile.

Sikyong emphasised the importance of the Tibet Policy and Support Act, highlighting its role in advocating for the rights and autonomy of the Tibetan people. He explained how the act provides a structured approach to the U.S. policy toward Tibet, reinforcing international support for the Tibetan cause and holding the Chinese government accountable for human rights abuses in Tibet. He stated, "The act supports the central Tibetan leadership, encouraging dialogue and collaboration with global partners to further the Tibetan cause." He further articulated his vision, saying, "We aspire for a free and democratic Tibet, and we remain committed to peaceful resistance and the pursuit of justice."

Additionally, Sikyong provided a concise overview of Tibet's leadership history, emphasising the continuous leadership of successive Dalai Lamas since the 15th century. He clarified misconceptions surrounding Tibet's sovereignty post-1913, explaining that Tibet maintained self-rule after expelling Chinese forces in 1912, following the fall of the Qing dynasty. He asserted, "No foreign country has ever directly ruled Tibet. While there have been instances of external influence, Tibet has never been under direct foreign control."

Sikyong further narrated the deep historical connections between India and Tibet, highlighting India's influence on Tibetan scripts and religion. He mentioned that, according to some historical accounts, the first king of Tibet was of Indian descent. Moreover, he expressed gratitude to the Indian government and people for their support of Tibetan refugees following the flight into exile led by His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

Sikyong also addressed the geopolitical and strategic significance of the Tibetan plateau, highlighting Tibet's role as the source of major rivers, including the Yarlung Tsangpo and the Mekong, and expressed concern over China's diversion of Tibet's water resources, which affects downstream countries like India and those in Southeast Asia. He condemned China for failing to share hydrological data, leading to environmental and livelihood challenges for riparian nations.

A key highlight of the talk was the enduring legacy of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama in shaping the global movement for Tibetan freedom and the preservation of Tibetan culture and identity. Since his exile in 1959, His Holiness has been a vital figure advocating for the rights of the Tibetan people, promoting a message of compassion and non-violence. Sikyong Penpa Tsering stated, "His Holiness' teachings have not only galvanised support within Tibet but have also inspired individuals and movements worldwide to stand up for justice and human rights." He added, "His commitment to dialogue and understanding continues to resonate with the Tibetan cause."

Sikyong underlined the significance of the Tibetan Plateau, often referred to as the 'Roof of the World', the 'Third Pole', or 'Asia's Water Tower.' He noted, "The rivers originating from Tibet, such as the Yarlung Tsangpo, Machu, and Dzachu, have become the lifeline for hundreds of millions of people in Asia." He pointed out that "two of the world's oldest civilisations—the Indus Valley Civilisation and Chinese Civilisation—also rely on Tibet's rivers."

However, Sikyong expressed concerns about the ongoing mismanagement of Tibetan rivers by the Chinese Communist government, stating, "This situation poses serious threats to the environment and the livelihoods of millions downstream." He warned of severe repercussions for the future, emphasising the urgent need for sustainable practices to protect these vital water resources.

The session concluded with a Q&A segment, allowing participants to engage directly and ask questions. The event offered insights into the current political situation, the challenges faced by the Tibetan community, and the CTA's plans for safeguarding Tibet's future.

Bengaluru: Panelists urge global action for Tibetan rights amid growing pressures from China

21 October 2024, ANI

The Dalai Lama Institute for Higher Education (DLIHE) and the Department of Information and International Relations (DIIR), Central Tibetan Administration hosted a panel discussion titled 'Why Tibet Matters' at the institute's Aa-Ka-Ma auditorium.

The panelists engaged in a robust dialogue on Tibetan identity and rights, exploring the multifaceted challenges faced by the Tibetan community in the current political climate.

The event was moderated by Acharya Norbu, a lecturer in Tibetan History, and featured two panellists -- Dechen Palmo, an environmental researcher at the Tibet Policy Institute, and Dukthen Kyi, head of the Tibet Advocacy Section at DIIR.

During the discussion, Dukthen Kyi highlighted the political and cultural importance of protecting Tibetan identity amid increasing pressures from the Chinese government. She outlined the Central Tibetan Administration's efforts to advocate for Tibetan rights and called for heightened international awareness and support for the Tibetan cause, linking environmental sustainability with human rights.

The panel concluded with a call to action, urging participants to engage in advocacy for Tibet's critical issues. DLIHE's Principal, Tenzin Pasang, reinforced this message, emphasising the collective responsibility of attendees to support the Tibetan movement. The event, attended by nearly 200 students and faculty, fostered dialogue and community among those invested in the Tibetan cause.

The Tibetan issue involves political, cultural, and human rights concerns related to Tibet, a region known for its unique culture and spiritual traditions.

After China invaded Tibet in 1950, it was incorporated into the People's Republic of China, changing its governance and society. Many Tibetans, including the Dalai Lama, seek greater autonomy or independence due to worries about cultural loss, religious repression, and human rights violations.

The Chinese government insists that Tibet is part of China and promotes economic development in the region. This has led to ongoing international discussions and activism for Tibet's cultural preservation and the rights of its people, making the issue a sensitive topic in international relations.

In recent years, there have been several notable cases that highlight ongoing concerns. For instance, the Chinese government's intensified crackdown on Tibetan Buddhism, including the restriction of religious practices and the surveillance of monasteries, has drawn international attention.

The situation surrounding the Panchen Lama, a key figure in Tibetan Buddhism, is particularly poignant. Kidnapped by Chinese authorities in 1995 at the age of six, he has not been seen publicly since, raising fears about religious freedom and the future of Tibetan spirituality. (ANI)

UK Foreign Secretary raises Uyghur's rights, ignores Tibet during China visit

21 October 2024, Phayul

David Lammy and Wang Yi during the meeting on Friday in Beijing (Photo/EPA)

During his recent visit to China, UK Foreign Secretary David Lammy addressed human rights violations concerning the Uyghur population in East Turkestan (Xinjiang), but notably avoided any mention of Tibet, despite calls from rights groups to highlight the deteriorating human rights situation inside Tibet.

After Lammy's meeting with Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi on Friday, the UK Foreign Office issued a statement saying that the discussions included concerns over the mistreatment of Uyghurs in East Turkestan (Xinjiang) and the case of detained British citizen Jimmy Lai. The statement described the meeting as "constructive," noting that a range of foreign policy and security issues were discussed.

Ahead of Lammy's first official trip to Beijing, several Tibetan rights groups urged him to raise the deteriorating conditions in Tibet with his Chinese counterparts. In an open letter, the London-based Free Tibet organization stressed that Lammy's visit coincided with a "historic low" for human rights in Tibet. The letter expressed deep concern over Beijing's growing control over the region, citing the forced assimilation of Tibetan children through state-imposed education systems and the closure of Tibetan schools. The group also pointed to increasing transnational repression of Tibetan communities in exile, particularly in the UK, by Chinese authorities.

Rights groups also urged Lammy to use his first official visit to China as a foreign secretary to confront these human rights violations. They highlighted that Tibet remains largely closed to independent journalists, diplomats, and human rights monitors, limiting accountability. Citing the UK's economic and diplomatic influence as a key trading partner with China, the groups emphasised that Britain should leverage this position to pressure Beijing to release political prisoners and halt policies that endanger Tibetan culture, identity, and livelihood. However, no mention was made of Tibet.

During his visit to Beijing, Lammy also met with Ding Xuexiang, China's most senior vice-premier and a close ally of President Xi Jinping. He is also expected to travel to Shanghai for talks with British businesses to strengthen economic ties between the UK and China.

Lammy emphasised that the UK government is seeking to bring "consistency" to its relationship with China, noting that there had not been "sufficient contact" between London and Beijing under his predecessors, particularly regarding human rights. He also stressed the importance of maintaining a "pragmatic" approach to relations with China. His visit marks the second by a British foreign secretary in two years, following James Cleverly's trip in August 2023.

Tibetan advocates highlight language suppression at UN Human Rights Council event

20 October 2024, ANI

Tibetans and their supporters took the stage at a United Nations Human Rights Council side event in Geneva, bringing attention to China's suppression of the Tibetan language and recent school closures in Tibet.

The event, hosted by the Helsinki Foundation for Human Rights, was moderated by Kai Mueller from the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT).

The panel featured prominent speakers including Palmo Tenzin, a senior researcher at ICT, Tenzin Choekyi from Tibet Watch, and Gloria Montgomery from the Tibet Justice Center. The discussion was well-attended by representatives from various UN missions, highlighting the growing concern over the situation in Tibet.

Tibetan advocates highlight language suppression at UN Human Rights Council (Photo/@International Campaign for Tibet)

Tenzin Choekyi opened the event by outlining the history of Tibetan protests advocating for language rights and the severe consequences faced by those who speak out against the Chinese government. She noted that community leaders, intellectuals, and ordinary Tibetans risk detention, torture, or imprisonment for their advocacy.

During the event, Palmo Tenzin emphasised the oppressive environment that stifles open dialogue about these issues within Tibet and discussed recent educational policies detrimental to the Tibetan language and culture.

She said, "Tibetan children lose their mother tongue, are unable to communicate with relatives, and cannot access their culture and history."

Gloria Montgomery warned about the implications of China's closures of Tibetan schools, reminding attendees of the Chinese government's obligations under international law to provide education in the Tibetan language, as established by various international covenants ratified by the People's Republic of China.

In a significant move, China chose to attend the panel and respond to the testimonies rather than delegating the task to proxy organisations. However, their representatives denied the validity of the accounts presented, reflecting Beijing's longstanding dismissal of the situation in Tibet and a reluctance to engage with the testimonies provided by Tibetan advocates.

Tencho Gyatso, President of the International Campaign for Tibet, praised the advocates for clearly illustrating the harsh realities of Chinese governance in Tibet. He stated, "Instead of lying to the world, China must acknowledge that Tibetans have every right to be educated in their mother tongue and stop trying to forcibly erase Tibet's rich heritage."

The event's significance was underscored by a recent appeal from 100 Tibetan and Himalayan scholars to the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Volker Turk. In their petition, the scholars expressed deep concern over China's systematic closure of Tibetan monastic and public schools and called for an end to forced assimilation policies in Tibet.

This gathering at the UN serves as a critical moment for Tibetan advocates, who continue to call for recognition of their rights and the protection of their language and culture amid increasing repression.

Tibet and Ukraine share struggle against colonial power: former CTA President in Kyiv

19 October 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The former President of the Tibetan government in exile, Dr. Lobsang Sangay, during his visit to Kyiv, Ukraine's capital, highlighted parallels between the struggles of Tibet and Ukraine against colonialist aggressors.

Former President of the Tibetan government in exile Dr. Lobsang Sangay during his visit to Kyiv, Ukraine's capital (Photo/Instagram)

In an interview with Kyiv Post, Dr. Sangay emphasised the shared challenges faced by both nations—Tibet under China's ongoing occupation and Ukraine resisting Russia's invasion. He stressed that in both cases, the aggressors are targeting not only land but also the cultural identity and resources of these countries.

The former political leader detailed how China has systematically sought to erode traditional Tibetan culture by imposing Han Chinese cultural norms. "Tibet was invaded, and 98% of our monasteries were destroyed, but today they are being rebuilt. Tibetans continue to resist forced assimilation. Even now, speaking Tibetan or wearing traditional Tibetan dress is an act of resistance, as is visiting monasteries, which is why Tibetans continue to do so 'constantly,'" he explained.

He also acknowledged that while Ukraine is an internationally recognised state, its challenges differ from those faced by Tibet. However, he pointed out the commonality in their experiences—both Tibetans and Ukrainians are dealing with imperialism and colonial forces, such as China and Russia, that exploit their lands for natural resources.

Dr. Sangay further highlighted how, in the case of Tibet, many Western governments turn a blind eye to China's actions. He drew a parallel to Ukraine, where European countries have softened sanctions on Russian steel and refused to penalise metal magnates who supply not only Europe but also the Russian military.

He noted the economic dimensions of Russia's and China's interests in these occupied regions. "Russia's control of the Donbas led to the loss of 80% of Ukraine's coal reserves, which are essential for steel production, where Ukraine is a major producer. Similarly, China's exploitation of Tibet is economically motivated—80% of China's cotton comes from Xinjiang; 75% of its lithium is sourced from Tibet, along with 50% of its copper, gold, and uranium." Dr. Sangay emphasised that both Ukraine and Tibet have seen millions of lives disrupted and cultures threatened as imperialists seek to plunder their resources.

In closing, he conveyed a message of solidarity to the people of Ukraine, stating, "Your success would be our success. Ukraine is standing up for what is right—a battle between good and evil. It is time for the good side to win and the bad side to lose."

China should look for Mao's reincarnation instead of Dalai Lama, says CTA President

17 October 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The democratically elected leader of the exile Tibetan government, known officially as the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), President Penpa Tsering emphasised the CTA's roadmap for ensuring the succession of the 14th Dalai Lama remains free from Chinese interference while speaking on the topic 'Future of Tibet?' at the 28th Forum 2000 held in Prague, Czech Republic.

In a bold statement, President Tsering suggested that instead of focusing on the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama, China should concern itself with finding the reincarnation of Mao Zedong. His comment was a sharp critique, made in response to question about Beijing's repeated claims of having the authority to decide the next Dalai Lama.

"The reincarnation in Tibetan Buddhism is unique, where we have reincarnated Lamas, which China refers to as 'living Buddhas.' They have been preparing for the death of the Dalai Lama for the last 20 years or more. They are not concerned about the living 14th Dalai Lama but are more focused on the yet-to-come 15th Dalai Lama," said Tsering.

President Penpa Tsering during a conversation with Carl Gershman, the Founding President of National Endowment Democracy (NED), at the 28th Forum 2000 in Prague, Czech Republic (Photo/Instagram)

He highlighted that His Holiness the Dalai Lama has often commented on China's intentions, noting that if the Chinese government were genuinely serious about reincarnation, they should first study Tibetan Buddhism, which centers on the belief in life after death. "Maybe they should look for Mao Zedong's reincarnation first, Deng Xiaoping's reincarnation second, and now that Jiang Zemin is also no more, perhaps they should look into Jiang Zemin's reincarnation as well," Tsering added with pointed humour.

During the forum, the Tibetan leader also outlined the CTA's strategy to safeguard the sanctity of the Dalai Lama's reincarnation process. This roadmap involves the exile government collecting statements and resolutions from Buddhist communities worldwide as evidence of their collective stance on the issue. "The Tibetan Buddhist community will be most impacted by His Holiness' reincarnation," Tsering stated.

He further hinted at the possibility of an upcoming announcement from His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama regarding his succession plans. "Maybe next year, His Holiness will say something about his succession or reincarnation plans. He will definitely make a statement on how the process will take place. Whether it happens next year or a few years after that is for His Holiness to decide. There is only one document regarding His Holiness's reincarnation, which is the September 2011 document," Tsering said.

In the same conversation, Penpa Tsering addressed several pressing issues, including the ongoing cultural genocide in Tibet and the colonial-style boarding schools designed to assimilate Tibetan children. He also touched upon the back-channel dialogues and the Dalai Lama's unwavering commitment to democratic principles throughout his life.

The Tibetan statesman concluded the discussion with a thought-provoking question; "How are democracies empowering authoritarianism?" He criticised the way Western democracies have inadvertently fueled China's rise to power. "China has all the political and military power because of its foreign exchange reserves, which they splurge on Belt and Road Initiatives (BRI), space technology, and military while initiating debt traps around the world," he said.

"Politicians tell me that the dragon is biting at us, and I told them the dragon was once very weak. Who fed the dragon to become so strong it can bite? It is the U.S., Europe, and Japan." He argued that to challenge China effectively, focusing on its economy is key. "If you want to bring China to its knees, then the economy is the answer," he suggested, emphasising that reducing business with China could be a powerful means to challenge China's overall threat.

Documentary Film 'Never Forget Tibet' Launches in Brazil

16 October 2024, CTA

Documentary Film 'Never Forget Tibet' Launches in Brazil

On World Mental Health Day (10 October 2024), a special event was held in São Paulo, Brazil, to launch Never Forget Tibet, an officially endorsed documentary by Latin America's Office of Tibet, produced by Compassionate Films (U.K.). The film tells the incredible story of His Holiness the Dalai Lama's escape into exile, assisted by Har Mander Singh.

The documentary will be available in Brazil starting 31 October on Apple TV+, YouTube Movies, and Google Play. Already accessible in over 60 English-speaking countries, the film will be released in 120 countries over the next 12 months and is being translated into multiple languages. It is set for release in India in 2025 to honour the 90th birthday and the remarkable achievements of His Holiness.

The launch event in Brazil was a huge success, with many attendees enjoying a special exhibition at Casa Seva Gallery, showcasing photographs by Austrian explorer Heinrich Harrer, whose work is featured in the film. Harrer's photographs serve as a significant historical record of pre-invasion Tibet. The film's director, Jean-Paul Martinez, highlighted the importance of these images at the event.

In addition to the film screening, the Mystical Arts of Tibet's monks from the Drepung Loseling Monastery led a three-day Buddha of Compassion's sand mandala program and chanting sessions, creating a joyous and deeply spiritual atmosphere for all participants.

The event drew strong support from civil society and cultural influencers from various fields, including news broadcaster Patricia Poeta, singer-songwriter Thierry de Araújo Paixão da Costa, and actor João Signorelli, known for his role as Gandhi in a Brazilian T.V. show.

The documentary not only recounts the remarkable escape of His Holiness but also highlights the rich art, culture, and spirituality of Tibet. The widespread attention it received is a promising sign for keeping Tibet's globally relevant issues in the spotlight, especially following the Resolve Tibet Act passed in the U.S. by President Biden.

A key takeaway from the event was the emphasis on inspiring the next generation with hope and awareness of Tibet. As part of this effort, a special delegation in Brazil will be taking a "Peace Tree" to five schools in São Paulo, offering an interactive exhibit to share His Holiness the Dalai Lama's message of peace with young people.

The event marks an important milestone in promoting Tibetan culture and history in Latin America and beyond.

The Mystical Arts of Tibet in Colombia

At the request of Compassionate Films (U.K.) and Casa Seva (São Paulo, Brazil), the Mystical Arts of Tibet group returned to Latin America, holding a successful series of events in Bogotá, Colombia, from 4 to 17 September 2024. Accompanied by Representative Jigme Tsering, the group showcased Tibetan culture and Buddhist practices through the creation of two Sand Mandalas and three sessions of Sacred Music and Sacred Chants for Peace and Healing. These events, enriched by lectures on Tibetan Buddhist traditions, arts, and philosophy, took place at venues including Centro de Meditación Budista Yamantaka – FPMT Colombia, Biblioteca Pública Julio Mario Santo Domingo, Universidad Externado de Colombia, and Universidad El Bosque – Biblioteca.

The events were organised in collaboration with the Latin America Office of Tibet, Atlanta Loseling Center, and Centro Yamantaka, Bogotá, with coordination by Geshe Lobsang Kunchen, Isabela Caro, Claudia Bonito, Doris Julio, and volunteers. The diverse audiences were deeply engaged, appreciating the spiritual significance of the Mandalas and chants, as well as the teachings of compassion and peace at the heart of Tibetan Buddhism.

The tour fostered cultural exchange and greatly contributed to raising awareness of Tibetan traditions in Colombia, strengthening ties between the Colombian and Tibetan communities while helping to preserve and share Tibet's rich cultural heritage.

Tibetan Sikyong meets with Czech leaders, Tibet supporters

16 October 2024, Tibetan Review

Sikyong (executive head), Mr Penpa Tsering, of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) held a series of high-level meetings at the Senate and Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Czech Republic while visiting the country to attend the 28th Forum 2000 in capital Prague, said the CTA on its Tibet.net website Oct 15. Among those attending the Forum was former President Dr Tsai Ing-wen of Taiwan.

The high-level meetings followed the Forum's plenary session on the second day on Oct 14 and began in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs where the Tibetan Sikyong held discussions with Veronica Mitkova, Director of the Human Rights and Transition Policy Department, and Patrick Rumlar, Deputy Director of the Asia Department.

Mitkova has provided insights on how the Czech government had raised the issue of Tibet in multilateral forums and on international platforms. She has also offered ideas on making the 90th birthday of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, which would be a significant event in Czechia. The CTA plans to observe the exile Tibetan spiritual leader's 90th birthday with a series of year-long events next year.

Rumlar was stated to have "candidly expressed the stance of Czech parliamentarians on the Tibetan cause".

The Tibetan Sikyong has next met with Mr Pavel Fischer, a Member of the Czech Senate, at his office. The two were stated to have discussed ways to transform the deep emotional and sympathetic sentiment that the people of Czechia had towards the Tibetan people into a more rational and strategic approach.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering has also met with Mr Jiří Oberfalzer, the Vice President of the Czech Senate, welcomed by Hayato Okamura, Member of the Chamber of Deputies, to both of their offices. Known for his active participation in Tibet events, Mr Okamura has said many in Czechia were deeply sensitive to human rights issues and would stand in solidarity with the Tibetan cause.

During the meeting with Mr Okamura, Katerina, Secretary of the Friends of Tibet Support Group in the Czech Republic, has presented to the Tibetan Sikyong a booklet showcasing the initiatives the group had undertaken in collaboration with the Tibetan community in support of the Tibetan cause.

Earlier, on his arrival in the Czech capital on Oct 13, the Tibetan Sikyong has met with representatives Zuzana from the Potala Himalayan Centre and Edita Kleckerová from the Lungta, both Tibet support groups in the country. Their discussions were stated to have centred on plans for celebrations marking the 90th birthday of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, with particular focus on project implementations.

Later in the evening. The Tibetan Sikyong has met with Mr Fernando Iglesias, Chair of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Chamber of Deputies of Argentina, and Mr Claudio Javier Rozenzwaig, Ambassador of Argentina to the Czech Republic, at the 28th Forum 2000 which was held from Oct 13 to 15.

The Prague visit was the final destination of the Tibetan Sikyong's tour of Europe this month which included Switzerland, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg in that order, beginning Oct 7.

The 28th Forum 2000 opened on Oct 13 evening in the Prague Congress Centre. Tsai Ing-Wen and the Tibetan Sikyong were prominently seated in the front row, the report noted. The keynote speakers at the opening ceremony included Mr Miloš Vystrčil, President of the Senate of the Czech Republic, and Mr Walter Russell Mead, the James Clarke Chace Professor of Foreign Affairs and Humanities at Bard College and who had taught American foreign policy at Yale University and served as the editor-at-large of The American Interest magazine.

The event provided a distinguished platform for dignitaries to engage in meaningful dialogue and exchange ideas on strengthening democratic values. Forum 2000 is a foundation and conference of the same name held in Prague, Czech Republic. The foundation was founded in 1996 as a joint initiative of the then Czech President Václav Havel, Japanese philanthropist Yohei Sasakawa, and Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel.

Surveillance in Tibet: ICT delivers remarks at 6th International Religious Freedom or Belief Alliance Ministerial Conference in Berlin

15 October 2024, ICT

Kai Mueller, Executive Director of ICT Germany, addressed the 6th International Religious Freedom or Belief Alliance Ministerial Conference in Berlin last week, raising the dystopian proportions of surveillance in Tibet, particularly in Tibetan Buddhist monasteries.

The high-profile conference was hosted by the German Federal Ministry on Development Cooperation and by the German Federal Commissioner for global religious freedom or belief, Frank Schwabe, and by Ambassador at Large, Special Envoy for Holocaust Issues, Interfaith Dialogue and Freedom of Religion of the Czech Republic, Robert Rehak. German Federal Minister Schulze as well as US Ambassador at Large Rashad Hussain delivered remarks on this year's conference topic which centered on artificial intelligence and freedom of religion and belief.

Remarks[i] delivered by Kai Mueller at the International Ministerial Conference on Freedom of Religion or Belief (FoRB) and Artificial Intelligence (AI) on October 11, German Federal Ministry of Development Cooperation (BMZ)

On behalf of the International Campaign for Tibet, thank you for organizing this important conference and the opportunity to speak today on the Chinese government's extensive use of surveillance targeting the Tibetan people.

Not surprisingly, China and thankfully the situation in Tibet and also the Uyghur region have been raised already several times today.

Rightfully so. Because China is a Leninist style one-party state that pursues a policy of so called Sinicization of religion towards Tibetan Buddhists, Uyghur Muslims and Chinese Christians, and others. And I urge for caution when using the term "Sinicization", as we should not accept the rather crude ideology of the Chinese Communist Party as the equivalent to Chinese culture. Whatever the latter may be.

In this context, the Chinese government is deliberately targeting Tibetan Buddhism.

Why? Because the tenets of Tibetan Buddhism are central to Tibetan civilization.

A multitude of Chinese Communist Party (CCP) so-called regulations and laws assert official control of all aspects of Tibetan Buddhism. This includes recognition of lamas, religious venues, affiliations, personnel, schools, and religious activities.

President Xi Jinping declared that religious institutions and clergy should serve the state's "highest interests" by prioritizing the political leadership, state socialism, and CCP priorities above the religious canon. A particularly egregious violation of Tibetan Buddhists' rights is the CCP's interference in the reincarnation process of Tibetan spiritual leaders in and outside Tibet, most prominently its expected plan to disregard the 14th Dalai Lama's authority to determine his own successor.

Returning to surveillance and AI. The CCP's methods are of dystopian proportions aiming to eliminate the integrity and genuine practice of Tibetan Buddhism.

Both human and technological means are deployed. It is important to understand that Tibetan Buddhist monasteries serve as both places of faith and community, and as schools and universities transmitting Buddhist philosophy, literature, art, and Tibetan history over generations.

This is why as many as more than 6,000 government cadres operate in as many as 1,800 monasteries in the "Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR)."

This means at least three to four cadres in every monastery. The number may be higher, as these figures are from 2015.

One of the more pervasive oppressive measures are "reeducation campaigns" that force the monastic community and laypeople to profess devotion to the Chinese Communist Party.

The aim of such campaigns in Party speak is to instill the so-called "three consciousnesses" among monks and Buddhist laypeople.

Specifically, "national consciousness", "civic consciousness" and – most bizarrely for an autocratic state without separation of powers – "consciousness for the rule of law".

Monks are forced to “expose and condemn” the Dalai Lama and to “preserve the unity of the motherland”. They have to “learn the Party’s policies, be grateful for the Party’s care, and play an active role in the religious community.”

I could go on with CCP language.

At the same time, a sophisticated network of both human and electronic surveillance is used to control the monastic community.

The methods deployed are of dystopian proportions.

In a community predicated on trust and intimacy, of close bonds between teacher and student, sealed by vows, the suspicions caused by intrusive human intelligence gathering severely compromise the basis of meditative progress.

CCTV cameras are widely deployed for surveillance of the monasteries within and outside their vicinities.

These deliberately visible cameras are the most prominent tool used by law enforcement agencies to maintain surveillance of the monastic community, retain a cumulative record, and proactively crush any hint of dissent.

The presence of ever-watching cameras produces a suffocating environment for the monastic community.

Less visible means are equally pervasive. The messaging App WeChat is popular among the monastic community. As the dominant social media app in Tibet and China, it is subject to state laws on content control.

Monks face arrest for messages as simple as sharing images of the Dalai Lama or talking about the state of Tibetan language.

Facial recognition and artificial intelligence technology for surveillance is also used to classify Tibetans as a “problematic group”. Monks and nuns are subject to the same surveillance as all other Tibetans.

Digital forensic analysis of an app Tibetans are being forced to install at police checkpoints revealed it is a surveillance tool providing access to sensitive data and control over key device functionalities.

The CCP’s imposition of fear and suspicion via human and technological intelligence gathering erodes the core of the Tibetan Buddhist’s tradition of close community and trust and intimacy between teacher and student.

It constrains the way people communicate by creating a society-wide ‘chilling effect’ on the way they think, feel and relate to each other.

I would like to offer the following recommendations to governments.

- Raise electronic surveillance of Tibetan Buddhists as violations of both the right to privacy and freedom of religion.
- Recognize the CCP’s concept of “Sinicization” as a systematic assault on religion, and prioritize combatting this human rights violation.

- Understand AI as the “spider in the web” – integrating facial recognition technology, cameras, control of the internet, surveillance apps, DNA data collection, QR codes on residential buildings, and physical surveillance.
- As China is exporting such technology abroad, states should not just view these products as a threat to their own public safety, but also as an ethical question. Do we want to see the same cameras on our public spaces that we see in Tibetan monasteries? I do not believe so.

Let me end on a positive note.

In 2022, Tibetan Buddhist monk Geshe Lobsang Monlam, and a team of more than 150 editors and staff in Dharamsala, India, published the 223 volume “Grand Monlam Tibetan Dictionary,” containing over 360,000 Tibetan-language definitions. This has given rise to 37 apps and a website.

In December 2023, Dr. Lobsang Monlam launched Monlam AI, a platform providing access to four machine learning models comprising machine translation, optical character recognition, speech-to-text, and text-to-speech functionalities.

Uniquely, the software is based on 30 million pages of Tibetan literature, from the fields of religion, philosophy, and psychology.

These examples demonstrate the innovations possible when Tibetans are empowered and free to practice, explore, and evolve their religious practice and language.

Thank you.

Tibetan students face crisis as arrivals in India decline

15 October 2024, Times of India

Due to reported Chinese oppression, the arrival of new Tibetan students in India has significantly decreased, with no new entries at the Tibetan Children's Village this year. This decline underscores the CTA's need to intensify efforts in pressuring China to allow Tibetan migration for education.

The number of Tibetan students arriving in India has significantly decreased, largely due to reported Chinese oppression, with no new arrivals at the Tibetan Children Village (TCV) this year, making it imperative for the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) to exert international pressure on China to allow the movement of Tibetans into India.

“This year there is no arrival of any student from Tibet, last year around 6 students had arrived as against 700 to 800 students arriving every year before 2008,” said Tsultrim Dorjee, Director of the Tibetan Children’s Village (TCV).

“Reports received here indicate that China is forcibly taking young Tibetan children from cities and remote villages, bring them to 'colonial schools' established by the Chinese regime, in Tibet and convert them into Chinese,” alleged Dorjee.

He said a disturbing trend is emerging in which Tibetan students are being converted to Chinese by being taught the Chinese language, values, cultural practices, and traditions.

“This systematic approach aims to erase their Tibetan identity, leading them to forget their language, culture, values, and traditions. Moreover, it develops a sense of resentment towards Tibet, as the focus shifts entirely to a Chinese-centric education system” said Dorjee.

He claimed that China has established military camps to monitor the movement of Tibetans into India and has also set up posts along the Tibetan-Nepal border to prevent their entry into India.

Presently, there are just around 6000 Tibetan students in TCV and its branches undergoing kindergarten to Plus Two grade education as against the previous number of over 12000 students, added he.

“Our mission is that all Tibetan children under our care receive a sound education , a firm cultural identity and become self reliant and contributing members of the Tibetan community and the world at large” said the Director.

He also informed that they are celebrating the 64th Founding Anniversary of TCV with a theme that expresses solidarity with the children in Tibet, who are deprived of their language, culture, history, and values due to alleged Chinese political ideology.

“We are continuously raising the issue of Tibetans through the CTA and civil population to build international pressure on China, so it allow the movement of Tibetans into India. This will enable our youth to receive an education at TCV, Dharamshala, which is considered the mother of Tibetan schools in India and hosts the largest number of students,” he said.

An open letter to Foreign Secretary David Lammy

15 October 2024, Free Tibet

As David Lammy prepares for his first trip to China as Foreign Secretary, Tibet groups in the UK urge him not to sacrifice human rights for trade

Dear Foreign Secretary,

We write on behalf of UK-based Tibet groups and the thousands of Tibetan community members based in the UK ahead of your first crucial visit to China with a clear message: you must ensure human rights and Tibet remain at the top of the agenda for the UK government.

Your meeting takes place at a historic low point for human rights in Tibet as the Chinese government increases its control in Tibet and intensifies policies designed to eradicate the distinct culture, way of life, and identity of the Tibetan people. Meanwhile, increasing instances of transnational repression are being inflicted on Tibetan communities around the world including the UK. It is critical that you use your first visit to China as Foreign Secretary to raise these crucial issues directly with Beijing.

A successful China policy is one in which the UK directly challenges the Chinese government’s human rights abuses against the Tibetan people, working alongside other concerned governments to seek accountability for these abuses and challenging the Chinese government’s attempts to undermine the international human rights system. It also means striving for a just and lasting settlement of the Tibet-China conflict that upholds Tibetans’ rights, not least their legal and fundamental right to self-determination.

Although few details of your upcoming visit have been released by the government, reports about the meetings you will be holding in Beijing give us reason for concern. We are aware that the UK government plans to hold a “reset” with the Chinese government to establish friendlier ties and promote investment and job creation.

Recent history shows us that unless this reset contains an assertive call for an end to the Tibet-China conflict and immediate and verifiable human rights reform, it will achieve little of long-term value, and will ultimately lead the UK back to the failed policies of the so-called “Golden Era” of the 2010s when the human rights situation in Tibet sharply deteriorated. Decades of human rights diplomacy by foreign governments have failed to deter Chinese authorities, particularly Xi Jinping, from deepening the repression in Tibet. Instead it has been taken as an invitation to assert further control.

With Tibet remaining closed off to independent journalists, diplomats and human rights monitors, one of the only forms of leverage that exists is for China’s trading partners to press the Chinese government to release political prisoners and abandon policies that threaten the lives and livelihoods of Tibetans.

This does not mean halting negotiations on trade or global cooperation with China to address pressing global concerns, but it does mean using these meetings to speak up for Tibetans as they face multiple threats to their homeland and identity, and the UK government pairing its diplomacy with concerted pressure on Beijing to end its human rights abuses in Tibet, addressing transnational repression against Tibetans in the UK and calling a just resolution of the Tibet-China conflict.

Given your previous work and well-known interest in decolonisation and the effects of imperialism, we are sure you will appreciate the importance that the UK's interactions with the Chinese government have for Tibetans, living under occupation or in exile, and that they, along with Tibet groups, and Tibet supporters will be paying close attention to the issues you raise, and those that you do not raise, during your visit.

With these considerations in mind, we urge you to use your visit to:

- Reiterate the UK's previous call for China to follow the recommendations of UN experts to immediately abolish China's colonial and coercive boarding school system imposed on Tibetan children in Tibet. Furthermore, call for an end to the closure of Tibetan schools and for the re-opening of those that have been shut down.
- Press for the immediate release of all Tibetan human rights defenders and end persecution of their families including the community leader and anti-corruption activist A-Nya Sengdra, Tibetan monk and religious philosopher Go Sherab Gyatso, and Jampa Choepel, who was detained after publishing a post about the teachings of the Dalai Lama;
- Seek information about Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, the 11th Panchen Lama of Tibet, who has been missing since his abduction in 1995. This must include tangible proof of his whereabouts, safety, and well-being.
- Urge a moratorium on the building of megadevelopment projects including mines and hydropower dams in Tibet until Tibetans have given full prior, free, and informed consent to all development projects. Specifically raise the threat of the Kamtok Dam and other massive hydropower dam projects, which are forcing Tibetans from their homes and threatening monasteries with destruction from rising waters.
- And in addition to these human rights concerns, address Tibet's status by calling for a return to direct dialogue with the representatives of the Tibetan people, to end the Tibet-China conflict.

Upon conclusion of your visit, we also urge that you meet with Tibet groups and members of the Tibetan community.

The UK government's stated policy towards the Chinese government is to cooperate where it can, compete where it needs to, and challenge where it must. Your meetings this week offer their own challenge: should you return to the UK with promises of jobs and investment but without taking a stand for Tibet, you will have sold out Tibetans and their human rights including those who are UK citizens.

On the other hand, should you be bold, and seize the moment to speak out on Tibet and challenge China over its human rights abuses, it will show that this new Labour government can be a positive force for change and an example for other governments to follow.

Tibetan leadership congratulates Japanese atomic bomb survivors on winning Nobel Peace Prize

14 October 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The exile Tibetan leadership, including His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the President of the Tibetan government in exile, Penpa Tsering have extended their heartfelt congratulations to Nihon Hidankyo, a Japanese group of atomic bomb survivors, for being awarded the 2024 Nobel Peace Prize. The prestigious award, presented to hibakusha, known as the survivors of the 1945 Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombings has been recognised by the Norwegian Nobel Committee for efforts to eliminate nuclear weapons from the world.

Penpa Tsering, the political leader of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), congratulated the survivors, stating that their steadfast commitment to nuclear disarmament has inspired countless movements for peace around the globe. "My heartfelt congratulations to Nihon Hidankyo, this year's Nobel Peace Prize laureate. Their tireless advocacy for a nuclear-free world, shaped by the experiences of A-bomb survivors, is a profound reminder of the catastrophic threat nuclear weapons pose to humanity," he wrote. "In honouring Nihon Hidankyo with the Nobel Peace Prize, I hope this serves as a meaningful step towards a world free from nuclear weapons and united in peace."

Similarly, the foremost exile spiritual leader His Holiness the Dalai Lama sent a personal message of congratulations to the co-chairpersons of Nihon Hidankyo, Terumi Tanaka, Shigemitsu Tanaka, and Toshiyuki Mimaki, expressing his deep admiration for their resilience and courage. "During my visits to Japan, I have had the occasion to meet some of you. I deeply appreciate your work, His Holiness wrote on Saturday.

"Having visited both Hiroshima and Nagasaki myself, I have some sense of the immense suffering experienced by the victims, particularly the survivors of the nuclear bombings. I understand that because they experienced the horror of the nuclear explosions and survived, those who have founded this organisation powerfully represent the need to do away with these dangerous weapons," he further wrote.

Founded in 1956, Nihon Hidankyo has been actively sending survivors around the world to share their testimonies of the “atrocious damage” and suffering caused by nuclear weapons, according to the organisation’s website. Their mission began nearly a decade after the devastating bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

On August 6, 1945, a U.S. bomber dropped a uranium bomb over the city of Hiroshima, killing around 140,000 people. Three days later, a second nuclear weapon was dropped on Nagasaki, leading to Japan’s surrender, announced by Emperor Hirohito, which brought an end to World War II.

Speaking to reporters in Japan, a tearful Toshiyuki Mimaki, the co-head of the group, said, “Never did I dream this could happen,” he said. Mimaki also criticised the idea that nuclear weapons bring peace, stating, “It has been said that because of nuclear weapons, the world maintains peace. But nuclear weapons can be used by terrorists.”

Nihon Hidankyo has been nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize multiple times, including in 2005, when the group received special mention from the Norwegian Nobel Committee. The 2024 prize, which includes a diploma, a gold medal, and $1 million, will be presented at a ceremony in Oslo this December, marking the anniversary of the death of prize creator Alfred Nobel.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Attends the 28th Forum 2000 Alongside Former Taiwanese President Tsai Ing-Wen

14 October 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering arrived in Prague in the early hours of the morning, marking the final destination of his European tour, to participate in the 28th Forum 2000 that is scheduled from 13 to 15 October. The first day of Sikyong’s visit began with a meeting with representatives of the Tibet Support Groups: Zuzana from the Potala Himalayan Center and Edita Kleckarová from Lungta. Their discussions centred on plans for the upcoming 90th birthday celebration of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, with a particular focus on project implementation.

During the conversation, the representatives expressed concerns regarding the insufficient awareness in the Czech media regarding the current well-being of His Holiness, which led to inquiries about his health and the situation of Tibetans, particularly those in Tibet. Following this meeting, Sikyong gave an interview to Liam Scott and Jessica Jerreat of Voice of America, during which he addressed the issue of Chinese transnational repression and underscored the importance of the Tibet-Czech Republic relationship.

