
At a meeting in February, Wu and his lieutenants set out this year's key tasks, telling provincial social control teams to quickly formulate plans to find ways to better handle petitions and listen to grass-roots grievances and suggestions. They were also urged to deploy more staff to identify and defuse any potential social risks.

The central department is also tasked with asserting the party's leadership over various sectors of society, including industry federations and party branches in private companies. It also aims to extend the party's reach into the gig economy and among the growing number of self-employed people.

Most of the provincial officials who attended the event were the secretaries of local new economy and new social organisation work committees, which have been established since 2016 to extend the party's reach into the private sector and new internet industries, where the party previously had a limited reach.

A Zhejiang cadre said building a social organisation network across the country is still a work in progress. "We are still in the process of clarifying our new lines of reporting, finding duplicate functions and streamlining them. But the instruction from the top is very clear, get it done before the end of the year – and they won't accept excuses," he said.

The first new body to be established was the National Administration of Financial Regulation, which was set up in May last year – indicating the leadership's belief there is an urgent need for better oversight of the financial sector.

In March last year Beijing also said it would replace local financial regulatory bodies with the provincial outposts of the National Administration of Financial Regulation in a clear sign of Beijing's distrust of local governments when it comes to tackling the problem – especially since giving them free-rein over regulation is seen as a major source of corruption.

Most of the regional financial regulatory heads have been sent from central offices in Beijing.

As part of this drive another body, the Central Financial Work Commission, headed by Premier Li Qiang, was set up later in the year to design, coordinate and supervise financial policies for better stability and development.

A political scientist from Nanjing University said the leadership has grave concerns about financial risk and corruption, because the damage it can cause to ordinary people's lives is "nuclear grade".

"If you compare the damage from different sectors ... financial sector corruption is definitely going to lead the chart as they can influence the flow of or have access to the whole financial markets worth trillions of yuan.

"While other officials are taking bribes in thousands or millions of yuan, the financial sector's corruption can easily reach billions, leaving big holes and major headaches in the system," he said.

He cited the case of Lai Xiaomin, the former chairman of Huarong, one of China's largest state-controlled asset management firms, who was executed in 2021 for taking almost 1.8 billion yuan (US$277 million) worth of bribes – a crime the supreme court said had a "particularly severe" social impact.

The political scientist said the government shake-up showed "Beijing is very clear about this now. The financial sector shall not have its own agenda. It shall just serve its role of moving capital to where the party wants it to go".

Three regional officials involved in the overhaul said the new local financial bodies will only operate in provincial capitals and a handful of major cities.

"So in Guangdong, you will see a provincial financial regulatory bureau and two municipality level bureaus in Guangzhou, the provincial capital, and Shenzhen, a city under separate state planning. That is all," a Guangdong official said. An official in Guizhou concurred. "We will only have a provincial financial regulatory body and municipal financial regulator in our provincial capital Guiyang. Many cadres working in the financial area will be redeployed, especially those in smaller cities," he added.

An official involved in the institutional overhaul in Shanghai, China's financial and commercial centre, said the overhaul is aimed at removing the responsibility for developing markets from the municipal financial office to focus on regulation.

"The financial works office's job was to serve local governments and financial institutions, coordinate financial resources, help to obtain more credit to finance local development projects, and assist local companies to go public.

Now it is different. The central government's priority for us is to identify potential financial risks within our jurisdiction and manage them before it blows up," said the Shanghai official.

"It is not just changing the plate outside our office. It requires a drastic change in how we run the bureau, our mentality, how to regulate the interactions between officials and the financial institutions to avoid corruption etc. We are just embarking on it."

When it comes to data management the implementation at a provincial level is more patchy.

AI is seen as the next major area of competition between China and the US, and data is a vital resource for developing and training the technology.

After the launch of the National Data Administration, 20 out of the mainland's 31 provinces, regions and municipalities have so far set up their own data management offices to fit with Beijing's blueprint to develop China's data infrastructure and integrate and share data resources.

The plan will see national hub nodes set up in some of the country's key economic hubs, such as the Yangtze and Pearl River Deltas as well as around Beijing, and in less populated areas including Inner Mongolia, Gansu and Ningxia.

Except for Ningxia, all other provinces and regions mentioned in the plan have already announced new data agencies, led by directors with professional backgrounds in computers and big data.

Some provinces – Shaanxi, Hebei, Inner Mongolia and Guangdong – have also included "government services" in the name of their data agencies, suggesting a clear expansion in their role to allow residents to have one-stop access to government services.

The most mysterious of the new party organs are those set up to coordinate scientific development, with little information being released about their operations across the country.

The Central Science and Technology Commission was set up to oversee the sector from the top, but the only public reference to this new party body is a statement on the Ministry of Science and Technology's website in July that said cadres had studied the outcome of its first meeting.

Unlike the other newly established party organs, even the leadership of this body is unknown, something analysts said may be a sign of China's concerns about scrutiny from the West and may even indicate it has links to the military.

"China needs to avoid attention from the West so that it can push forward its science and tech development agenda with relatively fewer obstacles and intervention," said Tsinghua's Xie,

He noted that China's ambitious tech development and talent attraction plans – such as the Made in China 2025 blueprint and Thousand Talent Plan – has been used by the West to track the new industries China is betting on and its international talent recruitment, so "staying low-key is the natural response".

Information about science bodies on the provincial levels is also very limited. As of the end of April, only Henan and Inner Mongolia had announced the establishment of their own science commissions, which were chaired by senior officials.

National University of Singapore's Wu said it is still too early to say if the overhaul is effective as such drastic organisational changes need time to clear up any confusion or internal disputes they may cause.

"Many companies take years to complete their merger and acquisition process, not to mention mega-Chinese party and state machines which have faced three major reshuffles since Xi came to power."

Xi's three rounds of institutional reform – announced in 2013, 2018 and last year – have all aimed to centralise power in the hands of party apparatchiks and streamline the ever-ballooning bureaucracy to improve its efficiency and effectiveness.

"Deciding on the organisational structure and the staffing are probably the easiest parts of the latest reshuffle. It can be done in two years. Going forward, the bigger challenge is for the new agencies to prove themselves," Wu said.

China wants to control reincarnation of the next Dalai Lama

12 May, 2024, Sunday Guardian, Khedroob Thondup

By influencing the reincarnation process, China aims to assert its sovereignty over Tibet.

REINCARNATION

The Chinese government's interest in controlling the reincarnation of the next Dalai Lama, despite officially being an atheist state, is rooted in political and religious reasons. The Dalai Lama is a significant figure in Tibetan Buddhism and is traditionally believed to be reincarnated after death. The selection of his successor has historically been a religious process.

However, the Chinese government has sought to control this process for several reasons. By influencing the reincarnation process, China aims to assert its sovereignty over Tibet, which it annexed in 1951.

Controlling the selection of the next Dalai Lama allows China to mitigate any potential political unrest or movements for Tibetan independence.

China has imposed regulations that reincarnations must be recognized by the state and must be born within China's borders, which gives the government control over Tibetan Buddhism.

This control is also a way for the Chinese government to remove the influence of the current Dalai Lama, who lives in exile and is a global advocate for Tibetan rights and autonomy.

The Chinese authorities have even enshrined the right to appoint and recognize reincarnated lamas into Chinese law, setting a precedent for state control over religious practices.

The issue of the Dalai Lama's reincarnation is not just a religious matter but also a significant geopolitical issue, involving not only China and Tibet but also India, where the current Dalai Lama resides in exile. It's a complex interplay of religion, politics, and international relations.

BACK-CHANNEL TALKS

Back-channel communications with the Chinese government can be considered ineffective for several reasons, as highlighted by recent reports and statements from officials involved in such discussions: Despite the existence of back-channel talks, there has been little to no progress in achieving their intended outcomes. For instance, the President of the Tibetan government-in-exile mentioned that while back-channel talks with China exist, they have not progressed enough to be discussed publicly.

There is a high level of suspicion and distrust from the Chinese side, which hampers open and constructive dialogue. The Chinese authorities are very cautious and suspicious, making it difficult to move the talks beyond a preliminary stage.

The Tibetan community has been advised to prepare for a long-term struggle, possibly extending over decades, indicating that there is no expectation of a quick resolution through these back channels. The talks are described as very informal, with no immediate expectations from them. This informal nature might contribute to the lack of concrete outcomes and the absence of a structured dialogue process.

There are internal challenges within the communities engaged in back-channel talks, such as the younger generation's restlessness due to the lack of progress. This internal unrest can affect the effectiveness of the talks.

External geopolitical factors, such as the relationship between India and China, can also influence the effectiveness of back-channel communications. The dynamics of these relationships can either highlight or overshadow the issues being discussed in the back channels.

These points suggest that while back-channel talks are a step towards dialogue, their effectiveness is limited by various factors, including political, social, and diplomatic complexities.

Khedroob Thondup is the son of Gyalo Thondup, elder brother of the Dalai Lama. Educated at St Stephens College, Delhi University and the University of San Francisco, Khedroob Thondup was Personal Assistant to His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and accompanied him on his first trip in 1979 to the U.S. He was sent by the Dalai Lama to Beijing from 1980 till 1993 in dialogue talks. He interacted with Xi Jinping's father Xi Zhongxun and Hu Jintao. He is President of the Tibetan Refugee Self Help Centre, Darjeeling since 1987.

The escaped dissident still pursued decades on by China

11 May, 2024, BBC, Gordon Corera

Three decades ago, Chinese dissidents were being smuggled out of the country in a secret operation called Yellow Bird - but as one of them tells the BBC, Beijing is still pursuing them.

June 1992: It was the middle of the night on the South China Sea, and a Chinese patrol vessel was approaching a boat en route from the Communist mainland to the then-British colony of Hong Kong.

As border troops came on board to talk to the crew, their voices could be heard by a group of people packed into a secret compartment below deck.

A few minutes earlier, when the patrol boat was spotted, these secret passengers had been given an urgent order.

Beijing 1989: Yan Xiong pictured during the Tiananmen Square protests

"I was told to hide," one of them, Yan Xiong, recalls. "Don't make any noise!"

Most of those hiding were economic migrants, hoping to find work in Hong Kong – but not Yan.

He was a political dissident, and if he was discovered, he would be in serious trouble.

Yan was being smuggled out of China as part of a secret operation code-named Yellow Bird.

The patrol eventually sailed away, and in the early hours Yan - who had never travelled in a boat before that night - arrived in Hong Kong.

After a hearty breakfast, he was taken to a detention centre. This was, he was told, for his own safety. Walking the streets could be dangerous.

Being in detention was not new to Yan. He had already spent 19 months in a Chinese prison for his part in 1989's Tiananmen Square protests. Students had called for greater democracy and freedom, but the Communist Party sent in tanks to crush them.

At the end of June 1989, the Chinese government said that 200 civilians and several dozen security personnel had died. Other estimates have ranged from hundreds to many thousands.

On his release, Yan had made his way to southern China where, in scenes that could have been taken from a spy film, he was sent from one public phone booth to another, to be put in touch with the people who could get him out.

He was not the only dissident to undertake this risky journey.

Speaking to the BBC for a new series, Shadow War: China and the West, Chaohua Wang recalls her escape.

Despite being number 14 on a list of the 21 most wanted people after the Tiananmen Square protests, she managed to evade capture, hiding in tiny rooms for months before heading south and becoming part of the Yellow Bird escape line.

"I was like a parcel moved from one [person] to another," she says.

"I didn't even know the name Yellow Bird for quite some years."

Yellow Bird may sound like a classic spy operation, and many believed that an intelligence service - MI6 or the CIA - had come up with the idea. But they had not.

In fact, it was a private enterprise undertaken by concerned groups of citizens in Hong Kong, motivated by a desire to help out those who were on the run. Among them were the local film and entertainment industry and (more usefully) organised crime, in the form of the triads.

"They [the triads] had a lot of Chinese police in their pockets," says Nigel Inkster, who at that time was an intelligence officer based in Hong Kong. This was what enabled them to move people out of hiding in Beijing and smuggle them across the border.

The UK and US only became involved when those people who arrived in Hong Kong needed to work out where to go next.

Yan remembers being visited by what he described as an "English gentleman" who never gave his name but helped him with the paperwork.

"It is better for you to go to America, not England," the man told him. Within days Yan was in Los Angeles. Chaohua Wang also ended up in the US.

Why not England?

Former officials have told the BBC the UK was reluctant to take in Tiananmen protesters because it was desperate to avoid upsetting China in the run-up to the 1997 handover of Hong Kong.

An agreement had been signed by the UK in 1984, but the events of Tiananmen Square five years later raised difficult questions about Hong Kong's future.

In 1992, a few weeks after Yan's arrival in the colony, the former Conservative cabinet minister Chris Patten became the last governor of Hong Kong. He says he was determined to embed greater democracy, in the hope it would endure after the handover, and he announced proposals for the democratic reform of Hong Kong's institutions, aimed at broadening the voting base in elections.

There was opposition to the reforms not just from China's leadership but also from those in London who did not want to antagonise Beijing.

"My main responsibility was to try to give people in Hong Kong the best chance of continuing to live in freedom and prosperity, and to do so after 1997," the former governor, now Lord Patten, tells me. He says he also was aware of - but not involved in - Yellow Bird.

The reluctance to allow dissidents to come to the UK - and the anger in some quarters about Patten's reforms - speaks to a central question from the 1990s which still matters today: How far should the West go to avoid angering China and accommodate its rise, especially when it comes to values like human rights and democracy?

Yellow Bird ended on the rainy night in July 1997 when Hong Kong became sovereign Chinese territory. For a few years, the liberties that Patten had been trying to secure, held. But in the past decade, China - under Xi Jinping - has taken a more authoritarian turn and has tried to bring Hong Kong into line.

Yan took US citizenship and lived a model American life. He joined the US army and served in Iraq as a military chaplain.

He might have thought the hand of China's Communist Party could not reach him in his new home, but he was wrong.

In 2021, he decided to run for public office. He stood as a candidate in the Democratic primary for New York's 1st Congressional District.

Yan started noticing some odd occurrences during his campaign. Strange cars followed him and lurked outside where he was staying at three in the morning. At campaign events, people would try to block him from speaking.

He learned why when the FBI came to talk to him. A US private investigator had told them he had been approached by an individual in China, who had asked him to carry out surveillance on Yan. It seems the idea of a former Tiananmen protester entering US Congress was unacceptable.

"He had specifically told our private investigator that they needed to undermine the victim's candidacy," says FBI agent Jason Moritz.

The FBI were able to monitor events as the Chinese-based individual proposed the investigator dig up dirt on Yan. If he could not find any, he was instructed to make some up. If that did not work, beating him up or even staging a car accident was suggested.

"They want to smother and kill my campaign," Yan explains.

The person instructing the private investigator, the FBI assessed, was working on behalf of China's Ministry of State Security. They were indicted but could not be arrested because they were outside the US.

China has consistently denied claims of political interference. But this is not the only case where it is alleged to have become more assertive in tracking down those it considers dissidents in other countries. There have been claims of "overseas police stations" in the UK and US and of individuals being pressured to return to China or be silent.

Yan's story reveals that as China has become more confident and controlling at home, it has also sought to extend its reach abroad. And that is increasingly causing friction over issues of espionage, surveillance and human rights.

Meanwhile, Yan's message to Western governments when dealing with China is simple: "They've got to be careful."

What Xi Jinping Really Thinks

11 May, 2024, Time, Steve Tsang

Xi Jinping has changed China fundamentally. He has kept the same political system that Chairman Mao Zedong created when he founded the People's Republic of China in 1949. Mao governed China with "Mao Zedong Thought," which he introduced in 1945. Deng Xiaoping put that aside when he took power in 1978 and unleashed the "reform and opening up" era. The Dengist approach was in turn jettisoned with "Xi Jinping Thought" as the de facto state ideology in 2017. Xi is not attempting a Maoist restoration; he has ambitions even greater than Mao. At the core of Xi's vision is the fulfilment of the "China Dream of national rejuvenation" by 2050. But what does Xi Thought really entail? To understand this properly, we consulted all publicly available speeches, writings, and policies of Xi in the first comprehensive study of his ideology to explain how this supreme leader of one of the world's most important countries is upending both China and the world in profound ways.

Xi's ambition to strengthen his regime security, enhance the Chinese Communist Party's supremacy, and deliver his dream of national rejuvenation can be boiled down to two visions.

"One Country, One People, One Ideology, One Party, and One Leader"

The first vision is to create "one country, one people, one ideology, one party, and one leader." Xi's vision of "one country" requires every Chinese person to submit oneself to the greater good of China as interpreted by the Party. His vision of "one country" calls for the resolute defense of China's honor. This requires a forceful approach to tame China's restive peripheral regions, lest they become centrifugal forces. It also implies that Xi is serious about using force to take Taiwan or territories defined by the party-state as Chinese. He sees building the People's Liberation Army (PLA) into a, if not the, world-class military as essential to advancing his vision of "one country."

To create "one patriotic people," Xi Thought makes every Chinese person take on a politicized national identity and learn its tenets. Chinese heritage or culture are made inseparable from political loyalty to the PRC, the CCP, and its top leader. Thus, the Maoist ideas of the mass line (making people believe whatever the Party does is in their best interest) and the United Front (the ultimate divide and rule methodology) have been reinvigorated. In Xi Thought, the extreme measures used are meant to "educate" and "level up" those Xi deems to have fallen astray, such as the Muslim Uyghurs, other minorities, Hong Kongers, and some private tech conglomerates, so that they can become full and useful members of the "one family" that is China. Xi wants to turn his "one people" into new socialist Chinese patriots. To this end, he invests in forging Xi Thought into the "one ideology" that enables them to think correctly. He believes that ideological indoctrination is not effective if it is not all-encompassing. That means standardizing not only people's thinking in political or historical matters but also how education and entertainment providers operate. For this reason, Xi uses technology adroitly, such as Xuexi qiangguo, the mobile app that promotes Xi Thought, to require Chinese citizens to learn Xi Thought and be monitored in how hard they are learning it on a daily basis. This is reinforced by the use of digital surveillance technologies to ensure no critical comments on Xi is allowed.

To bring Xi's vision for "one country," "one people," and "one ideology" into reality, Xi Thought reinvigorates and "upgrades" the CCP into the "one party" that can guide everyone, everywhere, and in all policy areas under himself as supreme leader. The "upgraded" CCP is a Leninist party that follows strict discipline, embraces centralized hierarchy, penetrates society effectively, and upholds Xi's leadership. Xi believes that these attributes can enable the Party, under his guidance, to lead everyone and everything in China. To cement his hold on power, Xi effectively prohibits any plan for succession, a major departure from recent Chinese leaders.

Making China "Great Again"

As Xi's global vision is guided by a "China First" principle, which in reality means putting the power and interest of the Party—and himself as its core leader—above all other considerations, it guides Chinese foreign policy to make the world safe for authoritarianism. A world unsafe for authoritarian states like Xi's China is one in which his government can fall victim to a "color revolution." This vision also includes the ambition to "modernize and transform" the U.S.-led rules-based international order into one that dovetails with China's interests and values. Xi Thought's other key foreign policy tenet, that Chinese diplomats and officials must proudly tell China's story well and demand others to pay due respect to China, underpins the advent of "wolf-warrior" diplomacy.

This combination has six main implications, not in order of importance.

First, despite China's craving for soft power, the Xi approach undermines China's capacity to enjoy soft power in the rich world. But the focus of Xi Thought on soft power is the less developed, less wealthy, and often undemocratic parts of the world. Its Sino-centric mentality that primes the Chinese people to feel superior to others, in line with Xi's tianxia worldview, where China was the "top civilization" power, is offensive to many. But the fundamentally transactional nature of Xi's approach—whether investments via the Belt and Road Initiative or support for authoritarian rulers abroad—make Beijing a valuable partner around the globe.

Second, while China under Xi Thought ultimately aims to make China the preeminent power in the world, it will not seek to replace the U.S. as the global hegemon. It implies that if the U.S. should withdraw from a leadership role in a region and China gets to fill the void, it will do so on its own terms and not pick up where the Washington may leave off. Under Xi, China will continue to advocate multipolarity as it weakens U.S. global hegemony, but it sees it as a stepping stone toward China's own unipolar moment, which Xi expects to achieve by the mid-century.

Third, putting China first also implies that China will take a more assertive approach toward its neighbors and the rest of the world. Under Xi Thought, China will adopt a tough line on territorial or maritime disputes, be it in the East China Sea, South China Sea, or China's western land borders. The only major exception is over the Russian Far East, which Tsarist Russia took from the Manchu Qing Empire in 1860. Xi's China claims the Manchu Empire as Chinese and will want this vast territory back but will hold off demanding it so that China can keep strategic partnership with Russia while it competes with the U.S. for global leadership. As a corollary to this assertive approach is a readiness to insist on China's extraterritorial reach. Under Xi, Chinese fugitives, including alleged corrupt former officials and dissidents, have been brought home to face "justice." Beijing has also pushed the Hong Kong State Security Law and enhanced the United Front work overseas.

Fourth, Xi Thought has a different view of globalization, where furthering it should only be pursued if it is beneficial to China. In policy terms, this translates into selective decoupling, as Xi seeks to strengthen China's economic strength through innovation by any means necessary and to reduce its economic vulnerability to potential Western sanctions. In terms of China's place in the global supply chain and economic integration, China will prioritize its domestic political needs ahead of the global common good, as evidenced in how the "dynamic zero COVID" policy and its associated lockdowns have been implemented.

Fifth, under Xi Thought, the primary focus for China's foreign policy competition is the U.S. That means engaging in intense and often antagonistic competition with Washington. This includes inculcating hatred against the U.S. among China's population, and celebrating major U.S. foreign policy mistakes and its democratic mishaps. While it does not intend China to replace the U.S. as the global hegemon, it does ultimately require Beijing to displace Washington as the preeminent power and assert its leadership for the world.

Sixth, and most important of all to Xi Thought, is seizing Taiwan and integrating it into the PRC. There is no doubt that Xi prefers a peaceful solution over Taiwan, which can be achieved by Taipei surrendering and accepting "reunification" with China. Since that is unrealistic, Xi requires the PLA to stay prepared to use force. However Chinese control over Taiwan is to be achieved, it can only happen by China either deterring the U.S. from interfering in line with the American Taiwan Relations Act or being sufficiently defeated to back off. Either way, China prevailing over Taiwan against U.S. wishes will fundamentally change the global and Indo-Pacific power balance, and the U.S. will have conceded a key geopolitical sphere of dominance. A Chinese victory here will show the world that Xi's China Dream of national rejuvenation has been accomplished.

ཇ་དང་ཨ་མོ་ཤིང་བཞི་ལམ་དབང། My Destiny with Amdo

Ngaba: Generational Impeded Culture leading to Self-Immolation in Ngaba

10 May 2024, FNVA, Rinzin Namgyal

Abstract: In the reverberating words of Barbara Demick, Ngaba stands as the formidable bastion of Tibetan resistance, epitomising a steadfast defiance against Chinese dominance. Embodied in the proverbial wisdom, "if there is a fire in Lhasa, the smoke will rise from Ngaba," lies the profound significance of this town nestled in Eastern Tibet. Within the tapestry of its history, Ngaba emerges as a focal point in the perpetual struggle against Chinese encroachment, marking the zenith of third epoch of resistance. My narrative intertwines with the essence of Amdo Ngaba, unearthing "Generational Impeded Culture" that culminate in the fervent protests saturating this region. Comparative scrutiny juxtaposes Ngaba's fervor with the broader spectrum of Tibetan resistance, illuminating its unparalleled fervour evident in self-immolations, demonstrations, and myriad forms of dissent. Ngaba emerges as a crucible wherein the dialectics of heritage and modernity converge, forging a collective consciousness that pulsates with resilience. It is a saga of identity wrested from the clutches of assimilation, a testament to the indomitable spirit of a people entrenched in the sanctity of their cultural and national legacy against the Chinese occupation. Till date 65 cases of Tibetan Self-Immolating in the Ngaba County has been reported, recovered and recorded. (I was able to gain this valuable data through the help and assistance of TCHRD). Read more here.

Backdoor support of China fuels Nepal's cartographic aggression irks India

May 10 2024, Organiser

The cabinet of Prachanda recently decided to include a map on its new banknotes that depicts portions of the Indian state of Uttarakhand as part of its territory. Nepal shares a border of over 1,850 km with five Indian states – Sikkim, West Bengal, Bihar, Uttar Pradesh, and Uttarakhand. The disputed areas include Lipulekh, Limpiyadhura, and Kalapani in the Rs 100 denomination bank notes. It is seen as a deliberate and provocative act by Nepal. External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar has stated that such unilateral measures are not going to change the reality on the ground. Together, the three disputed areas cover about 370 sq km. The strategic Lipulekh pass connects the Indian state of Uttarakhand with the Tibet region. The Kalapani area is strategically significant in South Asian diplomacy as it is at the tri-junction between India, China, and Nepal. Nepal has claimed that these areas belong to it. In 2020, India inaugurated the 80 kilometres road to facilitate pilgrims visiting Kailash-Mansarovar in Tibet in China, which is around 90 kilometres from the Lipulekh pass. Lipulekh is a strip of land on the northwestern edge of Nepal, lodged between Nepal, India, and Tibet. It is a far western point near Kalapani, a disputed border area between Nepal and India. The road has strategic value for India as it will be the first to provide connectivity to the Indian troops deployed on the Line of Actual Control with China in Uttarakhand.

The map was adopted by consensus in Nepal's Parliament four years ago. The Prime Ministers of India and Nepal have agreed to examine the border issue and settle it through diplomatic means and channel. Following Nepal's cabinet decision, Jaishankar said that discussions regarding the border issues are going on through established platforms. However, it appears that Nepal is not running at the same pace as India in this matter. Unlike in 2020, when the new map was adopted, the May 2 decision to put it on the currency note has met with scepticism and criticism.

The fissures in the bilateral relations of India and Nepal emerged when the well placed 2005-2014 relations between India and Nepal, when Nepal witnessed a transition in its secular and federal features vanished into thin air in 2015 after the Maoists flat refused the suggestion of New Delhi that Nepal's constitution should be delayed until the concerns of the Terai parties are addressed. The 134-day blockade of Nepal that began in 2015 created a major trust deficit against India. K.P. Sharma Ali who took over as PM of Nepal in 2015, quickly shifted his allegiance towards China. In 2018, Oli returned as PM again. In 2020, he built the consensus in Parliament for Nepal's new map that included the disputed regions. India strongly objected to such acts.

The said issue needs to be resolved with evidence and diplomatic routes. Notably, the cabinet decision on printing new notes has come in just two months after Oli's Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist Leninist) CPN (UML) joined the ruling coalition in Nepal. His party's manifesto clearly promises to bring the contested areas into Nepal. The country has slowly drifted apart from India, and China has moved in to fill the vacuum with investments, aid, and loans. China's charm offensive in Nepal might be veering the Himalayan country away from India. China considers Nepal a key partner in its Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) and wants to invest in Nepal's infrastructure as part of its grand plans to boost global trade. It has been reported that in 2022, China offered Nepal a Trans-Himalayan Multi-Dimensional Connectivity Network created by blasting tunnels through the mountainous Tibetan plateau under its flagship Belt and Road Initiative. But the project has been marred by delays over finance. China has already constructed Pokhara International Airport, but India continues to deny permission to fly overhead to flights heading to the Chinese-built airport. This means that the airport remains inactive. India has also squandered away its goodwill bank in the country, as its new recruitment scheme cut out the Nepalese Gurkhas from getting recruited in its Gurkha regiments. It has been nearly three years, and not a single Nepali Gurkha has joined the Indian Army, denting century-old ties. There has been a change within Nepal as to how they compare the 2020 and 2024 issue. Unlike in 2020, when the new map adored by Nepal, there is no visible consensus on the current decision by putting up the map on the currency notes. It is being believed that the decision is perceived as unwise. Many in Nepal believe that the issue should be settled through diplomacy and dialogue without any cascading consequences, which compels India to play the hardball vis a vis the Himalayan country. The Nepalese government is however, taking it lightly and believes that it can improve its chances by shaking hands with China. As India is currently undergoing its national elections, the new government will have its work cut out to seriously recalibrate its approach towards its neighbourhood policies. Despite having in principle agreements on the resolution of the tedious border issues, both India and Nepal have to set a time-bound framework to fix the tangible issue of disputed territories and restore the non- tangible historical ties.

Human rights organizations hold lecture tours at world-renowned universities to commemorate the 35th anniversary of the Tiananmen Massacre

09 May, 2024, VOA, Zhou Xingchen

Zhou Fengsuo, executive director of the human rights organization Human Rights in China, gave a speech at Stanford University on Tuesday (May 7), telling the story of the June 4th massacre that he personally experienced in Tiananmen Square 35 years ago, and telling the real history to the world, especially the younger generation. This is part of the "Tiananmen Square Student Protests and Democracy in China" series of lecture tours jointly organized by China Human Rights and Humanitarian China and student organizations from well-known universities around the world to commemorate the 35th anniversary of the 1989 student movement. After being invited to give lectures on the June 4th theme at Cambridge University, Georgia Free Students Union, Brown University, and Columbia University in April and May, Human Rights in China held a June 4th-themed lecture at Stanford University in the San Francisco Bay Area on May 7. speech. Zhou Fengsuo, executive director of Human Rights in China and co-founder of Humane China, delivered a speech titled "From the Tiananmen Student Movement, the Hong Kong Anti-Extradition Movement to the White Paper Movement - Chinese Student Movement and Chinese Democracy." Survivors of the Tiananmen Massacre told the truth and remembered history.

Zhou Fengsuo was one of the student leaders of the Tiananmen student movement and served as a standing committee member of the Beijing University Student Autonomy Federation. After the authorities suppressed the student movement, he was listed as one of the 21 backbone members of the Chinese Communist Party, wanted and imprisoned. As an eyewitness, Zhou Fengsuo recounted his experience in Tiananmen Square in 1989. He said: "The student protest group persisted in Tiananmen Square for 50 days. As a survivor, I want to tell the real history to the world. I like talking to young people, this is very important. Young people need to know the truth of history, we need Keep the truth and keep this fighting spirit going."

On May 7, 2024, Zhou Fengsuo, executive director of the human rights organization Human Rights in China, delivered a speech at Stanford University on the theme of "From the Tiananmen Student Movement, the Hong Kong Anti-Extradition Movement to the White Paper Movement-Chinese Student Movement and Chinese Democracy." (Photography by Zhou Xingchen)

Zhou Fengsuo's speech about "the students' protests have won the support of the people" was applauded by the audience.

He said: "The 1964 student movement was supported by all the Chinese people. In Beijing alone, more than 1 million people took to the streets to support the student protests, accounting for one-tenth of Beijing's population at the time. Not only in Beijing, citizens took to the streets to support students in hundreds of cities in China. There were large-scale protests in Shanghai, Chengdu, Wuhan and other places. Almost every university has an independent student organization to organize protests, including CCTV and People's Daily. Many journalists, including daily newspapers, participated in the protest and covered the student demonstrations at the time."

The truth about June 4th is still shocking

People from all walks of life, including teachers and students from Stanford University, citizens of the San Francisco Bay Area, and members of local democracy and human rights organizations, participated in the lecture and subsequent discussion sessions. Tom, a student at Stanford University, is one of them.

He spoke about his feelings in an interview with VOA after the meeting.

"We had seen some information about the Tiananmen Massacre from the Internet. Although I rarely talk about the Tiananmen student movement with my friends and parents, we are very interested in the history of the Chinese democratic movement and hope to hear personal accounts from the Tiananmen protest students. Narration. Mr. Zhou Fengsuo's speech today gives us the opportunity to understand the real history, which is very good," he said.

Mobi, a graduate of Stanford University, was also happy to have the opportunity to hear the history of the June 4th incident from those who witnessed it.

After the lecture, he told America: "Although I have read some information about the June 4th Movement, I am still very happy to hear people who participated in the 1989 student movement speak about that period of history in person, because in 1989, I was very small, and for me, it was a very idealistic student democratic movement."

Ms. May, who came all the way from Fremont to Stanford University to hear Zhou Fengsuo's speech, told VOA that she was very shocked after listening to the speech.

She said: "From Mr. Zhou Fengsuo's speech, I learned for the first time that the youngest child among the June 4th victims was only three and a half years old! He also mentioned that after the Tiananmen Massacre, he saw more than 40 corpses at the entrance of Fuxing Hospital. The bodies of the victims. This time I saw with my own eyes the list of wanted students he brought to the speech, the bloody clothes in Tiananmen Square, and the photos of more than 100,000 people commemorating June 4th in Victoria Park in Hong Kong. These are all the CCP's suppression of students! The evidence of the movement and the massacre of unarmed students is so cruel!"

The 1989 Tiananmen Student Democratic Movement, also known as the 1989 Democracy Movement, the 1989 Student Movement, the Tiananmen Incident or the Tiananmen Massacre, refers to the massacre that began in mid-April 1989. Triggered by the commemoration of Hu Yaobang, Chinese college students launched a demonstration movement in Tiananmen Square that lasted for nearly two months. The students raised demands such as anti-corruption, freedom, and democracy. The student movement that started in Beijing soon swept many cities across the country, and college students from all over the country took to the streets to protest and demonstrate. From the evening of June 3 to the early morning of June 4, the Central Military Commission of the Communist Party of China ordered the Chinese People's Liberation Army, the Armed Police Force and the police to use force to clear the demonstration crowds in Beijing's Tiananmen Square. Many students and citizens were massacred. For the Tiananmen massacre. Immediately, the Chinese authorities issued a wanted order for the fugitive student movement leaders.

File photo: June Fourth witness Fang Zheng (in a wheelchair), from left: Wang Dan, Zhou Fengsuo, Li Xiaoming, Wu Renhua, Teng Biao and Wang Juntao in front of the Tank Man installation in front of the Chiang Kai-shek Memorial Hall in Taipei.

Fang Zheng: It is very important to tell young people the truth about June 4th

Fang Zheng, president of the China Democracy Education Foundation, a pro-democracy organization in the San Francisco Bay Area, is another victim and survivor of the Tiananmen massacre. As a senior student at Beijing Institute of Physical Education, Fang Zheng held on to Tiananmen Square until the last moment. In the early morning of June 4, he withdrew from Tiananmen Square and walked to Liubukou. In order to save a female classmate, he was run over by a tank and his legs were broken.

Fang Zheng told Voice of America after the lecture at Stanford University that in the context of the CCP banning Chinese people from mentioning the 1989 student movement and arresting people commemorating the Tiananmen Massacre, survivors of the Tiananmen Massacre went on a lecture tour to world-renowned universities. , it is very important to tell and spread the truth about the Tiananmen Massacre to young people.

He said: "China Human Rights and Humanitarian

China have been committed to exposing China's human rights disasters and rescuing persecuted Chinese human rights defenders for many years. Zhou Fengsuo himself has been paying attention to China's domestic rights protection struggles for many years. He has intervened and spoken out on China's current human rights incidents. He is very suitable for communicating with young people who are concerned about Chinese democracy, from telling the history of China's democratic movement to discussing with young people how China can further develop democratic movements and carry out human rights causes in China now and in the future. , I believe there will be many sparks."

"Today's young people will play a leading role in the future of the world and China in ten and twenty years. They determine the future, and young people must be made aware of the crimes and tyranny of the CCP. It is very important for young people to have a correct understanding of the nature of the CCP," Fang Zheng emphasized.

Zhou Fengsuo: The June 4th clearance was a deliberate massacre.

Zhou Fengsuo emphasized during the interactive session with students: "The tank attack on Tiananmen from the evening of June 3 to the morning of June 4th was not an accident at all. The June 4th clearance was a deliberate massacre. "It was a carefully planned massacre carried out by the CCP army. Deng Xiaoping wanted to kill the protesting students and citizens and create fear in people's hearts so that the CCP could continue to govern smoothly and he could live in peace.

"In an interview with Voice of America after the meeting, he said that the massacre did not only occur in Beijing.

He said: "In the end, the CCP deployed 250,000 troops to suppress the protesting students and citizens in Tiananmen Square. But the massacre occurred not only in Beijing, but also in many other places. For example, Chengdu. One of the most revealing studies is about the Tiananmen Square massacre. Massacre, NPR reporter Louisa Lin wrote a book specifically confirming the large-scale killing of participants of the 1989 student movement by the Chinese Communist Army in Chengdu."

Zhou Fengsuo: He was moved by the interaction with the audience after the speech

This pro-democracy activist who has been committed to promoting human rights in China said that during the interactive sessions after the speeches at various universities, many audience members told him about their experiences in Tiananmen Square, which moved him very much.

"After I gave a speech at Cambridge University, a Uighur girl told me that when her father participated in the pro-democracy movement in China in 1989, he wrote a slogan in support of democracy and freedom. At that time, he escaped censorship. But after Ten years later, this matter was discovered, and her parents were forced to flee to England, so she was finally born in England. This is a very representative story, showing that people of all nationalities were widely involved in it at that time. Participate. Ten years later, they are still being persecuted for this matter, which shows how afraid the CCP is of the 1989 student movement," Zhou Fengsuo said.

He said that during his speech, he would meet young students from China and feel the inspiration they received from the 1989 student movement. They are all eager to talk about what they want to do to bring about democratization in China, and many people will think of some very practical issues, such as how to organize in this difficult situation of network security and how to pay attention to China. political prisoners.

Zhou Fengsuo also mentioned that young people in the West are also very interested in the June 4th and Tiananmen movements.

He said: "This year, several young Americans said that what happened in 1989 changed their lives. They saw the problems of the Chinese Communist Party today and the harm caused by China's lack of democratization. They also felt more urgently that China We need democracy and freedom, and we also want to learn about another possibility in China through this incident in 1989, that is, how can China be democratized, and how should democratic countries deal with demons like the CCP now? I think these are very meaningful. "

Fang Zheng, chairman of the China Democracy Education Foundation, said that when the anti-extradition movement occurred in Hong Kong, one million Hong Kong people took to the streets to demonstrate, which proved that the people supported Hong Kong's social movements and democratic demands; even the events that will happen in China in 2022 are mainly young people. The protest movement on the streets and the white paper movement with the "anti-blockade" as its appeal also received widespread support from the Chinese people. Because of this, this democratic movement with a mass base achieved a basic victory, and finally ended with China The government ended the blockade, although the CCP arrested many young people involved in the White Paper Movement.

After the lecture, Zhou Fengsuo told VOA that Human Rights in China will hold lectures on the June Fourth student movement and Chinese democracy at well-known universities such as the University of Calgary in Canada, the University of London, and Sun Yat-sen University in Taiwan. In addition, Humane China will also hold an exhibition of June Fourth cultural relics.

From the bookshelf: 'The Political Thought of Xi Jinping'

13 May 2024, ASPI

At the Chinese Communist Party congress in October 2017, 'Xi Jinping thought on socialism with Chinese characteristics for a new era' was formally incorporated in the party constitution—alongside Mao Zedong thought, Deng Xiaoping theory, Jiang Zemin's 'important thought on the three represents' and Hu Jintao's 'scientific outlook on development'. In the CCP ideological hierarchy, 'thought' is at the top, followed by 'theory', while Jiang's 'three represents' and Hu's 'scientific outlook' are considered to be action manuals, lower on the scale. Labelling Xi's input to CCP ideology as 'thought' puts him on a par with Mao and ahead of Deng Xiaoping, at least in principle. But the length and clunkiness of the name of Xi's dogma, contrasting with the punchy title 'Mao Zedong thought', is generally seen to indicate that Xi is not yet in the same class as the great helmsman.

Is this significant? To the casual reader, Xi Jinping's written works and speeches might simply seem like disjointed pronouncements presented in the heavy jargon of the CCP. But do they in fact form a coherent body of work intended to guide Chinese decision makers, party cadres and the population at large? And can they serve as a guide for outsiders wishing to understand and predict the actions of China's leaders?

In the book The Political Thought of Xi Jinping, Steve Tsang and Olivia Cheung think they do. The authors ambitiously tackle the task of making Xi Jinping's thought accessible to the general reader. Tsang has published widely on Chinese politics and is director of the China Institute at the School of Oriental and African Studies of the University of London, where Cheung is a research fellow. Together they have reviewed the vast body of work that has emerged in Xi's name during his decade in power.

At the centre of Xi's thought lies the CCP, which in his view has been weakened over the years by factionalism, corruption and the separation of party from state instigated by Deng Xiaoping. Xi sees the state as subservient to the party, as simply the executor of party policies, and has systematically reversed Deng's political reforms and brought state organs firmly under party control.

Xi's ideological mission is to reinvigorate the CCP and consolidate China as a party-state. He wants to make the party great again. Pursuing this theme, the authors devote an entire chapter to 'The party leads everything', detailing how Xi has shifted control of all major policy processes to the CCP and, ultimately, himself.

The authors review policy decisions and specific actions in the context of Xi's concern to maintain control, from economic policy, diplomacy and fighting corruption to reining in the rival youth league faction led by his predecessor Hu Jintao and the late Li Keqiang. Even the central bank's recent monetary policy decisions appear to be driven by Xi Jinping thought.

When the tennis star Peng Shuai in 2021 went on the social media platform Weibo to accuse former deputy premier Zhang Gaoli of sexual assault, many expected disciplinary action against Zhang. But censors quickly took down Peng's post, and she disappeared from view and later retracted the allegations and announced her early retirement. Zhang remained unscathed. The message was clear: the CCP could initiate disciplinary action against its members but would not entertain outside complaints.

A fascinating chapter on the 'socialist market economy' should set off alarm bells in corporate boardrooms. Xi favours state-owned enterprises, is wary of the private sector and has implemented a raft of measures to extend party control into the decision-making bodies of private companies, local and foreign. According to the authors, Xi will support private enterprises 'only if they prove themselves totally loyal to the Party and willing to serve China's interests as defined by the Party or himself.' The star pupil in this regard is the technology giant Huawei, a cutting-edge but steadfastly loyal business.

The chapter on a 'common destiny for humankind', again, bears careful reading by diplomats and defence specialists. As the authors see it, Xi's ultimate ambition is to restore the system of tianxia (all under heaven), with China as the central power, surrounded by vassal states and operating in a global environment that poses no threat to authoritarianism. Under this Sinocentric world view, divide-and-rule politics, wolf-warrior diplomacy and assertive efforts to undermine the liberal rules-based order can be expected to continue, while peaceful resolution of China's claims on Taiwan seems unlikely.

At the same time, the authors flag elements of hypocrisy. Xi's moves to stamp out corruption and factionalism were presented to the public as designed to reinvigorate the party. But equally clearly, they were intended to eliminate Xi's adversaries and rivals.

Will Xi Jinping's dogma eventually shed its awkward title, be renamed 'Xi Jinping thought' and be proclaimed the state ideology? Since this would put the ambitious Xi unequivocally on a par with chairman Mao, the authors consider it likely. But so far party elders have kept Xi waiting. The issue will be high on China watchers' agenda during the 2027 party congress.

The Political thought of Xi Jinping is one of the first serious efforts to analyse Xi's political doctrine. As such, it is essential reading for anyone wishing to understand the underpinnings of Xi's actions, or to make an informed guess at his next moves.

China Must Cease Collective Punishments Targeting Families of Tibetan Human Rights Defenders

09 May, 2024, TCHRD

In an interview with TCHRD, Namkyi, a 24-year-old former political prisoner, describes making the difficult decision to leave her family, and her daring escape across the border with her childhood friend and cousin sister Tsering Kyi, both of whom arrived in India last summer. Despite the punitive measures imposed by Chinese authorities, it was the suffering of her loved ones that weighed heaviest on her conscience. Namkyi detailed the prevailing culture of fear and oppression, where dissent was stifled and discouraged, leaving individuals like herself isolated in the struggle for justice.

On 21 October 2015, Namkyi, along with her sister, Tenzin Dolma, who were both 15 at the time, staged a peaceful protest carrying two large portraits of His Holiness the Dalai Lama while marching on the 'Martyrs Road' in Ngaba (Ch: Aba) County, Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Sichuan Province. They called for "Freedom in Tibet" and the "Return of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and Kirti Rinpoche to Tibet".

Namkyi with her brother Gendun Phuntsok before her escape

Within 10 minutes a squad of between four and five Chinese Armed Police officers arrived and brought them to a detention centre. Both sisters endured rigorous and relentless interrogations, and experienced severe physical and psychological torment, including prolonged exposure to extreme heat, deprivation of sleep and inadequate food, and solitary confinement, as they awaited sentencing during a one-year pre-trial detention period.

Prior to her sentencing, Namkyi underwent intense political re-education sessions at the detention centre. Authorities frequently told her,

For one hour every week, they were given "political re-education" sessions. These sessions consisted of watching government TV news channels and sitting through lectures on Xi Jinping 'Thought', Chinese language and Chinese laws.

On 23 November 2016, the Trochu County People's Court handed down a three-year prison sentence to Namkyi and Tenzin Dolma, who faced charges of 'inciting separatism' in a closed-door trial. Despite being only 16 years old at the time, the court intentionally raised their age to 18. They were subsequently imprisoned in the Sichuan Province Women's Prison. During the initial three months of their imprisonment they were forced to endure mandatory military style training, 'political re-education', and forced to learn the Chinese constitution. They had to study for, and complete, an oral test on numerous Chinese documents, and underwent training for daily activities as prisoners. They were subjected to excessive hard labour for over 12 hours per day, where they had to make copper wires, cigarette boxes and wristwatches.

They were provided with extremely poor quality food, including watery rice porridge and uncooked meals, which compounded their already weakened physical state, making the rigorous mandatory military training exceptionally difficult. Namkyi recalls that despite requiring medical assistance, it was repeatedly denied.

On 21 October 2018, the sisters were released from prison following the completion of their sentences. However, they continued to be detained at the police station in Ngaba County for a week, as their family were required to submit a pledge letter for their release. Like many other Tibetan political prisoners in Tibet, their identity cards were blacklisted, as well as their family's household registration cards (Ch: Hukou) ; this was due to the involvement of Namkyi, Tenzin Dolma and their brother, Gendun Phuntsok, in political activism. Consequently, they were excluded from government welfare schemes, from which they had previously received a small amount of rice and grains annually. Following their release, heightened surveillance and stringent monitoring severely restricted their ability to move freely and access vital service; they were denied medical examinations in hospitals. Their nieces and nephews also faced administrative obstacles when attempting to enrol in universities, a consequence of the Chinese government's practise of collective punishment. They were largely penalised due to their association with political prisoners, illustrating the unjust repercussions endured by families of Tibetan political prisoners.

In 2015, TCHRD reported the sentencing of Gendun Phuntsok, Nyamki's elder brother, and Lobsang Kelsang, two monks from Kirti monastery, after they participated in a peaceful protest in Ngaba County. The County People's Court in Tashi Ling (Ch: Li) County, Ngaba, sentenced Gendun Phuntsok to four years in prison and Lobsang Kelsang to three and a half years. Despite being 17 years old at the time, Gendun Phuntsok's age was falsely increased to 18 by Chinese authorities.

Gendun Phuntsok, was released from prison in 2019 after serving a four-year sentence; the news of his release only came to light following Namkyi's escape from Tibet. Upon release he was emaciated, and required extensive medical attention for injuries sustained during his imprisonment. Initially treated in Ngaba County, he was later transferred to Chengdu's Municipal People's Hospital, where it was discovered that he had suffered broken ribs and untreated tuberculosis in prison. His family members incurred medical expenses exceeding 10,000 Chinese Yuan, costs which were not covered by the Chinese government. To this day, he continues to endure chronic pain from the rib injuries inflicted during his time in Chinese custody.

Similarly, Lobsang Kelsang, who was sentenced at a similar time, was released in poor health conditions. Despite completing his prison term, he faced an additional six months imprisonment for allegedly reacting negatively to prison guards, which led to a prolonged period spent in harsh conditions in solitary confinement. Upon release his health was severely compromised, and he was on the brink of death. Numerous Tibetan political prisoners have attested to being denied adequate medical attention, a violation of both Chinese law and international standards, including the Convention against Torture, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and the Basic Principles for the Treatment of Prisoners. The deliberate withholding of medical care as a means of further persecution against detainees and prisoners of conscience indicates a tacit endorsement of such practices by the Chinese government, forming a systemic pattern of abuse.

Namkyi, Tenzin Dolma, and Gendun Phuntsok hail from a nomadic family in Chugle Gabma Village, Cha Township, Ngaba County. They are the children of Mrs. Rigkho and Mr. Tragya, also known as Tashi Gyatso. Nyamki fled Tibet to raise awareness about the hardships faced by Tibetans under Chinese oppression, and is urging the international community not to be swayed by the false narratives which are propagated by the Chinese government.

India's Spying Upsurge Can Complicate Security Ties With the West

06 May 2024, The Diplomat, Mohamed Zeeshan

Espionage is standard fare for almost all global powers, but China and India stand out for their specific interests in their country's mammoth diaspora.

China and India might be seen as each other's geopolitical opponents, but last month, they were both at the receiving end of similar exposés in the great global espionage game.

In Britain and Germany, six individuals were arrested on charges of spying for Beijing. Among those arrested were a young aide to a prominent member of the British Parliament, and a German citizen of Chinese descent who worked for a far-right German member of the European Parliament. The accusations, authorities said, involved infiltrating the political establishment and attempting to influence the democratic process.

Meanwhile, in Australia, reports said that a few Indian spies had been removed from the country a few years ago after they were caught trying to steal sensitive defense secrets, obtain classified information on trade, and monitor the Indian diaspora.

Espionage is standard fare for almost all global powers, but China and India stand out for their specific interest in their country's mammoth diaspora. For years, China has spied on its own diaspora through various means. In the initial years, these efforts were largely driven by paranoia following the flight of dissidents as far back as after the Tiananmen Square protests. But in more recent years, Beijing has also cultivated neo-nationalist diaspora elements to do much more than merely spy on Chinese dissidents; members of the Chinese diaspora have been caught trying to infiltrate Western institutions and pilfer trade secrets, influence political decision-making, and obtain sensitive defense technology.

New Delhi is increasingly watching and learning.

India has long been dismayed that in the great power game, its economic influence is sorely lacking. In the last four decades, China has built an extraordinary trade footprint covering much of the world. In 2001, when China first acceded to the World Trade Organization, over 80 percent of countries for whom data was available counted the U.S. as a larger trade partner than China. By 2018, the tables had flipped: two-thirds of the world was trading more with China than with the U.S. that year, according to Australia's Lowy Institute.

In 2022, China accounted for over 14 percent of the world's total export in goods. India's share was less than 2 percent.

Under Prime Minister Narendra Modi, India has made a strong rhetorical push to correct this disparity. But India's weak integration in terms of trade and investment agreements, its relatively poor labor productivity, and continued infrastructure problems have kept that gulf wide. Instead, Modi made an intelligent calculation early on that India had to rely on a different, more potent asset to grow its global influence: its vast, highly-skilled, and politically influential diaspora.

Indians abroad make up the largest diaspora group in history: some 18 million people, according to the United Nations. Each year, they send back record sums of money in remittances — as much as $125 billion in 2023 alone. They are also among the highest income-earning groups across much of the West, and occupy positions of high power across politics, business and the arts.

Very early in his term, Modi attempted to connect with the diaspora in ways that none of his predecessors had done — holding massive rally-like events in New York, Sydney, and elsewhere. That was at the time a conscious foreign policy effort. In 2015, Ram Madhav, then the general secretary of Modi's Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), explained: "[The diaspora] can be India's voice even while being loyal citizens in those countries. That is the long-term goal behind diaspora diplomacy. It is like the way the Jewish community looks out for Israel's interests in the United States."

Yet, as Hindu nationalism came to dominate the BJP's politics at home, the diaspora abroad became increasingly fragmented and incoherent. A 2020 survey of Indian Americans by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace found that as much as 69 percent of Hindus in the United States approve of Modi's performance as prime minister. Yet, only 20 percent of Muslims and 34 percent of Christians did.

Democrats in the survey were also less likely to approve of Modi and the BJP than Republicans, and that has also borne out on Capitol Hill. When Modi visited Washington for a state visit last year, a handful of progressive Democrats publicly protested and vowed to boycott his speech. Another group of lawmakers — led by Indian American Representative Pramila Jayapal — signed a public letter, pushing President Joe Biden to raise human rights issues with Modi.

In more recent times, New Delhi has found itself at odds with Sikhs in the West. That fault line has resulted in accusations in Canada and the U.S. that agents of the Modi government were involved in plotting and executing the assassination of Sikh separatist leaders.

These tensions are unlikely to go away easily. Both China and India see their diaspora as an extension of their own national security. Scuffles with dissidents at home engender scuffles with dissidents in the West. So far, the West's response to India has been starkly different from its response to China, but it also faces a different challenge. For years, Europe and Australia continued to seek economic cooperation with China despite these tensions. But those ties have since come crashing down after Beijing sought to leverage its trade profile to coerce the European Union and Australia.

With India, the West has sought to strengthen security ties, in large part to cultivate an ally that can counterbalance China in the Indo-Pacific. Those ties have involved not only the transfer of advanced defense technology, but also intelligence-sharing, training, and joint operations.

But can such security cooperation run in tandem with New Delhi's desire to expand its espionage operations in the West or monitor dissidents abroad? If the U.S. and its allies sense a risk that India may leverage its role in these information networks for purposes that aren't mutually acceptable, it may jeopardize India's security ties with the West.

What China is signaling by renaming regions

05 May 2024, Taipei Times, Khendroob Thondup

In the intricate ballet of geopolitics, names signify more than mere identification: They embody history, culture and sovereignty. The recent decision by China to refer to Arunachal Pradesh as "Tsang Nan" or South Tibet, and to rename Tibet as "Xizang," is a strategic move that extends beyond cartography into the realm of diplomatic signaling.

This op-ed explores the implications of these actions and India's potential response.

Names are potent symbols in international relations, encapsulating the essence of a nation's stance on territorial disputes.

China's choice to rename regions within Indian territory is not merely a linguistic exercise, but a symbolic assertion of sovereignty.

Such actions are provocative, touching upon the sensitive chords of territorial integrity and national identity.

India's response, maintaining the use of the name "Tibet," is a reaffirmation of historical and cultural recognition.

By doing so, India not only challenges China's unilateral renaming, but also underscores its commitment to respecting the historical context of the region.

This stance is significant, as it reflects India's adherence to global norms and understanding, despite China's attempts to reshape international perceptions.

The term "Sinicization" denotes the process by which non-Chinese societies are influenced to adopt Chinese cultural, linguistic and societal norms.

In Tibet's case, this process is a deliberate effort by the Chinese government to integrate Tibetan culture into the broader Chinese cultural framework.

The renaming of Tibet to "Xizang" is a facet of these Sinicization efforts, aiming to solidify China's rule and dilute the Dalai Lama's influence and the global recognition of the Tibetan cause.

The international community, including governments and organizations, often weighs the historical and cultural context heavily when referring to regions.

Despite China's renaming efforts, many continue to use the term "Tibet," aligning with the established global understanding.

This collective stance is crucial, as it supports the cultural and religious identity of the Tibetan people against the tide of Sinicization.

The Indian government has firmly rejected China's attempts to rename places in Arunachal Pradesh, emphasizing that such actions do not alter the state's status as an integral part of India.

This rejection is a clear message to China and the international community that India stands firm on its territorial sovereignty.

India's potential reciprocation, refusing to accept the name "Xizang" and instead using "Tibet," is a powerful diplomatic gesture.

It is a declaration that India does not recognize the Sinicization of Tibet and supports the region's historical and cultural identity as they are known internationally.

The naming dispute between India and China over Tibet and Arunachal Pradesh is more than a war of words: It is a reflection of deeper geopolitical tensions and the struggle for cultural preservation.

India's stance, rooted in historical recognition and international law, serves as a bulwark against attempts to rewrite history and infringe upon rights of sovereignty.

As the situation evolves, the international community's role in upholding these principles becomes ever more critical, ensuring that names – and the identities they represent – remain respected on the global stage.

Opinion | China Is Revamping Its Military, And India Must Not Take It Lightly

02 May 2024, NDTV, Harsh V. Pant

While India continues to be absorbed in its long-drawn elections, the rest of the world is moving ahead with its own priorities. Last week, Chinese President Xi Jinping undertook a comprehensive restructuring of his country's armed forces when he made a surprising decision to dissolve the Strategic Support Force (SSF), a military division he established in 2015 to merge various capabilities of the People's Liberation Army (PLA), including space, cyber, electronic, and psychological warfare.

In its stead, Xi introduced the Information Support Force, which he described as "a fresh strategic component of the PLA and a crucial support for the coordinated advancement and utilisation of the network information system". As a result of this revised framework, the PLA now comprises four primary branches: the ground forces, naval forces, air forces, and the rocket forces. Additionally, there are now four auxiliary units: three divisions derived from the SSF, and the Joint Logistic Support Force.

Harnessing AI And Emerging Tech

While Xi himself underscored the importance of the move in enabling the Chinese military to effectively "engage and triumph in contemporary warfare", his extensive anti-corruption campaign within the PLA last year precipitated this restructuring. It implicated influential generals and caused significant disruption within the rocket force, a prestigious division responsible for managing China's rapidly expanding cache of nuclear and ballistic missiles. The restructuring strengthens Xi's direct oversight of the PLA's strategic capacities and emphasises China's aspirations to proficiently harness Artificial Intelligence and other emerging technologies in anticipation of what it terms the "intelligentised warfare" of tomorrow.

And this is critical for China as it continues to push its military to adapt to the changing strategic realities and the rapidly evolving nature of contemporary warfare. Over the past decade, Beijing has pursued a comprehensive modernisation of its military capabilities, aiming to transform the PLA into a formidable force capable of safeguarding its interests regionally and globally. This modernisation drive has encompassed various aspects, including technological advancement, organisational reform, and doctrinal evolution.

Preparing For Modern Warfare

One of the focal points of China's military modernisation has been the development and acquisition of advanced weaponry and equipment. This includes the enhancement of its naval capabilities with the commissioning of aircraft carriers, modernisation of its air force with next-generation fighter jets, and bolstering its missile forces with advanced ballistic and cruise missiles. Additionally, China has invested heavily in cyber and space capabilities, recognising their importance in modern warfare.

Moreover, organisational reforms have been instituted to streamline command structures, improve joint operations, and enhance the overall efficiency and effectiveness of the PLA. These reforms have included the establishment of new commands and theatre commands, as well as efforts to professionalise and modernise the military personnel. It goes without saying that China's military modernisation poses several significant consequences for India, both in terms of security dynamics and strategic calculations. Its enhanced military capabilities, particularly in areas such as naval expansion, missile development, and cyber warfare, could potentially tilt the balance of power in the region, thereby altering the strategic landscape vis-à-vis India. The military modernisation seems to have already emboldened Beijing to assert its territorial claims more strongly, potentially heightening the risk of border skirmishes and military confrontations between the two countries. This has exacerbated existing tensions and destabilised the region.

Why India Should Pay Attention

Furthermore, China's growing military prowess has implications for India's defence planning and security posture. New Delhi is compelled to invest more resources in its own military modernisation efforts to maintain a credible deterrent against potential Chinese aggression, which may require diverting resources away from other development priorities.

Over the last decade, India has embarked on a series of defence reforms aimed at modernising and enhancing the efficiency of its armed forces. One significant reform has been the promotion of indigenous defence manufacturing through initiatives like the "Make in India" programme. This initiative seeks to encourage domestic production of defence equipment, reducing reliance on imports and bolstering India's self-reliance in defence capabilities.

The 'Make In India' Initiative

Additionally, there has been a focus on streamlining defence procurement processes to expedite the acquisition of critical military hardware and technology. Measures such as the Defense Acquisition Procedure (DAP) and the Strategic Partnership Model aim to facilitate smoother procurement processes and encourage private sector participation in defence production. There have also been efforts to enhance defence infrastructure along India's borders, particularly in border areas with China.

This includes the development of roads, airfields, and other infrastructure to improve mobility and logistical support for the armed forces. Moreover, there has been an emphasis on promoting jointness and integration among the three branches of the Indian armed forces - the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force - to enhance operational synergy and effectiveness.

And yet there is a need for quicker reforms and broader restructuring. Indian debate on theatre commands is still in limbo, and rationalisation of the human resources and technology ratio is still at a nascent stage. China's recent moves are a wake-up call. Making Indian armed forces fit to fight 21st-century wars should be the topmost priority for any government that takes office in June.

India is starting to split in two parts, What's Next?

01 May 2024, Ground Report, Wahid Bhat

Recent studies at the American Geophysical Union conference propose a seismic shift in India's geology. Rather than a sideways split, seismic data hints at a horizontal division in the Indian Continental Plate.

A recent study suggests that India's geological landscape is undergoing significant transformation, with indications that the Indian Continental Plate might be undergoing a horizontal split rather than a conventional sideways separation.

The analysis of seismic data gathered from southern Tibet, coupled with a reevaluation of previous research, has unveiled a striking portrayal of the immense geological forces at play beneath the Himalayas.

Seismic data reveals Himalayan geological forces. Presenting at the American Geophysical Union conference in San Francisco last December, researchers from institutions in the US and China unveiled findings suggesting a unique disintegration process within the Indian continental plate. As it interacts with the basement of the Eurasian tectonic plate, situated above it, the Indian plate undergoes a transformative process.

Contrary to prevailing models explaining the elevation of the Tibetan plateau and the formation of the Himalayan mountain range, this discovery offers a surprising compromise. Traditionally, these phenomena were attributed to a collision between the Indian and Eurasian crustal fragments. This collision, dating back approximately 60 million years, involved the Indian plate subducting beneath its northern neighbour, propelled by currents of molten rock within the mantle.

Scientists propose that the split is occurring in layers rather than the plate breaking into two distinct pieces. The formation of the Tibetan Plateau has sparked considerable debate within the scientific community regarding its underlying causes.

According to a January 2024 study, the Indian tectonic plate is splitting into two layers, each about 100 kilometres (60 miles) thick, as it moves towards the Eurasian plate. This process, known as "delamination", is causing the landmass to decrease by 2 millimetres per year.

The study suggests that the plate is separating into higher and lower layers, with the elevated section contributing to Tibet's high peaks and the lower part submerging into the Earth's mantle.

India's plate undergoes horizontal split

A recent study suggests that India's geological landscape is undergoing significant transformation, with indications that the Indian Continental Plate might be undergoing a horizontal split rather than a conventional sideways separation. Scientists propose that the split is occurring in layers rather than the plate breaking into two distinct pieces.

"Levels of helium present in the Tibetan springs led us to draw our arguments," explained Simon Klemperer of Stanford University and co-authors on the study. "Our research revealed a pattern suggesting that the mantle was close enough to the Earth's surface for the rare helium-3 to emerge through the springs in northern Tibet," they added.

"In southern Tibet, the prevalence of Helium-4 indicates that the plate has not yet split there," stated Professor Douwe van Hinsbergen of Utrecht University in an interview with Science Magazine. Reflecting on the concept, he added,

"We didn't know continents could behave this way and that is, for solid earth science, pretty fundamental," Professor Douwe van Hinsbergen, who is not an author of the study said.

Research into the density of the mantle and crust indicates that the buoyant Indian continental plate should not sink easily, suggesting that submerged sections of the crust likely continue to grind along under the Eurasian plate rather than plunging into the depths of the mantle.

Indian plate distorts; land wrinkles, folds

Another theory proposes that the Indian plate may be undergoing distortion, causing some areas to wrinkle and fold while others dip and dive.

Diverse interpretations arise depending on the favoured evidence and data processing methods. In a study led by geophysicist Lin Liu from the Ocean University of China, researchers collected 'up-and-down' S-wave and shear-wave splitting data from 94 broadband seismic stations spanning southern Tibet. This data, combined with previously gathered 'back-and-forth' P-wave data, yielded a more nuanced understanding of the underlying dynamics.

Fabio Capitanio, a geodynamicist at Monash University, underscores the uncertainties surrounding the process, noting the limited data available. 'It's just a snapshot,' he remarks. However, Capitanio acknowledges the significance of the research as a crucial step toward understanding the formation of our modern landscape. 'It's the type of work that we need to move [forward],' he asserts.

Professor Douwe van Hinsbergen, who highlights the novelty of the findings said, 'This is the first time that ... it's been caught in the act in a downgoing plate.' Scientists have long theorized about the possibility of tectonic plates unzipping, driven by the layered composition of buoyant crust and denser upper mantle rock.

Such a split occurs along the weak interface between these layers, a phenomenon previously studied in the interiors of thick continental plates and simulated in computer models.

Earthquake risks tied to ancient collisions

A more recent analysis, based on a different set of earthquake waves, indicates a tear along the western edge of the delaminated slab. According to Anne Meltzer, a seismologist at Lehigh University, almost every landmass on Earth, including the Himalayas, was formed from similar collisions. Understanding these collisions not only illuminates our current landscape but also helps us grasp the earthquake risks along ancient continental scars.

The study's implications are profound, extending beyond mountain formation to earthquake prediction. By gaining a clearer 3D insight into tectonic plate interactions, scientists can enhance understanding of Earth's surface changes and potentially improve seismic event forecasts.

Celal Sengor, a professor of geological engineering at Istanbul Technical University, who was not involved in this research, remarks, "India was going far too fast after it parted company with Africa-Madagascar and Australia. ... Its speed northward, concerning the rest of Eurasia, was faster than any plate motion we know today, or have inferred in the past across a single plate boundary. This paper not only has changed some of our ideas on the paleotectonics and paleogeography of the neo-Tethys but has given us a new model about what double subductions can do."

Competition and conflict: On the U.S.-China relationship

01 May 2024, The Hindu

U.S. and China must manage their differences responsibly

U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken's marathon talks with top officials in China, which includes President Xi Jinping, have underscored the desire of the two countries to stabilise their relationship and the resultant challenges. Mr. Blinken stressed that the U.S. would make sure that the competition between the world's two largest economies "doesn't veer into conflict". Mr. Xi said they should seek common ground "rather than engage in vicious competition". But the Blinken visit also exposed the structural fault lines in the Sino-American competition. He raised America's concerns about what he called China's "support for Russia's defence industry" and threatened actions if Beijing "doesn't address this problem". China slammed the "hypocrisy and irresponsibility" of the U.S., which just decided to send military aid worth $61 billion to Ukraine and then made "groundless accusations" against normal economic and trade exchanges between China and Russia. China also attacked the U.S. policy towards Taiwan and the South China Sea and urged Washington to look at China's development "in a positive light".

Both the U.S. and China have mutual deep misgivings. U.S. National Defence Strategy documents name China as a "revisionist power" and a pacing technological and military challenger. The U.S. has imposed export controls to limit China's growth in strategic sectors, particularly semiconductors, and imposed high tariffs on Chinese goods. It has also doubled down on its support for Taiwan and bolstered defence cooperation with the Philippines, which has disputes with China in the South China Sea. Beijing has blamed the U.S. for South China Sea tensions and called Washington's support for Taiwan as an intervention in its internal affairs. While it is practically impossible to reset ties given these structural challenges, there are areas of cooperation as well. In November 2023, when Presidents Xi and Biden met in California, both sides decided to resume bilateral military-to-military communication, cooperate in addressing the risks of artificial intelligence and launch efforts to control the production of fentanyl. Tackling climate change and global food security are also areas of cooperation. A key lesson from the Cold War is that if competition between superpowers turns ugly, it could affect the world through proxy conflicts, economic wars and diplomatic crises. As the two most powerful countries, they should stay away from repeating history. Even if they are not able to resolve their ideological and geopolitical differences, they should build the guardrails that could prevent the competition from turning ugly and stay focused on the areas of cooperation, addressing the common challenges of the world.

Where is the Panchen Lama? Will the CCP manipulate the Dalai Lama's Reincarnation?

01 May 2024, Tibet Policy Institute

On January 28, 1989, the 10th Panchen Lama (strangely) passed away at the Tashilhunpo Monastery in Shigatse. On May 14, 1995, His Holiness the Dalai Lama recognized Gedhun Choekyi Nyima as the 11th Panchen Lama. However, three days later, six-year-old Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, along with his family, was secretly abducted by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), and their whereabouts remain unknown to this day.

Ye Xiaowen, then head of the CCP's Religious Affairs Bureau, once told Agya Rinpoche that, after the Dalai Lama announced the spirit child, the situation was really tense. They acted immediately, borrowed three airplanes from the Politburo Standing Committee, and hid the three spirit children in three separate locations, without anyone knowing.

The CCP indeed concealed their whereabouts very effectively so that no one would find them. Gedhun Choekyi Nyima has been missing since May 17, 1995, for 29 years now, and his fate remains a mystery. This year 2024, April 25 marked Gedhun Choekyi Nyima's 35th birthday.

Despite continuous international pressure to disclose the whereabouts of the Panchen Lama, the CCP maintains its stance, insisting that the so-called "reincarnated Panchen Lama" is simply an ordinary Chinese citizen leading a normal life. They claim that he and his family do not wish to be disturbed by the outside world.

One might wonder, what kind of "ordinary citizen" requires the entire might of a country to shield them from any outside interference? Not only have they been shielded, but all traces of his family, including his parents, have vanished without a trace, to such an extent that it sends chills down one's spine!

The Origins of the Reincarnation System of the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama.

65 years ago, His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama fled Tibet in 1959. But why, in 1995, did the Dalai Lama in India endorse the reincarnation of the Panchen Lama? To understand this, we must delve into the origins of the reincarnation system between the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama.

In the 14th century A.D., Gendun Chupa, the first Dalai Lama and a disciple of Tsongkhapa, the founder of the Gelugpa school, established the Tashilhunpo Monastery. Through scholarly debates, he defeated the foreigners who challenged him from India and thus, earned the title "Panchen Dakshinpo," meaning the Great Wise One, abbreviated as the Panchen Lama. This marked the origin of the title "Panchen." Gendun Chupa served as the first Dharm seat of Tashilhunpo Monastery, and "Panchen" became an exclusive title for the abbots of the monastery. After several successions, in the early 17th century, Lobsang Choegyal, a monk from Wensa Monastery, became the Zashlun Monastery Panchen.

In 1642, the Fifth Dalai Lama established the Gandenphodang regime, and the Dalai Lama system, rooted in the Gelugpa school, became the paramount authority in Tibetan politics and religion. Lobsang Chökyi, a revered teacher of the Fifth Dalai Lama, traced his lineage back to Khedrup Györgyi, another disciple of Tsongkhapa. Consequently, "Panchen" became an exclusive title for the abbots of Tashilhunpo Monastery, and the monastery became the permanent seat of the Panchen Lama.

Henceforth, the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama were referred to as "Gyawa Yabsai," which translates to "King of Buddha Teacher and Disciple." Tibetans often say, "the sky has the sun and the moon, the earth has the Buddha king, master, and disciple."

According to the highest reincarnation tradition of the Tsongkhapa Gelugpa Dharma lineage, when either the Dalai Lama or the Panchen Lama passes away, a search is conducted for the reincarnation of the deceased. If the living person is too young, or both the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama have passed away, the responsibility of finding the reincarnation falls upon the highest-ranking living monks. This custom has been established over a long history but was not always a requirement.

For instance, when the 14th Dalai Lama recognized a Lama from Sera Monastery as his reincarnation, the search group confirmed his identity immediately, without additional procedures. Similarly, after the passing of the Ninth Panchen Lama in 1937, the Kashag (Cabinet) and Dzong Rinpoche issued an order to find the reincarnation of the Tenth Panchen Lama through divination.

From a secular perspective, the Panchen Lama system is an extension of the Dalai Lama's reincarnation system. Without the Dalai Lama's position as the leader of Tibetan politics and religion, the Panchen Lama system would not have evolved.

The Chinese Communist Party abolishes the Dalai Lama's certified spiritual child and decides to draw lots from a golden bottle.

The Chinese Communist Party (CPC) reacted strongly to the Dalai Lama's certification of the Panchen Lama's reincarnation. They announced the abolition of this certification and decided to select a Panchen Lama who met their criteria by drawing lots from a golden vase.

On November 29, 1995, the CCP conducted a "golden vase lottery" at Dazhao Monastery in Lhasa, selecting Panchen Norbu. Both of Khensen Norbu's parents were members of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), which prohibits its members and their families from practicing religion. However, the Khensen Norbu family enjoyed certain privileges. The CCP was well aware that finding the reincarnation of the Panchen Lama would likely involve cooperation with the Dalai Lama. During a meeting of the panel responsible for selecting the reincarnated Panchen Lama, Yan Mingfu, then head of the Central United Front Work Department, and Luo Gan, Secretary General of the State Council, expressed their willingness to "communicate with the Dalai Lama" and even "adopt the Dalai Lama's views."

Gyalwa Dhondup, the Dalai Lama's second brother, wrote in his memoir "The Maker of the Kalundu" that Deng Xiaoping wanted the Dalai Lama to personally preside over the Panchen Lama's farewell ceremony after his passing. The authorities may have wanted to emphasize this point to increase the legitimacy of the Panchen's reincarnation.

According to Gyalwa Dhondup, during his visit to Beijing in 1994, a representative of the Panchen Lama's search team visited him, asking him to deliver a gift from the Dalai Lama and a letter from Chaza Rinpoche.

Why then did the CCP react so strongly when the Dalai Lama announced the reincarnation of the Panchen Lama? The atheist CCP, involved in Tibetan religious affairs, not only claimed the authority over reincarnation, which is traditionally outside its jurisdiction, but also detained Chagzar Rinpoche, who was originally appointed by the authorities as the deputy head of the Panchen Reincarnation Search Leading Group.

The CCP's sudden change in attitude can be best understood through Jiang Zemin, the then president of the CCP, who issued the directive that led to the "golden vase lottery" maneuver.

The Tibetan monk who was [exasperated] by the golden vase stick-withdrawal – Agya Rinpoche

In 1998, Agya Rinpoche, departed from the United States. In his autobiography, "Against All Odds," Rinpoche reveals that the Golden Bottle Lottery held at the Dazhao Monastery in Lhasa during the night of 1995 was the final catalyst for his departure.

Who is Agya Lobsang Tubdan Rinpoche? He was recognized at the age of two by the 10th Panchen Lama as the 8th Agya Rinpoche, was one of the abbots of Kubum Monastery. Kubum Monastery, the birthplace of Tsongkhapa, the founder of the Gelugpa school, holds a significant place in Tibetan Buddhism. Agya Rinpoche is considered the reincarnation of Tsongkhapa's father, which bestows upon him a highly revered status.

Before his departure in 1998, the CCP appointed Rinpoche as the president of the China Buddhist Association and a member of the Standing Committee of the Central Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC). Rinpoche was also the sutra teacher of the Panchen Gyaltsen Norbu, originally favored by the CCP. Ngagyar Rinpoche had personally witnessed the CCP's manipulation of the reincarnation of the Panchen Lama.

In "Against the Wind and the Water," Agya Rinpoche writes, "I was not surprised that the Dalai Lama announced the reincarnation of the 10th Panchen Master; it was the attitude from above that surprised me."

In 1992, there was full cooperation between His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Chinese Communist Party. On September 27 of that year, two months after the Dalai Lama's announcement of the 17th Karmapa, the Chinese government recognized Ogyen Trinley Dorje as the reincarnation of the Karmapa. This led Tibetans to anticipate that the reincarnation of the Panchen Lama would follow a similar authentication process, fostering good cooperation between the CCP and the Dalai Lama.

On November 28, 1995, Agya Rinpoche and others were transported to Lhasa by a special CCP plane. On the night of the 29th, at around 2:00 a.m., the Golden Vase Lottery was held at the Da Zhao Monastery amidst a heavy military and police presence. The entire city of Lhasa was under a state of near-martial law. Agya Rinpoche exclaimed, "If the Golden Vase ceremony is so grand, why is there such a politically charged atmosphere?"

Rinpoche observed the entire process of the Golden Vase lottery at the Da Zhao Monastery and later wrote in his autobiography, "I expected the person to shake the vase until a sign emerged, but to my surprise, he merely touched the three signs briefly. Then, he selected one and handed it to the Central Special Envoy, Luo Gan, who nodded in approval. The Bohol Living Buddha then handed the sign to Jiangchun Lobu, who loudly declared Kyanzan Norbu of Gyari County as the winner."

Jiangcun Luobu announced that "Gyentse Norbu won the lottery." The names Jiangcun Luobu and Gyentse Norbu are written the same way in Tibetan, which later became a topic of conversation among Tibetans, teasing the Chinese Communist Party for the apparent manipulation of the Panchen Lama reincarnation.

During the plane ride back to Beijing, Ye Xiaowen, then director of the CCP's Religious Affairs Bureau, candidly informed Agya Rinpoche and Jamyang Rinpoche, "It's just a formality. We filled it with a bit of cotton. Did you notice the signboard was slightly raised? We placed some cotton in the signboard bag to ensure it was slightly higher in the bottle, thus ensuring the chosen spiritual child would be the one we wanted."

The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) uses the golden vase as a tool to manipulate the reincarnation of Tibetan monks.

Following the establishment of the Ganden Phojang regime in Tibet in 1642 and the Manchu Qing Empire in 1644, a relationship between the two sides was established. As a patron of the Gelugpa school of Tibetan Buddhism, in 1792, the Qianlong Emperor, suspecting misuse of the Tibetan reincarnation certification system for personal gain, sent a golden vase to be used in drawing lots for certifying the reincarnation of senior monks.

In China, drawing lots from a golden vase is equivalent to divination in monasteries and Taoist temples. In Tibet, a similar form of divination, dowsing, was originally practiced. The candidate's name is written on a slip of paper, wrapped in dough, and placed in a vessel. The vessel is then shaken to make the dough jump out, revealing the chosen individual. Thus, for Tibetans, the golden vase is not an exotic system but a substitute tool for traditional divination practices, catering to Tibetan culture and aesthetics.

Tibetan Buddhism recognizes the reincarnation of monks through various methods. The first is the reincarnation of the undead, where monks directly identify their reincarnation. The second is the reincarnation of a child with deep memories of their previous life, such as the Second and Fourteenth Dalai Lamas. The Fourteenth Dalai Lama recognized the lamas of Sera Monastery who came to find him, and the Dharma vessels of his previous life before being certified. The search party confirmed his identity as the Dalai Lama without further procedures. The third type involves a child leaving a prophecy or will in their previous life, as seen in the Karmapa reincarnation system. The fourth type occurs when a child lacks memories or a prophecy from their previous life. Tibetan monks and Dharma protectors divine to identify the reincarnated child. Other forms of divination, such as using three oranges, as done by the 13th Dalai Lama to find the 9th Panchen Lama, have also been practiced. Therefore, the golden vase divination, as a substitute for traditional divination, is considered the least preferred option and is not mandatory.

In the case of CCP authorities, they tamper with the process by placing cotton in the bag, ensuring that the sign they want to choose is slightly higher in the bottle. Instead of allowing the sign to jump out naturally, they directly select the pre-determined sign from the golden vase. Learning from the feudal empire's practices, CCP officials use the so-called "golden vase" to assert control over the reincarnation system of Tibetan Buddhist monks, satisfying their desire for power and emulating imperial practices.

In 2007, the CCP government introduced the "Methods for Managing the Reincarnation of Living Buddhas in Tibetan Buddhism" claiming complete authority over reincarnation. According to this policy, without the Communist Party, there would be no recognition of reincarnated lamas. Only those approved and permitted by the CCP can be reincarnated, while dissenters are denied reincarnation. The Party asserts its supremacy over religion, allowing only those who pledge allegiance to the Party to have any freedom, while those who resist are suppressed.

For Tibetans, finding the reincarnation of a high lama is a significant endeavor, requiring the identification of a genuine reincarnated child, which is no small task. However, for CCP officials, a reincarnated child is merely a child, and any child will suffice. The CCP seeks a puppet Panchen Lama that it can manipulate, hence the selection of Khensang Norbu, whose parents are both members of the CCP, making him easier for the authorities to control.

In recent years, the CCP has organized the "Tibetan Buddhism Living Buddha Reincarnation Exhibition" in Tibet and conducted tens of thousands of lectures in Tibetan communities, colleges, and monasteries. These events assert the CCP's authority over reincarnation, promoting the "golden vase sign" as the most authoritative method. The CCP has also implemented the "Ten Prohibitions" in Tibet, explicitly stating its refusal to allow any unauthorized activities related to the death of the Dalai Lama. It is evident that the CCP has made extensive preparations.

By trampling on Tibetan religious traditions and defying the international community, the CCP has manipulated the reincarnation of the Panchen Lama, using Gyentse Norbu as a political tool to indoctrinate Tibetans. The question of whether the authorities can continue to manipulate the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama to achieve their goal of completely eradicating Tibetan culture, and how to prevent such a plot, has become the most pressing challenge of our time.

PS: This is a roughly translated version of an article originally written in Chinese by the author -Phenthok. For any unclarity with the translation, please refer to the original article written in Chinese and published by Beijing Spring.

Can Nepal get a lift from wooing by India and China to become a middle-income economy?

01 May 2024, SCMP

Nepal has drawn considerable foreign investment in recent years as it aims to become a middle-income country but its "dysfunctional" politics may curb its ambition amid strategic jostling between India and China, according to economists.

During a two-day investment summit in Kathmandu that concluded on Monday, representatives of India and China vied to draw closer to Nepal and strengthen their country's economic footprint in South Asia.

Potential investors pledged during the summit to inject as much as 9.13 billion Nepali rupees (US$68.3 million) into the country, which is still navigating its transition from a centralised monarchy to a federal democratic republic under its 2015 Constitution, as well as an economic transformation from being less reliant on international aid to becoming a hub for global investments.

"Our unwavering commitment to liberal economic policies lays the foundation for a vibrant and investor-friendly business environment," said Nepal Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal.

"Nepal's strategic location, situated between emerging markets India and China, signifies it as an ideal investment destination," he told the summit during its opening on Sunday.

While India and China did not directly compete with each other to invest in the projects offered at the summit, their overlapping interests could be seen in the resulting deals that were announced.

Unsurprisingly, delegates from India and China formed the largest contingent among the 2,400 representatives from various countries who attended the summit. While India sent about 150 participants, China's delegation was twice as large.

At the summit's opening on Sunday, Beijing announced the exemption of visa fees for Nepali travellers starting on May 1. This is in addition to the start of commercial flights from two international airports in the Nepali cities of Pokhara and Lumbini.

The airports were built with Chinese funding totalling hundreds of millions of dollars. In contrast, India has hesitated to open up air routes to Nepal due to the two airports' link to Beijing's Belt and Road Initiative. "Air and road links and border checkpoints are progressing well. Feasibility studies of the cross-border railway and cross-border transmission lines are moving forward. That's why today's summit holds a very special significance," said Luo Zhaohui, chairman of the state-run China International Development Cooperation Agency, during his address at the event.

Piyush Goyal, India's federal minister for commerce and industry, said in a speech at the event via a video call: "We will continue to expand our trading and business relationship. I urge Indian investors across the globe to invest in Nepal, to seize the opportunity, and become a part of emerging Nepal."

Tapping hydropower potential

Landlocked Nepal has been wooing foreign investors, primarily from its neighbours, in various sectors, particularly hydropower.

The impoverished South Asian country is home to eight of the world's largest mountain peaks, with dozens of rivers flowing from them, offering immense potential for harnessing hydropower.

While the country currently produces 3,200MW of hydropower, multiple large-scale projects with a combined capacity of 5,568MW are in the pipeline. India is heavily invested in Nepal's hydropower projects, while China is seeking to gain a foothold in the sector.

However, the Nepali government is hesitant to accept Chinese investment in hydropower due to concerns that India and Bangladesh – the only two markets for the electricity generated – may be reluctant to purchase power from China-linked projects, according to economists.

"From the Chinese side, there is considerable interest in hydropower and related projects. From the Indian side, buying energy for Chinese-invested projects is hesitant. Chinese investors will have a tough time selling this energy generation," said Jaya Jung Mahat, a policy economist with the Nepali Institute of Policy Research.

"Transporting energy to Chinese territories is challenging due to the high mountains between the countries. It's easier for Indian investors and the [Delhi] government can facilitate the purchase," Mahat added.

Stifling bureaucracy

Nepal's transition from a low-income nation to a middle-income nation can only succeed with the help of India and China, economists say.

"Nepal is transitioning from being a recipient of aid and development help to attracting investments. All countries are substituting aid with trade and investment," said Sujeeva Shakya, founder-chair of Nepal Economic Forum, a Kathmandu-based economic policy and research institution.

"We need US$7 billion-US$8 billion [in the coming years] to grow our economy at an accelerated pace.

We have 600,000 people entering the job market. Wherever the investment comes from, it doesn't make any difference," Shakya said.

Critics question, however, whether events like the summit can help improve Nepal's economic outlook unless its government undertakes measures to improve the country's political stability, cut red tape and develop a robust bureaucratic framework.

"The leadership, governance system, and population are divided along political party lines and have become toxic and dysfunctional," said Kedar Neupane, an economist at the Nepal Policy Institute think tank.

The country's leadership should address bureaucratic and policy hurdles to entice foreign investors, Neupane said.

"Successive governments in Nepal have failed to see things from a realistic economic perspective due to political divisions.

"This summit may not deliver significant new investments beyond some pledges ... other than serving as self-amusement for the organisers."

In response to the criticisms, Investment Board Nepal CEO Sushil Bhatta said the government was determined to tackle the difficulties that companies faced in doing business in the country, citing the recent introduction of new laws to remove investment bottlenecks.

He said: "The higher political leadership has expressed commitment for continued reforms in the investment regime

April

How Xi Jinping is consolidating his power by revamping Chinese military

30 April 2024, First Post

The turmoil in the organisational structure of China's military continues. The latest is the disbandment of one of the main forces that was formed less than a decade ago. On April 19, the PLA Strategic Support Force (PLASSF) was disbanded and three new forces were formed, viz, the Information Support Force (ISF), the Aerospace Force, and the Cyberspace Force, with the already established Joint Logistics Support Force forming the 'fourth arm'. The PLA is thus now reconfigured as "four services [army, navy, air force, and rocket forces] and four arms [ISF, aerospace, cyberspace, and joint logistics]"

Turmoil in the nearly 97-year-old China's military is not unknown, however. As it brought the Communist Party into power in 1949, the Red Army turned into the People's Liberation Army (PLA), which is identified as the Communist Party's wing but known to bargain hard for privileges, defence budgets, representation, and participation in the decision-making bodies of the country.

Given its value as the "protector" of the party, the PLA sometimes showed its teeth or even threatened to slow down. In mid-1960s, it exhibited shantouzhu (mountain-topism)—sitting on the top of the mountain and out of the reach of the party's control mechanisms—in other words, becoming "independent".

In other times, it demanded its pound of flesh by filling up positions for the children of the Generals. Increasingly, it demanded higher defence allocations, specifically since the 1990s, making it the second largest spender in the world.

China's Communist Party is aware of the PLA's praetorian demands, leading to its gradual loss of power. Hence, the party has struck back periodically to keep the military confined to the barracks and assert its "absolute power".

Mao Zedong disbanded ranks and military grades in the mid-1960s. Deng Xiaoping accused the PLA of being "bloated, lax, and undisciplined" in 1979 and launched a programme for reorganising towards a "lean and mean" armed force. Deng disbanded over a million troops in the process, including Maoist elements.

Xi Jinping dismissed or even arrested several thousands of officers and soldiers in the name of curbing corruption, netting Jiang Zemin's proteges like Guo Boxiang, Xu Caihou, and others. Last year, China's defence minister, Li Shangfu, disappeared from public view, only to be replaced after several months by Deng Jun.

Rocket forces commander Li Yuchao, its commissar Xu Zhongbo, and its deputies Zhang Zhengzhong and Liu Guangbin as well were shown the door. PLASSF commander Ju Qiansheng went missing. The Aerospace department's officials, Liu Shiquan, Wu Yansheng, and Wang Changqing, were dismissed. Rampant corruption and dereliction of duty in PLA forces were seen as a threat to the civilian leadership under Xi and to the combat requirements.

Xi launched a major reorganisation of the PLA in December 2015 to "fight and win" future warfare based on China's core interests and acquiring regional and global hegemony. At the 19th Communist Party Congress, 2017, Xi ordered the PLA to become a "world class military" by 2049. The rump in the PLA is not tuned into these new requirements, leading to further reorganisations.

In pursuing global ambitions, Xi in December 2015 reorganised the PLA into five theatre commands, brought the four "General" departments (of staff, political, logistics and armaments) and the newly established PLASSF under the control of the General

Office of the Central Military Commission (CMC). Yet, the PLA doesn't seem to be matching Xi's ambitions of becoming an expeditionary force firmly under his control.

Xi realised a "world-class military" cannot be raised with so much inefficiency and corruption in the PLA forces. Moreover, some of these units also went beyond their brief, blackening the political leadership's face. The Chinese balloon incident in early 2023, which was shot by the United States, exposed PLASSF's vulnerabilities and command and control problems. Likewise, the Yuan Wang 5 surveillance ship incident at Hambantota alerted India to the PLASSF's ambitions to enter the Indian Ocean. China's information operations across the world depleted its soft power.

It is also realised that the ISF should be a separate force, directly under Xi, as the demands of information warfare increased recently after the Ukraine and Israel-Palestine-Iran crises and cannot be subsumed under the overall umbrella of the PLASSF. Also, despite extensive and threatening deployments in the Taiwan Strait since August 2022, the PLA forces, including the PLASSF, were unable to make a significant dent in the region. The Galwan incident with India also exposed China's limitations in information dominance and logistics support.

Xi Jinping's tenure as Chairman of the all-powerful CMC witnessed increasing turbulence for the PLA forces, in part due to his global ambitions and the inability of the PLA to adjust to such demands. While Xi attacked rampant corruption in the PLA, specifically targeting rival political factional officers loyal to Jiang Zemin, recently this campaign targeted his own appointees, highlighting vulnerabilities in civil-military relations.

The newly formed PLA ISF that was carved out of the PLASSF on April 19 has Bi Yi as the commander and Li Wei as political commissar. This reorganisation provides more for specialisation under the direct leadership of Xi. Given the lack of transparency in the PLA, it is hard to predict if further purges would be carried out in the "four services and four arms" of the PLA. The resulting uncertainty in the PLA is detrimental to peace and stability in China and beyond.

Prof. S. Kondapalli, the author, is Professor in Chinese Studies at JNU. Views expressed in the above piece are personal and solely those of the author. They do not necessarily reflect Firstpost's views.

Are there really Chinese sleeper cells operating in the U.S.?

29 April 2024, PolitiFact

Is the Chinese Communist Party operating "sleeper cells" on American soil? That's what Rep. Elise Stefanik, R-N.Y., said in a recent social media post. Stefanik, who as House Republican Conference chair is the third-highest party official under Speaker Mike Johnson, R-La., decried Chinese nationals crossing the U.S.-Mexico border in a March 17 post on X.

Stefanik, who has closely aligned herself with former President Donald Trump, went on to say in the post that "we know the #CCP (the Chinese Communist Party) has set up sleeper cells in our communities. Joe Biden is asleep at the wheel as a hostile foreign regime is waging war on our way of life."

PolitiFact reached out to Stefanik — a member of the House Armed Services and Intelligence committees — multiple times but never received a response. However, terrorism experts said whether her assertion is accurate depends on how one defines "sleeper cell."

We couldn't find any publicly available, official intelligence community definition of "sleeper cell," and we did not hear back from the CIA or the House Intelligence Committee. But the International Spy Museum, which has board members and advisers from the intelligence community, defines a "sleeper agent" as an "agent living as an ordinary citizen in a foreign country; acts only when a hostile situation develops."

This definition mirrors the image most Americans may have from pop culture: spies or terrorists who embed themselves in another country. These so-called sleeper agents pass themselves off as ordinary citizens as they await a call from their handlers — sometimes years later — with orders to undertake a mission such as sabotage or terrorism.

Experts told PolitiFact they are unaware of any efforts by China or its ruling Communist Party that fit this Hollywood version of a sleeper cell.

However, a looser definition of "sleeper cell" may fit a recent case of Chinese nationals who allegedly embedded themselves in Manhattan to operate an "illegal overseas police station," said Daveed Gartenstein-Ross, a terrorism expert who founded the security and technology firm Valens Global.

According to the Justice Department's April 2023 announcement of the charges, the effort was focused on intimidating Chinese dissidents. Like sleeper agents, the suspects worked undercover within an American community while doing the bidding of a foreign government.

But the case also presents differences with the popular conception of sleeper cells. The suspects allegedly targeted Chinese dissidents living in America, not native-born Americans; their endgame does not appear to have been a terrorist act against the U.S.; and the suspects' anti-dissident operations may have been ongoing, rather than having to await orders for a specific mission.

The overseas police station example

The existence of these overseas police stations had been bubbling up for a few years prior to the arrests.

In September 2022, a Spanish human rights group, Safeguard Defenders, released a report alleging the existence of at least 54 secret Chinese police stations in 21 countries. In April 2023, U.S. media reports cited seven Chinese police stations in the U.S.: two in New York City, two in California, one in Minnesota, one in Nebraska and one in Texas.

That month, the U.S. arrested "Harry" Lu Jianwang, 61, of the Bronx, and Chen Jinping, 59, of Manhattan, on charges related to operating a Chinese police station in lower Manhattan's Chinatown neighborhood on behalf of a provincial branch of China's Ministry of Public Security.

The suspects were charged with "conspiring to act as agents of the (People's Republic of China's) government as well as obstructing justice by destroying evidence of their communications with" a Ministry of Public Security official, the Justice Department said in announcing the arrests.

"They were residents of New York City, they communicated with the Chinese Ministry of Public Security, they worked to establish this unofficial police station, they operated it clandestinely at the behest of the People's Republic of China, and it involved at least two people, which is the minimum for a 'cell,'" said Gartenstein-Ross, the terrorism expert. "That provides a number of aspects that would establish them as a sleeper cell."

The Chinese "police stations" don't fit other aspects of the popularly held definition

To the extent ordinary Americans have heard of sleeper cells, however, it's from pop culture — and such examples differ from the Chinese police stations.

The Chinese defendants don't appear to have been terrorists, unlike the sleeper cells from the 2005-2006 Showtime miniseries "Sleeper Cell" or another Showtime series, "Homeland."

In addition, the Chinese defendants appear to have been targeting Chinese dissidents, rather than natives of the country in which they embedded themselves. The latter was the modus operandi in the 1962 movie "The Manchurian Candidate" and the 2013-2018 FX series "The Americans."

It also appears that the two men arrested were pursuing their activities on an ongoing basis, rather than waiting for years to undertake a specific mission, which is a key element of the Spy Museum definition.

Would China want to pursue a sleeper cell strategy against the United States?

Experts told PolitiFact that a Chinese-devised sleeper cell of the Hollywood variety seems far-fetched in today's environment. They said Stefanik's framing falls into the longstanding trope of a feared Chinese invasion.

"Stefanik is basically replicating old-school 'red scare' stuff, trying to provoke anti-China sentiment," said James J.F. Forest, the director of security studies at the University of Massachusetts-Lowell.

However, they added, other tactics seem more promising from the Chinese perspective. "A cyber-attack involving hackers that are already present and lurking in our networks is far more likely than a Chinese-directed terrorist campaign involving 'sleeper cells,'" Forest said. "That's not what China does, nor is it something they'd want or need to do." Suzanne Ogden, a professor emerita of political science at Northwestern University, agreed.

Ogden said China has "so many thousands of students in scholars and others in this country that they don't really need so-called sleeper cells. In the age of computers, they can find out everything they want to know without doing what sleeper cells used to do."

Why China disbanded once-touted Strategic Support Force: Implications for India

29 April 2024, First Post

With the intermediary SSF now having been removed, President Xi Jinping will have more direct control of the information domain

As a part of the most touted major security structure reforms, Chinese President Xi Jinping created the Strategic Support Force (SSF) in December 2015. And now, on April 19, 2024, the SSF met its death knell in yet another restructuring of the People's Liberation Army (PLA). The PLA now has three independent branches: the Information Support Force (ISF), the Cyberspace Force, and the Aerospace Force.

China is known for its lack of transparency. Whether this change has been done to enhance military operational capability or to exercise greater political oversight and direct control over various elements is being analysed. Could corruption have played a part in Xi's decision, is being speculated.

The Ukraine conflict has surely highlighted the importance of the logistics and information domains. Space and cyber are other very dominant operational domains. Aerospace force could mean the partial merging of air and space domains. It may be recalled that China created the "Near Space Command" in November 2023.

Erstwhile SSF

The 2015 PLA reforms brought in major structural changes, including the formation of theatre commands. The then-newly created SSF was focused on space, counter-space, and information warfare capabilities. It was meant to improve the PLA's ability to fight what China calls "informatised conflicts" and to simultaneously enhance the PLA's power projection capabilities in space and cyberspace. SSF was designed to ease intelligence sharing and coordination with departments of the different branches.

The nearly 250,000 personnel force represented nearly 10 per cent of the military. The SSF was on par with the other military services and the PLA's five operational theatre commands. Later, the overall responsibility for national and joint military communication networks was also shifted to SSF control.

The SSF oversaw all units responsible for psychological warfare, information warfare, space warfare, cyberwarfare, and electronic warfare operations. With so many tasks, command and control were spread thin, and individual units were vying for resources. Also, the expertise required to command such a multifaceted force was complex.

The SSF consolidated all the PLA's space-based C4ISR systems. The conduct of strategic reconnaissance using the spy balloons flying in 'near space' was also part of the SSF domain. When the Chinese spy balloons shooting down became a public spectacle, Xi was reportedly unhappy with SSF. Splitting SSF will now allow more focus on each sector.

The SSF used to report directly to the all-powerful China's Military Commission (CMC), headed by President Xi Jinping. The SSF's previous mandate encompassed a wide array of responsibilities, potentially hindering operational effectiveness. It was therefore split within just a little more than eight years.

China's Military Commission and reduced layers

The CMC wanted to give independent focus and importance to information, cyber, and space domains as stand-alone forces. It is yet another pivotal step in PLA modernisation, what China now calls the "four services and four arms". The four services being the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Rocket Force, and the four arms include the Aerospace Force, the Cyberspace Force, the Information Support Force, and the Joint Logistic Support Force (JLSF). All these, in addition to the theatre commands, now report directly to the CMC, the top political party organ that oversees China's armed forces.

With the intermediary SSF now having been removed, Xi will have more direct control of the information domain. The new structure means the four forces plug into the PLA's joint operations system more easily due to fewer management layers. Operationally, the new structure is good for China's military. The SSF was as powerful as the PLA's five theatre commands. The current four support forces are now one level lower. The theatre commanders may have greater access to the support forces' assets without hierarchical complications. The four support forces, having become stand-alone, can now concentrate on their own specialised functionality with a reduced management layer.

The overall reform is much smaller in scale than what happened in 2015. The changeover will thus be smoother and faster. Clearly, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) leadership places high priority on aggregating information and network operations.

Information Support Force

China emphasises that network information systems are the largest variable for improving the combat effectiveness of the military, as modern warfare is a confrontation between systems. The Information Support Force (ISF) will perhaps be responsible for the entire PLA's integrated computer architecture, including network information systems and communications support. The ISF will be responsible for command and control, information security, and intelligence dissemination. They will also coordinate the defence of their own cyber networks and be responsible for maintenance and repairs.

The military considers the information domain as important as the four traditional air, land, sea, and space domains. The ISF tasks are crucial for modern competitive warfare in contested domains. The ISF is China's answer to the US military's advanced network capabilities associated with Joint All-Domain Command and Control (JADC2).

Cyberspace Force

The Cyberspace Force will be responsible for offensive cyber operations such as computer network attacks and active defence. Their mission will be to reinforce national cyber border defence, promptly detect and counter network intrusions, and maintain national cyber sovereignty and information security. The force will concentrate on intelligence collection. The Cyberspace Force could one day resemble the US Cyber Command, thus allowing for a more effective employment of resources and expertise.

China has also been imbibing lessons from Russian structures. Russia also has a Cyber Command that reports directly to the Ministry of Defence. They have many dedicated cyber units. Russia has been training for live electronic, cyber, and informational confrontation and undertaking counter-propaganda efforts. China's Cyberspace Force bears a certain degree of resemblance to both US and Russian practices.

Aerospace Force

China has become a very significant space power and is fast catching up to the leader, the US. The Aerospace Force will take over SSF's Space Systems Department. The department managed backend systems for space-related affairs, but had overlaps with the Equipment Development Department and some elements within the Rocket Force and Air Force. Such overlapping organisational structures inevitably impeded operational efficiency. It was so much unlike the US' dedicated Space Force, which centralised all matters pertaining to space warfare. Xi Jinping may have possibly drawn inspiration from the US military's framework.

Now the Aerospace Force will supervise space operations and space launches and strengthen the capacity to safely enter, exit, and freely use space, albeit overtly for peaceful purposes. The Pentagon reports state that the PLA views space superiority, the ability to control the space-enabled information sphere, and the ability to deny adversaries their own space-based information gathering and communication capabilities as critical components of conducting modern warfare.

Indian defence reforms

As China pushes ahead with further military reforms, India too has made incremental changes. India set up the tri-service Andaman and Nicobar Command (ANC) in 2001 and the Strategic Forces Command (SFC) in 2003. The Armed Forces Special Operations Division (AFSOD) integrated the Special Forces of the armed forces. In 2019, the Defence Cyber Agency (DCyA) and the Defence Space Agency (DSA) were created at the same time. These could one-day become full-fledged commands. There is an Integrated Defence Staff, and a Chief of Defence Staff (CDS).

The modalities for the formation of theatre commands are being worked out. The concept of Air Defence Command was deliberated and abandoned. The idea of integrated helicopter operations and integrated logistics is evolving. While some are exhibiting a high degree of urgency, it is best to take small but firm steps and hasten slowly. Information warfare and electronic warfare need greater importance. China's defence production capability is coming of age. They already have home-grown stealth fighter aircraft and large transport aircraft and are making stealth bombers. India is making strong efforts to increase indigenous defence production. However, the same needs a greater push, even if it is through partnerships for high-end technologies.

Conclusions and implications

China is busy consolidating and refining its military structures, this time with a special emphasis on battle-space information control in a multi-domain integrated joint operations environment. The structural changes are not cosmetic. The move is clearly a strategic response to evolving security challenges and technological advancements.

The reforms reflect the evolving nature of modern warfare and the imperative to enhance capabilities in emerging domains such as space, cyber, and information warfare. Xi is trying to align the PLA with global trends and potential adversaries' structures, giving higher importance to information, space, and cyber operations. PLA will have to once again engage in extensive training and exercises to stabilise the new structure. The new structure throws up unforeseen challenges to operational effectiveness.

Beijing competes with Washington for military primacy in the Western Pacific. It also wants to keep the Line of Actual Control with India alive to stem India's unprecedented economic growth. India has witnessed significant Chinese cyberattacks. The frequency of attacks increased manifold during the Galwan skirmish. China also has dedicated electronic warfare aircraft.

China's space launches are nearly 8-9 times more than India's. Chinese satellite communications, space-based intelligence surveillance and reconnaissance (ISR), and its own global satellite navigation system, the BeiDou satellite navigation system, greatly support military operations. In modern warfare, victory hinges on information. PLA employs a much larger force, with many in civil clothing, for this purpose.

Xi has repeatedly asked the PLA to modernise its readiness structure for high-tech combat and structure the military to 'fight and win' future wars. They have made another major structural change within a decade of the last major military reform. The international military competition is undergoing historic changes. New and high-tech military technologies are advancing constantly. Long-range precision, intelligent, stealthy or unmanned weaponry and equipment will change the way we fight wars. The US and India have reasons to study and understand the implications of China's military restructuring. New Delhi must also look inward to accelerate India's own defence structural reforms.

The naming dispute between India & China

28 April 2024, Sunday Guardian

By using Tibet, instead of the Chinese Xizang, India challenges China's unilateral renaming.

In the intricate ballet of geopolitics, names carry more than mere identification; they embody history, culture, and sovereignty. The recent decision by China to refer to Arunachal Pradesh as Tsang Nan or South Tibet, and to rename Tibet as Xizang, is a strategic move that extends beyond cartography into the realm of diplomatic signalling. This op-ed explores the implications of these actions and India's potential response.

Names are potent symbols in international relations, encapsulating the essence of a nation's stance on territorial disputes. China's choice to rename regions within Indian territory is not merely a linguistic exercise but a symbolic assertion of sovereignty. Such actions are provocative, touching upon the sensitive chords of territorial integrity and national identity.

India's response, maintaining the use of the name "Tibet," is a reaffirmation of historical and cultural recognition. By doing so, India not only challenges China's unilateral renaming but also underscores its commitment to respecting the historical context of the region. This stance is significant, as it reflects India's adherence to global norms and understanding, despite China's attempts to reshape international perceptions.

The term "Sinicization" denotes the process by which non-Chinese societies are influenced to adopt Chinese cultural, linguistic, and societal norms.

In Tibet's case, this process is a deliberate effort by the Chinese government to integrate Tibetan culture into the broader Chinese cultural framework. The renaming of Tibet to "Xizang" is a facet of these Sinicization efforts, aiming to solidify China's rule and dilute the Dalai Lama's influence and the global recognition of the Tibetan cause.

The international community, including governments and organizations, often weighs the historical and cultural context heavily when referring to regions. Despite China's renaming efforts, many continue to use the term "Tibet," aligning with the established global understanding. This collective stance is crucial, as it supports the cultural and religious identity of the Tibetan people against the tide of Sinicization.

The Indian government has firmly rejected China's attempts to rename places in Arunachal Pradesh, emphasizing that such actions do not alter the state's status as an integral part of India. This rejection is a clear message to China and the international community that India stands firm on its territorial sovereignty. India's potential reciprocation, refusing to accept the name "Xizang" and instead using "Tibet," is a powerful diplomatic gesture. It is a declaration that India does not recognize the Sinicization of Tibet and supports the region's historical and cultural identity as known internationally. The naming dispute between India and China over Tibet and Arunachal Pradesh is more than a war of words; it is a reflection of deeper geopolitical tensions and the struggle for cultural preservation. India's stance, rooted in historical recognition and international law, serves as a bulwark against attempts to rewrite history and infringe upon sovereign rights.

As the situation evolves, the international community's role in upholding these principles becomes ever more critical, ensuring that names—and the identities they represent—remain respected on the global stage.

Billions in US investment goes to Chinese firms linked to CCP military, human rights abuses

28 April 2024, Fox Business

Billions of investment dollars are going from U.S. financial markets to Chinese companies that have been blacklisted by the U.S. government over links to Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) military modernization and human rights abuses, according to a new report.

The bipartisan House Select Committee on the Strategic Competition between the U.S. and the CCP released a report detailing how asset managers and index providers facilitated investment of more than $6.5 billion to 63 companies in the People's Republic of China (PRC) that have been blacklisted or red-flagged by the U.S. government.

"These companies develop advanced fighter jets and nuclear weapons for the People's Liberation Army (PLA) and create technology used to perpetrate the ongoing genocide against the Uyghur people," the committee wrote. "What may surprise many Americans is that the activity by U.S. financial institutions described below is not illegal. It is time for Congress to act."

"Through the products of our own financial industry, Americans' hard-earned savings and retirement money are supporting the military modernization of a foreign adversary and the development of tools used by the CCP to violate human rights. Many investors have no idea," the bipartisan panel warned.