In the evening, Sikyong Penpa Tsering engaged in a meeting with His Excellency Fernando Iglesias, Chair of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Chamber of Deputies of Argentina, and His Excellency Claudio J. Rozencwaig, Ambassador of Argentina to the Czech Republic, at the 28th Forum 2000. His Excellency Fernando Iglesias, drawing on his extensive experience and knowledge as a journalist, demonstrated a profound understanding of Chinese history, expressing his firm support for human rights and voicing concern for those suffering oppression. Sikyong Penpa Tsering encouraged both dignitaries to explore the “Tibet Brief 2020” and Professor Lau’s book on Tibet, both of which provide compelling evidence that Tibet has never been a part of China. He urged them to critically assess these materials rather than accepting the narrative promoted by the Chinese government to the international community. The day culminated in the opening and award ceremony of the 28th Forum 2000, held at the prestigious Prague Congress Center. The event gathered an assembly of dignitaries from across the globe, with the conference focusing on the theme of democracy. Her Excellency Tsai Ing-Wen, the former President of Taiwan, and Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration were prominently seated in the front row. The keynote speakers at the opening ceremony included His Excellency Miloš Vystrčil, President of the Senate of the Czech Republic, and Walter Russell Mead. Mead emphasised the gravity of the current global situation, stating, “Not since the 1940s has democracy been under this kind of threat, and not since the 1930s has the world been this close to a major power conflict.” He highlighted the lack of responsibility and courage displayed by individuals in free countries, which has enabled the geopolitical expansionist ambitions of nations such as China and others. The speakers collectively stressed the urgent need to safeguard democracy amid escalating global challenges. The event provided a distinguished platform for dignitaries to engage in meaningful dialogue and exchange ideas on strengthening democratic values.

Tibetans in France continue protest, condemning museum’s refusal to rename exhibit as “Tibet”

14 October 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Tibetans in France protesting against the two museums in Paris on September 23, 2024 (Photo/SFT France)

Tibetans and Tibet supporters in the French capital are continuing their protests against the Musée Guimet, despite the museum's recent decision not to rename exhibitor spaces as "Tibet" rather than "Himalayan world." While the Musée du quai Branly apologised and promised, on September 25, to restore the name "Tibet" with the romanised version of a Chinese term, "Xizang" on its artefacts. For weeks, members of the Tibetan diaspora, human rights activists, and Students for a Free Tibet (SFT), a chapter-based network of youth activists, have gathered outside the Musée Guimet, demanding the recognition of Tibet as a distinct cultural and historical entity. Protesters chanted slogans such as "Tibet Exists. Name It." and "Shame on Guimet," calling on the museum to honor Tibetan heritage by renaming the exhibition halls to reflect Tibet's true identity.

Despite the peaceful demonstrations, museum officials have rejected the appeal, stating that the name change was part of a broader global framework and that Tibet continues to be mentioned within the museum's exhibits.

"Many researchers and experts in the field have also expressed their disagreement with this renaming and the invisibilisation of Tibet that it entails," said Tenzin Yangchen, President of SFT France, speaking on behalf of the Tibetan community. "Their opposition underlines the importance of maintaining historical and cultural integrity in our academic and museum institutions. That is why we cannot remain silent."

Yangchen also emphasised that the issue at the Guimet Museum is just one example of the increasing Chinese influence in France. "For decades, the Tibetan people have suffered under the oppression of the Chinese government. We cannot remain silent in the face of this injustice that now extends to our own cultural institutions." She added that the protests would continue for as long as necessary until the Guimet Museum acknowledges Tibet as a nation with its own identity, culture, and artistic heritage. The activists are also stepping up efforts to engage with local politicians and government officials to press for change.

Nicolas Tournadre, a leading expert on Tibetan languages, has also criticised the museum's reasoning, stating, "The term 'Himalaya' is a denomination that provides a cheap way of sidestepping the once powerful Tibetan state. Indeed, the northern slopes of the Himalayan range only form the southern border of Tibet, which, additionally, also has several other ranges, which reach over 7,000 meters high, crossing it from east to west. On the other hand, certain populations south of the Himalayas have adopted many elements of Tibetan culture, such as the Ladakhi [in India], the Sherpa [in Nepal], or the Sikkimese [in India]: They are often referred to as 'Bhoti,' derived from the word 'Bod' – 'Tibet' [in Tibetan]."

Fernand Meyer, a Tibetologist and former chairholder of the Science and Civilisation of the Tibetan World at the Practical School of Advanced Studies (EPHE), echoed these concerns. "Since the Musée Guimet has no problem talking about Tibetan Buddhism, it would be strange to reduce it to Himalayan Buddhism alone!" Meyer remarked. "The 'Himalayan world' is not a culturally definable entity as such. Rather, it is a zone where the cultural areas of India and Tibet meet. To reduce the latter to its southern, geographically Himalayan fringe, therefore, does not do justice to the history and extension of a specifically Tibetan culture."

The controversy gained public attention when Le Monde raised concerns that the Musée du Quai Branly had replaced "Tibet" with "Xizang Autonomous Region," and the Musée Guimet had renamed its exhibition spaces focused on Tibet as the "Himalayan world." Scholars argue that these changes align with Chinese state propaganda, which aims to rewrite and distort Tibetan history and culture, ultimately legitimising China's illegal occupation of Tibet.

In new film, Dalai Lama says inner peace is key to happiness

12 October 2024, RFA, Rabgang Tsering Phuntsok and Tenzin Dickyi

'Wisdom of Happiness' took 6 years to complete and includes never-before-seen archival footage.

"Eight billion human beings. Everybody, including our enemy, wants peace," says the Dalai Lama in a documentary that opens in Swiss cinemas on Dec. 5 and in other movie theaters around the world.

"Wisdom of Happiness" offers an intimate, meditative cinema experience where the Tibetan Buddhist spiritual leader speaks directly to the camera about what he says is the source of happiness – inner peace.

Directed by Barbara Miller and Philip Delaquis and listing Richard Gere, the American actor and Tibet advocate, as an executive producer, the 90-minute film premiered on Oct. 7 to a sold-out audience at the Zurich Film Festival.

Gere, a long-time follower of the Dalai Lama, expressed excitement at the event about the potential impact the film could have on global audiences.

"There are around 750 people here tonight with different energy, but after this film, they have the possibility to carry it back to their families, communities and the world," Gere said at the film's screening. "This is how we change the world."

Taglined "A heart-to-heart with the Dalai Lama," the film provides a personal glimpse into the Dalai Lama's reflections on peace, happiness and the potential for a peaceful 21st century, while featuring never-before-seen, newly restored archival footage of the Tibetan spiritual leader.

"We began working on this film in 2018, and it took six years to complete," Miller told Radio Free Asia. "The result is an intimate and unique documentary that captures the Dalai Lama speaking directly to viewers, creating the feeling of a personal audience."

"His Holiness advocates for greater compassion in humanity during the 21st century," she said. "It's a true blessing that we were able to create this documentary, which reflects everything His Holiness stands for."

'Not an easy century'

In the film, the 89-year-old Buddhist leader talks about balancing age-old Tibetan Buddhist traditions with contemporary values of a globalized society that is struggling with war, violence and environmental concerns.

"Our 21st century will not be an easy century," the Dalai Lama says in the film. "Lot of difficulties come. Destructive actions come from destructive emotions. So, now our world needs knowledge about our mind, about our emotions, and how to tackle these emotions."

Also present at the premiere in Zurich were Jetsun Pema, the Dalai Lama's younger sister, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, president of the Central Tibetan Administration – the Tibetan government-in-exile – the film's co-executive producer Oren Moverman and director of photography Manuel Bauer.

Speaking to RFA, Pema said, "It's a truly wonderful film in which His Holiness shares practical wisdom for navigating the challenges of this century."

"This is my second time watching it, yet every time I hear His Holiness speak, I feel both joy and sadness, and tears flow out without any control," she said. "Everyone who has seen the film has loved it, and everyone is moved by it."

Sikyong Penpa Tsering underscored the significance of the film and the relevance of the Dalai Lama's teachings amid current war and conflict around the world.

"While this film centers on His Holiness' wisdom regarding the universal pursuit of inner peace and compassion, the cause of Tibet is inherently tied to the Dalai Lama," he said. "As a result, Tibet's struggle naturally becomes part of the film, and that is why I am here at this premiere."

Though there are visible conflicts in Gaza and Ukraine, it is important to remember that there are also about 55 other wars and acts of violence occurring in the world, many of which go unnoticed, Tsering said.

"In times like these, the teachings of His Holiness the Dalai Lama on love and compassion, as presented through this film, hold immense relevance and significance," he said. "The premiere at this festival couldn't be more timely."

Archive footage

The documentary also delves into the story of the Dalai Lama's early life, including rare archival material that chronicles his journey as Tenzin Gyatso, who was chosen as the spiritual leader of Tibet at the age of 4 in 1940.

At the screening, Gere emphasized the unique presence of the Tibetan spiritual leader, saying, "He has a childlike quality, is completely unpretentious, and you feel a bubble of joy around him."

"At the same time, he is probably the greatest scholar of his generation," he said. "It's an incredible mix of purity, joy and profound wisdom."

Pema also addressed the audience at the premiere, reflecting on the special connection between Tibet and Switzerland.

"Switzerland was the first country to open its doors to Tibetan refugees after China occupied our homeland," she said. "Like Tibet, Switzerland is a mountainous country, and it's always a pleasure to be here."

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Advocates for Tibetan Rights During Official Visit to the Netherlands

11 October 2024, CTA

On the morning of 9 October 2024, Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration landed at the Schiphol Airport in Hague to kick off his official engagements in the Netherlands.

Sikyong commenced his day with a productive interaction with members of the Foreign Affairs Committee at the Dutch Parliament Building. The meeting was graced by the presence of His Excellency Jesse Klaver, the Chairman of the committee, along with other members.

Following this meeting, Sikyong called on His Excellency Wim Geerts, the Dutch Ambassador for Human Rights, who has previously expressed serious concerns regarding the violent arrest of Tibetans in Derge and advocated for their release.

Later that day, at the Hague Centre for Strategic Studies, Sikyong engaged in a thought-provoking discussion with the centre's Political Director, Han ten Broek and Senior Project Manager, Berend Kwak. Ten young scholars of the centre also participated in the meeting, during which the gathering discoursed the global significance of the Tibetan plateau, particularly its vital water resources and their implications for riparian communities, as well as the prospects for Sino-India and India-Tibet relations.

Before heading towards Luxembourg for his scheduled programmes, Sikyong concluded the engagements in Hague with an informal meeting with coalitions of key NGOs, including representatives of Uyghur, Southern Mongolia, Hong Kong, International Campaign for Tibet, Student's for Free Tibet, and the members of the Tibetan community. This meeting underscored a shared commitment to Human Rights and humanitarian cooperation.

Throughout these formal interactions, Sikyong was accompanied by Representative Rigzin Choedon Genkhang of the Bureau du Tibet, Brussels.

Tibetan nuns touring the U.S. spending six days in Lincoln County performing ceremonies, creating mandala

09 October 2024, Yachats News

Jangchub Choeling Tibetan nuns will spend 4-5 days creating an Avalokiteshvara Sand mandala in the auditorium of the Lincoln City Cultural Center beginning next week.

The first United States tour by a group of Tibetan nuns is in Lincoln City for a week of Tibetan cultural events, workshops, talks and ceremonies from through Tuesday, Oct. 15.

The highlight of the visit by the Jangchub Choeling Tibetan nuns is the creation of the Avalokiteshvara Sand Mandala in the Lincoln City Cultural Center's auditorium. It will take four to five days to complete, and is a colorful and meticulously hand-created piece of sacred Tibetan art representing Avalokiteshvara, (Chenrezig in Tibetan) the Bodhisattva (or "Great Being") of Compassion.

The Dalai Lama himself is said to be the reincarnation of Chenrezig. The completed mandala will be a symbolic depiction of a celestial palace, filled with sacred symbols from Tibetan culture, including animals, trees, geometric designs and a portrait of Avalokiteshvara.

Unlike some other forms of "sand painting," the Tibetan sand mandalas are brocade-like designs that give the final design a three-dimensional quality. To draw the designs, the nuns use narrow metal funnels identical to the ancient tools used in Tibet for 1,000 years. The funnels are then vibrated by the nuns using a special metal rod, so that the fine lines of colored sand can be carefully "painted" into the mandala.

The week of events begins on the evening of Thursday, Oct. 10 with an opening "purification ceremony." Then, from Friday through Tuesday, the nuns will be working throughout the day on the sand mandala. The public is invited to come and observe this meditative process of the mandala's creation throughout the visit.

While the nuns are here, they will also be offering a number of other Tibetan cultural events, including a Tibetan Cultural Night on Saturday, Oct. 12, which features the sacred Dakini Dance, a ritual dance that until recently was only performed by Tibetan monks. Also on the cultural night program is the "Chod Ceremony" for removing of inner and outer obstacles featuring classic Tibetan Buddhist chanting and ceremony, followed by a question and answer and slideshow with the nuns about their history and life in Tibet, their perilous journey across the Himalayas to exile in India after the Chinese invasion in 1959, and the recent creation of an order of Tibetan nuns and "Geshemas," or senior teachers, alongside the large Tibetan monasteries of Tibetan monks.

Other events during the week include: the "White Tara Empowerment Ceremony" on Friday, Oct. 11, a meditation workshop on Saturday morning and, on Sunday, Oct. 13, a talk on "Who is Green Tara?," another important figure in Tibetan Buddhism.

On the final evening of their visit Tuesday, Oct. 15, the nuns will conduct the dissolution ceremony for the finished sand mandala, during which the completed mandala is ritually swept up and carried to the ocean. This ritual symbolizes the impermanence of all created things, a fundamental teaching of Tibetan Buddhism.

All events are open and by suggested donation. Funds raised during the visit will be used for the medical care and medical facilities for the nuns at Jangchub Choeling Nunnery in the Tibetan Refugee Zone in Mundgod, India.

The U.S. tour is part of a year-long visit that has brought the nuns to Boston, Minneapolis, Chicago and New York City. The tour group includes four Tibetan nuns, one of whom is a Geshema, the highest degree awarded in the Tibetan monastic universities. Thanks to the efforts of Tibetan women who aspired to become nuns and to the efforts of the Dalai Lama, the order of Tibetan nuns was re-established in the 1980s, with Geshema degrees awarded to nuns only in the past decade. However, there is still a lack of facilities, as well as qualified female teachers among the nuns, and thus the nunneries work in close cooperation and support from the various Tibetan monasteries and colleges in exile in India.

Tibet Museum Showcases Travelling Exhibition Alongside DIIR's Tibet Awareness Talks

08 October 2024, CTA

The Tibet Museum of the Department of Information and International Relations (DIIR), Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), has successfully concluded its two-week travelling exhibition titled "India and Tibet: Ancient Ties and Current Bonds" at various universities and colleges in Varanasi and Gujarat. The exhibition aimed to raise awareness about India and Tibet's historical and current relations through a visually engaging pictographic panel-based exhibition.

A group picture with dignitaries from Mahatma Gandhi Kashi Vidyapith University

The first round of the museum's travelling exhibition was showcased at the Central Institute of Higher Tibetan Studies (CIHTS), Varanasi, from 23 to 25 September 2024. The exhibition was inaugurated and graced by the Vice Chancellor, Professor Wangchuk Dorje Negi, and the Registrar, Dr Sunita Chandra.

Thereafter, the exhibition was witnessed by faculty members, staff, students of the institute, and a group of Ladakh students from the Central Institute for Buddhist Studies who visited CIHTS for an education tour.

On 26 September 2024, an exhibition at Mahatma Gandhi Kashi Vidyapith (MGKVP), Varanasi, was inaugurated and led by Shri Santosh Sharma, Finance Officer and Shri Harishchand, Deputy Registrar. In a traditional gesture of goodwill, the Tibet Museum staff presented a Khatag (white scarf) to both dignitaries. Dr Sunil Vishwakarma, Head of the Department of Fine Arts, attended the opening ceremony, as well as faculty members and students from various departments of the university. The exhibition offered an opportunity for academic engagement with Tibet's rich cultural heritage and its ties to India.

From 29 September to 1 October 2024, the Tibet Museum conducted a panel-based exhibition and workshop at The Maharaja Sayajirao University of Baroda, Gujarat. The exhibition was attended by Tibetan students accompanied by key members of the Regional Tibetan Youth Congress (RTYC) and Tibetan Student's Association (TSA), including Tsultrim Nyima, President of RTYC, Nyima Tsering, Vice President, and Dechen Zangmo, General Secretary. The exhibition aimed to foster a deeper understanding of Tibet's historical and cultural connections with India.

On 1 October, the exhibition was showcased at the main campus of Maharaja Sayajirao University (MSU) in Baroda. The event was attended by Kalpana, Dean of the university, Professor Sushmita Sen and students from various faculties. The exhibition provided a platform for students and faculty to explore the enduring ties between India and Tibet, creating an environment of cultural and academic exchange.

On 4 September 2024, Dr Geetika Patel, Vice President of Parul University; Dr Rajendra Parekh, Dean of the Faculty of Law; Dr Ketan Desai, Associate Professor in the Faculty of Law; and Dr Ruchi Tiwari inaugurated an exhibition at Parul University in Vadodara, Gujarat. The event attracted considerable interest, with participation from students and faculty members of the Departments of Law and Political Science. This exhibition facilitated valuable interactions between the Tibet Museum staff and the university community.

The exhibition successfully captured the attention of students and faculty and received positive feedback from visitors. Museum staff had the opportunity to engage with a diverse audience, guiding them through the various pictorial panels and fostering a deeper understanding of the long-standing ties between India and Tibet.

-Report filed by The Tibet Museum, DIIR, CTA

Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang Meets with the US Embassy Staff

08 October 2024, CTA

Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile met with staff from the US Embassy of Delhi, including James Plasman, First Secretary; Mike Cramer, Political Officer; and Ajay Dayal, Political Specialist on 8 October 2024. They were joined by Dhondup Gyalpo, Secretary of the Delhi-based Tibet Bureau, and Tenzin Paljor, protocol officer from the DIIR.

The US Embassy staff were welcomed with Khatak, traditional Tibetan ceremonial scarves, and taken on a guided tour of the parliament hall.

During the visit, the Deputy Speaker provided an overview of the evolution of Tibetan democracy, highlighting key milestones such as His Holiness the Dalai Lama's vision for a democratic system for Tibet, the establishment of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile with 13 elected representatives in 1960, the inclusion of women's representation in 1964, the adoption of the Charter of Tibetans in Exile in 1991, and the devolution of His Holiness's political authority to elected leaders in 2011.

Additionally, the U.S. Embassy staff were briefed on the composition and undertaking of the Tibetan Parliament, including its key functions such as biannual sessions, visitation programs, and advocacy initiatives, among others.

The Deputy Speaker subsequently expressed her heartfelt gratitude to the U.S. government, Congress, and citizens for their unwavering support of the just cause of Tibet. She clarified that the One China policy has no justification regarding Tibet, as it lacks historical backing. She emphasised that the international community should not yield to China's dictates.

Speaking about the systematic targeting of Tibet's religion and language by the Chinese government through policies aimed at Sinicisation, the Deputy Speaker highlighted China's coercion of Tibetan children into colonial boarding schools and the promotion of marriages between Tibetans and Hans, among other measures that undermine Tibetan identity.

During the meeting, the Deputy Speaker emphasised the significance of the Tibetan Plateau and the rivers flowing from Tibet for the global climate, particularly focusing on China's claim to hegemony over Tibet's water resources and the serious impact this has on downstream South Asian countries.

-Report filed by Tibetan Parliamentary Secretariat

Tibetans urge NYC to add Losar to 'Alternate Side Parking suspension calendar

08 October 2024, Phayul

Tibetan and Himalayan residents of New York City on September 28 testified before the City Council, advocating for an Alternate Side Parking (ASP) holiday to recognise Losar, the Tibetan Buddhist New Year. Around 25 representatives from various organisations, including the Tibetan Community of New York and New Jersey, the United Sherpa Association, Lo Nyamship Association, and the Walung Community of North America, delivered testimonies during the public hearing.

The legislation, Intro 100, introduced by Council Member Julie Won (D-Queens) and supported by 25 co-sponsors, seeks to recognise Losar, the Tibetan Buddhist New Year, as an official holiday where 'Alternate Side Parking' (ASP) rules are suspended in New York City. The bill aims to add Losar to the city's list of holidays that already include exemptions for specific legal and religious observances important to various ethnic and religious communities.

ASP is a system that requires vehicles to be moved from designated streets to allow for routine street cleaning. While essential for maintaining city cleanliness, these parking restrictions can impose challenges for residents observing cultural or religious holidays. The City of New York currently suspends ASP rules on select holidays, such as Yom Kippur, Eid, and Diwali, to accommodate the religious practices of diverse communities.

Representatives from around 25 Tibetan and Himalayan organisations on the day of hearing (Photo/Nick Gulotta)

Tenzin Dorjee, a lecturer in political science at Columbia University and a well-known Tibet activist, delivered testimony supporting the proposed legislation to add Losar to New York City's ASP suspension calendar. Speaking before the City Council, Dorjee highlighted the significance of Losar for nearly 100,000 people in New York, including Tibetans, Mongolians, Nepalese, Ladakhis, Sherpas, Monpas, Kalmyks, and other Buddhist communities. He stressed that instead of focusing on prayers and festivities, community members are often forced to worry about moving their cars during the celebrations.

"Many members of our community are essential workers who have kept the city going through its toughest times, including the pandemic, on so many levels," Dorjee said. "The least we can do is offer them the peace of mind to celebrate Losar without interrupting their prayers, without having to leave a family gathering just to move their cars, and without spending half an hour searching for parking."

Dorjee emphasised that the bill represents more than just a parking holiday—it is a gesture of respect and inclusion for a community that contributes to the city's rich cultural diversity. "By declaring Losar a street cleaning holiday we are acknowledging the contribution of a diverse community that has given so much to the City," he concluded.

If passed, Intro. 100, would be one of the most significant municipal laws recognising the Tibetan-American community and their civic participation in the United States.

Council Member Won, whose office includes a sizeable Tibetan and Himalayan population, including Bhutanese, Sherpas, Lowas, Sikkimese, Monpas, and more emphasised that the legislation will bring recognition to her Himalayan constituents. "Losar is the most important holiday for my Tibetan and Himalayan neighbours across the city. Intro. 100 will ensure that they can enjoy their celebrations without the disruption of moving their cars or worrying about being towed," said Council Member Julie Won. "Suspending Alternate Side Parking on Losar is another way that we can honour our neighbours' religious practices and time with their families."

Exile administration issues guidelines for Tibet or China visits by Tibetans

08 October 2024, Tibetan Review

The Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) of the exile Tibetans has on Oct 7 announced guidelines requiring any exile Tibetan who wishes to visit Tibet or China to intimate its Security Department beforehand.

The general guidelines announced online notes that after Tibetans got separated between those remaining in Tibet and the others who escaped into exile, visits to each other and for other purposes became possible after 1979. However, the Chinese government has been using the opening up to infiltrate the Tibetan community in exile, which it has viewed as separatists and anti-China enemy forces, or their tools.

The announcement accuses China of having continued to carry out various kinds of devious plans with objectives to weaken the exile Tibetan setup and to create dissention and internal conflicts. In this milieu, there has been a sharp increase in recent times of the Chinese government enticing Tibetans living in India, Nepal and Bhutan as well as other foreign countries to visit Tibet for all sorts of purposes, including tourism, family visits, pilgrimage and so forth while at the same time engaging in transnational repression of Tibetans living abroad. These developments have seen a marked increase in numbers and prominence in recent times, which makes it necessary to urge everyone to take note of certain points for consideration and caution, the seven-point announcement said.

The announcement then begins by asking all senior leaders and officials at all levels of the CTA, whether current or former, not to undertake any visit to Tibet without taking into confidence its Department of Security.

The CTA has no objection to any private exile Tibetan undertaking visits to Tibet. However, they should intimate their travel plans to their concerned Settlement Representative or Welfare Officer, as the case may be, or, otherwise, the Department of Security itself.

The announcement notes that the Chinese government imposes all sorts of conditions on exile Tibetans while granting them permits; that under it, a few had set up Tibetan or Tibet-related organizations in a variety of names to organize visits to Tibet in the name of pilgrimage, tourism, scholarly visits and so forth. However, it says, these are devious programs designed to carry out political objectives, and it is important that visitors do not get snared in them, such as by becoming their members.

In the case of those who have visited Tibet and had been deceived into falling under the influence of the Chinese government, and have absolutely abandoned the fundamental Tibetan cause, anyone who publicize the Chinese propaganda and acts against the interest of the Tibetan people after their return should be considered as an opponent of the CTA. It is important that all Tibetans counter their propaganda efforts and expose them, wherever and whenever they may be, the announcement said.

The announcement also expresses concern that the Chinese government deceives Tibetans who visit Tibet by compelling them with use of monetary or material enticements, pressure tactics, threats, dire warnings, and so forth to enter into partnerships or co-operations, continuations of relationships, and so forth. It asks such people not to allow themselves to become victims of such machinations, but remain steadfast in their stand. Tibetans should make efforts to obtain guidance from concerned entities before their trip to Tibet. In order to pre-empt any chance of falling victim to such traps, Tibetans living abroad should obtain the telephone and other contact details of their host countries' embassies in China, the announcement said.

Anyone who had mistakenly accepted Chinese government's conditions due to the latter's deception are asked to understand that once they return from their trip, they are free from the harassment and pressures of the Chinese government. They should therefore submit a timely report of the difficulties they had faced to the CTA's Department of Security and thereby make efforts to free themselves from the Chinese government pressure. Any such people who ignore such situation or who continue their clandestine contacts can find themselves in any sort of legal trouble with their host countries, the announcement warned.

The announcement notes that these days, the government of China carries out transnational repression of exile Tibetans by trying to compel them to refrain from engaging in activities for promoting the fundamental and political causes of Tibet and, instead, co-operate with it and facilitate its repressive activities. Calling such practices a violation of international law, the announcement says that in the best-case scenario, anyone who come under such pressure should publicize it before the media with proof thereof. Otherwise, such targeted persons should report the same with all the relevant details to their concerned host governments, or CTA Representative offices, or Settlement Heads, or the Department of Security, as the case may be.

DIIR Tibet Awareness Talk Reaches Thousands Across Indian Universities and Colleges

07 October 2024, CTA

The Department of Information and International Relations has successfully concluded a two-week Tibet Awareness Talk series and Tibet Museum Exhibition across universities and colleges in Varanasi and Gujarat. The campaign, aimed at educating students and faculty about Tibet's perennial relationship with India and the critical current situation inside Tibet under the repressive rule and policies of Chinese government, reached a total of 1,348 participants in 13 universities.

During the talks, speakers Tenzin Kunkhen and Rinchen presented a detailed analysis of Tibet's current human rights challenges. They emphasised Tibet's global significance and urged Indian students to address these issues in their academic work. The speakers encouraged attendees to publish articles in journals to maintain awareness of Tibet's situation, highlighting the importance of ongoing dialogue and scholarly attention to the region's concerns.

Tibet Awareness Talk in Varanasi

The Tibet Talk kicked off with its first leg in Varanasi on 23 September and 24 September, making significant inroads at three key institutions. At the Central Institute of Higher Tibetan Studies, the talks engaged 250 students and faculty members, while at Malviya Shiksha Niketan Inter College, 100 participants attended the sessions. The campaign also reached out to 20 Tibetan students at the prestigious Banaras Hindu University, ensuring a diverse audience.

Gujarat Tour

In a notable collaboration, the Bharat Tibet Sangh (BTS) led by Shri Bhavesh Joshi, Gujarat BTS State President and the vibrant and affectionate BTS team, in Gujarat played a crucial role in facilitating the DIIR's Tibet Advocacy Section staff's outreach efforts throughout the state, particularly in the cities of Rajkot and Junagadh. Members of the Bharat Tibet Sangh not only assisted in arranging the talks but also provided transportation and accommodation facilities in the state and accompanied the DIIR staff during their presentations at various universities, strengthening the impact of the awareness campaign. This partnership highlights the growing network of support for Tibetan issues in India and underscores the effectiveness of local organisations in promoting cross-cultural understanding and dialogue.

Vadodara:

- The Maharaja Sayajirao University of Baroda (MSU) (30 September): 20 Tibetan students during the Middle Way Policy Outreach program.
- Parul University (1 October ): 65 Indian students and faculty

Rajkot (3 October):

- SMT Kansagara College: 235 female students and 27 others
- VVP Engineering College: 250 professors, technical and academic staff, and non-academic staff
- Saurashtra University: 65 students and faculty

Junagadh (4 October):

- Commerce and Law College: 120 female students and 22 faculty members
- Bhakt Narsinh Mehta University: 158 students and 20 faculty members
- Junagadh Agriculture University: Meeting with the Vice Chancellor

Media Coverage and Wider Impact

The Tibet Awareness Talk series in Rajkot and Junagadh, Gujarat, garnered significant attention from prominent Gujarati newspapers, substantially amplifying the campaign's reach. Leading publications such as Akila News and Gujarat Samachar provided extensive coverage of the events, bringing the Tibet issue to the forefront of public discourse in the region. These newspapers, known for their wide readership and influence, played a crucial role in disseminating information about the talks to a vast audience across Gujarat. A local newspaper also covered and published the Tibet Awareness talk and the Tibet Museum Exhibition in Varanasi, not only to highlight the key messages of the campaign but also to spark interest in Tibet's cultural heritage and current challenges.

Given the popularity and extensive circulation of these newspapers, it is estimated that the media coverage exponentially increased the number of people exposed to the Tibet awareness message, far beyond the direct participants in the university talks. This media amplification has been instrumental in fostering a more informed and engaged public discourse on Tibet-related issues.

Enthusiastic Response and Engagement

The Tibet Awareness Talk series across universities in Varanasi and Gujarat met with an overwhelmingly positive response, underscoring the campaign's success in effectively conveying its message. Throughout the sessions, Indian students and faculty members displayed remarkable enthusiasm, engaging speakers with thought-provoking questions that reflected a deep interest in Tibet's culture, history, and the deteriorating current situation. The talks sparked lively discussions, with attendees expressing curiosity about various aspects of India-Tibet Relations and the gravity of the challenges faced by the Tibetan people inside Tibet. Many participants offered supportive messages and pledged to further educate themselves and others about Tibet-related issues. The enthusiastic reception, consistent across all visited institutions, from Central Institute for Higher Tibetan Studies to Gujarat's Saurashtra University, clearly demonstrates the talks' efficacy in raising awareness and fostering a sense of solidarity among Indian students and academics. The speakers noted that this widespread engagement and support significantly exceeded their expectations, reinforcing the importance and timeliness of the awareness campaign.

-Filed by the UN, EU and the Human Rights Desk, Tibet Advocacy Section, DIIR

Open Letter to the co-founder of Rubin Museum of Art

06 October 2024, Phayul

Dear Shelly,

When you graciously stopped by the MET Museum yesterday and congratulated me with a warm hug for my newest installation, I felt like I had made two very special people in my life proud and happy – you and Donald Rubin. Your visit brought immense warmth and joy, and I found myself reflecting on the long and wonderful journey we've shared over the years.

As we spoke at length, my mind began to wander like a wind-horse galloping through memory lanes. I recalled many cherished moments from my earliest involvement with Donald Rubin and the Rubin Museum family. Each memory, still vivid, brings surges of joy to my heart.

It feels like yesterday when I was first introduced to you and Donald by Tim McHenry at the 2007 opening of "The Missing Peace: Artists Consider the 14th Dalai Lama" at the Rubin Museum of Art. This ground-breaking group exhibition brought together 80 artists from around the world to celebrate the Dalai Lama as a symbol of peace. Notable participating artists included Lobsang Gyatso, Chuck Close, Bill Viola, Anish Kapoor, Laura Anderson, Marina Abramovic, Christo, and many others. If I am not mistaken, I was the youngest artist in the group. I felt humbled, cared and loved by all the senior artists that I met during the exhibition.

Despite initial backlash from the Chinese consulate, the exhibition received widespread acclaim from the public and critics. I was just 25 years old at the time and the warmth of your handshake and Donald's radiant smile left an indelible mark on my memory.

I also remember very fondly the time Fabio and I visited Donald at his office. As we were about to sit down, Donald stepped inside the room with both his arms raised and, in his signature lively voice, said, "I love art! I love art! Show me some good art!" Everyone in the room burst into laughter. That moment captured his infectious enthusiasm for life and art, which left a lasting impression on me. On another occasion, when I was about to leave after a meeting with a curator at the Rubin Museum to discuss an upcoming exhibition titled "Kora" at the Queens Museum of Art, Donald called me over saying, "Rigdol, I want to show a wonderful artwork by a young Tibetan artist." He led me to his office and pointed to a painting. I admired it and said, "This is a very good painting, it feels like the work of a master." I then added with a smile, "By the way, it's one of mine, from my pastel series." Donald was momentarily taken aback and then burst into laughter, saying, "Are you sure, you made this?" That day, I saw how genuinely he connected with art, letting it speak to his heart before anything else. The exhibition which opened at the Queen's museums and travelled to more than four other museums became one of the most significant and widely travelled exhibitions of contemporary Tibetan art representing artists from Tibet and the global diaspora.

One of my fondest memories dates back to 2010, during the "Tradition Transformed" exhibition. The Trace Foundation and Rubin Museum of Art co-organized a panel discussion, bringing together art critics, scholars, and participating artists. However, the discussions unexpectedly centred around a single review by New York Times art critic Ken Johnson. His critique was somewhat harsh, particularly towards two senior contemporary Tibetan artists. As the audience passionately defended the artists and exhibition, the atmosphere grew tense. Then, Donald, seated in the front row, raised his hand and calmly said, with a gentle smile, "Andy Warhol used to say he didn't read reviews; he measures it with a tape." The room erupted in laughter, and the tension dissipated instantly. Turning to us, the Tibetan artists, Donald continued, "All you need to do is create exceptional art. Focus on your work, and we'll always support you."

Through all this, I feel profound gratitude for the opportunities you, Donald, and the Rubin Museum of Art have provided me and numerous fellow artists, especially marginalized Tibetan artists.

The Rubin Museum has been and remains an integral part of my journey and that of countless artists. It is a nurturing home and platform for Tibetan, Nepalese, Mongolian, and Bhutanese art, artists, historians, and scholars.

Finally, I would like to extend my warmest congratulations and heartfelt prayers for the bold new direction the Rubin Museum is embarking upon. May the spirit and love of Donald, you, and the Rubin Museum of Art resonate across all mountains and plains.

With warm regards

Tenzing Rigdol

12 Years After Dalai Lama's Previous Visit, MPs from Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile Coming to Kashmir

05 October 2024, Kashmir Life

In a significant development for Tibetan communities across Jammu and Kashmir, the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile announced a delegation's forthcoming visit to Srinagar, Kargil, and various regions of Ladakh. The delegation, comprising parliamentarians Geshe Lharampa Gowo Lobang Phende and Phurpa Dorjee Gyaldhong, will embark on this extensive tour from October 7 to October 21, 2024, reports appearing in media suggest.

This visit holds profound historical and cultural importance, rekindling memories of the Dalai Lama's 2012 maiden visit to Srinagar, during which he met the Tibetan refugee community and local leaders, emphasising interfaith harmony and compassion.

The delegation's itinerary includes a series of meetings across Ladakh's key areas such as Leh, Zaskar, Nubra, Dhurduk, and the Tibetan settlements of Jangthang Nubma, Kakshung, Goeyul, Hanley, Makyu, Chumur, Sumdoo, and Samedh. They are expected to engage with the Tibetan communities to address issues of welfare, education, and preservation of Tibetan cultural identity amid evolving geopolitical scenarios in the region.

Their visit will begin in Srinagar, where they will spend two days meeting with local Tibetan refugees, a reminder of the deep historical ties between Kashmir and Tibet that stretch back centuries.

The two-day engagement in Srinagar revives memories of the Dalai Lama's visit in July 2012, when he met with both Tibetan and Kashmiri leaders. At the time, he was welcomed by the then-Chief Minister Omar Abdullah, who conveyed his government's support for the Tibetan refugees.

During his 2012 visit, the Dalai Lama's interactions with the Tibetan Muslim community in Srinagar stood as a powerful symbol of interfaith harmony. Tibetan Muslims, a small but historically significant community in Kashmir, have their roots dating back to the 8th century CE, when Muslim traders began settling in Tibet. By the time of the fifth Dalai Lama, Tibetan Muslims had become an integral part of Tibetan society, granted special rights and recognition. The Dalai Lama's 2012 visit was the first to Kashmir after his retirement from active politics, focusing on meeting these Tibetan refugees who fled Tibet in 1959 following the Chinese occupation.

His Holiness had expressed deep admiration for the Tibetan Muslim community's resilience, recalling the rich cultural exchange between Tibet and Kashmir over the centuries. The community's history was shaped by centuries of trade and migration, with many Kashmiris settling in Tibet, intermarrying with Tibetan women, and becoming part of the Tibetan cultural fabric. These Tibetan Muslims were later repatriated to India after the Chinese occupation of Tibet, where they found refuge in Kashmir.

The current delegation's visit, echoing these shared histories, will undoubtedly focus on sustaining this cultural and religious harmony. After leaving Srinagar, the MPs will travel to Leh on October 11, where they will meet with Tibetan and Ladakhi Buddhist leaders. The Leh meetings are anticipated to include discussions on preserving Tibetan heritage and bolstering education initiatives within Tibetan settlements in Ladakh, especially those affected by the Sino-Indian tensions and recent border challenges.

Following their engagements in Leh, the delegation will travel across Ladakh, meeting Tibetan communities in remote areas like Zaskar and Nubra. On October 14, they are set to visit settlements in Jangthang Nubma, Kakshung, and Goeyul, with further visits scheduled to Hanley, Makyu, Chumur, and Sumdoo between October 16 and 18. These settlements are crucial to the Tibetan community's socio-economic stability, and the delegation is expected to discuss local education, healthcare, and cultural preservation measures.

Reflecting on the Dalai Lama's 2012 address to the Tibetan Public School in Srinagar, where he praised the school's efforts to promote interfaith harmony, the Tibetan parliamentarians are likely to emphasise the need for continued support for Tibetan educational institutions. The Dalai Lama, during his 2012 visit, had stressed the importance of education as the foundation of inner peace and happiness, calling for a balance between material development and moral values in the curriculum.

The delegation will conclude their tour on 21 October in Leh before returning to Dharamshala, where they will present a report to the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile on their observations and recommendations for the Tibetan communities in Jammu, Kashmir, and Ladakh.

Chamgon Kenting Tai Situpa Rinpoche Visits Tenzingang Tibetan Settlement, Confers Teachings to Tibetan and Local Residents

05 October 2024, CTA

Chamgon Kenting Tai Situpa Rinpoche Visits Tenzingang Tibetan Settlement, Confers Teachings to Tibetan and Local Residents

The 12th Chamgon Kenting Tai Situpa Rinpoche made a visit to Gyuto Monastery in Tenzingang Tibetan Settlement, Arunachal Pradesh, from 30 September to 2 October 2024. This visit was graciously facilitated by the Chief Minister of Arunachal Pradesh, Shri Pema Khandu, who invited Rinpoche to the Mon Tawang area.