Under current law, U.S. government agencies maintain a variety of blacklists and red-flag lists that serve a range of purposes, from barring exports to covered foreign firms and blocking imports due to connections with the use of forced labor, to restricting purchases of equipment that poses a national security risk and more.

Most of these lists do not restrict U.S. asset managers or investors from investing in listed companies. One list that does restrict U.S. investment in listed firms, the Treasury Department's NS-CMIC list, blocks investment only in listed firms but excludes those companies' subsidiaries, allowing them to receive U.S. capital.

Index providers like MSCI, the world's leading index provider, have created indexes used by fund managers and other investors that seek to mirror financial markets like those in China. In that process, they have the option of excluding firms at their discretion, but may opt to include the broadest possible selection of companies in a given market or to rely on the most widely-used benchmark index.

Those indexes are then used by asset managers like BlackRock, Vanguard and others to create investment products like exchange-traded funds (ETFs) or mutual funds centered on that index.

For example, BlackRock, the world's largest asset manager, offers the iShares MSCI China ETF (ticker MCHI), which mirrors the MSCI China Index that covers about 85% of Chinese equities. The committee found that the ETF had assets under management (AUM) of about $7.6 billion, of which about 3.01%, or $230 million, is in Chinese firms flagged by U.S. government agencies.

BlackRock's iShares Core MSCI Emerging Markets ETF (ticker IEMG), which mirrors an MSCI index benchmarked to a number of emerging markets around the world including China, had about $70.9 billion in AUM – of which 0.78%, or $556 million, was in blacklisted or red-flagged Chinese firms per the committee's analysis.

Of the $6.5 billion that the committee found invested in Chinese firms included on U.S. agencies' red-flag lists, nearly 59% was invested through asset managers Vanguard and BlackRock, which each accounted for about $1.9 billion of the total.

"The existing regulations prohibiting investment in certain Chinese companies because of national security risks or human rights violations are insufficient," the committee wrote. "Congress must act to restrict U.S. investment in entities tied, directly or indirectly, to the PLA, critical technology sectors, or forced labor and genocide."

The committee recommended three policies for Congress to act on to address the shortcomings of U.S. restrictions on investment in certain Chinese companies, including:

- Restrict investment in companies blacklisted by the U.S. government, including subsidiaries, affiliates, parents and holding companies – including through the delisting of PRC companies covered by human rights sanctions or implicated in Uyghur forced labor.
- Require U.S. public companies to disclose key risks related to investments in PRC securities, including differences in shareholder rights.
- Ensure the U.S. financial system is resilient to PRC market uncertainty through increased disclosures to investors about risks associated with the PRC market.

"Short of such action, billions of dollars of Americans' life savings will continue funding the PRC's military and human rights abuses, including the Uyghur genocide," the committee said.

Financial firms respond

"The Committee and its report confirm BlackRock complies with applicable U.S. laws, this matter reflects the entire asset management industry, and that Congress and the Administration must work together to create clear rules of the road for U.S. investors," BlackRock told FOX Business in a statement. "Despite fully cooperating with the Committee for more than eight months, its report includes misleading assertions about index funds, including that they are 'funneling billions of dollars' to these entities."

"We are pleased that the Committee acknowledges that MSCI indexes comply with U.S. laws and regulations," MSCI told FOX Business in a statement. "An index is simply a mathematical calculation of the performance of the market. An index does not, and cannot, channel investments, and MSCI does not manage or recommend investments in any country or company."

"If Congress or other government bodies expand restrictions on investment in China as recommended by the Committee, MSCI will assess applicable changes to our indexes in accordance with our methodologies," MSCI added.

"Vanguard maintains robust policies and procedures to ensure compliance with all applicable laws and regulations, including the rigorous sanctions laws maintained by the U.S. Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC)," Vanguard told FOX Business in a statement. "We stand ready to comply with any new regulations or compliance measures laid out by policymakers."

"Vanguard invests on behalf of 50 million individual investors and retirement savers, offering a wide array of investment options that can help investors meet different goals and objectives, including a range of funds to invest internationally. Our clients' investments in China are limited and primarily through U.S.-based passive index products that are designed to provide exposure to many diversified and developing economies around the globe," the company added.

Xi's Imperial Ambitions Are Rooted in China's History

27 April 2024, Foreign Policy

Then-U.S. President Richard Nixon with Chinese Vice Premier Li Xiannian, looking out over the Great Wall, circa 1972. BETTMANN ARCHIVES/GETTY IMAGES

When Richard Nixon defied expectations and went to China in 1972, Henry Kissinger, his national security advisor, packed the president's briefcase. Among Nixon's reading materials was The Chinese Looking Glass, a book by British journalist Dennis Bloodworth about understanding China on its own terms. In his opening pages, Bloodworth sets the stage by going back to the beginning: "The gaudy catalogue of China's disasters and dynastic glories, whose monumental scale has given the Chinese much of their character ... brings us to our true beginning." Kissinger, one of America's most consequential foreign-policy leaders in recent memory, clearly internalized the centrality of China's "true beginning." In his 2011 tome On China, Kissinger marveled at China's "singularity" and staying power. Indeed, even the hardest of hearts cannot help but be moved by the continuity of a civilization that predates the birth of Christ by hundreds, even thousands, of years.

Awe, however, is no substitute for knowledge. In the opening pages of On China, Kissinger writes of China's "splendid isolation" that cultivated "a satisfied empire with limited territorial ambition." The historical record, however, contradicts him. From the Qin dynasty's founding in 221 B.C. to the Qing's collapse in 1912 A.D., China's sovereign territory expanded by a factor of four. What began as a small nation bound in the fertile crescent of the Yangtze and Yellow rivers morphed into an imperial wrecking ball. In the words of Bloodworth, the very author Kissinger recommended to Nixon in 1972, "It would be absurd to pretend that the Chinese had never been greedy for ground—they started life in the valley of the Yellow River and ended by possessing a gigantic empire."

To be sure, China was not the aggressor in every war it fought. In antiquity, nomadic tribes regularly raided China's proto-dynasties. During the infamous Opium Wars of the 19th century, Western imperialist powers victimized and preyed upon China at gunpoint. The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) regularly refers to China's "Century of Humiliation," when European empires brutalized China and killed or wounded tens of thousands of Chinese men, women, and children. Indeed, the party has memorialized these grievances in a permanent exhibit of the National Museum of China, just steps away from Tiananmen Square.

For all of Beijing's legitimate and long-standing security concerns, however, the sheer scope of China's expansion is undeniable. Western leaders often deny or ignore it, usually at the behest and prodding of Chinese leaders. When Nixon finally gained an audience with Mao Zedong, he reassured the chairman, "We know China doesn't threaten the territory of the United States." Mao quickly corrected him: "Neither do we threaten Japan or South Korea." To which Nixon added, "Nor any country." Within the decade, Beijing invaded Vietnam.

At the time, Nixon's gambit was to split the Soviet bloc and drive a wedge between the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China (PRC). Nixon and Kissinger saw the Sino-Soviet split and took stock of the PRC's trajectory: a growing population that, once harnessed, was poised to dominate the global economy. It was textbook realpolitik: cold, dispassionate tactics divorced from moralism. If Washington could turn the Soviet Union's junior partner, the West could significantly hamper Moscow's ability to project power into Eastern Europe and Southeast Asia.

During the final years of Nixon's life, his presidential speechwriter William Safire asked him about that fateful trip to Beijing in 1972. Had opening up to the PRC made Americans safer and China freer? According to Safire, "That old realist, who had played the China card to exploit the split in the Communist world, replied with some sadness that he was not as hopeful as he had once been: 'We may have created a Frankenstein.'" Over time, many in the United States have come to realize this predicament. Unfortunately, articulating that problem well has proved difficult.

During her brief stint as director of policy planning at the State Department in 2019, Kiron Skinner previewed the shop's keystone intellectual project: a strategy to counter China, in the spirit of George Kennan's "containment" strategy. At a public event in April 2019, Skinner tipped her hand and revealed her philosophy of U.S.-China competition: "This is a fight with a really different civilization and a different ideology, and the United States hasn't had that before." She went on to add, incorrectly: "It's the first time that we will have a great-power competitor that is not Caucasian." Skinner received widespread criticism for these remarks and was soon after dismissed for unrelated issues.

Skinner's mistake was twofold. First, she simply got the history wrong and ignored imperial Japan in World War II. Of deeper consequence was her failure to explain what strategic culture actually is, why it matters, and how China's past shapes the CCP's behavior today. In fairness, these errors aren't unique to Skinner. Understanding Chinese history can be difficult for most Westerners. In some ways, it's difficult to think of two more different nations. The United States is less than three hundred years old.

China was unified more than two hundred years before Christ was born. Immigrants founded America. Denizens established China. The United States was born out of revolution against a colonial power. China came into being from a regional conflict of gigantic proportions. Favorable geography allowed America to grow economically and territorially on its own terms and at its own pace. China came into being surrounded by rival kingdoms and tribes on every side.

Americans turn to one source more than any other to make sense of these differences: The Art of War, by Sun Tzu. One of his more recognizable dictums, "All warfare is based on deception," has captured the imagination of many Western thinkers. Instead of investigating the history that informed Sun Tzu's counsel, however, many policymakers take the easier path of Orientalizing China. "China thinks in centuries, and America thinks in decades" is a well-worn trope. Another well-meaning but vapid cliché is, "America plays chess, but China plays Go."

These statements are often left untethered from history and offered as self-evident axioms. What's left are useless clichés that offer no actual understanding of why Chinese strategists advised cunning and deception, or how China's unique historical experiences informed military tactics. In the absence of curiosity, an impression easily forms of China as "the other," a mysterious, inscrutable competitor. A shallow understanding of Beijing's past leads to incomplete conclusions about its present behavior.

More often than not, policymakers find it easier to avoid China's history entirely. In late 2020, the policy planning office finished the 72-page report. It was a commendable attempt to reprise Kennan's strategic clarity, but China's dynastic strategic culture received a single page of attention.

Reducing strategic culture to vague racial differences helps no one except Chinese President Xi Jinping and his party henchmen. The CCP works to enmesh itself with the Chinese people and regularly uses them as a rhetorical human shield. To criticize the CCP, according to the well-worn rhetorical trope of Beijing's diplomats, is to "hurt the feelings of 1.4 billion people." As a matter of course, Beijing uses this specious logic to construe anti-CCP policies as evidence of racism. Years before former U.S. President Donald Trump fell headlong into this trap with his careless rhetoric about the "Chinese virus" and "kung-flu," a young generation of China hawks had vowed to evade this pitfall.

Washington Post columnist Josh Rogin wrote about this resolve in his 2021 bestseller, Chaos Under Heaven, which documented the collective decision of Washington, D.C.-based China hands to blunt Beijing's attempts "to divide Americans by party or ethnicity, to divert attention from its actions." I was a regular member of those meetings and still believe America's leaders must differentiate the party from the Chinese people—not only out of respect for those who daily live under the CCP's jackboot, but also for the safety of Chinese Americans, who faced a rise of race-based crime in the wake of the COVID-19 pandemic. But, in doing so, America must avoid a separate trap: equating the party with China. China's history did not begin in 1949 when Mao and the CCP established the PRC. Nor did it start with China's "Century of Humiliation," when European imperialist powers forcibly opened China in the mid-19th century. Chinese civilization predates America and the West by orders of millennia. That context gives meaning to the party's contemporary behavior. The themes of greatness, fall, and restoration hidden in Xi's remarks in 2013 constitute the essence of Chinese history.

They are the four-act play of China's story, or "strategic culture"—without which it is impossible to understand the CCP's strategy today. Strategic culture explains how a country's unique experiences shape distinct national identities that translate into foreign policy. These three elements—story, identity, and policy—reinforce and shape one another. To be sure, the CCP has its own story, identity, and policies, but the party is one tributary in a long river. American leaders cannot prevail against the CCP without understanding the story and identity that belong to China.

From the start, China has been a civilizational juggernaut striving for political hegemony. China has often attempted to conceal this ambition with conciliatory diplomacy, but its neighbors know from experience the struggle to live—and survive—in the dragon's shadow. CCP diplomats often bully China's neighbors by claiming sovereignty over part or all of their territory "from time immemorial"—an inadvertent admission that the party is the latest crusader in a long line of imperialists. This struggle that was once relegated to the nations of East Asia is now a challenge for every country in the world.

Beijing is approaching the world not to embrace it, but to rule it. The Western world has no excuse for missing this reality, and American politicians have badly misjudged Beijing for decades. Washington's China policy will continue to be a "two steps forward, one step back" affair until it reckons with the Middle Kingdom's penchant for imperialism.

This reality calls into question the unspoken objective of American policymakers: seeking a democratic China. For all their differences, both hawks and doves in the United States have framed the "China problem" as an ideological challenge. Proponents of engagement believed that economic contacts would necessarily lead to political reform, a belief rooted in liberal internationalism. Advocates of confrontation couch the CCP regime as the problem, which implies an ideological solution.

The one unchanging constant in America's China policy since Nixon's meeting with Mao in 1972 is the steady commitment to regime change, either by commerce or competition. The underlying belief in the universal power of democracy has proved intoxicating. "If we can just make them like us," the thinking goes, "we can turn an enemy into a friend." Perhaps this self-delusion is inevitable. America's national identity is steeped in beliefs about liberty, equality, and opportunity. But the CCP's heritage raises an uncomfortable question for the United States: Even if modern China were to become a democracy, would it cease to be the Middle Kingdom?

If the CCP collapsed and China followed Taiwan's path of economic and political liberalization, would it suddenly lose its appetite for hegemony? Maybe. Then again, perhaps simplifying Beijing's behavior to its current Communist Party overlords ignores thousands of years of China's own history, as well as the strategic culture that informs those decisions.

Suddenly, Chinese Spies Seem to Be Popping Up All Over Europe

27 April 2024, NY Times

One of the men, a young Briton known for his hawkish views on China, worked as an aide to a prominent member of the British Parliament. Another, a German citizen of Chinese descent, was an assistant to a member of the European Parliament representing Germany's far right.

While from different countries and seemingly divergent backgrounds and outlooks, both men became ensnared this week in accusations of espionage on behalf of China — and a widening pushback in Europe against malign Chinese influence in politics and commerce. In all, six people in three separate cases have been charged this week in Europe with spying for China: two in Britain and four in Germany.

On Friday, as the two Britons made an initial court appearance in London, the U.S. secretary of state, Antony J. Blinken, met in Beijing with China's leader, Xi Jinping, in the latest effort by the two rivals to keep communications open even as disputes escalate over trade, national security and geopolitical frictions. The espionage cases in Britain and Germany, the first of their kind in two countries that once cultivated warm relations with Beijing, served as eye-catching exclamation points in Europe's long, often anguished breakup with China.

Shortly after British and German officials announced that six of their citizens had been charged with espionage, the Dutch and Polish authorities on Wednesday raided the offices of a Chinese security equipment supplier as part of a crackdown by the European Union on what it sees as unfair trading practices.

It was the first time that the bloc's executive arm, the European Commission, had used a new anti-foreign subsidy law to order a raid on a Chinese company.

In early April, Sweden expelled a Chinese journalist who had been a resident of the country for two decades, saying the reporter posed a threat to national security.

After years of regular tiffs over trade followed by reconciliation, Europe "has lost patience with China," said Ivana Karaskova, a Czech researcher at the Association for International Affairs, an independent research group in Prague, who until last month served as an adviser to the European Commission on China.

China still has steadfast friends in the European Union, notably Hungary, she added, in "the multidimensional chess game" between the world's two largest economies after the United States. But Europe, Ms. Karaskova said, has moved from a position of "total denial" in some quarters over the danger posed by Chinese espionage and influence operations to "take a less naïve view, and wants to defend European interests vis-à-vis China."

Accusations this week that China was using spies to burrow into and influence the democratic process in Germany and Britain caused particular alarm, as they suggested a push to expand beyond already well-known, business-related subterfuge into covert political meddling, something previously seen as a largely Russian specialty.

But, according to China experts, those accusations and the flurry of charges this week indicated not so much that Beijing was ramping up espionage but that European countries had stepped up their response.

"Countries have been forced to get real," said Martin Thorley, a British China expert and author of "All That Glistens," a forthcoming book detailing how what London trumpeted a decade ago as a "golden era" of Sino-British friendship during the premiership of David Cameron made it easy for China to suborn politicians and businesspeople. The "golden era" has been widely mocked as a "golden error."

Mr. Cameron, who is now Britain's foreign secretary, has in recent months become an outspoken critic of China. "A lot of the facts changed," he said during a visit to Washington in December, declaring that China had become "an epoch-defining challenge." His change of heart mirrors a wider shift across much of Europe in attitudes to a rising superpower that long counted on European countries, particularly Germany, to push back against what it denounces as "anti-China hype" emanating from Washington. Germany's security service has been warning publicly about the risk of trusting China since 2022, when, shortly after Russia started its full-scale invasion of Ukraine, the head of its domestic intelligence agency, Thomas Haldenwang, told Parliament, "Russia is the storm, China is climate change." The agency, known by its German acronym, BfV, said in an unusual public warning last summer, "In recent years, China's state and party leadership has significantly stepped up its efforts to obtain high-quality political information and to influence decision-making processes abroad."

Germany's political leadership, however, has until this week been far more equivocal. Chancellor Olaf Scholz recently made a state visit to China, Germany's biggest trading partner, to discuss trade and market access.

But Germany's interior minister this week gave a blunt assessment of China's activities. "We are aware of the considerable danger posed by Chinese espionage to business, industry and science," the minister, Nancy Faeser, said. "We are looking very closely at these risks and threats and have issued clear warnings and raised awareness so that protective measures are increased everywhere."

China's foreign ministry responded by dismissing the accusations as a groundless "slander and smear against China," demanding that Germany "stop malicious hype" and "halt anti-China political dramas."

Mareike Ohlberg, a China expert and a senior fellow at the German Marshall Fund in Berlin, said that "for a long time China was spared big public warnings." Now, she said, the German authorities are "more willing to call things out, or no longer have the patience not to call things out."

Three of the four people arrested in Germany this week, a husband and wife and one other man, appear to have been involved in economic espionage using a company called Innovative Dragon to pass on sensitive information about German marine propulsion systems – of great value to a superpower interested in building up its navy. They also used the company to buy a high-powered, dual-use laser, which they exported to China without permission.

The fourth person, in what prosecutors called “an especially severe case,” was Jian Guo, a Chinese-German man who has been accused of working for China’s Ministry of State Security. His regular job was as an assistant to Maximilian Krah, a member of the European Parliament for the far-right party Alternative for Germany – a rising political force friendly to China and Russia – and its top candidate for elections in June.

Since then, the public prosecutor in Dresden has begun a “pre-investigation” into how much Mr. Krah knew of his employee’s ties to China. On Wednesday, his party decided to keep supporting Mr. Krah’s bid for re-election to the European Parliament but disinvited him from campaign stops.

Maximilian Krah, a member of the European Parliament, spoke to reporters in Berlin on Wednesday after an aide was arrested in what prosecutors called “an especially severe case” of espionage. Credit Fabrizio Bensch/Reuters

When Mr. Xi travels to Europe next month, he will skip Germany and Britain and instead visit Hungary and Serbia, China’s last two staunch allies on the continent, and France.

Mr. Thurley, the British author, said the spying cases had sounded the alarm over Chinese activities but were only a small part of efforts by China to gain influence and information. More important than traditional espionage, he said, is China’s use of a “latent network” of people who do not work directly for the Ministry of State Security but who, for commercial and other reasons, are vulnerable to pressure from the Chinese Communist Party and its myriad offshoots.

“This has been bad for a while and has been left far too long,” he said.

The two men accused in London of espionage for China, Christopher Cash, 29, and Christopher Berry, 32, were arrested in March last year but released on bail and were not named publicly until they were charged this week.

Mr. Cash was a parliamentary researcher with links to the governing Conservative Party and a former director of the China Research Group, a body that often takes a hard-line view on China and hosts podcasts with critics of Chinese interference.

His former colleagues include Alicia Kearns, a member of the governing Conservative Party who heads Parliament’s influential Foreign Affairs Committee, and her predecessor in that role, Tom Tugendhat, who is now the security minister.

In a statement this week, London’s Metropolitan Police said Mr. Cash and Mr. Berry were charged with violating the Official Secrets Act and had provided information “intended to be, directly or indirectly, useful to an enemy.” It added, “The foreign state to which the above charges relate is China.”

“It took a hell of a long time to wake up, but we finally see some movement,” said Peter Humphrey, a British citizen whom China accused of illegally obtaining personal information while doing due-diligence work for the pharmaceuticals company GlaxoSmithKline, and who spent two years in a Shanghai jail with his wife.

He was in jail suffering from cancer when Mr. Cameron visited the city in 2013 with a delegation of British businesspeople. “It was sickening,” recalled Mr. Humphrey, an external research fellow at Harvard’s Fairbank Center for Chinese Studies. “Nobody in the higher levels of the British government,” he said, “wanted to hear a bad word about China because of business interests.”

The story of one of Buddhism’s most revered figures, long missing, explained

26 April 2024, RFA

The young boy who was abducted as a 6-year-old turned 35 this week.

What he does, where he lives or even if he’s still alive isn’t known, thanks to the reticence of the Chinese government, which kidnapped him along with his family and his teacher 29 years ago.

Beijing leaders, ever wary of potential rivals for the Communist Party’s authority, viewed the boy, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, as a possible threat.

Days earlier the Dalai Lama had named him the 11th reincarnation of the Panchen Lama, the second-highest spiritual leader in the largest sect of Tibetan Buddhism.

Tibetan leaders marked his birthday this week with a celebration held in absentia, and reiterated long-standing requests to Beijing to reveal Gedhun Choekyi Nyima's fate.

Who is the Panchen Lama?

The word "Panchen" is based on a Sanskrit word for "Great Scholar." Traditionally the Panchen Lama has played a leading role in Tibetan Buddhist scholarship as the leader of the Tashi Lhunpo Monastery in Shigatse, the second largest city in Tibet, which has been controlled by China since 1951.

Buddhists believe that the Dalai Lama is a physical representation of Avalokiteshvara, the Buddha of compassion, and the Panchen Lama of Amitabha, the Buddha of infinite light.

The two lamas share a special spiritual relationship, with each recognizing the other's successive reincarnations and serving as the other's teacher.

Tibetan Buddhists believe that the reincarnations of the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama are revealed through a series of tests as judged by prominent religious leaders.

The Panchen Lama's most important responsibility includes finding and recognizing the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama in the event of his passing, one reason why China wants a Panchen Lama under its control.

What happened to the Panchen Lama?

On May 14, 1995, the exiled Dalai Lama recognized Gedhun Choekyi Nyima as the Panchen Lama, the 11th reincarnation of his predecessor.

This angered Chinese authorities, who rejected the choice.

Three days later the boy, his family and his teacher were abducted. They have remained missing ever since.

For over 29 years, Tibetans, global leaders, and rights groups have called on the Chinese government to reveal their whereabouts, to no avail.

Who is the Beijing-appointed Panchen Lama?

Shortly after the abduction of the Dalai Lama-appointed Panchen Lama, Beijing installed another boy, Gyaltzen (in Chinese, Gyaincain) Norbu, as their own candidate in his place.

However, the Chinese government-appointed Panchen Lama remains unpopular with Tibetans both in exile and at home and is perceived as a "political tool" for Beijing.

Ordinary Tibetans and monks in monasteries traditionally loyal to the Dalai Lama have been reluctant to acknowledge or receive him, and during his visits to Tibet, Beijing has in the past handed out small monetary incentives for people who receive his blessing.

Significance of the Panchen Lama's role

China's appointment of Gyaincain Norbu as Panchen Lama underscores Beijing's attempts to interfere in the selection of the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama when he passes, and gain control and legitimacy among Tibetans, both inside Tibet and in exile, say experts.

The move is also seen as China's attempts to acquire more influence over Buddhism not only inside occasionally restive Tibet but throughout the Himalayan region. Beijing has increasingly looked to leverage religion as a soft power diplomacy tool across various Buddhist nations.

In 2007, the Chinese government decreed that China would begin overseeing the recognition of all reincarnate Tibetan lamas, or "Living Buddhas," including the next incarnation of the Dalai Lama, for which China plans to use its own Beijing-appointed Panchen Lama to sign off on.

Edited by Kalden Lodoe and Jim Snyder.

Significance of passage of Resolve Tibet bill'

25 April 2024, Taipei Times

The passage of the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, also known as the Resolve Tibet bill, by the US Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on Tuesday last week, to be sent to the US Senate for a vote, marks a pivotal moment in international relations, one that could significantly influence the geopolitical landscape of Asia, particularly affecting India's stance on Tibet.

This act, which has garnered substantial bipartisan support, underscores the unresolved conflict between Tibet and China, and asserts that Tibet's legal status is to be determined in accordance with international law. For India, the act serves as a reaffirmation of US support for the Tibetan cause, mirroring India's longstanding position of providing asylum to the Tibetan government-in-exile and the Dalai Lama. This alignment between US policy and India's historical stance could bolster New Delhi's diplomatic leverage in its negotiations with China, especially concerning border disputes and regional sovereignty.

The act's emphasis on the unresolved status of Tibet – a region that shares an extensive and contested border with India – might prompt a recalibration of diplomatic relations in the region. It could lead to increased solidarity among nations that recognize the significance of a peaceful resolution to the Tibet-China conflict, potentially forming a united front that advocates for the rights of the Tibetan people.

By advocating for dialogue and a peaceful resolution to the Tibet-China conflict, the act aligns with India's interests in maintaining regional stability. India's proximity to Tibet and the historical ties between the two regions mean that any escalation of tensions could have direct implications for India's security and its efforts to maintain peace along its borders.

The act's provisions to counter disinformation about Tibet could indirectly support India's narrative against unfounded territorial claims by China. By authorizing actions to counter such disinformation, the act not only defends the historical and cultural identity of Tibet, but also reinforces India's sovereignty over regions like Arunachal Pradesh, which China claims as South Tibet (藏南).

The emphasis on resolving the Tibet issue in accordance with international law might inspire similar approaches to other disputed territories. This could be advantageous for India, which has consistently advocated for a rules-based international order to address its border disputes with neighboring countries.

While the Resolve Tibet bill is a significant step, its true impact would depend on the subsequent actions taken by the US and other international players. The responses from China and India would also play a crucial role in shaping the future of the region. The situation remains dynamic, and the geopolitical implications would continue to unfold over time. As the world watches, the act could serve as a catalyst for change, promoting the rights of the Tibetan people and encouraging a peaceful resolution to one of the longest-standing conflicts in Asia.

Khedroob Thondup is a former member of the Tibetan parliament in exile.

China's Alternative Order

23 April 2024, Foreign Affairs

By now, Chinese President Xi Jinping's ambition to remake the world is undeniable. He wants to dissolve Washington's network of alliances and purge what he dismisses as "Western" values from international bodies. He wants to knock the U.S. dollar off its pedestal and eliminate Washington's chokehold over critical technology. In his new multipolar order, global institutions and norms will be underpinned by Chinese notions of common security and economic development, Chinese values of state-determined political rights, and Chinese technology. China will no longer have to fight for leadership. Its centrality will be guaranteed.

To hear Xi tell it, this world is within reach. At the Central Conference on Work Relating to Foreign Affairs last December, he boasted that Beijing was (in the words of a government press release) a "confident, self-reliant, open and inclusive major country," one that had created the world's "largest platform for international cooperation" and led the way in "reforming the international system." He asserted that his conception for the global order—a "community with a shared future for mankind"—had evolved from a "Chinese initiative" to an "international consensus," to be realized through the implementation of four Chinese programs: the Belt and Road Initiative, the Global Development Initiative, the Global Security Initiative, and the Global Civilization Initiative.

Outside China, such brash, self-congratulatory proclamations are generally disregarded or dismissed—including by American officials, who have tended to discount the appeal of Beijing's strategy. It is easy to see why: a large number of China's plans appear to be failing or backfiring. Many of China's neighbors are drawing closer to Washington, and its economy is faltering. The country's confrontational "Wolf Warrior" style of diplomacy may have pleased Xi, but it won China few friends overseas. And polls indicate that Beijing is broadly unpopular worldwide: A 2023 Pew Research Center study, for example, surveyed attitudes toward China and the United States in 24 countries on six continents. It found that only 28 percent of respondents had a favorable opinion of Beijing, and just 23 percent said China contributes to global peace. Nearly 60 percent of respondents, by contrast, had a positive view of the United States, and 61 percent said Washington contributes to peace and stability.

But Xi's vision is far more formidable than it seems. China's proposals would give power to the many countries that have been frustrated and sidelined by the present order, but it would still afford the states Washington currently favors with valuable international roles. Beijing's initiatives are backed by a comprehensive, well-resourced, and disciplined operational strategy—one that features outreach to governments and people in seemingly every country. These techniques have gained Beijing newfound support, particularly in some multilateral organizations and from nondemocracies. China is succeeding in making itself an agent of welcome change while portraying the United States as the defender of a status quo that few particularly like.

Rather than dismissing Beijing's playbook, U.S. policymakers should learn from it. To win what will be a long-term competition, the United States must seize the mantle of change that China has claimed. Washington needs to articulate and push forward its own vision for a transformed international system and the U.S. role within that system—one that is inclusive of countries at different economic levels and with different political systems. Like China, the United States needs to invest deeply in the technological, military, and diplomatic foundations that enable both security at home and leadership abroad. Yet as the country commits to that competition, U.S. policymakers must understand that near-term stabilization of the bilateral relationship advances rather than hinders ultimate U.S. objectives. They should build on last year's summit between President Joe Biden and Xi, curtailing inflammatory anti-Chinese rhetoric and creating a more functional diplomatic relationship. That way, the United States can focus on the more important task: winning the long-term game.

I CAN SEE CLEARLY NOW

Beijing's playbook begins with a well-defined vision of a transformed world order. The Chinese government wants a system built not just on multipolarity but also on absolute sovereignty; security rooted in international consensus and the UN Charter; state-determined human rights based on each country's circumstances; development as the "master key" to all solutions; the end of U.S. dollar dominance; and a pledge to leave no country and no one behind. This vision, in Beijing's telling, stands in stark contrast to the system the United States supports. In a 2023 report, China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs claimed Washington was "clinging to the Cold War mentality" and "piecing together small blocs through its alliance system" to "create division in the region, stoke confrontation and undermine peace." The United States, the report continued, interferes "in the internal affairs of other countries," uses the dollar's status as the international reserve currency to coerce "other countries into serving America's political and economic strategy," and seeks to "deter other countries' scientific, technological and economic development." Finally, the ministry argued, the United States advances "cultural hegemony." The "real weapons in U.S. cultural expansion," it declared, were the "production lines of Mattel Company and Coca-Cola."

Beijing claims that its vision, by contrast, advances the interests of the majority of the world's people. China is center stage, but every country, including the United States, has a role to play. At the 2024 Munich Security Conference in February, for example, Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi said that China and the United States are responsible for global strategic stability. China and Russia, meanwhile, represent the exploration of a new model for major-country relations. China and the European Union are the world's two major markets and civilizations and should resist establishing blocs based on ideology. And China, as what Wang called the "largest developing country," promotes solidarity and cooperation with the global South to increase its representation in global affairs.

China's vision is designed to be compelling for nearly all countries. Those that are not democracies will have their choices validated. Those that are democracies but not major powers will gain a greater voice in the international system and a bigger share of the benefits of globalization. Even the major democratic powers can reflect on whether the current system is adequate for meeting today's challenges or whether China has something better to offer. Observers in the United States and elsewhere may roll their eyes at the grandiose phrasing, but they do so at their peril: dissatisfaction with the current international order has created a global audience more amenable to China's proposals than might have existed not long ago.

FOUR PILLARS

For over two decades, China has referred to a "new security concept" that embraces norms such as common security, system diversity, and multipolarity. But in recent years, China believes it has acquired the capability to advance its vision. To that end, during his first decade in power, Xi released three distinct global programs: the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) in 2013, the Global Development Initiative (GDI) in 2021, and the Global Security Initiative (GSI) in 2022. Each contributes in some way to furthering both the transformation of the international system and China's centrality within it.

The BRI was initially a platform for Beijing to address the hard infrastructure needs of emerging and middle-income economies while making use of the Chinese construction industry's overcapacity. It has since expanded to become an engine of Beijing's geostrategy: embedding China's digital, health, and clean technology ecosystems globally; promoting its development model; expanding the reach of its military and police forces; and advancing the use of its currency.

The GDI focuses on global development more broadly, and it places China squarely in the driver's seat. Often working with the UN, it supports small-scale projects that address poverty alleviation, digital connectivity, climate change, and health and food security. It advances Beijing's preference for economic development as a foundation for human rights. One government document on the program, for instance, accuses other countries of the "marginalization of development issues by emphasizing human rights and democracy."

Beijing has positioned the GSI as a system for, as several Chinese scholars have put it, providing "Chinese wisdom and Chinese solutions" to promote "world peace and tranquility." In Xi's words, the GSI advocates that countries "reject the Cold War mentality, oppose unilateralism, and say no to group politics and bloc confrontation." The better course, according to Xi, entails building a "balanced, effective and sustainable security architecture" that resolves differences between countries through dialogue and consultation and that upholds noninterference in others' internal affairs. Behind the rhetoric, the GSI is designed to end U.S. alliance systems, establish security as a precondition for development, and promote absolute sovereignty and indivisible security—or the notion that one state's safety should not come at the expense of others'. China and Russia have used this notion to justify Russia's invasion of Ukraine, suggesting that Moscow's attack was needed to stop an expanding NATO from threatening Russia.

But Xi's strategy has taken flight only in the past year, with the release of the Global Civilization Initiative in May 2023. The GCI advances the idea that countries with different civilizations and levels of development will have different political and economic models. It asserts that states determine rights and that no one country or model has a mandate to control the discourse of human rights. As former Foreign Minister Qin Gang put it: "There is no one-size-fits-all model in the protection of human rights." Thus, Greece, with its philosophical and cultural traditions and level of development, may have a different conception and practice of human rights than China does. Both are equally valid.

Chinese leaders are working hard to get countries and international institutions to buy into their world vision. Their strategy is multilevel: striking deals with individual countries, integrating their initiatives or components of them into multilateral organizations, and embedding their proposals into global governance institutions. The BRI is the model for this approach. Around 150 countries have become members of the program, which openly advocates for the values that frame China's vision—such as the primacy of development, sovereignty, state-directed political rights, and common security. This bilateral dealmaking has been accompanied by Chinese officials' efforts to link the BRI to other regional development efforts, such as the Master Plan on Connectivity 2025 created by the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN).

China has also successfully embedded the BRI in more than two dozen UN agencies and programs. It has worked particularly diligently to align the BRI and the UN's high-profile 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. The UN Department of Economic and Social Affairs, which has been headed by a Chinese official for over a decade, produced a report on the BRI's support for the agenda. The report was partially funded by the UN Peace and Development Trust Fund, which, in turn, was initially established by a $200 million Chinese pledge. Such support undoubtedly contributes to the enthusiasm many senior UN officials, including the secretary-general, have shown for the BRI.

Progress on the GDI, GSI, and GCI has understandably been more nascent. Thus far, only a handful of leaders from countries such as Serbia, South Africa, South Sudan, and Venezuela have offered rhetorical support for the GCI's notion that the diversity of civilizations and development paths should be respected—and by extension, for China's vision for an order that does not give primacy to the values of liberal democracies.

The GDI has gained more international support than the GCI. After Xi announced the project before the UN General Assembly, China developed a "Group of Friends of the GDI" that now boasts more than 70 countries. The GDI has advanced 50 projects and pledged 100,000 training opportunities for officials and experts from other countries to travel to China and study its systems. These training opportunities are designed to promote China's advanced technologies, its management experiences, and its development model. China has also succeeded in formally linking the GDI to the UN's 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development and held GDI-related seminars with the UN Office for South-South Cooperation. Beijing, in other words, is weaving the program into the fabric of the international governmental system.

The GSI has achieved even greater rhetorical buy-in. According to China's Foreign Ministry, more than 100 countries, regional organizations, and international organizations have supported the GSI, and Chinese officials have encouraged the BRICS (Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa), ASEAN, and the Shanghai Cooperation Organization to adopt the concept. At the SCO's September 2022 meeting, China advanced the GSI and received support from all the members except India and Tajikistan.

MASS APPEAL

China, in contrast with the United States, invests heavily in the diplomatic resources necessary to market its initiatives. It has more embassies and representative offices around the globe than any other country, and Chinese diplomats frequently speak at conferences and publish a stream of articles about China's various initiatives in local news outlets. This diplomatic apparatus is supported by equally sprawling Chinese media networks. China's international news network, CGTN, has twice as many overseas bureaus as CNN, and Xinhua, the official Chinese news service, has over 180 bureaus globally. Although Chinese media are often perceived in the West as little more than crude propaganda tools, they can advance a positive image of China and its leadership. In a study published in 2024, a team of international scholars surveyed more than 6,000 respondents in 19 countries to see whether China or the United States was more effective at selling its political and economic model and its role as a global leader. At baseline, participants overwhelmingly preferred the United States—83 percent of the interviewees preferred the U.S. political model, 70 percent preferred the U.S. economic model, and 78 percent preferred U.S. leadership. But when they were exposed to Chinese media messaging—whether only to China's or to Chinese and U.S. government messaging in a head-to-head competition—participants preferred the Chinese models to those of the United States.

Beijing also draws heavily on the strength of state-owned companies and the country's private sector to promote its objectives. China's technology firms, for instance, not only provide digital connectivity to a variety of countries; they also enable states to emulate elements of Beijing's political model. According to Freedom House, representatives from 36 countries have participated in Chinese government training sessions on how to control media and information on the Internet. In Zambia, adopting a "China way" for Internet governance—as a former government minister described it—resulted in the imprisonment of several Zambians for criticizing the president online. German Council on Foreign Relations experts revealed that Huawei middleboxes blocked websites in 17 countries. The more states adopt Chinese norms and technologies that suppress political and civil liberties, the more Beijing can undermine the current international system's embrace of universal human rights.

In addition, Xi has enhanced the role of China's security apparatus as a diplomatic tool. China's People's Liberation Army is conducting exercises with a growing number of countries and offering training to militaries throughout the developing world. Last year, for example, China brought more than 100 senior military officials from almost 50 African countries and the African Union to Beijing for the third China-Africa Peace and Security Forum. China and the African participants agreed to hold more joint military exercises, and they embraced the BRI and the GSI, alongside the African Union's Agenda 2063 development plan, as a way to pursue economic development, promote peace, and ensure stability on the continent. Together, these arrangements help create the collaborative security system China wants: one that's based on Beijing.

China has boosted its strategy by being both patient and opportunistic. Beijing provides massive resources for its initiatives, reassuring other countries of its long-term support and enabling Chinese officials to act quickly when opportunities arise. For example, Beijing first announced a version of the Health Silk Road in 2015, but it garnered little attention. In 2020, however, China used the COVID-19 pandemic to breathe new life into the project. Xi delivered a major address before the World Health Assembly promoting China as a hub for medical resources. Beijing paired Chinese provinces with different countries and had the former send personal protective equipment and medical professionals to the latter. China also used the pandemic to push Chinese digital health technologies and traditional Chinese medicine—a priority for Xi—as ways to treat the virus.

More recently, China has used Russia's invasion of Ukraine and the resulting Western sanctions to push de-dollarizing the global economy. China's trade with Russia is now mostly settled in renminbi, and Beijing is working through the BRI and multilateral organizations, such as the BRICS (which 34 countries have expressed interest in joining), to advance de-dollarization. As Brazilian President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva said during a 2023 visit to China, "Every night I ask myself why al l countries have to base their trade on the dollar. Why can't we do trade based on our own currencies?"

THE PAYOFF

Beijing has clearly made progress in gaining rhetorical buy-in from other countries, as well as from UN organizations and officials. But in terms of effecting actual change on the ground, garnering support from other countries' citizens, and influencing the reform of international institutions, China's record is more mixed.

The GDI, for its part, is well on its way. A two-year progress report produced by the Xinhua News Agency's think tank indicated that 20 percent of the GDI's initial 50 cooperation programs had been completed, and an additional 200 had been proposed. Some projects are highly local and long term, but others will have a greater immediate impact, such as a wind power project in Kazakhstan that will meet the energy needs of more than one million households.

Despite the relative nascence of the GSI, Wang, China's foreign minister, quickly claimed that the Beijing-brokered 2023 rapprochement between Iran and Saudi Arabia was an example of the GSI's principle of promoting dialogue. China has had less success, however, using GSI principles in its attempts to resolve the war in Ukraine and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Moreover, some countries have expressed concern that the GSI is a kind of military alliance. Despite being an early beneficiary of GDI projects, for example, Nepal has resisted multiple Chinese entreaties to join the GSI because it does not want to be part of any security alliance.

The BRI has transformed the geostrategic and economic landscape throughout much of Africa, Southeast Asia, and, increasingly, Latin America. Huawei, for example, provides 70 percent of all the components in Africa's 4G telecommunications infrastructure. In addition, China's 2023 BRI investments have increased from 2022. There are signs, however, that the BRI's influence may be plateauing. Italy, the biggest economy in the initiative (aside from China itself), withdrew in December, and only 23 leaders attended the 2023 Belt and Road Forum, compared with 37 in 2019. China's financing for the BRI has fallen sharply since its peak in 2016, and many BRI recipient countries are struggling to repay Beijing's loans.

Public opinion polls paint a similarly mixed picture. The Pew poll indicated that middle-income economies, particularly in Africa and Latin America, are more likely to have positive views of China and its contributions to stability than higher-income economies in Asia and Europe. But even in these regions, popular views of China are far from uniformly positive.

A 2023 survey of 1,308 elites in ASEAN states, for instance, reveals that although China is considered the most influential economic and security actor in the region, majorities in every country, except Brunei, express concern over China's rising influence. Pluralities or majorities in seven of ten countries do not believe that the GSI will benefit their region. And when asked whether they would align with China or with the United States if forced to choose, majorities in seven of ten ASEAN countries selected the United States.

Afrobarometer's 2019 and 2020 surveys suggest China has a more positive reputation in Africa: 63 percent of Africans polled in 34 countries believe China is a positive external influence. But only 22 percent believe China is the best model for future development, and approval of China's model declined from the 2014 and 2015 surveys.

A 2021 survey of 336 opinion leaders from 23 countries in Latin America was similarly telling. Although 78 percent of respondents believe China's overall influence in the region is high, only 35 percent have a good or very good opinion of China. (Respondents have similar opinions about the United States.) There was support for engagement with China on trade and foreign direct investment but minimal support for engagement on multilateral cooperation, international security, and human rights. Finally, support for China and Chinese-backed initiatives in the United Nations is mixed. For example, a detailed study of China's Digital Silk Road investment in Africa found that although eight African DSR members supported China's New IP proposal for increasing state control over the Internet, more African DSR members did not write in support of it. And the February 2023 vote to condemn Russia's invasion of Ukraine—in which 141 countries voted in favor, seven voted against, and 32, including China and all other members of the SCO except Russia, abstained—suggests widespread rejection of the GSI's principle of indivisible security. Nonetheless, China won the support of 25 of the 31 emerging and middle-income countries (not including itself) in the UN Human Rights Council in a successful bid to prevent debate on Beijing's treatment of its Uyghur minority population. It was only the second time in the council's history that a debate has been blocked.

FIGHTING FIRE WITH FIRE

Support for China's efforts may appear shallow among many segments of the international community. But China's leaders express great confidence in their transformative vision, and there is significant momentum behind the basic principles and policies proposed in the GDI, GSI, and GCI among members of BRICS and the SCO, as well as among nondemocracies and African countries. China's wins within bigger organizations—such as the UN—may seem minor, but they are accumulating, giving Beijing substantial authority inside major institutions that many emerging and middle-income economies value. And Beijing has a formidable operational strategy for achieving its desired transformation, along with the capability to coordinate policy at multiple levels of government over a long period.

Part of why Beijing's efforts are catching on is that the present, U.S.-led system is unpopular in much of the world. It does not have a good record of meeting global challenges such as pandemics, climate change, debt crises, or food shortages—all of which disproportionately affect the planet's most vulnerable people. Many countries believe that the United Nations and its institutions, including the Security Council, do not adequately reflect the world's distribution of power. The international system has also not proved capable of resolving long-standing conflicts or preventing new ones. And the United States is increasingly viewed as operating outside the very institutions and norms it helped create: deploying widespread sanctions without Security Council approval, helping weaken international bodies such as the World Trade Organization, and, during the Trump administration, withdrawing from global agreements. Finally, Washington's periodic framing of the world system as one divided between autocracies and democracies alienates many countries, including some democratic ones.

Even if its vision is not fully realized, unless the world has a credible alternative, China can take advantage of this dissatisfaction to make significant progress in materially degrading the current international system. The uphill battle the United States has waged to persuade countries to avoid Huawei telecommunications equipment is an important lesson in addressing a problem before it arises. It would be far more difficult to overturn a global order that has devalued universal human rights in favor of state-determined rights, significantly de-dollarized the financial system, widely embedded state-controlled technology systems, and deconstructed U.S.-led military alliances.

The United States should therefore move aggressively to position itself as a force for system change. It should take a page from China's playbook and be opportunistic—seeking strategic advantage as China's economy is faltering and its political system is under stress. It should acknowledge that, as Xi has repeatedly said, there are changes in the world “the likes of which we haven't seen for 100 years” but make clear that these shifts do not signal the decline of the United States. Instead, they are in line with Washington's own dynamic vision for the future.

The vision should begin by advancing an economic and technological revolution that will transform the world's digital, energy, agricultural, and health landscapes in ways that are inclusive and contribute to shared global prosperity. This will require new norms and institutions that integrate emerging and middle-income economies into resilient and diversified global supply chains, innovation networks, clean manufacturing ecosystems, and information and data governance regimes. Washington should promote a global conversation on its vision of technologically advanced change rooted in high standards, the rule of law, transparency, official accountability, and sustainability—norms of shared good governance that are not ideologically laden. Such a discussion would likely be widely popular, just as China's focus on the imperative of development holds broad appeal.

Washington has put in place some of the building blocks of this vision through the U.S.-EU Trade and Technology Council, the Indo-Pacific Economic Framework, and the Partnership for Global Infrastructure Investment. Largely left out of the equation, however, are precisely the states most open to China's vision of transformation—most members of the BRICS, the SCO, and nondemocratic emerging and middle-income economies. Together with these countries, Washington should explore regional arrangements akin to those it has established with its Asian and European partners. More countries should be brought into the networks Washington is establishing to build stronger supply chains, such as those created by the CHIPS and Science Act. And countries such as Cambodia and Laos, left out of relevant existing arrangements such as the Indo-Pacific framework, should be given a path to membership. This would expand the United States' development footprint, allowing it to provide a development trajectory that is different from Beijing's BRI and GDI and—unlike China's initiatives—offers participating countries an opportunity to help develop the rules of the road.

Artificial intelligence presents a unique opportunity for the United States to signal a new, more inclusive approach. As its full applications become appreciated, AI will require new international norms and potentially new institutions to harness its positive effects and limit its negative ones. The United States, which is the world's leading AI innovator, should engage up front with countries other than its traditional allies and partners to develop regulations. Joint U.S.-EU efforts regarding skills training for the next generation of AI jobs, for example, should be expanded to include the global majority. The United States can also support engagement between its robust private sector and civil society organizations and their counterparts in other countries—a multistakeholder approach that China, with its “head of state” style of diplomacy, typically eschews.

This effort will require Washington to draw more effectively on the U.S. private sector and civil society—much as China has worked its state-owned enterprises and private sector into the BRI and GDI—by fostering vibrant, state-initiated but business-and-civil-society-driven international partnerships. In most of the world, including Africa and Latin America, the United States is a larger and more desired source of foreign direct investment and assistance than China. And Washington has left untapped a significant alignment of interests between its strategic goals and the economic objectives of the private sector, such as creating political and economic environments abroad that enable U.S. companies to flourish. Because American companies and foundations are private actors, however, the benefits of their investments do not redound to the U.S. government. Institutionalizing public-private partnerships can better link U.S. objectives with the strength of the American private sector and help ensure that initiatives are not cast aside during political transitions in Washington. The work of private foundations in the United States—which invest billions of dollars in emerging economies and middle-income countries—should similarly be amplified by American officials and lifted up through partnerships with Washington.

More inclusive global governance also requires that Washington consider potential tradeoffs as other countries' economies and militaries grow relative to those of the United States. In the near term, for example, a clearer delineation of the limits of U.S. sanctions policy could help slow the momentum behind Beijing's de-dollarization effort. But Washington should use this time to assess the viability of the dollar's dominance over the longer term and consider what steps, if any, U.S. officials should take to try to preserve it. Washington's vision may also need to incorporate reforms to the current alliance system. The hard realities of China's growing military prowess and its economic support for Russia during the latter's war against Ukraine make clear that Washington and its allies must think anew about the security structures necessary to manage a world in which Beijing and its like-minded partners operate as soft, and potentially hard, military allies.

As with China, the United States needs to spend more on the foundations of its competitiveness and national security to succeed over the long term. Although defensive policies are often necessary, they grant only short-term protections. This means Washington must staff up to match Beijing's foreign policy apparatus. Around 30 U.S. embassies and missions have no sitting U.S. ambassador; each of these slots must be filled. The United States has taken the first steps to enhance its economic competitiveness with programs such as the Inflation Reduction Act and the CHIPS and Science Act, but it needs sustained investment in research and development and advanced manufacturing. It also needs to adopt immigration policies that attract and retain top talent from around the world. And Washington needs to recommit to investing in the foundations of its long-term military capabilities and modernization. Without bipartisan support for the basic building blocks of American competitiveness and global leadership, Beijing will continue to make headway in changing the global order.

Finally, to avoid unnecessary friction, the United States should continue to stabilize the U.S.-Chinese relationship by defining new areas for cooperation, expanding civil society engagement, tamping down needless hostile rhetoric, strategically managing its Taiwan policy, and developing a clear message on the economic tools it uses to protect U.S. economic and national security. This will enable the United States to maintain relations with those in China who are concerned about their country's current trajectory, as well as give Washington room to focus on building up its economic and military capabilities while moving forward with its own global vision.

China is right: the international system does need reform. But the foundations for that reform are best found in the openness, transparency, rule of law, and official accountability that are the hallmarks of the world's market democracies. The global innovation and creativity necessary to solve the world's challenges thrive best in open societies. Transparency, the rule of law, and official accountability are the foundation of healthy, sustained global economic growth. And the current system of alliances, although insufficient to ensure global peace and security, has helped prevent war from breaking out among the world's great powers for more than 70 years. China has not yet managed to convince a majority of the planet's people that its intentions and capabilities are the ones needed to shape the twenty-first century. But it is up to the United States and its allies and partners to create an affirmative and compelling alternative.

Why the Dalai Lama's Message Still Resonates Today

23 April 2024, AoL

In addition to co-founding TIME—96 years ago this week—Henry Luce is most famous for articulating his vision of the American Century. And while that vision takes its name from the U.S., its real focus—closely informed by his formative years abroad in China as the son of missionaries—was the shape of the world. Today, TIME continues to take measure of the world by providing our readers unparalleled access to its most influential figures. Since November 2017, led by International Editor Dan Stewart, TIME has published 15 interviews with leaders and leaders-to-be guiding their nations through this extraordinary period of global transformation.

The Apr. 20, 1959, cover of TIME | Cover Credit: BORIS CHALIAPIN

These include conversations with the leaders of France, Saudi Arabia, New Zealand, Colombia, Argentina, Thailand, Italy, Brazil ("I am not a troglodyte!" Jair Bolsonaro volunteered during his time with us), Armenia, Pakistan, Iraq, Austria (the world's youngest head of government), Malaysia (the world's oldest) and of course the U.S. For this week's issue, Shanghai-based correspondent Charlie Campbell traveled to Dharamsala, in the Indian Himalayas, for a conversation with the spiritual leader of one of the world's most secluded peoples, the Tibetans. Even as China continues to isolate him and attempts to co-opt Buddhism for its own purposes, Charlie says, "The Dalai Lama didn't show an iota of bitterness, not to the Chinese government, nor the British or Americans who abandoned Tibet, nor anyone else." Charlie's story is accompanied by Ruven Afanador's intimate photographs taken in and around the Dalai Lama's private residence, and you can watch video of the interview here. This is in fact the third time the Dalai Lama has been on the cover of TIME. The first was in 1959, the year the Dalai Lama, then 23, fled Tibet disguised as a soldier. In 2008, the great travel writer and TIME contributor Pico Iyer profiled him again as China cracked down on Tibetan freedom demonstrations ahead of the Beijing Olympics. The Buddhist message of interdependence is a powerful one for today, when so many of our challenges are global and yet so much of our globe is deeply fragmented. "The Dalai Lama came across as a kind, genuine, fun-loving person," says Charlie, who has interviewed the leaders of the Philippines, South Korea and Thailand, among others. "He's one of a kind."

Beyond Borders: China's attempts to censor global Academia

22 April 2024, Human Rights Foundation

The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) is dedicated to perfecting its global narrative, employing a combination of coercion and co-optation tactics to shape public discourse both within China and abroad. As part of its strategy, Beijing has increasingly intimidated global academia, targeting both individual scholars and higher education institutions. This includes Beijing's regulation of academic activities through government-funded programs and informal networks and the erosion of the academic institutions' autonomy by promoting financial dependency.

Infiltrating Academia: Students and Scholars

A key player in this strategy is the United Front Work Department (UFWD), a CCP agency focused on influence operations and intelligence activities. Central to its mission is the orchestration of China's work abroad, aimed at establishing a global network to influence local politics, economics, diaspora communities, and academia. The UFWD has a significant presence within global academia, seeking to ensure that critical voices are either co-opted or coerced into silence.

In 2015, Chinese dictator Xi Jinping acknowledged overseas Chinese students as a new key focus of UFWD's overseas operations, recognizing them as valuable assets for managing foreign discourse. Xi's approach requires these students to align their personal aspirations with the overarching vision of the "Chinese Dream," urging them to acquire knowledge abroad that benefits the regime and "serve their nation" both abroad and upon their return.

CCP-Sponsored Scholarships

The China Scholarship Council (CSC) is one of many scholarship providers in China. It distributes funding to thousands of Chinese students pursuing studies abroad and international students studying in China each year. Overseen by the UFWD, the CSC operates as a nonprofit organization affiliated with China's Ministry of Education.

Under the CSC scholarship, students are obligated to adhere to CCP directives. Scrutiny of the CSC intensified after Swedish media revealed the loyalty pledge recipients were required to sign. Applicants are explicitly required to endorse the CCP's leadership, comply with Xi's "Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era," undergo an assessment of their political ideology, and accept the "guidance and management" of Chinese diplomats, including declaring allegiance to the CCP and maintaining regular contact with the embassy. Should students fail to comply or engage in actions deemed detrimental to national interests, they and their families may face penalties.

Despite the lack of academic independence inherent in CSC scholarships, fully funded CSC doctoral students are financially attractive to universities abroad. For instance, in the Netherlands, while CSC scholarships cover recipients' tuition and living expenses, the universities receive bonuses from the Dutch Government for each successfully defended PhD dissertation.

Amid criticism, CSC recipients have defended their scholarship requirements, stating that these are common in contracts in China and only have "symbolic meaning."

Military Linked Research

Universities have also expressed concern over research supporting the Chinese military, as evidenced by several well-known universities in Sweden, Germany, Denmark, and the US cutting ties with such government-funded programs.

Under Xi's strategy of "Military-Civil Fusion" (MCF), the CCP has made substantial investments in science and technology to realize a "world-class" military by 2050. This doctrine, directly overseen by Xi, mandates that independent research, including by Chinese science and technology enterprises, must serve to advance China's economic and military development.

As part of this effort, China's People's Liberation Army (PLA) sends thousands of military personnel for educational exchange abroad before returning to China's military system – called "picking flowers in foreign lands to make honey in China" (异国采花中华酿蜜).

In the Netherlands, more than 90 Chinese military scientists have studied as PhD students over the past decade, most returning to China's military system afterward. Some students confirmed that their purpose was to learn groundbreaking science and technology to serve their military.

Deutsche Welle's research reveals that 26 prominent Chinese researchers in Germany – in fields such as mathematics, computer science, natural sciences, and technology – were employed at elite universities with close ties to the Chinese military. Twenty-two returned to China through the Thousand Talents Plan (TTP)<sup>1</sup>, the CCP's flagship talent recruitment program aimed at top scientists in fields relevant to MCF. A 2022 investigation found that nearly 3,000 scientific publications were collaborations between European researchers and military universities in China.

Scientists sent by Chinese military-affiliated universities, whether for short-term exchanges, PhD studies, or collaborative research, typically specialize in fields crucial to the MCF scheme, such as artificial intelligence, computer vision, and quantum research. One such military affiliate is the National University of Defense Technology (NUDT), China's top military institution, operating under the Central Military Commission chaired by Xi Jinping. NUDT has an extensive overseas network, dedicating significant resources to Chinese military missions and involvement in Chinese espionage activities abroad.

In 2019, a Chinese spy who defected revealed that NUDT's "intelligence center" had provided him with a fake passport for a mission in Taiwan aimed at interfering with elections. In 2020, a federal arrest warrant was issued for NUDT researcher Yanqing Ye for falsely identifying herself as a "student" and concealing her ongoing military service at NUDT. While at Boston University, Ye was an active PLA lieutenant, carrying out missions with access to US military websites and documents.

China has dedicated significant efforts and resources to improving its military technology, and partnerships with foreign universities are considered instrumental to that progress. Xi does not view these collaborations as bona fide academic projects but as information that can be used and weaponized to further national interests. As Xi stated in 2013, "science has no borders, but scientists have a motherland." Consequently, it can be challenging for researchers to ascertain whether their collaborative research and innovations are being shared with and used by the Chinese military to perpetuate atrocities such as the Uyghur genocide.

Intimidating Foreign Academics

While the CCP exploits the research of Chinese students abroad through government-funded programs, Chinese diplomats also suppress foreign scholars and their research. One notable case is

New Zealand professor Anne-Marie Brady. Brady faced written threats and break-ins at her home and office for her report analyzing China's political influence activities in Western democracies.

Such tactics have escalated in aggression, leading to scholars facing visa denials, frozen assets, and even sanctions for their academic endeavors. For example, European scholars Jo Smith Finley, Björn Jerdén, and Adrian Zenz were sanctioned for their scholarly activities and for engaging in public discourse on China and their human rights violations in the Uyghur Region.

Chinese embassies and consulates are also involved in hostile behavior to muzzle academics. Political historian and director of the SOAS China Institute in London, Professor Steve Tsang, faced pressure from university administrators to refrain from criticizing Xi or CCP policies publicly. The Chinese embassy in London even summoned Tsang to cancel invitations to Taiwanese politicians to speak at the school. Pressure from Beijing allegedly resulted in the closure of the School of Chinese Studies at Nottingham University in 2016.

Similarly, in 2021, the Chinese embassy in Washington, D.C., pressured officials of the US National Academy of Sciences twice to disinvite the Dalai Lama and Taiwanese Nobel Prize recipient Lee Yuan-Tseh during the Nobel Prize Summit, which, when ignored, resulted in two apparent cyberattacks. The Chinese government has attempted to censor Lee on multiple occasions, including the embassy in Brazil's attempt to prevent his attendance at the Rio+20 meeting in 2011.

Informal Informant Networks on Campus

In China, university students are encouraged to monitor and report their professors and fellow students if they engage in academic activities that contradict the official discourse of the CCP. University professors face the risk of suspension or other disciplinary actions for teaching subjects deemed sensitive, particularly those prohibited in Doc. 9 – a widely circulated secret document that prohibits universities from teaching topics such as constitutionalism, the separation of powers, and Western notions of human rights. Students have been reportedly punished for participating in anti-COVID "white-paper" demonstrations or distributing rainbow flags on campus, often after being reported by their peers.

Practices of peer-to-peer surveillance extend beyond China's border to campuses abroad, where the CCP leverages its overseas informal networks of Chinese students and student unions, such as Chinese Students and Scholars Associations (CSSA), to spy on academic activities on foreign campuses.

CSSAs, under the control of the United Front Work Department, is the official organization for overseas Chinese students and scholars. The CSSA network comprises party loyalists dedicated to fulfilling Xi's call of "studying abroad to serve the country." Members are encouraged to monitor and report on individuals and events critical of China's domestic policies. Despite presenting as non-political student-led organizations, CSSAs have a history of reporting and harassing individuals and activities on campus. At UChicago, the local CSSA requested to cancel Nathan Law's speech, the UC San Diego CSSA prevented the Dalai Lama from giving a commencement address, and the president the CSSA's Egypt chapter reportedly interrogated Uyghur students about their Islamic practices on behalf of Chinese and Egyptian authorities. CSSA members even facilitated a crackdown of over 200 Uyghur students, who were subsequently deported and arrested.

CSSAs are also committed to promoting the Chinese narrative within their respective universities, publicly censoring discourse on sensitive topics such as Hong Kong, Tibet, Taiwan, and the Uyghur Region. In 2021, representatives of the Bristol CSSA requested the removal of the Flag of East Turkestan from a cultural event poster titled "Oppressive Regime Series – Focus on Xinjiang," falsely claiming it represented a terrorist group. After the organizer complied with the removal, CSSA representatives pushed for the deletion of the word "oppressive" from the event title, citing a lack of factual evidence to support characterizing the Chinese regime as such.

Additionally, CSSAs receive direct instructions from Chinese Embassies and diplomats. The former chairwoman of the Durham CSSA in the UK claimed that the Chinese Embassy required her to "intervene" in a university lecture titled "China's Threat to the West." The president of the Durham Union, who hosted a similar debate, also confirmed receiving numerous messages opposing the event, followed by a threatening call from the Chinese embassy warning of potential trade repercussions for the UK if the debate proceeded.

Chinese embassies and consulates also exert pressure and control over individual students, requiring them to monitor and report campus activities – an extension of China's domestic peer-to-peer reporting culture. Certain Chinese students, already primed with nationalist sentiment from their domestic education, naturally follow the embassy's guidance of their own volition. However, those who refuse to cooperate face consequences; they become targets alongside other students whose views contradict the official Chinese narrative. If identified by their classmates, photographed, or reported to Chinese law enforcement, they and their families in China may even face harassment and threats, including physical violence and cyberbullying.

In 2019, a student photographed a Chinese student in Edinburgh holding a sign supporting free elections in Hong Kong and condemning police violence. Upon his return to Chengdu, China, the photos were posted on Chinese social media with the caption "Brothers from Chengdu, beat him to death," which garnered 10,000 shares. Another student at the University of Minnesota was sentenced to jail for posting cartoon images of Lawrence Limburger and Winnie the Pooh, a character used to mock Xi. He was accused of denigrating the national leader's image and creating a negative social impact.

University professors also fall prey to this reporting scheme, facing pressure from Chinese students regarding anything that deviates from CCP orthodoxy. Professors have been coerced into apologizing for referring to Taiwan as an independent country or displaying maps of the China-India border that may trigger Chinese students in the class. In extreme cases, certain modules have been removed from university programs, as when University College London professor Michelle Shipworth was banned from teaching a course due to complaints from Chinese students about her lecture mentioning China's modern slavery index.

Ensnaring Institutions: Global Universities

The growing reliance on Chinese students' tuition fees and funding from the Chinese government is raising concerns about Western universities' acquiescence to telling China's story on the Chinese dictatorship's terms.

In leading British universities, approximately 25% of tuition fee income comes from Chinese students, not accounting for additional state and military-sponsored funding. For example, Jesus College of Cambridge University receives large amounts of funding from both the Chinese government and the Beijing-affiliate and UK-banned Chinese telecom company Huawei.

Within Cambridge University, the Chong Hua professorship in development studies is funded and controlled by Wen Ruchun, the daughter of former Chinese Prime Minister Wen Jiabao. Peter Nolan, a professor from Jesus College and current Chong Hua Chair, also has deep ties to the CCP and a record of discouraging student discussions on controversial topics such as Uyghur human rights and the Hong Kong democracy movement. Nolan also leads Jesus College's China Forum, which has drawn scrutiny due to its charity link with the Cambridge China Development Trust, where Nolan is a trustee. This trust organizes annual China Executive Leadership Programs, sponsored by CCP's Central Committee, with previous participants including executive members of the Party Committee and officials from the UFD.

China increasingly infringes upon global academic discourse. In 2021, Fudan University signed a memorandum of understanding with the Hungarian government to establish an international campus in Budapest. This was met with widespread opposition due to concerns about increased Chinese influence in Europe. The university, previously one of China's most liberal institutions, also saw its academic freedom hampered when the CCP removed the phrase "freedom of thought" and included a pledge to follow CCP leadership in its university charter.

Satellite campuses of Western universities in China, such as NYU Shanghai, are even more vulnerable to CCP censorship and influence. NYU terminated its fellowship with pro-democracy activist Chen Guangcheng in anticipation of the inauguration of its Shanghai campus and adopted self-censorship by adding "patriotic education" courses to its curriculum to adhere to Chinese academic norms.

Resorting to Self-Censorship

This chilling effect results in international students and Chinese students who support pro-democracy efforts alike becoming targets of retaliation. Often the first to succumb to self-censorship, many Chinese students carefully curate their academic activities, from course selection to research topics, to avoid scrutiny. Many instances of self-censorship and harassment go undocumented, which in turn contributes to universities' failure to address issues associated with diminishing academic freedoms on campuses.

Additionally, many China experts grapple with navigating academic freedom and CCP pressures, as many of their research subjects can easily be perceived as too sensitive. Many tread cautiously, refraining from overly critical discourse to maintain access and funding while also resisting the complete adoption of the official Chinese dictatorship narrative to preserve academic integrity.

Some universities have become increasingly vigilant, scrutinizing lectures and even terminology deemed politically sensitive. One notable example is a North American university's Asian Studies department, which revised its guidelines to categorize topics like "Tibetan independence" and "Hinduism from a critical perspective" as sensitive terms.

The delicate balancing act adopted by scholars and institutions underscores the far-reaching influence of the Chinese regime's assertiveness and the urgent need for a robust defense of academic freedom globally.

Conclusion

As signs of pushback, the US has reduced the number of Confucius Institutes (CIs), and the UK banned over 1,000 Chinese researchers who were a risk to national security from working in the UK, signaling a recognition of the CCP's transnational repression of global academia. However, Beijing's influence persists. The intricate web is stitched together by the enticement of Chinese money, Beijing's intimidation and fear tactics, and the reluctance of many Western institutions to acknowledge the severity of the situation. The lack of reporting and protection mechanisms may leave international Chinese students and faculty vulnerable to CCP coercion and co-optation, forcing them to self-censor to avoid potential trouble. It is crucial not to indiscriminately ostracize all students and researchers associated with China. Universities should instead adopt individualized approaches when assessing if the student is a victim of or complicit in Beijing's transnational repression. A comprehensive investigation is also necessary to identify the risks associated with collaborative research involving Chinese researchers and to ground cooperation in transparency and integrity. Universities must also prioritize ethical due diligence while minimizing financial reliance on Chinese funding, thereby safeguarding academic autonomy and integrity.

1 In 2018, due to heightened scrutiny and investigations into TTP with regards to intellectual property theft, the relevant units are required to refrain from publicly mentioning the term TTP (千人计划), and by 2020, the term was completely blocked from Chinese online discourse. However, it was quietly reintroduced in 2023 under the new name of "Enlightenment Plan" (启明计划).

We must be free or die

19 April 2024, Tibetan Review

Phuntsog Wangyal* argues that loyalty to His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the desire for freedom are not incompatible, that clamouring for Tibet's independence is not only a matter of political freedom in consonance with our democratic system but also a realistic aspiration, while our experience of the 17-Point Agreement shows that trusting China to respect the terms of any middle way policy deal, even if possible, may be a wishful thinking.

Freedom, democracy and independence are huge issues for which many people have fought and died. Democracy means that a choice of leadership is given to the people (as in the USA and UK) where people argue, debate and formulate policies and then vote to decide which policies have the greatest public support – unlike in North Korea or China where there is only one leader and one party.

In the system of democracy which His Holiness has introduced for the Tibetan people there should be a choice between candidates with different policies. To glorify one person and one set of policies is a contradiction of what His Holiness proposed. To suggest that raising the question of independence for Tibet is a greater threat than that imposed by the Communist Party of China is absurd.

In my opinion His Holiness would view current discussion about independence as a sign of growing maturity in political consciousness rather than as something negative which must be objected to. At the time of His Holiness's announcing the Strasbourg Statement in the European Parliament I was one of a number of people who disagreed with the statement. At the time I was a volunteer working at the Tibet Office in Zurich and I had the honour of personally speaking with His Holiness and expressing my reservations. His Holiness was kind enough to listen and did not object to my arguments or see them as a sign of disloyalty. Moreover, he suggested that I was free to continue to express my views on the importance of struggling for independence. Later I issued a written statement and Jonathan Mirsky – a renowned journalist on China affairs – interviewed me and published the interview in The Observer newspaper.

Similarly, far from scorning Jamyang Norbu for his pro-independence views, His Holiness graciously met him and stated that it was vitally important “that we unearth historical evidence of Tibet’s independence and make it known, not only to the world but also to the Chinese”. His Holiness added that “without proof of independence, Umaylam (the Middle Way) policy would be like a beggar begging for food”.

Extreme statements like saying “those Tibetans struggling for independence are more dangerous than the Communist Chinese” are absurd and are nothing more than a cowardly attempt to undermine those who have the courage to fight for freedom, democracy and independence. It is unfortunate that such claims seem to come from people close to His Holiness who seem to view every effort for freedom as hostile to His Holiness. This is a shameful distortion and manipulation of the truth. While His Holiness has a personal view of what is spiritually desirable, he has never suggested that the Tibetan people should slavishly follow his every thought. His Holiness withdrew from active politics in 2011, hoping that his people would take more responsibility for political decisions – as happens in other countries. Throughout the democracies of the world a distinction is made between the spiritual life and the political life. Spiritual life deals with life as we ideally wish it to be; political life deals with harsh realities and includes argument, compromise and bargaining.

The Tibetan people’s urge to return to a Tibet that is free and independent has remained unchanged, despite decades of attempts to eradicate or assimilate their way of life into that of a communist and irreligious state. This has been demonstrated over the years by actions such as raising the fist and the Tibetan national flag in defiance, shouting slogans like “Free Tibet” and “China Out” and opposing the CCP by resisting their rule and facing dangers of torture, imprisonment and even sacrificing their lives – as in the cases of self-immolations and many others.

I have personal experience of visiting Tibet many times, from Dartsedo in the east to Ngari in the west, and over a period of more than 28 years. I have witnessed again and again with admiration the Tibetan people’s loyalty to His Holiness AND their determination to be free from living under Chinese communist control. Loyalty to His Holiness and the desire for freedom are not incompatible. Tibetans everywhere are loyal to His Holiness as their religious leader but they also want political freedom. Despite theoretical claims by the communist powers that we are all equal, we all know that the Chinese have always treated Tibetans as second-class citizens. Our way of life, our religion and family values and traditions have been turned upside down, and false accusations, arbitrary detention, torture and the execution of completely innocent Tibetans continue to this day. Tibetans in Tibet do not trust the communist party to be fair and impartial or to treat us as equals and for those of us lucky enough to live in the free world to go on believing that if we give up our struggle, the CCP will somehow miraculously change and grant us the freedom to live our own lives is pie in the sky. It is not going to happen.

The free world has over decades witnessed the Tibetan people’s courage and is sympathetic to Tibet’s right to determine its own future. His Holiness also has time and again expressed his admiration for the Tibetan people’s courage and determination “not to give up”. We must not play into the hands of the CCP and fall into the jaws of the Chinese dragon. Deception and creating confusion are China’s most effective tools for destroying its enemies – they were used to win over the Nationalists in the past and are currently being used to win over the Taiwanese.

This is not the time to talk about different views held by different sections of our community and to score points in insignificant arguments. Our division helps only the CCP. The REAL issue is that the people of Tibet are clearly deeply unhappy and are suffering under the rule of the CCP which disregards their wishes to preserve their language and culture, to preserve their religious heritage and natural environment and resources, and to protect their children from communist propaganda which has the intention ultimately to erase our distinctive culture. It is our duty – and especially the duty of those Tibetans who live in the free world – to preserve our culture for the benefit of the whole world.

Submitting to the aggressor has led us in the past to submit to signing the 17-point Agreement in exchange for the promise not to change the Dalai Lama's status. It led us to agree not to raise the question of "Independence" in the hope of being able to break the deadlock in negotiations over our status. In both cases the CCP reneged on its promises and left us looking weaker and incompetent. Our confusion benefits only the CCP.

The Tibetan government and the people must find a common long-term goal in seeking complete independence. We must find a strategy to unify the Tibetan community in order to sustain our Tibetan culture and way of life. The struggle for independence is challenging and may be long, but there is nothing that cannot be achieved if we are prepared to endure hardship and move forward together. There are some who say that China with its population advantage of more than a billion is too powerful to challenge but size is not everything as Vietnam, East Timor and Bhutan illustrate. There is a saying that "Little folks have felled great oaks" – meaning that small numbers of people – IF UNITED AND DETERMINED – can cause great trees to fall.

It is time also for us to remember the law of impermanence. Nothing remains the same forever. The great British Empire on which the sun never set has ended; the seemingly all-powerful Soviet Union disintegrated after 70 years; and more recently feared dictators like Saddam Hussain and Colonel Gaddafi were overthrown. We are witnessing gradual changes in China. The economy of the CCP is failing; countries once befriended by China now see China as an enemy to be wary of; and the Chinese people no longer have trust in their own government. The writing is on the wall that the CCP leaders are losing the confidence of their own people as the crack in the communist system grows wider. Light will shine after the passing of the darkness of night and truth will ultimately prevail over the forces of evil. Blessed are those who fight for the freedom of their homeland; blessed are those who unite with their fellowmen in resisting aggression. Now is not the time to squabble but to unite.

—

* Phuntsog Wangyal is a former representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and a former member of Tibetan Parliament in Exile

Reform and opening up are not dead', but today's China 'looks risky': veteran observer David Lampton

22 April 2024, SCMP

- China watcher since the times of Deng Xiaoping says current tightness of political system is likely to continue for the foreseeable future

- 'No government in its right mind' would want China's collapse, but what it and the US want from each other unlikely to happen 'any time soon', he warns

For the Open Questions series of interviews with global opinion leaders, Sylvie Zhuang speaks to David Lampton, former president of US non-profit organisation the National Committee on US-China Relations. Lampton is a professor emeritus at Johns Hopkins-SAIS and author of many books and articles on China. His most recent book is Living US-China Relations: From Cold War to Cold War. Lampton first visited China in 1976 as part of a National Academy of Sciences Group on steroid chemistry and three years later returned with then health, education, and welfare secretary Joseph Califano, when Califano signed the US-China bilateral agreements on health and education.

Read the previous instalment in the series, with James Heimowitz, here.

Professor, you have been watching China since it entered the Deng Xiaoping era of "reform and opening up", which remains a core and relevant slogan for the Communist Party today. So is the reform drive today different from the one we knew in the Deng era?

It strikes me that while the name "reform and opening up" has continued, the actual content of reform and opening up is [now] rather different. The scope of the reforms themselves is much narrower and the internal decision-making system more tightly controlled, less collective, and more top down.

The earlier reform was more spontaneous combustion. The world was optimistic and very supportive of China. In the earlier reform stage, when China was small and making big strides, the outside world was patient. China was playing a modest economic and security role globally. The People's Republic of China (PRC) was making big strides, trying to overcome the dysfunction of the Cultural Revolution era.

But now, China is big and the reform-oriented changes are relatively smaller, and the West is much more impatient because what China does greatly affects the outside world. Most dramatically, China's foreign policy has greater affinity for nations much of the West finds problematic – Russia, Iran and North Korea.

Many have said the so-called reform is dead despite Beijing's pledge to stick to reform and opening up. What are your thoughts on this? Could you share a bit about your friendship with the Deng family? Do you see the legacy of Deng's reform and opening up continuing in China in the years to come?

Reform and opening up are not dead, because reform and opening are the nature of this world of security, economic, ecological, and social interconnectivity, and because each generation must find its own way to address the challenges. I think it is appropriate for China to move reforms forward step by step, but my sense is that the current tightness of the political system is likely to continue for the indefinite future.

Deng Xiaoping reflected his personal experience in the Cultural Revolution and earlier experience in Europe, and all this was reflected in the manner in which he promoted his policies. Then, president Jiang Zemin came along and not only reflected his experience in the Soviet Union but also his exposure to Western-style thinking in his youth when he grew up in China's southeastern city of Yangzhou, one of the most open and economically advanced cities of his era.

President Xi Jinping had his own experience in the Cultural Revolution and that has shaped domestic policy and the current era. Each of those eras has reflected the experience of the top leader and certainly those around him.

Though I never personally met Deng, I had a feel for him conveyed to me by his family members whom I did know. He brought his experiences in the West as a young man to the needs of China in his time. I think his thinking is very relevant to today.

Then is China a peaking power as some say?

To talk about peaking power means China has reached the top of its power curve and now it's plateauing or heading downhill, the implication being that the US and like-minded countries and societies will gain in power, relatively. I think that's a precarious idea. I'm pretty sure it's not even true, but it certainly is a dangerous assumption if it leads to incautious behaviour by either side.

If you were an ambitious business executive, would there be a difference between thinking about investing in China during the Deng-era reforms and now?

Well, to put it simply, businessmen are now risk-averse and China looks risky to them, and this is true to some extent of Chinese businesspeople as well.

This is partly because their investments need to be bigger now than before and therefore they are more cautious. But, businesspeople also feel less certain about China's political direction and the health of its foreign relations.

Also, countries around China have improved their societies and economies, like Vietnam, India and Malaysia. Some of them have lower labour costs and look more stable, presenting more attractive investment options for new, marginal investment.

Also, US-China relations are going downhill, so US investment in China when a US administration has poor economic performance, people begin to lose confidence in that administration. In that sense, China's Communist Party, as the ruling party, will see its popularity and sense of legitimacy necessarily affected by poor economic performance.

There was a period under presidents Jiang Zemin and then Hu Jintao where the party was not very intrusive with respect to foreign business. But now, the party exerts more control and is more present in foreign enterprises. So what is seen by foreigners is the increasing presence and interference of the party in economic decision-making.

Many in the party are not businesspeople. They are concerned about other things like political stability and foreign subversion, while foreign businesses worry about the party just getting too involved in business decisions. Some business executives feel personal insecurity in contemplating travel to China.

President Xi began an unprecedented third term last year. Consequently, an unavoidable question is what is Beijing's succession plan, if any. What kind of signals should we watch for in order to understand whether Beijing is preparing the way for the next No 1? And what risks might arise if the rules around succession continue to be kept under wraps?

Any individual political leader, like Xi Jinping, may or may not have a succession plan in their own mind – I don't know what he and those surrounding him may have in mind.

But, for a system to be stable, the population and the broader elite need to know and buy into the succession procedure, and different political groups need to know what the process for succession is. If it isn't a plan based in a law and in the constitution, when the great leader leaves, the default process is political struggle.

China is viewed as riskier, and business wants to diversify its sources of supply. On balance, I would say business is less optimistic and sees significant opportunities for new investment elsewhere.

What role does China's economic growth play in justifying the legitimacy of the ruling Communist Party? Some argue that the current shape of the Chinese economy is a result of the party's lack of capacity and some say it is a lack of willingness to prioritise the economy. Will this undermine the party's power?

Economic performance affects the legitimacy of all governments, not just the Chinese Communist Party.

People, abroad or at home, cannot have confidence in the outcome of a power struggle. You may just look at China's history and look at the Great Leap Forward and the Cultural Revolution, and it seems to me that you either have law and constitutionalism and transparent mechanisms or you have power struggle.

So if you have to ask whether there is a succession plan, there is no succession plan.

Just saying the Politburo Standing Committee will decide, is not really a succession plan. And the third plenum has not happened yet. Where did the third plenum go? If you don't know where the third plenum went, you surely don't know how things are operating.

The world pays attention to the internal stability and predictability of major powers. So as China becomes more important to the world, the world cares more about what happens in the PRC. Big powers have a special obligation to manage their politics in ways the rest of the world finds stabilising and to guarantee orderly succession.

Ironically, the United States now presents its own challenges in this respect, for the first time in more than 160 years.

In the past 10 years, China is considered to have become tougher towards the US-led West and tougher on national security and economic self-reliance. Would you say the trend represents the will of the entire party elite or is dictated by a small circle of the top leadership? Is there still an influential reformist camp within the Communist Party as some say?

Addressing this question is necessarily speculative. I've had some Chinese tell me that China's leaders are divided into two blocks – two irreconcilable blocks.

One set of opinions tends to want China to boldly move forward in reform – and not just reform of economics, but also to loosen party control and improve relations along China's periphery and with the West more broadly. Another big group says that given the hostility of the US, instability in the world, and the economic problems facing China, control needs to be enhanced and national security needs to be the overriding priority. There's the basic question in Chinese politics: which set of policies promotes stability? I think there's a division.

Some people think more reform will enhance security. Others think more reform and loosening increases dangers and instability. I think that's the fundamental question the system is debating.

It appears that the group around Xi Jinping is quite solid in supporting the current policy. However, we know that in recent major international meetings Premier Li Qiang doesn't seem to be so visible to outsiders.

We observe elite appearances because there's so little transparency; we pay great attention to who we see, how often we see them, and what they say. We also pay attention when ministers of defence or ministers of foreign affairs just vanish with no explanation. We ask, "Why is that?"

On US-China ties, many say relations have sunk to the lowest point in recent years and you have labelled the current era as the "second Cold War". In your view, what structural conflicts between the two systems account for this cold war and make it seem inevitable?

I do not use the word "inevitable", because I believe in human agency as it relates to policy and politics. But I do believe that the US and China, and their allies and partners, have entered a period reasonably characterised as a cold war – that is not to say [I can forecast] how "cold" it becomes, how long it will last, or what its outcomes may be. There is lots of uncertainty.

In the first Cold War, we had no trade, no students going back and forth, and no tourists, among many other things. So there currently is much more connection in this cold war. But that is misleading if that is all you look at.

The current period is like the first Cold War in several important respects: ideology is becoming important again; the US talks about the struggle between autocracy and democracy as we used to during the first Cold War.

Once you use an ideological vocabulary, you are then in effect saying that you want China to change its system. Well, no country will change its system because somebody else wants them to. The dichotomy between autocracy and democracy is not a good basis for productive US-China relations.

Once again, alliance behaviours have become important. Washington is building new partnership organisations and China is doing this with the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation, Brics, and the "no limits" partnership with Russia. And most obvious of all are the rapidly growing military spending and arms, cyber, and space races.

So what would be the possible scenarios, or what would a victory look like for the US side? Would the US aim for a Soviet-style collapse of China? What would a victory look like from the Chinese perspective?

I think no government in its right mind would hope for China's collapse, because that would be a tragedy for the Chinese people and a tragedy for Asia and the whole world. China is a major engine of the global economy and a major determinant of the globe's ecological future. Just look at the last pandemic, the Covid-19 pandemic. China produced medical devices that the rest of the world couldn't produce enough of. If China were to collapse, where would all the refugees go?

To predict or seek "collapse" in either of our societies is to contemplate unimaginable costs for ourselves and the world beyond. In this sense "victory" is an illusion.

I think for most people, they would like to see China evolve in a more reform-oriented way and at a faster pace, and also with less closeness to Russia when Moscow is invading its neighbours.

Further, I think China's neighbours wish for it to become more respectful of their maritime and other boundaries, or at least shelve disputes and curtail claim advancement. I think China wants Washington to act in conformity with its long-standing one-China policy, not drift towards a "one China, one Taiwan" policy. That's probably the single most important thing. China also would like to see the US and countries along China's periphery not so closely cooperating militarily.

But the point is, all of these things don't look very likely to happen any time soon. Xi has seen Putin more than any other major power leader, and the leaders of Japan, Philippines, and the United States just convened in Washington.

Could you share with us the state of China studies in the US now, and how the field has changed in the past few years? You have mentioned before that younger China watchers are being driven to employ different methodologies to understand the country. Are they relying less on first-hand interviews and field research now? I also learned from a previous interview of yours that you love to study China from the "inside out" – by talking to ordinary people, as well as leaders at various levels. Is that the case for the younger generation of China watchers as well?

I think many of today's younger China scholars would like to study China more from the inside out, but, frankly, that is becoming less possible. Consequently, China scholars must diversify their methods. Beginning in the late 1970s and the early 80s, China became increasingly open to foreign scholars coming and studying, not only in libraries, but also getting out in the field and talking to people that are not all central government people.

I think we learned a lot and this openness gave China more influence and made people more empathetic to China. We could understand some of the problems China had, and still has.

With the decline of strategic trust and all the talk about spies in both of our countries, it's become more difficult for foreign scholars, particularly Americans, to do field research in China. Archives like the foreign ministry archive are now not open to foreign scholars, but used to be.

When I was younger, I met most of China's presidents, chairmen, general secretaries, and premiers. Basically, we had great access. Now, young China scholars want to have that degree of access but they don't have it. And, I should also say, the US government is similarly restricting Chinese access to our officials for Chinese researchers. So, younger American scholars are relying more on documents, data sets, cyber and remote sensing tools, interviews in third locations, and they increasingly go to Taiwan for language study and research.

The more people experience China from the inside, the better our understanding will be. In the 1950s through the 60s and into the early 70s, most China scholars had to go to Taiwan or Hong Kong because those were the only places where they could even talk to Chinese refugees.

Well, you don't get a very good picture of a country by talking only to people who left; you also want to talk to people who stayed in [mainland] China. So, China's current policy is making it harder for outsiders to have an objective view of China.

China has been rivalling the US on different fronts, like tech, science, trade and arms development. How would you assess China's influence in terms of its hard power and soft power? What are its main strengths and weaknesses?

A country's hard power is very difficult to judge. Is it measured by how many nuclear bombs it possesses? If we have 1,400 nuclear warheads and China has 500, are we more than twice as powerful as China? If China has more troops than the US, is China more powerful than America?

For example, the US has lots of military power in the vicinity of Taiwan, but the US must project its power over vast distances, far from home. It has basing agreements with neighbours closer to China, but what kind of access may Washington have if conflict arises? So, even in the Taiwan Strait, it's not all totally clear who's stronger and who is weaker. Such uncertainties are the soil in which the odds of miscalculation grow.

On soft power – both sides are reducing direct access to each other's scholars – and media – as mentioned above, with the curtailment being much more severe on the Chinese side than with respect to efforts by Washington.

There still are around 300,000 Chinese students and scholars in the US while there are about 400 Americans studying and researching in China. Chinese language training is, to some extent, moving to Taiwan, though there still are important joint Sino-American programmes and institutions operating in China.

The US media doesn't have many people in China any more. Some are now reporting on [mainland] China from Taiwan.

I have always felt that a China that opens itself gains in power and influence. I hope both our countries will renew the science and technology umbrella agreement that Deng Xiaoping and president Jimmy Carter signed in 1979.

The US is in its election year, with some anticipating a Trump return. If Donald Trump actually makes it back to the White House, what impact do you think that will have on US-China relations, and what changes would he bring to Washington's China policy?

I believe that it is not possible to, at this moment, predict the outcome of the US general election in November 2024. I do believe that each side in the American contest for the presidency will react and speak with less moderation this year than in non-election years. It, therefore, is important that each side be especially watchful and prudent.

And then there is the fact that Trump, as a personality, brings a degree of unpredictability to decisions unseen in our history. Anybody who hopes for a Trump return must be ready to contemplate very dangerous instability in bilateral relations, not to mention broader American foreign policy.

There's a think tank in Washington called the Heritage Foundation that appears to be empowered by Trump to develop policies for the new administration if he wins. The Foundation has put out a long study (set of recommendations) for Trump to implement in a hypothetical Trump administration.

You don't need to speculate if he is planning to escalate the trade war with China – he's talked about raising tariffs across the board by a very high percentage if he is elected.

Also, I think trade conflict and less free trade will happen regardless of who gets elected here – the US is spending tens of billions of dollars to rapidly expand the capability of our silicon chip production to compete with China and its industrial policy subsidies. Likewise, China is deepening its industrial policy and the US is greatly accelerating its own industrial policies. This will continue whether you have Trump or [Joe] Biden.

Having said all this, to those who value a more pacific and constructive future, there are no certainties, but the prospects for improvement would be far greater under a second Biden administration. But, even that road will be bumpy, requiring the wisest and most diligent efforts of both nations.

Some US-China trade and military talks have been revived. Xi and Biden spoke on the phone earlier this month. To what extent do you think this can help to diminish the distrust between the two countries? What are their limitations? What could China and the US do to reduce distrust and, realistically speaking, which would be the easiest step to begin with?

I think it's almost always better to talk than not to talk, so I applaud our two presidents speaking to each other. While talk is good, it also is essential to address the sources of distrust. Enhancing confidence also requires concrete and constructive actions by both sides in important areas.

It's my sense that neither side is willing to address the most important concerns of the other. For instance, will the US be restrained in weapons transfers and foreign military sales and financing to Taipei? Will Washington suddenly start sending high-capacity chips to China? Is Beijing likely to say bye-bye to the "no limits" partnership with Russia, putting military pressure on Taiwan, and purchasing Iranian oil? I don't think so.

Operative guidance for the relationship for the next year should above all be the doctor's code – "First, do no harm".

Beyond that, I would like to see some modest steps such as opening our closed consulates in Houston and Chengdu, restarting the Fulbright Program, and signing a revived Science and Technology Cooperation Agreement for a full five-year term, not just another six-month extension. Forging more strategically ambitious cooperation, such as working to address the Gaza humanitarian fiasco in the United Nations, would be very helpful.

More and More Chinese Citizens Lose Trust in CCP Leadership

16 April 2024, Catalyst

A few years ago, in 2021, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) celebrated the centennial of its founding. It is the legacy of one of the most daunting world powers. While bursts of fireworks marked this celebration, a shadow of fear lingers over the people of China.

Today, China is ruled by an authoritarian government, and more and more citizens are losing faith in their leaders. The Party seeks to silence any dissidents, and it censors any information considered harmful to its endeavors. Despite this milieu, the people of China seem to be increasingly pro-democracy and anti-party despite the hazards of such convictions.

The CCP seeks to establish cultural and ideological control over the world's largest population. Anything resembling distrust or protest of the Party is quickly stamped out. Under the guise of COVID-19 safety precautions, the government banned public demonstrations in Hong Kong to commemorate the Tiananmen Square Massacre, according to historian Andy B. Liu. The Tiananmen incident, one of the most controversial events in modern Chinese history, was formerly openly commemorated in the city.

In spring 1989, demonstrators flooded Beijing's Tiananmen Square. They demanded democratic norms, calling out the injustices of media censorship, restrictions on freedom of assembly, and the stifling of other liberties. On June 4th, troops opened fire on the civilians. The death toll has always been a point of contention. Several hundred, possibly several thousand, lost their lives.

The very things the Tiananmen demonstrators protested were used to cover up the story: censorship and regulation of public assembly. Decades have passed, but the tactics remain unchanged. Citizens' motives to protest remain also.

In 2020, the people of Hong Kong came together for an annual pro-democracy rally, defying government regulations to not hold public gatherings exceeding 50 people. Beijing stepped in and arrested numerous demonstrators.

Taiwan, although de facto independent, shares significant cultural heritage with the mainland as well as current economic ties. Taiwan's trust in the CCP, however, is growing fairly slim. At a rally, Taiwanese President Tsai Ing-wen stated, "We don't want Hong Kong-style peace. We want dignified peace." Such sentiment echoes the region's general reaction to China's 2020 crackdown.

That year, the well-known Chinese real-estate developer Ren Zhiqiang, who criticized the Party and called Xi "a clown who had no clothes," was imprisoned for an 18-year sentence. It's dangerous to speak out against China's leaders, but citizens continue to do so. We just don't see too many of them for too long. Zhiqiang was an outlier in that he was widely heard before his arrest and disappearance from public view. Alluding to Vladimir Putin's public and ultimately lethal imprisonment of political rival, Aleksei A. Navalny, the New York Times columnist Li Yuan alleges there are thousands of similar cases in China hidden from public knowledge.

In 2022, demonstrators protesting COVID-19 local lockdown policies took to the streets of China's capital and other cities. They held blank sheets of paper, a metaphor for the country's widespread censorship and the near illegality of political protest. The gatherings quickly became focused on broader liberties, calling for the practice of democratic principles. Some protesters eventually called for the removal of President Xi. AP called the movement "the most direct challenge to the Communist Party's authority in decades."

Not only are inconvenient opinions in the public square discouraged, but what citizens communicate and consume via the media gets censored by the state or its affiliates. In China, the press is not just "the fourth estate" in name only. The media—what comes in and what goes out—is heavily filtered by the government.

Practically any media viewed by the Chinese public has been influenced by the Party. The Central Propaganda Department, an organization of the CCP, coordinates with its affiliates, to monitor all publicly available content.

The government forbids talking about the Tiananmen Square Massacre in the media or other forums, especially when it conflicts with the official story. For years, there's been a desire to use the Internet liberally, demonstrated by Chinese citizens having begun to find ways to work around the far-reaching censorship.

Over 500 critical documents divulging the procedures of Chinese state-affiliated tech company i-Soon were leaked to GitHub in March. These show an extensive hacking scheme of monitoring and "harassing dissidents who publicly criticize the Chinese government." Although the source of the leak is supposedly dissatisfied with i-Soon's policies, the unknown whistleblower could be an unhappy employee or someone upset with the way i-Soon's tech gets used.

The London-based Chinese journalist Xinran, who has devoted years to unearthing the hidden history of postwar China, says, "The surveillance of ordinary people is now commonplace. Xi's China has become like 1984."

From an outside perspective, the CCP's hold over Chinese citizens seems to be failing under the strain of its ever-tightening grip.

Xi Jinping's meeting with former Taiwanese president: Understanding Cross-strait dynamics

16 April 2024, First Post

China's President Xi Jinping met with Taiwan's visiting former President Ma Ying-jeou in Beijing on April 10, 2024. This is their second meeting after they met in Singapore in November 2015, when Ma was the President of Taiwan.

Wang Huning (the top-most politburo standing committee member in charge of the Taiwan issue), Cai Qi, and other senior officials attended the meeting.

From April 1 to 11, Ma was leading 20 young people from the Taiwan region to the Chinese mainland for talks. The meeting at the Great Hall of the People in Beijing was the first time that a Chinese leader has met a former president of Taiwan on Chinese soil. Ma is considered more friendly to China than the current Taiwanese president, Tsai Ing-wen.

This meeting is seen as an effort by China to influence Taiwan's politics. Ma visited Fujian, Xian, and other places. Last year, Ma visited China just before Taiwan went for presidential elections in January of this year but did not meet Xi.

Ma was Taiwan's president from 2008 to 2016. In May 2008, Ma declared "no unification, no independence, and no use of force" and subsequently broadened economic ties and signed accords on direct postal, shipping, and air links. In 2010, chairman of Beijing's Association for Relations Across the Taiwan Strait Chen Yunlin visited Taiwan, making him the highest-ranking Chinese official to visit Taiwan. Chen addressed Taiwan's president as "Mr Ma".

Ma also opened Taiwan for group tours from China. Initially capped at 300 visitors a day, the numbers quickly soared to 1.6 million mainlanders in 2011 (the total by 2011 was 7 million). This tourism led to $3 billion in Taiwan's economy, an amount equal to 0.72 per cent of the island's gross domestic product. Ma proposed in June 2010 an Economic Cooperation Framework Agreement (ECFA) with China—a sort of free trade area proposal. Ma also expressed his opinion about joining the proposed Trans Pacific Partnership (TPP), although China had not viewed this with enthusiasm. ECFA led to massive opposition in Taiwan, mainly led by the youth, who spearheaded the Sun Flower Movement by occupying the Premier and other offices in Taipei. Their main accusation was that the ECFA is detrimental to Taiwan's economy and that no oversight committee has been proposed for evaluating the ECFA.

In September 2010, Ma cobbled up confidence-building measures (CBMs) in the military field with China. In October 2011, Ma proposed a peace agreement with China through a referendum process. All of these pro-China measures by Ma endeared him to the Chinese leadership, even though they backfired with the Taiwanese citizens.

While not addressing the current Chinese intimidating military exercises near Taiwan, Xi stated in his meeting with Ma's entourage that "external interference cannot hold back the historical trend of national reunification."

Further, Xi said: "All Chinese on both sides of the Strait should firmly oppose any separatist moves of secessionists on the island and interference by external forces, firmly safeguard the common home of the Chinese nation, and work together to pursue a bright future for peaceful reunification. The future of the Chinese nation should be firmly held in the hands of the Chinese people."

Xi stressed in his speech that unification with Taiwan is part of the rejuvenation project. The speech is aimed at countering the United States, Japan, and other countries support for Taiwan as well as criticising the "independent" forces within Taiwan.

The current ruling Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) is seen as moving towards independence, even though in the DPP's two terms from 2000 to 2008 and 2016 until now, it has desisted declaring itself independent.

The DPP also rejected the '1992 consensus' between Kuomintang (KMT), of which Ma was the Chairman, and China's Communist Party (CCP). According to this, Taiwan and China belong to 'one China'. China has said acceptance of the consensus is a precondition for resuming public dialogue with Taiwan. This is not acceptable to the current ruling DPP in Taiwan.

The DPP says that while the KMT lost its war to the CCP in 1949, it fled to Taiwan and practiced authoritarian leadership until 1986. A decade later, the first elections in Taiwan threw an altogether different generation that stresses Taiwan identity. Indeed, according to a National Chengchi University Election Study Center survey conducted in 2023, only 1.2 per cent of Taiwanese support unification with China.

A Pew Research Centre poll released earlier this year found that 67 per cent identify as primarily Taiwanese, while 28 per cent consider themselves primarily Taiwanese and Chinese, and only 3 per cent consider themselves primarily Chinese.

Identity in Taiwan is tied to politics. Those who consider themselves primarily Taiwanese are most likely to align themselves with the ruling DPP. Ma is thus trying to enhance the segment that supports the unification process.

The visit of Ma at this juncture is interesting. First, Lai Ching-te, the current Vice President and President-elect in January this year, will be taking the oath of office in May, and hence the timing of Ma's visit to China is interesting. Lai's party, the DPP, has lost the majority in the Legislative Yuan by a thin margin, and Ma's KMT party could stall crucial legislation in the future.

Second, Japan's Prime Minister Kishida and Philippines President Ferdinand Marcos are in the United States meeting President Biden. They possibly discussed China's invasion scenarios of Taiwan, and possibly both will coordinate the security situation in the Taiwan Straits.

By meeting Ma at this juncture, Xi is also conveying a message of influencing cross-Strait dynamics. It is also interesting that the second Ma-Xi meeting comes on the 45th anniversary of the signing of the US Taiwan Relations Act into law, requiring Washington to take steps to help the island defend itself, including through arms sales, despite Beijing's vocal opposition.

Third, an official KMT delegation is due to visit China in June, even though specific dates are not notified. This suggests that the KMT itself is in a huddle, given the Taiwanese predicament on the unification issue.

Fourth, Xi addressing select Taiwanese youth is also intended to carry the CCP propaganda into Taiwan and build a pro-China constituency, even though Ma returned home without any assurances from Xi that intimidating military exercises would be discontinued. Prof. S. Kondapalli, the author is Professor in Chinese Studies at JNU. Views expressed in the above piece are personal and solely that of the author. They do not necessarily reflect Firstpost's views.

What Would Modi's Third Term Mean for India-China Relations?

15 April 2024, Geopolitical Monitor

India will hold its 18th general election on April 18, 2024, and Prime Minister Narendra Modi and his Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) are poised to win a third term. Similar to his first and second terms, a significant amount of historical and contemporary political and economic baggage will burden Modi's third term and his relations with China. While his anticipated election victory would likely result in the continuation of complex India-China issues and tensions from his previous years as prime minister, Modi appears to have a stable but delicate relationship with China to manage.

Competing perspectives of Modi

The vast majority of Chinese internet users have a positive view of India's leader, calling him 'Immortal Modi' or 'Modi Laoxian' ('不朽的莫迪'). Based on data from the popular microblogging platform Weibo (China's version of Twitter), which has more than 598 million active monthly users, many Chinese people also think that Modi is crucial to preserving the balance of power in the world.

Competing perspectives of Western-style liberal democracy and China's political model commonly, though unfairly and inaccurately, portray the former as the stable foundation of a well-functioning society, whereas the latter, marked by ardent nationalism and a supreme leader, is viewed as volatile. Weibo users' comments shed light on their perceptions of democracy as a fundamentally unstable political system beset by internal conflicts, corruption, and misrepresentation. Indeed, they frequently dismiss the concept of democracy as a whole process. Many Chinese people believe that larger nations, even ones that claim to be democratic, tend to adopt authoritarian characteristics.

Western media often express this erroneous belief when reporting on political developments in India. During Modi's tenure, debates about the essence of Indian democracy have shifted, which is consistent with Chinese perspectives on the democratic system in general but not on India's democratic system specifically. This lively but partisan debate, not confined to academia, centers on the purported new chapter in Indian history, where Modi's leadership has distanced the nation from the fundamental principles of democracy, minority rights, and executive accountability.

Nitasha Kaul, a well-known Modi critic, writes for the Australian Institute of International Affairs that 'the Modi myth proffers the idea of a paternal, ascetic, and efficient leader at the helm of a civilizational resurgence of India as a "Vishwa Guru" (world leader).' In 2021, Jostein Jakobsen and Kenneth Bo Nielsen of The Centre for Development and the Environment at the University of Oslo added India under Modi to their list of 'authoritarian, populist, and right-wing regimes.' In 2023, The Guardian published an article calling Modi's government 'autocratic' and 'illiberal.' Similarly, a Financial Times piece from the same year highlighted Modi's alleged 'authoritarian streak' as a major concern for the West.

However, China's recent mention of Modi contrasts sharply with the much-embellished portrayal of India during his tenure. On 2 January 2024, Zhang Jiadong, the director of the Centre for South Asian Studies at Fudan University in Shanghai, expressed his admiration for Modi, his economic and foreign policy, and his 'Bharat narrative'. Zhang claimed that India has become more proactive and self-assured on a national and international level. His remarks were published by the state-run newspaper Global Times. Coming from the Chinese government, these statements might seem unconventional, but when considering India's efforts to create a multi-aligned system in international affairs and the Western disapproval of India following the West's unsuccessful attempts to steer Modi towards Western alignment, they have geopolitical relevance, particularly regarding China's relationship with India under Modi.

Though he and his party greatly benefit India, Modi now poses a challenge to governments, intellectuals, and people of Western and Indian ancestry who support Congress. India has a strong governance framework, making it difficult for a single person or political party to attain widespread popularity. For the past nearly 23 years, he has served as Prime Minister of India and Gujarat State Chief Minister, owing to his and his party's perseverance and nationalist, India-focused agenda, not because he is a despot or authoritarian. People understand how regional and global environments are degrading and changing, as well as where India should rank as a developed country on the world map. They are electing him and his party to govern India (or Bharat). Furthermore, the Supreme Court, as the pinnacle body in India's robust judicial structure, keeps a watchful eye and is well-equipped to deal with any violations of democratic institutions by any person or entity.

The BJP/Modi government at the helm is now well-positioned to bolster India's economic standing without yielding to any internal or regional pressures. A landslide victory in the upcoming election may allow Modi and his right-wing nationalist government to reshape India into a Hindu nation, with the goal of amending the Constitution to dilute the problematic principles of secularism and socialism while curbing illegal immigration and ethnic separatism, as well as addressing the challenges posed by rising Islamism. In countering Islamism and terrorism in India, the emphasis is on confronting the activities of a subset of extremist Sunni Muslims. This group, while not substantially contributing to the broader Indian society, is increasingly mobilizing for communal interests, becoming susceptible to the influence of a transnational Islamist agenda and global caliphate bogey. Any potential Modi-led government plan will include a comprehensive approach to addressing the dangers posed by these dynamics while also ensuring national security and social harmony. These objectives broadly align with Beijing's policies in the context of Chinese society.

Tensions

Although most Chinese people have a positive perception of and interest in the Indian prime minister, the relationship between China and India has been tense for many years, creating an environment conducive to the emergence of new and escalating conflicts between the two countries.

Since his initial election in 2014, China has warmly welcomed Modi, and both parties are optimistic about a new era of India-China relations under the BJP. The first encounter between Chinese President Xi Jinping and Prime Minister Modi took place in Fortaleza, Brazil, ahead of the 6th BRICS Summit that same year. Xi conveyed to Modi that China and India are long-term strategic and collaborative allies rather than adversaries, underscoring their common goal of 'national rejuvenation' and asserting that cooperation is the most efficient way to achieve it. Despite their outward amicability, India and China continue to have geopolitical conflicts.

The India-China border dispute, which began in May 2020, has been a frequent topic of discussion between Xi and Modi. Furthermore, there have been ongoing clashes and instances of Chinese aggression along the 4,057 km Line of Actual Control (LAC), a notional boundary, particularly in the Ladakh region. China and India have had territorial disputes along their shared border since the countries' modern beginnings. Both nations engaged in a bloody conflict over this issue in 1962, but it was the only one. However, violent incidents have increased in recent years. Modi, in his third term, cannot ignore or avoid the negative consequences of the current situation for India-China relations. India and China's reluctance to withdraw along the LAC reflects their postures and aspirations on their respective home fronts, as well as on the international stage, where they both desire to expand their influence as emerging global powers.

The Tibet question

Given the intricacies of historical tensions and Chinese provocations, heightened by the Tibet 'issue', handling toxic border relations is bound to be tough. The Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso, who will be 88 in July, and, more importantly, the future Dalai Lama, are major issues in both India and China. India's stance on Tibet is mainly spiritual, with Tibet's geographical location leaving ample leeway for potentially significant political consequences. India has the largest number of Tibetan refugees, and the Dalai Lama issue will have an impact on the country. Given India's rebirth of Buddhism, the country's next and future prime ministers will take a more active position in any Buddhist-related matters, particularly those involving China.

India has yet to make significant use of the Tibet card in its political dealings with China; nevertheless, on March 9, 2024, Modi paid an official visit to Arunachal Pradesh, India's Tibet-border state, where he announced, among other efforts, the important Sela Tunnel Project. Beijing claims the state is part of its territory, Southern Tibet (藏南地区), and calls India's claims 'ridiculous.' For China, Tibet represents the 'three evils' of terrorism, separatism (or 'splittism'), and religious extremism. Under Xi, China is aggressively reinforcing its security in Tibet through increasing militarization, surveillance, and other actions. Both countries have dramatically increased Tibet's geopolitical, cultural, and ecological significance, making it crucial to both.