The Gyuto Monastery and the Tenzingang Tibetan Settlement Office jointly extended an invitation to Tai Situ Rinpoche, who kindly accepted the request. On the evening of 30 September, the residents of Tenzingang, along with devotees from nearby villages—Domkho, Kamalangchen, Kalaktang, and Shergaon—extended a warm and grand welcome reception for Rinpoche.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

On 1 October, Rinpoche delivered a dharma talk focusing on "Refugee Practice & Mind Generation," as requested by the Tibetan Settlement Office. Rinpoche also conducted a long-life enthronement initiation for the attendees, including devotees, the public, and students at Tenzingang Gyuto Monastery, honouring the revered mother queen of the Siddha, Machi Drupi Gyalmo (Tsewang).

During the teaching, the Tibetan Settlement Officer delivered a welcome speech and presented brief introduction of the Tenzingang Tibetan Settlement, followed by a presentation of colourful cultural programme from the student of local Sambhota Tibetan School and settlers.

On 2 October, Tai Situ Rinpoche visited the Tibetan Settlement Office, Sambhota Tibetan School in Tenzingang, and K.S Memorial Clinic before departing for Guwahati, Assam.

The government of Arunachal Pradesh has declared Tai Situ Rinpoche as State guest during his visit to Arunachal Pradesh and received all the protocol and accommodations from the State government.

-Report filed by Tibetan Settlement Office, Tenzingang

Dalai Lama to visit Ladakh next summer

04 October 2024, Phayul

His Holiness the Dalai Lama has agreed to visit Ladakh next summer, following a meeting with religious and community leaders from the region at his residence here on Friday .

The delegation included prominent figures such as Thiksey Rinpoche, Tsering Dorje, President of the Ladakh Buddhist Association (LBA), Tsering Angdus, President of the Ladakh Gonpa Association and Jigmet Rabtan, President of the Ladakh Youth Association. According to Thiksey Rinpoche, His Holiness agreed to the invitation to visit Ladakh and the Nubra region next summer.

The news comes as a welcome development for the Ladakhi people, who have been eagerly awaiting His Holiness's visit since a few years. Speaking to the media, Tsering Dorje, President of LBA stated that the Ladakhi community had been concerned about the Dalai Lama's health following his knee surgery.

This announcement follows an earlier request made in April by various Buddhist organizations from Ladakh. Initially, the Office of His Holiness had scheduled a visit for July 2024, but it had to be cancelled due to his knee surgery in the United States in June.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama has also resumed giving public audiences, scheduled on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday mornings at his residence here. These sessions began following the long-life prayer offered by the Monpa community of Arunachal Pradesh in the first week of September.

In recent years, public audiences for the general public have increased, with thousands of people taking the opportunity to receive the Tibetan spiritual leader Dalai Lama's blessings in person. These public audiences were temporarily halted when His Holiness travelled to the U.S. for knee surgery in June.

Sikyong Delivers Kashag's Message at the Celebration of 41st Sakya Trizin Kyabgon Gongma Dorje Chang Rinpoche's 80th birthday

04 October 2024, CTA

On 3 October 2024, a long-life prayer ceremony was held along with the 80th birthday celebration of the 41st Sakya Trizin, Kyabgon Gongma Trichen Rinpoche, organised by the Sakya community at the Sakya Monastery in Rajpur, Dehradun.

The event was attended by the 42nd Sakya Trizin Ratna Vajra Rinpoche, the 43rd Sakya Trizin Gyana Vajra Rinpoche, Khondung Avikriti Vajra Rinpoche, Khondung Asanga Vajra Rinpoche, Dungsey Abhaya Vajra Rinpoche, high lamas of the Sakya, Ngor, and Tsar traditions, Speaker of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang, Tibetan Justice Commissioner Tenzin Lungtok, former Speaker Pema Jungney, former Deputy Speaker Acharya Yeshe Phuntsok, former Kalons (Ministers), Public Service Commissioner Karma Yeshe, standing committee members of the 17th Tibetan Parliament, some former parliamentarians, Secretary Dhondul Dorjee of the Department of Religion and Culture, Secretary of the Gaden Phodrang Lobsang Jinpa, and other dignitaries from India and the Tibetan community.

In the afternoon, a birthday celebration was held for Sakya Trichen Rinpoche, presided over by the 43rd Sakya Trizin Gyana Vajra Rinpoche, the 42nd Sakya Trizin Ratna Vajra Rinpoche, and other members of the Khon lineage. The chief guest was Satpal Ji Maharaj, Minister for Public Works Department, Culture, and Tourism of Uttarakhand state. Special guests included Sikyong Penpa Tsering, Speaker of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, and Tibetan Justice Commissioner Tenzin Lungtok, along with other reverent lamas, representatives of spiritual leaders, current and former officials of the Central Tibetan Administration, guests from various regions, and members of the monastic and lay communities.

At the event, Sikyong Penpa Tsering delivered the Kashag's message, offering heartfelt greetings and best wishes on the 80th birthday of Sakya Trichen, Ngawang Kunga Tegchen Palbar Trinley Samphel Wanggi Gyalpo. Warm regards were also extended to the 43rd Sakya Trizin, the 42nd Sakya Trizin, the Khön lineage descendants, and all the attendees. The message highlighted the significant religious, political, and cultural contributions of the Sakya tradition, led by great scholars who helped establish Buddhism in Tibet and has promoted its teachings over centuries.

In his remarks, Sikyong highlighted the enduring legacy of the five Sakya founding masters and their successors, who have upheld and propagated the Buddha's teachings through explanation, debate, and practice. The message highlighted the significant religious, political, and cultural contributions of the Sakya tradition, led by these great scholars who helped establish Buddhism in Tibet and promoted its teachings.

It praised the efforts of figures like the great scholar Kunga Gyaltsen and his disciple, Drogon Chogyal Phagpa, who earned the favour of the Mongol emperors and their subjects through their profound Dharma teachings. By halting a major Chinese invasion, they offered fearless refuge to hundreds of thousands. They also unified Tibet's three provinces under one political authority, ending a period of division.

In the speech, Sikyong applauded Sakya Gongma Rinpoche for his steadfast support of His Holiness the Dalai Lama's leadership and the Tibetan administration throughout his time in exile. Sikyong also highlighted Rinpoche's global efforts to spread the teachings of Sutra and Tantra, while fostering non-sectarian disciples in Tibet, which have greatly benefited the preservation of Buddhism and the Sakya tradition. Reflecting on the hardships of exile, Sikyong praised Sakya Trizin's pivotal role in re-establishing Sakya monasteries, modernising their education systems, and promoting gender equality by empowering female teachers and abbots. Additionally, the Sikyong acknowledged his founding of Dharma centres worldwide and his transparent reforms to the Sakya throne-holder system, underscoring the far-reaching impact of his religious and secular contributions.

Sikyong expressed personal gratitude for the privilege of attending several significant events honouring Sakya Gongma Rinpoche, including the golden jubilee of his enthronement in 2009, the 50th anniversary of the Sakya Institute of Higher Buddhist Studies in 2022, and now the celebration of Rinpoche's 80th birthday. He conveyed his appreciation for being able to offer a brief long-life prayer on behalf of the Kashag of the Central Tibetan Administration.

Additionally, Sikyong emphasised that this celebration is an opportunity to reflect on Sakya Gongma Rinpoche's remarkable contributions and to put his teachings into practice.

In his concluding remarks, Sikyong extended heartfelt birthday greetings and wished Sakya Gongma Rinpoche a long life, hoping that all his noble aspirations will be fulfilled.

Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Meets European Parliament Members in Belgium

03 October 2024, CTA

A Tibetan parliamentary delegation, including parliamentarians Tashi Dhondup and Rigzin Lhundup, continued their advocacy efforts in Belgium on 1 October 2024.

They held meetings with Bernard Guetta, Member of the European Parliament from France; Hannes Heide, Member of the European Parliament from Austria; Dainius Žalimas, Member of the European Parliament from Lithuania; Lóránt Vincze, Member of the European Parliament from Romania; and Michael Gahler, Member of the European Parliament from Germany.

During their meetings, the Tibetan lawmakers briefed Members of the European Parliament on the situation in Tibet, focusing on policies implemented by the Chinese Communist Party. They highlighted how Tibetans in exile are working to protect and preserve their distinct language and religion, as well as the current status of the Tibetan struggle and the democratic framework of the Central Tibetan Administration.

The Tibetan MPs underscored the importance of support from the international community, particularly democratic nations, in resolving the Sino-Tibetan conflict. They urged European Parliament Members to raise the issue of Tibet within the Parliament and to adopt a resolution on the matter.

Office of Tibet in Canberra and Alliance for Victims of the Chinese Communist Regime Organise Counter-event on PRC's Founding Anniversary

03 October 2024, CTA

Coinciding with the founding day of the People's Republic of China, the Tibet Information Office (Office of Tibet), in collaboration with the New Zealand and Australia Alliance for Victims of the Chinese Communist Regime, organised a counter-event on 1 October 2024 at Sydney Town Hall.

Representative Karma Singey, accompanied by Chinese Liaison Officer of Tibet Information Office, attended the event and interacted with members of the participating groups.

The event featured a morning photo exhibition and an afternoon rally, bringing together Chinese democrats, Hongkongers, Tibetans, and Falun Dafa practitioners, aimed to raise public awareness about the pressing issues each community faces under Chinese Communist rule.

The President of the Alliance, Professor Feng, moderated the rally and underscored the illegality of the Chinese Communist Party by referring founding day of the PRC as "National Fall Day".

Chinese Liaison Officer of Tibet Information Office, Dawa Sangmo, emphasised in her speech the colonial nature of Chinese state-run Tibetan boarding schools and the forced closure of local Tibetan schools, a policy aimed at further eradicating the Tibetan language and culture.

Former Chinese diplomat, Chen Yonglin, who defected from the regime, spoke at the event, drawing attention to the countless lives lost since the Communist government came to power. He called on the Australian government to invoke the Magnitsky Act to sanction Chinese officials involved in human rights abuses.

Other speakers at the rally included John Deller, spokesperson for Falun Dafa, who spoke about the illegal organ harvesting from Falun Gong practitioners, and Jenni Chen from the Hong Kong community, who discussed the severe human rights abuses under China's National Security Law.

Likewise, V-TAG Australia actively participated in the event by displaying photos and reports and raised awareness among the Australian public on the Chinese state-run colonial boarding school. Tenzin Chokrab Kindeling, a member of V-TAG Australia, delivered a speech on behalf of the group.

The event concluded with a unified call for the Australian government to take immediate action, specifically urging the use of the Magnitsky Act to sanction Chinese officials involved in human rights abuses.

-Report filed by Office of Tibet, Canberra

Department of Religion and Culture Achieves Key Milestones in First Year of Tibetan Digital Library Initiative

03 October 2024, CTA

As part of the department's Strengthening Cultural Resilience of Tibetan Communities project funded by USAID, the Department of Religion and Culture has successfully completed orientation workshops on the Tibetan Digital Library Initiative at 20 different Tibetan cultural and religious institutions, marking the beginning of the research and digitisation of scriptures.

On 13 May this year, the first orientation session was held in Dharamshala, followed by other assigned regions, namely Bylakuppe, Hunsur, Kollegal, and Mundgod, where the mentioned institutions are located. Over the span of four and a half months, the Department of Religion and Culture, in collaboration with Wadhvani AI and the Monlam IT Research Centre, conducted a series of workshops at the aforementioned Tibetan settlements on the implementation of the Tibetan Library Management System application, as well as on researching and digitising ancient scriptures.

In addition, during these orientation workshops, the task force team from the Department of Religion and Culture also participated in the project. Thus far, the initiative has completed QR code integration for 2,000 bookshelves and 70,000 master texts.

-Report filed by Department of Religion and Culture, CTA

Top Paris museum has replaced 'Nepal-Tibet' with incorrect 'Himalayan World' to avoid mentioning 'Tibet'

03 October 2024, Tibetan Review

While the Musée du quai Branly apologized and promised, on Sep 25, to restore the name "Tibet" in place of the China-dictated "Xizang" on its displays and documentations, the Guimet Museum of Asian Arts, another top museum in Paris, refuses to come out of its China-pressure despite criticisms from scholars and protests by Tibetans and supporters. The criticisms included an op-ed written by eminent French specialists on Tibet and China published in Le Monde on Aug 31.

While the Quai Branly museum has recognized its error and intends to correct it, the Guimet Museum rejects the accusations, pointing out that the change of name was made as part of a global reflection, and that Tibet remains mentioned within the museum, reported actualnewsmagazine.com Sep 29.

Whether in Hong Kong or Europe, museums that showcase exhibitions related to China sometimes succumb to Xi Jinping's warning for the arts to foster "correct" viewpoints of history and culture, noted the chinadigitaltimes.net Oct 1.

China decided last year to replace 'Tibet' with 'Xizang' in all its official documents to make the point that Tibet as the world has known thus far and as Tibetans identify themselves with no longer exists. 'Xizang', on the other hand, refers to the China-designated Tibetan region called 'Xizang Autonomous Region', which is roughly the western half of Tibet.

Earlier this year, the Guimet Museum renamed certain rooms of an exhibition from "Nepal-Tibet" to "Himalayan World," claiming that the decision was meant to highlight cultural, not geographical, similarities in that region. This was despite the fact that the museum appears to carry displays of artifacts from across Tibet, of which the Himalayas form only its southern belt.

The real reason for the museum's censoring of the name 'Tibet' appears to be pressure from China. According to anonymous sources from Le Monde, the museum was subjected to sustained pressure from Chinese authorities earlier this year.

In a Sep 27 Le Monde article by Bruno Philip, Tibet specialists criticized the museum's reasoning. It quoted linguist Nicolas Tournadre, a leading specialist in Tibetan languages, as saying: "The term 'Himalaya' is a denomination that provides a cheap way of sidestepping referring to the once powerful Tibetan state. Indeed, the northern slopes of the Himalayan range only form the southern border of Tibet, which, additionally, also has several other ranges, which reach over 7,000 meters high, crossing it from east to west. On the other hand, certain populations south of the Himalayas have adopted many elements of Tibetan culture, such as the Ladakhi [in India], the Sherpa [in Nepal] or the Sikkimese [in India]: They are often referred to as 'Bhoti,' derived from the word 'Bod' - 'Tibet' [in Tibetan]."

"Since the Musée Guimet has no problem talking about Tibetan Buddhism, it would be strange to reduce it to Himalayan Buddhism alone!" Tibet specialist Fernand Meyer, a former holder of the Science and Civilization of the Tibetan World chair at the Practical School of Advanced Studies (EPHE), has said.

"the 'Himalayan world' is not a culturally definable entity as such. Rather, it is a zone where the cultural areas of India and Tibet meet. To reduce the latter to its southern, geographically Himalayan fringe, therefore, does not do justice to the history and extension of a specifically Tibetan culture," he has added.

Sikyong Visits Two Schools in Mussoorie, Advice Tibetan Students on Continuing Future Tibet Struggle

03 October 2024, CTA

On 2 October 2024, Sikyong Penpa Tsering visited Tibetan Homes Foundation School (THF) and Sambhota Tibetan Day School in Mussoorie (STS), where he addressed the students and staff of both schools.

On the morning, Sikyong Penpa Tsering traveled from Dehradun to Mussoorie. Upon arriving at Tibetan Homes School around 10 a.m, he was warmly welcomed by General Secretary of Mussoorie Tibetan Home School, Tenzin Choklang, and Sambhota School's Principal Sangpo Rigzin, along with students and staff from both schools performing traditional music.

Afterwards, in the Tsering Dolma Hall of Tibetan Homes School, students from grade 9 and above, along with staff from both schools, gathered for a meeting. The General Secretary of Tibetan Homes Foundation delivered a welcome speech and presented the school's report, followed by Principal Sangpo Rigzin presenting the report for Sambhota School. Then, the Sikyong addressed the gathering.

While lauding the teachers for their dedicated services, Sikyong began his address referring to the Tibetan saying "Hope for the best, prepare for the worst," he explained that while the hope is to resolve the Tibet issue, preparation requires hard work. He noted that since the elder generation of Tibetans who came into exile and worked for Tibet's freedom under His Holiness the Dalai Lama's leadership are gradually passing away, it is now crucial to mobilise younger generations to make them carry the baton of Tibetan freedom struggle.

Sikyong emphasised that Tibetan children should have pride in being Tibetan and maintain their cultural dignity. For this, Sikyong stressed the importance of understanding Tibet's history and current issues. He introduced the historical development of Tibet, the value and significance of Tibetan writing, and the history and evolution of Tibet-China conflicts. He further implored Tibetan youths to pay attention to and study their own history.

In relation to this, Sikyong explained that the Kashag (Cabinet) is working to gain recognition of Tibet's historical status as a sovereign nation to strengthen the support for policy of Middle Way Approach. Hence, Sikyong acknowledged that a hearing on Tibet was conducted in the U.S. for the said reason that eventually resulted in enactment of the "Resolve Tibet Act".

Additionally, regarding His Holiness the Dalai Lama's reincarnation, Sikyong disclosed that since the Chinese government will certainly interfere in the recognition process, Tibetans have passed resolutions affirming that the authority to recognise the reincarnation lies solely with His Holiness. Sikyong also suggested the importance of securing similar resolutions from Himalayan Buddhists communities, followers of Tibetan Buddhism, and the international community. He mentioned that the Department of Religion and Culture is compiling these resolutions to strategically counter China's interference in the reincarnation issue.

Furthermore, through a PowerPoint presentation, Sikyong explained Tibet's geographical location, its environmental and geopolitical importance to the world and Asia, and how Tibetan religion and culture benefit humanity. Afterwards, he answered questions from some students.

In the afternoon, Sikyong Penpa Tsering visited the Sambhota Tibetan Day School and gave a speech in English to the staff and students, primarily Indian students. First, Principal Sangpo Rigzin welcomed him and presented a brief school report. Then, the Sikyong gave his speech, expressing gratitude to the Indian government and people for assisting in the establishment of Tibetan schools in India. He explained that Tibetans consider India a holy land and that there are strong historical ties between Tibet and India, and noted that Tibetan Buddhism originated from India and His Holiness describes himself as an ambassador of ancient Indian wisdom. Sikyong also addressed the declining number of Tibetan students in Tibetan schools and the increasing number of Indian students. He explained that the Tibetan administration's continued provision of education to Indian students is a way of showing gratitude to the Indian government and people. He mentioned that due to decreasing student numbers, some schools need to be consolidated. He then spoke primarily to the Indian students about the importance of the Tibetan plateau, the development of Tibetan history, and Indo-Tibetan relations, followed by answering students' questions.

After that, Sikyong inspected land that the Tibetan Homes School plans to sell, and then visited the local Tibetan market area to examine issues raised by the community regarding their difficulties.

Dalai Lama praises Japan for promoting peace in world

03 October 2024, The Tribune

The Dalai Lama has congratulated the new Prime Minister of Japan, Shigeru Ishida, on his election. In a letter to Ishida, the Dalai Lama wrote, "Over the years, I have had the opportunity to visit Japan quite regularly. I deeply appreciate the interest and enthusiasm that people from all walks of life have shown in my efforts to encourage the cultivation of fundamental human values such as compassion and my work to promote inter-religious harmony and create a peaceful world free from weapons, including nuclear weapons."

The Dalai Lama wrote, "I admire the way the Japanese people have worked to transform Japan into one of the most modern nations in the world. Japan has also frequently taken the lead in trying to establish peace in the world. Your country's spiritual traditions place great value on peace, and I hope you will be able to build on that during your tenure. In these times of uncertainty and upheaval in many parts of the world, it is vital that earnest and concerted efforts are made to resolve problems through dialogue and diplomacy."

The Dalai Lama concluded his letter by wishing Ishida success in his efforts to fulfil the hopes and aspirations of the people of Japan and in creating a more peaceful and compassionate world.

Tibetan Student Unity Network Debuts on PRC's 75th Anniversary, Aims to Empower Tibetan Students

03 October 2024, The Tibet Express

Marking a significant milestone in the Tibetan diaspora community, the Tibetan Student Unity Network (TSUN)-India was officially launched on 1 October 2024, coinciding with the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China (PRC).

This newly formed student network aims to unite exiled Tibetan students and youth across India, fostering unity, empowerment, and collective strength through a shared vision and apolitical stance.

The TSUN aims to educate students on Tibetan culture, history, and governance, fostering collective strength among dispersed student associations. Its initiatives include annual meetings, monthly online sessions, social media campaigns, and commemorating significant events.

Currently, 10 student associations have joined, with membership open to any student association in India. The network seeks to enhance Tibetan students' knowledge, influence, and collective strength.

In the RTYC Jalandhar President's absence due to health reasons, RTYC Jalandhar's Executive Member, Karma Tashi, spoke with us, shedding light on the TSUN's vision and initiatives.

On the origin of the TSUN, Karma says it emerged from a youth gathering, where Tibetan student leaders converged, and was refined through subsequent meetings. This collaborative effort led to the network's official launch on 1 October 2024.

"The TSUN has three key goals," says Karma. It aims to establish a strong Tibetan student organisation, promote cultural and democratic awareness among youth, and unite dispersed, fragmented associations to amplify their collective influence.

"TSUN focuses on India for now with no international expansion plans," Karma said. Currently, its social media presence is only through its newly opened page on Instagram as tsun_india. In order to join, any student association can contact the network through Instagram or reach out to RTYC Jalandhar's President or other TSUN leaders.

Karma added that so far, "TSUN marked Tibetan Democracy Day, which falls on 2 September." He added that the student members of the group participated in making short videos, dramas, and plays related to Tibetan Democracy Day, which he said drew approximately 30 participants.

The network has no single President; instead, the 10 member associations hold equal positions. These associations are RTYC Jalandhar, SFT Jalandhar, RTYC Sarah, Chakori, MTSA Mysore, TSAM Chennai, SFT Mangalore, RTYC Mangalore, and SFT Bangalore.

The network operates primarily online with no fixed location. It was formed informally in June/July through discussions among student leaders. The network's active members are the presidents and vice presidents of the 10-member student associations.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Extends His Congratulations to the New Prime Minister of Japan, Honourable Shigeru Ishiba

03 October 2024, CTA

On 3 October 2024, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, on behalf of the Central Tibetan Administration and Tibetan people, wrote a congratulatory letter to extend greetings to Honourable Shigeru Ishiba and the Liberal Democratic Party of Japan on the election victory.

Sikyong wrote, "Japan has consistently shown gracious hospitality to His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan people since welcoming His Holiness in 1967, shortly after His arrival in India to exile. Over the years, Japan, a nation where the vast majority hold deep admiration and respect for His Holiness, has hosted His Holiness on multiple occasions".

Similarly, Sikyong shared the Tibetan people's admiration towards Japan's unwavering commitment to championing freedom, democracy, and the rule of law, as well as its advocacy for human rights, particularly in the face of China's egregious violations and repression in Tibet, East Turkestan, Southern Mongolia and beyond. "Japan's bold stance against authoritarianism and infringement of freedom sets a true example of global leadership in defending rights and freedom," Sikyong added.

"It is also a profound source of hope for the Tibetan people in Tibet and in exile that Japan hosts one of the world's largest parliamentary support groups for Tibet, with over 100 members across party lines."

In conclusion, the Tibetan political leader expressed his optimism over continued support for Tibet and the Tibetan people under the leadership of Japan's new Prime Minister.

30 Tibetans detained

02 October 2024, The Tribune

New Delhi: The Delhi Police detained 30 Tibetans heading to protest outside the Chinese embassy on Tuesday against the human rights situation in their homeland, officials said. The protest was held after China marked its 75th year of communist party rule, a protester said. "We have detained 30 Tibetan protesters. They were released later after some time from Chanakyapuri police station," a police officer said.

Embassy in New Delhi targeted as exile Tibetans, others protest on China's 75th National Day

02 October 2024, Tibetan Review

As China marked the 75th anniversary of the founding of its Communist Party state on Oct 1 in a distinctly low-keyed manner, beset by a host of economic, social stability, and other challenges, Tibetans living in exile, supporters and other victims of its persecution rallied to register their protests.

In India's capital New Delhi, Tibetans held a demonstration and chanted slogans outside Chinese embassy in Chanakyapuri. Thirty protesters were subsequently detained by police, taken to Mandir Marg police station, and later released, reported the timesofindia.com Oct 1.

The protesters, numbering 50, had arrived in the national capital after completing a cycle rally from Dehradun, covering a distance of over 400 km, with the aim to draw attention to the ongoing human rights abuses and the suppression of Tibetan culture under China's Communist party. The multi-day rally sought to raise awareness about the situation in Tibet and called for international solidarity against China's oppressive measures, reported indiatoday.in Oct 1.

"We are here to peacefully protest the CCP's brutal occupation of Tibet. The world must acknowledge the suffering of the Tibetan people and oppose this injustice," the report quoted a Tibetan Youth Congress representative as saying before the detention.

The demonstrators vocalized their demands with slogans such as, "Make China accountable for committing atrocities in Tibet," "Free Tibet," and "Stop genocide in Tibet," reported the devdiscourse.com Oct 1.

At the Vishwavidyalaya Metro Station in Delhi, Students for a Free Tibet (SFT) organized a photo action and awareness campaign.

SFT, a New York-headquartered group with grassroots chapters in various countries, was also a part of over 50 international human rights NGOs that came together to condemn transnational repression "in a powerful joint statement" on China's 75th National Day.

Those that signed the Joint Statement Against Transnational Repression ranged from groups such as Human Rights Watch, Freedom House, and Amnesty International to local chapters of exile Tibetan groups. They came together "to show that the CCP's transnational repression is in the spotlight, and we will fight back against it at every turn," said the statement Oct 1.

"We stand together with dissidents against the long arm of authoritarian governments around the world. As organizations committed to protecting civil liberties, we, the undersigned, pledge to remain vigilant through education and advocacy to combat the growing threat of transnational repression," the statement said.

The signatories vowed to "continue to collaborate with affected communities to raise public awareness of the tactics employed by governments that extend their reach abroad."

The statement's direct reference to China specifically said: "One disturbing example (of transnational repression) occurred on the streets of San Francisco in November 2023, when Hong Kong, Tibetan, Uyghur, and mainland Chinese protesters gathered to oppose the Chinese leader Xi Jinping during the APEC Summit. As documented by a recent report jointly published by the Hong Kong Democracy Council and Students for a Free Tibet – followed by a Washington Post investigation – harassment, intimidation, surveillance, and physical violence were orchestrated by groups affiliated with the Chinese Communist Party. Even consular personnel were seen on the ground. We urge the U.S. State Department to consider elevating this as a diplomatic incident and the Justice Department to consider bringing federal charges against those who were responsible. Congress should likewise consider passing relevant new legislation to deter future episodes."

Elsewhere, 650 to 700 members of the exiled Uyghur community in Turkey staged a protest outside the Chinese Consulate in the Seriyer district of Istanbul, reported the ANI news service Oct 1.

Led by Hidayet Oguzhan, President of the International Union of East Turkestan Organizations, the protest drew support from several NGOs advocating for Uyghur rights, the report said.

Office of Tibet, Nepal Hosts Three-Day Exhibition Showcasing Jamyang Dorje's Masterful Tibetan Calligraphy

02 October 2024, CTA

Jamyang Dorjee showcased exceptional artwork, including various distinctive drawings using Tibetan scripts, particularly in the Umed (cursive) style

The Office of Tibet in Nepal, in collaboration with the Himalayan Buddhist Library and Cultural Center, hosted a distinguished three-day exhibition and workshop on Tibetan calligraphy from September 25 to 27, 2024.

Esteemed Tibetan calligraphy artist Jamyang Dorjee presented his remarkable artwork, featuring a variety of distinctive drawings utilizing Tibetan scripts, particularly in the Umed (འུམེད) style. A notable highlight of the exhibition was a unique scroll showcasing the complete “Padma Kathang Sheldrags” manuscript, accompanied by displays of various other calligraphic styles.

The opening ceremony was held at the Choejor Community Hall on the first day. Throughout the subsequent three days, Jamyang Dorjee conducted educational sessions tailored for diverse groups, including monastic students and practitioners—especially those from the Nyingma tradition’s Shechen Monastery and university students and schoolchildren.

Participants included students from Namgyal University, Songtsen Nepal School, Namgyal Middle School, and Samten Memorial School. During these sessions, Jamyang Dorjee provided comprehensive teachings on the history and origins of Tibetan script alongside both traditional and contemporary artistic techniques.

The event witnessed the participation of approximately 200 individuals, comprising both male and female students, along with numerous interested public members. A significant presence of monastics from various monasteries, predominantly from Shechen Monastery, further enriched the program.

-Report filed by Office of Tibet, Nepal

His Holiness the Dalai Lama Confers Teaching on Tsongkhapa's Three Principal Aspects of the Path

01 October 2024, CTA

This morning His Holiness the Dalai Lama made a circuit of the Tsuglagkhang, the Main Tibetan Temple, on his way to address an estimated 7000 people, including 1300 from Taiwan, as well as many monks on vacation from the monasteries in South India. He smiled at those he saw as he passed, occasionally extending a hand to an elderly man or woman who caught his eye.

In the temple His Holiness warmly greeted the Ganden Throneholder and took his seat on the throne. The ‘Heart Sutra’ was chanted in Chinese, following which a mandala was offered to him.

“Today we’re going to hold a spiritual discourse,” His Holiness began. “When I was on my way here, listening to your chanting the ‘Mig-tsé-ma’ prayer to Jé Tsongkhapa reminded me that not only was I born close to his place of birth, but that I also share his philosophical views. However, the survival of the Buddhadharma is not linked to a particular location and those of us in exile have done our best to keep it alive. Jé Rinpoché’s teaching has spread around the world and I’ve done my best to clarify it.

“When I was in Tibet, and also since leaving the Land of Snow, one of my most important practices has been to read the 18 volumes of Jé Rinpoché’s Collected Works. I have a special regard for them and feel a close connection to them. Today, I’ll read his ‘Three Principles of the Path’.

“Tibetans’ core identity is focussed on the Buddhadharma. We have kept it alive and we have kept it well through study and practice. Consequently, many who have an interest in the Dharma are paying attention to our tradition.

Tea and bread served to the congregation were blessed with the recitation of a verse that celebrates His Holiness’s names:

I pray to you, O Supreme Noble Lotus Holder (Padmapani):

You are the adamantine Gentle Glory who has Mastery of Speech,

Your vase of Sublime Insight is replete with the nectar of Exalted Wisdom,

And you are embellishing jewellery of (Beautifully adorning) the Vast playful Ocean of Upholders of Dharma! “There was a prediction at the time of the Buddha,” His Holiness continued, “that the Buddhadharma would spread from the north to the north. After his enlightenment the Buddha began his teaching by explaining the Four Noble Truths. In due course, what he had to say spread throughout Tibet, which is north of India, and on to Mongolia, which is north of Tibet. Tibetans in Tibet and in exile have kept the tradition alive through study and practice of the Three Higher Trainings—ethics, concentration and wisdom. Interest has grown around the world because these trainings are rooted in reason and logic.

“The three principles of the path are renunciation, or a determination to be free, the awakening mind and the correct view. The determination to be free does not lead to enlightenment directly, it needs to be augmented by the other two principles.

“Shantarakshita, among Indian masters invited by Tibetan kings to Tibet, established the Buddha’s teachings there. We have studied and meditated on what was taught and put the Three Higher Trainings and the Three Principles of the Path into practice.

“When we develop a determination to be free, we’ll no longer be drawn to the pleasures and attractions of this life or future lives in cyclic existence. We’ll turn away from them. However, we will not reach the state of omniscience without the awakening mind of bodhichitta and a correct view of emptiness.

“From the very beginning of my day I cultivate the awakening mind and an understanding of emptiness. When I hear sad news, these principles help me develop a determination to be free. Understanding the workings of the mind and emotions, and seeing how things are dependently arisen, we can come to an appreciation that suffering is rooted in ignorance.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama addressing the congregation during his teaching at the Main Tibetan Temple in Dharamshala, HP, India on 30 September 2024. Photo by Tenzin Choejor

“The Three Principles of the Path need to be integrated within us. They need to become part of our inner experience.”

His Holiness began to read briskly through the text noting that without a pure determination to be free there is no way to still attraction to the pleasures of cyclic existence. We need to reverse attraction to this life as well as reversing attraction to future lives. When we do not for an instant wish for the pleasures of cyclic existence, and day and night remain intent on liberation, we will have produced a determination to be free.

However, a determination to be free without a pure awakening mind of bodhichitta does not bring forth enlightenment. Therefore, Bodhisattvas generate the excellent awakening mind. They reflect on how all beings, our mothers, are swept by the current of the four powerful rivers, tied by strong bonds of actions so hard to undo, caught in the iron net of self-centredness, completely enveloped by the darkness of ignorance, born and reborn in boundless cyclic existence, and are ceaselessly tormented by the three miseries. Thinking of them in this way they generate the awakening mind.

The text touches on how, despite these realizations, without wisdom, the realization of emptiness, we cannot cut the root of cyclic existence. Therefore, we must strive to understand dependent arising.

Jé Tsongkhapa states that appearances are infallible dependent arising, while emptiness is free of assertions. But as long as these two understandings are seen as separate, we will not have realized the intent of the Buddha. And yet, when these two realizations are simultaneous and concurrent, analysis of the profound view is complete. He goes on to reveal that appearances refute the extreme of existence, and emptiness refutes the extreme of nonexistence. When we understand the arising of cause and effect from the viewpoint of emptiness, we will not be captivated by either extreme view.

Members of the audience from Taiwan taking notes during His Holiness the Dalai Lama’s teaching at the Main Tibetan Temple in Dharamshala, HP, India on 30 September 2024. Photo by Tenzin Choejor

Jé Rinpoché counsels his disciple Ngawang Drakpa, to whom he sent these verses to realize the Three Principles of the Path, to depend on solitude and strong effort, and quickly reach the final goal.

His Holiness announced that he would offer the Bodhisattva Vow. He remarked that he finds reading books about the awakening mind of bodhichitta and its qualities, such as Shantideva’s ‘Entering the Way of a Bodhisattva’ to be both moving and inspiring. He said such books encourage us to work for all sentient beings throughout space.

“When the Buddha first set out on the path to enlightenment,” His Holiness advised, “he generated such an awakening mind. We should emulate him.”

His Holiness read the verses for taking refuge in the Three Jewels and generating the awakening mind, encouraging members of the congregation to generate the awakening mind and take the Bodhisattva vow themselves. Next, he repeated verses from 'Entering into the Bodhisattva's Way' in celebration.

Today my birth is fruitful, my human life is justified. Today, I am born into the family of the Buddha, now I am a child of the Buddhas.

So that there may be no blemish upon this spotless family, I must now act as becomes my family.

"People around the world seem obsessed with weapons and the use of force," His Holiness observed. "As practitioners of the Buddhistharma we should avoid this. Nothing good comes from the use of force. Killing so many people only brings further suffering. Setting aside attachment, anger and hatred we should work instead to benefit all sentient beings. Much better that developing bodhichitta within ourselves should be our primary aim."

A view of crowd sitting in the courtyard attending His Holiness the Dalai Lama's teaching at the Main Tibetan Temple in Dharamshala, HP, India on 30 September 2024. Photo by Ven Zamling Norbu

Among several questions from the audience His Holiness was asked what is the main cause not to be separated from the spiritual master. He answered that heeding the teachings you've received and putting them into practice creates a strong link with your teacher.

Another questioner wanted to know whether steady cultivation of practices like the exchanging of self and others would lead to genuine experience. His Holiness replied that if you familiarize your mind with such practice, it will eventually give rise to experience. In terms of bodhichitta you'll feel ever closer to it. He repeated the verse concerning the four immeasurable wishes.

May all beings have happiness and the causes of happiness.

May all beings be free from suffering and the causes of suffering.

May all beings rejoice in the well-being of others.

May all beings live in peace, free from greed and hatred.

"If we familiarize ourselves with bodhichitta, in time we will become imbued with it. I cultivate bodhichitta and the view of emptiness on a daily basis and I feel it has created a solid experience within me."

Asked how a beginner should act to prevent their sense of bodhichitta from slackening His Holiness simply advised that if you persevere with a practice, it will not decline. Finally, he declared that main cause of higher rebirths in the future is to cultivate the awakening mind of bodhichitta and an understanding of emptiness.

The Taiwanese disciples expressed their pleasure at His Holiness's advice with a burst of applause. He left the temple, walked steadily to the lift, smiling at well-wishers as he went, and in the courtyard boarded the golfcart that would carry him home.

The World Needs a Champion like the Tibetan People and the Guidance of His Holiness the Dalai Lama More Than Ever: Congressman Jim McGovern at Gratitude Event in His Honor

01 October 2024, CTA

The Regional Tibetan Association of Massachusetts (RTAM) on Saturday held a significant gratitude event titled "Thank You, Congressman Jim McGovern," celebrating Congressman for his steadfast commitment to Tibet, His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and the Tibetan people.

In a stirring address, Congressman McGovern highlighted the enduring spirit and global impact of the Tibetan community. He spoke passionately about the vital themes of human rights, peace, and resilience. "The Tibetan Spirit Represents the Value that Can Change the World," McGovern declared, reflecting on his experiences with the Tibetan community and His Holiness the Dalai Lama. His speech deeply resonated with the audience, which included community leaders, activists, and supporters of the Tibetan cause.

During his remarks, Congressman McGovern discussed the profound lessons of love, respect, and joy he has absorbed from Tibetan culture. He emphasized the importance of these values in offering a stark contrast to the turmoil seen worldwide today, underscoring the necessity of promoting these ideals to counteract the pervasive negativity and violence.

"The world needs a champion like the Tibetan people and the guidance of His Holiness the Dalai Lama more than ever," stated McGovern, acknowledging the significant influence of Tibetan philosophy on fostering global unity and contentment.

Highlighting his legislative efforts, which were inspired by his interactions with the Tibetan community both within the U.S. and internationally, McGovern reaffirmed his commitment to supporting the Tibetan cause in Congress. "This legislation arose from meetings with Tibetans globally. These ideas came from you," he noted, celebrating the cooperative efforts that have led to substantial policy advancements.

Congressman McGovern concluded with a compelling call to action: "Nothing improves in our community, our country, and the world unless good, like-minded people unite and demand change."

Other special guests for the event focused on their collective appreciation for Congressman McGovern's dedication to Tibetan freedom struggle and his broader impact on global human rights advocacy. Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration congratulated Congressman McGovern on receiving the well-deserved honour. In a video message, Sikyong expressed his heartfelt gratitude to Congressman McGovern for his unwavering commitment to the Tibetan cause, acknowledging the personal sacrifices he has made, including facing sanctions, as a consequence of his steadfast support for Tibet.

Thondup Tsering, Member of the Tibetan Parliament in Exile, reflected on Congressman McGovern's long-standing commitment to human rights and his direct impact on the U.S. foreign policy, especially concerning Tibet, and referred to McGovern as "truly the conscience of the House." Tsering further highlighted the congressman's resilience against international pressures, and how despite facing sanctions, Congressman McGovern continues to stand with Tibet, wearing opposition as a badge of honour. "His commitment to justice is unwavering, and his actions inspire us to maintain our fight for freedom and dignity," noted Tibetan Parliamentarian Thondup.

Namgyal Choedup, Representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Washington, D.C., commended Congressman McGovern for his compassionate and moral leadership that transcends political divisions, emphasising his pivotal role in advancing the Tibetan cause and supporting human rights on a global scale. Tenchoe Gyatso, President of the International Campaign for Tibet, praised Congressman McGovern for his leadership in passing crucial legislation like the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act, which has bolstered international support for Tibet and set a precedent for future U.S. policies supporting Tibet.