Cooperation and conflicting conditions

India and China are economically interdependent, and both are important components of a multipolar, multi-aligned world system. The border dispute is still a major worry, especially in light of the fact that both countries have lost soldiers in armed battles. Nonetheless, the prospect of cooperation holds significance, particularly considering the plethora of opportunities for relationship-building and pursuing shared interests. Climate change is one such common problem, necessitating collaboration to decarbonize energy systems and diversify energy sources, while others include addressing security problems in a rapidly changing global environment. At COP28, India and China failed to endorse a promise to triple renewable energy sources by 2030, despite a pledge to transition away from fossil fuels. This highlights the paradoxical nature of power rivalry in international relations and between the two most populous countries, led by Modi and Xi, respectively. One of Xi's biggest challenges is the continuing deflationary pressures caused by rising property prices and diminishing construction output. In contrast, if Modi wins, he will inherit a stable rupee and surging Indian markets. India and China have differing inflation rates, but India is in a favorable economic position, and Modi would inherit India's rising economy and foreign investment opportunities. Overall, India's economy is strong and steady. India's and China's economic positions can have an anchoring effect, limiting or increasing their political capacity and leaders' influence. Inflammatory or aggressive acts by Xi or Modi would have economic consequences for both, potentially causing additional political turbulence on their respective domestic fronts and increasing economic troubles in an already volatile global context. Neither leader will want this. India-China relations are unique in nature. And, while Modi and Xi have shown open political affection and promised to address common concerns, the two countries, each with over a billion people, are geopolitical rivals with the ability to influence global affairs in both positive and negative ways. As has been the case in recent years, India-China relations will continue to be stable yet sensitive despite their historical, contemporary, and probable future challenges.

We need a strategy, not retorts, to deal with China

14 April 2024, Deccan Herald

A spokesperson of China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Mao Ning, "noted" Prime Minister Narendra Modi's comments on India-China relations and said that "sound and stable China-India relations serve the common interests of both sides." His comments were in response to Modi's comment calling for the two countries to "urgently address the prolonged situation on our borders" because "Stable and peaceful relations between India and China are important for not just our two countries but the entire region and the world." The Chinese spokesperson's response conveniently sought to downplay the border issue, saying, "the boundary question does not represent the entirety of China-India relations." This while Beijing indulges in the shenanigan of giving Chinese names to nearly 30 places in Arunachal Pradesh in its continuing bid to claim the entire state as part of its part of its territory. China has eyed Arunachal Pradesh ever since Chairman Mao made his infamous assertion that Tibet was the right palm of China, and Ladakh, Nepal, Sikkim, Bhutan and the North-East Frontier Agency (NEFA), including Arunachal Pradesh, its five fingers. Killing thousands of Tibetans, Mao's Communist China annexed Tibet, giving credence to his agenda of 'reclaiming the Middle Kingdom.' Xi Jinping, who has broken with China's Deng Xiaoping line of leaders and returned to a Maoist idea of China, wants to 'rejuvenate' the country by regaining territories that it lost due to imperial intervention since 1840.

After taking over Tibet, during a mass meeting in Lhasa in July 1959, Chinese Lt-Gen Zhang Guohua had said: "The Bhutanese, Sikkimese and Ladakhis form a united family in Tibet. They have always been subject to Tibet and to the great motherland of China. They must once again be united and taught the Communist doctrine." Alarmed, Bhutan closed its border with China and shut off all trade and diplomatic contacts with Beijing (then Peking). It also established formal defence arrangements with India. It was the annexation of Tibet and Xinjiang province that brought China to the borders of India, Nepal, Bhutan, Afghanistan, Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan, Russia, and Mongolia. Besides being China's largest political unit in area, Xinjiang has linked China back to the ancient Silk Route, becoming a gateway for Xi Jinping's signature project, the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), and given China ownership over Kashgar, the junction of the Southern Xinjiang Railway Project, which is the gateway to Afghanistan, Iran, Central Asia and the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) ending at Gwadar in the Indian Ocean. The Doklam stand-off precipitated by the People's Liberation Army at the trijunction of India-Bhutan-China in 2017 was a clear indication of Xi's idea of 'rejuvenation'. Some have suggested that we fight China's bid to name-and-claim our territory by renaming Chinese towns with Indian names. That would be a juvenile reaction, to say the least, and a naïve way of dealing with China's long-term strategy. Delhi should revisit its 'One China' policy on Taiwan as well as step up support for the Free Tibet movement. We must declare Xinjiang a 'disputed territory' and demand that its majority Uighur population be allowed to determine its status free of Beijing's coercion and oppression. The West, meanwhile, should wash off the China gleam in its eyes, which continues to persist despite the heightening fear of China's aggressive turn, shed its double standards, and wake up to the realities of regional geopolitical dynamics. It is, after all, already reaping what it sowed in building up the Chinese economy. Does it want to burn its fingers anymore?

The key to dealing with China's revanchism and hegemonic ambitions is to put a brake on its economy. The West's mindless outsourcing of all manufacturing to China for decades allowed the latter to become the world's second-largest economy. Now, the West must put the genie back in the bottle. Irrespective of who wins the US presidential elections in November, Washington will have to further tighten the economic screws on Beijing. Europe, too, will have to do the same and step back from the unsustainable trade relations the countries of the European Union have developed with Beijing. European car-makers, for instance, will have to redraw their strategies and supply chains if they are to protect their industry, especially in the face of China's aggression in the electric vehicle markets. It is in these realities that India and the West must seek opportunities to together meet the China challenge. On the one hand, New Delhi will have to strengthen its own defence industrial capabilities and keep China at bay on its own. On the other, it has to step up the effort to pull western capital, technology and manufacturing to its soil.

China had a 'special place' in PM Modi's heart, now it's a thorn in his side

13 April 2024, The Economic Times

Narendra Modi once looked up to China. As a business-friendly Indian state leader, he traveled there repeatedly to attract investment and see how his country could learn from its neighbor's economic transformation. China, he said, has a "special place in my heart." Chinese officials cheered on his march to national power as that of "a political star."

But not long after Modi became prime minister in 2014, China made clear that the relationship would not be so easy. Just as he was celebrating his 63rd birthday by hosting China's leader, Xi Jinping – even sitting on a swing with him at a riverside park – hundreds of Chinese troops were intruding on India's territory in the Himalayas, igniting a weeklong standoff.

A decade later, ties between the world's two most populous nations are almost completely broken. Continued border incursions flared into a ferocious clash in 2020 that threatened to lead to all-out war. Modi, a strongman who controls every lever of power in India and has expanded its relations with many other countries, appears uncharacteristically powerless in the face of the rupture with China.

As Modi seeks a third term in an election that begins Friday, the tensions weigh heavily on the overarching narrative of his campaign: that he is making India a major global power and, by extension, restoring national pride. Far from the 2,100-mile border, along every avenue where India seeks to expand, China looms as a fierce competitor.

In India's own backyard in South Asia, China has used its vast resources – the fruits of economic reforms introduced decades before India's – to challenge Indian preeminence, courting partners through infrastructure deals and gaining access to strategic ports.

More broadly, China and India are vying to lead the developing nations of the so-called global south. When India hosted the Group of 20 summit last year, using it to showcase its support of poorer countries, Xi skipped the event. China has also been a major roadblock in India's campaign to gain a coveted permanent seat on the U.N. Security Council.

"Today, you encounter an India which perhaps you had never seen before, in many senses," said Nirupama Menon Rao, a former Indian ambassador to China and the United States. "I think the Chinese are increasingly aware of it, and they would still like to pull us down, to create barriers."

India's estrangement with China has provided an opening for Western nations to expand defense and economic ties with New Delhi, a distressing development for Beijing.

India signed a series of deals with the United States last year to strengthen military cooperation. India has also drawn closer to the other two members of the so-called Quad, Australia and Japan, as the group works to counter China's projection of power. In addition, India sees an opportunity as the United States and Europe look for alternatives to China as a place to make their products. One early success has been sharply increased production of iPhones in India.

But even with these openings, China continues to expose Indian insecurities. The Chinese economy is about five times the size of India's, and China remains India's second-biggest trade partner (after the United States), exporting about six times as much to India as it imports. China spends more than three times what India does on its military, giving its forces a significant advantage across land, sea and air.

The Indian military, which has long struggled to modernize, is now forced to be conflict-ready on two fronts, with China to India's east and archrival Pakistan to its west.

Tens of thousands of troops from both India and China remain on a war footing high in the Himalayas four years after the deadly skirmishes broke out in the disputed Eastern Ladakh region, where both countries have been building up their military presence. Nearly two dozen rounds of negotiations have failed to bring disengagement.

Although the political opposition has tried to paint Modi as weak in the face of Chinese encroachment, the border incursions are unlikely to hurt him much politically, given the lack of news coverage from a largely sympathetic Indian media.

Still, Modi has had to prioritize billions of dollars for border infrastructure and military upgrades as India still struggles to cover the basic needs of its 1.4 billion people. His government is drawing up plans to repopulate hundreds of border villages as a second line of defense against the constant threat of Chinese encroachment.

S. Jaishankar, Modi's external affairs minister, admitted recently that there were "no easy answers" to the dilemma posed by India's aggressive neighbor.

"They are changing, we are changing," Jaishankar said. "How do we find an equilibrium?"

In a book published in 2020, just as he had taken over as Modi's trusted foreign policy architect, Jaishankar wrote that the tensions between the United States and China set "the global backdrop" for India's choices in a "world of all against all." India's ambitions as a major power, he wrote, would require a juggling act: "engage America, manage China, cultivate Europe, reassure Russia."

India's rise as a large, growing economy has allowed it to hold its ground – working with any partner it can benefit from – in a polarized and uncertain world.

Even as India has expanded defense ties with the United States and doubled bilateral trade over the past decade, to about $130 billion in goods alone, it has resisted American pressure to reconsider its strong relations with Russia. India has deepened connections with Europe and the Middle East, too; trade with the United Arab Emirates alone has reached $85 billion.

While India remains wary of becoming a pawn in the West's fight with Beijing, and has not forgotten its frosty history with the United States, China has become an unavoidable focus after being a secondary threat for much of modern Indian history. India's socialist founding prime minister was accommodating of communist China, but the bonhomie was shattered by a monthlong war in 1962 that left thousands dead. The relationship began to normalize in the 1980s even as incursions continued, and open channels of communication kept tensions down and elevated trade.

"It was a different China," said Rao, the former top diplomat.

The situation changed in the years before Modi took office, she said. As its economy soared, China began flexing its muscles – investing heavily in its Belt and Road infrastructure initiative, which India saw as threatening its security and spheres of influence, and moving more aggressively on its borders and in the Indian Ocean.

Still, Modi, blacklisted by the United States when he was a state leader over his alleged role in religious riots, continued to extend a hand to Beijing. As prime minister, he did not allow the embarrassment of the Chinese incursion in 2014 to dampen his red-carpet welcome to Xi. His subtle message – a warning that "a little toothache can paralyze the entire body" – carried the hope that Xi would come around.

That hope ended with the deadly 2020 clash in Eastern Ladakh. Now, it is clear that New Delhi is resigned to a long-term threat from China, a shift evident in Modi's push for road and tunnel construction in border areas to support a large troop presence.

Over the past five years, more than 2,200 miles of roads have been built along the border. In the Kashmir region, over 2,000 workers have been busy for three years digging a high-altitude tunnel that will improve connectivity to Ladakh.

When the tunnel project, which will cost more than $850 million, is completed, it will ensure that traffic moves year round, and reduce travel time by hours.

"For four months, the supplies to the Indian army were cut off because the road would get closed," said Harpal Singh, the project head. "After this tunnel is complete, that will not happen again."

Modi's government is also trying to revive hundreds of villages along the border to fortify defenses.

Through a program called Vibrant Villages, the government is working to develop infrastructure, extend services and nurture tourism in the hope of reversing the economic migration that created "ghost villages."

"What India could have done in the last 20 years, they have to do now in two," said Sonam Murup, a retired Indian army officer from Ladakh, referring to infrastructure development in his area.

"Our situation is much better now," he said. "But when you look toward the Chinese side, you can see villages full of lights."

This article originally appeared in The New York Times.

India-China border dispute: Beyond the hype, the reality of the LAC

13 April 2024, Indian Express

Online strap: Talk of land loss in eastern Ladakh is gross exaggeration. Indian forces gave a fitting response to premeditated Chinese aggression in 2020. New government must continue to work on de-escalation

The clamour of considerable land being lost to China in eastern Ladakh is political hyperbole – an agenda-driven narrative to bolster electoral prospects on national security grounds. The issue was raised in August last year by Congress leader Rahul Gandhi but no studies or expertise are available to verify such claims.

Ladakh certainly has been and will continue to remain a serious flashpoint. There are no borders here except a 1,597 km-long Line of Actual Control (LAC), a notional demarcation separating India and China since 1962. Even the LAC is not well defined. Both countries have differing perceptions. The patrolling is done till 65 earmarked Patrol Points (PPs) stretching from Karakoram to Chumur. The recent dispute points occurred at PP9, 10, 11, 12, 12A and 13 in Depsang, PP14 in Galwan, PP15 and PP16 in Hot Springs/ Chang Chenmo, and PP17 and 17A in Gogra.

Chushul-Pangong Sector

In the Chushul-Pangong sector, the situation in the Sirijap range on the north bank of Pangong, where Finger series 1 to 8 jut out, is stable. In May 2020, the People's Liberation Army (PLA) entered the Finger 3-4 area to prevent Indian troops from patrolling. After the disengagement agreement in February 2021, the status quo prior to May 2020 is being restored.

Kailash Range

In the Kailash range, the PLA's provocative move in early September 2020 to capture Nyanlung Yokma/ Gongma or the Kailash Heights, at an altitude of 15,000 feet located between Pangong Tso and Spanggur Gap, was foiled by the Indian Army in a major pre-emptive strategic manoeuvring. Peace was restored after both sides agreed to disengage from north and south Pangong Tso in February 2021.

Chang Chenmo Valley

PLA's intrusions in Galwan Valley, Changlung Nalla, Hot Springs and Kongrung Nalla of Chang Chenmo Valley, where it had created area denial for Indian troops, are also relatively peaceful now. Both sides agreed to disengage in June 2020.

The situation in the Gogra-Hot Springs area remained volatile until September 8, 2022, when both sides agreed to disengage. There are no forward deployments in this area though a buffer zone is being created with new patrolling norms. All temporary structures have been dismantled. However, the situation in the PP15 area remains tense as China is still adamant about restoring the pre-April 2020 position.

Depsang and Demchok

Currently, only Depsang and Demchok remain points of friction, predating the 2020 stand-off. Since 2009, the PLA has frequently made offensive moves from Track Junction Nallah to the south at Burtse/Depsang Plains. In 2011, PLA built a 30 km road from Raki Nallah to cut into the Depsang Plains. In 2013, Burtse became a flashpoint when the PLA set up remote camps 18-19 km inside Indian Territory, preventing Indian patrolling from PP10, PP11, PP12 and PP13. The Shyam Saran Report of August 2013 made a chilling revelation of India having lost 640 sq km area due to "area denial" by the PLA.

Since 2019, the PLA has blocked the Bottleneck area, restricting India's patrolling limits to PP10 and PP11. The Chinese road construction along Jeevan Nallah towards the south, adjacent to our Murgo post, could potentially cut off the Indian supply line to the DBO at Murgo, like in the case of Galwan. Experts suggest that the Chinese are in control of 600-800 sq km of the southern half of Depsang Plains. The situation here remains complicated and deadlocked. Therefore, complete disengagement has been elusive.

In Demchok, the PLA has been violating LAC at Charding-Nilung Nallah (CNN) junction since 2018, obstructing Indian patrolling to that point. The dispute is stalemated.

As for Ladakhi Changpas losing grazing ground, their movements were restricted along the LAC because of heavy militarisation by the Chinese as well as Indian armies. India has shored up its defences, inducting several reinforcements, including artillery brigades, after the 2013 Depsang episode.

Infrastructure upgrades

One cannot overlook the fact that infrastructure in eastern Ladakh has been ramped up in recent years. Earlier, the Chinese bullied and coerced India because of the latter's lax attitude and grabbed a chunk of Ladakh territory between the 1960s and 1990s. The situation has changed now. India had stepped up construction activities under the UPA government but the projects were mired in corruption and scams. The BJP government has fast-tracked the connectivity projects, including the 260 km long Shyok-DBO road that was completed on a war footing. DBO can be reached from Dorbuk in eight hours now, which gives Indian troops a major advantage in the difficult terrain.

India's growing dominance in far-flung areas has been one of the key factors that forced the PLA to react differently, accusing India of transgressions on the LAC and provoking the Galwan stand-off in 2020.

Our aviation infrastructure has also been upgraded after reactivating all the abandoned Advanced Landing Grounds (ALGs) at DBO, Fukche, and Nyoma. The Nyoma ALG is being upgraded into a full-fledged airfield capable of operating cargo as well as fighter jets. This will boost the security of eastern Ladakh apart from the economic development of the Changthang region.

Fitting response to Chinese aggression

In all, one cannot deny that the Indian forces gave a fitting response to premeditated Chinese aggression and denied China a strategic victory in 2020. Beijing has been made to realise the cost of engaging in misadventures.

Certainly, the LAC situation remains in a stalemate, although the 21st round of Corps Commander-level meetings was held in February to reduce tension in the region.

The accusation of losing massive areas, therefore, is a gross exaggeration. Technically, there has been no intrusion on our side of the LAC. The discrepancies have occurred only in the grey-zone patrolling areas due to differences in LAC perception. Both sides should grasp fresh opportunities to revive the stalled process of clarifying the LAC after the new government is formed in New Delhi.

Ian Explains: Xi Jinping's nationalist agenda is rebuilding walls around China

12 April 2024, Gzeromedia

Youtube Link

It's been a rough few years for China's economy. Between harsh "Zero Covid" policies that shut China off from the rest of the world and major Communist Party crackdowns on private sector industries, the country is in desperate need of an economic jolt. So President Xi Jinping has been on an international charm offensive outside China, hoping to attract foreign investment. But if you look inside China, Xi's vision is one of extreme nationalist messaging and centralized control that's hurting his message abroad.

On Ian Explains, Ian Bremmer breaks down how Xi Jinping is turning China inwards at a time when it can't afford to close itself off. Since assuming the presidency in 2012, Xi has consolidated power within the Communist Party to become China's most dominant ruler since Chairman Mao Zedong. Under Xi's watch, China has rolled back democratic rights in Hong Kong, implemented crackdowns on the powerful tech, finance, and real estate sectors, restricted English in schools, and even expanded the definition of espionage so broadly that basic interactions with foreigners are viewed as suspect. President Xi's nationalist vision has become so dominant that it's written into the Constitution and official history of the People's Republic. But will that vision make China hostile to the very ideas that fueled its economic transformation in the first place?

The Hot Peace Between China and India

12 April 2024, The Diplomat

Karni Sena supporters shout slogans during a protest against China in Ahmedabad, India, June 24, 2020.

Credit: AP Photo/Ajit Solanki

Despite flashes of actual conflict along their border, and New Delhi's increased outreach to the West, relations between China and India have never completely broken down.

Relations between China and Japan have often been characterized as a "cold peace." As such, they have been stormy enough to create a massive rejection of China in Japan's public opinion, and a solidification of the Japan-U.S. alliance, which entered a new stage with Prime Minister Kishida Fumio's state visit to the United States this week. Yet, economic relations have always been strong, with a degree of dependence of Japanese firms on China, and a Chinese reliance on Japan's market as well.

Not so with India. Flashes of actual conflict have happened, none as protracted as the triple challenge from China over Ladakh, Sikkim, and, indirectly, Arunachal Pradesh, since 2020. Soldiers from both sides have died in combat. China has built a network of bunkers, tunnels and fortified villages. India has mobilized 100,000 soldiers close to the front line and worked on its own logistical infrastructure.

Even a visit by Prime Minister Narendra Modi to Arunachal Pradesh, a region that has been India's since the British drew up the McMahon line in 1914, is enough to incur the ire of the Chinese government. Beijing always reminds India that it claims the state as Chinese land, as successive governments in Beijing never accepted the 1914 delimitation.

Therefore, this is at best a hot peace. India's public opinion has gone the way of Japan's, and New Delhi has increasingly turned westward – toward the United States, France, and others such as Israel – to supplement its aging Russian armament connection.

Yet, relations between China and India have never completely broken down. Certainly, India has taken steps to limit the China risk in its infrastructure and society – banning China from ports and rail construction, prohibiting Chinese apps, keeping Chinese telecoms out of Indian procurement, and rebuffing plans for massive BYD and Great Wall Motors automobile investments. This does not apply, however, to the overall trade and investment relationship.

Bilateral trade passed $136 billion in the fiscal year ending on March 31, 2022, with a huge and rising deficit of $100 billion for India. In fact, Indian exports crashed while China's sales to India continued their rise. And certainly BYD is happy to sell on the Indian market the cars it cannot build locally. Indian officials claim to be open to Chinese investments, hinting in January 2024 at Davos that the openness may increase as the border becomes quiet.

The potential long-term gains for either China or India are not clear. China seems to take a line from the ancient fable where the fox, unable to reach attractive grapes, proclaimed that "they were too sour anyway." China's India experts and the Global Times, the mouthpiece for foreign consumption, proclaim that India is "a graveyard for investment" and hype the known complexity of doing business there.

Some non-Chinese analysts argue that China's belligerent behavior, on three border theaters, has pushed India to further embrace a quasi-alliance with the United States, and a very strong strategic partnership with France that implies less conditionality on weapon procurement. But this is a result that Xi Jinping's China has produced all over Asia. China does not seem to take actual notice of such developments as the Quad, AUKUS, a rising Japanese military budget, or the Indo-Pacific designs of Europeans that leave China aside.

Xi's China believes in the slow erosion of will in democracies, and that factor seems to weigh more than the present power balance. China's new defense budget increase of 7.2 percent is significant. While the real economy certainly is growing at less than 5 percent, with slow price deflation, it is a banner year for Chinese military procurement. Considering its 450 ships, with increased projection across the Indian Ocean, and a large base in Djibouti, China is becoming strategically pre-eminent against all except the United States Navy, and even there, it can hope to match it in the near future.

The situation on the border is maybe even more critical for India for several reasons. First, China's tactics of erosion, with fake withdrawals followed by consolidation, have created facts on the ground that will be hard to erase.

Second, it can be argued that for several years after March 2020, China had even more room to move forward. The imbalance of power between Chinese and Indian ground forces is even more flagrant than those of their navies. India's military, hampered by long and weak logistical lines, could have indeed been defeated even further. A humiliation of this magnitude would have been a catastrophe for a government that is dependent on popular votes, with an opposition ready to pounce. A patient player who calculates his risks, Xi Jinping did not push his advantage that far.

Slowly but surely, India is working to reduce its vulnerability behind the border. This is the basic argument behind its own armament drive, whether it is Made in India or procured from the West. Modi has also had to factor in the continuing dependence, even if dwindling, on Russian weapons and munitions.

All of the above has dictated India's diplomatic response and posture to the challenges from China, while paying some homage to India's history of neutralism. As India's Foreign Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar skillfully put it, his concept of "multi-alignment" reflects a desire to combine the benefits of Western support while remaining open to other partners – including Russia, and potentially with China should the opportunity for negotiations arise. The relationship with France, also preoccupied with "strategic autonomy" and seeking to be "a power for equilibrium," has been made easier by this thread that the two countries have in common.

Multi-alignment also preserves the chances for India to exercise influence over the so-called Global South. There is no shortage of countries, including India, that tend to view the Russian war on Ukraine as "a conflict among Europeans." But, conversely, there is not a long list of nations ready to side with India over China in a conflict over the Himalayas.

In fact, India hardly requests direct diplomatic support for its position over the border issue. Clearly, it wants to preserve at all costs its freedom of maneuver, and prefers to rely on concrete deals with suitable partners. Yet, on significant issues such as Gaza and the Red Sea, India has disengaged from vocal partners such as South Africa and made a notable contribution to restoring freedom of navigation. And it has most recently diminished its purchases of Russian oil, reportedly refusing to switch to payments in renminbi.

In a sign of its intensifying bid with Asian allies to collectively contain China's aggressive attitude, the Biden administration, apparently on its own initiative, has formally declared for the first time its recognition of Arunachal Pradesh as an Indian territory, and simultaneously its opposition to any unilateral move or incursion beyond the Line of Actual Control (LAC). Even prone to doubts on the longevity of such statements in a volatile American political climate, this is an achievement for India's diplomacy. Faced with a dire situation in the Himalayas, seeking support while maintaining the appearance of a balancing diplomacy on many issues, India is now pulling through these difficulties on the eve of a national election. Barring any strategic surprise from China, it should find itself stronger after this stage.

India's predicament of confrontation with China creates growing convergence with the European Union and its member states. Economic security issues, such as the diversification of supply chains or the risks of economic coercion, clearly bring Europe and India closer. Uncertainties regarding Xi Jinping's China, its use of military power, and the extent to which it will directly challenge the international security order are clearly shared concerns in Europe and India. How to turn this shared risk assessment into real opportunities – the untapped potential question – is a pressing issue for EU-India relations. This article was originally published as the introduction to China Trends 19, the quarterly publication of the Asia Program at Institut Montaigne. Institut Montaigne is a nonprofit, independent think tank based in Paris, France.

China's Cartographic Antics Signal the Logic of an Expanded Alliance With India

12 April 2024, NY Sun

Feature, for starters, what is happening along the borders of Arunachal Pradesh.

Communist China's recent renaming of 30 areas in India's Arunachal Pradesh is the latest example of its efforts to assert territorial claims by creating facts on the ground. This marks the third such move since 2017, with 11 areas having been renamed last year. India's foreign minister has described the Sino-Indian border, along which Arunachal Pradesh lies, as "very tense and dangerous." Washington, meanwhile, continues to court Beijing.

Its response to China's advances has also amounted to little more than diplomatic thoughts and prayers. The episode marks the latest example of the Biden Administration's flawed strategy of engaging China at the expense of America's strategic allies, like India, key to containing it. Then again, too, Washington's recent flurry of diplomatic overtures to Beijing, much like those prior, raises doubts as to whether containment is even the aim.

China refers to Arunachal Pradesh as "Zangnan" and insists it is part of Tibet. It insists, too, that the renaming by its Ministry of Civil Affairs is "a legitimate move and China's sovereign right" to safeguard against "place names in foreign languages that may harm China's territorial claims." Though outwardly farcical, Beijing's renaming tactic is part of a broader suite of greyzone warfare tactics it deploys against India and around the world.

Last year, it renamed eight Russian cities along its border with Russia. Along its 2,100-mile-long disputed border with India, known as the Line of Actual Control, Beijing has accelerated construction of military installations and villages since the 2020 clashes. The villages are akin to the artificial islands it has erected in the South China Sea. In Tibet, and to further fortify its claims, China has resettled about 250,000 Tibetans to the villages.

Some Tibetans serve as plain-clothes border patrols alongside Chinese security and military units. Unlike the Indian army, which usually conducts its patrols a few miles short of the actual control line, Chinese forces tend to patrol up to their claimed border and within Indian territory. So India last year lost access to 26 of its 65 patrolling points, effectively ceding territory to Beijing. Few beyond New Delhi appear to have noticed.

Some 200,000 Chinese troops are deployed at the border. China's presence also includes airbases, transport infrastructure, reinforced troop shelters, and weapons-storage facilities. India has responded in kind. Last month, it relocated 10,000 troops from its western border to its Chinese frontier in Uttarakhand and Himachal Pradesh, adding to the already 50,000-plus troops guarding the LAC. It has also increased its weapons imports.

Following last summer's meeting between President Biden and Prime Minister Modi it seemed that a growing share of India's weapons imports would come from America. Some have, yet not enough to suggest closer cooperation. The last substantive exchange between Messrs. Biden and Modi was at September's G-20 Summit. Meanwhile, Washington has berated New Delhi for ostensible rights violations and ties with Russia.

Russia is no chum, yet pressuring New Delhi to pivot from Moscow misunderstands its Atmanirbhar Bharat – self-reliance – doctrine. Caravans of American dignitaries to Beijing also do little to convince India of our diplomatic loyalties. As do Washington's overtures to Pakistan. This is worrying. First, the threat of renewed armed conflict along the Sino-Indian border cannot be discounted. Talks to cool tensions have largely failed.

After nearly five years of military build-up, with thousands of Chinese troops deployed in harsh conditions along the frontier, Mr. Xi also faces the challenge of solving the crisis without losing face. This makes negotiated settlement unlikely. Empty pronouncements of concern by Washington are also ineffective deterrents against Beijing's expansionist aims. If tensions rise, this could destabilize Asia in ways unmanageable by America.

The threats to our national security would be great. The second consideration ties closely to the first. India is a key ally in the effort not only to contain, but prevail over, China. Last month, its navy deployed eight submarines in the Indian Ocean in a show of force against Beijing, and as part of ongoing efforts to stymie China's aims of linking its holdings in the South China Sea with its African interests via the Indian Ocean.

There, as along the Sino-Indian border, Beijing fabricates false narratives to advance its territorial aims. India has proven willing, and increasingly able, to counter such efforts. Yet it cannot do so if it will be in a hot border war with Beijing. It also cannot do so alone. The logic is for Washington to grasp that India is a critical ally and pivot its foreign ties accordingly. A firm stance against China's cartographic antics would be a good start.

China-India-US power balance at stake in 2 elections

11 April 2024, Asia Times

Two elections this year may shift the triangular balance of power among China, India and the US. Indian prime minister Narendra Modi is expected to be returned to power after the Indian elections, which run from April 19 to June 1. Modi has woven a close relationship with Donald Trump, who is seeking re-election as US president in November.

Modi established a strong relationship with Trump during his first presidency. Both men have strong nationalistic credentials, possess larger-than-life personas and focus on immigration policies. If both Trump and Modi ascend to power, India-US ties are likely to be stronger than ever.

Meanwhile, the China-US relationship is not doing well. Trump's tariffs that continued throughout Biden's presidency may be ramped up if Trump returns to the White House. In an interview with Fox News' Sunday Morning Futures, Trump announced that if he is re-elected, tariffs on Chinese goods will exceed 60%.

But that's not all. Trump intends to reduce US dependency on the Chinese economy further by phasing out all essential Chinese imports within four years, banning US firms that outsource to China from obtaining federal contracts and preventing Chinese firms from owning key infrastructure in the energy, technology and agricultural sectors.

Moreover, since Trump had banned US firms from investing in Chinese companies that might compromise US security during his first presidency, it is likely that he would do the same during his second administration.

As the Chinese economy weakens and the youth unemployment rate remains high at 14.9%, China needs foreign funds to stimulate its ailing economy and increase exports. Unfortunately for Beijing, not only would Trump's agenda undermine China's economic recovery but US prohibitions of American tech firms from investing in China would also batter Beijing's ambitions of becoming a world leader in artificial intelligence by 2030.

Rise of India

Even though Trump intends to slap a baseline tariff of 10% on all imports, the high tariffs levied on Chinese imports present huge trading opportunities for India. As the US economy becomes increasingly disengaged from the Chinese economy, US firms will look to diversify their supply chains by sourcing goods elsewhere.

India is poised to be China's alternative for three reasons:

- One, India has a thriving manufacturing industry with government support.
- Two, there are many relatively youthful workers in the country who can support the industry.
- Three, the US sees India as less of a security risk than China.

Furthering ties with the US would be well received by Delhi given how Beijing's influence within south Asia has risen under the Belt and Road Initiative, China's scheme to create a global trade network.

The US has always been keen on nurturing India as a "counterbalance to China" and it seeks to contain China's influence through the security group the Quad, whose four members are the US, India, Japan and Australia.

The tariff problem

In January 2018 Trump began an unprecedented trade war against China by imposing a 25% tariff on Chinese imports. Beijing retaliated by imposing its own tariffs on US goods, and Sino-US ties spiralled downhill culminating in the 2019 recalls of Chinese giant pandas from the San Diego zoo in California (a hugely symbolic gesture by the Chinese government).

The tariffs, which tax Chinese imports, were supposed to protect American interests. But as the US economy relies heavily on Chinese imports, US consumers and firms have had to pay more for goods. By 2019, Trump's tariffs cost the US an estimated 300,000 jobs. The US economy shrank, and in 2020 the tariffs cost the US a whopping US$316 billion.

Beijing is worried about a second Trump administration. Since 2018, China has sought to minimize the impact of Trump's trade war by adopting a policy of self-reliance. This meant a reduction of China's imports of inputs of production into the high tech, electric and automotive industries. However, China's ability to minimize its dependence on the international community is highly limited. The Chinese leadership knows this, and pundits speculate that a main reason why Xi attended the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting in San Francisco was to repair ties with the West and attract much needed foreign investment into China.

The Taiwan problem

In 2012, Trump tweeted an iconic phrase from the Chinese classic Sun Tzu's Art of War: "The Supreme Art of war is to subdue the enemy without fighting." But if he had read the rest of Sun Tzu's work, he would be aware of the following: "When you surround an army, leave an outlet free. Do not press a desperate foe too hard."

Trump should realize that Washington's increased aggression towards China may only undermine Taiwan's security. For a while, Beijing's desire to unify with Taiwan was largely a nationalistic exercise aimed at legitimizing the "one China policy". But the need to acquire Taiwan has gone beyond historical fervor to economic desire, given the island state's advancement in semiconductor technology, and China's current economic woes.

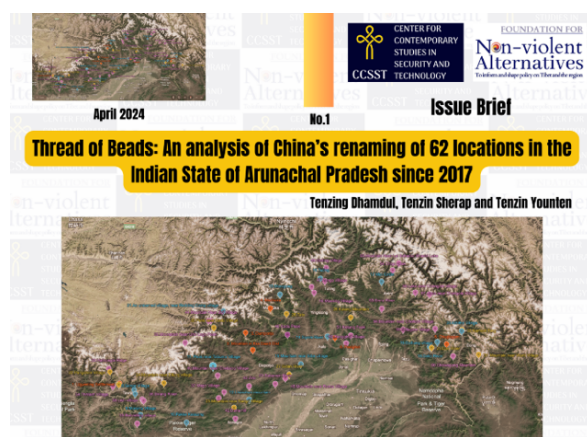

Artificial intelligence is important because it will confer major economic, technological, and military benefits to China. And if China wishes to be the world's AI leader by 2030, it needs to get its hands on semiconductor chips. If China can't access that through trade, it may acquire this technology forcefully by invading Taiwan.

Chee Meng Tan is an assistant professor of business economics at the University of Nottingham, Malaysia campus.

This article is republished from The Conversation under a Creative Commons license. Read the original article.

Thread of Beads: An analysis of China's renaming of 62 locations in the Indian State of Arunachal Pradesh since 2017

10 April 2024, FNVA

The issue brief delves into the contentious matter of China's renaming of 62 locations in Arunachal Pradesh, India, which has escalated tensions between the two countries. This renaming, culminating in the release of an official map of South Tibet (Zangnan) by the Chinese Ministry of Civil Affairs on March 30, 2024, marks the latest development in a series of exercises aimed at asserting Chinese influence in the region.

The document highlights the significance of this renaming exercise within the broader context of Indo-China relations, drawing parallels to China's strategic moves in the Indo-Pacific region, where it has established a "String of Pearls" to extend its influence. By standardising names and issuing official maps, China seeks to solidify its territorial claims and potentially pave the way for future administrative control.

Referred to as the 'Thread of Beads', this renaming strategy underscores China's systematic efforts to encroach upon Indian sovereignty and establish a foothold in Arunachal Pradesh. This has been accompanied by longstanding tensions, including the issuance of stapled visas to residents of Arunachal Pradesh by China, indicating a pattern of provocations and challenges to India's territorial integrity.

The brief outlines how China's actions have far-reaching implications for India's national security and its long-term development goals, particularly the vision for Viksit Bharat (2047). By propagating narratives about the alleged illegality of Indian occupation in South Tibet, Chinese media exacerbates tensions and increases the likelihood of confrontation in the region.

Drawing from open-source materials, including official communications from Beijing and trending Chinese articles, the brief provides insights into the motivations behind China's renaming endeavours. Satellite imagery and official Indian government data are used to analyse the impact of these exercises on the ground, highlighting trends and patterns across the four renaming exercises conducted by China. With the case study of Tibet and Bhutan carried in understanding how China carries out these exercises to eventually annex and even occupy sovereign territory.

In conclusion, the issue brief underscores the gravity of China's renaming efforts in Arunachal Pradesh and their broader implications for regional stability and India-China relations. It calls for a nuanced understanding of China's long-term strategic objectives and emphasizes the need for proactive measures to safeguard India's territorial integrity and national security interests.

Going Back in time: When China was clueless about McMahon Line

09 April 2024, First Post

You have probably never heard the name of Maj Gen Li Jue, a senior officer of the People's Liberation Army (PLA) posted in Tibet in the early 1950s. He was instrumental in what became the turning point of the Communists' occupation of the Tibetan plateau, i.e. the construction of the Sichuan-Tibet and the Qinghai-Tibet highways.

As the Commander of the First Army's General Logistics Department based in Lanzhou, Gen Li was responsible for what a few years ago, President Xi Jinping called: "A Miracle in Highway Construction." It allowed China to get its supplies from the mainland instead of from India (particularly the rice supply). The two roads built by Gen Li, under the 18th Army, were inaugurated on 24 December, 1954.

When the Dalai Lama came back from Beijing after a visit in 1954-55, Maj Gen Li Jue accompanied the Tibetan leader as Intelligence Chief.

A year later, Gen Li was again in Lhasa on the occasion of the establishment of the Preparatory Committee for the Tibet Autonomous Region; but instead of attending the functions presided over by Marshal Chen Yi, he suddenly left on an inspection tour of some areas north of the McMahon. China then knew little about Tibet's southern borders.

This was noticed by the Indian Consul General in Lhasa, PN Menon (incidentally father of the former NSA Shiv Shankar Menon), who wrote to Apa Pant, the Political Officer in Sikkim responsible for Tibet: "Li may well have been the high ranking Chinese military officer who carried out an inspection of the Tibet-Bhutan Frontier as mentioned by Chibber."

Maj SL Chhiber, then Indian Trade Agent in Gyantse, was keeping track of the important Chinese officials visiting Southern Tibet. The Indian officials in Tibet also knew that Gen Li had also visited other areas north of the McMahon line too.

Why is China raising the issue of 'Southern Tibet' now?

This came back to mind when I read that for the fourth time, China has 'renamed' places in Arunachal Pradesh. A few months back, China had changed the names of 11 places in Arunachal Pradesh. The first renamed place was then Pangchen, an important location near the McMahon Line, north of Tawang.

This time too, the first renamed place was Hathong-la, the plateau facing the Thagla ridge of 1962 war memory. Why Hathong-la? China is probably not too pleased with the many articles/programmes which recently appeared in the Indian media celebrating the 65th anniversary of the arrival of Dalai Lama in India near this very spot.

Among the other names changed is Mago, the constituency of Chief Minister Pema Khandu (he has just been reelected unopposed). Also to be noted rivers such as the Kameng and the Subansiri and several spots near the disputed Fish Tails in the east of the State, have been 'renamed'.

External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar rightly said: "If today I change the name of your house, will it become mine? Arunachal Pradesh was, is and will always be a state of India. Changing names does not have an effect."

The point remains that for years China did not even know about the McMahon Line.

Where is the border?

To understand China's poor knowledge of Tibet Southern borders, it is necessary to go back to the Bandung Conference in 1955. An apparently moderate Chinese Premier Zhou Enlai managed to convince a credulous Indian prime minister about the 'sincerity' of the new Chinese Communist rulers. Writing about his encounter with Zhou at the Conference, Nehru said: "When asked if he wanted to push communism into Tibet, Chou En-lai [Zhou Enlai] laughed and said that there could be no such question as Tibet was very far indeed from communism. It would be thoroughly impracticable to try to establish a communist regime in Tibet and the Chinese Government had no such wish."

A few days later, the Indian prime minister told his foreign secretary about a remark of the Chinese Premier on the McMahon Line: "Although [Zhou] thought that this line, established by British imperialists, was not fair, nevertheless, because it was an accomplished fact and because of the friendly relations which existed between China and the countries concerned, namely, India and Burma, the Chinese Government were of the opinion that they should give recognition to this McMahon Line."

Zhou knows nothing about the border

At the end of 1956, as India prepared to celebrate the 2,500th anniversary of the birth of Buddha, Communist China was extremely nervous; eastern Tibet was on fire with the Khampa rebellion, while central Tibet was slowly getting contaminated by the revolt. After months of prevarication, Beijing finally allowed the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama to visit India for the celebrations. A febrile Chinese Premier Zhou Enlai came to Delhi thrice to ensure that the Dalai Lama returned to Tibet.

During one of his encounters with Nehru, Zhou admitted that India knew more about Tibet's history than China. "For example, I knew nothing about McMahon Line until recently when we came to study the border problem after the liberation of China," he said.

Zhou added that though people like him never knew about the McMahon Line till recently, the Kuomintang regime had referred to it.

Zhou also spoke of a 'secret' pact between British India and Tibet at the time of the Simla conference in 1914 when the Tibetans sat on an equal footing with the Chinese and British India between October 1913 and July 1914.

Five years later, in April 1960, Zhou Enlai visited Delhi and had long talks with Nehru. He also had two informal encounters with Indian Defence Minister VK Krishna Menon, during which Zhou stated that China would never change its position in the Western Sector (Aksai Chin), but was open for the rest of the border. Zhou was testing the ground for a 'swap'. India would acknowledge Aksai Chin as Chinese and Beijing would recognise the North East Frontier Agency (today's Arunachal Pradesh) as Indian. China's position on NEFA was not rigid.

Another Chinese source

An unpublished Chinese document entitled "China's reaction to Indian occupation of the territory to the south of McMahon Line, 1952-54" mentions the situation on the borders soon after the arrival of the PLA on the plateau: "Undoubtedly, Indian occupation of the McMahon line [in February 1951] officially placed the McMahon line issue before the Chinese government. As the records point out, the key problem was that the Chinese government did not release any comment nor show any resistance."

This refers to the expedition of Maj Bob Khathing in Tawang in February 1951. While Lhasa informed Delhi about the Khathing expedition, Beijing was not. The Chinese paper comments further: "Although during this period, New Delhi agreed that China enjoyed suzerainty over Tibet, [at the same time] India treated Tawang as a local problem ...This kind of a puzzling silence from the side of the Chinese government could only be interpreted as China permitting India to expand its territories to the McMahon line. ...It was only in 1959, when India started to cross the McMahon line [in Khenzimane?] that China expressed its objection [for the first time]." In 1951, China had not protested simply because Beijing did not know about the McMahon Line. The paper then quotes Nehru, who 20 April, 1960, during a talk with Zhou Enlai, said, "We are pained that, if the Chinese government did not agree with us, they should have expressed their objections to us. They did not say anything for 9 years."

Today, Beijing says that the area belongs to them since immemorial times in which case why didn't China express some objection after India extended its administration upto the McMahon line?

The Chinese Paper answers: "According to Chinese sources, China had adopted a policy of temporarily overlooking some issues which they intended to solve later as just after the formation of new China, there were many things waiting to be done; China was resisting America and helping North Korea. China had to first take care of peace within the country and liberate Tibet. So they did not have time to spare for dealing with the border issues with India. They were not very alert about the Indian incursions ...India made full use of this opportunity and captured Tawang."

But the truth is that before the 1956 visit of Gen Li, China had very little knowledge about Tibet's border with India, though "they were consulting the local Tibetan government to get a clear idea about its border with India and the 1914 Simla pact [the McMahon Line]."

Today, Beijing says that the entire area has always been theirs.

However, the present claim on the state is clearly an afterthought. It should be treated as such and the Arunachal Pradesh chief minister is right in saying that his state only has a border with Tibet, with no one else.

Why we must take seriously China's mastery and misuse of AI espionage

09 April 2024, First Post

In William Gibson's science fiction novel Neuromancer, artificial intelligence is depicted as being used for espionage and to manipulate international relations. The novel revolves around a washed-up computer hacker hired by a mysterious employer to pull off the ultimate hack. In the process, he encounters AIs that manipulate individuals and events to serve their ends, subtly influencing global power structures.

While we haven't reached the dystopian future of AI depicted in 'Neuromancer', where artificial intelligence becomes a direct threat to human existence, the world is witnessing the early stages of AI's potential for harm. Countries have begun to harness AI for espionage, sowing discord in foreign nations and inciting political unrest. These actions mark the subtle beginnings of AI's potential to manipulate and destabilise international relations, and China is at the forefront of this. This week's Microsoft Threat Intelligence report starkly illustrates this trend. It details how China has been actively using AI-generated content to exacerbate divisions within the US, Asia Pacific region. (including Japan, Taiwan and South Korea), and even in India. With AI, disinformation can be more effectively tailored and disseminated to stir conflicts, influence public opinion, and even tamper with the democratic process.

As noted in the report, with upcoming elections in India, South Korea, and the United States, there is a significant concern that Chinese, and to some extent North Korean, cyber and influence operations will intensify. These actors will likely leverage AI capabilities to target the electoral processes, aiming to weaken trust in democratic institutions and influence election outcomes.

Chinese state-sponsored hackers increasingly employ sophisticated AI-powered tools to enhance their cyber espionage capabilities, targeting critical infrastructure, government agencies, and private companies. These advanced persistent threats (APTs) exploit vulnerabilities in networks and systems to gain unauthorised access, exfiltrate sensitive data, and potentially disrupt essential services. Moreover, China's cyber actors are adept at using AI algorithms to analyse vast amounts of stolen data, identify high-value targets, and craft highly personalised and convincing phishing attacks.

China-based espionage groups are intensifying geopolitical tensions in the South China Sea through sophisticated cyber espionage activities targeting strategic partners and rivals alike. These groups, identified by Microsoft Threat Intelligence as Gingham Typhoon, Flax Typhoon, Granite Typhoon, and Raspberry Typhoon, have been actively engaging in cyber operations that reflect China's broad strategic objectives in the region. Gingham Typhoon, in particular, has been the most active actor, targeting international organisations, government entities, and the IT sector across nearly every South Pacific Island country.

This includes complex phishing campaigns aimed at vocal critics of the Chinese government as well as diplomatic allies of China, highlighting the dual goals of extending global influence and gathering intelligence. The espionage efforts are not limited to political and military targets but also encompass economic partners, as seen in the large-scale targeting of multinational organisations in Papua New Guinea, a nation benefiting from China's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) projects.

Moreover, the focus of these espionage activities extends to entities related to the South China Sea, where China-based threat actors opportunistically compromised government and telecommunications victims within the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN). This targeting behaviour is particularly pronounced in the context of US military drills in the region, with Raspberry Typhoon successfully targeting military and executive entities in Indonesia and a Malaysian maritime system ahead of a multilateral naval exercise involving Indonesia, China, and the United States.

Similarly, Flax Typhoon targeted entities related to US-Philippines military exercises, while Granite Typhoon compromised telecommunication entities across Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Cambodia, and Taiwan.

Chinese espionage groups, such as Storm-0062 and Volt Typhoon, have notably escalated tensions in the United States through targeted cyber activities against military and critical infrastructure sectors. Storm-0062's focus on aerospace, defence, and natural resources, coupled with Volt Typhoon's infiltration of critical infrastructure networks, reflects a strategic effort to undermine US national security. These actions not only compromise the integrity of vital sectors but also raise alarm about the potential access these groups have to sensitive information, thereby stoking fears and mistrust within the US defence community and beyond.

In Taiwan, the influence operations led by Storm-1376, a Chinese Communist Party-linked actor, have injected additional strain into already tense cross-strait relations. By utilizing advanced AI to fabricate endorsements and spread disinformation during critical election periods, these actors have sought to manipulate public perception and political dynamics in Taiwan. The deployment of AI-generated content, including fake endorsements and misleading narratives, represents a sophisticated escalation in the tactics used to influence Taiwan's political landscape, exacerbating tensions between Taiwan and China.

Japan and South Korea have also been targets of Chinese influence operations, with Storm-1376 amplifying controversies and stoking discord within and between these nations. In Japan, the group spread fear and misinformation regarding the disposal of Fukushima's treated radioactive wastewater, challenging scientific assessments and sowing doubt about the safety and intentions behind the disposal. Similarly, in South Korea, the group capitalised on environmental and diplomatic concerns, using localised content to amplify protests and criticisms against the Japanese government. These actions not only exacerbate regional tensions but also aim to undermine trust in governmental and international regulatory bodies.

Moreover, the spread of conspiratorial narratives, such as the claim that the U.S. government used a "weather weapon" in Hawaii, alongside aggressive messaging campaigns in South Korea and misinformation surrounding the Kentucky train derailment, illustrates a broader strategy by Chinese espionage groups. By exploiting and amplifying regional and domestic issues, these groups aim to foster distrust, deepen societal divisions, and weaken the coherence and international standing of the United States, Taiwan, Japan, and South Korea. This multifaceted approach to stoking tensions reveals a complex and persistent threat that these nations must address collectively to safeguard their security and democratic processes.

To enhance the technical sophistication of India's response to AI-driven cyber espionage, NTRO could leverage state-of-the-art machine learning models and anomaly detection algorithms to improve threat detection capabilities. By adopting deep learning techniques, such as convolutional neural networks (CNNs) and recurrent neural networks (RNNs), for analysing network traffic and user behaviour, NTRO can identify subtle patterns indicative of malicious activities that traditional systems might overlook. These advanced models can be trained on vast datasets of cyber incidents to accurately predict and detect espionage activities. Furthermore, the integration of adversarial machine learning can help NTRO's systems to anticipate and counteract evasion tactics employed by AI-powered cyber threats.

DARPA's initiatives, like the CHASE program, utilise big data analytics and machine learning to automate the detection of cyber threats on a large scale. NTRO can adopt similar methodologies, employing scalable data processing platforms and real-time analytics to continuously monitor and analyse cyber threats. This approach would enable the rapid identification of anomalous behaviours and potential cyber espionage activities, facilitating preemptive actions against such threats.

To tackle AI-generated disinformation, techniques like digital watermarking and blockchain can be employed to authenticate content and trace its origin. Advanced AI detection tools, which analyse inconsistencies in image or audio files, can be used to spot and flag deepfakes and synthetic media. These tools often utilise feature extraction methods and classification algorithms to differentiate between genuine and manipulated content. Developing and implementing these AI-driven detection tools requires a collaborative effort between government agencies, academia, and the tech industry to continuously refine algorithms and adapt to evolving disinformation tactics.

To address the challenge of AI-generated content, platforms where such content is shared must take on greater responsibility and adopt more robust measures. This necessitates a multi-layered approach involving technical, regulatory, and collaborative strategies to ensure the integrity and trustworthiness of the information disseminated. Technically, platforms need to implement advanced detection systems that can identify AI-generated content with high accuracy.

These systems should leverage the latest advancements in machine learning, such as natural language processing (NLP) and image recognition algorithms, to analyse and detect patterns or anomalies characteristic of synthetic media. For instance, employing deep learning techniques like Generative Adversarial Networks (GANs) can help discern between real and AI-generated images or videos by detecting subtle discrepancies that are typically invisible to the human eye. Regulations should make platforms more responsible for the content being disseminated. Further, there is a need for more collaboration between academia, platforms and government technical intelligence agencies to deal with AI-generated content.

Ironically, one should invoke Sun Tzu's The Art of War here. "Know the enemy and know yourself, and you can fight a hundred battles without disaster," Sun Tzu wrote, signifying the importance of understanding both the capabilities of AI and the tactics of adversaries like China. To combat AI-induced espionage and division, nations must embody Sun Tzu's principles by developing a deep knowledge of AI's potential for both creation and deception, ensuring preparedness for any cyber threats. Similar to Sun Tzu's emphasis on planning and adaptation, strategic foresight must guide the defence against these cyber incursions.

The author (X: @adityasinha004) is Officer on Special Duty, Research, Economic Advisory Council to the Prime Minister of India. Views expressed in the above piece are personal and solely that of the author. They do not necessarily reflect Firstpost's views.

The Emerging Great Game Chinese, Indian and American Engagement in South Asia

08 April 2024, Stimson

When it comes to great power competition, Nepal and Bangladesh are often overlooked. This paper dives in and asks three questions: What are the emerging forms of great power competition in the region? Is there evidence that the great powers are responding to each other's actions in the region, or is one power leading while the others play catch up? How are the targeted states responding to this outreach? Using both English and Chinese open-source information and in-depth interviews with academics, journalists, think tank experts, and government and embassy officials, this paper argues that states like Nepal and Bangladesh are also strategic players that are navigating Chinese, American, and Indian interests in South Asia.

Executive Summary

In 2023, the Nepalese city of Pokhara found itself at the center of the emerging great power competition between China, India, and the United States. In June, the Chinese ambassador to Nepal, Chen Song, called the new Chinese-constructed airport in Pokhara a "new chapter" in Belt and Road cooperation. The only problem with this statement was that the Nepalese government did not consider the airport part of the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI).<sup>1</sup> Speaking before the House of Representatives, Nepal's Foreign Minister NP Saud stated, "Not a single project in Nepal under the BRI has been executed."<sup>2</sup> This anecdote speaks to some of the confusion and competition surrounding Beijing's expanding presence in South Asia, which aligns with its reenergized "peripheral diplomacy" that President Xi Jinping has reportedly elevated to a status above ties with great powers like the United States.<sup>3</sup> Thus, China has been trying to ramp up its economic, diplomatic, and security influence in a region that has not been at the forefront of its outreach over the past several decades. This engagement is also driven to an extent by China's rivalry with India.<sup>4</sup>

China's increasing foothold in the infrastructure, energy, and trade flows of the subcontinent and its involvement in domestic politics of the region is causing unease in New Delhi and, to a lesser extent, in Washington. For New Delhi, the structural shift in the power dynamics in South Asia driven by China's increasing presence and influence in the region and more recently, violence along its disputed border with Beijing, have heightened concerns of Chinese encirclement. From Washington's perspective, South Asia is not the primary or even secondary zone of competition in the U.S.-Sino rivalry. However, countering Beijing's influence and assisting New Delhi in providing alternatives to China is ultimately part of Washington's National Security Strategy of "outcompeting China,<sup>5</sup>" and is congruent with its Indo-Pacific Strategy.