Dhardon Sharling, former Member of Tibetan Parliament in Exile, spoke about the historical context of Congressman McGovern's support, reflecting on a pivotal moment in 2012 when he co-authored a significant letter to the U.S. Secretary of State advocating for Tibetan rights. She underscored how his support has not only persisted but intensified over the years, significantly contributing to the Tibetan cause and reinforcing their collective spirit and resilience.

Tsultrem Kunsang, President of the Regional Tibetan Association of Massachusetts, celebrated the impactful legislative achievements spearheaded by Congressman McGovern, particularly noting his crucial role in the passage of the Resolve Tibet Act. Kunsang highlighted this law as a significant milestone that not only affirms the U.S. commitment to the Tibetan cause but also serves as a bold declaration against misinformation about Tibet's historical sovereignty.

A highlight of the event was the special ceremonial presentation of a silver sculpture replicating the historic Sino-Tibet Treaty of A.D. 821/823. This pillar, still standing today in front of the Jokhang Temple in Lhasa, Tibet, symbolises the enduring peace and mutual recognition of sovereignty between Tibet and China.

The Resolve Tibet Act, sponsored by Congressman McGovern, not only recognises the right of the Tibetan people to self-determination under international law but also calls for a meaningful and direct dialogue without any preconditions with His Holiness the Dalai Lama or representatives of the Central Tibetan Administration. Significantly, section 5 of the Act's Findings challenges the long-standing false narrative propagated by China, stating, 'The United States Government has never taken the position that Tibet was a part of China since ancient times.' This is a historic acknowledgment by the U.S. Government, marking a clear departure from past narratives and affirming Tibet's status as a historically independent nation.

In keeping with the spirit of the Resolve Tibet Act, the pillar not only commemorates Tibet's historical independence but also underscores its rightful sovereignty, honouring Congressman McGovern's pivotal role in championing these truths.

The event featured cultural performances by the students and teachers of Thunme Lekshey School, The Tibetan Weekend School managed by RTAM. The gratitude event also served as a reaffirmation of the Tibetan community's resolve to fight for the rights of the Tibetan people and for the restoration of freedom in Tibet.

The entire event live streamed on Tibet TV can be watched here.

September

The Three Principles of the Path

30 September 2024, His Holiness The 14th Dalai Lama

This morning His Holiness the Dalai Lama made a circuit of the Tsuglagkhang, the Main Tibetan Temple, on his way to address an estimated 7000 people, including 1300 from Taiwan, as well as many monks on vacation from the monasteries in South

India. He smiled at those he saw as he passed, occasionally extending a hand to an elderly man or woman who caught his eye.

In the temple His Holiness warmly greeted the Ganden Throneholder and took his seat on the throne. The 'Heart Sutra' was chanted in Chinese, following which a mandala was offered to him.

"Today we're going to hold a spiritual discourse," His Holiness began. "When I was on my way here, listening to your chanting the 'Mig-tsé-ma' prayer to Jé Tsongkhapa reminded me that not only was I born close to his place of birth, but that I also share his philosophical views. However, the survival of the Buddhadharma is not linked to a particular location and those of us in exile have done our best to keep it alive. Jé Rinpoché's teaching has spread around the world and I've done my best to clarify it.

"When I was in Tibet, and also since leaving the Land of Snow, one of my most important practices has been to read the 18 volumes of Jé Rinpoché's Collected Works. I have a special regard for them and feel a close connection to them. Today, I'll read his 'Three Principles of the Path'.

"Tibetans' core identity is focussed on the Buddhadharma. We have kept it alive and we have kept it well through study and practice. Consequently, many who have an interest in the Dharma are paying attention to our tradition.

Tea and bread served to the congregation were blessed with the recitation of a verse that celebrates His Holiness's names:

I pray to you, O Supreme Noble Lotus Holder (Padmapani):

You are the adamantite Gentle Glory who has Mastery of Speech,

Your vase of Sublime Insight is replete with the nectar of Exalted Wisdom,

And you are embellishing jewellery of (Beautifully adorning) the Vast playful Ocean of Upholders of Dharma!

"There was a prediction at the time of the Buddha," His Holiness continued, "that the Buddhadharma would spread from the north to the north. After his enlightenment the Buddha began his teaching by explaining the Four Noble Truths. In due course, what he had to say spread throughout Tibet, which is north of India, and on to Mongolia, which is north of Tibet. Tibetans in Tibet and in exile have kept the tradition alive through study and practice of the Three Higher Trainings—ethics, concentration and wisdom. Interest has grown around the world because these trainings are rooted in reason and logic.

"The three principles of the path are renunciation, or a determination to be free, the awakening mind and the correct view. The determination to be free does not lead to enlightenment directly, it needs to be augmented by the other two principles.

"Shantarakshita, among Indian masters invited by Tibetan kings to Tibet, established the Buddha's teachings there. We have studied and meditated on what was taught and put the Three Higher Trainings and the Three Principles of the Path into practice.

"When we develop a determination to be free, we'll no longer be drawn to the pleasures and attractions of this life or future lives in cyclic existence. We'll turn away from them. However, we will not reach the state of omniscience without the awakening mind of bodhichitta and a correct view of emptiness.

"From the very beginning of my day I cultivate the awakening mind and an understanding of emptiness. When I hear sad news, these principles help me develop a determination to be free. Understanding the workings of the mind and emotions, and seeing how things are dependently arisen, we can come to an appreciation that suffering is rooted in ignorance.

"The Three Principles of the Path need to be integrated within us. They need to become part of our inner experience."

His Holiness began to read briskly through the text noting that without a pure determination to be free there is no way to still attraction to the pleasures of cyclic existence. We need to reverse attraction to this life as well as reversing attraction to future lives. When we do not for an instant wish for the pleasures of cyclic existence, and day and night remain intent on liberation, we will have produced a determination to be free.

However, a determination to be free without a pure awakening mind of bodhichitta does not bring forth enlightenment. Therefore, Bodhisattvas generate the excellent awakening mind. They reflect on how all beings, our mothers, are swept by the current of the four powerful rivers, tied by strong bonds of actions so hard to undo, caught in the iron net of self-centredness, completely enveloped by the darkness of ignorance, born and reborn in boundless cyclic existence, and are ceaselessly tormented by the three miseries. Thinking of them in this way they generate the awakening mind.

The text touches on how, despite these realizations, without wisdom, the realization of emptiness, we cannot cut the root of cyclic existence. Therefore, we must strive to understand dependent arising.

Jé Tsongkhapa states that appearances are infallible dependent arising, while emptiness is free of assertions. But as long as these two understandings are seen as separate, we will not have realized the intent of the Buddha. And yet, when these two realizations are simultaneous and concurrent, analysis of the profound view is complete. He goes on to reveal that appearances refute the extreme of existence, and emptiness refutes the extreme of nonexistence. When we understand the arising of cause and effect from the viewpoint of emptiness, we will not be captivated by either extreme view.

Jé Rinpoché counsels his disciple Ngawang Drakpa, to whom he sent these verses to realize the Three Principles of the Path, to depend on solitude and strong effort, and quickly reach the final goal.

His Holiness announced that he would offer the Bodhisattva Vow. He remarked that he finds reading books about the awakening mind of bodhichitta and its qualities, such as Shantideva's 'Entering the Way of a Bodhisattva' to be both moving and inspiring. He said such books encourage us to work for all sentient beings throughout space.

"When the Buddha first set out on the path to enlightenment," His Holiness advised, "he generated such an awakening mind. We should emulate him."

His Holiness read the verses for taking refuge in the Three Jewels and generating the awakening mind, encouraging members of the congregation to generate the awakening mind and take the Bodhisattva vow themselves. Next, he repeated verses from 'Entering into the Bodhisattva's Way' in celebration.

Today my birth is fruitful, my human life is justified. Today, I am born into the family of the Buddha, now I am a child of the Buddhas.

So that there may be no blemish upon this spotless family, I must now act as becomes my family.

"People around the world seem obsessed with weapons and the use of force," His Holiness observed. "As practitioners of the Buddhadharma we should avoid this. Nothing good comes from the use of force. Killing so many people only brings further suffering. Setting aside attachment, anger and hatred we should work instead to benefit all sentient beings. Much better that developing bodhichitta within ourselves should be our primary aim."

Among several questions from the audience His Holiness was asked what is the main cause not to be separated from the spiritual master. He answered that heeding the teachings you've received and putting them into practice creates a strong link with your teacher.

Another questioner wanted to know whether steady cultivation of practices like the exchanging of self and others would lead to genuine experience. His Holiness replied that if you familiarize your mind with such practice, it will eventually give rise to experience. In terms of bodhichitta you'll feel ever closer to it. He repeated the verse concerning the four immeasurable wishes.

May all beings have happiness and the causes of happiness.

May all beings be free from suffering and the causes of suffering.

May all beings rejoice in the well-being of others.

May all beings live in peace, free from greed and hatred.

"If we familiarize ourselves with bodhichitta, in time we will become imbued with it. I cultivate bodhichitta and the view of emptiness on a daily basis and I feel it has created a solid experience within me."

Asked how a beginner should act to prevent their sense of bodhichitta from slackening His Holiness simply advised that if you persevere with a practice, it will not decline. Finally, he declared that main cause of higher rebirths in the future is to cultivate the awakening mind of bodhichitta and an understanding of emptiness.

The Taiwanese disciples expressed their pleasure at His Holiness's advice with a burst of applause. He left the temple, walked steadily to the lift, smiling at well-wishers as he went, and in the courtyard boarded the golfcart that would carry him home.

Former Chief Justice Commissioner and Deputy Speaker Sonam Sangpo Jadur passes away at 85

30 September 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Sonam Sangpo Jadur, former Tibetan Chief Justice Commissioner and Deputy Speaker of the Tibetan parliament in exile, passed away at the age of 85 on September 28 at his residence in Dolanji Bon settlement after a prolonged illness.

Born on September 28, 1939, in Jadur, Western Tibet, Sonam Sangpo began his education at the age of six at Jadur Monastery, where he learned reading and writing and later served as the monastery's treasurer. After fleeing into exile, he worked as a Hindi translator for Tibetan labourers involved in road construction projects in the Shimla and Kullu regions.

In 1966, under the guidance of His Holiness Menri Trizin, the spiritual head of the Bon tradition, Sonam Sangpo assisted in securing land to establish the Bon settlement in Dolanji. By 1979, he had become the Settlement Officer of Dolanji Bon settlement.

From September 2, 1982, to May 11, 1990, Sonam Sangpo represented the Bon tradition in the 8th and 9th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, then known as the Assembly of Tibetan People's Deputies (ATPD). He was re-elected to the 11th, 12th, and 13th terms of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile from May 29, 1991, to September 24, 2003. During his tenure, he served as Deputy Speaker in the 11th term and again briefly from June 1, 2001, to September 24, 2001, during the 13th term, before resigning to become a Justice.

On September 26, 2001, Sonam Sangpo was appointed as a Justice of the Supreme Justice Commission of the Tibetan Government-in-Exile, later becoming the Chief Justice on October 1, 2002, a position he held until his retirement on September 28, 2004. After his retirement, he continued to serve as Vice President of the Tibetan Bon Foundation following the instructions of the 33rd Menri Trizin. On Monday, the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) held a prayer service to honour the memory of Sonam Sangpo Jadur. The Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile has also sent a letter of condolence to his family and relatives.

Taiwanese devotees attend teachings of the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala

30 September 2024, The Print

The 14th Dalai Lama recently delivered a spiritual discourse on 'The Three Principal Aspects of the Path' (lamtso namsum), a key text by the revered Tibetan scholar Tsongkhapa.

The event was organised at the request of Taiwanese devotees and took place at the Tsuglagkhang, the main Tibetan temple in Dharamshala. More than 5,000 people, including 1,200 Taiwanese devotees, foreigners, Tibetan monks, nuns, and locals, gathered for this special teaching in the northern Indian hill town.

This discourse attracted people from diverse religious backgrounds, reflecting the Dalai Lama's message of universal compassion. Tien Nai-Wen, a Taoist from Taiwan, expressed how meaningful the experience was for him.

"This is very important for me because I am from Taiwan, and many people in Taiwan appreciate the Dalai Lama's teachings. Even though I come from a different religion, the Dharma says all religions can come together to share these holy teachings, so I came here. I feel very happy to be part of this," Tien told ANI.

Tien also emphasised how the teachings on compassion and kindness resonated with him personally, and she expressed a desire to share these lessons with his Taoist community back in Taiwan.

"We have over 1,200 people from Taiwan here, but I am the only Taoist. I hope to bring these teachings back to Taoism because they, too, can benefit from it," she added.

Another Taiwanese devotee, Lin Yaan Yi, echoed these sentiments, noting the spiritual enrichment gained from attending the Dalai Lama's teachings. "I'm very happy to be here, and it's been beneficial for me to develop compassion for others and *Bodhichitta* in my mind. We came to wish His Holiness a happy birthday and to gain insight from his wisdom," she said.

The event, highlighted the Dalai Lama's enduring appeal across cultures and religious backgrounds, offering a moment of unity and spiritual growth for all those in attendance. (ANI)

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Addresses Tibetan Community in Dehradun: Emphasises Cultural Preservation and International Support

29 September 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Visits Manduwala Lingsang Settlement, Calls for Youth Engagement in Tibetan Buddhism and Language Preservation. Photo / Tenzin Tenkyong / bod.asia / CTA

Dehradun: On the morning of 28 September 2024, Sikyong Penpa Tsering began his official visit to Tibetan Settlements in the Dehradun area. Upon arrival at Manduwala Tibetan Settlement, Sikyong was warmly welcomed by the local Tibetan Settlement Officer Dondup Gyalpo, the President of the Local Tibetan Assembly, the President of the Local Tibetan Freedom Movement, representatives from various monasteries, and representatives from both governmental and non-governmental Tibetan organizations in the area.

After the welcome, Sikyong visited Gesar Temple, Zamön Gyalyung Ling Monastery, and Palpung Kunkhyab Chöling Monastery. Subsequently, he delivered a speech to the public at the Lingsang Community Hall (Manduwala).

At the beginning of the speech program, Dehradun Tibetan Settlement Officer Dondup Gyalpo welcomed the Sikyong and presented the annual report of the settlement. Afterwards, Sikyong addressed the gathering.

In his speech, the Sikyong praised the local organisations of Lingsang settlement for their ongoing efforts to address their local issues. He also promised that the Central Tibetan Administration would provide as much support as possible based on the fundamental needs of the local people.

Sikyong highlighted the challenge of the decreasing number of monks in Tibetan Buddhist monasteries in exile and stressed that, according to the records of the Department of Religion and Culture, the number of monks has decreased over the past three years. He further noted that the majority of current monks are from Himalayan communities.

Sikyong underscored the significance of Tibetan Buddhism as a source of pride for the Tibetan people and urged the youth to engage with its teachings. He articulated that the global attention towards the Tibetan cause is, in part, a reflection of the worldwide dissemination of Buddhism, a phenomenon attributed to the benevolence of His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

He pointed out that among all refugee communities worldwide, only Tibetans have a fully democratic system in exile. For the future stability of the Tibetan community, including the Central Tibetan Administration, he stressed the importance of abiding by local laws, properly registering organisations, following correct procedures for receiving foreign funds, and carefully preserving land ownership documents. He announced that the CTA plans to offer workshops to raise awareness about Indian laws.

Similarly, Sikyong explained that Chinese President Xi Jinping is forcibly transforming all ethnicities into Chinese people with communist ideology. He clarified that in Tibet, there are increasing restrictions on teaching the Tibetan language, and private schools teaching Tibetan are being closed.

He reminded everyone of the value of the Tibetan language, especially as the medium for priceless Buddhist scriptures and philosophical texts. In connection with this, he explained that the Department of Religion and Culture is digitising important texts to create a Tibetan digital library to preserve Tibetan Buddhism.

Furthermore, he mentioned that the Tibetan language has now entered the field of artificial intelligence.

Additionally, Sikyong explained that this year, through the joint strategic efforts of the Central Tibetan Administration, the International Campaign for Tibet, and other Tibet-related organisations, they were able to establish the Resolve Tibet Act in the United States. He elaborated that this act recognises the Tibet-China conflict as an unresolved international issue, acknowledges Tibetans' right to self-determination, Shows that the U.S. government is challenging China's false narrative that Tibet has been a part of China since ancient times, clarifies that "Tibet" refers to all three traditional provinces of Tibet.

Sikyong emphasised that the establishment of such legislation marks a new step forward in the Tibetan freedom struggle.

China deepens repression in Tibet after passage of Resolve Tibet Act in US

29 September 2024, News Day

Top security official of China Chen Wenqing visited Tibet in the second week of September and instructed the local authorities to step up a crackdown against ethnic Tibetans, branding them as 'separatists.' It is a different question who these separatists are as China is in illegal occupation of Tibet. The move by the Chinese Communist Party to step up security in Tibet is believed to be a knee-jerk reaction to the passage in the U.S. Congress of the Resolve Tibet Act which empowers the U.S. government to put pressure on Beijing to hold talks with the Dalai Lama.

Coming from the Head of the dreaded Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission of the CCP, the threat is a cause of serious concern for the Tibetan people. The Commission oversees the vast coercive apparatus of the party-state. It is the main agency of the CCP, headed by a politburo member of the party, to maintain the supremacy of the CCP over the coercive apparatus of the state, to organize surveillance and to supervise campaigns of repression.

In his three-day stay in Tibet, Chen went to the Tibet Autonomous Region and some of the Tibetan autonomous prefectures outside TAR, across Yunnan, Sichuan, Gansu and Qinghai; calling for "resolute crackdown" against separatists, asking local officials to "maintain stability and guard against pro-independence activities." In the plateau he presided over a meeting on "anti-secession and stability maintenance in Tibet," indicating a possible increase in surveillance and restrictions.

Reports from the Central Tibetan Administration in Dharamshala in India indicate that the occupation forces of China have already started putting into practice its threat of a "resolute crackdown" in Tibetan areas. They have been trying to suppress the religion, culture and language of the Tibetan people. Now in the name of crackdown on separatists the degree of oppression on the Tibetan people will increase.

Top judges and prosecutors of China have also gone round Tibet in recent weeks. President of the Supreme People's Court Zhang Jun has visited Tibetan courts and said it is necessary to hand down tough punishment to keep up the pressure on "violent terrorism, ethnic separatism and other serious criminal crimes," says a report in South China Morning Post. Head of the Supreme People's Procuratorate Ying Yong has inspected the office of the public prosecutors in Tibet. He has stressed on the need for prosecutors to "harshly crack down in accordance with the law on all kinds of separatist infiltration, sabotage activities and crimes endangering national security.”

The Central Tibetan Administration quotes a report by Radio Free Asia that Lobsang Thabkhey, a 55-year-old Tibetan Buddhist monk, has lately been sentenced to three years in prison after a secret trial. Arrested in June 2023, he was accused of possessing and republishing books from the exiled Tibetan community and for having contact with people outside the region when he had been in charge of the library of Kirti Monastery in Ngaba County in the Sichuan province.

While signing into law the Resolve Tibet Act, a bipartisan legislation passed by the U.S. House of Representatives in July last, U.S. President Joe Biden had said it showed the bipartisan commitment in America to advancing the human rights of Tibetans and supporting efforts to preserve their distinct linguistic, cultural, and religious heritage. He also called on Beijing to resume direct dialogue, without preconditions, with the Dalai Lama or his representatives to “seek a settlement that resolves differences and leads to a negotiated agreement on Tibet.” The Act empowers State Department officials to actively and directly counter disinformation about Tibet by the Chinese government. It also rejects Beijing’s claims that Tibet has been part of China since “ancient times,”

The move of the U.S. government to take steps to protect human rights of Tibetans and to preserve their language, culture and religion has been a badly needed one. According to reports from Tibet reaching the Central Tibetan Administration, in a systematic move to erase Tibetan identity the Chinese government has introduced a policy for education aimed at assimilation of the Tibetans with the Han Chinese identity. Colonial-style boarding schools have been set up in the plateau and young monks from monasteries as well as children from Tibetan families are being asked to join these schools where they are brought up in the Han Chinese way of life and brainwashed to forget their Tibetan identity, language, culture and religion.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Talks on Significance of Tibetan Plateau and Tibet’s Water Resources at Sambhota Tibetan School, Herbertpur

28 September 2024, CTA

On the morning of 27 September 2024, Sikyong Penpa Tsering visited Sambhota Tibetan Day School in Herbertpur. Upon his arrival, Sikyong received a warm welcome from the school’s Principal, Sonam Palkyi, along with faculty members and students. Following this, Sikyong toured the classroom and observed the class sessions.

Afterwards, during a gathering, Sikyong discussed the spiritual connection between Tibet and India and emphasised the geopolitical significance of the Tibetan plateau and its ecological importance. Sikyong also commended the Tibetan and Indian teachers and students at the school for exemplifying harmony and appreciated the coexistence of two different cultures within the same educational environment.

In this connection, Sikyong Penpa Tsering mentioned that although Tibetans have been in exile in India for over 65 years, awareness about the Tibet issue among the Indian public remains very low. Therefore, he considers it important to raise awareness about the Tibet issue among the Indian public, especially among the youth. Sikyong stated that he has been giving talks about Tibet at various Indian educational institutions, including universities. Similarly, since many local Indian students are studying at the Sambhota Day School in Herbertpur, he felt it was important to give a talk about Tibet there as well.

In his talk, Sikyong narrated the historical accounts of the first Tibetan king, who originated from India, and the derivation of Tibetan scripts and religion from India. Likewise, Sikyong also spoke about the current relations between the two nations and expressed his appreciation to the government and people of India for extending assistance to Tibetan refugees following His Holiness-led Tibetans’ flight into exile.

Similarly, Sikyong discussed the significance of the Tibetan Plateau, which is also known as the “Roof of the World,” the “Third Pole,” or “Asia’s Water Tower.” Sikyong said, “The rivers originating from Tibet, such as Yarlung Tsangpo, Machu, and Dzachu, have become the lifeline for hundreds of millions of people in Asia". Sikyong further pointed out that two of the world's oldest civilizations, the Indus Valley Civilization and the Chinese Civilization, also depended on Tibet's rivers.

However, Sikyong shared his concerns regarding the Chinese Communist government's ongoing mismanagement of Tibetan rivers, which will have severe repercussions in the future.

Tibetan activist begins 5th cycle rally for Tibet cause

September 28 2024, Phayul

TYC activists during the cycle rally from Dehradun to Delhi (Photo/TYC)

amyang Tenzin, a 64-year-old Tibetan activist, embarked on his fifth Tibet Awareness Solo-Cycle Rally from Tawang to Delhi on September 27. The rally started at Urgenling, the birthplace of the 6th Dalai Lama in Tawang. His rally coincides with the 37th anniversary of the revival of Tibetan protest uprising in Lhasa in 1987.

The veteran cyclist's journey will span from Mon Tawang, Arunachal Pradesh to Jantar Mantar in New Delhi. Throughout his route, Tenzin plans to highlight issues faced by Tibetans under Chinese occupation, including the forced closure of educational institutions and the systematic attempts to eradicate Tibetan identity, language, and culture.

Tenzin's objectives for this rally focus on three points; demanding the return of Tibet to the Tibetan people; the end to Chinese policies that aim to eliminate Tibetan identity. and appeals to the Indian government and citizens for support for Tibet.

This rally marks Tenzin's fifth awareness cycle. His previous journeys covered distances across India. The first took him from Dharamshala to Bodhgaya, spanning 3000 km. The second journey went from Bylakuppe in Karnataka to Dekyiling in Dehradun, also covering 3000 km. His third rally went from Dekyiling to Delhi, a distance of 250 km. The fourth journey took him from Ladakh Khardung La to Dharamshala, covering 800 km

The Tibetan Youth Congress also launched a bicycle rally campaign a few days prior on September 24th, set to conclude on October 1st, marking the 75th anniversary of the People's Republic of China. The rally, which involves over 50 Tibetans of all ages, began in Dekyiling and will pass through Chandigarh before culminating in New Delhi.

Gonpo Dhondup, President of the Tibetan Youth Congress, stated that the campaign's objectives are to demand an end to policies aimed at eradicating Tibetan identity, call for human rights for Tibetans inside Tibet, and appeal for increased support from India for the Tibetan cause.

Tibetan anthology feature showcasing stories of exile and identity to premiere at Busan Film Festival

27 September 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

'State of Statelessness', a Tibetan-language anthology feature film, has been officially selected for the 29th Busan International Film Festival, where it will have its world premiere from October 2-11 in the 'A Window on Asian Cinema' section. This prestigious selection is a major milestone for Tibetan cinema, as Busan is one of Asia's leading film festivals, known for showcasing unique voices and compelling stories from across the continent.

Produced by the Dharamshala-based Drung Tibetan Filmmakers' Collective, the film poignantly explores themes of statelessness and migration through four distinct stories about Tibetans living in exile. Directed by Tibetan filmmakers based in India, America, and Vietnam, the anthology sheds light on the painful realities of displacement faced by Tibetans scattered around the world.

According to the film's synopsis, the anthology tells four compelling stories; In one, a Tibetan father in Vietnam explains to his young daughter how the Mekong River, which originates in his homeland, flows into the sea in their new country, symbolising their journey into exile. Another story follows two estranged sisters who reunite to cremate their mother, only to discover that years of separation have created deep emotional complexities they must confront. The third narrative focuses on Sonam, who is recovering from a family tragedy when a visit from a long-lost school friend from America forces him and his wife to face the fragility of their lives. In the final tale, a son returns to his late father's home in Dharamshala, where he uncovers a family secret that challenges his understanding of both his heritage and identity.

Tenzin Tsetan Choklay, the New York and Dharamshala-based filmmaker who also produced 'State of Statelessness', told Phayul that the film's selection for the prestigious Busan International Film Festival marks a significant milestone for Tibetan filmmakers. He believes this recognition elevates Tibetan voices and highlights the diversity and complexity of their narratives.

"The global stage provided by Busan brings much-needed attention to our stories. This recognition not only validates the artistic merit of our work but also gives momentum to the broader Tibetan filmmaking community, encouraging younger generations to share their own stories and, hopefully, attracting more support and opportunities for Tibetan cinema. This has been our goal at Drung Tibetan Filmmakers' Collective since the very beginning," the Tibetan filmmaker told Phayul. Tenzin Tsetan Choklay's feature documentary film "Bringing Tibet Home" also premiered at the Busan International Film Festival in 2014 in its Wide Angle section.

A still from the film (Photo/BIFF)

He said that the film is deeply rooted in the themes of exile, migration, and identity. "Through the personal and intimate stories in the film, we aim to evoke empathy and understanding for those who live without a state to call their own. We hope that viewers will leave with a greater appreciation for the shared human experience, realising that the struggles of stateless people are universal, and that we all face similar challenges regardless of nationality or borders," he further said.

The film director also spoke about how the film is shaped by the personal and collective experiences of exile. "The anthology format allows different filmmakers, including myself, to bring our unique perspectives from various corners of the Tibetan diaspora. Even within our own exile community, there are diverse experiences. The style of the film is influenced by where each of us comes from and the transient spaces we inhabit. My own experience of living in Dharamshala, South Korea, New York, and Europe has shaped the way I see the world and tell stories. The themes of disconnection, longing, and identity that run through the film are deeply personal to all of us who worked on it," he shared.

Drung is a collective of Tibetan filmmakers based in Dharamshala fostering a community that shares knowledge, skills and connections to tell stories about Tibet, India and beyond. The group is dedicated to the advancement of story-telling in the Tibetan exile communities by building a community of story-tellers through workshops, film screenings and other educational programs.

Amid EU, others' criticisms, China claims over 100 countries' support for its stance on rights situation in Tibet etc

27 September 2024, Tibetan Review

The European Union (EU), a body of 27 countries, on Sep 24 reiterated its concerns about the continuous dire human rights situation in Tibet, highlighting the obligatory boarding schooling, mass DNA sampling and closure of Tibetan schools, said the Central Tibetan Administration on its Tibet.net website Sep 26. China, on the other hand, claimed the support of over 100 countries for its position on issues related to Xinjiang, Tibet and Hong Kong regions, namely that any criticism of human rights there amounts to interfering in China's internal affairs, according to its official globaltimes.cn Sep 25.

The Tibet.net report also said the EU highlighted the harassment, intimidation and surveillance faced by human rights defenders, lawyers, journalists, media workers, writers and intellectuals, including at transnational level. They also continue to face exit bans, house arrest, torture and ill-treatment, unlawful detention, sentencing and enforced disappearance including though Residential Surveillance in a Designated Location (RSDL) that could amount to torture and ill-treatment.

The EU was also stated to have urged China to uphold its obligations under national and international law, including its own Constitution to respect, protect and fulfil human rights for all, including Tibetans.

The EU has reaffirmed its commitment to closely monitoring the preservation of fundamental freedoms, cultural heritage and identity of Tibetans and called on China to ensure full bilingual education both in Tibetan and Chinese at all levels of the schooling system.

The EU also wanted China to allow more visits from the International Community, UN Special Procedures Mandate Holders and civil society organisations to Tibet. It has also called for the immediate and unconditional release of Anya Sengdra, Chadrel Rinpoche, Go Sherab Gyatso, Golog Palden, Semkyi Dolma and Tashi Dorje, among others.

The Chinese claim of opposing the politicization of issues on human rights followed statements made "by the US and a handful of countries which smear China's human rights situation during the ongoing 57th session of the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Council," said the official globaltimes.cn report.

The report cited a joint statement made by Cuba “on behalf of nearly 80 countries” as saying “issues related to Xinjiang, Xizang, and Hong Kong Special Administrative Region are internal affairs of China”. “They oppose the politicization of human rights issues and the application of double standards, as well as using human rights as an excuse to interfere in the internal affairs of other countries,” the report quoted those more than 100 countries as saying.

Additional Secretary Tenzin Lekshay Addresses Students and Faculty of the Central Institute for Higher Tibetan Studies on the Middle Way Policy

27 September 2024, CTA

A Moment from the Address at the Central Institute for Higher Tibetan Studies Tenzin Lekshay, Additional Secretary of the Department of Information and International Relations, Central Tibetan Administration, spoke about the Middle Way Policy at the Central Institute for Higher Tibetan Studies in Sarnath on 27 September 2024.

The Honorable Vice Chancellor of the Institute welcomed the gathering, attended by all the teachers and students. The audience remained attentive throughout the talk, taking into account the historical context and current implications of the policy.

Students and faculty alike posed insightful questions during the Q&A session, demonstrating their deep interest in and understanding of the Middle Way Policy.

-Report filed by the Tibet Advocacy Section, DIIR, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Assesses Damages Caused by Heavy Rainfall at Puruwala Tibetan Settlement

27 September 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering visits Puruwala Tibetan Settlement. Photo / Tenzin Tenkyong / bod.asia

On the morning of 26 September 2024, Sikyong Penpa Tsering visited Puruwala Tibetan Settlement to assess the damages caused by heavy rainfall that disconnected several roads.

Following this, Sikyong visited the Tibetan Children’s Village School (TCV) in Selakui and its affiliate, the Tibetan Private Industrial Training Institute (ITI), in Dehradun.

Upon arrival, Sikyong was accorded a warm welcomed by school’s teachers and students, including Tsultrim Kelsang, the Principal of the Tibetan Children’s Village School, Selakui, and Tenzin Choesang, the Director of ITI.

At a gathering later that day, Sikyong addressed the students and staff members, stressing that Tibetans outside Tibet have a special responsibility to uphold the unique Tibetan identity and maintain the rich Tibetan cultural heritage as the Communist Party of China’s intensified suppressions inside Tibet by enforcing strict regulations. While sharing insights on Tibetan history, Sikyong advised students to go through ancient histories of Tibet to properly comprehend the facts amidst China’s increasing distortion of Tibet’s past.

Furthermore, Sikyong provided an overview of the Sino-Tibetan dialogue, noting that since 2010, there has been no communication between the two sides. However, Sikyong disclosed the existence of a back-channel communication, over which he opined his pessimism for its effectiveness. Therefore, Sikyong emphasised that Tibetans must explore every opportunity that the current domestic and international political situations of the PRC offer.

Additionally, the exile Tibetan political leader spoke about the geopolitical significance of the Tibetan plateau and China’s mismanagement of Tibet’s water resources, which feed billions of downstream residents. Thereafter, Sikyong and his aides toured the school and training centre's premises.

After concluding his official visit to TCV Selakui, Sikyong visited Khera Camp Tibetan Settlement and Baluwala Tibetan Settlement later that afternoon. At Khera Camp, Sikyong made obeisance inside Gongkar Choede monastery.

Sikyong's day-long engagements ended at Herbertpur Tibetan Settlement, where he was extended a welcome reception by Settlement officer Dolma Tsering, the President of the Local Tibetan Assembly, Tenzin Sungrab, and the President of the Regional Tibetan Freedom Movement, Thupten Gyaltsen.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering was accompanied by Additional Secretary Tashi Dickey from the Department of Home, Pema Youdon from the Department of Health, and Thupten Rinzin from SARD.

Gonmo Kyi speaks out about her treatment in new video

26 September 2024, Free Tibet

Gono Kyi, the sister of imprisoned Tibetan businessman Dorjee Tashi, has shared a new video talking about her efforts to raise her brother's case with authorities.

In the video, released 24 September, Gonmo Kyi talks about her efforts to secure a retrial for Dorjee Tashi. She states how her protests in front of the court in Lhasa have seen her repeatedly being detained and beaten by Public Security Bureau officers and that she is in poor health.

On 27 July, the Court of Chengguan District of Lhasa City dismissed an appeal that she lodged against her treatment by PSB officials. Tibet Watch has seen the court's documents in which court authorities stated that "petitioner, Gonmo Kyi, actions constitute breaking of the social rules and laws of the state." It further stated that "Chengguan District of Lhasa City Public Security Bureau has warned her on several occasions but she didn't obey the warning. Therefore, the Public Security Bureau had detained her".

Tibet Watch reported in April that Gonmo Kyi was severely beaten that month, one of several occasions when she suffered ill-treatment or was threatened. On other occasions, police have simply attempted to obstruct her protest from public view. In December 2023, Gonmo Kyi was held in detention for a week. Gonmo Kyi's brother, Dorjee Tashi, is serving a life prison sentence. Prior to his arrest in 2008, he was a hotelier and philanthropist. He was charged with loan fraud, a charge his family and those following his case vigorously contest. He was also reportedly subject to torture in detention in 2010.

Gonmo Kyi and other family members have pushed for a retrial and to be able to visit him in prison. No in-person visit has been permitted since 2019.

"I have petitioned the Lhasa Court to retry Dorjee Tashi's case in accordance with the law of the State but they have refused to address it. The Public Security Bureau repeatedly detained me, dragged me and beat me! So, presently, I'm in an ill health condition, afflicted by these repeated beatings! I have no power/right to petition for a retrial of my brother's case! I will continue to protest and petition unless and until the Lhasa Court addresses this appeal."

Unclimbed peak in Arunachal Pradesh named after 6th Dalai Lama, Tsangyang Gyatso

26 September 2024, CTA, Bikash Singh

A team from the National Institute of Mountaineering and Adventure Sports (NIMAS) has successfully scaled an unnamed 20,942 ft high peak in Arunachal Pradesh's Gorichen range. The peak, now named Tsangyang Gyatso Peak, honors the 6th Dalai Lama. This challenging expedition highlights Arunachal Pradesh as a key destination for mountaineering and adventure sports.

Guwahati: A team from the National Institute of Mountaineering and Adventure Sports (NIMAS), has successfully scaled an unnamed and unclimbed 6383 MSL or 20,942 ft high peak in Gorichen range of Arunachal Pradesh Himalayas on Tawang-West Kameng region.

The peak was one of the most technically challenging and unexplored summits in the region. After overcoming immense challenges including sheer ice walls, treacherous crevasses, and a 2-kilometer-long glacier, the team has immortalized the momentous feat by naming the peak "Tsangyang Gyatso Peak" in honour of His Holiness the 6th Dalai Lama Rigzen Tsangyang Gyatso. Click here to read more details.

European Union Reiterates Concern about the Continuous Dire Situation in Tibet and Calls for the Preservation of Tibetan Identity

26 September 2024, CTA

In a comprehensive statement delivered under item 4 during the ongoing 57th session of the United Nations Human Rights Council, the European Union reiterated its concerns about the continuous dire human rights situation in Tibet, highlighting the obligatory boarding schooling, mass DNA sampling and closure of Tibetan schools.

Additionally, the EU highlighted the harassment, intimidation and surveillance faced by human rights defenders, lawyers, journalists, media workers, writers and intellectuals, including at transnational level. They also continue to face exit bans, house arrest, torture and ill-treatment, unlawful detention, sentencing and enforced disappearance including through Residential Surveillance in a Designated Location (RSDL) that could amount to torture and ill-treatment.

Furthermore, the EU urged China to uphold its obligations under national and international law, including its own Constitution to respect, protect and fulfil human rights for all, including Tibetans.

The EU reaffirmed its commitment to closely monitoring the preservation of fundamental freedoms, cultural heritage and identity of Tibetans and called on China to ensure full bilingual education both in Tibetan and Chinese at all levels of the schooling system.

Finally, the EU encouraged China to allow more visits from the International Community, UN Special Procedures Mandate Holders and civil society organisations to Tibet. It also called for the immediate and unconditional release of Anya Sengdra, Chadrel Rinpoche, Go Sherab Gyatso, Golog Palden, Semkyi Dolma and Tashi Dorje, among others.

Welcoming the statement, Representative Rigzin Genkhang of the Office of Tibet Brussels expressed gratitude to the European Union for its commitment to addressing the dire human rights violations in Tibet and urged for continued support.

The full statement is available here.

-Report filed by Office of Tibet, Brussels

French Museum removes “Xizang”, reverts to ‘Tibet’ for artefacts after public protest

26 September 2024, Phayul

The Musée du quai Branly in Paris has removed the term “Xizang” from its descriptions of Tibetan artefact, following widespread public outcry. The museum has reverted to using “Tibet” in its catalogue and exhibition labels for items related to Tibet.

The museum’s decision comes after strong opposition from Tibetans and their supporters in France, who swiftly mobilised, launching petitions and making repeated appeals for the museum to correct its labelling. Scholars and activists argued that the use of “Xizang” – the Chinese term for Tibet – aligns with China’s official narrative, which they say undermines Tibet’s distinct cultural identity and historical autonomy.

However, the Musée Guimet, which renamed its Tibetan exhibition spaces as the “Himalayan World,” has yet to respond to similar appeals. Meanwhile, the Branly Museum is scheduled to meet with representatives from six Tibetan NGOs in France, who had previously sent formal letters to both museums, seeking discussions on the implications of these terminology changes.

President Penpa Tsering, the political leader of the exile Tibetan government officially known as the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), also condemned the change in terminology. In a letter sent to French officials and the directors of both museums on September 14, Tsering argued that using “Xizang” is part of a broader Chinese strategy to erode Tibetan identity. He urged the museums to reinstate “Tibet” in their exhibits to uphold historical accuracy.

Echoing these concerns, the Tibet Museum of the CTA released a statement, calling the museums’ decisions an alarming distortion of history and an attack on Tibet’s cultural identity. Tenzin Topdhen, the museum’s director, called on both the Musée Guimet and Musée du quai Branly to correct the terminology to ensure an accurate representation of Tibetan heritage.

Tibetans and their supporters in France have been actively protesting these changes, organising petitions, contacting museum officials, and raising awareness across social media platforms. Many view the museums’ actions as part of China’s broader effort to control the global narrative around Tibet and its cultural legacy.