Focusing on events since the official inauguration of the BRI in 2013, this paper examines how China, the United States, and India are competing for hard power in the political, economic, and security realms. Specifically, it focuses on events since the official inauguration of the BRI in 2013. Importantly, the author takes into account the evolution of the BRI and analyzes what has been termed as the "BRI 2.0."<sup>6</sup> This research focuses on the less scrutinized cases of Nepal and Bangladesh, with references to other South Asian states, and is driven by three questions: What are the emerging forms of great power competition in the region? Is there evidence that the great powers are responding to each other's actions in the region, or is one power leading while the others play catch up? How are the targeted states responding to this outreach? The author relies on three main approaches to investigate these questions and analyze whether targeted states are extracting benefits from all powers playing against each other or developing effective strategies to pursue their interests. First, is utilizing open-source information in English, such as publicly available data and scholarly and think tank publications.

Second, the analysis is reinforced by the author's in-depth interviews with academics, journalists, think tank experts, as well as government and embassy officials, conducted in Nepal, Bangladesh, and Washington D.C. in May and June of 2022, and in New Delhi in May and November of 2023. The third and final approach includes a detailed examination of open-source Chinese-language sources.

This paper puts forth several key arguments regarding Chinese, Indian, and American engagement and balance of power dynamics in South Asia. First, Beijing's activities in the region are causing a new form of great power competition between China and India, but also increasingly between the United States and China, even though Washington is primarily a peripheral power in the region. The U.S.-India relationship is also experiencing some tension as both try to navigate their own cooperation in the region. Second, regional states see the competition as an opportunity for economic development as well as a way to reduce an overreliance on India. The elites, in particular, view it as a vehicle to advance their own interests. Third, there are significant limitations for targeted states to fully realize their potential to benefit from this competition. Finally, Beijing appears to be overemphasizing the role and importance of local elites. When these elites lose power, Beijing is left scrambling to play catch up. This study begins with the case of Nepal and then goes over the case of Bangladesh. It ends with policy recommendations for the United States, India, and targeted regional states on how to better maneuver in this evolving competition. This is especially relevant as both the United States and India will undergo elections in 2024.

The Case of Nepal

In recent times, Nepal has experienced significant political upheaval due to its near-constant leadership transitions, with 13 governments in the last 16 years.<sup>7</sup> While India is concerned about Chinese ambitions in Nepal and is working to counter Chinese influence, China frequently hedges its bets on certain elites whose time in power is ephemeral. More recently, Washington has significantly expanded its influence by increasing its foreign assistance in the country. For example, according to the U.S. government, during 2018-2022, Washington provided Nepal with, on average, $159,844,274 per year in foreign assistance. This amount skyrocketed to at least $618,626,906 in 2023.<sup>8</sup>

The dominant perspective in Nepal is that it has spent much of the past 75 years under different forms of Indian hegemony.<sup>9</sup> This has taken many forms, ranging from Nehru's insistence that India's security interests triumph over Nepal's<sup>10</sup> to three de-facto Indian economic blockades of Nepal in 1962, 1988, and 2015.<sup>11</sup> The most recent blockade arose out of a dispute over a new Nepalese constitution. New Delhi responded by sealing off the border with Nepal in 2015, which caused acute shortages of goods and fuel in Nepal.<sup>12</sup> The economic blockade had a profound effect on Nepalis, who were still reeling from a massive earthquake in April that same year.<sup>13</sup> Importantly, this blockade took place under a different geostrategic context, with China actively courting Nepal's leadership and playing the crucial role of an alternative to India.

Analysts see the blockade as a turning point in Nepal's relations with India, which catalyzed Nepal's engagement with China.<sup>14</sup> Beijing's role as a counter to New Delhi is still in its early stages, but various actions from the Chinese government have elicited responses from both New Delhi and, more recently, Washington. On the issue of Tibet, for decades, Beijing has been concerned about unsubstantiated allegations of Nepal being used by the U.S. as a base to foment instability in Tibet.<sup>15</sup> In fact, in the most recent meeting between Xi and Nepalese Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal in September 2023, Nepal did not agree to sign an extradition treaty with China that would force Nepal to turn over Tibetan refugees residing in Nepal.<sup>16</sup>

A RAIL LINK TO CHINA?

Beijing's response to India's 2015 de-facto blockade was a critical juncture in their evolving great power rivalry in Nepal. In September 2015, just as the blockade was gaining traction, China, in a symbolic gesture, signed a protocol providing Nepal access to ports along its east coast, giving Sino-Nepalese relations a huge boost.<sup>17</sup> Former Nepalese Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli visited China in 2016 and announced that a cross-border railway project would start "as soon as possible," and in May 2017, Nepal joined the BRI.<sup>18</sup> Xi's 2019 visit to Nepal also raised hopes of greater connectivity between China and Nepal. Xi stated that Nepal would be transformed from "a landlocked country to a land-linked country."<sup>19</sup> In March 2022, China's foreign minister signed an agreement on a railway technical study with Nepal's Ministry of Finance.<sup>20</sup> More recently, Beijing has provided a grant of $300 million for a feasibility study, although the projected cost of a rail line is now estimated to have increased from $3 billion to $8 billion.<sup>21</sup>

The proposed railway link from Tibet to Nepal has raised concerns in India about China encroaching into India's sphere of influence. Critically, while constituencies in the Nepalese government want China to build a railway, there is near universal agreement within Nepal's policy and scholarly communities that the railway project will never happen.<sup>22</sup> The technical aspects are huge—the 121-kilometer link from Gyirong to Kathmandu would require 80 kilometers of bridges and 10 kilometers of tunnels in a geographic zone that is highly susceptible to seismic activity, making it an engineering nightmare that is not economically viable. The issue of who would fund the proposed railway is also controversial. According to Nepalese policy experts, Kathmandu wants the project funded through Chinese grants. One of Nepal's most respected China analysts stated: "Nepal is looking for a free railway... and this puts China in an uncomfortable position"<sup>23</sup> While Nepal has signed up for the BRI and the two countries have held various meetings on the initiative, as of January 2024, out of nine BRI projects not a single one had been implemented because Nepal wants grants and not loans, and Kathmandu has different expectations from the relationship than China.<sup>24</sup> Furthermore, despite Chinese talk of allowing Nepal to access Chinese ports, seven years after this offer was made, not a single shipment to Nepal has transited Chinese ports.<sup>25</sup>

Beijing also seeks to forge strong ties with elites in Nepal and has not paid adequate attention to grassroots movements and civil society, leading some Chinese analysts to argue that China needs to learn from the U.S. by paying attention to nongovernmental and community organizations.<sup>26</sup> Such investment in elites is very helpful when one's ally is in power, but it also means that China has had to hit reset multiple times when one of its preferred leaders loses power through the democratic process. Such a situation occurred in 2021 when Oli was removed from power.<sup>27</sup> Oli was widely seen as anti-India and pro-China. His replacement, Sher Bahadur Deuba, was viewed as much more pro-U.S. and India. According to a western diplomat based in Kathmandu, under Oli, "the USA was stiff-armed and Nepal fell to China. Nepal was a pro-China puppet in its voting at the UN. After the new government was formed in July 2021, Nepal went from a puppet to an irritant in China's belly."<sup>28</sup> It is important to note that the December 2022 election of Dahal may change the strategic dynamic once again in Nepal. While Beijing appeared to be happy that he won the election,<sup>29</sup> the events of 2023 were not exactly a clear victory for Beijing.

The BRI is widely perceived to be Xi's signature foreign policy initiative/legacy, thus a lack of progress on it in Nepal is a political embarrassment. The Chinese government has pressured every Nepalese delegation that visits China to show progress on the BRI, and the Chinese embassy in Kathmandu has pushed Nepali leaders to do the same. However, no progress has been made on any projects.<sup>30</sup> In a public embarrassment to Beijing, China falsely claimed that the newly completed Pokhara international airport was the BRI's flagship project in Nepal. In fact, Nepal has rejected this claim, partly due to pressure from New Delhi. Furthermore, the Indian government has also blocked international flights from India to the airport.<sup>31</sup> After Dahal's visit to China in September 2023, Nepali officials released a 40-point briefing, which did not mention the BRI. Of equal importance, two of the BRI's nine supposed projects in Nepal, the Tamor Hydroelectricity Project and the Phukot Karnali Hydroelectric Project, were awarded to Indian companies when Dahal visited India in June 2023.<sup>32</sup>

DELHI'S RESPONSE TO BEIJING

There is a widespread perception among Nepal's policy community that India is a domineering neighbor. However, China's increasing activities in Nepal may change that in the near future because of New Delhi's fear of Kathmandu becoming too pro-Beijing. India does not have the financial ability to compete with China in Nepal, but it does have critical geographic leverage to influence Nepal in a way that China lacks. Any meaningful connectivity between China and Nepal must traverse the world's highest mountain range, the Himalayas. In the indefinite future, China is not a realistic alternative for Nepalese imports and exports. India assists Nepal in the running of the 25-kilometer Janakpur to Jainagar rail line on the Indian border, and once news broke about the possible Chinese rail line to Tibet, New Delhi proposed a line to Kathmandu through the flat lands and not the mountains, which would be much easier to construct.<sup>33</sup> Ironically, by upgrading Chinese-built electrical lines that transmit excess power to India, New Delhi is also benefiting from Chinese projects in Nepal.<sup>34</sup>

ENTER WASHINGTON

Nepal is far from occupying center stage in U.S. foreign policy. However, given its geographic location, over the past 70 years it has played a small, but important role in American policy toward China. While Washington utilized Nepal's location during the Cold War, more recently Nepal has become a regional player in the emerging triangular rivalry among China, India and the U.S. The American Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) provided a USD 500 million grant program that is designed to build and reinforce Nepalese infrastructure by helping to maintain roads, provide electricity, and increase economic development.<sup>35</sup> It was signed in 2017 but only ratified in February 2022 due to some local opposition.<sup>36</sup> While the MCC is designed to help Nepal develop, it has been perceived by Beijing as an anti-China initiative. One Chinese commentator stated that the MCC is an attempt by Washington to "kidnap Nepal,"<sup>37</sup> while others believe it is an example of American hegemony in South Asia.<sup>38</sup>

There is wide agreement in the Chinese South Asian expert community that the MCC is part of the Indo-Pacific strategy and that Nepal was coerced into joining it.<sup>39</sup> On the other hand, there is widespread belief in the Nepalese policy and the western diplomatic communities that China was behind a strong and successful propaganda campaign to discredit the MCC. One western diplomat noted: "from 2017-2018, China was winning the info-war, the U.S was not aggressive enough in this forum."<sup>40</sup> However, the biggest policy takeaway from the MCC debate is that it was finally ratified because of the change in leadership in Kathmandu as the previous government under Oli was not willing to approve it. The key lesson from the MCC is that given its geographic location, Nepal has options when it comes to dealing with its neighbors and the U.S. With Washington closing the development assistance gap with China (the U.S. International Development Finance Corporation financing of private sector projects has increased in recent years by 15-fold<sup>41</sup>) there will likely be more projects available to Nepal.

IS NEPAL PLAYING THE GAME?

Overall, it is critical to note that from Kathmandu's perspective, China represents a great opportunity. The main policy challenge for Nepal is a critical lack of state capacity and knowledge of China that would allow Nepal to better leverage its ties with its northern neighbor. Multiple Nepalese interviewees argued that Nepal lacks the ability to deal with China. According to several of Nepal's leading China specialists, there is not a single Mandarin speaker in the entire Nepalese government, nor is there "any interest in the diplomatic corps to study China."<sup>42</sup> Another analyst pointed out that "Nepal does not even have the ability to play the China card." Nepalese journalist Amish Raj Mulmi, one of Nepal's top China experts, sums up Nepal's China challenge as follows: "While Beijing has secured its interests in Nepal, Kathmandu has failed to see beyond the 'China Card.' It has not improved its capacity to negotiate better deals. Above all, Nepal has not been able to extricate itself from the aid-beneficiary mentality and come up with a strategy that can take advantage of China's economic and infrastructural progress on its own terms."<sup>43</sup>

How much leverage does Nepal have over the great powers? China is deeply concerned with Tibetan refugees in Nepal, and Beijing has expressed concern about how Kathmandu has dealt with them.<sup>44</sup> Some Chinese commentators have argued that Nepalese politicians are "playing with fire" by "handing over their country to the U.S.," thus apparently jeopardizing the "peace and stability of the region."<sup>45</sup> Interviews revealed that the Nepalese government has not effectively used its potential leverage to play China against the other powers or, more importantly, to use Beijing's concerns as additional leverage to push forward various Nepalese goals. The cozying up to Beijing in 2015 has not produced a firm commitment to build a rail line to Tibet. With the constant changes of government and with new leaders vacillating between New Delhi and Beijing, it is extremely difficult for Kathmandu to effectively develop and operationalize a clear and sustained policy response to any of the three great powers. Nepalese leaders are clearly aware of Indian hegemony in Nepal, but the constant game of musical chairs in leadership positions in Nepal greatly reduces room for maneuver and the ability to play powers off each other.

The prospects of Nepal taking a "non-aligned" approach to great power competition are tempting, however changes of leadership occur too frequently for any real policy to be successfully carried out and institutionalized. Kathmandu's ability to pursue a non-aligned approach would likely be challenged both by India, which has historically exercised a form of hegemony over Nepal, and increasingly by China. Remarking on Chinese interference in Nepal's internal affairs, Tien-Sze Fang of Taiwan's National Tsing Hua University, writing in a Chinese-language publication, stated that "Hou Yanqi, Chinese Ambassador to Nepal, often uses her online beauty image to create a friendly atmosphere through social media. However, she also actively intervened in the political disputes within the Nepal Communist Party in an attempt to mediate conflicts and ensure that the pro-China government can remain in power."<sup>46</sup> While the Chinese attempt failed, it is likely that neither of Nepal's enormous neighbors would sit by passively as Kathmandu took a clear and sustained neutral stance.

The Case of Bangladesh

Over the past decade, Bangladesh has found itself an increasingly important actor in the evolving great power rivalry between China and India. Both Beijing and New Delhi have pledged billions of dollars in aid and loans to Dhaka, much of which is focused on developing infrastructure in Bangladesh. And the state is well-placed to take advantage of great power competition to diversify its options for economic investment and infrastructure development.

For Bangladesh, which is almost entirely surrounded by India, the ability to have an alternative to New Delhi as a source of development and military aid is not only good politics, but also essential for the country's future.<sup>47</sup> As is the case in Nepal, citizens in Bangladesh harbor a deep sense of resentment toward what they perceive as Indian bullying. While India played the critical role in the formation of Bangladesh in 1971, and relations have been relatively positive over the past decade, lingering tension remains. For example, hundreds of Bangladeshis are killed each year by India border patrols, which contributes to a general sense of resentment of India in Bangladesh.

Anu Anwar, a fellow at the Fairbank Center at Harvard University, sums up the negative feelings by stating, "Bangladesh often feels threatened by India, while China takes care to respect Bangladeshi sensitivities."<sup>48</sup> The bombshell comment made by Amit Shah, then the President of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) (and now the Indian Minister of Home Affairs), calling Bangladeshi migrants in India "termites" was a public relations disaster.<sup>49</sup> The Citizenship Amendment Act of 2019, which made it possible for non-Muslim refugees from Bangladesh, Pakistan, and Afghanistan to become Indian citizens, was similarly viewed as discriminatory against Muslims.<sup>50</sup> In the words of a former Indian Ambassador, this comment was "deeply offensive" to Bangladesh, and while it suited Prime Minister Narendra Modi's domestic agenda, it damaged India's reputation in the region.<sup>51</sup> Besides the occasional friction between New Delhi and Dhaka, Bangladesh is of much greater strategic importance to India than it is to Beijing or Washington. Events in Bangladesh, such as infrastructure projects or water security issues, have a direct impact on India, but little impact on Beijing or Washington although interest is growing in both capitals.

DHAKA'S DESIRE FOR BALANCE

A good starting point to examine great power competition in Bangladesh is 2016, when Dhaka signed onto the BRI. Of greater importance, Xi visited the country and signed 27 agreements worth $24 billion, bringing the total amount of Chinese investment in the country to $38 billion, a sum that is equivalent to roughly 10 percent of Bangladesh's annual GDP.<sup>52</sup> Furthermore, China is the only country that Bangladesh has a defense cooperation agreement with, and Beijing is also Dhaka's largest supplier of arms.<sup>53</sup> In fact, according to the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute, from 2018-2022, the last year data is available, China provided Bangladesh with 73 percent of the value of their arms imports.<sup>54</sup>

As will be discussed below, many of these proposed Chinese projects have not materialized, but New Delhi did respond directly to China's $24 billion financial package to Dhaka. India provided a $5 billion line of credit to Bangladesh in 2017, the largest ever credit line offered by India to any country. The credit was designed to "wean away Dhaka from China" and is allocated towards the construction of infrastructure projects.<sup>55</sup> Interestingly, concerns over Dhaka's embrace of Beijing caused New Delhi to solve its territorial dispute with Dhaka in 2015 when 162 pieces of land were exchanged on both sides of the border.<sup>56</sup> Overall, India has provided nearly $8 billion in lines of credit to Bangladesh. While much of this is tied to improving connectivity between India and Bangladesh, C. Raja Mohan, a senior fellow at the Asia Society Policy Institute in New Delhi, argues that the Modi government feels that India “needs to do something” about the geopolitical competition with Beijing.<sup>57</sup>

Great power competition also manifested itself in the proposed Chinese port deal at Sonadia, where China had been lobbying Bangladesh for decades to construct a port. In 2016, India, Japan, and the United States put pressure on Dhaka to cancel the Chinese project and in its place a Japanese port project in Matarbari, which is close to Sonadia, was announced.<sup>58</sup> The apparent reason for cancellation was lobbying by the United States, India and Japan, who were concerned that the port would provide China with an advantage in the emerging maritime rivalry in the Indian Ocean.<sup>59</sup> More recently, New Delhi and Beijing have both been funding the port of Mongla in Bangladesh, the second largest in the country. After it was revealed in December 2022 that New Delhi had selected Egis as the project management consultant for the port upgrade, Beijing confirmed that it was also willing to fund the port. Rear Admiral Mohammad Musa, the Chairman of the Mongla Port, stated that the two projects were in different sections of the port and would not “collide with each other.”<sup>60</sup> Munshi Foyez Ahmed, a former Bangladeshi Ambassador to China, acknowledged the competition between India and China in Bangladesh, and pointed out that Bangladesh needs to manage the competition carefully.<sup>61</sup>

While some Indian infrastructure projects in Bangladesh are designed to counter Chinese initiatives, not all can be attributed to a tit-for-tat rivalry model.<sup>62</sup> India has long sought access for its northeastern states to Bangladeshi ports instead of the port of Kolkata in West Bengal. Such access was halted as a result of the 1965 war with Pakistan, and the alternative route is time- and energy-intensive. For example, goods traveling from Agartala, the capital of Tripura, to Kolkata must pass through Guwahati, which takes over 30 hours for the 1,600-kilometer journey. Transit through Dhaka can reduce the time to 10 hours for the 550 kilometer trip.<sup>63</sup> To help solve this challenge, the Maitri Setu (“Friendship Bridge”) on the Feni river was inaugurated by Modi in 2021. The bridge will significantly enhance connectivity between Bangladesh and India’s northeast.<sup>64</sup> Joint infrastructure projects also extend to energy projects. The 1320-megawatt Maitree Super Thermal Power Station, scheduled to be Bangladesh’s largest and valued at $1.5 billion, is being set up by a joint venture between India’s NTPC

Limited (formerly known as National Thermal Power Corporation) and the Bangladesh Power Development Board.<sup>65</sup>

CHINA REPLACING INDIA?

It is tempting to view China’s replacement of India as the dominant power in South Asia as a forgone conclusion. However, so far, this is not correct. Six years after the initial announcement, the often-quoted number of $24 or $38 billion that China supposedly earmarked for Bangladesh has not materialized.<sup>66</sup> In addition to these challenges, there is very little, if any, transparency of the projects in Bangladesh. One of Bangladesh’s leading China scholars stated that “nobody knows how many BRI projects are actually being implemented.” Another expert stated that only one-third of projects are actually being implemented, while a western diplomat pointed out that Bangladesh came up with a large wish list of projects and then shopped it around in order to be less reliant on one state.<sup>67</sup> In an echo of the challenges of state capacity in Nepal, multiple interviewees pointed out that Bangladesh lacks the ability to properly implement many of the infrastructure projects that they are requesting. Another said that “Bangladeshi foreign policy is ad hoc and has no real agency. It just goes from deal to deal and it all depends on the Prime Minister whose goal is to stay in power...the Prime Minister prefers big ticket items that can be completed before elections and look good on television.”<sup>68</sup>

Chinese analysts are aware of the geopolitical competition being played out in Bangladesh. Fudan University’s Lin Minwang argues that China needs Bangladesh strategically in order to hedge against strategic containment.<sup>69</sup> Other Chinese commentators have argued that India believes that China will attempt to replace India’s dominance in South Asia and that China’s deepening of ties in South Asia has minimized and even excluded India’s influence in the region.<sup>70</sup> One Chinese project that does merit a quick note is the Padma Bridge. In 2012, the World Bank pulled out of this important infrastructure project citing problems with corruption.<sup>71</sup> However, from 2019 and 2021, Beijing provided Sheikh Hasina’s government $2.3 billion per year in official development assistance and other official flows. This funding was critical in finishing the Padma Bridge, as well as other projects including power plants, and the elevated highway in Dhaka. Critically for Sheikh Hasina, who was re-elected in the controversial January 2024 general election, the Padma Bridge is in her home district.<sup>72</sup>

Beijing has not hesitated to pressure Dhaka when it feels its interests are under threat. Beijing warned Dhaka to avoid joining the Quad consisting of Japan, India, Australia, and the United States (even though no offer was made to Dhaka to join.) China’s ambassador to Bangladesh Li Jiming reportedly stated “obviously it will not be a good idea for Bangladesh to participate in this small club of four (Quad) because it will substantially damage our bilateral relationship.” Bangladesh’s Foreign Minister, Dr. AK Abdul called the ambassador’s comment “very unfortunate” and “aggressive.”<sup>73</sup> With this example aside, New Delhi and Washington would do well to realize that for many in Dhaka China still represents an opportunity.

WASHINGTON’S HITS AND MISSES

A final note is warranted on the high-level American visits to Bangladesh in January 2023 and the peculiar Chinese response. On January 7, Eileen Laubacher, the senior director for South Asia at the National Security Council, arrived in Bangladesh for a four-day visit, where she met with senior Bangladeshi officials including the foreign minister.<sup>74</sup> She was followed by Donald Lu, the U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for South and Central Asian Affairs, who visited Bangladesh from January 12-15.<sup>75</sup> Oddly enough, in the early morning hours of January 10, Chinese Foreign Minister Qin Gang landed at Dhaka for what the Chinese Foreign Ministry called a “technical stop” where he met with the Bangladeshi foreign minister.<sup>76</sup>

Washington’s challenge with its dealings with Bangladesh are for the time being less about worrying about what Beijing is up to in the country and more about how American leaders should approach an increasingly autocratic leadership in Dhaka. In 2021, the Biden Administration did not invite Bangladesh to its democracy summit. While this may have played well in certain sectors in Washington, the Chinese envoy to Bangladesh, Li Jiming, came out in support of Dhaka.<sup>77</sup> Also in December 2021, the U.S. Treasury Department slapped sanctions on the Rapid Action Battalion (Bangladesh’s elite paramilitary force) for serious human rights violations.<sup>78</sup> In addition, Washington increased pressure on Dhaka in September 2023, when it began to impose sanctions against individuals believed to be involved in undermining the then upcoming 2024 election.<sup>79</sup> Directly addressing American criticisms over the declining level of democracy in Bangladesh, Sheikh Hasina stated that it does not matter if someone does not go on a 20-hour flight crossing the Atlantic Ocean and “that there are other countries and other continents in the world, we will make friends with those continents crossing other oceans.”<sup>80</sup> These comments demonstrate the challenge U.S. leaders face when balancing American values with states that are drifting away from democratic institutions and norms. Publicly scolding Dhaka over its deteriorating levels of democracy will only play into the hands of Beijing. Furthermore, while Washington harbors concerns about the increasing autocratic nature of governance in Dhaka, New Delhi sees the regime as providing regional stability and limiting Beijing’s influence in the country. There are also concerns in India that, with its recent pressure on Dhaka, Washington may take a more forward-leaning approach to policy in Bangladesh that could generate friction with New Delhi’s preferred approach.<sup>81</sup>

Ultimately, Bangladesh is attempting to “spread projects around to different countries” <sup>82</sup> and is more concerned with giving each great power a piece of the pie, as opposed to playing each power of the other. Foreign Minister Dr. AK Abdul Momen articulated the delicate diplomacy Bangladesh was conducting between the great powers when he stated that maintaining good ties with global powers such as the United States and China is a “challenging” task. More importantly, he stated that the “U.S., China might have their own problems...that is their headache, not ours. We want to maintain good relations with both.”<sup>82</sup>

Recommendations and Conclusion

The two cases highlighted in this paper point to an evolving great power competition in South Asia. The drivers of this competition are complex and decisionmakers need to be careful in assigning too much weight to one or two politically convenient explanations. For example, China’s controversial involvement in Sri Lanka is not just about security and competition with India, it also involves substantial commercial opportunities for Chinese entities. The widely held perception that China is engaging in “debt trap diplomacy” has been discredited by some western analysts and scholars who have taken the time to carefully analyze the data and draw conclusions. For instance, the Lowy Institute points out that Beijing is not responsible for Sri Lanka’s economic crisis and finds that Eurobonds account for the largest proportion (36 percent) of Sri Lanka’s sovereign debt, while China’s share is between 10-20 percent.<sup>83</sup>

Washington and New Delhi need to be aware that the BRI is a complicated, contradictory, and in many ways self-defeating Chinese initiative. It lacks cohesion and suffers from enormous bureaucratic infighting, a paucity of reliable data, and perhaps most importantly a profound lack of understanding of the countries where it is spending hundreds of billions of dollars. The idea that the BRI is a well-oiled machine based on solid evidence and a coherent grand strategy is false. Professor Zhao Suisheng, an expert on the BRI, argues that the BRI is poorly coordinated and is fragmented. He sees the BRI as being politically driven with resulting projects not always financially viable.<sup>84</sup> By 2018, the Chinese government started to become aware that many BRI projects were at the risk of becoming white elephants or were not economically viable for political, economic, or security reasons (or all three combined). A critical challenge for Beijing then and now is a sheer lack of area experts on countries with major BRI projects. Importantly, we are now encountering the “BRI 2.0.” China has learned many valuable lessons from its initial mistakes and is quickly changing course. For example, Beijing is completely altering its lending process and is rapidly decreasing the role of policy banks, relying more on commercial banks. Perhaps of greater importance, Beijing is now outsourcing risk management to foreign lending institutions such as the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.<sup>85</sup> This new approach should significantly reduce the waste and redundancies in many of previous BRI projects. It is critical for policymakers in the United States and India to realize that the smaller South Asian states see China as an opportunity in multiple domains. Attempts to force them to distance themselves from Beijing will likely fail and may actually be counterproductive. South Asia suffers from significant infrastructure shortfalls, and Chinese loans and grants are seen as essential to improving living conditions and livelihoods in the region. China has deep pockets and is willing to finance infrastructure projects that may not be profitable but are nevertheless critical for a state’s development and provide rent-seeking opportunities for corrupt elites. The non-democratic nature of China enables its leaders to spend money on BRI projects, but Washington needs to be aware that these projects may fail or never materialize. Instead of competing project-for-project or dollar-for-dollar with Beijing, what American leaders can do instead is to finance projects in these countries that are economically viable or help reinforce state capacity.

In particular, U.S. policymakers could consider the following courses of action:

Expand the Regional China Officer Program to smaller states in South Asia: Washington needs to rapidly build up its Regional China Officer Program (RCO), which posts China-focused U.S. foreign services officers in key states around the globe. As of early 2024, there were no RCOs based in Nepal or Bangladesh. Specifically, the RCO can examine Chinese financial, security, political and social activities and both share them with American partners and engage local authorities. This will help to increase transparency.

Develop state capacity in smaller South Asian states: The BRI suffers from an enormous lack of transparency on the part of both China and targeted countries. Washington should work with in-country bureaucrats and high-level officials as well as civil society groups and local media to encourage transparency on such issues. Additional funding should be made available to bring NGO leaders and local journalists to the U.S. for extended training sessions and even degree programs. The focus should be on areas, such as technical and legal assistance, where the long-term value of institutions and rule of law are emphasized. This is not in China’s playbook and it is an enormous asset that the U.S. has in its arsenal.

Continue host country engagement across the political spectrum: The U.S. needs to play the long-game and continue to engage in host country civil society. In many states, China places too much emphasis on individual leaders who are removed from office or are defeated at the ballot box. This is a strategic liability for Beijing that Washington and New Delhi can capitalize on by allowing China to score own goals. By focusing on civil society, Washington can capitalize on its soft power appeal in Bangladesh, especially of American universities and the U.S. as an export market.

Overall, great power competition in South Asia is in its infancy. Now that China has emerged from its Covid-19 self-isolation and is reworking the BRI, its interests in the region will continue to expand, thus causing concern in New Delhi about Chinese ambitions in the region. India is also watching the United States as it engages with Nepal and Bangladesh in ways that are not always in India’s interests, causing tensions in the U.S.-India bilateral relationship. Regardless of whether we are now witnessing “Peak China,” if BRI 2.0 is able to avoid the mistakes of I 1.0, it will be a much more formidable force for both India and the U.S. to navigate.

New Chinese Gray Zone Warfare Against India

06 April 2024, Kashmir Observer

Indian army soldiers at the Indo-China border in Bumla/ PTI

The Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh grabbed headlines in the last few weeks over Chinese protestation against PM Modi’s visit to the state on March 11 and again on March 25 in response to Indian External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar rebuffing Beijing's claims as ludicrous. Following closely on this recent tussle, Beijing on March 28 commemorated the 'Democratic Reform Day' in Xizang (Mandarin term for Tibet) which marked the 65th anniversary of Tibet's 'liberation from earlier feudal serfdom'. What is of significance is that the above mentioned celebrations were held in the newly built Xiaokang (well-off) villages constructed along the borders of India and Bhutan. This action, in the light of recent events including the India- China border stand-off since 2020 and negotiations over settling the Sino- Bhutanese boundary (with implications for India), can be seen as a grey zone warfare tactic by Beijing.

Grey zone warfare broadly refers to the methods of indirect warfare or competition between nation states which lie in the area between peace and full-scale war. It includes a vast array of option such as economic coercion, blockade of vital supplies, cyberwarfare, disinformation, and narrative building and influencing campaigns. China is no stranger to such warfare given its pre-eminence in ancient Sinic military treatises such as The Art of War and the application of such tactics against India and Taiwan. With respect to the Chinese celebrations above, the first aspect to note is the location i.e. the Xiaokang villages. These villages, numbering around 628, have been built along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) straddling the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and the Indian territories of Ladakh and Arunachal Pradesh under the ostensible purpose of poverty alleviation and development in border areas; however, it is alleged that they are dual-use in nature and has been built with the purpose of stationing PLA troops and equipment. In addition to the LAC, these villages have also been constructed along the disputed Sino- Bhutan boundary in the backdrop of negotiations between Beijing and Thimphu. More worrying for India is the fact that such villages have also cropped up in the strategically sensitive Doklam tri-junction which has the potential implications for the Siliguri Corridor connecting the Indian mainland to its North-Eastern region. It is also to be underlined that Doklam is one of the main areas of dispute between Bhutan and China and of strategic importance for India which saw a tense 73 days standoff between New Delhi and Beijing in 2017.

In terms of grey zone warfare, the celebrations in the villages situated along the above disputed areas were meant to substantiate China's claims over the latter and in a way, normalise the occupancy of the same. Moreover, the celebration of the Democratic Reform Day provides an occasion for Beijing to highlight the 'development and prosperity' of these villages and thereby buttress its claims towards the seemingly non-military character and aims of the settlements. At the same time, the timing of the celebrations immediately following the Chinese response to Indian to the rebuttal on Arunachal Pradesh are also aimed at reinforcing and reiterating Beijing's claim over the region which it refers to as Zangnan or southern Tibet. In addition, the emphasis on 'continuous, rapid development' of the border as well as announcement of 'promoting frontier prosperity, reinforcing border defence, border security, and the happiness of border residents' can be seen as an apparent jibe aimed at recent Indian attempts at strengthening border infrastructure along the LAC including the recently inaugurated all-weather Sela Tunnel reaching the strategic region of Tawang which drew the Chinese uneasiness on 9 March. Similar messages have also been conveyed through celebrations in villages to Bhutan and indirectly to India by holding events in villages at the Yadong county situated in the tri-junction.

What should India do?

Along with the current efforts at addressing the infrastructure deficit along the border, India should learn and adopt similar tactics of grey zone warfare. For starters, there should be frequent visits by the Prime Minister and other Central Ministers to Tawang— a region coveted by China both for its strategic location as well as its importance in Tibetan Buddhism. Such regular visits would help in reinforcing the already evident Indian sovereignty over not just Tawang, but the entire state of Arunachal Pradesh. This would also serve as a corrective to the earlier administration's stance of not undertaking frequent high-profile visits to Tawang during official tours of the state of Arunachal Pradesh due to apprehension over Chinese actions. Along with this, such high-level delegation including the PM should actively take part in the Statehood Day celebrations of Arunachal Pradesh on 20th February every year to further buttress the above action. Along with the implementation of the Vibrant Village Programme aimed at bolstering the development of remote villages along the LAC, in a way similar to the Chinese celebrations, India too should regularly highlight the achievements and development of these areas to not only stem the migration from these areas but also counter Chinese attempts at psychological warfare.

On the diplomatic front, India should use its current international weight and multiple partnerships to influence its partners to issue statements similar to the US reiterating Indian sovereignty over Arunachal Pradesh while condemning baseless Chinese irridentist claims. In this regard, New Delhi can reach out to countries like Philippines whose sovereignty claims in the South China Sea (SCS) has been supported by India including calls to adhere to the 2016 ruling by the Permanent Court of Arbitration on the same. Similarly, India can seek out other partners such as Japan and Vietnam to do the same in exchange for stronger support to their claims in the SCS and other benefits.

Narrative constitutes a vital stratagem of grey zone warfare which China has never shied away from using. In response to its narrative of historical control over Xizang (Tibet) since time immemorial, India should invest its cultural resources in developing its own narrative highlighting the historical, religious and cultural links between Tibet and the Indian subcontinent as well as recognising the existence of separate Tibetan kingdom and culture militarily occupied and annexed by the People's Republic of China in 1950. In addition, as a response to the commemoration of 28 March, the Government of India can participate in the official events organised by the Tibetan Government in Exile such as the annual anniversary of the Tibetan Uprising of 1959 on 10 March and unofficial presence during Tibetan Independence Day celebrations on 13 February, thereby highlighting the violent history of the Chinese occupation often brushed under the carpet. Moreover, the proposal of granting Bharat Ratna, India's highest civilian award to His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama should also be considered along with allowing the latter to make frequent visits to the historic Tawang monastery— an important seat of Tibetan Buddhism which would also bolster the legacy and connection of India with the same. At the same time, as a rebuff to the usage of terms like Xizang and Zangnan, India should use the term Tibet to refer to the region and should even skilfully utilize the term 'Indo-Tibetan border' to refer to the LAC in unofficial responses as done by certain quarters of the government in 2020. Consideration should also be given to counter-measures such as re-naming places in Tibet as a signal of stronger Indian assertiveness.

With regard to Bhutan, while India has increased its outreach and level of support to the country, New Delhi also should also strive to increase the level of its commitment and re-assurance to backing Bhutan's claims including supporting Thimphu's voice in the international fora. Such strong support would not only help India's own strategic concerns but also raise its standing in its near and extended neighbourhood as a trusted and reliable partner vis-a-vis China. New Delhi should especially try to channelise robust assistance towards aiding Bhutan in developing its own border areas with China and its military capabilities. Such efforts would perhaps encourage Thimphu to emulate similar grey zone tactics as mentioned above on its own accord.

As outlined by Dr S Jaishankar in his book Why Bharat Matters the crux of the positive development of the Sino- Indian ties lie in 'three mutuals- mutual respect, mutual sensitivity and mutual interests'. A cursory glance at the history of the ties since 1950 will show that while New Delhi has adhered to the three 'mutuals', Beijing has and continues to violate them till date. Hence, it is time, to employ the same tactics from China's own playbook to make As outlined by Dr S Jaishankar in his book Why Bharat Matters the crux of the positive development of the Sino- Indian ties lie in 'three mutuals- mutual respect, mutual sensitivity and mutual interests'. A cursory glance at the history of the ties since 1950 will show that while New Delhi has adhered to the three 'mutuals', Beijing has and continues to violate them till date. Hence, it is time, to employ the same tactics from China's own playbook to make Beijing realise that 'it would get as hard as it gives' which should hopefully make it curtail its ambitions and exhibit responsible behaviour.

The China-India-US Imbroglia

05 April 2024, Anuttama Banerji, Inkstick

The relations between these powers are fraught and entangled.

Earlier this week, US President Joe Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping had a phone call in which they discussed several contentious issues including fighting narcotics production, China's support of Russia during the war in Ukraine, the conflict in the Middle East, the Houthi rebels attacks on commercial vessels, and the Taiwan conflict. The call followed Xi's meeting with US business leaders last week, when the Chinese premier attempted to bolster investment in China, and Xi's visit to the United States in November 2023. The various dialogues show the building rapprochement between the two countries following earlier tensions exacerbated by Nancy Pelosi's 2022 visit to Taiwan, and the Chinese spy balloon episode.

These engagements resumed at a time when Biden canceled a planned visit to India's Republic Day celebrations along with the postponed QUAD summit. The US has also continued to adopt a stern outlook over India's involvement in the assassination bid against Gurpatwant Singh Pannun, a US national and Sikh separatist.

Considering these developments, it can be argued that the US and China are making a formal attempt to "manage" their ties in such a way that cooperation coexists with conflict in the Indo-Pacific, and that the US relationship with India — despite continued momentum in defense ties — requires a fair bit of course correction. Moreover, these developments suggest that despite the US viewing India as a strategic bulwark against China, the India-US bilateral partnership cannot rely on countering the perceptible Chinese threat in the Indo-Pacific alone. India will have to focus on both traditional and non-traditional security areas like space, Artificial Intelligence, and technology to strengthen its enduring partnership with the US.

The China-India-US Imbroglio

Over the last decade, India and the United States have emerged as close allies in South Asia and the Indo-Pacific as China has attempted to change the “rules based international order” while expanding its naval and maritime influence in the South China Sea and the Indo-Pacific. China’s actions have brought India and the US closer. In 2016 the US designated India a “Major Defense Partner” and has continued to facilitate military sales, calling the country “vital” for a “shared vision for a free and open Indo-Pacific.”

The strengthening US-India ties came when Chinese incursions increased considerably on India’s border especially in the crises in Doklam in 2017 and Galwan in 2020. The two sides have also signed the four foundational agreements in recent years that the US deem essential to conduct defense trade with any partner or ally country. India also recently bought MQ 9B drones and the F-414 engines – crown jewels of American technology – to manage the Chinese threat along its terrestrial and maritime borders and improve Intelligence, Surveillance and Reconnaissance (ISR) capabilities.

However, while the US is keen to assist India in balancing the Chinese threats, the US is reticent for the crisis to escalate to a war that could involve them. Just as the US is assessing the extent of support India could offer in a potential Taiwan contingency, India too is keen to evaluate the level of reciprocal support that the US could offer in the event of a crisis with China on its borders.

This dilemma is at the heart of the India-US bilateral relationship today. In Foggy Bottom and Raisina Hill, both sides ponder the nature of reciprocal support that either could get in the advent of a real conflict.

Moving Ahead: Advantage China?

In light of these uncertainties, the US will attempt to manage its relationship with China and build its ties with India simultaneously. India will have to remain cognizant of this fact as it also plays a balancing game: navigating its ties with both the US and Russia in a bid to maintain its strategic autonomy and remain “multi-aligned.” The US, meanwhile, will attempt to wean India away from Russia despite India’s age-old partnership with Moscow that has seen the latter supporting India on contentious issues like Kashmir at the United Nations.

Interestingly, in this imbroglio, China will have the advantage, at least in the short term.

China will continue to call the shots vis-à-vis its ties with Washington as the Biden administration would like to have a modicum of better ties with Beijing to present to its domestic electorate before the upcoming 2024 elections. Biden’s call to assist China in its economic recovery and the US’s wish to keep its strategic diplomatic engagements through economic integration at multiple levels with the Chinese attest to this fact.

India will have to closely watch the unfurling events as Beijing and Washington engage each other. While a tight embrace between the US and China is unlikely considering the plethora of unresolved issues – ranging from Taiwan to the freedom of navigation and overflight, trade wars, semiconductors, access to resources, and human rights abuses on the part of the Chinese continue to limit the scope of the relationship – the US’s conciliatory approach towards China may harm Indian interests.

China is India’s next-door neighbor and India faces an imminent threat from the Chinese.

India and China are geopolitical rivals and China has increased its footprint in India’s strategic backyard of South Asia in recent years. In this regard, among many controversial projects.

Managing China’s Influence

China is pursuing the “String of Pearls” Project in the region – with the Chinese building bases with potential for dual-use in strategic ports like Gwadar, Pakistan, Hambantota, Sri Lanka, and Chittagong, Bangladesh among others potentially encircling India. China’s all-weather partnership with Pakistan has made the latter a supplicant state under China’s Belt and Road Initiative. Sri Lanka, India’s southern neighbor, is also entrapped in debt diplomacy after it leased out the port of Hambantota to China for 99 years. Moreover, the strategically important island of Maldives has also extended its security partnership with China, with Beijing offering “non-lethal” military weapons to Malé.

India is therefore keen to manage China’s growing influence in South Asia and potentially views Washington as an ally in this endeavor.

China will continue balancing its multiple relationships while pursuing its goals: engaging the US while supporting Russia in the ongoing war with Ukraine, and pushing for India to acquiesce to the idea of a China-led South Asia – all of which falls under the umbrella of Tianxia, the vision of a Chinese world order.

Intricate Entanglement

India will have to be a careful observer of these developments as it keeps the cash on defense sales flowing while addressing the US’s concerns associated with the Pannun assassination attempt. Although the India-US relationship has broadened and deepened in recent years with the growing defense ties, the structural impediments remain as India continues to navigate the US regulatory measures like International Traffic in Arms Regulations (ITAR).

While the India-US relationship extends from the “seas to the stars,” India will have to get the basics right to ensure that enduring ties with New Delhi continue to receive bipartisan support in Washington and so that Washington’s attempted rapprochement with Beijing does not isolate New Delhi. While engagement at the bilateral level will remain the crux of the relationship, India could potentially strengthen its position within multilateral fora like the QUAD, I2U2, and the Combined Maritime Forces through support to US initiatives to enable more US support vis-à-vis China. India’s handling of the pirates in the Red Sea is an example of India stepping up to deal with mutually relevant concerns. To ensure more convergence with the US in the maritime domain, India could also join Operation Prosperity Guardian, the US-led multinational coalition designed to fight the Houthi rebels. Overall, the dance between the US, China, and India remains an intricate entanglement, and no one wants to trip. Geopolitical considerations will continue to dominate the political thinking and decision-making of these nations in the years to come.

China’s Unquenched Territorial Greed: What Is The Limit? – OpEd

04 April 2024, Eurasia Review

Many discerning observers around the world, who are taking a closer look at China’s claims on the territory of other countries, inevitably could conclude that China’s territorial greed today is similar to that of Adolf Hitler’s, which ultimately caused World War II.

Occupation of Tibet. Several decades back, China aggressively entered Tibet, overpowered the Tibetans who resisted its aggression and mercilessly massacred a large number of them. Today, China is sitting pretty with full control over the Tibet region and is hiding that country with an “iron curtain” from the eyes of the world. Outside China and probably within China, most people do not know what is really happening in Tibet at present.

After the onslaught on Tibet, with no worthwhile protest from other countries about China’s act of aggression, China appears to have convinced itself that it can have its way to satisfy its territorial greed by occupying other regions at its will.

Threat to invade Taiwan

China claims that Taiwan should be part of it, though there is no justification for this. Taiwan emerged as separate region after a civil war, and if China claims that Taiwan should belong to it, then Taiwan too can have equal claim to China territories.

On several occasions, China has threatened to invade Taiwan. However, unlike in the case of Tibet when China’s aggression virtually went unchallenged, the Taiwan region has the support of Western countries. This has prevented China from militarily operating against Taiwan, even as China’s territorial greed persists.

South China Sea / Senkaku Islands

The South China Sea is an area where China claims its sovereignty and is rejecting the claims of other countries including the Philippines, Vietnam, Taiwan. China-Philippines tensions are now rising around a flash point in the South China Sea, due to China’s aggressive posture.

There is territorial dispute regarding the Senkaku Islands between Japan China and Taiwan. It is now claimed by China that the Senkaku Islands belong to it and there is considerable tension in the region due to China’s claim and aggressive postures. China is not ready to discuss the issue and arrive at an amicable solution.

Occupation of Indian territory

China launched a war against India in the 1962 and is now holding thousands of hectares of Indian territory as its own, which was occupied by China during the war. Frequently, China is creating issues in the border with India and skirmishes between Chinese and Indian soldiers are becoming frequent.

Claim on India’s Arunachal Pradesh

China now claims that Arunachal Pradesh in India should belong to China and is doing everything to stress its claim, short of going for a full-fledged war with India

Recently, China released a fourth list of thirty new names of various places in Arunachal Pradesh, amid China’s stepped up assertions in recent weeks to re-emphasise its claim over the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh.

The Chinese Civil Affairs Ministry released the first list of the standardised names of six places in “Zangnan” (the name given by China for Arunachal Pradesh ) in 2017. The second list of 15 places was issued in 2021, followed by another list with names for 11 places in 2023.

The naming of places in India’s Arunachal Pradesh by China indicates the height of arrogance of that government and its confidence that it can do anything against other countries and get away with it.

Obviously, the unquenched territorial greed of China makes it behave with such aggressive postures against other countries.

Stranglehold over Pakistan

By tempting and persuading Pakistan to implement the economic corridor project, China has extended huge loans to Pakistan to implement such projects, even as China knows that Pakistan will never be able to repay the loans and accrued interest in the foreseeable future. Thus, Pakistan has now become highly dependent on China and is indebted to it.

In the process, China has taken control of the Gwadar port in Pakistan and is creating access to transport material from the port to China. Obviously, China will never let go of its vice like grip over Pakistan in future

Take over Hambantota port in Sri Lanka

Like what China has done in Pakistan, it has extended a huge loan to Sri Lanka and implemented projects in Sri Lanka, which benefited Chinese industries and the economy of China, more than that of Sri Lanka.

With Sri Lanka is facing a debt trap, China has taken over Hambantota port on 99 year lease from Sri Lanka in lieu of the loan that Sri Lanka received from China.

A 99 year lease is a very long period and the ground reality is that China will never give up its grip over the Hambantota port, which area ultimately may become an extended territory of China for all practical purposes.

What could be the ultimate limit of China's greed?

It is generally said that greed has no limits as such. That said, the ultimate limit of greed could happen, when the level of greed makes an individual or a group or a country to overreach in satisfying its unquenched greed. Such a scenario would cause a huge resistance from the people in the affected regions, creating an insurmountable problem for the entity with the unquenched greed.

The British empire, which expanded the territory under its control in different continents for several centuries, ultimately lost all such territories and remains as just one of many nations in the world now. Its past glory is now a matter of distant memory. China should derive the right lessons from the experience of the British empire and allow other countries to live in peace.

Arunachal Pradesh Again: Why China Keeps Coining New Names For Places In Other Countries

01 April 2024, ETV Bharat

For the fourth time since 2017, China has released a new list of names for places and sites in the northeast Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh, in what is the latest manifestation of Beijing's claims over territories in other countries.

The latest list released by China's Ministry of Civil Affairs contains new names for 30 places and sites in Arunachal Pradesh. These include 11 residential areas, 12 mountains, four rivers, one lake, one mountain pass and a piece of land. All the names have been given in Chinese characters, Tibetan, and Pinyin, the Roman alphabet version of Mandarin Chinese, the South China Morning Post reported.

China first released a list of new names for six places in Arunachal Pradesh in 2017. This was followed by a second list of 15 places in 2021, and then a third list of names for 11 places in 2023. China refers to Arunachal Pradesh as Zangnan or south Tibet, a territory Beijing claims to be a part of the Tibet Autonomous Region. In Mandarin Chinese, Zang refers to Tibet and "nan" means south.

India is not the only country where China has coined new names for places and sites. One notable example of China renaming places in other countries is its actions in the South China Sea. China has asserted territorial claims over various islands, reefs, and shoals in the region, many of which are also claimed by other countries such as Vietnam, the Philippines, Malaysia, Brunei, and Taiwan. Despite international disputes over sovereignty, China has renamed several features in the South China Sea.

China has renamed several features within the Paracel Islands, known as the Xisha Islands in Chinese. For example, Woody Island, which is also claimed by Vietnam, has been given the Chinese name Yongxing Island.

Similarly, China has renamed features within the Spratly Islands, known as the Nansha Islands in Chinese. For instance, Fiery Cross Reef, claimed by China, the Philippines, and Vietnam, has been given the Chinese name Yongshu Reef. China refers to Scarborough Shoal, which is also claimed by the Philippines, as Huangyan Island in Chinese. China's renaming of this feature reflects its claim of historical sovereignty over the area.

In the East China Sea, a group of uninhabited islands referred to as Senkaku Islands in Japanese, are called Diaoyu Islands in Chinese. It is worth mentioning here that China has released the latest list of new names for places and sites in Arunachal Pradesh, following Prime Minister Narendra Modi's visit to the northeastern state last month. During the course of his visit, Modi inaugurated the Sela Tunnel at an altitude of 13,000 feet to provide all-weather connectivity to strategically-located Tawang. The tunnel is also expected to ensure better movement of troops along the frontier region.

As expected, China protested Modi's visit to Arunachal Pradesh, which New Delhi immediately dismissed. "We reject the comments made by the Chinese side regarding the visit of the Prime Minister to Arunachal Pradesh," External Affairs Ministry spokesperson Randhir Jaiswal had said in response to media queries regarding the comments from the Chinese side.

"Indian leaders visit Arunachal Pradesh from time to time, as they visit other states of India. Objecting to such visits or India's developmental projects does not stand to reason," Jaiswal said. According to MS Pratibha, Associate Fellow at the East Asia Centre in the Manohar Parrikar Institute of Defence Studies and Analyses, China resorts to this tactic of coining new names for places in other countries whenever it feels that its sovereignty is being challenged.

"This is something they generally do in Chinese maps to show to their people that these places are part of China's territory," Pratibha told ETV Bharat. India and China have had a longstanding territorial dispute over Arunachal Pradesh, with both sides periodically asserting their claims. China's renaming of locations in Arunachal Pradesh is seen as a means to bolster its territorial claim and challenge India's sovereignty in the region.

China's claims to Arunachal Pradesh are based on historical assertions of sovereignty, including references to past governance structures and cultural ties. By renaming places in the region with Chinese names, Beijing aims to reinforce the narrative of historical control over the area. This tactic is part of a broader effort to reshape historical narratives in support of its territorial claims.

Arunachal Pradesh holds strategic significance due to its proximity to the Line of Actual Control (LAC), the de facto border between India and China. Control over this region provides geopolitical advantages, including access to natural resources, strategic military positioning, and influence over neighbouring states. China's renaming of locations in Arunachal Pradesh is thus intertwined with its broader geopolitical ambitions in the region.

Renaming places and sites is a symbolic way for China to assert control and influence over Arunachal Pradesh. By imposing Chinese names on these locations, Beijing seeks to shape perceptions and establish a sense of authority over the region, both domestically and internationally. This tactic is part of a broader strategy of psychological warfare aimed at undermining India's claims and reinforcing China's dominance.

According to Pratibha, China's release of the latest list of new names for locations in Arunachal Pradesh might be because Beijing felt that it needs to give a proportionate response to Modi's visit. "There are a variety of ways in which way they respond," she said. "This is one way. However, it does not change the fact that Arunachal Pradesh is Indian territory."

India Stands To Lose Strategic Leverage Against China As Exiled Tibetans Leave Settlements – OpEd

01 April 2024, Saurabh Sen, Eurasia Review

Tibetans exiled in India are leaving their settlements in droves. Over time, these settlements had become platforms that nurtured Tibet's political aspirations while protecting the Tibetan identity. Since 2014, however, there has been a sharp reduction in the number of exiled Tibetans living in these settlements.

Heightened security along Nepal-Tibet border made it almost impossible for Tibetans to come to India. Also, a large number of Tibetans in these settlements, especially the youth, moved away in search of work and better living. With India happy to maintain status quo, these settlements can become unviable, denying it a strategic leverage against China.

Home away from home

After the 14th Dalai Lama escaped from China in 1959 with 80,000 followers, India sheltered them in designated settlements. There were three categories: agriculture-based, handicraft/industry-based and scattered settlements. In order to set these up, India leased land to the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA). Till about 2010, the number of Tibetans exiled in settlements boiled over, forcing them to scatter all over India.