Tibetans and activists call for Tibet Intergroup at the European Parliament

26 September 2024, ICT

This week a group of determined Tibetans and Tibet activists from six countries in Europe participated in the Tibetan Empowerment Days. The event, organized by the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) from September 23-26, brought together 12 Tibetans and Tibet activists from six European countries – Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, Ireland and the Netherlands – to Brussels.

Participants engaged with 15 EU policymakers and their representatives, shared their stories and pushed for stronger support for Tibet within European institutions. They urged their representatives in the European Parliament for the re-establishment of the Tibet Intergroup and appealed for stronger support for Tibet at the European Union level.

ICT’s EU Policy Director Vincent Metten said: “Tibetan Empowerment Days are an excellent opportunity not only to train and empower young Tibetans to become effective advocates for Tibet, but also to raise awareness about the critical situation in Tibet within the new European Parliament following the 2024 European election. As the human rights situation inside Tibet deteriorates at an alarming pace, it is crucial that Tibet remains on the European political agenda and that Members of the European Parliament take new initiatives in support of the Tibetan people.”

This year’s edition of the Tibetan Empowerment Days was a direct follow-up to the EU4Tibet campaign – during which over 100 European elections candidates signed a “Pledge for Tibet” committing to support the Tibetan people in the European Parliament if elected – and focused on transforming those pledges into concrete actions. One key recommendation that participants passed on to their representatives was the need for the re-establishment of the European Parliament’s Tibet Intergroup, which has historically played a pivotal role in keeping Tibet on the European agenda.

The four-day program began with a comprehensive training on EU-China policies, recent developments in Tibet as well as advocacy and communication techniques. Participants then had the opportunity to meet with dozens of Members of the European Parliament from different political groups to raise awareness about the alarming situation in Tibet and appeal for EU action on issues such as transnational repression, Chinese government’s interferences in the succession of Tibetan Buddhist leaders, the environmental degradation on the Tibetan plateau as well as China’s increasing interferences in Europe. Participants also engaged in discussions with an official from the European External Action Service (EEAS) and with representatives from NGOs working on China – including Amnesty International and the World Uyghur Congress.

The Executive Director of the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy, Ms. Tenzin Dawa, also participated in the meetings to present her organization’s latest report on China’s transnational repression of Tibetans.

The event was supported by the Taiwan Foundation for Democracy as well as the Office of Tibet in Brussels.

Tibetan leader claims cultural identity threats from Chinese policies

26 September 2024, Awaz The Voice

Exiled Tibetan leader Sikyong Penpa Tsering has emphasised that the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) is making systematic efforts to suppress Tibetan identity, including shutting down cultural and religious centres.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the political leader of the Kashag (the executive branch of the Central Tibetan Administration), explained that these actions are part of a larger strategy to make Tibetan culture more Chinese and erase its unique heritage, according to a press release from the Central Tibetan Administration.

He also expressed concern about the government’s recent change in terminology, using “Xizang” instead of “Tibet,” which he believes is an attempt to distort Tibet’s historical and cultural identity.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering made these remarks during his visit to the Sakya Tibetan Society Settlement in Puruwalla as part of his tour of Tibetan communities in Uttarakhand and Himachal Pradesh.

During his visit, Sikyong shared updates on the 16th Kashag’s political and administrative work, focusing on the serious situation in Tibet under the CCP. He also spoke about the importance of the Tibetan plateau in global politics and reaffirmed the Kashag’s commitment to the Middle Way Approach.

This approach aims for genuine autonomy for Tibet within China. He shared the Vision Paper, which outlines the Kashag’s long-term goals and emphasises the need for ongoing international support for Tibetan rights.

After interacting with the community, Sikyong visited several local institutions, including the Sakya Magon Shedra and Sambhota Tibetan School. He then went to the Paonta Cholsum Tibetan Settlement, where he visited Shalu Monastery and continued to raise awareness about the challenging situation of Tibetan culture and religion under Chinese rule.

He also informed attendees about current projects, like digitising important documents and creating a Tibetan digital library, which are designed to strengthen the administration of the Tibetan community in exile.

Senior officials from the Central Tibetan Administration accompanied Sikyong during his visit, highlighting their commitment to supporting Tibetans living outside Tibet.

Tibetan artist’s installation ‘Biography of a Thought’ exhibited at Metropolitan Museum of Art

24 September 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York has recently unveiled a remarkable installation titled “Biography of a Thought”, featuring an intricate series of Tibetan mandala inspired paintings by renowned Tibetan artist Tenzing Rigdol. Based between Nepal and New York, Rigdol’s work reflects a deep engagement with Tibetan spiritual traditions, reinterpreted through his lens.

Dissecting his thoughts, Rigdol shared that the conceptualisation and creation of the mandalas took a span of five years. He dedicated two years to the work in New York and an additional three years in Kathmandu, Nepal, with the support of his team. The “Biography of a Thought” mandalas delve into the complex layers of human consciousness. Drawing inspiration from the ancient tradition of sand mandalas, Rigdol has reimagined this sacred art form using modern materials, with a particular emphasis on at least 50 shades of blue, which serves as the dominant colour throughout the installation. The use of blue, symbolic of both the sky and ocean, evoking the vastness and depth of thought.

The installation is structured into two halves, with four large paintings adorning the walls. The first panel introduces the fundamental principles of tantra, which are central to Tibetan Buddhism. At the core of the exhibit is a striking visual element—the artist's own head wrapped in cloth, an image that recurs throughout Rigdol's body of work.

"In most of my work, I have this one element that is repeated. I am in the painting with my head wrapped around. In all my paintings, it mostly symbolises not that I celebrate ignorance, but I am saying I am ignorant. I don't know everything, but the little that I know, I want to share with you," Rigdol explained in an interview with the MET.

Rigdol's philosophical exploration is also reflected in the acronym of the exhibit's title, 'Biography of a Thought', which spells out BOAT. He elaborated on the significance of this in one of the paintings, "In the first painting, you have myself thrown into the world, ready to learn, ready to unwrap a little bit more. When I was young, I studied in computer class, and they used to say, G.I.G.O.—garbage in, garbage out. I thought it was talking about karma. The first panel is really about how we throw garbage and everything into the ocean, and you can also see the karma—where everything you plant comes back," he said.

The second panel delves into the idea of how an unstable mind can create an unstable world, highlighting how human conflicts arise. It referenced significant historical tragedies like the bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Another powerful image in the panel is the Twin Towers, evoking memories of 9/11. Rigdol explained that during the creation process, the George Floyd incident occurred, stirring widespread anger and frustration. The artwork also addressed the heart-breaking issue of gun violence, particularly involving children, a pressing concern in America.

Rigdol connected these events to a deeper tantric philosophy. "In Tantra, you don't revisit the past to inherit hatred or to worsen things. You only visit the past to inherit its wisdom," he noted, emphasising the importance of learning from history without being consumed by it.

In the third panel, the focus shifts toward finding stability. Rigdol opened with a nod to Picasso's Les Femmes d'Alger, portraying five women. At the center of the piece, he placed an image of Ardhanari—a half-male, half-female figure from Sanskrit tradition. This duality, he explained, symbolises the balance of masculine and feminine energies that make up human existence. "Tantra is really about finding commonality—what is unique in me, but also in you. We are unique, yet the same," he noted.

The contemporary Tibetan artist also referenced modern whistle-blowers like Haugen, Manning, Snowden, and Julian Assange—individuals exposing hidden truths. "These people are warning us, yet our attention is being trained out of us by technologies like the iPhone," he reflected, suggesting that society is losing focus. This concept sets the stage for the fourth panel. The imagery of multiple hands mimics the iconography of a deity, with the American Sign Language phrase "Up is down" appearing in the palms. Rigdol used this metaphor to propose a radical idea: "Wouldn't it be nice if our brain functioned like a stomach? We would only think enough. Once the stomach is full, we vomit. Now is the time to limit your thoughts."

The fourth panel brings the viewer to a place of stillness and reflection. "Now, just sit," Rigdol suggested. "Calm yourself, and observe—what remains, the residue, is likely who you truly are." He played with the metaphor of clouds representing thoughts. "Some clouds are playful, some are angry, while others are simply relaxed," he explained. Gradually, in the fourth panel, these clouds of thought begin to settle, revealing the sky as a symbol of awareness. "The goal," he said, "is to have fewer thoughts and more love."

At the heart of this panel is the idea of interdependence—the notion that, in the end, we are all connected. Rigdol's centrepiece emphasised that individual existence is the interconnectedness of actions and their consequences.

Renaming Tibet "Xizang": Are French Museums Backing Off?

24 September 2024, Bitter Winter

After having been named and shamed for their abject subservience to Xi Jinping, Musée Guimet and Musée du quai Branly are trying to save their reputation.

Or was it just a clerical mistake? A misunderstanding, perhaps? Having been accused of abjectly "bowing to China's demands to rewrite history and erase peoples," two leading Paris museums are trying to back off.

What happened, exactly? On September 1, 2024, "Le Monde" published an op-ed signed by la crème de la crème of French academic Tibetologists and experts of Asian art accusing the Musée Guimet and the Musée du quai Branly of having sold their soul to Xi Jinping. The Musée du quai Branly had changed the name "Tibet" to "Xizang," according to Beijing's diktat, in its catalogues. The Guimet had changed the title of its "Tibetan" rooms to "Himalayan World" rooms.

The scholars reminded the readers of "Le Monde" that calling Tibet "Xizang" is a historical fraud. Readers of "Bitter Winter" know this already, and with all the details. While they were at it, the French scholars also repeated that "Xinjiang" is a questionable Chinese name for East Turkestan, too, and that neither Tibet nor "Xinjiang" were historically part of Imperial China. They noted, however, that "this is well known to specialists but probably less so to admirers of modern China's successes, achieved at the cost of economic exploitation of these territories and the relentless Sinicization of these peoples, thanks to the establishment of a dictatorial regime and the Han's demographic domination."

Adding that hosting the Confucius Institutes, whose real aim is spreading Chinese propaganda, as some French cultural institutions and universities do, is not acceptable either, the scholars wrote that, "Our institutions want to preserve their access to Chinese research fields, sources and archives at all costs, as well as benefit from the financial largesse and loans of museum objects that depend on the goodwill of the Chinese regime. As a result, they are coaxing the threatening power that Xi Jinping's China has become and are bowing to its demands to rewrite history and erase peoples.... That French museums should accept to be dictated to in the rewriting of history is a sign of great weakness. Our scientific and cultural institutions must, as a matter of the utmost urgency, reject any interference by undemocratic foreign regimes."

Normally, faced with the power and money of China, these appeals have no consequences. However, the criticism directed at two prestigious (and beautiful) museums was echoed by media all over the world, which ridiculed France and those who took the decisions about Tibet.

For once, it seems that the campaign had some success. After all, French use to say that ridicule kills. Finally, the Musée du quai Branly stated that it "uses the appellation Tibet in its cartels of the permanent collections and has never ceased to use this appellation in its work on the collections." "Xizang" replaced "Tibet" on the Internet, but this was due to a "technical update in progress that may be misleading." The Musée Guimet claims that, on the contrary, it keeps using "Tibet" on the Internet, and "Himalayan" means that the same rooms are now devoted to both Tibet and Nepal.

We wait for the results of the "technical updates in progress"—and to what will happen when the international media will look the other way. For the time being, we applaud the French scholars who tried to stop the shame before it would be too late—and perhaps succeeded.

Tibetan leaders respond to Biden and Modi's remarks on China at Quad Summit

23 September 2024, ANI

Tibetan leaders have reacted strongly to remarks made by President Biden and Prime Minister Modi regarding China during the recent Quad Summit. Sikyong Pempa Tsering, President of the Central Tibetan Administration, expressed his views on the evolving dynamics within the Quad alliance.

He stated, "It looks like the Quad formation is getting more entrenched and as we have been mentioning over the years the reality of China's threat is very visible so I think India's role particularly in this grouping will be very-very crucial."

Tsering also noted the significance of increased cooperation between the United States and India, particularly on issues like microchips.

"There is a convergence of strategic alliance that needs to be formed because of China and China's behaviour so that's very much clear in this grouping," he said. Tsering pointed out that the competition for influence in the Global South is also an important factor in this geopolitical landscape.

Highlighting the strategic importance of the Indo-Pacific region, Tsering remarked, "Indo Pacific is a very busy maritime trade route from Malacca Strait to Indian Ocean so it is important not only for the countries in this region but it involves a lot of trade." He emphasized that concerns over China's hegemonic claims in the South China Sea and East China Sea have intensified discussions about security and economic issues.

"I think it is very clearly mentioned South China Sea and East China Sea that is where Australia comes into," he said to ANI during the interview.

The Sikyong further indicated that nations in the Asia-Pacific region, including Japan, South Korea, Australia, and New Zealand, are also ramping up their defence spending in response to China's actions. He pointed out, "So all of these countries announce many more money on defence only because of China's behaviour."

Dolma Tsering, Deputy Speaker of the Tibetan Parliament in-exile, also weighed in on the importance of the Quad and the remarks from Biden and Modi. "I think these statements are very important that too coming from America and India.

India becoming a leading power is a very positive thing that's happening around the world so I want to congratulate Prime Minister Modi for that," she stated. Dolma noted that the Quad Summit reflects a unified stance against threats to the rule of law and democratic sovereignty.

She remarked on China's expanding influence, saying, "Looking into Xi Jinping's global ambition of expanding to wherever they are touching is not only intimidation endanger to South Asia but also to the whole world."

Dolma echoed President Biden's concerns, adding, "Therefore, I think President Biden has well said that China is testing us. Us in the sense is the whole world, the democratic setup," Dolma said to ANI.

Dolma Tsering also highlighted the need for a peaceful resolution to global conflicts. "Prime Minister Modi has also told that they are looking for a possible peaceful resolution of conflicts happening around the world," she said. She expressed a specific request to Modi regarding the situation of Tibetans in exile. "The majority of Tibetans are in India, so we want Prime Minister Modi and the stakeholders of the Quad, in America also we have sizeable American Tibetans, in Austria also, Australia also we have a sizeable number of Australian Tibetans," she stated.

Dolma urged global leaders to advocate for Tibetan rights, emphasizing, "We want the leaders to raise the issue of Tibet, the occupation of Tibet also and try to resolve this long-standing decades old conflict between Tibet and China in a most amicable way."

Earlier on Saturday, the Wilmington declaration of the Quad grouping expressed serious concern about the coercive and intimidating manoeuvres in the South China Sea.

In the joint declaration, the leaders from the US, India, Australia, and Japan opposed efforts to disrupt other countries' offshore resource exploitation activities, and reaffirmed that maritime disputes must be resolved peacefully and in accordance with international law.

The leaders asserted that they are of strong conviction that international law, including respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity, along with the maintenance of peace, safety, security, and stability in the maritime domain, should be kept at the topmost priority.

Tibetan NGOs condemn defamatory video threatening the Dalai Lama

23 September 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Eight Tibetan non-governmental organisations held a press conference on Monday, strongly condemning the defamation and death threats directed at His Holiness the Dalai Lama, the revered exiled spiritual leader. The coalition of NGOs denounced the actions and views of an individual identified as Senge, known online as Gangser, a Tibetan resident of Adelaide, Australia

In a video, Senge is seen inciting the assassination of the Dalai Lama and the sabotage of the exile Tibetan government known officially as the Central Tibetan Administration. The video surfaced on micro-messaging apps, sparking discussions during the recently concluded 2024 parliamentary session.

The NGOs labeled his actions as "terrorist behaviour," asserting that they threaten Tibetan unity. The statement emphasised that Senge not only issued life-threatening remarks against the octogenarian spiritual leader with the intent to undermine the Tibetan government in exile but also incited others to defame His Holiness the Dalai Lama. Additionally, he portrayed the exile government as an enemy through his actions and inflammatory rhetoric.

The NGOs called on the Central Tibetan Administration to pursue legal action and ensure the matter is addressed according to the host country's laws. They pledged full support for any campaigns or legal measures undertaken. They also committed to providing the Indian government and relevant local authorities with information on the audio and visual materials Senge has circulated publicly, as well as details of his background. The group said that they will appeal to prevent his entry into India, citing concerns for the safety and security of His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

Dawa Tsering, President of the U-Tsang Cholkha Central Executive Committee, told reporters, "We are committed to providing both financial and human resource support. As discussed in parliament and stated by the Security Minister, this act is illegal and will face prosecution. We will not leave this responsibility solely to the Central Tibetan Administration. All members of the eight organisations will contribute as much as possible to ensure legal action is taken."

Students for a Free Tibet (SFT), a global network of activists headquartered in New York, also issued a statement on September 20, condemning the video as a "promotion of political violence and hate speech". The statement reiterated that both non-violence and rangzen (freedom) are core tenets of SFT's mission. "We will continue to teach and train young people and activists around the world to use strategic nonviolence as the most effective path to achieve freedom in Tibet," the statement affirmed.

Tibetans rally in Paris against museum's use of Chinese term 'Xizang' for Tibet"

23 September 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Around 800 Tibetan activists and supporters gathered in front of the Musée Guimet on Saturday to protest the recent terminology change in the museum's exhibitions, which replaced "Tibet" with "Xizang," a Chinese name for the country.

The demonstration came after reports that two Parisian museums had altered their terminology regarding Tibet. The Musée du quai Branly had replaced "Tibet" with "Xizang Autonomous Region," the romanised version of the Chinese term, in its catalogue of Tibetan artefacts. Similarly, the Musée Guimet renamed its exhibition spaces related to Tibet as the "Himalayan world."

Six Tibetan NGOs in France had earlier sent formal letters to both museums, seeking meetings to discuss the implications of the terminology changes. While the Musée du quai Branly agreed to meet with the groups, the Musée Guimet did not respond, prompting the protest to be centered at its premises. Protesters carried banners that read "Tibet belongs to Tibetans" and "World leaders should not succumb to Chinese pressure," accusing the museums of contributing to China's efforts to erase Tibetan history by using the term "Xizang." The demonstrators vowed to continue their protests until both museums reverted to using the term "Tibet."

Tibetans worldwide expressed solidarity via social media for the cause, where they denounced the terminology change as a blatant attempt to rewrite history. Many have called on cultural institutions to uphold historical truth and resist political pressure from Beijing.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the political leader of the Central Tibetan Administration, also spoke out against the change. In a letter sent to French officials and the directors of both museums on September 14, Tsering argued that the use of "Xizang" was part of a broader Chinese strategy to diminish Tibetan identity. He urged the museums to restore the term "Tibet" in their exhibits to reflect historical accuracy.

The Tibet Museum of the Central Tibetan Administration echoed these concerns, issuing a statement labeling the museums' decisions as an alarming distortion of history and an attack on Tibet's cultural identity. Tenzin Topchen, the museum's director, called on the Musée Guimet and Musée du quai Branly to correct the terminology and ensure that Tibetan heritage is accurately represented.

Tibetans and supporters in France have been actively protesting the museums' changes, organizing petitions, contacting museum directors, and spreading awareness across social media platforms. Many see the actions of these museums as symptomatic of China's broader effort to control the global narrative around Tibet and its cultural legacy.

Central Tibetan Administration Launches Investigation Over Dalai Lama Threat

21 September 2024, Dev Discourse

The Central Tibetan Administration's Security Department is investigating a social media threat against the Dalai Lama. The incident was discussed in the Tibetan Parliament, with MPs expressing concern and condemning the act. Authorities assure there is no security threat, attributing the issue to possible foreign influences.

The Central Tibetan Administration's Security Department is investigating a recent social media threat against the Dalai Lama. The threat was reportedly issued by a person of alleged Tibetan origin in a video message. Discussed during a session of the Tibetan Parliament in exile in Dharamshala, the matter has been handed over to the administration's Security Department for a thorough investigation. Dorjee Tseten, a Tibetan Parliamentarian in exile, confirmed, "This issue was discussed in the recent Tibetan Parliament session. As a member of parliament, I have condemned this criminal act. We have directed the Security Department to conduct a thorough investigation, ensuring the culprit is held accountable according to the law." Tseten noted that the suspect is believed to be based either in Europe or Australia, and a comprehensive investigation will reveal the motive behind the threat. Despite the seriousness of the threat, she reassured the community that there is currently no security threat to the Dalai Lama. Lhagyari Namgyal Dolkar, another MP in exile, expressed disappointment but confidence in the security measures provided by the Indian government for the Dalai Lama. She noted, "China uses various measures to create unrest within the Tibetan community, but I trust the security that India's government has provided. The Tibetan community's love for His Holiness is profound, and I am confident he will continue to spread his message of love, peace, and compassion for a long time."

Bill to include Jonang in Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile fails floor test

20 September 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

A bill proposing the inclusion of the Jonang as the fifth Buddhist tradition represented in the parliament fails the floor test on the final day of the eighth session of the 17th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile leading to disappointment among Jonang followers and supporters.

The bill which received 21 votes out of the required 30 was introduced by the the Kashag (cabinet) on Wednesday, aiming to add Jonang alongside the currently represented schools of Nyingma, Kagyu, Sakya, Gelug, and Yungdrung Bon in the Tibetan Parliament in Exile.

MP Karma Gelek, in support of the bill, stated "The composition of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile has undergone many changes. When the parliament was first introduced in September 1960, there were only 13 MPs—one member each from four religious traditions and three members each from the three provinces. In 1976, Yungdrung Bon was included, increasing the number of MPs representing religious traditions to five and adding one member for each province. In 1991, amendments were made to the charter, allowing for two MPs from each of the five religious traditions, 10 MPs from each province, and the inclusion of MPs from abroad. So, there have been changes, and Jonang leaders have persistently requested the parliament and submitted applications to gain representation in the parliament."

The International Jonang Well-being Association issued a press release shortly after the bill failed to secure the necessary votes to pass, expressing regret over the outcome. The association urged the Tibetan parliament to take full responsibility for any critical issues that may arise in the future concerning the Jonang tradition.

In their statement, the association highlighted that the current charter and related regulations have created discrimination against the Jonang tradition for the past 27 years. They pointed out that despite numerous petitions, appeals, and even peaceful protests, including a hunger strike in 2015, their pleas for equal rights have been ignored.

The association also noted that in 2011, during the 11th Religious Conference presided over by the Dalai Lama, religious leaders unanimously recognized Jonang as an independent school of Tibetan Buddhism. However, this recognition has not been reflected in the charter of the exile government.

The failure to pass this amendment has sparked disappointment and criticism on social media platforms, with many expressing dissatisfaction with the decision. Supporters of the Jonang tradition argue that this continued exclusion undermines the unity and equality within the Tibetan exile community.

CTA Prez criticizes French museums for 'pandering to Chinese wishes'

20 September 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

The President of the Central Tibetan Administration has expressed concern over two prominent Parisian museums' decision to adopt Chinese terminology in their catalogues of Tibetan artefacts.

In a letter dated September 14, the Tibetan political leader criticized the Musée du quai Branly and the Musée Guimet for replacing the term "Tibet" with "Xizang" or "Himalayan World" in their collections.

The letter, addressed to several high-ranking French officials including the Minister of Culture and the Mayor of Paris, as well as museum directors and members of the Tibetan Support Group in the French Senate, denounced the museums' actions as "pandering to the wishes of the People's Republic of China (PRC) government."

He argued that this terminology shift, initiated by China's United Front Work Department in 2023, is part of a broader strategy to erase Tibet's identity as an independent cultural entity. He emphasized that the term "Tibet" historically encompasses three traditional provinces inhabited by Tibetans and that the use of "Xizang" distorts Tibet's history as an independent nation.

"It is particularly disheartening that the said cultural institutions in France—a nation that cherishes liberty, equality, and fraternity—are acting in complicity with the PRC government in its design to erase the identity of Tibet," the letter stated.

The Tibetan leader urged the museums to reconsider their position and accurately represent Tibet in accordance with historical facts, international laws, and the aspirations of the Tibetan people.

This controversy unfolds amid ongoing tensions between Tibet and China, with recent actions by the Chinese government exacerbating the situation. The letter highlighted several measures, including the forced enrollment of over a million Tibetan children in state-run boarding schools, efforts to Sinicize Tibetan Buddhism by exerting control over monasteries and religious education, and the forced relocation of Tibetan nomads, alongside land confiscation under the pretext of environmental protection.

The Tibetan President's letter also highlighted the recent enactment of the Sino-Tibetan Dispute Act by the U.S. government on July 12, 2024. This legislation challenges China's historical claims over Tibet and acknowledges the Chinese government's systematic suppression of Tibetan culture and way of life.

The Tibet Museum also released a statement expressing concern over the museums' decisions, calling it an alarming distortion of history and a denial of Tibet's cultural identity. The museum's director, Tenzin Topdhen, urged the Musée du quai Branly and Musée Guimet to reverse their decisions and restore accurate representation of Tibetan heritage.

Tibetans and supporters of the Tibetan cause in France have initiated various protests against the museums for adopting Chinese names for Tibetan artifacts. They are using petitions, writing to the museum directors, and actively raising awareness on social media platforms.

ICT invites presidential candidates to state positions on Tibet

17 September 2024, ICT

As the November 5, 2024 American presidential election approaches, the candidates and campaigns are presenting their positions on key questions, including America's relationship with China. As the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) recently noted, however, these positions have largely focused on trade relations. Issues such as Tibet and human rights have not been in the foreground.

ICT wrote to candidates Donald Trump, Kamala Harris, JD Vance, and Tim Walz in August requesting statements of their positions on Tibet. The release of such statements would not be unprecedented; in the 2016 election cycle Marco Rubio, then a contender for the Republican candidate for president, answered ICT's questionnaire on Tibet. Four years later Democratic candidate Joe Biden articulated his promises of support for Tibet and the Tibetan people during the 2020 campaign.

Although ICT does not endorse candidates for office, our 50,000 members across the United States have a strong interest in learning more about where each candidate stands on Tibet. We await their responses and will be ready to inform our members and the general public when we receive them.

The text of the letters sent to Trump and Harris campaigns are given below as an example:

On behalf of the 50,000 active American members of the International Campaign for Tibet, please allow me to congratulate you for securing the nomination of your party to run for the presidency of the United States of America.

If elected, among the many issues your administration will confront in the White House is the Chinese Communist Party's ongoing occupation of Tibet, which subjects the Tibetan people to grave human rights abuses. Previous administrations under both parties have supported the Tibetan people and called for human rights and democratic freedoms in Tibet.

They have done this by meeting with the Dalai Lama and representatives of the elected Central Tibetan Administration in exile, by calling on China's leaders to reach a negotiated solution that respects Tibet's unique cultural, religious, and linguistic heritage, and by maintaining America's indefatigable, bipartisan tradition of supporting Tibet. Our laws provide invaluable tools for the White House to insist on a peaceful resolution of the Tibet situation, including the Tibet Policy and Support Act 2020, the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act of 2018 and the Resolve Tibet Act of 2024.

Between 2002 and 2010 the Chinese leaders and Tibetan representatives repeatedly engaged in dialogue in pursuit of peaceful, mutually beneficial resolution with the support of contemporary American administrations. American policy dictates that the United States should take a leading role in fostering the resumption of these negotiations, and we hope that you will take this as a core of America's China policy if elected.

As our members are deeply concerned about the situation in Tibet, I am writing to ask for your position on Tibet and your plan for bringing Beijing back to the negotiating table. While the International Campaign for Tibet cannot endorse candidates for office, we would like to share your responses with our members and the public as we believe that it is highly important for our members and all citizens to be informed of each candidate's position.

I look forward to your response.

Exile Tibetan parliament to resume session Sep 17 morning

16 September 2024, Tibetan Review

The 8th session of the 17th Tibetan Parliament in exile (TPiE) is to resume on Sep 17 morning following a meeting of the Speaker, the Kashag and TPiE members, reported the Tibetan-language Tibettimes.net Sep 16.

The regular, biannual session began on Sep 11 but could not be resumed from Sep 14 afternoon for lack of quorum after some members claimed that "general public" Tibetans who took their protest before the parliament building that day posed a threat to their personal safety.

Those Tibetans have been protesting on a nearby basketball court under the banner of "People's Movement for Securing the Central Tibetan Administration", organized by a group calling itself "The Advocacy of the General Public for the Sustainability of CTA". They have been calling for the TPIE to carry out the long-ignored amendment of the Charter of Tibetans in Exile to provide for the appointment of the justice commissioners of the Tibetan Supreme Justice Commission (TSJC), to which the absentee members have been vehemently opposed thus far.

The session did not resume today also as the absentee members were demanding an assurance for their personal safety from the Central Tibetan Administration's Department of Security.

As attending members of the TPIE kept asking the Speaker to find a way to enable the continuation of the session, the "general public" protest organizers issued a press statement this afternoon, denying that the protest action on Sep 14 posed any danger to the personal safety of the TPIE members as alleged by a section of its members, that the Department of Security of the CTA was assured of it on Sep 15 and it was being repeated in today's press statement as well.

Seizing on TPIE member Geshe Monlam Tharchin's remark that it was incumbent on the TPIE to amend the Charter to provide for the appointment of the justice commissioners of the TSJC, and that all the TPIE members fully knew it, the press statement pleaded for this amendment to be carried out at the earliest, rather than the matter being relegated towards the end of the session.

Then, a little after 4:30 pm, religious constituency member Geshe Atuk Tseten, speaking on behalf of four Dotoe and religious constituency members, was reported to have spoken of having remarked that yesterday (Sep 15), the religious and Dotoe constituency members of the TPIE had informed the Speaker and Deputy Speaker that they would not attend the session if the Kashag and the Department of Security were not in a position to assure their personal safety. He has also said that the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker had now called them over, and informed them that the Kashag had assured them that the Department of Security would take responsibility for the security arrangement.

"The situation is now such that we will continue to attend the TPIE session," Atuk Tseten has added.

Meanwhile, Geshe Monlam Tharchin and Dotoe TPIE member Mr Kunchok Yangphel indicated in their media interactions that the issue on which a section of the TPIE members were not allowing the Charter to be amended to provide for the appointment of the justice commissioners continued to remain.

Exile Tibetan parliament session aborted by lack of quorum

15 September 2024, Tibetan Review

The 17th Tibetan Parliament in Exile (TPIE), meeting for its 8th session since Sep 11, had to be postponed until further notice from the afternoon of Sep 14 due to lack of quorum. Only 23 members appeared while 22 remained absent, reported the Tibetan-language tibettme.net Sep 15. Three were already on leave at least till Sep 16.

The development followed the appearance before the parliament building of members of a group called "People's Movement for Securing the Central Tibetan Administration", shouting slogans calling for the long-aborted amendment of the Charter of Tibetans in Exile to provide for the appointment of the justice commissioners of the Tibetan Supreme Justice Commission to be carried out.

Although the item was on the session's agenda, and due to be taken up later on, movement members, who had been protesting on the nearby basketball court since Apr 11, felt that their demand was being ignored and so took the protest in front of the parliament building, seeking a meeting with the Speaker.

However, following an assurance from the CTA's Security Department Kalon (minister) Ms Dolma Gyari, the protesters peacefully left the scene. Even so, when the TPIE session resumed in the afternoon, there was lack of quorum and so could not continue, the report said. The Speaker undertook to inform the members whenever the session could be resumed.

On this issue, Bonpo TPIE member Geshe Monlam Tharchin has said, "It is our duty to amend the Charter and to provide for the appointment of the justice commissioners (of the TSJC). It is being stated that this matter is already included in the agenda; but it is yet to come up. However, despite claims being made in the name of appeal and peaceful movement of the general public, everyone has seen what they did today. What was supposed to happen was that the movement organizers had to sit down; and we needed to pay heed to the documents they gave us. However, just by looking at the TPIE session's activities in the past three days, they claimed that the general public was being ignored and they rushed here.

"When the matter was discussed with the Department of Security Kalon, Secretary, and other staff, they expressed the department's inability to guarantee security; that the protesters had their rights under the law of the land, and they were not acting on the basis of any right given by the department. And because the Department of Security could not guarantee our security, we could not attend the TPIE session."

On the other hand, President Tenzin Yangkar of the Advocacy of the General Public for the Sustainability of CTA group, has said: "For four days, the participants from the general public had maintained ethical propriety in their conduct. Last year (too), the general public was ignored. Even so, IF we had been told that because the item to amend the Charter to provide for the appointment of the justice commissioners was already on the agenda this time, we should rest assured, the general public would certainly have felt at ease. However, no response or message of any kind came to us from the TPiE authorities over the past four days. This was what drove members of the general public to proceed to the ground before the TPiE building one after another. ...

"And then, later on, we were assured, following a meeting with the Department of Security Kalon, the Deputy Speaker (because the Speaker was presiding over the TPiE meeting), officers from the local police authority, that the Speaker would meet with us. And the protesting members of the general public peacefully left the scene."

Meanwhile, Geshe Monlam Tharchin and Dotoe TPiE member Mr Kunchok Yangphel indicated in their media interactions that the issue on which a section of the TPiE members were not allowing the Charter to be amended to provide for the appointment of the justice commissioners continued to remain.

The 23 TPiE members who arrived to attend the session in the afternoon were stated to include seven Amdo, all the 10 U-Tsang and all the five overseas members. Those who stayed away included nine religious and all the 10 Dotoe members. One Domey member had taken leave for the entire session while two were on leave until Sep 16.

Vienna: Premiere of 'Amala' shines light on Tibetan struggle amid "cultural genocide"

15 September 2024, ANI

A large audience gathered at a local theatre in Vienna on Saturday for the Austrian premiere of 'Amala - The Life and Struggle of the Dalai Lama's Sister,' a movie that chronicles the life of Jetsun Pema, the Dalai Lama's younger sister.

The event, organised by the 'Students for a Free Tibet' group and the Tibetan Diaspora in Austria, was a heartfelt tribute to Pema's enduring contributions to Tibetan education and culture.

Affectionately known as "Amala," meaning 'mother,' Jetsun Pema is celebrated for her leadership in the Tibetan Children's Village (TCV), a network of schools she established to educate Tibetan refugee children in India.

The film captures her personal challenges and triumphs as she took over the Nursery for Tibetan Refugee Children and transformed it into a flourishing institution for displaced Tibetan youth.

The premiere took on a deeper resonance as it coincided with growing concerns about the ongoing cultural genocide in Tibet.

Following the screening, Tibetan-Canadian activist Chemi Lhamo, a member of the International Tibet Network's Steering Committee, addressed the audience virtually. In her impassioned speech, Lhamo highlighted the Chinese government's systematic efforts to suppress Tibetan identity.

She revealed that over one million Tibetan children have been forcibly enrolled in Chinese-run colonial boarding schools, where they are stripped of their language, culture, and traditions.

Lhamo's address underscored the urgency of the Tibetan plight, while brochures and flyers detailing human rights violations in Tibet were distributed to ensure attendees left with a deeper understanding of the ongoing struggle.

Despite the inclement weather, the event became a powerful moment of solidarity, demonstrating the Tibetan community's resilience in the face of adversity. Events like these, the organisers emphasised, are crucial in keeping the Tibetan cause in the international spotlight and resisting the erasure of their culture and identity.

The Tibetan Diaspora in Austria continues its mission to raise awareness, ensuring that the voice of Tibet remains heard across the globe.

Tibetan cast film "Shambhala" selected as Nepal's official entry for 97th Oscars

14 September 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Nepal has officially selected Tibetan-language film "Shambhala" as its official submission for the 97th Academy Awards, commonly known as the Oscars. Directed by Nepalese filmmaker, Min Bahadur Bham, the film features a predominantly Tibetan cast, marking a milestone for both Tibetan and Nepali cinema on the global stage.

The film first garnered international attention at the 74th Berlin International Film Festival, premiering in the Main Competition on February 23 at the Berlinale Palast. Shambhala also earned the Best Cinematography award at the 2024 Bishkek International Film Festival in Kyrgyzstan. Its lead actor, Thinley Lhamo, a Tibetan refugee, received the prestigious Boccacino d'Oro Prize for Best Acting Performance at the 77th Locarno Film Festival.

Filmed entirely in Tibetan, the story revolves around Pema, played by Thinley Lhamo, a pregnant woman living in the remote Dolpo region of Nepal. Pema is part of a polyandrous marriage with Tashi and his two younger brothers. When Tashi fails to return from a trading trip, raising questions about the legitimacy of her unborn child, Pema embarks on a transformative journey to find him. As her search for Tashi unfolds, it becomes a profound spiritual quest for self-discovery and liberation, transcending the mere need to reunite with her husband.

In a statement on social media, the film's team expressed their excitement over the Oscar selection, "The stunningly crafted "Shambhala", directed by Min Bahadur Bham makes its way to the 97th Oscars. The film is contextualised in the Northern part of Nepal, and defines the concrete journey of Female Self Determination. And now, the film becomes a true inspiration itself."

Currently, Shambhala is being screened in nine theatres within Kathmandu Valley and in 39 locations outside the valley.

"If I were in Tibet" Art Exhibition of Tibetan students inaugurates in Dharamshala

14 September 2024, The Tibet Post, Yangchen Dolma

The art exhibition "Dreaming Tibet" or "If I were in Tibet" by about 200 Tibetan students of classes 6 to 12 from five Tibetan schools inaugurates at the Kangra Art Museum, Dharamshala, on Friday. The aim of this exhibition is to raise awareness of Tibet among Indians and to create an opportunity for Tibetan children born in exile, under the title "If I were in Tibet", to express their feelings and thoughts through art form.

Hemraj Bairwa, Deputy Commissioner of Kangra District, inaugurates the art exhibition "Dreaming Tibet" or 'If I were in Tibet' by about 200 Tibetan students of classes 6 to 12 from five Tibetan schools at the Kangra Art Museum, Kotwali Bazar, Dharamshala, on September 13, 2024. Sonam Sichoe, President of the Tibetan Village School (TCV), Tibetan activist Tenzin Tsundue, Tibetan writer Bhuchung D Sonam and other artists, Tibetan students and the general public attended the exhibition opening and visited the students' art exhibition. The exhibition will be held from September 13 to 19, 2024.

The "Dreaming Tibet" exhibition is organised by KHADHOK, a collective of Tibetan artists based in Dharamshala. The "If I were in Tibet" art exhibition features works of Tibetan students from Upper TCV, Sambhota Petoen, TCV Gopalpur, TCV Suja and TCV Chauntra. A group of Tibetan and Indian artists has selected 50 works of art to be shown at the exhibition.

The organiser explained that everyone can have a dream, no one can limit the dream, even if we can't go to Tibet, but we can dream of Tibet, which is why we called the exhibition "Dreaming Tibet", we organised workshops in these schools to involve the students more in the creative process. Art is the expression of our feelings and thoughts, we can raise awareness of the issue of Tibet, the true situation in Tibet, politics and culture through art forms and people can receive more messages from these artistic forms.

"After over 60 years of occupation, Tibetan children are growing up in exile, disconnected from their homeland. With Khadhok's first-ever Youth Art Engagement Project, we aim to encourage them to reflect on their roots, identity, dreams, and aspirations. This unique exhibition brings together a vibrant collection of artworks that reflect how our young artists imagine life in Tibet," the organiser said.

Tsering Chospal, from the TCV Suja School, drew a picture of Tibetan nature. He explained his drawing: "For us, Tibetan nature was beautiful, everything was green, the water was fresh, you could drink water straight from the river, all the mountains were covered in snow, the clouds were white and everyone was kind. But after China invaded Tibet, Tibetan nature was destroyed."

Tennor Samkey, a student from TCV Suja School, explained her drawing (a head that is half Chinese and half Tibetan, half Tibetan cloth and half Chinese school uniform) by saying: The drawing is called 'Who am I?' because I have heard that in Tibet, parents are forced to send their children to a Chinese board school. If I were in Tibet, I would learn and speak Chinese and live in a Chinese environment that would make me think about who I am. Because, my parents always told me: "You are a Tibetan". But the teacher is telling me and forcing me to believe that I am a Chinese! In a situation like this, the biggest and hardest question is who I am."