During 2011 Indian Census – the last census conducted – 182,685 persons reported Tibetan as their mother tongue. The number included exiled Tibetans as well as those who were Indian citizens. This figure reflected a 114.22 percent increase compared to the previous decade. Indian media, quoting government officials, reported the number of Tibetan refugees to be around 150,000 during the same time. In the 2004-2014 decade, CTA received between 4000 and 5,000 Tibetans each year at Dharamsala. These were Tibetans coming for pilgrimage, for admission into monasteries, schools, meeting relatives; and of course, the major part of the traffic was to receive an audience from His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

However, there was sharp reduction in the number of refugees in the next decade, more specifically, between 2011 and 2022 – a trend corroborated by CTA officials. According to data collected by the (CTA) in 2022, there were 72,000 Tibetan refugees living in India, either in 39 settlements or scattered all over the country. The number now exiled in India is less than the number that accompanied the Dalai Lama.

There are two reasons behind this: heightened security at the Nepal-China (Tibet) border has made it almost impossible for Tibetans to come to India. The flow has now shrunk to 100-200 annually. Massive halls constructed at Dharamsala to welcome refugees have been converted to training centres. Moreover, a large number of Tibetans, especially the youth, are deserting the settlements in search of work and better living. In addition to migrating to other parts of India, they are going abroad, USA being a favourite destination. According to CTA estimates, 15 years back, there were 5,000–7,000 Tibetans in America. But now the number is close to 15,000. Nearly 5,000 Tibetans live in New York city itself. Faced with this exodus, it has become a challenge to accurately estimate the number of exiled Tibetans in Indian settlements. "We could not even locate individuals or families living outside the settlements," said a senior official of the CTA Home Department.

Dwindling numbers make the settlements vulnerable to local pressures

The CTA South Division has 15,000 acre of prime land leased to it by the local state government of Karnataka, spread over five agricultural settlements. With Tibetans moving out, more and more of this land either remains uncultivated for years, or are being informally sub-leased to local operators for contractual farming.

There have been instances when real estate developers (propped up by politicians across all parties) have tried to grab these unused land, prompting local administrators to step in and sort out the matter. CTA leadership has been counselling Tibetan refugee cultivators to respect the law of the land and not sub-lease settlement land. CTA is advocating a review of India's 2014 Rehabilitation Policy to ensure a pan-India rehabilitation SOP.

Settlements fight Chinese onslaught on Tibetan identity

In the past 60-plus years, these settlements not only enabled exiled Tibetans to pursue their political goals, but most importantly also helped them preserve their cultural, linguistic and religious identities, even as refugees imbibed India's diverse local culture. Unless Tibetans, more specifically the youth, do not come and stay in India, their long term political goals may become impossible to achieve. Jigmei Tsultrim, CTA's Chief Representative, South Division, explained: "If the Tibetan communities get fragmented in a foreign land, there is a risk of these fragments getting absorbed and lost. So we are encouraging the Tibetan youths in exile to think in terms of their longer interest in serving in the settlements."

Preservation of Tibetan identity has become a key weapon to fight China's state-sponsored Sinicization drive. Other than prohibitive and discriminatory fees and inadequate facilities in rural areas, Chinese authorities have shut down local schools in Tibet and forcibly taken away children to boarding schools located between 1,000 and 2,000 km away from their homes. In these schools, nearly 100,000 Tibetan children are being taught the official Chinese curriculum in Mandarin as well as the positive aspects of Chinese Communist Party and administration, in the process, eradicating Tibetan language, culture and heritage.

Tsultrim said CTA was fighting this Chinese onslaught by encouraging Tibetans exiles to return to Tibet so that they can tell people back home that Tibetans are no longer aspiring for complete independence from China, but to live within the framework of the People's Republic of China. Young and senior monks who study in different monasteries in Indian settlements are encouraged to go back and serve their respective monasteries in Tibet. In return, Tibetans would like the Chinese government to guarantee autonomy of Tibetan culture, language, religion and other rights so that their distinct identity is protected.

India's attitude on exiled Tibetans: no escalation

India's position over Tibetan settlements needs to be understood in the context of its bilateral relation with China as well as in the context of Asia's emerging geopolitical narrative (where India is gradually getting surrounded by hostile neighbours with pro-China tilt).

Maintaining status quo with settlements rather than leveraging Tibet – with US support – to provoke China appears to be India's strategy at the moment.

According to a member of India's National Security Advisory Board, India is not interested in provoking China before 2028 by stoking the Tibet issue. Nor is it prepared to surrender its strategic leverage against China which Tibet provides. The current thinking within India's security establishment is that by 2028 (prior to the 2029 parliamentary elections), it will be in a position to resist China in case of a full-blown war. Till that happens, India is happy to restrict its hostility against China to the level of low-level border skirmishes with Tibetan settlements left to grapple with their own issues locally.

China's Advancing Efforts to Influence the U.S. Election Raise Alarms

01 April 2024, NY Times

ICovert Chinese accounts are masquerading online as American supporters of former President Donald J. Trump, promoting conspiracy theories, stoking domestic divisions and attacking President Biden ahead of the election in November, according to researchers and government officials.

The accounts signal a potential tactical shift in how Beijing aims to influence American politics, with more of a willingness to target specific candidates and parties, including Mr. Biden.

In an echo of Russia's influence campaign before the 2016 election, China appears to be trying to harness partisan divisions to undermine the Biden administration's policies, despite recent efforts by the two countries to lower the temperature in their relations.

Some of the Chinese accounts impersonate fervent Trump fans, including one on X that purported to be "a father, husband and son" who was "MAGA all the way!!" The accounts mocked Mr. Biden's age and shared fake images of him in a prison jumpsuit, or claimed that Mr. Biden was a Satanist pedophile while promoting Mr. Trump's "Make America Great Again" slogan.

"I've never seen anything along those lines at all before," said Elise Thomas, a senior analyst at the Institute for Strategic Dialogue, a nonprofit research organization that uncovered a small group of the fake accounts posing as Trump supporters.

Ms. Thomas and other researchers have linked the new activity to a long-running network of accounts connected with the Chinese government known as Spamouflage. Several of the accounts they detailed previously posted pro-Beijing content in Mandarin — only to resurface in recent months under the guise of real Americans writing in English.

In a separate project, the Foundation for Defense of Democracies, a research organization in Washington, identified 170 inauthentic pages and accounts on Facebook that have also pushed anti-American messages, including pointed attacks on Mr. Biden.

The effort has more successfully attracted actual users' attention and become more difficult for researchers to identify than previous Chinese efforts to influence public opinion in the United States. Though researchers say the overall political tilt of the campaign remains unclear, it has raised the possibility that China's government is calculating that a second Trump presidency, despite his sometimes hostile statements against the country, might be preferable to a second Biden term.

China's activity has already raised alarms inside the American government.

In February, the Office of the Director of National Intelligence reported that China was expanding its influence campaigns to "sow doubts about U.S. leadership, undermine democracy and extend Beijing's influence." The report expressed concern that Beijing could use increasingly sophisticated methods to try to influence the American election "to sideline critics of China."

Liu Pengyu, the spokesman for the Chinese Embassy in Washington, said in a statement that the presidential election was "the domestic affair of the United States" and that "China is committed to the principle of noninterference."

Relations Between China and the U.S.

Yellen's Visit: Despite a warm welcome on Janet Yellen's second trip to China as Treasury secretary, it was evident that the level of trust between Washington and Beijing does not run deep.

Biden-Xi Call: President Biden spoke with Xi Jinping, China's leader, in a call that was aimed at addressing a variety of combative and cooperative issues, as the United States grapples with wars and other global crises.

Influencing the U.S. Election: Covert Chinese accounts are masquerading online as American supporters of Donald Trump, signaling a potential tactical shift in how Beijing aims to influence U.S. politics.

Mounting Space Threats: The United States and China are locked in a new race over a fundamental resource: time.

"Claims about China influencing U.S. presidential elections are completely fabricated," he added.

Ms. Thomas, who has studied China's information operations for years, said the new effort suggested a more subtle and sophisticated approach than previous campaigns. It was the first time, she said, that she had encountered Chinese accounts posing so persuasively as Trump-supporting Americans while managing to attract genuine engagement.

"The worry has always been, what if one day they wake up and are effective?" she said. "Potentially, this could be the beginning of them waking up and being effective."

Online disinformation experts are looking ahead to the months before the November election with growing anxiety.

Intelligence assessments show Russia using increasingly subtle influence tactics in the United States to spread its case for isolationism as its war against Ukraine continues. Mock news sites are targeting Americans with Russian propaganda.

Efforts to beat back false narratives and conspiracy theories — already a difficult task — must now also contend with waning moderation efforts at social media platforms, political pushback, fast-advancing artificial intelligence technology and broad information fatigue.

Until now, China's efforts to advance its ideology in the West struggled to gain traction, first as it pushed its official propaganda about the superiority of its culture and economy and later as it began denigrating democracy and stoking anti-American sentiment.

In the 2022 midterm elections, the cybersecurity firm Mandiant reported that Dragonbridge, an influence campaign linked to China, tried to discourage Americans from voting while highlighting U.S. political polarization. That campaign, which experimented with fake American personas posting content in the first person, was poorly executed and largely overlooked online, researchers said.

The recent campaigns connected to China have sought to exploit the divisions already apparent in American politics, joining the divisive debate over issues such as gay rights, immigration and crime mainly from a right-wing perspective.

In February, according to the Institute for Strategic Dialogue, a Chinese-linked account on X calling itself a Western name alongside a "MAGA 2024" reference shared a video from RT, the Russian television network controlled by the Kremlin, to claim that Mr. Biden and the Central Intelligence Agency had sent a neo-Nazi gangster to fight in Ukraine. (That narrative was debunked by the investigative group Bellingcat.)

The next day the post received an enormous boost when Alex Jones, the podcaster known for spreading false claims and conspiracy theories, shared it on the platform with his 2.2 million followers.

The account with the “MAGA 2024” reference had taken steps to appear authentic, describing itself as being run by a 43-year-old Trump supporter in Los Angeles. But it used a profile photo lifted from a Danish man’s travel blog, the institute’s report on the accounts said. Although the account opened 14 years ago, its first publicly visible post was last April. In that post, the account attempted, without evidence, to link Mr. Biden to Jeffrey Epstein, the disgraced financier and registered sex offender.

At least four other similar accounts are also operating, Ms. Thomas said, all of them with ties to China. One account paid for a subscription on X, which offers perks like better promotion and a blue check mark that was, before Elon Musk bought the platform, a sign of verification conferred to users whose identities had been verified. Like the other accounts, it shared pro-Trump and anti-Biden claims, including the QAnon conspiracy theory and baseless election fraud accusations.

The posts included exhortations to “be strong ourselves, not smear China and create rumors,” awkward phrases like “how dare?” instead of “how dare you?” and signs that the user’s web browser had been set to Mandarin.

One of the accounts seemed to slip up in May when it responded to another post in Mandarin; another was posting primarily in Mandarin until last spring, when it briefly went silent before resurfacing with all-English content. The accounts denounced efforts by American lawmakers to ban the popular TikTok app, which is owned by the Chinese company ByteDance, as a form of “true authoritarianism” orchestrated by Israel and as a tool for Mr. Biden to undermine China.

The accounts sometimes amplified or repeated content from the Chinese influence campaign Spamouflage, which was first identified in 2019 and linked to an arm of the Ministry of Public Security. It once posted content almost exclusively in Chinese to attack the Communist Party’s critics and protesters in Hong Kong.

It has pivoted in recent years to focus on the United States, portraying the country as overwhelmed by chaos. By 2020, it was posting in English and criticizing American foreign policy, as well as domestic issues in the United States, including its response to Covid-19 and natural disasters, like the wildfires in Hawaii last year.

China, which has denied interfering in other countries’ internal affairs, now appears to be building a network of accounts across many platforms to put to use in November. “This is reminiscent of Russia’s style of operations, but the difference is more the intensity of this operation,” said Margot Fulde-Hardy, a former analyst at Viginum, the government agency in France that combats disinformation online.

In the past, many Spamouflage accounts followed one another, posted sloppily in several languages and simultaneously blitzed social media users with identical messages across multiple platforms.

The newer accounts are trickier to find because they are trying to build an organic following and appear to be controlled by humans rather than automated bots. One of the accounts on X also had linked profiles on Instagram and Threads, creating an appearance of authenticity.

Meta, which owns Instagram and Threads, last year removed thousands of inauthentic accounts linked to Spamouflage on Facebook and others on Instagram. It called one network it had removed “the largest known cross-platform influence operation to date.” Hundreds of related accounts remained on other platforms, including TikTok, X, LiveJournal and Blogspot, Meta said.

The Foundation for Defense of Democracies documented a new coordinated group of Chinese accounts linked to a Facebook page with 3,000 followers called the War of Somethings. The report underscores the persistence of China’s efforts despite Meta’s repeated efforts to take down Spamouflage accounts.

“What we’re seeing,” said Max Lesser, a senior analyst with the foundation, “is the campaign just continues, undeterred.”

De-Risking’s Blind Spot: China’s Targeting of Global Civil Society

01 April 2024, The Diplomat

“De-risking” has become the buzzword in China policy circles since G-7 leaders endorsed the concept in May of last year. The task of reevaluating the complicated global supply chain with the People’s Republic of China (PRC) has catapulted to the top of elites’ minds from Washington to Brussels to Tokyo. However, this laser focus on vulnerabilities in the economic relationship with China ignores a critical blind spot: the vulnerability of democratic societies and their non-governmental sectors.

Chinese Communist Party (CCP)-affiliated entities have pierced – and in some cases, subsidized – civil society groups around the world. Universities, researchers, media outlets, overseas Chinese, and a variety of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) grapple consistently with the impact of the PRC's tactics of censorship, propaganda, transnational repression, and bribery.

Whereas governments can craft laws and regulatory processes enacting safeguards to de-risk their economies from China, civil society's very existence in functioning democracies depends on government not regulating it. Without new civil society-led initiatives and better efforts by democratic governments to protect the space for non-governmental actors from the CCP's pressure, policymakers will find these critical drivers of democratization neutered and, in some cases, working at cross-purposes. Any de-risking strategy toward China without a focus on protecting civil society will fall short.

Document No. 9's Decade-long, Global Ripple Effect on Civil Society

To better understand the CCP's vision for the role of civil society in democracies, one should simply look at what the CCP says it wants for it. One year after Xi Jinping's ascent to the post of general secretary in 2012, the CCP General Office issued secret Document No. 9 to all Party members. The edict comprehensively repudiated the legitimacy of civil society, media, and the market of ideas and organizations that might in any way "oppose the Party's theory or political line."

As just two examples of this repudiation, take media and the knowledge sector (universities, research institutions, and think tanks), both critical sources of freedom of expression and government accountability. Document No. 9 stated that "the media and publishing system must be subject to the Party's discipline," and "be infused with the spirit of the Party," in order to guard against "overseas media and reactionary publications."

China is now home to one of the world's most restrictive media environments and its most sophisticated system of censorship. Within the knowledge sector of universities and research institutions, the Party sees "ideology as an intense struggle" requiring Party members to "seize their leadership authority and dominance" in promulgating Xi Jinping Thought. The Party's decades-long campaign to bring universities and ideological elites under its control reached a milestone in January as university "Party cells" have now merged with presidents' offices in order to ensure that the CCP's ideology remains the dominant strand of thinking on Chinese college campuses.

A decade since Document No. 9's issuance and its establishment in 2017 of an autocratic overseas NGO law, that same ideology and approach within China has gone global. The ripple effects of the CCP's intensified crackdown on civil society at home are now reaching the shores of nations and non-governmental sectors eager to benefit from engagement with China.

In a June 2021 speech to the Politburo, Xi reaffirmed Document No. 9's application to the Chinese party-state's engagement in the world, pointing to the "system of internal and external propaganda" that should "build a media cluster with international influence." The Party's "struggle on the ideological battlefield" is part and parcel of its efforts to, in Xi's words, "expand the circle of international public opinion friends who know China and who are friendly with China."

The CCP's position that non-governmental entities – with some exceptions in the business realm – simply have little to no legitimacy holds enormous implications for independent civil society beyond China's borders.

Globally, Party-controlled radio, news, social media companies, and TV outlets have massively expanded into new global markets and have struck licensing, content-sharing, and advertising agreements to influence foreign narratives about China. Leveraging these arrangements, Chinese embassies have coordinated harassment and pressure campaigns against outlets that publish news or opinions disfavored by the Chinese government. Freedom House's deeply researched Beijing Global Media Influence report found these types of highly repressive tactics in 16 of the 30 countries they surveyed.

Even in the relatively open society of Brazil, a content partnership with the PRC's CCTV and a 24-hour cable news channel, Bandnews TV, led journalists to censor themselves on China-related topics and more positively framing China's engagement in Brazil and Latin America.

Within the knowledge sector of many democracies, China studies programs across Latin America, Africa, and Asia are propped up by China's Ministry of Education or other Party-affiliated entities. After the closure of many Confucius Institutes in Western societies, some simply re-branded themselves under a new Party-directed initiative. Even on foreign university campuses, the CCP's capacity to compel Chinese diaspora members and researchers have for many made "living outside of China feel like living inside of China." These subsidization and intimidation techniques create pervasive self-censorship, where what is not said by public intellectuals can far outnumber what is said about the PRC.

The CCP's ongoing pressure campaign against civil society goes well beyond university and media officials. Its global campaign of transnational repression against Chinese citizens who speak out is rooted in Document No. 9's labeling of "internal dissidents as anti-government forces." Its squashing of any Chinese political party not under the CCP umbrella has manifested globally in its rapid expansion of CCP-led political party exchanges with parties of all ideologies and its training on one-Party rule of African politicians and diplomats at a new facility in Tanzania.

Civil Society's Power and Independence

As the world sees time and time again during natural disasters, non-government organizations are often the first to arrive on the scene. Governments can't (and shouldn't) do everything on their own. Civil society, on the other hand, can be fast, entrepreneurial, and responsive. Its suite of activists, protest movements, investigative journalists, academics, and opposition groups can prevent – and have prevented – autocratization when illiberal leaders or parties rise to power.

A strong non-governmental sector and the accountability and scrutiny of government decisions is a competitive advantage for democracies. When left largely unregulated by the state, they remain that way. A media organization under pressure from or co-opted by a government or ruling party won't hold that government accountable. A university unable to elevate voices that dissent to the prevailing views of a government will simply choose not to elevate them – or at worse, silence them. Civil society's power is in its independence, providing it credibility in the public sphere and sensitivity to citizen needs and shifting public opinion.

Government support to civil society is best implemented by, first and foremost, protecting their space to operate. Free and independent media needs an enabling environment of laws and regulations to ensure media can thrive, journalists are protected, and news gathering rights are upheld. Universities and research institutions need measures to ensure their intellectual freedom, spaces to educate the public, and – if needed – funding unencumbered by control over their political views.

De-Risking Civil Society from CCP Pressure

In a healthy democracy, the autonomy that civil society enjoys from government regulation presents unique challenges in combating pressure on the non-governmental sector coming from outside a country's borders.

As with China's trade and economic ties, Chinese entities' engagement in nearly every country's society is inevitable. Decoupling Chinese media, universities, students, and NGOs from the world is not only untenable, but probably counter-productive toward other critical aims, like maintaining democratic freedoms of expression, association, and the press. The current U.S. debate over TikTok is a microcosm of the range of available policy options. Do you allow a CCP-influenced social media platform to operate openly in your free society? Or do you cut your society off from the platform entirely, including from all of the benign aspects of it? Or is there a middle ground that properly balances risk, values, and opportunity?

Civil society in democracies finds itself at a similar crossroads of options, and at a particularly vulnerable moment. The rate of China's engagement with the world over the past two decades has outpaced the ability of governments, civil society, and businesses to adapt and prove the resilience of their democratic models. These vulnerable societies need effective, democracy-affirming strategies to de-risk themselves from the PRC's malign, authoritarian impacts in their non-governmental spaces.

These strategies for resilience go above and beyond traditional mechanisms and roles used to beat back authoritarian drifts. They involve cross-sectoral collaboration within civil society and with government entities, assertive messaging and exposure campaigns about these vulnerabilities, and intense competition with China's overseas investments in non-governmental sectors by funders, the business sector, and democracy support groups.

More than a decade ago, the CCP took direct aim at Chinese civil society, striking a near-fatal blow, after which it then began targeting civil society abroad. Civil society, government, and other stakeholders now face the urgent need to shield themselves and prove the resilience of their democratic societies to this authoritarian pressure.

The CCP's Performing Arts Troupes in the U.S.

01 April 2024, China Scope

Chinascope has obtained a list of shows by Chinese performing-arts troupes in the U.S. between 2011 and 2019. Despite being incomplete, the list accounts for nearly 600 shows on U.S. soil. Additional data show that Beijing has been sponsoring performing-arts tours in the U.S. with political focus dating back to at least 2004.

The Chinese government has devoted significant resources to enabling these touring troupes to perform abroad, and the focus in sponsoring these shows is obvious, with a heavy political emphasis. These performing tours do not merely represent civil or cultural exchange; they are part of a substantial game played out by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) on foreign soil, aiming to build soft power influence and eliminate space for alternative voices.

One example concerns the prestigious Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C., which hosted performances by at least 68 Beijing-sponsored groups during the period from 2011 to 2019. Moreover, in the single month of October 2005, the Kennedy Center saw shows by 13 different Beijing-sponsored groups, some of which put on multiple performances. Shows during this month included the National Ballet of China, the China National Acrobatic Group, the Beijing People's Arts Theater and the Guangzhou Symphony Orchestra.

Other examples include New York City, where 41 such troupes visited during the period from 2011 to 2019. California, which has a high concentration of Chinese diaspora and where the Chinese consulate is influential, saw 220 visits during the same period. During the period from 2004 to 2006, the San Francisco Bay area specifically saw at least 24 visits by Beijing-sponsored performance troupes.

Productions have included shows by professional as well as children's theater groups, martial arts demonstrations, film screenings, musical shows ranging from solo pianists to national-caliber orchestral groups, acrobatic and circus performances, professional dance troupes, ethnic performing arts groups, and more. Such touring paused between 2020 and 2022 due to the global COVID-19 pandemic, resuming in 2023. While nations of the free world see arts exchanges as a means of building friendship, sharing inspiration, and promoting cultural understanding, Beijing's efforts clearly go beyond such noble objectives. The CCP has been employing art exchange as a weapon of influence in soft power competition. Through persistent, massive, inconspicuous-looking art exchange and touring theater operations, Beijing has aimed to gradually shape civil discourse and expand communist influence in the United States as well as in other countries across the globe.

The CCP's "Culture Going Abroad" Strategy

While such performances appear innocuous when considered independently, they paint a clear picture when viewed collectively: the CCP is sending performance troupes to penetrate live entertainment markets in U.S. and across the world.

This is not empty talk – the CCP has long used tools of culture, including the performing arts, as means of influence and propaganda. As Mao Zedong once said, "Culture not only reflects but can also guide political fighting and economic struggle." {1} It was in this vein that Mao launched the infamous Chinese Cultural Revolution, wielding such tools to take down his political rival Liu Shaoqi (the CCP's second-most prominent leader at the time).

When the CCP uses culture and the arts as tools of influence, it does so differently depending on whether its target audience is within China's borders or abroad. To achieve its goals domestically, the CCP develops "red songs" and "red arts," aiming to indoctrinate the mainland-Chinese audience. This means, for example, injecting lyrics that praise the "mother-party" into popular Chinese folk music, using imagery to depict the iron fist of the proletariat striking at capitalists, or using ballet performances to tell stories about landlords exploiting peasants so as to stir up public hatred against the landlord class as a whole. Meanwhile, when operating internationally, the CCP performs soft power infiltration by exporting communist art under the banner of Chinese Culture.

The CCP first introduced this concept of "Culture Going Abroad" (文化走出去) in the mid-1990s, and the idea was officially adopted as part of the CCP's core strategy at the Sixth Plenum of the 17th Party Congress on October 18, 2011. In detail, the adopted strategy consists of the following directives: Develop multi-channel, multi-format, and multi-level cultural exchanges.

Innovate overseas propaganda methods and "enhance international discourse power."

Implement the "Culture Going Abroad" project.

Strengthen the development of overseas Chinese Cultural Centers and Confucius Institutes.

Establish mechanisms of cultural exchange.

Create a mechanism of cultural exchange for youth in other countries and set up Chinese culture international promotion awards and international-level cultural awards. {2}

Many CCP researchers have justified or praised this strategy of soft power competition, emphasizing how culture plays a subtle yet pivotal role in shaping thoughts and "is the highest form of conquest." {3} Beijing has implemented government policies and devoted tremendous efforts to making the "Culture Going Abroad" strategy a success. {4} {5} As a result, Chinese performing arts troupes, ranging from the Peking Opera to acrobatics groups, from national-level to small-time troupes, have frequented theaters in the U.S. as well as in other countries.

One example of praise for this strategy came from China News Service (CNS), the second-largest state news agency in China. CNS, which is under the purview of the CCP's United Front Department, published an article in July of 2023 saying that the Anhui Huangmei Drama Theater had traveled to the U.S. as well as nearly 20 other countries, calling the group "a leading 'Culture Going Abroad' performance troupe." The article also declared, "With the blessing of Anhui Province's 'Culture Going Abroad' strategy, Huangmei opera (one of China's five major opera genres) has not only appeared on the world stage but has also taken root in many countries and regions." {6}

Logistics, Coordination, and Recruitment

The CCP is not just focusing on the biggest cities and states in the U.S.; it has been targeting the entire country. During the period from 2011 through 2019, we have records of Chinese performance troupes visiting at least 44 U.S. states (including Washington, DC). Given what we know about the CCP's pattern of political maneuvering, and given that the data we've obtained are incomplete, we can extrapolate that Chinese troupes have likely visited all fifty states in the U.S., demonstrating an attempt at sub-state level cultural infiltration.

Beijing's strategy for scheduling performances in every corner of the U.S. has been as follows: the national-level and highest-caliber troupes are sent to large cities and top venues, while small-time troupes, e.g. provincial- or municipal-level groups and more entertainment-natured performances, are sent to smaller cities. For example, the Jiangxi Art Troupe, invited by the Chinese Consulate in Chicago, went to Ames, Iowa; Shaanxi Provincial Art Troupe went to Minneapolis, Minnesota; and the Acrobats of China troupe went to Butte, Montana.

Chinese Consulates and other diplomatic and soft-power outlets have played a role in promoting and facilitating performances by Chinese groups in the U.S. For example, one of the first post-COVID Chinese performances in the U.S. was the dance drama "Mulan" by the China Arts and Entertainment Group (CAEG) at the Kennedy Center between September 29th and October 1st of 2023. The Chinese Embassy in the United States gave a high-profile endorsement to the show. The Embassy even co-hosted a debut-day reception with the CAEG, and the Chinese Ambassador delivered remarks. According to the Kennedy Center's website, CAEG is dedicated to spreading Chinese performing arts worldwide and "since its inception in 2009, has presented works at venues across the globe, including Lincoln Center in New York; The Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C.; and performance venues in Australia, New Zealand, UK, Germany, Italy, and throughout Europe." {7}

Beijing has also tried to recruit foreign performing arts venues to its cause, founding a "Silk Road International Theater Alliance" to rope in the world's top-tier theaters. CCP news outlet People's Daily recently reported that "in October 2016, under the guidance of the former Ministry of Culture, the Silk Road International Theatre Alliance was formed. As of today, the alliance has 155 member units from 45 countries and regions, including 83 overseas members and 72 domestic members. Since its establishment, the alliance has played an active role in information exchange, personnel exchanges, and collaboration in performance production among theatre members. It has fostered long-term, deepened cooperation in the field of performing arts with countries participating in the Belt and Road Initiative." {8}

Why Do These Performances Matter?

Some living in free nations may wonder: why should we care about Beijing's "Culture Going Abroad" campaign?

These Beijing-sponsored shows are of concern because the CCP is not a "normal" government. It attaches political, diplomatic, and ideological strings to art exchanges. One well-known example is the now-infamous Confucius Institute Initiative. Twenty years ago, when China began establishing Confucius Institutes at schools throughout the world, how many foresaw that such a language exchange program would be used as a trojan horse for propaganda? Since inception, the Confucius Institutes have been used to "tell the China story," suppress dissidents, isolate Taiwan and Tibet, and dictate to Western universities what they can and cannot say about China.

However innocent they may appear on the surface, these Beijing-sponsored cultural exchanges and performances betray a definite clandestine agenda:

1. The performances present the benevolence and beauty of the Chinese people and of Chinese culture, aiming to give the impression that the CCP too is benevolent and that it poses no harm to the world.
2. The "red" propaganda embedded in these performances can subtly impact the Western audience, leading them to believe that the CCP has benefited the Chinese by bringing them a better life.
3. Through cultural exchange, the CCP connects with potentially influential politicians as well as the cultural elite at the federal, state, and local levels; these individuals are the primary targets of the CCP's united front work.
4. Just as Beijing has engaged in worldwide dumping of "made-in-China" goods, lowering prices and driving out competition, the CCP aims to monopolize the world's theaters. This means squeezing out any non-CCP voices – especially voices that have a different but true story to tell about the history of China or the CCP.

Of course, the individual performers comprising many such Chinese touring troupes may be unaware of the extent of the CCP's ambitions. Nevertheless, the CCP is devoting significant resources to make such a grand infiltration effort possible. It has been covering costs, providing logistical and promotional support, and pulling strings to secure visas and performance venues as appropriate. Let us not forget that the CCP's goal is to propagate its ideology to every corner of the globe, either surreptitiously or by force. It follows the doctrine of "unrestricted war," actively working to permeate all aspects of society, both physical and abstract. The realms of information, culture, ideology, public opinion, and normative morality are all battlegrounds in its fight to consolidate power. The performances of the Chinese troupes can be downloaded here.

Endnotes:

- {1} The Collections of Mao Zedong, Third Volume, "On the Culture and Education Issue at the Shaan-Gan-Ning Border Region," March 22, 1944.
<http://cpc.people.com.cn/GB/64184/64185/189963/11567708.html>.
- {2} Chinascope, "Communist China's Cultural Invasion of the World – Part I," April 15, 2019.
<http://chinascope.org/archives/18295>.
- {3} Ibid.
- {4} Chinascope, "Communist China's Cultural Invasion of the World – Part II," April 19, 2019.
<http://chinascope.org/archives/18299>.
- {5} Chinascope, "Communist China's Cultural Invasion of the World – Part III," April 18, 2019.
<http://chinascope.org/archives/18302>.
- {6} China News Service, "Anhui Huangmei Opera Played Overseas to Renew Its Pre-Destined Relationships with Audience Overseas," July 17, 2023.
<https://www.chinaneews.com.cn/cul/2023/07-17/10044386.shtml>.
- {7} The Kennedy Center, "Image China: Dance Drama MULAN."
<https://www.kennedy-center.org/whats-on/explore-by-genre/dance/2023-2024/image-china-mulan/>.
- {8} People's Daily, "Civilizational Exchanges and Mutual Learning Promote Chinese Culture to Better Reach the World," November 7, 2023.
<http://www.people.com.cn/n1/2023/1107/c32306-40112644.html>.

March

The United States should seek engagement without provocation of China

31 March 2024, East Asia Forum

No foreign policy challenge is more important, or difficult, than finding a way to simultaneously deter and engage China without provoking unwanted behaviours. Achieving this requires understanding the perceptions and priorities shaping Beijing's actions.

Despite China's worsening economic problems and waning international trust, the March 2024 session of the National People's Congress has reaffirmed Beijing's determination to stick with policies fuelling domestic discontent and alienating foreign partners. The reasons are structural, not simply strong-man egoism. Policies in China are tightly interconnected, reflect hard-to-change perceptions, reinforced by bureaucratic and personal interests. Changing one facet requires changing the entire policy package. For now, that package prioritises domestic stability and security over economic growth.

Beijing has fallen into an old mindset that sacrifices growth to reduce vulnerability to external and internal threats that leaders believe endanger the regime and China's future. This is not good for China, the United States or the world. Washington cannot achieve immediate or fundamental changes in China's behaviour but ill-considered actions can make things worse. The best we currently can achieve is wary coexistence, careful management to reduce dangers, and keeping the way open for a better day.

The current bilateral framework of big power politics and competition is harmful to both countries and to efforts to address global challenges. It is vital to acknowledge that US policy is one of the drivers of Chinese behaviour. The United States should strive for a minimally provocative deterrent posture. The United States should adopt policies that make clear that it hopes for the material progress of China in a cooperative framework and that it will support any resolution of cross-strait relations peacefully agreed to by the people on both sides of the Taiwan Strait.

Eventually, the United States and China will adjust their policies toward mutual accommodation, but this could be well into the future and impose high costs on both nations in the interim.

Whenever that new day arrives, it will involve three parallel developments. First, Chinese acceptance that the United States is in Asia to stay. Second, US acceptance that the internal governance of China is a domestic choice of Chinese citizens, not a US change objective. Third, both countries deciding that cooperation to address global challenges is more important than each using the other to justify costly, contested or expedient policies.

Currently, prospects for such a meeting of the minds are poor. Leaders in both countries are firming up their internal support by depicting the other as an existential threat. China has blundered by aligning with the world's worst actors – from Russia to North Korea and Iran – while the United States has erred by driving Beijing further in the wrong direction.

Since at least the 19th century, China has pursued national security and economic modernisation through selective engagement with the West, seeking to acquire technologies that would strengthen China without endangering the domestic system which its elites were determined to preserve. China's twin goals of economic modernisation and internal stability are inextricably linked and always pursued in tandem, but circumstances and leadership calculations episodically change the weight given to each objective.

Over the centuries, China's policy options have coalesced into one of two comprehensive policy bundles. The historically dominant policy bundle prioritises national and regime security over economic growth and is deeply suspicious of outside interference. In such phases China imposes more restrictions on foreign trade, investment, civil society and religion. There is increased emphasis on strong-man rule and ideological indoctrination. This is the China we face today.

Conversely, in periods in which internal stability seems more assured and the West is seen as a positive force in economic modernisation, China prioritises the gains to be made through interdependence and openness. Former Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping embodied this second policy bundle and President Xi Jinping embraces the first.

Until a better day arrives, US strategy needs to hold open the door to the second Chinese policy package, while limiting the damage that the current first policy package does to core US interests. The biggest move the United States could make to influence Chinese behaviour in constructive ways is to get its own governance and economic house in order. Speaking loudly, while carrying a small stick, is provocative.

The United States must avoid setting its strategic goals in a way that implies it is trying to keep China eternally weak, divided and isolated, or that regime change is the US goal written in invisible ink. Statements from officials such as Assistant Secretary of Defense for Indo-Pacific Security Affairs, Ely Ratner, suggesting that even peaceful cross-Strait reunification is strategically unacceptable to Washington, undermines the basis for normalisation achieved in 1979.

Washington should restate the long-held US position that the use of force in the Taiwan Strait is unacceptable, that the United States is not opposed to peaceful reunification and that ties between the United States and Taiwan are unofficial. One Taiwan, One China is not US policy. Washington needs to stop nibbling around the edges of the One China Policy.

The Xi regime is acting as much out of insecurity as it is strength. It also is acting from the belief that the United States is overstretched internationally and divided internally. Washington's route forward, particularly in the 2024 presidential election year, is to make it clear that US foreign policy goals are not antithetical to the legitimate aspirations of the Chinese people. For its part, Beijing must realise it has blundered in choosing team Russia, Iran and North Korea over countries that fuelled its rise during the four-plus decades of engagement. Beijing needs to get back to a policy of reassurance rather than muscle flexing.

Tibetan culture, livelihoods are being damned in Xi Jinping's China

31 March 2024, First Post

In eastern Tibet, local Tibetans have resisted non-violently in the face of an imminent displacement from their ancestral land as China continues with its insatiable exploitation of Tibetan rivers with dams and diversions

Browsing through the pages of 'China's Tibet'—Beijing's primary propaganda magazine on Tibet—one is likely to get an artist's impression of a utopian Tibet—free and galloping like a wild stallion on the path of development.

However, in reality, through these colourful pictures and self-praising language, a chauvinist colonial Beijing masquerades itself as the only agent of liberation and modernisation for the very people it has occupied and colonised.

From time to time, Tibetans break this glassy shroud for the same Beijing to see the disgracefulness of its behaviour under the intoxication of its naked power.

This time, it is in Dege, in eastern Tibet, where local Tibetans have resisted non-violently in the face of an imminent displacement from their ancestral land as China continues with its insatiable exploitation of Tibetan rivers with dams and diversions.

China has planned to build a series of 13 dams on the Driчу River (Ch: Jinsha) on the upper reaches of the Yangtze River in eastern Tibet. These dams will, directly or indirectly, affect Tibetans living in Jomda in the so-called Tibet Autonomous Region, Yulshul in Qinghai, Dege, Markham, Bathang, Serphu, and Derong in Sichuan, and Dechen in Yunnan. All these sites selected for dam construction are areas where local Tibetans have lived for thousands of years as the Driчу River mothered their civilisation and sustained their lives.

Among them, the under-construction Kamtok (Gangtuo) hydropower station (229 metres) in Dege is the main reservoir for the South-to-North Water Diversion project to divert water from the Yangtze to the Yellow River. This dam is about to demolish at least two villages and six Buddhist monasteries, including the famous Wontoe monastery, whose murals date back to the 14th century.

In addition to their cultural values, these Buddhist monasteries and murals are even more precious in the context of the fact that more than 6,000 Tibetan monasteries and temples suffered destruction during the Chinese invasion in the 1950s and later the Cultural Revolution (1966–76).

Those monasteries that survived the ravages of both Chinese military and cultural violence hold special meaning for the Tibetans as cultural heritages that maintain historical and civilizational continuity for a people that continues to face cultural suppression.

The recent public gathering in front of the Dege county government on February 14 took place after the local Tibetans tried almost all the available legal means to prevent an illegal and unjust displacement looming over their villages and monasteries. We can see, in the videos from the scene, Tibetans, including monks and women, literally begging the officials with their thumbs raised to halt the dam construction.

In Tibetan culture, to request someone with one's thumb(s) represents extreme humility to the point of self-humiliation. By using the most humble body language, the local people appealed to the human conscience of Chinese authorities to recognise the magnitude of the devastation that they were about to wreck on the local Tibetans. Many held the Chinese flag in their hands to show their desperation rather than defiance.

However, the manner in which Chinese authorities cracked down on the peaceful Tibetan petitioners, with mass arrests, beatings, and phone confiscations, reflects their colonial mindset. Many had to be hospitalised. A large armed police force is deployed for further suppression, as if there were an armed revolt.

The geographical area threatened by the dam is not some desolate region but a thriving fertile river valley that supports both nomadic and farming activities for the local people. Given the limited arable areas available on the high and dry Tibetan plateau, such fertile river valleys are too priceless to be wasted for a dam whose advantages are questionable and disadvantages are real and long-lasting—both for the people in the affected area and those downstream in China.

The narrative of hydropower stations as clean sources of energy whitewashes the reality of their negative impacts on the whole ecosystem. Often, their construction begins with the mutilation of mountains, the strangulation of rivers, the drowning of vegetation to death, and the mass displacement of vulnerable communities.

Speaking of displacement, who gets displaced for a dam is not merely a question of engineering necessity but power relations, like who is more displaceable in the eyes of dam builders by weighing the political and economic resources of a given community to defend their fundamental interests.

In today's occupied Tibet, the existing political system makes Tibetans the most displaceable, if not disposable, people in the eyes of Beijing. For effective control and surveillance, China has transferred thousands of Tibetans, particularly nomads and farmers, from their ancestral lands to government relocation sites in the name of environmental protection or poverty alleviation.

Relocation, no matter how thoughtful, will never restore what the local people are about to lose—their land and way of life. But for China, it's made clear that the livelihood or cultural heritage of Tibetans is cheaper than a 229-metre-high dam.

In a fundamental sense, terms like relocation or resettlement not only fail to appreciate but also underestimate the whole experience of violence, trauma, and humiliation that the people facing displacement have to suffer—to say nothing of their material loss and physical difficulties.

The displacement of the Tibetans from their lands is a form of colonial dispossession to disempower them, thereby making their ability to earn a living conditional on their political and ideological subservience to colonial Beijing. It is to control their thoughts and behaviour with a rice bowl.

After being kicked out of their villages and monasteries, the Tibetans in Dege, besides being colonial subjects, will become refugees in their own homeland like thousands of other Tibetans displaced from their ancestral lands under different pretexts.

Once built, these dams will stand as monuments to China's colonial subjugation of Tibetan people and their land rather than representing modernisation or development.

Communist China had a good run — but the Party is over

30 March 2024, New York Post

Outside the Chinese Parliament in Beijing, the centerpoint of China's decades of communist rule and economic expansion – the former now beginning to strangle the latter.

China had a good run, but it is now over.

You know it's over when 65 million homes — one-fifth of the nation's total — lie vacant and real-estate prices have collapsed to 2018 levels.

Tens of millions of Chinese plunked down their life savings for an apartment in a high-rise that they will never live in because the builder went bankrupt, leaving the building an uninhabitable empty shell.

You know it's over when China's "official" youth unemployment rate reaches double digits, while its Ministry of Finance reports a 16% drop in personal income tax collected year over year.

Given how the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) toys with statistics, the real numbers must be much, much worse.

Finally, you know China's boom days are over when both capital and people are heading for the exits.

Five hundred billion dollars may have fled the country in 2023 alone and the hemorrhaging continues.

And as far as the human exodus is concerned, look no further than our own southern border.

The Chinese are now the fastest growing demographic attempting to enter the US, with 37,000 apprehended during the last year alone, not counting an unknown number of "gotaways."

While spies and saboteurs are surely among them – the CCP would be foolish not to take advantage of our open border in this way – the vast majority are simply seeking a refuge where their lives and property will no longer be at risk.

How has mighty China, which was supposed to dominate the 21st century, come to this?

The Trump tariffs—imposed in 2018 and still in place today – set China back on its heels. And the COVID debacle deepened China's economic malaise.

But most of the wounds have been self-inflicted.

The Chinese economy is suffering from a kind of death by a thousand cuts perpetrated by the policies of Xi Jinping, a man who models himself on one of the most monomaniacal – and deadly – communist leaders in human history.

There is, one might say, a specter haunting China. It is the specter of Mao Zedong – channeled by his latter-day clone, Xi Jinping.

It wasn't that long ago that former Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping, viewing the serial disasters that Chairman Mao's Great Leap Forward and Cultural Revolution had created, decided that a little private property might not be a bad thing.

He dissolved the communes, encouraged people to go into business for themselves and opened up China to the West.

The result of removing the dead hand of the state was explosive growth.

The Chinese people pulled themselves up by their bootstraps and fueled decades of double-digit economic expansion, along with a new generation of wealth creators.

But then along came Xi Jinping,

Soon after assuming office in 2012, he gave a secret speech to senior leaders in which – sounding like every other communist from Karl Marx on – he predicted "the eventual demise of capitalism and the ultimate victory of socialism."

Many observers, both in China and abroad, dismissed this as mere rhetoric.

Why would anyone in their right mind recklessly tinker with, much less abandon, a successful economic policy that has produced over three decades of mostly double-digit economic growth for China?

Yet, in communism's latest triumph of ideology over experience, Xi is once again driving the Chinese people down the socialist road to ruin.

Xi had to move slowly at first.

He assured China's wealth creators that he had no problem with people getting rich – as long as they used their wealth to serve the Party's interests.

Then, to make sure they did, he sent political commissars to watch over them.

Every major non-state-owned company in China was ordered to add a CCP representative to its board.

The effect was to place a target on the backs of the wealthy. It wasn't long before the more ambitious among those CCP overseers decided that the best way to ensure that the rich used their wealth to serve the Party's interest was to steal it from them.

Taking their cues from Xi's increasing hostility toward private enterprise, government officials at all levels began arresting, imprisoning, executing, and even "suiciding" hundreds of Chinese billionaires and CEOs. China's wealthiest woman, Whitney Duan, was snatched from her Beijing apartment by the security forces in 2017 and has yet to reappear.

In the minds of rapacious Communist officials, the best way to eliminate capitalism has always been to simply eliminate the capitalists themselves.

Not surprisingly, the Chinese economy has been on the skids ever since.

In one sense, Xi is merely doing what all good communists do when they get in a position of power: they choke the life out of the economy—and out of any person who gets in the way.

We know how this tale ends.

Whenever a Chairman Mao or a President Xi decides that producing tyranny is more important than producing the goods – as they all do sooner or later – economic collapse follows.

When that day arrives, the Chinese people should not expect sympathy from Xi.

After all, they got none from his mentor either, when Mao's own foray into collectivist folly ended in famine.

As tens of millions of his countrymen were starving to death in the early sixties, Mao simply shrugged: "Deaths have benefits, they fertilize the ground."

Opinion: A Gullible Singer And a Few Questions

25 March 2024, Bhuchung D. Sonam, Phayul

Switzerland based Tibetan musician Dechen Shak Dagsay (Photo/Instagram)

About a week ago, a minor-league Swiss-based Tibetan singer named Dechen Shak-Dagsay attended an event organised in Geneva by the China Society for Human Rights – one of many propaganda fronts of the Chinese Communist Party – during which she said that “the Tibetan language is spoken all over the place [Lhasa]” and thanked China “for giving our young generation in Tibet such a unique opportunity to excel in their studies, and each one becomes a precious gem, shining from the roof of the world.”

In a subsequent video clarification after harsh reactions from the exile Tibetans, Shak-Dagsay said that “we have shouted for sixty years, which only widened the gap between Tibetans inside and those of us in exile” and that “Tibetan language, culture and everything is so well maintained there [in Tibet].” Commenting on China’s colonial boarding schools, she said that “China spends huge money on this ... [and that] exile Tibetans should never oppose it.”

An in-depth report on China’s colonial boarding school by the Tibetan Action Institute found out that about a million Tibetan students in occupied Tibet are coerced into state-run schools, which “function as sites for re-molding children into Chinese nationals loyal to the CCP,” and are “removed from their families and communities, students must study primarily in Chinese, are barred from practicing their religion, and are subjected to political indoctrination.”

Dr Gya Lo, educational sociologist and a leading expert on China’s assimilation and education policies in Tibet, writes in an op-ed in The New York Times that within a few months of being admitted into one such school in northeastern Tibet, his young grandnieces started to distance themselves from their Tibetan identity and spoke “only Mandarin to each other and remained silent during our family dinner. They had become strangers in their own home.” Dr Gyal has testified on this issue at the UN Human Rights’ Summit, the Canadian House of Commons and other global forums.

China’s ongoing colonial boarding schools are widely covered in the international media, including the BBC, Foreign Affairs and others which led the European Parliament to pass a resolution condemning these schools stating that “80 % of Tibetan children, totalling around one million, have been separated from their families by this system, which aims to forcibly assimilate them culturally, religiously and linguistically into the Han majority.” The US Secretary of State, Antony Blinken, said that his country “is taking steps to impose visa restrictions on PRC officials for the forcible assimilations of Tibetan children in government-run boarding schools.”

In this year’s 10th March Tibetan National Uprising Day speech, President Penpa Tsering of the exile government said that “the ongoing forced assimilation of nearly one million Tibetan children in Chinese state-run colonial style boarding schools and promotion of Chinese language in a large number of kindergartens established across Tibet not only deny Tibetan children the right to learn and use their own language, they are also cut off from their way of thinking, custom and belief, which is giving rise to a generation affected by forced assimilation.”

Many Tibetans have harshly responded on social media to Shak-Dagsay’s groundless and unjustifiable comments by calling her “a Chinese stooge”, “a running dog” and “a Chinese spy”, which is widely off the mark. Shak-Dagsay does not have qualities to be an agent. She is simply a gullible woman who fell for shrewd Chinese propaganda. She was bamboozled into motor-mouthing ready-made half-truths about Tibet and puffery to China because she was given an opportunity to sing in Lhasa and was taken for an officially-vetted tour to spruced up places and schools.

Shak-Dagsay has since issued a reluctant two-sentence apology of a sort to the Tibetans. But the damage is done. China for the moment achieved its mission and got what it wanted:

1) An endorsement from an exile Tibetan to legitimizes its occupation of Tibet and its genocidal policies leading to the destruction of Tibet’s natural environment, self-immolation of 157 Tibetans, jailing of artists and intellectuals, including Go Sherab Gyatso and Gegjom, and corralling of over a million Tibetan children into colonial boarding schools.

2) To cause distrust and disharmony among the Tibetans, which have been clear from angry tirades and invectives thrown at the elderly singer, and a distrust that one of us could do such a thing. These are things that we do not want at all.

What is clear from Shak-Dagsay’s incident is that decades of relentless Chinese disinformation campaigning is working. The timing of this occurrence also seems calculated since the exile parliament is in session to discuss on the long-due charter amendments, and Shak-Dagsay's instance could steal the focus. Judging by the amount of financial and human resources that China pour into its propaganda apparatus, Shak-Dagsay won't be the last exile Tibetan to be conned into its web of lies.

This urgently calls us to rethink, recalibrate, reenergise and restrategise our moves. We also need to ask ourselves how did an exile Tibetan who lives in one of the most democratic countries in the world fall prey to Communist propaganda? Are we not telling our stories good enough? Are we not informing our citizens well enough about democracy and rule of law? What does it say about our communication channels?

Pointing our fingers at Shak-Dagsay – and badmouthing her – may give us a temporary ventilation to our anger, but it won't solve the fundamental problem. We need to do so much more.

As China prepares to invade Taiwan, US forces are about to combat-test a vital weapon

24 March 2024, Telegraph

Building giant steel Lego as Chinese missiles rain down

The main mission of the US Army flotilla now sailing toward Gaza is to build a floating pier that will help ships offload desperately-needed humanitarian aid. But the task force also serves a secondary purpose: it's practice for a critical combat operation – one that could help US forces to roll back Chinese advances in the event of a war over Taiwan.

The Joint Logistics Over-the-Shore pier system, or JLOTS, is a Lego-like suite of floating metal piers and ramps that can connect virtually any ship to virtually any beach. While the Pentagon is sending five 273-foot US Army landing craft to begin building the pier, the final components will sail aboard the 951-foot transport ship Roy A Benavidez, which belongs to the US Navy-administered Ready Reserve Force.

It could take weeks to ship the pier components and days to assemble them. But once the pier is ready, it should be able to move – from sea to shore – 2,000,000 meals per day, according to the Pentagon.

The Pentagon has deployed JLOTS before, perhaps most notably to Haiti following the devastating earthquake in that country in 2010. But it has never deployed it in a major war.

That could change – and soon – if China makes good on decades of threats and launches an invasion of Taiwan. If the People's Liberation Army succeeds in occupying Taiwan's island strongholds in the Taiwan Strait as a prelude to landing on Taiwan itself, counterattacking US forces could face a serious dilemma: how to land their own people and equipment in what amounts to a counter-invasion of mainland Taiwan and its island outposts.

Historically, US forces would force their way ashore aboard US Navy amphibious ships. But the US fleet has lost faith in its traditional amphibious capability as enemy beach-defenses stiffen with increasingly deadly anti-ship missiles. Lately, the US Navy has been decommissioning amphibious ships faster than it commissions them.

But JLOTS endures. And it gives the Pentagon options.

"JLOTS is a critical joint capability that enables US forces to enter a land area from sea despite insufficient port infrastructure," Joseph Tereniak, a US Army officer, wrote recently.

It's not that Taiwan doesn't have great ports: it does. But if Chinese forces control those ports as US and allied forces counterattack, the Americans and their allies will need some other way of moving heavy equipment over the beaches. "Potential adversaries will attempt to deny access to fixed ports," US Army officer Tom Clady wrote in 2013. "Seabasing provides a viable alternative to project forces."

The problem with JLOTS, of course, is that it's a big floating target that takes days to set up and, even when it's working perfectly, is a delicate piece of maritime clockwork. The speed at which soldiers and sailors can build the pier – and rebuild the pier in the event of an enemy attack – could make the difference between victory and defeat.

Back in 1996, a naval official named Harold Workman warned of a "lack of training, and therefore diminished proficiency levels," that could doom JLOTS ops in wartime. It's not clear that, nearly 30 years later, the US Army and US Navy have solved the training problem. JLOTS just doesn't get used very often in a truly stressful environment.

Gaza is nothing if not a stressful environment, with Israeli forces relentlessly bombarding cities and towns and even hospitals and Iran-backed militants – including the Houthis in Yemen – lobbing drones and missiles at commercial and naval vessels in the region.

US president Joe Biden announced the Gaza pier operation during his annual state-of-the-union address to the US Congress on March 7.

"I'm directing the US military to lead an emergency mission to establish a temporary pier in the Mediterranean on the Gaza coast that can receive large ships carrying food, water, medicine and temporary shelters," Biden said.

"No US boots will be on the ground," Biden added. They'll only be on the pier.

Increasingly impatient with Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Biden is counting on the US Army's logistics fleet not only to save Gazan lives, but also to signal his – and America's – opposition to continuing Israeli aggression. As a bonus, the fleet will be practicing a unique military skill: the construction of a temporary port.

"This temporary pier would enable a massive increase in the amount of humanitarian assistance getting into Gaza every day," Biden said.

It would be crass to think of the coming humanitarian JLOTS deployment primarily as practice for war. But it would also be naive to pretend American soldiers and sailors won't benefit from building a pier from scratch in a war zone. Even if that war doesn't directly involve US troops.

Those Americans just might be ordered to build the pier again in the waters around Taiwan, while Chinese missiles rain down.