Tibet rights organisation condemns launch of Chinese propaganda centre in Lhasa

13 September 2024, ANI

China's attempt to boost its efforts at controlling the world narrative on Tibet was witnessed yet again when the Chinese government recently inaugurated the "Tibet International Communication Center" in Lhasa.

Such a step by the Chinese administration is another way to promote the country's ongoing campaign to reshape global public opinion on Tibet, a report by the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) stated.

The ICT claimed that the establishment of such institutions in Tibet is a boost to China's propaganda on Tibet, which it had previously pointed out. And it expects further escalation by China in the future in an attempt to dominate the global conversation with China's propagandistic narrative and storytelling.

In an earlier report released in January this year titled 'China's External Propaganda on Tibet: Erasing Tibet to tell a good Chinese story', ICT claimed that "China's Tibet policy has been a subject of international scrutiny ever since its invasion and subsequent occupation of Tibet in 1959. The Chinese government knows that there is a political problem in Tibet. But rather than resolve it, one of its approaches is to falsify the situation and employ various methods to control the narrative around Tibet, aiming to reshape its portrayal in global discourse. This report examines China's recent external propaganda efforts concerning Tibet, highlighting the objectives and the tactics".

According to the ICT report, the latest propaganda centre by China was established after a "Roundtable Meeting on Building an Effective International Communication System for Tibet" which was jointly organised by the Propaganda Department of the Tibet Autonomous Region Party Committee and the China Foreign Language Bureau. This centre is an outcome of the group study session of the Political Bureau of the CCP Central Committee in May 2021.

The ICT claimed that the immediate outcome of the Politburo CCP Central Committee appears to be the CCP's push to replace the internationally recognised country name "Tibet" with the sinicised term "Xizang" on the global conversation.

Furthermore, the same report claimed, that such a renaming policy, discreetly initiated in late 2021 during the height of the COVID-19 pandemic, aligns with the CCP's General Secretary Xi Jinping's decade-old vision to "tell a good Chinese story" on the global stage.

The report also claimed that soon, China is likely to intensify its use of state-controlled media platforms to spread its narrative on Tibet.

The ICT also raised concerns that such an institution will be used to marginalize Tibetan voices and obscure the ongoing oppression in Tibet.

The report claimed that "This concern is well-founded, given China's extensive use of modern technology and media platforms to control information and shape narratives about Tibet".

UP-STF arrests Tibetan refugee for providing Indian bank accounts to cyber criminals

13 September 2024, Hindustan Times, Arun Singh

Investigation revealed that Tharchin was in contact with cybercriminals operating from Nepal and Sri Lanka to dupe Indian citizens. He provided them Indian bank accounts for ₹4.5 lakh per account, said investigators Uttar Pradesh special task force (UP-STF)'s Noida unit has arrested a 37-year-old Tibetan refugee for being allegedly involved in buying Indian bank accounts at cheap prices from financially weak people and providing these account details to cyber fraudsters operating in Nepal, Sri Lanka, and Thailand, said UP-STF officials on Thursday, adding that the suspect was residing in Delhi under a fake identity.

China tries to reshape Tibet, Xinjiang narratives with new propaganda efforts

12 September 2024, VOA, William Yang

Chinese authorities have rolled out new propaganda efforts aimed at countering Western narratives about the human rights situation in the northwest Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region and Tibet.

In recent weeks, they have continued to invite foreign vloggers to visit Xinjiang, home to millions of Uyghur people, a majority Muslim ethnic minority group. Also this month, China inaugurated an international communication center to produce content portraying some "positive developments" in Tibet, such as Tibetan people's growing income.

Since 2017, the United States, United Nations, European Parliament and rights organizations have condemned China for interning up to 1 million Uyghurs, forcing hundreds of thousands of Uyghur women to go through abortion or sterilization, and forcing Uyghurs, Kazakhs and other ethnic minorities in Xinjiang to work in factories, which prompted the United States to pass the Uyghur Forced Labor Protection Act in 2021.

In Tibet, human rights organizations and Western countries, including the U.S., have accused the Chinese government of erasing the Tibetan language and culture through compulsory Chinese language education for Tibetan children, forcing hundreds of thousands of rural Tibetans to relocate to urban areas and replacing the name "Tibet" with the Romanized Chinese name "Xizang" in official documents.

Taiwan said on September 5 it knows of reports China has been recruiting Taiwanese influencers to visit Xinjiang and help promote a more positive narrative about the region through their videos.

Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council, which oversees cross-strait exchanges, said it was still looking into the recent surge of Xinjiang-related content produced by Taiwanese influencers and urged them to avoid violating an anti-infiltration law by accepting payment from Beijing.

Taiwanese Youtuber Potter Wang claimed in June that the Chinese government had been inviting Taiwanese influencers on paid trips to China to produce content. His claims prompted several Taiwanese YouTubers who have recently published videos about Xinjiang to deny receiving payment from Beijing.

In response to warnings from Taiwanese authorities, China's Taiwan Affairs Office said Beijing welcomed "Taiwan compatriots" to visit China and enjoy "the magnificent mountains and rivers, taste the various kinds of food, experience the local customs, and share what they have seen and heard."

Apart from inviting Taiwanese influencers to visit Xinjiang, Beijing has been inviting foreign journalists and vloggers to visit Xinjiang since the start of 2024. In several reports, China's state-run tabloid Global Times said these foreigners learned about "Xinjiang's latest economic achievements, religious freedom, and ethnic integration" following visits to local industry, religious venues and residential homes.

Some experts say Chinese authorities usually impose tight control over foreign influencers' itineraries in Xinjiang to ensure the content they produce is aligned with the positive narrative that Beijing aims to promote, which is contrary to existing foreign media reports about mass internment of Uyghurs, forced labor of ethnic minorities or harsh birth control programs.

"Foreign influencers usually spend time in Xinjiang's capital, Urumqi, and visit places like the Grand Bazaar, where they will try local food and watch dance performances that could seem to suggest that cultural forms of the Uyghur people are protected," said Timothy Grose, a professor of China Studies at Rose-Hulman Institute of Technology in Indiana.

In addition to showcasing aspects of Uyghur culture, Grose said, foreign influencers' Xinjiang videos will often portray Uyghurs being employed and local signs containing Chinese and Uyghur characters.

"Beijing believes this is an effective strategy [to counter existing international narratives about Xinjiang] if they are indirectly controlling the types of pictures that are exported out of Xinjiang," he told VOA by phone.

By flooding social media platforms with Xinjiang content produced by these foreign influencers, Grose said, the Chinese government is trying to reach and influence casual viewers, especially younger audiences, with no deep knowledge about China or Xinjiang.

"These casual viewers don't have expertise in China, so they won't know where to find signs of oppression in the videos since they are unfamiliar with the Uyghur culture or China's ethnic policy," he said.

Since China is directly or indirectly filling social media platforms with content aligned with their preferred narrative for Xinjiang, Grose said, it will be difficult for academics, activists, and journalists to counter Beijing's propaganda efforts with content that reflects the reality in the region.

Telling the Tibet stories

Beijing has also launched a new initiative to "tell the Tibet story well."

On September 2, several local and central Chinese government agencies inaugurated an "international communication center" in the Tibetan capital, Lhasa, that aims to enhance Beijing's ability to promote its preferred narratives about Tibet.

During a roundtable event focusing on "building a more effective international communication system for Tibet-related issues," French writer Margot Chevestrier, who works for China's state-run China International Communications Group, said that many young Chinese people are affected by "biased reporting" on global social media and that these misunderstandings often stem from "misleading reporting by some media or individuals."

The new international communication center will "enable more people at home and abroad to know Tibet, understand Tibet, and love Tibet," according to China's state-run China News, an online news website.

Some analysts say the communication center may serve as a centralized institution to "coordinate" Beijing's propaganda efforts focusing on Tibet.

"Since there doesn't seem to be as much propaganda efforts on Tibet as on Xinjiang, Beijing might be thinking how they can use this tactic," said Sarah Cook, an independent researcher on China and former China research director at nonprofit organization Freedom House.

Cook said the amount of propaganda effort that China dedicated to Xinjiang and Tibet shows that these two issues are of a high priority for Beijing.

"While Tibet and Xinjiang are their priorities, the tactics that the Chinese propaganda apparatus deploys are similar, including spreading disinformation through fake accounts, restricting foreign journalists' access to certain places, and suppressing information that contradicts their preferred narrative," she told VOA by phone.

Since its propaganda efforts have been seemingly successful, Grose said, Beijing will continue to employ the same set of strategies to challenge existing facts about the situation in Xinjiang and Tibet.

To push back against Beijing's campaigns, he said, Xinjiang and Tibet-focused groups should try to increase their presence on social media platforms and create more "captivating and moving" visual content that is "properly contextualized" but can influence young audiences.

Additionally, Cook said it's important for individuals concerned about the situation in Tibet and Xinjiang to work with like-minded research groups and expose the different propaganda campaigns that China is pushing.

"They can try to produce short videos informing people of Beijing's tactics," she said.

'General Session' of TPIE begins, Tibetan advocacy group urges Charter amendment

11 September 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

As the 17th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile convened its eighth session in Dharamshala on Wednesday, nearly 1,000 Tibetans from the Indian subcontinent and abroad, under the banner of 'The Advocacy of the General Public for the Sustainability of CTA,' made a direct appeal to lawmakers. They called for urgent amendments to the Charter of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) to enable the appointment of the Chief Justice Commissioner and two judges to the Tibetan Supreme Justice Commission (TSJC), the apex judicial body of the CTA.

The group stressed the urgency to appoint the Chief Justice Commissioner and two additional justices of the Tibetan Supreme Justice Commission (TSJC) to establish a robust judiciary capable of administering oaths for future leadership of the exile Tibetan government.

In a press conference on Monday, the advocacy group stated that if the charter amendment is not enacted in this session of the parliament, they plan to set in motion a series of action plans including; Call for the resignation of all the 45 current members of parliament; Begin a hunger strike campaign; Submit a petition to His Holiness the Dalai Lama, invoking his authority under Article 1(ii) of the Charter; Campaign for equal voting rights for MPs from religious sects, Call for changes to be made to the allocation of standing committee members, and the right for overseas Tibetan representatives to be on the standing committee.

The ongoing session of the current parliament, also known as the 'General session' will deliberate on the activities and workings of each department of the CTA. On the first day of the session on Wednesday, Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, in his address, reminded parliament of the vital role the democratic system plays in Tibetan governance, a system bestowed by His Holiness the Dalai Lama. He urged Tibetans to work towards fulfilling the Dalai Lama's aspirations, particularly his four commitments.

The Speaker also expressed gratitude for international support, citing the passage of the Resolve Tibet Act in the US, a motion supporting Tibetan self-determination in Canada, the Australian Parliament's raising of the Tibetan issue, and the formation of a convener and co-convener for the All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet.

CTA's executive head, Sikyong Penpa Tsering responded to many questions from parliamentarians, particularly issues related to the Department of Religion and Culture. Key among them was the issue of reincarnation of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. President Tsering emphasized that the current Kashag has prepared measures to prevent interference from China on the matter and that his administration has drafted a 'blue book' outlining strategies for managing national emergencies.

Tibet: UN experts demand clarity after wave of arrests

10 September 2024, Table Briefings

In February, a wave of arrests swept through the Tibetan region of Derge. The reason: People were protesting against the construction of a dam. Now the UN has raised its concerns.

UN human rights experts are "deeply concerned" about the Chinese authorities' crackdown on dam protests in the Tibetan region of Derge (Mandarin Dege). 13 special rapporteurs had already sent a letter to this effect to the Chinese government in July. They demand transparency about how many people are still being detained for participating in the demonstrations and where they are being held. They also demand information on what risks the dam's construction actually poses to people and nature.

Michael Brand, Chairman of the Tibet Parliamentary Group in the German Bundestag, laments China's "extremely worrying" actions "also given the international escalation that the regime in Beijing is practicing more and more frequently." He urged that the protection of Tibetans and "the country of Tibet" should be high on the agenda of international geopolitics.

Kai Müller, Executive Director of the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) in Berlin, warns: "What is being sold with the dams as climate-friendly and green energy is in reality a ruthless strategy of exploiting an oppressed country and disenfranchising those affected." He continued that the international community should not fall for this sales ploy and that the Chinese development policy in Tibet should be resolutely questioned. Earlier, the Inter-Parliamentary Alliance on China (IPAC) had already welcomed the letter from the UN human rights experts and called on governments to defend Tibetans' fundamental rights.

On February 14, numerous people protested in front of the government building in Derge in the autonomous prefecture of Kardze (Ganzi) against the planned Kamtok (Gangtuo) hydropower project. Soon after the protests, reports of several hundred arrests and mistreated demonstrators emerged. It is unclear how many people are still in custody. The Derge protests are significant in that there was an apparently coordinated effort to document the peaceful resistance and disseminate video footage of the protests.

Motion on Tibet moved in Australian House of Representatives

10 September 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Members of the Australian Tibetan community with Australian MP Andrew Wallace (Photo/CTA)

A member of parliament of the Australian House of Representatives moved a motion addressing China's repressive policies towards Tibet, calling for the protection of Tibetan rights and culture on Monday. The motion, introduced by Andrew Wallace MP in the lower house of the Australian parliament called out China's systematic cultural assimilation of Tibetans. It affirmed the Tibetan people's rights to freely choose their economic, social, cultural, and religious policies without external interference. It highlighted the right of religious communities to select their own leaders, including the reincarnation of the next Dalai Lama, without Chinese government intervention.

While moving the motion, Representative Wallace stated, "The Chinese Communist Party is not content with simply trying to wipe out the culture of Tibet and Tibetans; they also want to remove their religious background. The CCP wants to control who will become the successor to the Dalai Lama. Australia's parliament stood in solidarity, united by the convention that we cannot remain silent in the face of evil."

Susan Templeman MP, Co-Chair of Parliament Friendship of Tibet, seconded the motion, urging Chinese authorities to release the Panchen Lama and reiterating Australia's stance against interference in selecting the next Dalai Lama. Dr Daniel Mulino- MP and Hon. Dr David Gillespie- MP also spoke in support, highlighting the forced assimilation of Tibetan children and suppression of religious and cultural practices in Tibet.

The motion expressed concern over China's assimilationist policies, including forced labour transfer programs, separation of Tibetan children from their families through state-run boarding schools, detention of Tibetans for the peaceful expression of political views, suppression of Tibetan religious expression, and excessive security measures against Tibetans.

In response to these concerns, the Australian Parliament called on China to re-engage with representatives of the 14th Dalai Lama to establish genuine autonomy for Tibetans within China, repeal discriminatory legislation, end arbitrary detention and family separation programs, remove restrictions on Tibetan culture and language, and allow access to Tibet for independent human rights observers.

The motion also referenced recent international developments, including United Nations reports on the assimilation of Tibetan children through residential schools, the European Union's resolution on the forced abduction of Tibetan children in December 2023, Canada's resolution supporting Tibet and the United States 'Promoting a Resolution to Tibet-China Act' passed in June 2024. The motion reaffirmed Australia's concern over China's assimilationist policies, which include forced labour programs, the coerced separation of Tibetan children from their families, detention for peaceful political expression, and the suppression of religious practices.

Tibetan group calls for charter amendments to appoint judge of TSJC

10 September 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

(L-R) The executive members of the group - Tseten Phuntsok, Tenzin Yangkar and Tsering Siten during the press conference at Akash Hotel, Dharamshala on Sept. 10.

A group of Tibetans under the banner of the 'People's Movement for Securing the Central Tibetan Administration' held a press conference on Monday at Dharamshala's Akash Hotel calling on parliamentarians of the Tibetan Parliament in Exile to amend the charter to enable the appointment of the Chief Justice Commissioner and two additional justices of the Tibetan Supreme Justice Commission (TSJC), the apex judiciary body of the Tibetan Government in Exile.

The press statement of the group, 'The Advocacy of the General Public for the Sustainability of CTA' stated that since October 8, 2021, they have repeatedly submitted detailed applications of thousands of petitioners to the parliament to safeguard the democratic system of the Tibetan exile administration. However, their efforts have been consistently ignored and disregarded.

“Last year, during the sixth session of the parliament in September, nearly a thousand people from various places in India, Nepal, and other foreign countries gathered in Dharamshala to launch an appeal campaign. Subsequently, during the March 2024 parliamentary session, there were discussions on the report of the ‘Charter Review Committee’ and the draft amendments to the charter. Based on these developments, we were hopeful for amendments that would allow the appointment of the Chief Justice Commissioner and two other commissioners. Therefore, we refrained from organising any mass gathering campaigns,” said Tenzin Yangkar, President of the advocacy group.

The statement also highlighted that instead of amending the charter to allow for the appointment of the Chief Justice Commissioner and two judges, the house made other amendments that allows the oath-taking to be administered by authorities other than the Tibetan Supreme Justice Commissioners, which they said, undermines the importance of appointing the Chief Justice Commissioner and the two remaining justices, and in effect, the legitimacy and standing of the apex Tibetan court.

Tsetan Phuntsok, one of the executive members for the group told the press, “The exile Tibetan government is crucial for the sustenance of the Tibetan movement to protect its identity, language and culture. Hence, it is irresponsible of the exile Tibetans to be mute spectators to the deliberate destruction of the Tibetan democracy founded by His Holiness the Dalai Lama.” Speaking on the campaign, he emphasised that their movement is non-violent, and in accordance to the laws of the land. He said that around 1,000 Tibetans from 28 different locations, including from India, Nepal, North America and Europe, are participating in the campaign.

The organisers further stated that if the charter amendment is not enacted in this session of the parliament, they plan to set in motion a series of action plans including; Call for the resignation of all the 45 current members of parliament; Begin a hunger strike campaign; Submit a petition to His Holiness the Dalai Lama, invoking his authority under Article 1(ii) of the Charter; Campaign for equal voting rights for MPs from religious sects, Call for changes to be made to the allocation of standing committee members, and the right for overseas Tibetan representatives to be on the standing committee.

The campaign is scheduled to commence from Wednesday at the Gangkyi Basketball Court in the CTA compound. The 8th session of the 17th Tibetan Parliament in Exile is also scheduled to begin from Wednesday until 19th of September 2024.

Eight Session of Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile Begins

10 September 2024, CTA

The eighth session (general session) of the 17th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, scheduled from 11 to 19 September 2024, commenced today at 9:30 a.m. with the Speaker’s announcement of session commencement.

The parliament hall assembled with Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang, Kalons, and parliamentarians sang the Tibetan national anthem.

In his session commencement address, the Speaker highlighted several significant events: the successful knee surgery of His Holiness the Dalai Lama in the USA, a recent long-life prayer offering made by the people of Monyul, and the celebration of His Holiness’s 90th birth anniversary according to the Tibetan calendar, attended by key leaders from Arunachal Pradesh, led by the Chief Minister.

The Speaker emphasised that the current democratic system of the Central Tibetan Administration is a blessing from His Holiness the Dalai Lama and encouraged Tibetans to work towards fulfilling His Holiness’s aspirations, including his four commitments.

He also expressed appreciation for international support, noting the US adoption of the Resolve Tibet Act, Canada’s motion supporting Tibetan self-determination, the raising of the Tibetan cause in the Australian parliament, and the appointment of a convener and co-convener to the All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet.

The Speaker also briefed the house on the agenda of the 8th session of the 17th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile and concluded by underscoring that resolving the Sino-Tibetan conflict remains a primary responsibility as outlined in the Charter of Tibetans in exile.

A panel of Chairpersons and an Ad Hoc Committee were appointed in accordance with the ‘Rules of Procedure and Conduct of Business of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile’.

An official obituary reference to former Tibetan Parliamentarian Dhangshar Yonten Gyatso was read by parliamentarian Tenpa Yarphel. A minute of silence was then duly observed in the house to mourn the official reference.

The session continued with Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the incumbent Kalon of the Department of Religion and Culture, presenting the précis 2023-24 annual report of its main ministry office and of institutions under it.

The review of the detailed annual report of the Department of Religion and Culture by the Standing Committee was presented by parliamentarian Phurpa Dorjee Gyaldhong.

Motion for debate on the DoR&C's précis report and its review by the Standing Committee was tabled by parliamentarian Geshe Atong Rinchen Gyaltsen and supported by parliamentarian Tenzin Jigdal. Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the incumbent Kalon of the Department of Religion and Culture, presented the Kashag's clarification.

Members of Parliament participated in the deliberation over the Department of Religion and Culture's overall undertaking, applauding it.

In response to queries from lawmakers, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the current Kalon of the department, provided detailed clarifications on recognising the reincarnation of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. He addressed the measures the Central Tibetan Administration is preparing to counter potential interference from China. Additionally, Sikyong Penpa Tsering provided insights into efforts to preserve major Tibetan traditional studies, including crafts, arts, and thangka painting.

He also responded to questions about various departmental projects and programs. These included the Tibetan Digital Library project, scholarships for newly arrived Tibetan monks and nuns, the Non-Sectarian Tibetan Buddhist Scholars' Conference, and other initiatives undertaken by the department.

The session proceeded with the presentation of the précis 2023-24 report of the Department of Home (DoH) by Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the incumbent Kalon of DoH. This was followed by the presentation of the Standing Committee's reviewed report on the detailed annual report of the Department of Home by parliamentarian Geshe Ngaba Gangri.

The motion for debate on the aforementioned report was tabled by parliamentarian Tsering Yangchen and supported by parliamentarian Geshe Atong Rinchen Gyaltsen. After that, Sikyong Penpa Tsering provided Kashag's (Cabinet) clarification to the reviewed report of the Department of Home by the Standing Committee.

The deliberation on the undertakings of the Department of Home remains open for tomorrow's seating.

The first day of the eighth session of the 17th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile was adjourned at 5 pm.

Tibet Lobby Day in Australia urge sanction against Chinese officials, support for Dalai Lama's reincarnation process

10 September 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The Australia Tibet Council, along with 20 Tibetan delegates across Australia at the 13th Tibet Lobby Day (Photo/ATC)

As part of this year's Tibet Lobby Day, the Australia Tibet Council (ATC), along with 20 Tibetan representatives from across Australia, including delegates from Canberra, Sydney, Queensland, Victoria, Wagga Wagga and Nowra, engaged in discussions with around 35 members of the Australian Parliament, including Foreign Minister Penny Wong.

During the meetings, the Tibetan-Australian community urged the Co-Chairs of the Australian All-Party Parliamentary Group for Tibet (AAPGT) to invoke the Global Magnitsky Act against five Chinese officials responsible for human rights abuses in Tibet. The officials named include Wu Yingjie, former Party Secretary of the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) from 2016 to 2021; Zhang Hongbo, Director of the Tibetan Public Security Bureau (TPSB) from 2018 to 2022; Chen Quanguo, former Communist Party Secretary of TAR from 2011 to 2016 and Xinjiang from 2016 to 2021; Ao Liuquan, former Party Secretary of Naqchu City and Prefecture from 2016 to 2020; and Zhang Qingli, who served as Party Secretary of TAR from 2006 to 2011.

The delegates also voiced concerns over the deteriorating human rights situation in Tibet, emphasising the need for the Australian government to formally recognise the reincarnation of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and to adopt policies aimed at preventing China's interference in this religious process.

The ATC led the advocacy by presenting key demands to the Australian Parliament and the Department of Foreign Affairs' China and Human Rights divisions. These demands included: the Australian government to adopt measures to prevent China from interfering in the reincarnation process of His Holiness the Dalai Lama; The Australian government to condemn the Chinese government's efforts to systematically erode Tibetan identity, language, and culture since the 1950 illegal invasion; Australia to strongly oppose China's policies of forced settlement and the establishment of draconian colonial boarding schools in Tibetan areas, which are tools for further assimilation; The Australian government to implement Magnitsky sanctions against Chinese officials responsible for the repression of Tibetans, restricting their travel and economic activities in Australia; and the Australian government to explicitly recognise that the Tibetan issue remains unresolved under international law and affirm the Tibetan people's right to self-determination.

UN Raises Concern Over Kamtok Dam

10 September 2024, Free Tibet

Letter from Special Rapporteurs seeks further information on the dam construction and crackdown in Dege County.

On 8 July 2024, a group of 13 United Nations Special Rapporteurs issued a letter to the Chinese government expressing concern over human rights ramifications of the Kamtok Dam project in Dege County.

The letter, which was made public on 6 September after China failed to respond, addresses both the crackdown on peaceful protesters in February and the forced relocation of Tibetans should the dam be built. It further describes the "irreversible destruction of important cultural and religious sites" as well as "irreversible environmental impacts" to the area.

The Kamtok Dam, which is due to be constructed along the Driчу River in Dege County, would see thousands of Tibetan people displaced, at least six ancient monasteries destroyed, and the local environment devastated by the flood of water.

The dam project has been opposed by local residents since it was proposed in 2012. This opposition culminated in protests in Dege County in February 2024 in which hundreds of protesters were detained and many of them beaten by armed police.

"The allegations described below reportedly form part of a general crackdown against the Tibetan people, in breach of the human rights to take part in cultural life, freedom of opinion and expression and freedom of peaceful assembly and of association. Similar concerns have been raised in previous communications."

– UN letter to the Chinese government

Special Rapporteurs share that local Tibetans "do not appear to have been consulted in a meaningful way" about the dam, and express that the dam "will have an irreversible impact on many of their human rights" including Tibetans' cultural rights to "maintain their way of life, to access and enjoy heritage, and to exercise their religious and cultural practices".

Alongside the Chinese government, the letter was also sent to China Huadian, the company responsible for the construction of the Kamtok Dam.

Despite the letter only requesting further information, rather than any specific actions, both the Chinese government and China Huadian did not respond within the 60-day deadline given. As a result, the letter was published publicly without a response.

It remains unknown if any response from China Huadian and the Chinese government will be forthcoming, however the letter and its lack of response will be presented to the UN Human Rights Council as a part of regular reporting.

The letter by the UN human rights experts was written following based on information supplied by Tibet groups, including Free Tibet and Tibet Watch. It also comes in the context of an international campaign to halt the Kamtok Dam, which has been running since August.

Read the full letter here.

Central Tibetan Administration Expresses Concern Over China's Expansion of Colonial Boarding Schools in Eastern Tibet

09 September 2024, CTA

According to reports received from reliable sources in the Ngaba region in Tibet, China's assimilationist education policies in Tibet and its strengthening of compulsory colonial-style boarding schools across Tibet are resulting in cultural erasure and loss of Tibetan identity. Targeted mainly at young Tibetan monks and nuns, these coercive practices pose a severe threat to the preservation of traditional Tibetan culture, religion, and way of life.

Over 1,700 young monks from Kirti Monastery and two monasteries in Dzoge County—all these three monasteries located in Ngaba in the traditional province of Amdo now incorporated into Sichuan Province—have been forcibly ordered to leave monastic life and enrolled in government-run colonial boarding schools. These expulsions and forcible enrollment of monks under the age of 18 are being conducted against the wishes and consent of both the affected children and their parents.

At these schools, the young clergy undergo intensive political indoctrination, including mandatory praise of the government of the People's Republic of China (PRC). These children are primarily taught in Mandarin Chinese and are further prohibited from visiting their own monasteries during school holidays. These measures lead to a loss of Tibetan language skills and the gradual severance of their ties to Tibetan cultural identity, spiritual traditions and religious practices.

In order to ensure strict enforcement of these policies, the local authorities are threatening to revoke public benefits and even imprison parents who resist sending their children to these government-run boarding schools. Restrictions have also been placed on Tibetans building new houses on their land and on nomads from increasing their livestock numbers. It is evident that considering the deteriorating human rights conditions in Tibet under the draconian rule of the PRC government, Tibetan cultural and religious freedoms are being suppressed and annihilated at an alarmingly rapid rate. These concerning developments in recent times have coincided with a visit in July this year by Wang Huning, a high-ranking member of the Chinese Communist Party Politburo Standing Committee, to the Tibetan areas of Karze, Ngaba and Kyungchu counties.

In light of the critical situation, we urge for an immediate intervention to this critical situation from the international community including governments, the United Nations, human rights organizations, educational institutions that are committed to protecting cultural diversity and religious freedom as well as to promoting human rights and fundamental freedom for all. We reiterate the need for the PRC to uphold their international legal obligations of safeguarding the rights and freedom of the Tibetan people to express, preserve and promote their Tibetan identity. We strongly call upon the PRC government to stop the assimilationist policies being practised in the Tibetan areas through the operation of colonial boarding schools.

Wangchuk Sends Climate SOS from Tanglang La at 17,400 ft to World Citizens

08 September 2024, Himbu Mail, Kuldeep Chauhan

Sonam Wangchuk, the renowned Ladakhi innovator, and his band of fellow marchers – including Ladakhi ex-army men – are five days into their grueling climate march from Leh to Delhi.

Their mission is simple yet urgent: wake up the world to the ticking climate clock and the fragile fate of the Himalayas.

As they crossed the towering Tanglang La pass at 17,450 feet and made their way to the Debring plains on the Tibetan Plateau, Wangchuk had a powerful message for the world – cut down on carbon emissions now or face irreversible consequences.

"We have less than five years to act before things spiral out of control," Wangchuk warned, standing in the biting cold at one of the highest motorable passes on the planet.

"While world leaders are setting carbon neutrality targets, India and China – two of the world's biggest polluters – are pushing timelines that simply won't cut it. We need immediate action, like Finland, not promises for decades down the line."

Through steep climbs and treacherous paths, the marchers are determined to amplify their message as they push towards the icy heights of Lahaul-Spiti in Himachal Pradesh.

Battling snowstorms and constantly shifting weather, the group has already covered nearly 200 kilometers, and the journey is only getting tougher. Yet, their resolve remains iron-clad.

"Our glaciers are melting fast, causing flash floods and droughts".

These glaciers are our lifelines, and if they disappear, we, the indigenous people of Ladakh, will become climate refugees. The clock is ticking," Wangchuk said, urging the people and leaders of the world to act now before it's too late.

In a heartfelt plea to Prime Minister Narendra Modi, Wangchuk called for the protection of the fragile ecosystems of Ladakh under the Sixth Schedule of the Indian Constitution, empowering local communities to steward their environment.

"This isn't just our fight," he added. "It's a global one. We're sending out an urgent SOS from the roof of the world. The Himalayas are dying, and if they go, we all go."

And though their bodies may be weary, their spirits remain unshaken.

Their destination: Delhi's Rajghat, where they hope to deliver their urgent message to the nation's leaders.

As they push on through Lahaul-Spiti, they call on every citizen, every voice to amplify this cry for help.

"Our time is running out," Wangchuk repeated, as the march continued, undeterred, towards its final destination.

Dimple Yadav meets Dalai Lama in Dharamshala: 'We support cause of Tibet'

07 September 2024, Hindustan Times

"I have come here with a spiritual purpose. His Highness Dalai Lama is here today for his 'darshan'. So, I came to visit him," the Samajwadi Party MP said.

Samajwadi Party MP Dimple Yadav on Saturday met Tibetan spiritual leader the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala. She also visited the main Tibetan temple in the city.

Interacting with media persons after the visit, Dimple Yadav also tendered support for the cause of Tibet.

"I have come here with a spiritual purpose. His Highness Dalai Lama is here today for his 'darshan'. So, I came to visit him," the MP from Uttar Pradesh's Mainpuri said. "We support the cause of Tibet."

The Dalai Lama returned to Dharamshala on September 28 after undergoing a knee replacement surgery in the United States. The 89-year-old spiritual leader was welcomed by his devotees and well-wishers outside the Gaggal airport in Kangra.

Arunachal Pradesh chief minister Pema Khandu also visited McLeodganj, Himachal Pradesh on Friday to meet the Dalai Lama.

The chief minister participated in the special prayers organised by the people of Tawang for the long life of the Dalai Lama. The five-day prayers began on September 3 and will conclude on September 7.

"His health has improved a lot. So, we also pray for the long life of His Holiness. This morning, I had a very good discussion with His Holiness. The people of Arunachal Pradesh share a very good relation with His Holiness, the Dalai Lama," he said, according to ANI.

"So, on behalf of people of the state, I have invited him to visit Arunachal Pradesh as and when he feels so. He was kind enough to accept the invitation on behalf of the people and in coming days, he will definitely be visiting Arunachal Pradesh."

'Democracy day' in Dharamshala

Last week, Tibetans-in-exile commemorated the 64th anniversary of 'Democracy Day' in Dharamshala, Himachal Pradesh September 2.

The day marks the inception of the Tibetan democratic system in exile. On this day, the Tibetan parliament-in-exile was established in 1960 following the arrival of the Dalai Lama and 80,000 Tibetans in exile in Dharamshala.

Last year also, Tibetans-in-exile celebrated the 63rd anniversary of Democracy Day in Dharamshala, where leaders of the exiled Tibetan Government, including Tibetan parliamentarians and other dignitaries, gathered at the main Buddhist temple, Tsuglagkhang in the north Indian hill town Dharmashala.

Arunachal Chief Minister participates in long-life prayers offering to Dalai Lama

07 September 2024, Tibetan Review

Chief Minister Mr Pema Khandu of India's Tibet-border state of Arunachal Pradesh has on Sep 6 called on His Holiness the Dalai Lama at his exile residence at McLeod Ganj, Dharamshala, to seek his blessing and has gifted to a trust in his name a residence for him built at the spot where he had temporarily resided upon entering India in 1959 to seek asylum. Khandu has again invited the exile spiritual leader of Tibet to visit his state.

"Humbled and grateful for a warm audience with His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama at his residence... I felt deeply blessed to receive his compassionate blessings," Khandu wrote on X.

Khandu also wrote that he had invited the Dalai Lama to visit Arunachal Pradesh and that the latter said he would visit "whenever he feels the call."

The chief minister also presented to the Dalai Lama a framed photo of a Phodrang (residence) the state had built for him at Pungteng in Tawang District. The building stands on the spot where the Dalai Lama had spent a few days after arriving in India from Tibet in 1959, reported the timesofindia.com Sep 7.

The chief minister was visiting Dharamshala in connection with a long-life prayers offering being made by the Monpa community of his state to which he also belongs. The preparatory rituals began on Sep 3 and concluded on Sep 7, when the actual offerings were made.

He was accompanied by Mr Tapir Gao, Lok Sabha member from Arunachal Pradesh and the Co-convenor of the All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet; Mr Pasang Dorjee Sona, the state's minister for Education and Tourism; and MLA's from the state.

Also on Sep 7 morning, along with the delegation, the Monpa Community of Arunachal Pradesh, joined by Tibetan residents and other followers of the Dalai Lama, gathered at the Tsuglakhang, the main local Buddhist temple, to celebrate the confluence of three auspicious occasions: the 65th anniversary of His Holiness's first dharma teaching to the people of Monyul since his arrival in India; the 341st birth anniversary of the 6th Dalai Lama Tsangyang Gyatso, who was born in Tawang; and the 90th birthday of His Holiness as per Tibetan calendar.

After his 1959 escape, the Dalai Lama has visited the state seven times so far, namely in 1983, 1996, 1997, twice in 2003, 2009, and 2017, noted arunachal24.in Sep 6.

UN human rights experts deeply concerned over repression of dam protests and Chinese hydropower policies in Tibet

06 September 2024, ICT

A powerful letter published today by 13 independent UN Human Rights Special Procedures expressed "deep concern" regarding the Chinese government plans to build the Kamtok dam in the Tibetan region of Derge. The scathing letter was sent to the Chinese government in July.

It demands a clarification from the Chinese government on the numerous reports of arrests and repression inflicted by Chinese government officials on local Tibetan protesters. It also requests details on how transparency, consultation, and respect for human rights will be ensured.

The Kamtok dam will submerge at least six monasteries and two villages and expel hundreds of residents. The 13 UN special procedures emphasized their distress regarding the irreversible destruction of religious and cultural heritage sites, as well as Tibetan ways of life. The letter also documented the lack of meaningful consultation with affected communities, a pattern of recent reprisals against protesters, and the irreversible impacts of dams on the environment and climate.

Kai Müller, Head of the UN Advocacy Team at the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT), said: "This communication by 13 UN special procedures is a methodical examination of the Chinese government's violent response to Tibetan protests against the Kamtok dam in Derge, as well as China's so-called 'sustainable renewable energy' plan. In their letter, the UN human rights experts shine a bright light on the consequences of the Chinese government's false claims about its development policy in Tibet. While Beijing pitches it as a climate-friendly and sustainable energy policy with hydropower dams as a key pillar, the reality is a ruthless strategy to exploit an oppressed country and marginalized people.

Müller continued: "The international community, governments, parliaments and civil society must not fall for China's propaganda claiming that dam projects are clean and equitable "renewable" energy sources. Tibetans who are directly affected by environmental changes need to be consulted. Above all, Chinese development schemes in Tibet must be vigorously investigated and Tibet's status as an unresolved political conflict must be honestly and seriously addressed."

Meanwhile, the Inter-Parliamentary Alliance on China (IPAC) has also welcomed the letter from the UN human rights experts and urged "respective governments to make strong representations against this construction, in favour of the fundamental rights of Tibetans."

China's Interference in Dalai Lama's Reincarnation Sparks International Concern

05 September 2024, Devdiscourse

China has intensified its interference in the reincarnation process of the next Dalai Lama, according to a report by the International Tibet Network. The report outlines Beijing's strategic plans to diminish international support for Tibet and reshape Tibetan identity through control over religious practices.

China has intensified its interference in the reincarnation process of the next Dalai Lama, according to a report released on Wednesday by the International Tibet Network (ITN). The 30-page document, titled 'Tibet, the Dalai Lama, and the Geopolitics of Reincarnation,' alleges that Beijing aims to use the Dalai Lama's passing as an opportunity to end global support for Tibet's cause and exclude the spiritual leader from his own succession planning.

The report highlights two Chinese policy documents revealing a strategy to control Tibetan religious identity and influence the international Buddhist community. In response to Chinese propaganda in 2011, the 14th Dalai Lama issued a document stating he might appoint a successor while alive—a practice with historical roots in Tibet—though this was swiftly rejected by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), which insists that only Beijing can approve his successor.

The report claims China's 'Sinicization' of Tibetan Buddhism aims to sever the deep connection between Tibetans and the Dalai Lama, involving high-tech surveillance, policing of religious sites, and campaigns of 'patriotic re-education' that have included torture and sexual abuse. The CCP's strategy, according to internal briefings, also aims to influence Western governments and media to end international support for Tibet in the 'post-Dalai era.' The case of the 11th Panchen Lama, replaced controversially by a Chinese candidate in 1995, serves as a precedent for Beijing's plans. Despite these measures, loyalty to the Dalai Lama among Tibetans remains strong.

Tibetans-in-exile mark 64th anniversary of 'Democracy Day' in Dharamshala

04 September 2024, India Bloom

Tibetans-in-exile recently marked the 64th anniversary of 'Democracy Day' in Dharamshala to mark the day of establishing democracy for Tibetans. The day marked the inception of the Tibetan democratic system in exile.

On this day, the Tibetan parliament-in-exile was established in 1960 following the arrival of the Dalai Lama and 80,000 Tibetans in exile in Dharamshala, reported ANI.

While speaking to ANI, a resident of Dharamshala expressed his pleasure on the occasion and said the day is very special for Tibetan people.

"In 1960, Dalai Lama declared the democracy system, started some members of parliament from the different regions of Tibet and then set up the democracy parliament system. A huge number of people from the three regions and also five sectarians of Tibetan Buddhism in Tibet. Since that, we have got a democracy system, as gradually we have the increased members of parliament from different regions," he added.

In early 1959 during the Tibetan uprising, their spiritual leader (Nobel Peace Winner) spiritual leader Dalai Lama and his retinue fled Tibet with the help of the CIA's Special Activities Division, crossing into India on 30 March 1959.

He is based in Dharamshala in Himachal Pradesh since then.

Ramon Magsaysay Foundation launches series to mark 65th anniversary of Dalai Lama's award

04 September 2024, Lokmat Times

The Ramon Magsaysay Award Foundation on Wednesday launched a seven-volume series titled 'Greatness of Spirit' in the presence of the Dalai Lama to commemorate the 65th anniversary of the award presented to the Tibetan spiritual leader.

In August 1959, the Dalai Lama was awarded the Ramon Magsaysay Award in recognition of "his leadership of the Tibetan community's gallant struggle in defence of the sacred religion that is the inspiration of their life and culture".

Susanna B. Afan, President of the Ramon Magsaysay Award Foundation, launched the seven-volume series at the Dalai Lama's residence in the hill town of Dharamshala in Himachal Pradesh in the presence of the Foundation's Board of Trustees, selected partners, and Indian laureates.

On April 26, 2023, the Dalai Lama was presented the 1959 Ramon Magsaysay Award personally by the members of the Ramon Magsaysay Award Foundation after 64 years at his residence.

The Nobel Peace laureate, known for his simplicity and jovial style and for whom Mahatma Gandhi was the most influential leader of the 20th century for his idea of non-violence, prefers to participate in meetings with religious leaders, and lectures students and businessmen on ethics for the new millennium and the art of happiness.

In 2007, the Dalai Lama received the US Congressional Gold Medal, even in the face of protests by China.

Born on July 6, 1935, at Taktser hamlet in Tibet, the Dalai Lama was recognised at the age of two as the reincarnation of the 13th Dalai Lama, Thubten Gyatso.

He fled Tibet after a failed uprising against Chinese rule in 1959, basing his government-in-exile here that never won recognition from any country.

The Ramon Magsaysay Award, often called the 'Nobel Prize of Asia', is an annual award established to perpetuate former Philippine President Ramon Magsaysay's example of integrity in governance, courageous service to people, and pragmatic idealism within a democratic society.

The prize was established in April 1957 by the trustees of the Rockefeller Brothers Fund based in New York with the concurrence of the Philippine government.

Disclaimer: This post has been auto-published from an agency feed without any modifications to the text and has not been reviewed by an editor.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

Countries should accept Tibet's historic status as independent nation: Penpa Tsering

03 September 2024, Hindustan Times, Rezaul H Laskar

Tsering questioned the logic of countries accepting Tibet as a part of the People's Republic of China (PRC) while simultaneously pushing talks between the Dalai Lama and the Chinese government.

Countries around the world should accept Tibet's historic status as an independent country to help foster a serious dialogue with China on the future of the region, the head of the Tibetan government in exile said on Tuesday.

Penpa Tsering, the Sikyong or head of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), said the Dharamshala-based government in exile intends to work with the US to convince more countries to challenge Beijing's contention that Tibet has historically been a part of China.

Tsering questioned the logic of countries accepting Tibet as a part of the People's Republic of China (PRC) while simultaneously pushing talks between the Dalai Lama and the Chinese government. Such an approach, he said, helps the Chinese avoid any serious discussions with the Tibetan side.

Participating in the opening session of a festival with the theme of "Spirit of Tibet", Tsering described this approach as part of a new strategy that is based on Dalai Lama's "middle way" policy to find accommodation with the Chinese.

After working with the US administration for two years to pass the Resolve Tibet Act, which focuses on the historical status of Tibet as an independent country, the CTA intends to convince more countries about this position.

"We would like to work with other governments to see whether similar positions can be adopted to push the Chinese government to come to the negotiating table," Tsering said.

Tsering questioned the approach of countries that keep saying Tibet is part of the PRC while supporting negotiations between the Dalai Lama and the Chinese.

"You are removing the very ground for negotiations. When every country says Tibet is part of the PRC, where is the reason for the Chinese government to come and talk to us?," he said.

He contended the Chinese government knows "they have no legitimacy for their rule in Tibet", and added, "We have to puncture those theories."

Tsering acknowledged that the "middle way" approach – proposed by the Dalai Lama, approved by a majority of Tibetans and ratified by the Tibetan parliament in exile – remains the official policy to find a lasting solution with China based on non-violence and negotiations. However, he said there has been a change in strategy based on “polarities or extremities”, including the current situation in Tibet under the “repressive Chinese government” and the historical state of Tibet.

Tsering also warned India about the consequences of China’s current policies in Tibet. Noting that Chinese authorities have forced more than a million Tibetan children into “colonial style boarding schools”, he said this is aimed at erasing Tibet’s long-standing relations with India going back more than 2,000 years.

“The Chinese government knows exactly what they’re doing to destroy the Tibetan identity right now,” he said, adding this will change the “emotional quotient” among Tibetans towards India. If younger Tibetans are forced to adopt the Chinese way of thinking, the emotional quotient will change, and they won’t have the same reverence and affinity towards India, he said.

China, Tsering pointed out, is renaming places to reinforce its claims on disputed regions. While noting that China refers to Tawang in Arunachal Pradesh as “southern Tibet”, he suggested India should refer to the frontier as the “Indo-Tibetan border”.

Describing China as the “biggest bully” in the world, he said the country is working with “other bullies” to create a new world order. “It started from the invasion of Tibet in those days and now you have the Chinese on the Indian border, right next to you,” Tsering said, in an apparent reference to the India-China military standoff on the Line of Actual Control (LAC) since April-May 2020.

Himachal Pradesh: Tibetans in-exile celebrate 64th anniversary of Democracy Day in Dharamshala

03 September 2024, ANI

Tibetans-in-exile commemorated the 64th anniversary of 'Democracy Day' in Dharamshala, Himachal Pradesh on Monday and highlighted the significance of the day in establishing democracy for Tibetans.

The day marks the inception of the Tibetan democratic system in exile. On this day, the Tibetan parliament-in-exile was established in 1960 following the arrival of the Dalai Lama and 80,000 Tibetans in exile in Dharamshala.

While speaking to ANI, a resident of Dharamshala expressed his pleasure on the occasion and said the day is very special for Tibetan people.

"In 1960, Dalai Lama declared the democracy system, started some members of parliament from the different regions of Tibet and then set up the democracy parliament system. A huge number of people from the three regions and also five sectarians of Tibetan Buddhism in Tibet. Since that, we have got a democracy system, as gradually we have the increased members of parliament from different regions," he added.

He further added that now the Tibetans have a "full-fledged democratic system" as well as the 46th member of the parliament.

"Now we have the 46th member of the parliament. This is a fully democratic system. And the Dalai Lama has given, especially in 2011, that he has given full power to the Tibetan people and the electing there as president of the Tibetan people, the president of the exile and also from Tibet."

On September 2, 1960, a year after thousands of Tibetans were forced to flee their homes due to the 'Chinese invasion', the first elected representatives of the Tibetan Parliament-in-exile took their oaths in Bodh Gaya to inaugurate the Tibetan democratic system.

Last year also, Tibetans-in-exile celebrated the 63rd anniversary of Democracy Day in Dharamshala where leaders of the exiled Tibetan Government including Tibetan parliamentarians and other dignitaries gathered at the main Buddhist temple, Tsuglagkhang in the north Indian hill town Dharmashala.

A 13-member delegation including Swedish parliamentarians led by MP Margareta Elisabeth Cederfelt joined the occasion as distinguished guests. The democratic system of government is based on a political ideology that does not differentiate people on the basis of the question whether a person is strong or weak, rich or poor, male or female, or on the basis of their race or lineage, and so forth with regard to their status in society. Rather, it postulates the founding of a society in which everyone is seen as equal, viewed through the prism of the generality or commonality of everyone, according to the Central Tibetan Administration.

Tibetans praise US, Canada for support on 64th founding anniversary of Parliament-in-exile

02 September 2024, The Morung Express

The Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) on Monday commemorated the 64th founding anniversary of the Tibetan Parliament-in-exile by acknowledging the US and Canada for advocating the right to self-determination.

The Kashag (executive) said in support of the aspirations of the Tibetan people, US President Joe Biden signed the “Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act” on July 12 this year.

The Act highlights that “the current policies of the People’s Republic of China are systematically suppressing the ability of Tibetans to preserve their religion, culture, language, history, way of life, and environment”.

The Kashag mentioned in its statement on His Holiness the Dalai Lama's 89th birthday that the Act recognises the US government's position on the historical status of Tibet that the Sino-Tibet dispute is unresolved and that it is the official policy of the US government to promote a negotiated resolution to the dispute through dialogue.

The Kashag also acknowledged the unanimous resolution passed by the Canadian Parliament on June 10. This resolution asserts that the Tibetan people and their country have the right to self-determination and are empowered to freely choose their economic, social, cultural, and religious policies without interference from any external power.

The resolution also condemned the Chinese government's systematic policy implementation of cultural assimilation against Tibetans.

"The aspiration of Tibetan people to preserve our national identity and to develop our own culture cannot be crushed by any form of brute force. More so, it is the important responsibility of Tibetans living in free countries to make every effort so that the Chinese government corrects and ends its misguided and repressive policies in Tibet," said the Kashag, urging every Tibetan to make collective efforts in unity.

"While we celebrate the Tibetan democracy day, we must also acknowledge that there is still considerable scope for improving our democratic system. In particular, it is the need of the hour to strengthen completion and effectiveness of the laws and regulations that ensure fairness and justice for all," it said.

The Dalai Lama, who along with many of his supporters fled the Himalayan homeland and took refuge in India when Chinese troops moved in and took control of Lhasa in 1959, views himself as a simple Buddhist monk.

He believes in a "middle-way" approach, meaning greater autonomy for Tibet rather than outright independence.

Reiterating its commitment to non-violence and to pursue the 'middle-way policy' – the only way to resolve the China-Tibet conflict based on mutual benefit and negotiation – the Tibetan government in exile, called the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), has blamed Beijing for the lack of political will to continue with the dialogue process that has remained deadlocked since 2010.

Tibetans mark 64th Democracy Day with Estonian guests

02 September 2024, Tibetan Review

The Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) commemorated the 64th Tibetan Democracy Day of Sep 2 at the Tsuglakhang courtyard, Dharamshala, by expressing gratitude to His Holiness the Dalai Lama for his gift of full democracy to the Tibetan people, condemning China for its continued hardline repressive rule in occupied Tibet, and urging international support for the resolution of the issue of Tibet in the presence of guests for the occasion from the Baltic state of Estonia.

The guests were members of the Estonian Parliamentary Support Group for Tibet led by its Chairman, Mr Juku-Kalle Raid, who is a Member of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Estonia Parliament. The other MP delegates were Mrs Karmen Joller, Member of Social Affairs Committee; Ms Ester Aruse, Member of Foreign Affairs Committee; and Mr Roy Strider, who coordinated the visit, said the CTA on its Tibet.net website Sep 2.

The report said the delegation continued their participation in the event despite strong opposition from the Chinese embassy in Tallinn. It said the embassy had issued a statement on Aug 30, expressing "strong opposition" to the visit of the Estonian Parliamentary Support Group for Tibet to the "Tibetan government-in-exile."

The statement was stated to include China's routine claims about Tibet being an integral part of China since ancient times and the "Tibetan government in exile" being an illegal organization, while accusing the Dalai Lama of "engaging in anti-China separatist activities."

The Dalai Lama has for decades sought a negotiated, meaningful autonomy for an undivided Tibet under Chinese sovereignty on the basis of his middle way proposal, which remains the official policy of the CTA. But China has continued to refused to talk to him, including by setting impossible preconditions.

In their keynote speeches, both Sikyong Penpa Tsering and Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel also strongly condemned China for the current phase of its policy of rapid assimilating Tibet, which has seen Tibetan children being forced into colonial style boarding schools, Tibetan language and culture schools being forced to shut down, and the activities of the religious centres being greatly curtailed.

In his speech, Mr Juku-Kalle Raid condemned the Communist Party of China (CPC) dictatorship while praising the democracy practised by the Tibetan diasporic community. He has called the Chinese statement criticizing his delegation's visit a "love letter" and denounced the CPC's dictatorship as "dictator-shit".

This was Juku-Kalle Raid and Roy Strider's second visit to the Tibetan exile capital this year, having previously attended the 35th birthday of the Chinese government-abducted 11th Panchen Lama in April, the report noted.

Each of the other delegation members also spoke in similar terms.

Human rights organisations express concern over enforced disappearances in Tibetan region

01 September 2024, ANI

The United Nations, the European Union, and the Central Tibetan Administration, in a joint statement, expressed their concerns over the ongoing enforced disappearances orchestrated by China in the Tibetan region.

The organizations strongly condemned the continued rampant cases of enforced disappearances of Tibetans in the region by the Chinese government's practice of torture and ill-treatment of Tibetans while in custody.

The statement claimed that each year, the Chinese authorities arbitrarily arrest several Tibetans and subject them to enforced disappearances, including religious and community leaders, writers and musicians, and human rights and environmental activists, mainly for their expression of Tibetan national identity and opposing repressive policies. And in most of these cases, they often result in prison sentences based on trumped-up charges, whereas many who have been imprisoned continue to be unseen and unheard of.

"The systematic practice of enforced disappearances at any time under any circumstances is a crime against humanity. The first Article of the UN Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance stipulates any act of enforced disappearance constitutes a violation of the rules of international law guaranteeing, the right to recognition as a person before the law, the right to liberty and security of the person, and the right not to be subjected to torture and other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment," the statement read.

The statement further mentioned that China, despite being a member of the UN, has consistently demonstrated a complete disrespect for international human rights law, systematically disregarding global standards in its treatment of Tibetans and people of other nationalities under its oppression.

As per the statement, among the most prominent enforced disappearance cases is the abduction of Tibet's 11th Panchen Lama, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, one of the highest Tibetan Buddhist leaders. At just six years of age, the Chinese administration abducted the 11th Panchen Lama, along with his family and Chadrel Rinpoche in 1995. Despite repeated expressions of concern over the matter and intervention by various UN bodies to date, China has still withheld credible information about his whereabouts or well-being for the last 29 years, making him one of the world's longest-serving political prisoners, it added.

The joint statement also claimed that just this year, several Tibetans have "disappeared" after Chinese authorities arbitrarily detained them for various reasons, from staging peaceful protests to publishing books.

These cases include the enforced disappearances of Phuntsok, Pema, Samten, Zomkyi, Tamdin, and Lobsang Thabkhey, whose fates continue to remain unknown. One prominent case in recent years is Gendun Lhundup's arbitrary arrest in 2020. Even after more than three years since his arbitrary arrest, his whereabouts and well-being remain unknown to his family, the statement claimed.

Enforced disappearance has an impact on the victim, but its paralyzing effects on the family members, who are left uninformed of the fate of their loved ones for extended periods, are horrid. Recently, news from Tibet reported the tragic death of Phude, a 53-year-old Tibetan mother of writer Tenzin Khenrab. Her 29-year-old son was arrested in 2023 for keeping a photo of His Holiness the Dalai Lama on his phone, along with several e-books. Despite her repeated attempts, the Chinese police refused to disclose any information about her son's whereabouts. After suffering from depression from worrying about her son's well-being for over a year, the mother Phude passed away earlier this year on 17 February, the statement added.

The human rights organisations urged international governments and organizations, including the United Nations, human rights organizations, rights activists, and supporters around the world, to continue to press China to disclose information about the Tibetans arbitrarily arrested and disappeared, including the 11th Panchen Lama case.

Enforced disappearance constitutes a grave violation of international human rights standards, and China is obligated to ensure that enforced disappearances are thoroughly investigated and that it provides integral reparations for those who have been subjected to this inhuman and illegal act by international standards, it added.

Tibet group welcomes former exile Tibetan administration head to Arunachal Pradesh capital

01 September 2024, Tibetan Review

A delegation of the Tibet Support Group of Arunachal Pradesh (TSGAP), led by its president Mr Tarh Tarak, has called on former executive head Prof Samdhong Rinpoche, of the Central Tibetan Administration at the state guesthouse in the state capital Itanagar on Aug 31. He is in the city for a four-day visit beginning Aug 30, reported arunachaltimes.in Sep 1 and others.

On Sep 1, Professor Samdhong Rinpoche, a distinguished scholar of Tibetan Buddhism, is to give a teaching on the Three Higher Trainings and Ways to Practice them (bslab pa gsum) at the Buddhist Gompa Itanagar. During the meeting, Rinpoche expressed hope that the "BJP-led government under the dynamic leadership of Chief Minister Pema Khandu will be performing best for greater interest of the people of Arunachal Pradesh and will be extending support for the Tibetan cause," the reports said.

Prof Rinpoche was stated to have commented the TSGAP for its continued support to the Tibetan cause and urged it for long-term policies on Tibet issues.

He has also stressed on the need to generate awareness among the younger generation on Tibet and the Tibetan issues, "so that it can carry forward the Tibetan cause."

TSGAP was established in 2013 under the aegis of the Core Group for Tibetan Cause India, an umbrella group for Tibet support groups across India.

Tarak has assured Rinpoche that the TSGAP will support the Tibetan freedom struggle "with its best effort," work for the basic welfare of the Tibetan community residing in Arunachal Pradesh, and organise a series of awareness programmes about Tibetans and the Tibet issues.

TSGAP vice president Mr Hinium Tachu has also stressed on freedom of Tibet from the People's Republic of China.

Earlier, on his arrival in the state capital on Aug 30, Rinpoche was stated to have been welcomed to the state guest house by a team led by TSGAP, joined by the Itanagar Buddhist Culture Society, Tuting Memba Welfare Society, Khamba Welfare Society, Mon Mimang Tsokpa, and other dignitaries.

Prof Samdhong Rinpoche has already been touring Arunachal Pradesh before arriving in Itanagar. On Aug 12, Chief Minister Pema Khandu led a procession to welcome him for his teaching at the request of Sherab Sangpo Society Mon in Jang sub-division of Tawang District. Mon refers to the region of the state's Tawang and West Kameng districts.

China calls Arunachal Pradesh Zangnan (south or southern Tibet) and therefore part of its territory on the basis of its armed annexation of Tibet in the middle of the last century. It does not have any support in the state for its claim, but expresses strong protests whenever any top Indian leader or the Dalai Lama, Tibet's exile spiritual leader, visits it.

US president Joe Biden on Jul 12 signed into law the "Resolve Tibet Act" passed by the two houses of the US Congress with super-majority votes. The Act calls China's annexation of Tibet illegal under international law, rejects its claims of Tibet being part of it since ancient times false, and urges a negotiated solution to the Himalayan territory's legal status.

Prof Rinpoche's visit is relevant in view of Resolve Tibet Act, 2024, which aims to promote a peaceful resolution to Tibet-China dispute according to international law and the United Nations Charter through peaceful dialogue without preconditions and empower the international community to stand up for justice and peace in Tibet.

August

Human rights body claims China subjects Tibetan people to inhuman treatment

31 August 2024, India Blooms

The Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) has said China is still subjecting Tibetan people to inhuman treatment due to their religious beliefs and cultural identities.

On the International Day of the Victims of Enforced Disappearances, TCHRD said it stands in solidarity with the victims and families of those who have been subjected to unlawful, Chinese state-sanctioned repression through enforced disappearances, arbitrary detentions, beatings and torture.

In a statement, it said: "The Chinese government has flagrantly overlooked its consistent human rights violations and, in direct deflection of international criticism of its human rights records, has covertly legalised enforced disappearances through amendments to the Criminal Procedure Law. During the March 2012 annual session, China's parliament, the National People's Congress (NPC), approved changes that facilitated the continued use of enforced disappearances to target critics of government policies."

"Article 73 of the revised law authorises the secret detention of Tibetans charged with vague, trumped-up charges, 'legally' allowing the Chinese state to suppress dissent and criticism by detaining Tibetans deemed threats to the People's Republic of China's unity and stability," the statement said.

Further targeting China, the body said: "Tibetans continue to endure severe oppression and disappearances, and China shows no signs of halting its repressive practices. Instead, the human rights situation has worsened, with China aiming to erode Tibetan identity through the sinicisation of Tibetan religion by infusing it with Communist elements, depriving Tibetan children of education in their native language, and tearing apart Tibetan society and families through trumped-up charges and collective punishments, all amounting to gross human rights violations."

TCHRD said it has documented more than 63 known cases of Tibetans subjected to enforced disappearance in Tibet in the past four years.

"The relatively low number of registered cases highlights a disturbing trend of underreporting, which is often associated with fear of reprisals," the body said. 63 cases of enforced disappearances in four years, rights group calls China to end its unlawful practise

31 August 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

In observance of the International Day of the Victims of Enforced Disappearances, the Dharamshala-based rights group, Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) reported 63 known cases of enforced disappearances in Tibet over the past four years. In its statement, the TCHRD expressed solidarity with the victims and their families, urging China to put an immediate stop to this unlawful practice.

"The Chinese government has flagrantly overlooked its consistent human rights violations and, in direct deflection of international criticism of its human rights records, has covertly legalised enforced disappearances through amendments to the Criminal Procedure Law," the statement read.

Among the documented cases is that of Tibetan singer Gegjom Dorjee, who was arbitrarily detained by authorities in Khyungchu County on February 12, 2024. His song, "Sad Song of Whirled Tears," poignantly expressed the struggles of Tibetans under Chinese rule, referencing the absence of His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Tibet using the honorific title "Gyalwa." The song also symbolically addressed the collective suffering of Tibetans, using the metaphor "red-faced."

In March, Tibetan monk Pema from Kirti Monastery was arbitrarily detained and held incommunicado by local Public Security Bureau officers after staging a peaceful solo protest. He had held a portrait of the Dalai Lama on a road known locally as "Martyrs' Road" in Ngaba (Ch: Aba) County. Following his detention, Chinese security forces reportedly intensified their control and restrictions in Ngaba, particularly in Soruma village and Kirti Monastery. Pema's current whereabouts remain unknown.

"Despite international criticism and calls for accountability, China continues to target Tibetans. TCHRD urges the international community to press China to end these violations and ratify the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance," the organisation expressed.

Due to strict surveillance imposed by Chinese authorities, news of disappearances, incidents of deaths in custody or news in general are often significantly delayed or not able to be relayed outside Tibet.

SFT honours Dege protestors and activists with Lhakar Award on 30th anniversary

31 August 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

In commemoration of its 30th anniversary, Students for a Free Tibet (SFT), a network of young activists advocating for Tibetan freedom, awarded the 2024 'Lhakar Award for Resistance in Tibet' to the peaceful protestors of Dege in Kham region of Tibet. The Lhakar Award for Dedication was presented to activist Thupten Chonyi, while the 2024 Lhakar Award for Activism in Exile was awarded to Tsela Zoksang.

The Lhakar Awards were presented during the Longsho Night event in New York on August 24. Nyima Lhamo, the niece of the late Tenzin Delek Rinpoche, accepted the award on behalf of the Dege protestors. The ceremony also honoured Ven. Golog Jigme, a former political prisoner, was present to receive his 2013 Lhakar Award for Resistance.

The peaceful Tibetan protestors of Kham Dege in February took to the streets to protest the Chinese government's forceful relocation of thousands of local Tibetans from their ancestral lands. The government's plan to construct a hydroelectric dam in Kham Dege, along the Drichu (Yangtze) River, threatened to displace thousands of residents from two villages and six monasteries. "When news broke of the massive protests erupting in Kham Dege earlier in February of this year, the world was stunned by the incredible scenes of resistance sent out by the residents of the Wongpo Tok region of Dege," SFT stated. "Despite the hundreds of Tibetans arrested and beaten in the aftermath of the protests in Dege, Tibetans, and supporters in exile saw that the fighting spirit of the Tibetans inside Tibet remained defiant, proud, and unbroken."

Thupten Chonyi, a Tibetan activist based in Philadelphia, is known for his unwavering commitment to the Tibetan cause. From March 10, 2023, to March 10, 2024, he led a year-long vigil for Tibet outside Independence Hall, demonstrating his dedication to raising awareness for the Tibetan struggle. Chonyi has also played a key role in leading the Philadelphia Tibetan Community during the annual U.S. Tibet Lobby Day for over a decade. "Thupten Chonyi has embodied dedication to the Tibetan Freedom Movement through his many years of organising and activism. In particular, his yearlong commitment to hold a daily vigil protest outside of Philadelphia's Independence Hall every weekday from March 10th, 2023 until March 10th, 2024 has inspired generations of Tibetans to stand up for the cause of Tibetan freedom," SFT said.

Tsela Zoksang, a student activist, gained international headlines when she unfurled the Tibetan national flag on a flagpole outside a hotel where Chinese President Xi Jinping was scheduled to meet the prominent US business leaders during the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit in San Francisco in November 2023. Just months later, in May, she displayed another striking display of dissent by raising the Tibetan flag in front of the Arc de Triomphe in Paris, France during Xi's visit to the French capital. "Tsela's daring direct actions over the past year have inspired countless young activists across the world. Through strategic non-violent direct actions, Tsela has demonstrated to a generation of young activists that young people have the power to shatter narratives and change the track of history," SFT remarked.

China's top political advisor calls for 'integration among all ethnic groups' in Tibet

30 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Giving a fillip to President Xi Jinping's Sinicization of ethnic minority regions drive, China's top official on ethnic affairs has on Aug 27 called for the promotion of exchanges and "integration among all ethnic groups" and the strengthening of the "sense of identity with the motherland" while addressing a conference in Tibet's capital Lhasa.

It is in this context that Wang Huning, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and Chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, has urged efforts to deliver solid paired-up assistance for Xizang Autonomous Region toward the goal of building a modern socialist new Xizang, using the Chinese name for Tibet.

"Efforts should be made to promote exchanges and integration among all ethnic groups, improve people's livelihoods, rally people's support, and strengthen the sense of identity with the motherland, the Chinese nation, the Chinese culture, the CPC, and socialism with Chinese characteristics among officials and people of all ethnic groups," China's official Xinhua news agency Aug 29 quoted Wang as saying.

Addressing the fourth work conference on paired-up assistance for Xizang, and marking the programme's 30th anniversary, Wang has hailed "the notable achievements in the paired-up assistance work for Xizang over the past three decades," and "urged efforts to promote targeted, systematic and long-term assistance for the region, and elevate the comprehensive benefits yielded by the assistance work."

"Targeted, systematic and long-term assistance" obviously refers to reinforcing Beijing current renewed campaign and goal for the Sinicization of Tibet with regard to its ethnic, linguistic, and cultural identity.

For this purpose, Wang has emphasized, "It is imperative to improve the work regarding officials and talent dispatched to assist Xizang and strengthen the organization and leadership of the paired-up assistance work."

The conference was also stated to have awarded honorary titles to exemplary individuals who had participated in the paired-up assistance for Xizang, which totalled nearly 12,000 over the period of 1994 and 2022, dispatched in 10 batches at three-yearly intervals.

The programme was stated to have involved the participation of 17 provinces and municipalities as well as dozens of ministries and state-owned enterprises of China, "bringing substantial investment, practical technology and essential talent to Xizang," said another Xinhua report Aug 28.

Dalai Lama back in D'shala after New York visit, to resume religious teachings

28 August 2024, Tibetan Review

The Dalai Lama has returned to his exile home at McLeod Ganj, Dharmshala, this morning after being away since Jun 21, mainly for a knee-replacement surgery in New York city. He was welcomed by large crowds of Tibetans and other well-wishers in New Delhi and Dharamshala. He is to give a series of religious teachings next month and will be offered long-life prayer ceremonies as well.

Earlier, Dr David Mayman, MD, Chief of the Adult Reconstruction and Joint Replacement Service at the Hospital for Special Surgery in New York, said last month that the Dalai Lama was recovering well and expected to continue improving, with physical therapy, over the next six to 12 months.

During his stay in the US, the Dalai Lama was offered a long-life prayers ceremony in a capacity-packed UBS Arena in New York City on Aug 22 by Tibetans as well as Mongol and Himalayan Buddhists.

He was also visited by Under Secretary of State Ms Uzra Zeya, who is designated as the Biden Administration's Special Coordinator for Tibetan issues. The meeting was condemned by China as interference in its internal affairs and an encouragement of what it called Tibetan independence "separatists".

Ms Zeya was accompanied by Kelly Razzouk, Special Assistant to the President and National Security Council Senior Director for Democracy and Human Rights.

Over the coming days, the Dalai Lama is scheduled to give religious teachings at three events in the Tsuglakhang, located just across his residence, next month.

Over Sep 6-7, His Holiness will confer the Avalokiteshvara Initiation (chenresig wang) and will be offered a long-life prayers ceremony by the Monpa Community from Arunachal Pradesh.

Over Sep 12 – 13, the Dalai Lama will teach on a yet to be decided topic at the request of a group from Southeast Asia in the mornings and there will also be a long-life prayers offering.

On Sep 18, the Dalai Lama will be offered a long-life prayers ceremony jointly by the Tibetan Women's Association, Ex-Students of CST Dalhousie and people from Lhasa Districts.

Then, over Sep 30-Oct 2, His Holiness will give teachings on Shantideva's A Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life (chodjug) at the request of Taiwanese devotees and attend a long-life prayers offering to be made by them.

Report by UNHRC highlights severe concerns about Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region and Tibet Autonomous Region

28 August 2024, The Print

Ravina Shamdasani the spokesperson for the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights on Tuesday highlighted the human rights abuses persistent in China, especially in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region and the Tibet Autonomous Region. The statement by Shamdasani came after a UN Human Rights team visited China in June this year. Additionally, the UN team had engaged in dialogue with the Chinese authorities, specifically addressing the counter-terrorism policies and the criminal justice system in the country.

The statement highlighted that the UN delegation during a dialogue with the Chinese authorities found out that in Xinjiang specifically, many problematic laws and policies remain in place which must be investigated and reviewed by the authorities from the human rights perspective. According to the same statement, the UN has also urged China and civil society members in the country to continue such interactions to seek tangible progress in the protection of human rights for all in China.

Additionally, the UN also expressed that it will be closely monitoring the current human rights situation in China even when difficulties are posed by limited access to information and the fear of reprisals against individuals who engage with the United Nations. The UN team during its visit to China also called on the Chinese authorities to take prompt steps to release all individuals arbitrarily deprived of their liberty and to clarify the status and whereabouts of those whose families have been seeking information about them.

The statement highlighted that the UN has always advocated for the implementation of the recommendations made by this UN team along with those made by other human rights mechanisms and during the Human Rights Council's Universal Periodic Review process of China. Previously, several non-governmental organisations (NGOs) had slammed China for rejecting recommendations of the Universal Periodic Review (UPR) at UNHRC's 56th session intended to address the severe human rights issues of the country.

Reportedly, China had ignored calls to implement UN findings and dismissed all serious criticism of its human rights record, refusing to budge on the documented plight of Uyghurs, Tibetans, Hong Kongers, and human rights activists.

During the 26th meeting of the United Nations Human Rights Council's (UNHRC) 56th session, held in Geneva on Thursday the Chinese diplomats refused to adopt several major recommendations of the Universal Periodic Review (UPR) intended to address the severe human rights issues of the country. Responding to the dismissal of the UPR recommendations, in a joint statement on behalf of 29 NGOs delivered at the Human Rights Council after China's remarks, the International Service for Human Rights (ISHR) urged China to 'genuinely engage with the UN to enact meaningful reforms' in line with the recommendations from the UN's Xinjiang report, UN Treaty Bodies and UN Special Rapporteurs. (ANI)

China: two years after Xinjiang findings, UN Rights Chief reports 'limited access to information', 'reprisals' against activists

27 August 2024, ISHR

In a public statement on 27 August, the Office of the High Commissioner (OHCHR) stressed its engagement and recommendations in areas where it has been pushing for responses and results from the Chinese government, including on Xinjiang, Tibet, Hong Kong, and individual cases 'of particular concern' in mainland China.

This includes a renewed call on Beijing to 'take prompt steps to release all individuals arbitrarily deprived of their liberty, and to clarify the status and whereabouts of those whose families have been seeking information about them.'

'I welcome Volker Türk's strong endorsement of the Xinjiang report. One day is a day too long for victims like my mother. This must be an urgent wake-up call for all countries to take concrete and swift action to hold China accountable for its long list of documented human rights violations, starting at the UN Human Rights Council.'

Ziba Murat, activist and daughter of arbitrarily detained Uyghur doctor Gulshan Abbas

Two years ago, on 31 August 2022, former High Commissioner Michelle Bachelet released a long-awaited report determining the possible commission of 'crimes against humanity' against Uyghurs and other Muslim peoples by Chinese authorities. While the UN report already concluded that conditions were in place for 'serious violations to continue and recur,' mounting documentation by UN expert bodies and civil society have confirmed the serious deterioration of the human rights situation in the Uyghur region and across China since 2022.

In today's statement, the OHCHR underscored that 'many problematic laws and policies remain in place' and that allegations of human rights violations, including torture, must be 'fully investigated'. The Office also called for a 'full review' with a human rights emphasis of the legal frameworks governing Chinese policies related to national security, counter-terrorism and minority rights. All of these have remained in place despite extensive concerns, including in the 2022 report, that authorities have weaponised such tools to target Muslim individuals, but also Tibetans, human rights defenders and journalists, and to clamp down on civil society space across mainland China and Hong Kong.

The Chinese government also maintains widespread and systematic restrictions, including through laws, policies and practices described in the UN report, that severely impact the intergenerational transmission of culture, language and religion of Uyghurs and Tibetans.

Beijing has perpetually attempted to present the Xinjiang report to other countries as an isolated initiative. Yet, since its release, further findings by widely-respected UN expert bodies have confirmed and expanded on its findings. Two impartial UN expert committees have called for the report's full implementation: the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) in their unprecedented November 2022 Urgent Action Decision on Xinjiang, and the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) in their May 2023 review of China.

In December 2022, at least 15 UN experts also recalled numerous report findings in a strongly-worded letter to the government, laying out seven benchmarks for immediate action, yet expectedly rejected by Beijing. 'We welcome the High Commissioner's commitment to work with civil society and advocate for the implementation of all UN recommendations to China. Beijing does not get to cherry pick: UN human rights findings are indivisible and, altogether, chart the only genuine path forward for China to achieve meaningful human rights change. Any step away from it is deceitful and a proof of lack of willingness to be a responsible global actor.' Raphaël Viana David, ISHR China Programme Manager

Crucially, the OHCHR stated it continues to 'follow closely the situation,' but reported 'difficulties posed by limited access to information and the fear of reprisals against individuals who engage with the United Nations.' The High Commissioner's Office also committed to advocating on behalf of victims and engaging with civil society 'to seek tangible progress in the protection of human rights for all in China.'

'After two years, High Commissioner Türk's update that the Office is committed to tangible change in China is heartening. Yet, China has not implemented any OHCHR recommendations, and independent investigations are still limited or blocked. Victims like my brother Ekpar Asat, who endured three years in solitary confinement, and families facing China's psychological warfare can't wait any longer. Türk's work and engagement with China must fully acknowledge these realities.' Rayhan Asat, Uyghur human rights lawyer Further evidence of the absence of good faith from Beijing in its engagement with the UN include an increased rejection rate of recommendations during its last UN human rights peer-review in January 2024 – including all related to the Xinjiang report and UN Treaty Bodies – and its unwillingness to provide unrestricted access to the whole territory for UN Special Rapporteurs listed in the Xinjiang report.

China also remains among the top perpetrators of reprisals against those cooperating, or seeking to cooperate with the UN, and has increased transnational repressive tactics to try silencing activists and victims abroad. In June 2024, two UN experts condemned the continued enforced disappearance of Uyghur doctor Gulshan Abbas, recalling the Xinjiang report's findings of a pattern of reprisals 'against family members of Uyghurs in exile who had engaged in advocacy.'

'Beijing has done its best to discredit the report, even touring foreign officials through Xinjiang, avoiding substantial discussion about the UN's findings,' added Raphaël Viana David. 'The High Commissioner's message places the Xinjiang report at heart of his engagement with Beijing. The onus is now on China to take meaningful steps forward and on the Human Rights Council to closely monitor until it does so,' Viana concluded.

In June 2020, June 2022 and September 2022, over 40 UN experts jointly rang the alarm at China's human rights crisis, urging the Human Rights Council to establish a monitoring and reporting mechanism on the country's rights situation.

Last June, ISHR and three rights groups jointly released translations of the Xinjiang report in the five remaining UN official languages.

ISHR urges:

The Chinese government to adopt a roadmap with a clear timeline for the implementation of recommendations from the OHCHR Xinjiang report and other UN human rights mechanisms, and for its meaningful reengagement with UN bodies, including by allowing unrestricted access to the whole territory for UN independent experts for adequate investigation and by putting an immediate end to all acts of reprisals as reported by the UN;

ISHR further calls on:

The Human Rights Council to establish a monitoring and reporting mechanism on the human rights situation in China, with a view to uphold the integrity of its mandate and put an end to China's exceptionalism.

The High Commissioner to continue monitoring the human rights situation in China, to publicly report about it, including on the implementation of the Xinjiang report and any restrictions in accessing information, and to publicly advocate on individual cases.

US coordinator highlights Tibet's role as regional freshwater source

27 August 2024, RFA

A U.S. official who handles Tibetan issues has called for information sharing about environmental changes taking place in Tibetan areas of China to help scientists prepare for climate change.

Uzra Zeya, the U.S. special coordinator for Tibetan issues, emphasized the critical role of the Tibetan Plateau in advancing global water security in virtual remarks given on Saturday to the World Water Week 2024 conference in Stockholm.

Zeya highlighted the negative effects of the increase in Chinese hydropower and water diversion projects in Tibet, including their impact on the Brahmaputra, Indus, and Mekong rivers for South and Southeast Asian nations.

The projects have been carried out without input from the 6 million Tibetans living in China, she said as part of a panel of speakers on water security.

"Opaque governance institutions and infrastructure development without inclusive public input exacerbate the impact of warming temperatures," Zeya said.

The glaciers, alpine lakes and waterfalls of the vast Tibetan Plateau are water sources for many of Asia's largest rivers.

But the region's warming climate is causing quicker melting and evaporation, threatening the plateau's freshwater reserves. Industrial activity, deforestation and mining have also affected the quantity and quality of Tibet's water sources.

These factors could lead to water scarcity in the future, scientists say.

Displaced by dams

Nevertheless, the Chinese government has increasingly sought to manage and control Tibet's water resources for its own benefit, building dozens of hydropower dams on rivers originating upstream in the Tibetan Plateau.

In some cases, the projects have been met with anger by Tibetans facing displacement and loss of agricultural and grazing land.

In February, over 300 Tibetans in Dege county of Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Sichuan province staged a rare protest against China's plans to build the 1,100-megawatt Gangtuo hydropower dam on the Driчу River.

The project was expected to displace residents of at least two villages and destroy several monasteries with religious and historical significance, including the Wonto and Yena monasteries.

A video shared exclusively with Radio Free Asia by a source who recorded it in early July shows that nothing remains of the religious structure, with the monastery's main prayer halls and the many stupas that surround it completely razed to the ground. RFA was able to independently verify the authenticity of the video with two sources from Tibet and in exile. In April, Chinese authorities began relocating another 19th-century Tibetan Buddhist monastery in Dragkar county, or Xinghai in Chinese, in Qinghai province due to the expansion of the Yangqu hydropower station on the Yellow River — known as the Machu River among Tibetans.

By July, authorities had demolished the Atsok Dechen Choekhorling Monastery, with video shared exclusively with RFA showing that nothing remained of the religious structure.

'Preserve these majestic glaciers'

Zeya, who is also U.S. under secretary for civilian security, democracy and human rights, highlighted the need for data sharing on climate changes taking place in Tibet.

"Scientists also struggle to obtain and verify data from Tibetan areas of China, which has vast implications for research and policy development," she said in her address.

"Without transparent information on areas like snowpack melt, regional partners are hindered from preventing, preparing for, and adapting to our changing climate,"

Zeya said. Earlier this month, Chinese scientists warned that global warming is causing the rate of glacier evaporation in Tibet to outpace the rate of precipitation, and could result in the permanent disappearance of some low-elevation glaciers on the Tibetan Plateau.

"The Himalayan Region and Tibetan Plateau and their fragile ecosystems are particularly vulnerable to climate change," Zeya said.

"As increased temperatures imperil this frozen cache of freshwater high in the mountains, we are reminded of the imperative to accelerate the reduction of greenhouse gas emissions ... to help preserve these majestic glaciers," she said.

Stretching across the southern border of the Tibetan Plateau, the Himalayan Mountain region includes over 100,000 square kilometers (38,600 square miles) of glaciers, is one of the largest stores of frozen water in the world, and serves as crucial sources of freshwater for those in the region as well as for over 1.8 billion people downstream, said Zeya, noting that the U.N. General Assembly has declared 2025 as the "Year of International Glaciers' Preservation."

World Water Week 2024, which runs Aug. 24-29, explores the theme "Bridging Borders: Water for a Peaceful and Sustainable Future."

The event highlights the critical role of water cooperation in fostering peace and security across communities and nations.

Karmapa calls on Dalai Lama in Zurich, their first meeting in seven years

26 August 2024, Tibetan Review

The 17th Karmapa Ogyen Trinley Dorje, one of Tibet's most prominent religious figures, living in exile since Dec 1999, has called on the Dalai Lama in the Swiss city of Zurich on Aug 25 in their first meeting in over seven years, reported the IANS news service Aug 25.

It was the day on which the Dalai Lama, on a stopover from New York City to New Delhi, was offered a long-life prayers offering by Tibetans in Switzerland and Liechtenstein in a capacity packed Hallenstadion, Zurich.

It was not clear what transpired in their meeting.

The report said the meeting, the first since Jan 2017 during the Dalai Lama's 34th Kalachakra teachings, given in Bodhgaya, revived hopes among his followers that the Karmapa may return to India soon. The Karmapa has a significant following in India, especially in Sikkim which had for long lobbied with New Delhi for his visit and eventual return. The Rumtek Monastery in Sikkim's Capital Gangtok is the Karmapa's exile seat.

Most recently, the state's Chief Minister Prem Singh Tamang reached out to Union Minister for Parliamentary Affairs and Minority Affairs, Kiren Rijiju, in Delhi and held discussions regarding the prospect of bringing the 17th Karmapa to Sikkim.

The Karmapa fled Tibet in Dec 1999 at 14 years of age and sought refuge in India, citing lack of religious freedom under Chinese rule. He mostly lived at the Gyuto Monastery in Sidhbari near Dharamsala, with the Indian government treating him as an 'honoured guest'.

He left for the USA in 2017 to seek medical treatment and later took up citizenship of the Commonwealth of Dominica. He has since then been unable to visit or return to India.

The Karmapa is the head of the Karma (or Kamtsang) Kagyu school of Tibetan Buddhism, of which he is the holder of the oldest lineage of reincarnations.

Dalai Lama emphasizes helping all sentient beings at Zurich long-life prayers offering

25 August 2024, Tibetan Review

A capacity crowd of 15,000 Tibetans and others from across Europe filled the Hallenstadion in the Swiss city of Zurich to make a long-life (Tenshug) prayers offering to His Holiness the Dalai Lama this morning. Switzerland was among the very first few countries to resettle Tibetan refugees after China consummated its annexation of Tibet in 1959.

In his speech the Dalai Lama has told the audience what being a Buddhist religious person meant.

"Cultivating warm-heartedness is the essence of religion. Cultivating the awakening mind of bodhichitta involves the intention to bring happiness to all sentient beings. It enables you to fulfil the goals of others and yourself."

He has noted that even people who don't think of themselves as religious recognize that Tibetan Buddhism includes many solutions to the problems we face today.

People in the outside world are especially attracted by Tibetan Buddhism's instructions about the workings of the mind and emotions and ways to cultivate positive qualities within us. "Even in China faith and understanding of the Buddhadharma has grown," he has noted.

As he conducted a brief ceremony for cultivating the awakening mind of bodhichitta, His Holiness has suggested that the gathering think of all sentient beings as having been our kind mothers. In an effort to repay that kindness we should make a strong determination to bring benefit and happiness to all sentient beings. And having generated bodhichitta we should call on all sentient beings as our guests at a feast of happiness.

"The awakening mind of bodhichitta is the key to fulfilling your own and others' goals. At the same time negative thoughts such as anger and pride subside," he has added.

His Holiness has also given the transmission of the mantra of Buddha Shakyamuni and Avalokiteshvara, the patron deity of Tibet, by asking those assembled to recite them after him.

After his knee replacement surgery in New York City on Jun 28, followed by a long-life prayers offering by a capacity packed UBS Arena there on Aug 22, the Dalai Lama landed at Zurich Airport on Aug 23 morning.

Mario Fehr, the representative of Zurich cantonal government; Yashbir Singh, the Government of India's Liaison Officer for His Holiness the Dalai Lama; Naveen Hooda, secretary of the Indian Embassy in Bern, had joined some 1,200 Tibetans for the Swiss reception led by Representative Ms Thinley Chukki of the Tibet Bureau, Geneva.

The Dalai Lama last visited Switzerland in Sep 2018 when he attended the 50th anniversary of the Tibet Institute in Rikon in Zurich's Töss Valley. On an earlier visit in Aug 2005, he held eight days of lessons in the Hallenstadion; some 30,000 people from 44 countries travelled to Oerlikon at the time, with around 270 journalists from Switzerland and abroad reporting on the event, noted swissinfo.ch Aug 24. The Dalai Lama will arrive at New Delhi airport on Aug 26 evening and will be back in Dharamshala, his exile home, on Aug 28.

Rubio Sounds Alarm Over Chinese Abuse of Tibetans

23 August 2024, Floridian Press, Mateo Guillamont

China is facing new political pressure from conservatives following reports it is employing draconian surveillance tactics to monitor Tibetans.

According to Radio Free Asia (RFA), China is persecuting Tibetan dissidents by increasing its police presence in Tibet, suppressing social media use, and employing surreptitious civilian surveillance officers. US Senator Marco Rubio (R-FL) publicly lamented Tibetans' oppression at the hands of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP).

China invaded Tibet in 1950 and has retained control of the country since then.

The US has historically sided with Tibetan rebels, who resisted Chinese authority in the years shortly after the latter's invasion to no avail.

The United Nations (UN), notwithstanding condemnations of China's human rights abuses in Tibet, has refused to recognize Tibet's self-determination rights.

Senator Rubio, a leading China hawk, called on the international community to respond to the CCP's persecution of Tibetans.

"Tibetans face harsh scrutiny and oppression by the occupying Chinese Communist Party," said Rubio. "The international community cannot remain as bystanders to these injustices"

Rubio has politically attacked the CCP extensively throughout this year.

From recommending the US deny Chinese companies IPOs to congressionally investigating investment funds engaged in Chinese markets, Rubio's animosity towards the CCP is palpable.

In June, Rubio sent a bipartisan letter to the Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of MSCI Henry Fernandez after MSCI seemingly ignored the CCP's alleged abuse of Uyghurs.

MSCI upgraded Volkswagen standing within its network although the latter was discovered to be harnessing Uyghur slave labor in its factory in Xinjiang. Many have accused the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) of committing genocide against Uyghurs and other predominantly Muslim ethnic groups in Xinjiang via forced labor and other genocidal acts.

Capacity crowd of 17,000 attend long-life prayers offering to Dalai Lama in New York

23 August 2024, Tibetan Review

A capacity crowd of 17,000, overwhelmingly Tibetan, people filled the UBS Arena in New York City's outskirt on Aug 22 to offer a long-life prayers ceremony to His Holiness the Dalai Lama. Recovering well from a knee surgery on Jun 28 and just a day before leaving the United States, the exile spiritual leader of Tibet assured the huge gathering about his good health and his confidence to live well past 100 years of age.

Addressing the crowd at the ceremony, which included Himalayan Buddhists, Mongols, Chinese, Koreans, Taiwanese and numerous others as well, the Dalai Lama has said:

"Here we have Tibetans from all three regions of Tibet demonstrating how we are united. Tibetan culture can be of benefit to the whole of humanity. The Buddha, Shakyamuni, became enlightened and gave teachings that have been preserved in Tibet and the Himalayan region. These teachings are profound and deeply valuable. I have studied them since I was very young. "The Buddha's teachings have influenced our way of life to the extent that the people of Tibet have been determined to keep them alive. I intend to live to be more than 100 years old and I will continue to do my best to help the Tibetan people.

"Chinese Communists may look down on Tibetan culture, but across the world we have friends who appreciate it. In Tibet we have the most complete transmission of the Buddha's teachings. As Tibetans have spread out across the world other people have become more aware of our traditions. We have many loyal friends who I'd like to thank. People around the world are taking an interest in Buddhism and even in China there are many curious to learn about Tibetan Buddhism."

The Dalai Lama also gave a short instruction on generating the awakening mind of bodhichitta. Explaining that he had followed the Buddha's teachings and generated the wish to become a Buddha in order to benefit beings over many lifetimes, he invited his listeners to make a similar commitment.

The Dalai Lama then gave transmissions of the mantras of Buddha Shakyamuni, Arya Tara, Avalokiteshvara, Manjushri, Hayagriva, the Medicine Buddha and Guru Rinpoché.

As the Tenshug prayers began, representatives from each of the 30 Tibetan Associations in the United States and Canada as well as from the Kalmykia, Buryatia, Mongolian communities, besides from the Sherpa, Tamang, Hyolmo, Bhutanese, Limi, Mustang, Manangi, Nubri, and other Himalayan communities, and New York based Tibetan NGOs, walked in a procession past the stage in symbolic offerings of Khatags (ceremonial greeting scarves).

The Dalai Lama also spoke about the need for religious harmony and emphasized the principles of secular ethics – an ethics system that appeals to the religious and the nonreligious alike and is based on the cultivation of genuine compassion.

Dr Namgyal Choedup, Representative at the Office of Tibet, Washington, DC, expressed special gratitude to Carol and Sam Nappi for their generous help in coordinating the arrangements for the Dalai Lama's successful knee replacement surgery and for their subsequent exceptional hospitality as he underwent over six weeks of physiotherapy in Syracuse. They were cheered by the crowd as His Holiness also personally thanked them.

Hollywood star and Tibet activist Richard Gere was a notable presence at the ceremony.

China protests, foul-mouths Dalai Lama, after US envoy for Tibet meets him

22 August 2024, Tibetan Review

The top US official on Tibetan issues has on Aug 21 met with Tibet's exiled spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, in New York City, prompting China to make what it said was "serious protest" with Washington the next day. The Dalai Lama, 89, has been in New York since Jun 23 for knee replacement surgery. The meeting with the US Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues, Under Secretary Uzra Zeya, was his first meeting with a senior US government official during his current sojourn.

Ms Zeya, who is also the Under Secretary of State for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights, was accompanied by Kelly Razzouk, Special Assistant to the President and National Security Council Senior Director for Democracy and Human Rights. "During the audience, she conveyed, on behalf of President Biden, best wishes for His Holiness's good health and reaffirmed the US commitment to advancing the human rights of Tibetans and supporting efforts to preserve their distinct historical, linguistic, cultural, and religious heritage," said the Office of the State Department Spokesperson in a media note Aug 21.

"Under Secretary Zeya welcomed His Holiness the Dalai Lama's lifelong dedication to promoting nonviolence and compassion. The Under Secretary also took the opportunity to discuss with His Holiness Tibetan cultural preservation, the United States' ongoing efforts to address human rights abuses inside Tibet, and support for resuming dialogue between the PRC and His Holiness and his representatives," the note said

The Chinese criticism came in response to a question from the AFP during Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Mao Ning's Regular Press Conference.

"China firmly opposes any country allowing the Dalai Lama to make visits under any pretext and opposes government officials of any country meeting with the Dalai Lama in any form. We've made serious protest with the US," the foreign ministry website quoted Mao as saying in her remarks.

She has sought to make the point that "the 14th Dalai Lama is not a pure religious figure, still less a figure promoting 'non-violence' and 'peace', but a political exile engaged in anti-China separatist activities under the cloak of religion."

Mao has further said: "We urge the US to fully understand the gravity and sensitivity of Xizang-related issues, be fully aware of the Dalai group's anti-China and separatist nature, honour the commitments the US has made to China on issues related to Xizang, truly respect China's core interests and major concerns, not allow the Dalai Lama to engage in political separatist activities in the US, have no contact with the Dalai Lama in any form, and stop sending the wrong message to the world."

Xizang is China's name for Tibet Autonomous Region, which is roughly the western half of Tibet proper.

The Dalai Lama is to attend a long-life prayer ceremony being offered by Tibetans, Mongolians and people of Himalayan communities based in North America in the UBS Arena in New York on Aug 22. He will then leave for Zurich where the Tibetan communities in Switzerland and Lichtenstein will also make a long-life ceremonial offering to him in the Hallenstadion on Aug 25.

This is the Dalai Lama's first visit to the USA since 2017. He has been reported to be recovering well from his knee surgery and is expected to be back at Dharamshala, his exile home, on Aug 28.

Earlier, Dr David Mayman, MD, Chief of the Adult Reconstruction and Joint Replacement Service at the Hospital for Special Surgery in New York, said last month that the Dalai Lama was expected to continue improving over the next six to 12 months.

Other meetings with US leaders seem unlikely, given the fact that the Dalai Lama is leaving the US on Aug 23.

In 2020, Candidate Joe Biden criticized then President Donald Trump for being the only president in three decades who had not met or spoken with the Tibetan spiritual leader, calling it "disgraceful," noted Reuters Aug 21.

US official meets Dalai Lama to discuss Chinese 'human rights abuses inside Tibet'

22 August 2024, WION

Dalai Lama on Wednesday (Aug 21) met a Biden administration official in New York City as the India-based Tibetan spiritual leader continues with his effort for Tibetan self-rule decades after China took territorial control over 1.2 million sq km of landmass neighbouring India.

"On August 21, 2024, Under Secretary of State for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights and Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues Uzra Zeya traveled to New York City, New York for an audience with His Holiness the XIV Dalai Lama," US State Department said in an official statement. The meeting takes place over a month after US President Joe Biden signed the 'Resolve Tibet Act', which enhances Washington's support for the Tibetan cause while aiming to promote dialogue between Beijing and the Dalai Lama toward a peaceful resolution of the dispute over the status and governance of the remote Himalayan region.

The act rejects false claims that Tibet has been part of China since "ancient times".

"Under Secretary Zeya was joined by Special Assistant to the President and National Security Council Senior Director for Democracy and Human Rights Kelly Razzouk," the statement added.

"During the audience, she conveyed, on behalf of President Biden, best wishes for His Holiness's good health and reaffirmed the US commitment to advancing the human rights of Tibetans and supporting efforts to preserve their distinct historical, linguistic, cultural, and religious heritage," it said.

"Under Secretary Zeya welcomed His Holiness the Dalai Lama's lifelong dedication to promoting nonviolence and compassion. The Under Secretary also took the opportunity to discuss with His Holiness Tibetan cultural preservation, the United States' ongoing efforts to address human rights abuses inside Tibet, and support for resuming dialogue between the PRC and His Holiness and his representatives," the statement added. The 14th Dalai Lama fled Tibet in 1959 and came to India, where he set up the government-in-exile at Dharamshala in the northern state of Himachal Pradesh.

From 2002 to 2010, the Dalai Lama's representatives and the Chinese government held nine rounds of dialogue that did not produce any concrete outcome.

Dalai Lama Chair to be set up at Panjab University

20 August 2024, The Tribune

A memorandum of understanding (MoU) has been signed between the Dalai Lama's Foundation for Universal Responsibility and Panjab University (PU) to establish the Dalai Lama Chair in the Department of Gandhian and Peace Studies.

PU Vice-Chancellor Prof Renu Vig said the main purpose of establishing the prestigious chair is to promote and preserve the Indo-Tibetan heritage for the dissemination of philosophical, historical and spiritual studies. The chair will disseminate the teachings and philosophy of the Dalai Lama and promote critical thinking and self-reflection among students, faculty and the wider community.

The chair will help, nurture and promote Buddhist response to contemporary issues, study of Tibetan and Pali Buddhist texts, Tibetan Buddhist art and architecture and Buddhist philosophy.

Department chairperson Prof Ashu Pasricha said the MoU will further explore Dalai Lama studies that discourses His Holiness' personal contribution on the important subject of ahimsa, social, ethical and emotional learning.

China's Tibetan Traditional Medicine Center eyes Manila satellite facility

20 August 2024, Manila Standard, Othel V. Campos

The Tibetan Traditional Medicine Center in Zhongshan, Guangdong Province in China disclosed plans to set up a satellite facility in Manila, a part of its global strategy to widen the reach of traditional Chinese therapeutic techniques.

"We are exploring how we can bring the benefits of Tibetan medicine closure to Filipinos. In fact, there is an ongoing government-to-government [G2G] negotiation between the Philippines and China," said New Goldmines Tours and Travel president Ruben Co. If talks go as anticipated, a new and the 7th Tibetan Traditional Medicine Center is expected to rise in Manila by July 2025, Co said.

As part of the Tibetan culture, the center will be adorned with traditional Tibetan decorations straight from Tibet to showcase its ethnicity and uniqueness. While there is no estimate yet on the cost of the facility, the traditional Tibetan works of art that will be used to decorate the building will reach about CY50 million.

Among the services the center intends to provide is an initial analysis of one's health conditions, particularly underlying illnesses not evident to the naked eye.

The center will also house a museum of traditional Chinese medicines, detailing their origin and their benefits to the human body. "Many Filipinos have sought the wisdom of Tibetan traditional medicine, particularly for those with serious health conditions such as cancer and internal organ failure," said Co. New Goldmines Tours provides a medical tour of the facility as part of a new tour package showcasing the cities in Southern China.

The traditional medicine segment targets mature markets who are into health longevity and therapy.

Tibetan actress wins Best Acting Performance at 77th Locarno Film Festival

18 August 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

profound spiritual quest for self-discovery and liberation, transcending the mere search for her missing husband.

The film was previously featured in the prestigious line up of the 74th Berlin International Film Festival, where it premiered in the Main Competition at the Berlinale Palast on February 23. Shambhala also won the Best Cinematography award at the Bishkek International Film Festival 2024 in Kyrgyzstan.

The Schrucker Fellowship for the Arts: Empowering Contemporary Tibetan Creatives

16 August 2024, ICT

Thinley Lhamo, the lead actor in Shambhala, a film prominently featuring a Tibetan cast and directed by Nepalese filmmaker Min Bahadur Bham, has been honoured with the prestigious Boccacino d'Oro Prize for Best Acting Performance at the 77th Locarno Film Festival. The festival is held from August 7 to 17, 2024, in Switzerland.

In a press release issued on Saturday, the film's team announced the honour, stating, "Shambhala team extends our heartfelt congratulations to Thinley and the entire team on this extraordinary accomplishment. This is a historic win and a first-of-its-kind recognition of a South Asian actor. Not only is this award recognition of Thinley's exceptional performance but also a testament to the emerging Nepali talents. It highlights the region's growing influence on the global cinematic stage."

Filmed entirely in Tibetan language, Thinley plays the role of Pema, the film's protagonist, who is a pregnant woman living in remote Dolpo, Nepal. Pema is in a polyandrous marriage with Tashi and his two younger brothers. When Tashi fails to return from a trading trip, leaving the legitimacy of her unborn child in doubt, Pema embarks on a journey to find him. As she searches for Tashi, Pema's journey transforms into a

Solidarity campaign for justice and protection of Tibetan rights

16 August 2024, Awaz The Voice, Sumana

In a continued display of solidarity with the Tibetan people, a group of exiled Tibetan families residing in Switzerland has been tirelessly advocating for the rights and freedoms of Tibetans living under Chinese rule. Their campaign, which began on Human Rights Day, December 10, 2012, persists with monthly protests in front of the United Nations Office in Geneva.

The campaign by the Tibet Solidarity Movement honours the memory of the 1.2 million Tibetans who lost their lives under Chinese domination and highlights the ongoing suffering of those still living in Tibet.

These activists stand in tribute to those who have committed the ultimate act of nonviolent civil disobedience—self-immolation—in protest against the political repression, cultural assimilation, social discrimination, and environmental degradation enforced by the Chinese government.

Under the guise of development and goodwill, the Tibetan people have been systematically deprived of their fundamental rights.

"Nearly a million Tibetan children, aged four to eighteen, are forcibly enrolled in colonial boarding schools, isolating them from their families, language, and cultural heritage. Simultaneously, Tibetan language schools are being shut down, further eroding the national identity of the Tibetan people", Tibet Solidarity Movement said in a statement.

The group has issued a series of urgent appeals, demanding international action to save Tibet.

They call for the implementation of United Nations resolutions on Tibet, adopted in 1959, 1961, and 1965, to restore freedom and peace in the region.

They also urge international bodies to support the return of His Holiness the Dalai Lama to Tibet.

Activists are also demanding an end to the massive environmental destruction in Tibet, which includes deforestation, overgrazing, uncontrolled mining, and the dumping of nuclear waste.

They emphasise the need to protect Tibet's fragile ecosystem, often referred to as the "Third Pole" and "Water Tower of Asia."

Their demands also include the release of political prisoners, investigation into the suppression of religious and cultural freedoms, closure of colonial boarding schools, and the establishment of a UN fact-finding mission.

Additionally, they urge the Chinese government to engage in substantive negotiations with representatives of His Holiness the Dalai Lama to resolve the Tibet issue peacefully and respect the rights of all its citizens, including Tibetans, Southern Mongolians, and Uighurs, in line with international obligations.

The exiled Tibetan community in Switzerland remains steadfast in their commitment to this cause, emphasizing that the world can no longer turn a blind eye to the violence and lies of authoritarian regimes. They urge the international community to act decisively before it's too late, to protect the children of Tibet and preserve the unique identity and culture of the Tibetan people.

"Save Tibet before it's too late," their message resonates, as they continue their peaceful but determined campaign for justice and freedom.

TYC concludes annual meeting, reaffirms commitment to Tibetan independence and global advocacy

16 August 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The Tibetan Youth Congress (TYC), the largest grassroots organization dedicated to the Tibetan independence cause, concluded its 54th Working Committee Meeting on August 10 in Gangtok, Sikkim. This gathering brought together around 200 representatives from 38 chapters, including from Nepal and India.

During the five-day meeting, both central and regional members of the organization engaged in extensive deliberations on nine key agendas, resulting in the adoption of 23 resolutions. The participants reaffirmed the overarching objectives of the TYC, emphasising the organisation's commitment to advancing the Tibetan independence movement among Tibetan youths and those living in Tibetan settlements. This includes organising workshops and discussions featuring discussions with former Tibetan political prisoners, and leveraging social media platforms to engage and inspire Tibetan youth across the diaspora to participate in the movement actively. The attendees expressed their determination to explore additional avenues for raising awareness about the ongoing atrocities in Tibet within the international community and among non-governmental organisations. They emphasised that Tibet has endured forced occupation for decades and reaffirmed their commitment to working closely with governments and NGOs to develop policies aimed at achieving Tibetan independence. The group also conveyed their gratitude to the United States for signing the "Resolve Tibet Act," expressing hope that other like-minded countries will enact similar legislation supporting Tibet.

The organization in their agenda also announced plans to collaborate with Tashi Lhunpo Monastery in the Bylakuppe Tibetan settlement, the spiritual and cultural seat of the Panchen Lama in exile, to mark the Panchen Lama's enforced disappearance in 2025. As part of this effort, they will send formal communications to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

On the final day, the participants in the meeting issued a statement condemning the Chinese Communist Party's ongoing cultural genocide in Tibet and reaffirmed their determination to draw international attention to the recent forced closure of the Ganjong Sherig Norbu Lobling School in Rajya, Tibet. They emphasised the urgent need for international intervention and support. The group announced plans to seek backing through advocacy and political efforts, including issuing a formal condemnation of the ongoing closures of numerous schools and monasteries in Tibet. They also intend to submit an appeal to the international community and its leaders, particularly highlighting the violations of children's rights.

The meeting concluded with the adoption of 23 resolutions, following the unanimous decision to withdraw three regional chapters of the Tibetan Youth Congress in Bylakuppe, Hunsur Rabgyaling, and Kollegal Dhondelling, and from using the TYC title in their future endeavours. The meeting also involved a comprehensive review of the annual financial reports from the TYC central leadership and regional chapters. Additionally, there were in-depth discussions on the implementation of resolutions passed during the previous Working Committee Meeting.

Toronto Tibetan activist concludes third bicycle rally for Free Tibet

16 August 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Sangyal Kyab with his cycle in Toronto, Canada (Photo/Facebook) Toronto-based

Tibetan activist Sangyal Kyap concluded his third bicycle rally for Free Tibet across Canada on Wednesday. Kyap completed his rally, beginning in Victoria, British Columbia, and ending in Toronto, Ontario, to raise awareness and inform Canadians about the Sino-Tibet conflict.

He covered a distance of 4,182.8 kilometres and took 54 days. The rally started on June 21 and concluded on August 14 when Kyap arrived at the Chinese Consulate in Toronto. Upon his arrival, he was greeted by Tibetans and supporters who had gathered to join him in the cause. The rally traversed remote Canadian provinces and made efforts to reach isolated areas. Throughout the journey, Kyap distributed brochures detailing the critical situation in Tibet and engaged in discussions about the urgent need for a resolution to the Tibet-China conflict.

Kyap outlined six demands to the Canadian government and the international community during this year's rally. The first demand is the immediate return of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama to Tibet without conditions. The second demand calls for the renewal of Sino-Tibet dialogue to resolve the conflict in good faith.

The third demand involves the immediate release of the Panchen Lama, who was abducted by the Chinese government on May 17, 1995, at age six. Kyap also called for the release of Go Sherab Gyatso and all other Tibetan political prisoners. Additional demands include shutting down Chinese colonial boarding schools in Tibet to free one million Tibetan children, halting illegal Chinese hydropower dam constructions in Dege, Kham, and other parts of Tibet, and ensuring human rights and religious freedom in Tibet due to ongoing abuses by the Chinese government.

Sangyal Kyap began his activism for the Tibetan cause in 2018 with a solo protest outside the Chinese embassy in Canada. He has since completed five peace marches spanning hundreds of kilometers to protest Chinese rule and policies in Tibet.

Sangyal Kyap's first bike rally for Free Tibet began in Vancouver, B.C., on August 16, 2022, and concluded in Ontario on October 12, covering 5,000 kilometres. His second bike rally, dedicated to H.H. The 14th Dalai Lama and Free Tibet, took place across Canada from Ottawa to Nova Scotia and then to Vancouver in May 2023.

Central Tibetan Administration Commemorates 78th Indian Independence Day

15 August 2024, CTA

In commemoration of the 78th Indian Independence Day, the Central Tibetan Administration held a brief ceremony at the Gangchen Kyishong to mark the joyous day alongside Indian brothers and sisters.

The celebration was attended by Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, Education Kalon (minister) Tharlam Dolma Changra, Security Kalon Dolma Gyari and Secretaries of the Central Tibetan Administration.

The proceedings began with Sikyong unfurling the Indian national flag and singing of India's national anthem. Sikyong then spoke to the media, offering congratulatory remarks to the government and people of India on this landmark occasion. "On behalf of Tibetans inside and outside Tibet, we wish to extend our warm greetings to the leadership and people of India on the 78th Independence Day celebration." While acknowledging the sincere assistance that India has rendered to Tibetan refugees during the latter's worst period of history for the last more than sixty years, the Tibetan political leader expressed gratitude on behalf of every Tibetan to the government and people of India.

Sikyong further said, "It's ironical that India got its independence in 1947, and three years later we lost our independence. In fact, many countries around the world, particularly after World War II, gained independence from colonial rulers. But unfortunately, the wave of communism that enveloped the region also enveloped Tibet under the forceful occupation by China. We still remain as political refugees here, and we also take inspiration from India's independence that we too will get to return back to Tibet as a free nation, as a people who can practice its freedom in the preservation of and promotion of its identity in terms of language, culture, religion, and way of life, and particularly Tibet's environment, that's not only important for Tibet but for the whole world. So it is a joyous occasion for Indians to celebrate, but for us, as Tibetans, we enjoy it with you. At the same time, we also think about and long for the day when we also get to celebrate our freedom.

Petition by 100 Tibetan scholars to UN High Commissioner calls for an end to school closures and cultural assimilation policies in Tibet

14 August 2024, ICT

The International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) welcomes a petition to UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Volker Türk calling for an end to China's forced assimilation policies in Tibet. In the petition 100 Tibetan professors, scientists and doctoral students in exile express their deep concern about the Chinese government's systematic closure of Tibetan monastic and public schools.

"This appeal by Tibetan scholars emphasizes the urgency of the situation in Tibet. The suppression of the Tibetan language and culture in everyday life through targeted school closures, indoctrination and propaganda in the educational sector are a core element of the Chinese government's assimilation policy. We expressly support the demands articulated in the petition. Tibetan students must have the opportunity to study at schools that celebrate their language and culture, Tibetan schools must not be closed, and the system of coercive boarding schools must be abolished," the International Campaign for Tibet stated.

The appeal was initiated by the Tibet Times, which is published in Dharamsala, India.

Campaign of school closures

A recent example of the cultural assimilation policies in Tibet is the closure of the Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling School in Ragya in July 2024. The Norbu Lobling School was the first private Tibetan school in the Golog region's Machen county (Chinese: Maqin qian) and was particularly well known for promoting the Tibetan language and culture. After its foundation in 1994, it made a name for itself as a vocational school, primarily through its Tibetan language courses. Human rights organizations have been observing with growing concern how the Chinese Communist Party has been replacing Tibetan textbooks with Chinese ones in primary and secondary schools in Tibet. Content in Tibetan is being systematically replaced by Chinese as the language of literature and instruction. At the same time, more and more public schools run by Tibetan monasteries and individuals have been forcibly closed by the Chinese authorities in recent years.

The petition has been submitted to the UN High Commissioner on 29 July by 100 professors, doctoral students and academics from the Tibetan exile community, and has also been signed by scholars who are attached to Tibetan culture.

It urges the UN High Commissioner to:

- Urge for an end to forced school closures and ensure restoration; protect private and monastic schools for their continued existence throughout Tibet and enable the immediate reopening of all forcibly closed schools.
- Call for an immediate end of the boarding school system in Tibet.
- Raise his voice to protect the Tibetan language, culture and religion and speak out publicly on the human rights situation in Tibet.
- Press for accountability and urge the Chinese government to comply with international education rights standards, as China has ratified the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Urge those responsible for violations to be held accountable.

Petition text

The signatories of the petition have requested that their names not be made public. The UN High Commissioner has received an unredacted version of the petition. ICT publishes the petition text hereafter, without indicating the names of the signatories:

Your Excellency,

The human rights situation in Tibet has been severely deteriorating. The PRC's assault on Tibetan cultural identity is evident in its accelerated implementation of what it calls 'bilingual education'. This policy undermines the Tibetan education system and uses the national curriculum to promote indoctrination and assimilation. In this context, we, the undersigned, express our deep concern over the Chinese government's systematic closure of privately-operated Tibetan schools.

Since 2010, the Chinese government's cultural assimilation policy has forced all schools in Tibet to use Chinese as the primary language, beginning from kindergarten. From primary school onward, all Tibetan students must take examinations in spoken Mandarin. In addition, colonial style boarding schools in Tibet separate Tibetan children from their families and communities, thus depriving them of their language, culture, and traditions from the grassroots level.

The recent closure of the reputed Ragya Gangjong Sherig Norbuling School in Golog Machen County, Qinghai Province, Tibet, on July 14, 2024, is particularly disheartening and alarming for Tibetans both within and outside of Tibet. This school has faced relentless pressure from the Chinese government through various means, including false allegations that elements of their logo were symbols of the Tibetan national flag, and false allegations charges against its founder, Ven. Jigme Gyaltzen (charges that were later dismissed), among other political accusations.

The Chinese government's cultural assimilation policy is ostensibly meant to provide better and equal job opportunities for Tibetans. However, in reality, privately-owned Tibetan schools have offered greater benefits and opportunities for the Tibetan people in general. One such example is Ragya School.

Ragya Gangjong Sherig Norbuling School was formally established in August 1994 with permission from the so-called Golog Local People's Government. It was the first privately-operated school in Qinghai Province. Over time, it became a specialized vocational school offering classes in Tibetan language, English, computer science, engineering, medicine, videography, and physical education. Since its inception, over 2,300 students have graduated, including at least 800 university students, 50 researchers, 90 doctors, 110 government employees, 250 university teachers, 13 headmasters, 110 monastic workers, and 260 entrepreneurs.

This is not the first instance of such closures. The Chinese government is targeting privately-operated schools, especially those engaged in promoting and preserving Tibetan culture and language. As per record of the Tibet Times, a Tibetan media outlet monitoring developments in Tibet from Dharamsala, India, out of 16 known private owned schools in Golog regions, since 2021, eight schools have already been shut down and most of the remaining schools under threat of closure through constant allegation and administrative pressure. For detailed reports on the Ragya School shutdown, please refer to this 'Tibet Times' news link: <https://en.tibettimes.net/2024/07/14/chinese-government-forcefully-shuts-down-ragya-gangjong-sherig-norbuling-school/> Buddhist philosophy based on Tibetan language offers numerous benefits to today's modern world, addressing both individual well-being and societal harmony. Concepts and practices from the Tibetan tradition are increasingly embraced and applied by a global audience. It is in every individual's interest to fight to preserve these invaluable ways of learning and living.

The United Nations promotes diversity and inclusion as fundamental principles across its agenda and it is also evident across its various programs and initiatives, aiming to build a more equitable and just world. This richness of Tibetan language, culture, and tradition offers much towards this diversity. The increasingly marginalized Tibetan language and culture should be protected and secured according to the principles and aims promoted by the United Nations.

As members of the global community, we urge the United Nations to take immediate and decisive action to address these critical issues and to preserve basic human rights and freedoms of the Tibetan people inside Tibet.

Given the severity and wide-reaching consequences of these educational restrictions, we respectfully request Your Excellency to:

- Urge for an end to forced school closures and ensure restoration; protect private and monastic schools for their continued existence throughout Tibet and enable the immediate reopening of all forcibly closed schools.

- Call for an immediate end of the boarding school system in Tibet.

- Raise your voice to protect the Tibetan language, culture and religion and speak out publicly on the human rights situation in Tibet.

- Press for accountability and urge the Chinese government to comply with international education rights standards, as China has ratified the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Urge those responsible for violations to be held accountable.

We believe these measures will significantly improve the right to education and cultural rights of the Tibetan people, their identity and cultural traditions, which in turn will help promote peace, security, and justice for the Tibetan people.

We have gathered signatures from Tibetans and those from other Himalayan regions – professors, lecturers, PhDs and Scholars from outside of Tibet – who have tremendous concern over the education crisis in Tibet. Their signatures below demonstrate widespread support for this letter and a collective desire for meaningful action and protection of fundamental human rights in Tibet.

We appreciate your attention to this matter and look forward to your prompt response. Together, we can work towards a more just and humane world for all.

Sincerely,

[Names redacted]

Former Ambassador Dilip Sinha talks to Tibetans in- exile about “Imperial Games in Tibet”

14 August 2024, The Print

The Tibet Policy Institute of the Department of Information and International Relations, Central Tibetan Administration on Wednesday held a talk by Former Ambassador Dilip Sinha on his recent book titled “Imperial Games in Tibet” in Dharamshala.

Various Tibetan intellectuals including Tibetan activists, a few members of the Tibetan parliament-in-exile and officials of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) attended the event.

Speaking to ANI, the author, Dilip Sinha, the former ambassador said, “I am grateful to the CTA and the Tibetan community in Dharamshala that they have invited me to speak on my book that was released a month ago in Delhi. It is a book called ‘The Imperial Games in Tibet’. It is about Tibetan history and about the cause of Tibet so the purpose of the book is to make the Indian people know about the history of Tibet and what happened to Tibet and what is the issue that we face today in our relations with China.” Talking about India's policy towards Tibet, Sinha said, “India's policy at the moment is a policy of supporting the Tibetan community in exile. India also supports the Central Tibetan Administration which runs the affairs of the Tibetan community but at the same time, the Indian government used to support the desires of the Tibetan people and their spiritual leader his holiness the Dalai Lama. We recognise that Tibet is an autonomous region of China and the autonomy should be respected and Tibetan culture and identity should also be respected."

Speaking about the motivation to write the book, Sinha further said, "I have been a student of political science and history and I realised that there was a neighbour of ours which we knew very little and our northern border which was always very peaceful border, has now become a security risk for us so how did this happen? Why did this happen? And why is the way forward? This is something that I wanted to read about to discover for myself and this is what I have written in the book."

The deputy director of Tibet Policy Institute, Tempa Gyaltsen Zamlha said, "I think it is an important event because the author is an Indian brother who wrote a wonderful book on Tibet and since he is a prominent former ambassador and diplomat so his presence here would highlight his book of course and also highlight how the imperial politics that was played at the time of independent Tibet and also around the time when Tibet was on the verge of losing its independence. The book will help the cause of Tibet because when more and more people read it they will have more and more understanding of what really happened to Tibet. After all, the book deals with the time between 1700 to the time when Tibet lost its independence so they will definitely have a great understanding." (ANI)

Committee Reviews Rules and Regulations of Parliamentary Procedure and Conduct for Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

13 August 2024, CTA

Following the decision made by the 7th session of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, a committee convened to review the 'Rules and Regulations for Parliamentary Procedures and Conduct of Business' concerning the removal of dignitaries from the Central Tibetan Administration has successfully concluded its work at 4 pm today.

The committee, chaired by Parliamentarian Dorjee Tseten and including Parliamentarian Karma Gelek (Secretary) and Parliamentarian Tenzin Jigdal, has spent over two months examining the current rules and comparing them with similar regulations from other countries.

The committee has submitted its report on these rules and regulations to Secretary-General Sonam Dorjee of the Tibetan parliamentary secretariat today.

Department of Education Initiates Free Distribution of Storybooks for Schools

11 August 2024, CTA

The Department of Education (DoE), Central Tibetan Administration initiated the free distribution of storybooks published between 2023 and 2024.

The Education Department aimed particularly on enhancing the reading proficiency of students in Tibetan schools throughout India. Each year, they translated internationally renowned children's storybooks, produced new children's publications, and distributed summaries of fairy tales. In the academic year 2023 to 2024, a total of 29 significant children's storybooks were released, of which 10 had been published previously.

Department of Education Initiates the Free Distribution of Storybooks

Dalai Lama's Succession Strategy; China's Xi Jinping Can't Handle Unpredictability: Tibet's Sikyong

11 August 2024, StratNews Global, Amitabh P. Ravi

Tibet's Sikyong (political head) Penpa Tsering in a wide-ranging, comprehensive chat on 'The Gist' Tibetan Sikyong Exclusive: Watch Here.