Xi's China deserves a diplomatic surgical strike by India on Tibet

24 March 2024, Vijay Kranti, Organiser

Having seen PM Modi's aggressive and decisive response to Pakistan's Uri and Pulwama acts, the Indian people are disappointed at a docile, timid and verbose response to China's insult on issues related to India's Arunachal Pradesh. India now needs to hit at the fountain head of China's aggression its illegal occupation of Tibet Beijing's aggressive reaction against Prime Minister Narendra Modi's visit to India's north-eastern state of Arunachal Pradesh for the inauguration of a strategically important road tunnel at Sela Pass on March 9 was no less intense and bullying than China's earlier reactions on similar occasions in the past. Hence, it was not very surprising, though shocking, for the common Indians. But what is surprising is the defensive response of the Modi government that had otherwise earned a different image and expectations after India's aggressive and decisive response to Pakistan in Balakot and across the LOC in Jammu & Kashmir.

New Delhi's verbose and oft-repeated reaction to China's aggressive and humiliating assertion has disappointed those who are watching India's foreign policy achieve new heights under the Modi government. They see it as just a replay of what is generally termed a docile, timid and self-evasive 'Nehruvian' response, which BJP and its leaders have always scoffed at. Trying to dismiss China's claims over Arunachal Pradesh, the MEA statement from New Delhi on March 12 looks like a copy-past exercise. This time, it reads that China's claims "will not change the reality that the State of Arunachal Pradesh was, is, and will always be an integral and inalienable part of India". In his media briefing, the Indian spokesman once again tried to assure the nation by saying, "The Chinese side has been made aware of this consistent position on several occasions."

This MEA's statement is in no way different from what it had said when Beijing challenged all similar visits by other Indian leaders like Home Minister Amit Shah in April 2023, PM Dr. Manmohan Singh in October 2009, USA's New Delhi-based Ambassador's visit in November 2023; Dalai Lama's visit in April 2017 or China's other humiliating acts like assigning Chinese names to more than 11 Indian cities and towns of Arunachal in 2017 and 2023. In July last year, China again issued stapled visas to Indian athletes from Arunachal and Jammu & Kashmir for participation in the Asian Games, saying that it does not recognize J&K as a part of India and that the Arunachal visitors don't need a Chinese visa as they are 'Chinese' citizens.

An ordinary Indian today has come to realize that Xi Jinping's ever-increasing assertion on claiming Arunachal as a 'part of China' and his open challenge to the authority and right of the Indian PM even against entering a State of his own country amounts to a far more aggressive act than Pakistan's open support to separatism and terrorist acts at Pathankot, Uri and Pulwama.

Looking back into the history of India-China relations, one will be amused to notice that neither the tendency of Chinese aggression and advances on Indian soil has changed over the past seven decades, nor there is a change in India's defensive and half-hearted, rather apologetic tone against the Chinese manoeuvres. For example, soon after occupying Tibet in 1950-51, China quietly grabbed about 38,000 sq km of Indian land of Aksai Chin in upper Ladakh. When the Indian Foreign Secretary brought this to the notice of PM Pandit Jawahar Lal Nehru, he was furious. He instructed the FS to send a strong letter of protest to Peking (i.e. today's 'Beijing'). However, only a few hours later, Nehru called him back and asked him to hold it, saying he would talk to Chinese PM Zou Enlai.

But it never happened. It was only in September 1957, when China inaugurated the 1200 km long stretch of G-219 highway through Aksai Chin and invited the Indian Ambassador in Peking to attend the ceremony, that the Nehru Government got furious. Even then, the official reaction from New Delhi was limited to the question: how did Chinese labour enter this Indian region without an Indian visa?

In the next five years, China developed Tibet into a military foothold and used the Tibetan land as its launch pad to attack an unprepared and unsuspecting India in October 1962. However, despite suffering a humiliating defeat in this attack from China, India has perpetually failed to realize that it is only illegally occupying Tibet, which is the real fountainhead of all aggression and territorial troubles for India from Beijing rulers. Indian security agencies have confirmed once and again that China has been using the occupied Tibetan land for training, sheltering and supplying arms, money and drugs to a host of anti-India terrorist and separatist groups like the Naxalites, Nagas, Mizos etc.

The latest Chinese danger, looming large from across the Indo-Tibetan borders, is President Xi Jinping's campaign to occupy the religious institution of reincarnation of Tibetan Buddhism. His real aim is to install the next, i.e., the 15th Dalai Lama, as a Chinese puppet after the demise of the current ageing 14th Dalai Lama. This exiled religious ruler of Tibet has been living in India since 1959, when China violently crushed the Tibetan people's uprising against its colonial rule, and the 25-year-old Dalai Lama had to escape to India to save his life. Understanding the fallout of this move of Xi Jinping, the US Congress, despite a serious clash of opinion and policies among the warring Democrats and Republicans, has passed a near-unanimous bipartisan constitutional amendment which makes it obligatory for all future Presidents and governments of the USA to take effective action against Chinese government to stop it from usurping the institution of Dalai Lama.

Unfortunately, total silence and indifference on the part of New Delhi make one believe that the Indian Government is oblivious to the severe consequences of Xi's designs for India's national integrity and sovereignty. The fact remains that the supreme religious root-temples and root-Gurus of almost all Buddhist traditions of Indian Himalayas, Nepal and Bhutan today lie inside Chinese occupied Tibet. A situation in which a puppet Dalai Lama and other incarnate root Gurus would act on Beijing's diktats holds seeds of imminent havoc falling upon the entire 4000-long Himalayan belt for all these three countries. This single development can convert today's Ladakh, Himachal, Uttarakhand, Sikkim and Arunachal from India's 'first line of defence' to porous floodgates of sabotage and rebellion against India's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

This surely calls for a qualitative change in the Indian Government's approach towards the Dalai Lama and the overall issue of Tibet. Sadly, right from the day the Chinese PLA marched into Tibet in 1950 to walk over to India's borders and subsequent signing away of Tibet by New Delhi as 'China's Autonomous Region' through its much-hyped 'Panchsheel' Agreement of 1954, all Indian governments have been handling Dalai Lama and the issue of occupied Tibet as a liability rather than an asset in their dealings with Beijing. With consistent use of Tibet as an anti-India launch pad and Xi's claims on Arunachal as 'Southern Tibet', New Delhi must have by now realized that the natural source of trouble from China for India is the former's colonial control and presence in Tibet. Unless India starts contesting and challenging China's illegal occupation of Tibet, New Delhi cannot hope for any end to the Chinese aggression.

It may not be easy for India to take any military action against today's mighty and rogue China. But the policymakers in New Delhi can surely use some fine surgical tools of diplomacy and international politics by taking some decisive baby steps like standing by the Dalai Lama on the issue of his reincarnation, honouring him with India's highest civilian award, 'Bharat Ratna' (as in the cases of other foreigners like Mother Teresa, Nelson Mandela and Khan Abdul Gaffar Khan); and bestowing a more respectful status to Dalai Lama's Dharamshala 'Central Tibetan Administration' as compared to its present 'NGO' like status in India. Taken one after another in a staggered manner, such steps are bound to force Xi and his communist establishment to shift from their aggressive gear to a defensive one. But that can happen only if the Modi government decides to show the courage of undertaking a diplomatic surgical strike in the same way as it did on the war front with Pakistan in Balakot and Uri.

Why is China provoking India over Arunachal Pradesh?

21 March 2024, Hindustan Times

China, under Xi Jinping, has gone downhill economically as well as politically with its BRI brand losing sheen by the day.

New Delhi: Chinese reiteration of its unfounded cartographical claims over Arunachal Pradesh in the wake of Prime Minister Narendra Modi's visit to the border state this month is part of Beijing's plan to keep scent marking its territorial claims as also deliberately provoking India.

While the Modi government has verbally retaliated to Chinese uncalled-for statements on Arunachal Pradesh, the fundamental objective is to draw Bharat into a verbal match and keep the comatose issue alive. The fact is China under Xi Jinping has gone downhill economically as well as politically with its BRI brand losing sheen by the day as countries like Italy have walked out of the Communist debt trap. By contrast, India has grown under PM Modi economically and politically with Bharat on the way to acquiring the global heft needed to tackle coercive powers like China.

20 March 2024, First Post

However, India has learnt to play the Chinese on their own game. The Modi government also repeats the standardized text in response to Chinese ad-nauseam claims over Arunachal Pradesh and parts of East Ladakh. Gone are the days when India would get hassled by oft-repeated Chinese statements and the Modi government is assiduously engaging allies in South East Asia with External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar in the Philippines on March 25 and profile of Taiwan increasing in India. US leadership may be in confusion over 'One China' policy but India has not uttered the magic words for Chinese for the past decade even as it continues to engage the Tibetan leadership in exile as well as openly supporting freedom of navigation in the South China Sea.

The Chinese provocation also is designed to provide fodder to the Indian opposition who themselves are trying to egg on the Modi government to take on the PLA for political rather than any nationalistic reasons. The Indian military border infrastructure all along the 3488 km LAC has taken a jump for the best under the Modi regime and classified efforts are also being made to ensure that the Indian troops never run out of ammunition and artillery in the worst-case scenario.

The real reason is that the Chinese economic bubble has burst because of the stock market decline. There are credible reports that the Communist state has intervened in the stock market in excess of RMB 400 billion, which is the second highest after their intervention in 2015 stock market collapse. In 2015, they had intervened to the extent of RMB 900 billion to revive its spiraling stock market. The current BRI debt is close to a trillion US dollars with countries like client state Pakistan, Sri Lanka, Maldives, Venezuela, Kenya, Tanzania, Uganda, Angola, Laos in no position to repay Beijing and being forced to part with state equity to repay the very high interest loans. The only other option is for Communist to take a haircut on these bad debts or give a loan waiver. But the latter is not possible as China projected growth this year is five percent with US political leadership slowly waking up to Beijing's coercion even as Europe is still playing the fence sitter.

The best way for India to deal with Chinese stuck record on Arunachal Pradesh is to have its own repudiation of Beijing's claim on an audio loop.

India has reiterated that it remains unconcerned about China's objections, protests and criticism. It will not normalise ties till the situation reverts to pre-April 2020

At the Express Adda last week, External Affairs Minister, S Jaishankar, answering a question posed by Zhou Yongsheng, political counsellor at the Chinese embassy in New Delhi, mentioned, "I think it's in our common interest that we should not have that many forces on the LAC, it's in our common interest that we should observe agreements that we have. And today, it's not just in common interest, I believe it's in China's interest as well."

He added, "I'm still very much committed to finding a fair, reasonable outcome (to the standoff at the LAC). But one which is respectful of agreements, which recognises the LAC, and doesn't seek to change the status quo." Jaishankar stuck firmly to the Indian stance that unless the border is resolved, relations cannot be normal, while mentioning that the situation was 'very tense and dangerous.'

The Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson, Wang Wenbin, responded to Beijing's standard approach, by stating, "China has stressed multiple times that the boundary question does not represent the entirety of China-India relations, and should be placed appropriately in bilateral relations and managed properly." The standoff in Ladakh continues since the Chinese intrusion in the summer of 2020.

A day prior, the Chinese had lodged a diplomatic protest over Prime Minister Narendra Modi's visit to Arunachal Pradesh to inaugurate the Sela Tunnel. In the protest it reiterated its claims to the region and mentioned that 'such moves will only complicate the unresolved boundary question'. India rejected the claim by responding that Arunachal Pradesh 'was, is, and will always be an integral and inalienable part of India'.

The same day Rs6,621 crore were sanctioned for the construction of the planned frontier highway in Arunachal Pradesh. This is expected to enhance connectivity to border areas as well as foster socio-economic growth. In 2014, once this project was announced, China objected by stating, "Before the border problem is solved, we hope the Indian side will not take any action that could further complicate the relevant issue, so as to preserve the current situation of peace and stability in the border area."

When India conducted its Agni-5 MIRV (Multiple Independently Targetable Re-entry Vehicle) test in the Bay of Bengal last week, China moved its research vessel, Xian Yang Hong 01, to monitor it. The vessel was deployed in international waters off the Vizag coast, under surveillance of the Indian navy.

The Chinese government mouthpiece, The Global Times, commented that the test indicates that 'India's main hypothetical enemy is China, with its goal of having missile coverage over China to enhance deterrence capabilities.' Its assessment was true. It also linked the test to Prime Minister Modi's visit to Arunachal.

Around the same time, The Global Times, in an opinion piece, hit out against India's policies towards Chinese mobile manufacturers. The government had demanded that Chinese mobile companies be transparent and accountable to Indian laws. To ensure this they must have 'Indian management, Indian distributors and local contract manufacturers.' The Chinese media termed the Indian action as 'trade protectionism.'

However, The Global Times ignored the fact that Indian directives were intended to curb illegal practices of Chinese companies. In December 2021, income tax authorities raided the offices of Xiaomi and OPPO, both Chinese companies, for violating rules and evading taxes. Earlier, Chinese firms running mobile loan applications and transport businesses were raided. The Minister of State for Electronics and IT, Rajeev Chandrashekar, had stated in the Rajya Sabha, in July last year, that Chinese smartphone makers including OPPO, Xiaomi and Vivo have been 'found evading taxes worth Rs 9000 Crores.'

In October 2023, the Enforcement Directorate arrested four executives of Chinese smartphone maker Vivo, including one Chinese national, in relation to a pending case of money laundering. Chinese companies had assumed that they could act against Indian laws because of diplomatic protection from their government. Government scrutiny of Chinese firms increased post Galwan. Chinese mobile companies currently control almost 70 per cent of the market in India.

The Chinese protesting high-level visits to Arunachal Pradesh are nothing new nor unexpected. It had resorted to criticising the prime minister's visit in February 2019 also. It had also objected when the US Ambassador, Richard Verma, visited the state in October 2016. Beijing had then warned Washington, mentioning, 'We urge the United States to stop getting involved in the China-India territorial dispute and do more to benefit this region's peace and tranquillity.'

In 2019, when the then US Ambassador, Kenneth Juster, visited Arunachal Pradesh, the US state department commented, "The Tawang visit highlights resolute US support for Indian sovereignty and commitment to local partnerships." This irked the Chinese. Beijing repeated its objections even when the current US ambassador, Eric Garcetti, visited the state in November last year.

It had opposed the visit of the Dalai Lama in both 2009 and 2017. In 2017, the Chinese spokesperson stated, "India, in disregard to China's concerns, obstinately arranged the Dalai Lama's visit to the disputed part of the eastern part of the China-India border, causing serious damage to China's interests and China-India relations." In every case, India countered the Chinese claiming Arunachal Pradesh belongs to India. Chinese objections are ignored and counters issued as a matter of routine.

The competition for regional dominance continues between the two nations. When the Chinese satellite tracking vessel, Yuan Wang 5, docked in Sri Lanka, despite Indian protests, in August 2022, it was received by pro-China Sri Lankan lawmakers as also the Chinese ambassador to Colombo. The Chinese ambassador even published an article on the docking in a local daily. The intent was to display diplomatic victory.

This year, when India pushed Sri Lanka to not permit the Chinese research vessel from docking, New Delhi considered it a diplomatic win. When it was granted permission to dock in Male, The Global Times stated, "The diplomatic actions India previously took to pressure Sri Lanka against the Chinese research vessel seem unlikely to work with the Muizzu government."

India's engagements with Taiwan are on the rise, which is bound to irk China. Apart from inking an agreement to move Indian workers to Taiwan and honouring their Foxconn Group's CEO and Chairman, Young Liu, with a Padma Bhushan, the government is establishing semiconductor plants in collaboration with Taiwan. Laying the foundation stone, the prime minister stated, "Leaders from Taiwan have also joined us in today's programme virtually." Unofficially, India is dumping the one-China policy.

India has reiterated that it remains unconcerned about China's objections, protests and criticism. It will not normalise ties till the situation reverts to pre-April 2020. China has understood Indian intent, and also noted its confidence in countering them. India will not bend, will China?

There will be no 'short, sharp' war. A fight between the US and China would likely go on for years.

19 March 2024, Atlantic Council

Everyone loves a short, sharp war. They end on time, are won decisively, and provide tight narrative completion for the stories we want to tell.

Among military commanders, planners, and theorists, this often manifests itself in the quest for the decisive battle—one that will inflict such a stunning defeat on the enemy that its will to fight is broken, forcing enemy leadership to sue for peace or otherwise accept terms of surrender. In naval warfare, Alfred Thayer Mahan embodied this ideal in his prescription to mass one's superior fleet against an adversary's inferior fleet, seek and win decisive battles, and thereby win command of the sea.

This bias is borne out in modern US war games, in which players command opposing armed forces in simulated warfare. Usually sponsored by military commands or think tanks, such games generally open with a compressed "road to war," or a backstory and the conditions under which the notional war begins. The players—usually a mix of military officers, officials, policymakers, and think tankers—"fight" a highly kinetic scenario at the opening stage of a conflict. While a war game might theoretically play out over a longer period, time constraints in the real world typically compel game sponsors and facilitators to end these games in a short period, often in a few days or a little over a week. Conclusions are then made based off of the snapshot provided by this brief gameplay. The results inform commanders and policymakers as they approve war plans and military investments.

In the United States, war-game results might, for example, inform prioritization of weapons procurement by the Office of the Secretary of Defense or the enthusiasm for Congress to invest in security infrastructure across the Indo-Pacific. Recently, an unclassified Center for Strategic and International Studies war game played out a scenario in which the United States fought China and won—albeit at great cost. While informative, this game focused largely on a short, decisive fight in and around Taiwan and the first island chain.

The same trend is borne out in the literary genre of "useful fiction." Recent novels such as Ghost Fleet and White Sun War depict wars fought primarily between the United States and China. Almost always in such works, the war is brought to a satisfying conclusion over a relatively short time frame. In part, this is a function of the commercial format, which almost certainly inclines authors toward tidy endings to satisfy publishers and readers alike. But the novels' popularity among military readers and their placement on official military service reading lists also reveal a predilection in the US military to think in terms of quick wars with decisive outcomes.

But wars between great powers are rarely short and sharp. They are more often long, grueling slogs of attrition that tend to expand horizontally, ensnaring other regions in their wake. Of course, it is possible that a US-China conflict over Taiwan could be an exception, that it could be brief and limited instead of protracted and wide-spread, but it's irresponsible to assume such an outcome given history.

For the French and the British, the American Revolutionary War was but a single theater of war in what was then the latest episode of an enduring conflict that spanned the globe. At the outset of World War I, popular opinion in Britain, among other belligerents, held that the war would be "over by Christmas," only for that nation and the world to endure four long years of slaughter. Imperial Japan launched its surprise attack on Pearl Harbor based on the assessment that it would convince the United States to cede to Japan its interests in the Pacific. Instead, Japan found itself fighting for years on the strategic defensive, until the atomic bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki forced Japan's unconditional surrender.

Examples abound, but the historical record repeats this simple but critical theme: Great powers rarely settle military conflicts with other great powers in a neat, tidy fashion. Yet despite career requirements to attend professional schools where military history is at the heart of the curriculum, military planners continue to chase the unicorns of decisive battles and short wars. Cathal Nolan documents this phenomenon, and reveals its hollowness, in his masterful The Allure of Battle.

But if one were to write the novel that more precisely illustrates the long, global grind that a war between the United States and China would entail, it might appear something like this:

The opening pages showcase the trends of modern war games and novels, where naval combatants, fifth-generation aircraft, missile forces, and non-kinetic effects wreak havoc in the war's opening days, crippling the air and naval power of the belligerents. Thousands upon thousands are killed in this first stage of the conflict. But the war expands horizontally, with China, Russia, and North Korea aligned against the United States, Taiwan, Japan, the Philippines, Australia, South Korea, and others. Fighting occurs in multiple theaters within United States Indo-Pacific Command and beyond, including a massive conflagration on the Korean peninsula. Soon, the ability to hurl precision munitions back and forth culminates as expenditure rapidly outpaces production capacity and as US fuel stocks in the Pacific dwindle. With pressure increasing and options decreasing, tactical nuclear weapons are employed on the battlefield . . . and yet the war drives on.

Thus would end the first chapter. The reader turns the page, which says: "Three years later."

And with some skillfully placed exposition, the author reveals the massive changes that have occurred across society as belligerents commit to a long, bloody war. Nations have fully mobilized their economies to support what is now an existential war.

Drafts and conscription are made mandatory to fill and maintain the ranks of multiple field armies, amphibious corps, fleets, and air forces. The war is not limited to the first island chain, but has multiple theaters that span the globe and escalates horizontally, with simultaneous conflicts drawing in additional belligerents. Emergency powers are universally invoked by executive branches, curtailing liberties in even the historically freest societies. The threat of nuclear holocaust is ever-present, and continuous fighting through tactical nuclear exchanges shatters previous conceptions of escalation management.

While these are logical conclusions should a US-China war occur, they usually take a backseat in policy analysis, strategic thinking, and operational planning, eclipsed again and again by a hyperfocus on a limited conflict in and around Taiwan. Committing the preponderance of security studies to the first phases of a global war of attrition is short-sighted, like a chess player who studies openings but fails to study the mid-game or its closing. None of this is easy, of course. Large-scale war disrupts societies and technology in profound and often unexpected ways. But because of this feature and not in spite of it, US policymakers and military leaders must rigorously study and plan for a broad range of implications of a years-long war with China.

With new national security legislation, China shows it will never loosen its grip on Hong Kong

19 March 2024, VOX

21 years ago, half a million Hong Kongers took to the streets to stop Article 23. This month, Beijing finally won.

On Tuesday, the government of Hong Kong passed the latest of a series of increasingly draconian national security laws. This one will target espionage, treason, and foreign political interference — all of which are fuzzily defined at best — and those found guilty of violating some of its tenets could be sentenced to life imprisonment.

This might sound niche or even well-intentioned; doesn't the US have its own fears about foreign political interference in its elections? But this isn't really about national security. It is, as Human Rights Watch put it, "Beijing's latest effort to transform Hong Kong from a free society to an oppressed one where people live in fear."

That effort has been underway at varying speeds since Hong Kong was returned to Beijing's control in 1997. Despite complaints from foreign governments, from what remains of Hong Kong civil society, and even from the city's increasingly beleaguered international business community, that effort is now all but complete.

For Hong Kong's 7.4 million citizens, the multiyear fight to maintain some semblance of self-government and political rights is basically over. There is no news here.

But the name of this new legislation — Article 23 — will jog the memory of anyone who has lived in or observed Hong Kong over the past quarter-century. It's a name that was once a symbol of Hong Kongers' refusal to submit to Beijing's will and their willingness to take to the streets to fight for their liberty.

The backstory of Hong Kong's Article 23

Article 23 is found in Hong Kong's Basic Law, a city constitution of sorts worked out between Beijing and the British government in the years leading up to Hong Kong's return to Chinese rule. It states, among other things, that Hong Kong's government will "enact laws on its own to prohibit any act of treason, secession, sedition, subversion against the Central People's Government" in Beijing.

It wasn't until nearly six years after the 1997 handover that Hong Kong's government, with more than a little nudging from Beijing, made a serious effort to pass a law that would fulfill Article 23. Legislation was drafted in February 2003 that, among other provisions, would have allowed the Hong Kong government to ban any organization if it had links to organizations banned in China for national security reasons.

That alarmed pro-democracy groups in Hong Kong, where hundreds of thousands of people from China had found refuge following the Chinese Communist Party's takeover of the mainland in 1949, as well as the city's vibrant Christian churches, which feared being forced out of existence.

But there were fears that went beyond the text of the legislation.

The relationship between Hong Kong and China after the former's return was defined by the phrase "one country, two systems." Formulated by former Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping, who had a knack for pithy political expressions, this meant in practice that Hong Kong would be largely left to run under its own system of laws — including general civil liberties like freedom of speech and press — while acknowledging that ultimately, Hong Kong was part of the Chinese state.

So Hong Kongers were always on the lookout for signs that "two systems" were becoming one. The introduction of Article 23 legislation in 2003 was that sign.

Still, what could they do about it? The British — who, let's not forget, had never allowed Hong Kong anything like full democracy — were long gone. They might be a Special Administrative Region and have their own passports, but they were part of the People's Republic of China. And in any case, Hong Kong was a city built on trade, not politics. Its business was business.

Then came July 1, 2003.

The march – and what came after

On what was a brutally hot day even for a Hong Kong summer, as many as 500,000 Hong Kongers took to the streets to oppose the Article 23 legislation. It was the largest such protest in the city since hundreds of thousands had marched against the Tiananmen Square massacre in 1989.

I was there, walking among the marchers as a young reporter for Time magazine. It was a cross-section of the Hong Kong I knew – young families, elderly men and women who had once come from the mainland themselves, teenagers at their first protest. They were angry about the Article 23 legislation, about the way their government had mismanaged the SARS outbreak earlier that year, and about the dwindling opportunities for good jobs and decent housing.

But what I remember was the pride present in the crowd. They were proud of their identity as Hong Kongers, as a people with a distinct language, a distinct culture, and, yes, distinct rights. They took to the streets because they would not allow that identity and those rights to be taken from them without a fight.

And they won, at least temporarily. The Article 23 legislation was eventually shelved.

But not forever. By the 2010s, with the less pragmatic and more autocratic Xi Jinping leading China, Beijing began to squeeze. Legislation was introduced to bring "moral and national education" to Hong Kong's curriculum, code for Beijing's view of history, and what limited representation existed in the city's legislature was further constrained.

At every turn, Hong Kongers returned to the streets in protest, most famously in the "Umbrella Revolution" of 2014. They won some battles and became a symbol of the global fight for democracy. But it was a war they couldn't win.

Xi Jinping had no interest in two systems – only his. And with every year, the room for free expression was further curtailed until there was no room at all. The new Article 23 legislation merely confirms that fact.

For one day, though, in July 2003 – and on many days that would follow – Hong Kongers showed what it was to act on freedom.

In the busy waters between China and Taiwan, the de facto border is being tested

19 March 2024, The Guardian

Around Kinmen, "Beijing has been careful to avoid looking excessively provocative even while using the incident to try to undermine Taiwan's authority," says Amanda Hsiao, a Taiwan-based senior China analyst at the International Crisis Group.

"The use of law enforcement patrols as a means of signalling displeasure is likely to continue, but Beijing may also choose to dial the frequency and intensity of those patrols up or down in response to events".

Last week the director-general of Taiwan's National Security Bureau, Tsai Ming-ye, told parliament that China was running "joint combat readiness patrols" on average every seven to 10 days in an effort to normalise the activity.

The end of the 'silent agreement'

On Kinmen, residents are relaxed, and dismiss the recent furore as bad faith parties "internationalising" a tragic accident. Attitudes towards cross-strait relations and national identity are different to those on Taiwan's main island. "The geographical economy and culture mean these two areas are always close," says independent local councillor Tung Sen-po.

Kinmen is home to more than 140,000 people. It is a quiet, semi-rural community, with visible signs of thousands of years of culture and hundreds of being a military staging base or frontline to multiple conflicts. The economy once relied on the thousands of soldiers stationed there during and after the Chinese civil war, but has since pivoted to tourism and production of a local liquor, kaoliang. In 2020 it was Taiwan's fifth-richest county in terms of median income.

Around Kinmen, "Beijing has been careful to avoid looking excessively provocative even while using the incident to try to undermine Taiwan's authority," says Amanda Hsiao, a Taiwan-based senior China analyst at the International Crisis Group.

"The use of law enforcement patrols as a means of signalling displeasure is likely to continue, but Beijing may also choose to dial the frequency and intensity of those patrols up or down in response to events".

Last week the director-general of Taiwan's National Security Bureau, Tsai Ming-ye, told parliament that China was running "joint combat readiness patrols" on average every seven to 10 days in an effort to normalise the activity.

The end of the 'silent agreement'

On Kinmen, residents are relaxed, and dismiss the recent furore as bad faith parties "internationalising" a tragic accident. Attitudes towards cross-strait relations and national identity are different to those on Taiwan's main island. "The geographical economy and culture mean these two areas are always close," says independent local councillor Tung Sen-po.

Kinmen is home to more than 140,000 people. It is a quiet, semi-rural community, with visible signs of thousands of years of culture and hundreds of being a military staging base or frontline to multiple conflicts. The economy once relied on the thousands of soldiers stationed there during and after the Chinese civil war, but has since pivoted to tourism and production of a local liquor, kaoliang. In 2020 it was Taiwan's fifth-richest county in terms of median income.

The primary worries among Kinmen people are about the tourism economy, and the ongoing restrictions on bilateral travel and trade privileges between their island and Xiamen, which were suspended during the pandemic and only partially restored.

Still, there are some concerns that tensions after the capsized vessel will deter tourists. A taxi driver and hotelier both thought fewer domestic visitors have come since the capsized incident. A couple from Taiwan's main island, surnamed Qiu and Li, say they were worried while planning their visit, but felt reassured once they arrived.

Some residents are concerned about maritime enforcement. At a fish market in Jincheng township, vendors say some fishing crew and tour boats are nervous to head offshore since Chinese patrols ramped up.

"They are worried about safety, and we are also afraid of conflict," says Zhang, a seafood seller.

"We don't think there is any hostility because [fishing crews] sometimes trade at sea, [but] the problem of smuggling is very serious, and sometimes the marine patrols will take care of it, but there are few of us and a lot of them."

In the past, China and Taiwan have cooperated on illegal activity in the strait but the future is now complicated.

Raymond Kuo, a political scientist at the Rand Corporation, says the standoff increases the risk of misunderstandings and accidents.

"Not just between Chinese and Taiwanese enforcement agencies, but also between those agencies and civilians in the area," he says.

"Whose rules and orders should they follow? What if they receive contradictory instructions? This disagreement in enforcement jurisdictions also creates opportunities for illegal activity."

Chinese negotiators left Kinmen weeks ago without an agreement on compensation. Taiwan's Ocean Affairs Council minister, Kuan Bi-ling, has apologised for poor evidence-collecting by Taiwan's coast guard, and expressed regret and condolences over the deaths. But Taiwan's investigation is ongoing, and further information would not be released until it was completed, she said.

On Wednesday last week,, Chen Binhua, spokesperson for China's Taiwan Affairs Office, accused Taipei of stalling, and threatened further countermeasures.

Less than 24 hours later, at least two Chinese fishers were killed in another capsized vessel, this time a registered fishing vessel near Dongding, Kinmen's southernmost island. It was inside the prohibited waters, but the cause wasn't clear. Chinese and Taiwanese authorities conducted the search and rescue, suggesting that at least for now, some cooperation is continuing.

But so are the increased patrols. Over the weekend, four Chinese coastguard vessels entered Kinmen's waters on consecutive days, causing confusion among Taiwanese officials who had just sent help to the capsized vessel.

Tung says the "silent agreement" on the border is gone now, but hopes the two sides can formalise it during negotiations.

Lu too is hopeful that the two sides can move on, and Kinmen's unique position between the two can return to friendlier times.

"The incident could have been minimised in the first place, but now it has become an international issue," he says.

Developments that rattled China in a fortnight

18 March 2024, The New Indian Express

Interesting developments in the domain of Sino-Indian relations took place almost simultaneously last fortnight. The relationship has not been in the best of states since May 2020, when the East Ladakh standoff commenced between the People's Liberation Army (PLA) and the Indian Army and resulted in some serious clashes at Galwan on June 15, 2020. The relationship seemed to dive only further south.

Prime Minister Narendra Modi recently inaugurated the Sela Tunnel, which has been bored at a cost of ₹825 crore and is 1.5 km long at a height of 3,000 metres, well below the height of 4,200 metres at which the Sela Pass exists. The Chinese seemed to have their age-old objection about the visit of any dignitary to Arunachal Pradesh, which they claim as their territory called Southern Tibet (or Zangnam). For the Indian PM, it was perhaps a carefully thought-out measure to assert sovereignty and project a sense of strategic confidence in the face of repeated psychological warfare. The completion of the tunnel in an area it calls its own is itself objected to by the PLA. Little does China and its official media, The Global Times, say about the entire corridor it has constructed through Gilgit-Baltistan, an area legitimately belonging to India.

Militarily, the Sela tunnel acts as a force multiplier in the speedy deployment of troops to hot war locations in the Kameng division of Arunachal Pradesh, one of the regions where the PLA and the Indian Army clashed during the Sino-Indian border war in 1962. With all-weather rapid induction of troops, the tunnel provides a psychological boost for India's military commanders who have always had to fret over the optimum size of deployment for winter and the quantum of winter stocking of supplies and ammunition.

For the layman, it needs to be understood that on the PLA side beyond the Bumla pass north of Tawang, the Tibetan plateau opens out into rolling plains, making logistics and reinforcements the least of its problems. Almost on the same lines, Eastern Ladakh also bears for the Indian Army the challenge of the Ladakh range from Leh to the battle areas. Srinagar and Pathankot have a problem of winter connectivity to Leh through the Himalayan and the Zaskar ranges. For the PLA, Indian infrastructure development should be worrisome, but India is only doing what the PLA did 20-30 years ago and continues to do. It should also be aware that permanent locations with habitat and storage have come up in important places all along the LAC, converting it almost akin to the LoC, which is manned very densely by the Indian Army to prevent any loss of territory.

The other development is in the field of future weaponry. India tested the Made-in-India Agni-5 missile with multiple independently targetable reentry vehicle (MIRV) technology. MIRVs consist of several reentry vehicles, each equipped to carry multiple warheads (2-10) that can be designated for various targets, spaced hundreds of kilometres apart. Alternatively, multiple warheads can target a single location.

This is different from other missile technologies, where a single missile carries only one warhead and targets only a single location. Under Project Divyastra, this is a classic Indian achievement. Only the five big powers possess this capability, which is complex enough to let the warheads be decoys for the adversary's anti-ballistic missiles, or cause far greater destruction through delivery of nuclear munitions to multiple targets several kilometres apart. While the US MIRV capability exists at 12,000-15,000 km, it is not just the long range but the achievement of complex technologies of reentry and multiple targeting that gives greater nuclear deterrence capability to India in a calibrated way. Although Pakistan is reported to be developing a similar capability, India's progress is not aimed at any one adversary but a broad future range of contingencies where the possession of such capability provides inherent deterrence.

Some interesting outcomes appear evident from the successful India MIRV launch. Firstly, with the MIRV range at 5,000 km (with perhaps more to come) China's Global Times quotes Qian Feng, a director of one of its research departments, as saying, "It particularly shows that India's main hypothetical enemy is China, with its goal of having missile coverage over China to enhance deterrence capabilities." What China, its leadership and military hierarchy have to realise is that India, too, is developing at a fast rate and gaining greater confidence as its economy, research and development, technology and human parameters all improve. This is natural for any nation to aspire for.

India is fully perceptive that China does not wish to see India grow and become an alternative pole in Asia. Understanding the inevitability of India's growth, China wishes to scuttle whatever it can to delay the achievement of India's aspiration. The actions China commenced in April-May 2020 in Ladakh have been followed by a tirade of hostility to force India to commit itself far more to its strategic security. It continues to include a mix of various measures to keep India on the defensive; the most recent being the placement of spy vessels of the PLA Navy in the vicinity of India's maritime zone to obtain data from Indian technology tests such as the MIRV. Terming 10,000 Indian troops in Eastern Ladakh, under various stages of re-orbating, as increments on the LAC, when these troops have remained deployed here since April-May 2020, is also unfortunate.

What China needs to realise is that keeping Sino-Indian relations in the grey zone of 'friend, adversary, partner or collaborator' is not helpful to either nation. In a competitive world, with a young population and dynamic human capital, India has all the potential to grow beyond the threshold of a middle power; events such as landmark technological achievements will continuously contribute to China's unfortunate perceptions, and the scope for that will increase manifold with more progress. It probably fears this happening before it has achieved its own threshold objectives, such as the re-integration of all its perceived former territories. Being a potential superpower too, it's not easy to let go of perceptions. Can India do anything more to ease misperception and intent? It will give us more leeway for rapid growth and perhaps even collaboration. Time to think.

Upholding one-China principle an unstoppable historical trend

18 March 2024, People's Daily Online

The separatist activities for "Taiwan independence" are the most destructive elements to the peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait, said Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi when answering questions from Chinese and foreign media about China's foreign policy and external relations recently.

To truly safeguard cross-Strait peace, the world must unequivocally oppose "Taiwan independence." The stronger the commitment to the one-China principle is, the greater the guarantee for the peace across the Strait will be, said Wang, also a member of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China Central Committee.

This solemn stance on the Taiwan-related issues made by the Chinese government has given a serious warning to the "Taiwan independence" separatist forces and external forces behind them, once again sending a powerful message that the historical trend of upholding the one-China principle is unstoppable. Taiwan is China's Taiwan. The elections in Taiwan held this January are just local elections in one part of China. The result does not change, even in the slightest terms, the basic fact that Taiwan is part of China. Nor does it change the historical trend of Taiwan's return to the motherland.

Since the elections ended, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokespersons promptly shared the reaction of the international community to the elections. In just a few days, more than 100 countries and international organizations have reaffirmed their commitment to the one-China principle and their support for China in safeguarding its sovereignty and territorial integrity.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Serbia said in a statement that Serbia, in accordance with its consistent policy and advocacy for adherence to the principles of international law and the Charter of the United Nations, supports the one-China principle, that it does not recognize the statehood of Taiwan.

The Hungarian Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade reaffirmed Hungary's commitment to the one-China principle in the country's foreign policy.

Pushpa Kamal Dahal Prachanda, Prime Minister of Nepal, said Nepal opposes "Taiwan independence," never allows others to use Nepal's territory to engage in any activities that harm China's interests, and opposes any interference in the internal affairs of other countries.

The spokesperson of the Russian Foreign Ministry Maria Zakharova said that the Russian side opposes any form of Taiwan's independence, and called on all outside forces to refrain from provocative actions undermining regional stability and international security.

The Syrian Foreign Ministry said that Taiwan is an inalienable part of the People's Republic of China, and any election or action carried out in Taiwan should not affect this fact.

Leaders of the Maldives, Sierra Leone and other countries issued joint press communiques or joint statements with the Chinese side during their visits to China, reaffirming their commitment to the one-China principle, opposition to external interference in China's internal affairs, and support of all efforts made by China to achieve national reunification.

These voices of justice and peace reflect the broad consensus of the international community in firmly upholding the UN Charter and the basic norms governing international relations, and embody the trend of the times and of history.

The one-China principle is what underpins peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait. Whatever changes take place in Taiwan, the basic fact that there is only one China in the world and Taiwan is part of China will not change; the Chinese government's position of upholding the one-China principle and opposing "Taiwan independence" separatism, "two Chinas" and "one China, one Taiwan" will not change; and the international community's prevailing consensus on upholding the one-China principle and long-standing and overwhelming adherence to this principle will not change.

A few countries, out of geopolitical considerations and ideological confrontation, have chosen to stand in opposition to the vast majority of countries in the international community, obscuring and hollowing out the one-China principle. While paying lip service to not supporting "Taiwan independence," they announce arms sales to Taiwan and collude with the "Taiwan independence" separatist forces.

The Democratic Progressive Party authority has obstinately adhered to the separatist position of "Taiwan independence" and refused to recognize the one-China principle and the 1992 Consensus. It made provocations in pursuit of "independence" in collusion with external forces. Such acts of undermining the one-China principle are despicable and deplorable. These are the root causes of the tensions across the Taiwan Strait.

The Chinese government and people have a clear stance on such plots and tricks. Whoever engages in "Taiwan independence" on the island will be held accountable by history. Whoever in the world connives at and supports "Taiwan independence" will get burned for playing with fire and taste the bitter fruit of their own doing.

Standing up for the one-China principle is the right thing to do. It has the overwhelming support of the international community and represents the prevailing trend of the world. A total of 183 countries have established diplomatic relations with China based on the one-China principle. Taiwan's number of so-called "diplomatic allies" has been reduced to 12, and these countries only account for less than 0.3 percent of the world's population. It's obvious to see which one represents the mainstream and the general trend.

On Jan. 15 this year, the day after the elections in Taiwan concluded, the Nauru government announced its recognition of the one-China principle and severed the so-called "diplomatic relations" with the Taiwan authorities. The country said it is willing to resume diplomatic relations with China.

On Jan. 24, China and Nauru signed a joint communique on the resumption of diplomatic relations at the ambassadorial level. Nauru's Minister for Foreign Affairs and Trade Lionel Aingimea said during his visit to China that the one-China principle is an irresistible trend in the world.

It is believed that more members of the international community will see the historical trend and choose to establish or resume diplomatic relations with China. The international community's prevailing consensus on upholding the one-China principle will become more solid. The Chinese people's just cause of opposing "Taiwan independence" separatism and external interference and striving for national reunification will win more understanding and support.

Some day, there will be a family photo of the whole international community in which all members uphold the one-China principle. It is only a matter of time.

The 2nd session of the 14th NPC: The Government Work Report and Key Takeaways for Inner Mongolia, Tibet and Xinjiang

18 March 2024, Rinzin Namgyal, FNVA

The commemoration of the 70th anniversary of the National People's Congress (NPC) stands as a pivotal juncture in the evolution of China's political framework. Despite enduring perceptions characterizing the NPC as a mere rubber stamp institution, its historical trajectory reveals a substantive legacy of consequential deliberations. Premier Li Qiang's delivery of the government work report during the second session of the 14th NPC underscores this significance, as it serves to delineate key policy initiatives and priorities of the state. Furthermore, scholarly attention is merited towards the NPC's policy directives concerning ethnic minority regions, indicative of China's persistent endeavors towards societal cohesion through assimilative measures. Such analyses contribute to a nuanced understanding of the NPC's multifaceted role within China's political landscape and its implications for governance dynamics.

Government Work Report:

Premier Li Qiang's presentation of the government work report on March 5th served as a focal point for highlighting a spectrum of policy measures. Significantly, the event was preceded by a pre-report seminar wherein insights from eight experts were solicited and incorporated.

Key highlights include:

1. The establishment of a GDP growth target for 2024 at approximately 5 percent, signaling a strategic trajectory for economic expansion.
  2. Facilitation of over 12 million employment opportunities within urban sectors, aligning with objectives to bolster labor market vitality and sustain socioeconomic stability.
  3. Implementation of targeted fiscal measures, including the issuance of special-purpose bonds for local government projects and ultra-long special treasury bonds, to optimize financing mechanisms and support infrastructural development endeavors.
  4. Introduction of the AI Plus initiative alongside a concerted drive to foster innovation in disruptive technologies, underscoring commitments to technological advancement and competitive positioning in global markets.
  5. Adoption of comprehensive measures to invigorate consumer spending and catalyze domestic demand, pivotal for fortifying economic resilience and ensuring sustained growth momentum.
  6. Affirmation of national treatment principles for foreign-funded enterprises and active participation in international trade agreements, indicative of a steadfast commitment to fostering a conducive business environment and deepening global economic integration.
  7. Implementation of targeted risk mitigation strategies to address challenges pertaining to property markets, local government debt dynamics, and the resilience of financial institutions, aiming to safeguard financial stability and mitigate systemic vulnerabilities.
  8. Prioritization of the energy revolution agenda alongside resolute opposition to external interference, reflecting a strategic imperative to enhance energy security and safeguard national sovereignty in economic decision-making.
- Ethnic Minority Regions:
- Ethnic minority regions are divided into cultivated (Shufan) and uncultivated (Shengfan) areas, with historical perceptions of hierarchies.
- The plenary sessions for Inner Mongolia, Xinjiang, and Tibet shed light on regional policies:
1. In Inner Mongolia, the strategic objective is the integration of ethnic minority communities within the broader societal framework, concurrently prioritizing stability initiatives and countering separatist tendencies.
  2. Xinjiang maintains a trajectory of assimilationist policies, with a particular emphasis on the Sinicization of Islam, coupled with efforts aimed at sustaining social cohesion and stability.
  3. Tibet's policy emphasis lies on fostering peace, stability, and development, notwithstanding environmental preservation challenges and the imperative of safeguarding cultural heritage amidst modernization efforts.

Observations and Analysis:

The proceedings of the National People's Congress (NPC) and plenary sessions elucidate a sustained pursuit of assimilationist policies within ethnic minority regions. Guided by the leadership and ideological framework espoused by Xi Jinping, these initiatives prompt inquiries into their alignment with constitutional precepts and laws pertaining to ethnic autonomy. Notably, deliberations underscore the government's concerted attention towards rural revitalization, modernization, and the pursuit of high-quality development as central tenets of governance priorities.

Conclusion:

The convening of the 14th National People's Congress (NPC) second session underscores China's steadfast dedication to fostering economic growth and ensuring stability.

Nevertheless, the deliberations on policies concerning ethnic minority regions illuminate persistent complexities in reconciling assimilation endeavors with imperatives of cultural preservation and legal autonomy. A nuanced comprehension of these intricate dynamics offers valuable insights into the prospective trajectory of China's ethnic policies and their implications for the nation's socio-political landscape.

Economic diplomacy: Charting the course for China-U.S. relationship

18 March 2024, CGTN

In the ever-evolving landscape of global commerce, few relationships carry as much weight as that between China and the United States. Despite apparent economic tensions between the two countries, stemming primarily from Washington's polarized politics and its policy of treating China as a rival, recent diplomatic efforts signify an ongoing commitment to keeping channels of communication open.

"The Americans have woken up and realized that China is a great power, which was inevitable - if China was successful economically, it would become a great power. And they find this very, very difficult to handle," remarked Martin Wolf, Chief Economics Commentator at the Financial Times, at a roundtable organized by the Beijing-based Center for China and Globalization (CCG) in the Chinese capital last month.

"The bottom line is we should take politics out of commerce... If there's a national security issue, let's deal with that. If there's no national security issue, let's leave it at that," emphasized Eric Zheng, President of AmCham Shanghai, speaking exclusively with CGTN. "If it's a commercial issue then let the market decide," he added.

The recent visit of an American business delegation to China, led by Suzanne Clark, President and CEO of the influential U.S. Chamber of Commerce, underscored the importance of maintaining dialogue and pursuing economic diplomacy. Clark's meetings with top Chinese officials, including Premier Li Qiang, emphasized the "extremely important" nature of China-U.S. relations.

"I think all of us want an outcome where the world's two largest economies can coexist in a way that isn't defined by zero-sum metrics," Clark had earlier said. "We want to create a framework...where we can compete on a level playing field, confront challenges in the relationship, and cooperate on big global priorities."

Clark's visit was welcomed by the American business community in China. "It's good to have somebody like Ms. Clark visiting China so that she could demonstrate to the audience back home in the U.S. that engagement (and) commercial relationship with China is important," Zheng stressed.

Despite the apparent China-U.S. tensions, a large number of American companies remain upbeat on China as a business and investment destination, as revealed in the latest report by the American Chamber of Commerce in China (AmCham China) released last month. Another report by AmCham South China found that 90 percent of American companies have achieved profitability in China, reflecting a high return on investment (ROI).

"We represent U.S. companies in China, so we certainly see the commercial benefits from that angle," Zheng noted. "When you talk about manufacturing, and certainly China has become a major manufacturing base exporting affordable products to the U.S. So, from a manufacturing standpoint, global supply chain standpoint, these two countries have benefited from this relationship. And from a consumption standpoint, certainly China is a huge market, not only for China itself but also for foreign companies," he elaborated.

However, despite striking a positive chord in Beijing and recognizing the significance of China-U.S. economic relations, Clark's own views continue to defend American protectionism, as gauged from her remarks at the 13th annual China Business Conference in Washington D.C. last year.

"The U.S. Chamber supports targeted and responsible steps to restrict Chinese access to sensitive technologies that could be used to undermine America's national security, including export controls, technology restrictions, and scrutiny of outbound investment," Clark said at the conference, however clarifying that "not every economic interaction with China poses a national security risk" and that "there is still a vast area of commercial opportunity where the two countries can and should engage productively."

This sentiment is mirrored in the Biden administration's strategy of "decoupling" or adopting a "small yard, high fence" approach that seeks to restrict economic engagement with China, particularly in high-tech sectors like artificial intelligence (AI) and semiconductor development. Premier Li Qiang pointed out the detrimental effects of this approach to the visiting American business delegation led by Clark.

Wolf offers a slightly different perspective. "When [U.S. National Security Advisor] Jake Sullivan says, 'We are trying to build a high fence but with a small yard,' I think he means it... They don't want open-ended conflict with China. They want a deal which narrows things... they want trade to continue and they want to be able to do deals with China on very important joint interests like climate which this administration believes in and other things."

The American business community in China recognizes the importance of maintaining robust economic relations between the two countries. "Decoupling is not a feasible option given the extensive commercial and cultural integration between the U.S. and China over the past four decades. Finding ways to work together remains in the best interests of both countries," concluded Zheng.

Despite the complexities and challenges, the economic relationship between China and the U.S. remains indispensable on the global stage. As we navigate through this intricate landscape, it's evident that constructive dialogue and cooperation are vital for both nations. While tensions may persist, the mutual benefits of collaboration far outweigh the alternatives, reinforcing the necessity of economic diplomacy in charting the course for China-U.S. relations.

Rahul Sankrityayan's Tibet connect debunks false Chinese narrative

17 March 2024, Firstpost

During the annual 'Two Meetings' in Beijing, it was announced that China's defence budget for 2024 would be $231.36 billion, an increase of 7.2 per cent from the previous year (about thrice the size of the Indian defence budget); it is a large increase, especially when one knows that official figures are only a fraction of the actual spending by the People's Liberation Army (PLA).

Li Jie, a Beijing-based naval expert, told the Chinese Communist Party mouthpiece The Global Times: "By 2027, the Chinese military will have the ability to effectively deal with threats brought by hegemonism and power politics in the western Pacific region, including issues relating to the Taiwan question and the South China Sea, as well as border tensions between China and India."

It is clear that the increase in the Chinese budget is targeting not only Taiwan, the 'rebel island', but also India.

In these circumstances, it is necessary for Delhi to think 'out of the box'.

One of the many alternatives is to supplement military preparedness with 'Historical Warfare'; this would not cost much to the exchequer and would help refocus and motivate the defence forces on the border.

It would also put the boundary question in its proper historical perspective; for millennia, Northern India has been contiguous to Tibet, an independent nation till the end of the 1950s, not to China; the same is true for Eastern Turkestan (now called Xinjiang).

In this context, I recently became acquainted with the fascinating life of Mahapandita Rahul Sankrityayan, one of the greatest Indian scholars who wrote some 130 books.

He was a great wandering scholar, spending 45 years of his life away from home on Asian and Western roads.

Rahul Ji, as he was known by his followers, was born Kedarnath Pandey to an Orthodox Hindu Brahmin family in Pandha village of Azamgarh district in Uttar Pradesh on April 9, 1893. He was the eldest child of six siblings. Though he only received a formal education up to grade eight (in Urdu language in his village), Sankrityayan later mastered some 34 languages.

His maternal grandfather, Ram Sharan Pathak, an ex-soldier, with his innumerable tales of valour and adventure, planted the seed of love for travelling in him; already at the age of 9, he ran away from home 'to see the world' and only after having visited Calcutta and Varanasi did he return to complete his middle school.

One of his biographers wrote: "Sankrityayan's life, work, and ideas were steeped in and spread through many cultures, disciplines, and geographies. Born in a Sanatani Brahmin family, he lived variously the life of a Vaishnava sadhu, an Arya Samaji polemicist, a Buddhist monk, an antiquarian and scholar of Buddhism, a political activist jailed for anti-colonial speeches (1920 and 1923-1925) and beaten up by the henchmen of landlords in a peasant movement in Bihar (1939), a self-professed communist, a progressive writer, a novelist, a historian, a biographer, a language activist, a linguist, lexicographer, and so forth."

Sankrityayan indeed lived multiple lives in one, always ready to change his worldview while remaining profoundly human.

From 1914 till 1930, he lived as a Vaishnava sannyasi; in 1939, Rahul Ji converted to Buddhism; this did not stop him from participating in the freedom movement, and between the years 1936 and 1944, he was actively involved in the peasant movement. During this period, he spent 29 months in jail (1940–42) for being a member of the Communist Party of India.

When free, he extensively travelled to Sri Lanka, the Soviet Union, the Far East, Central Asia, Iran, Afghanistan, and Western Europe.

Sankrityayan's four visits to Tibet are fascinating as they are a vibrant proof of the century-old linkages between India and Tibet (a fact denied by Communist China today) and a proof that Tibet is truly a child of Indian civilisation (as the Dalai Lama likes to put it).

It is important in the present tense context of Sino-Indian relations to not forget this.

During his trips to Tibet, this polymath managed to bring back to their land of origin some 1,619 valuable manuscripts and thankha paintings; he employed 16 mules to bring the precious loads to Bihar, where they are today kept in a special section of the Patna Museum.

In Tibet, Rahul Ji met his Tibetan 'counterpart', probably the greatest Tibetan scholar of the first part of the 20th century, Gendun Choepel. Rahul Ji called him 'Geshe' ('Kalyanamitra' in Sanskrit) or 'Brother in the Dharma'. In Tibet, Geshe denoted a high degree of knowledge and was equivalent to a PhD in Buddhist studies.

The Mahapandita recounted: "My first meeting with Geshe took place in Lhasa. He was a disciple of Geshe Sherab, the most learned pandit of Drepung, the largest monastery in Tibet. Geshe Sherab was an authority on philosophy; thus, his disciple would also be a student of the same subject."

However, Gedun was not only a student of philosophy; he was also a poet and had mastered traditional and modern Tibetan painting: "As a talented artist, he could live a comfortable life in Lhasa. However, Geshe never aspired to a comfortable life."

Like Rahul Ji, Gedun was a wanderer, an adventurer, with an insatiable thirst for knowledge, always wanting to acquire more knowledge.

Sankrityayan recalled: "[In 1934] I realised that his depth of classical learning combined with his artistic background would be invaluable to me in the search for ancient MSS [manuscripts]... On his part, he wanted to accompany me to India and see and learn more. We became friends from that time onwards."

Thus started the search for the lost manuscripts of Nalanda and the other great viharas of Northern India; the two pandits wanted to rediscover the centuries-old linkage between India and Tibet.

They first visited the ancient monasteries north of Lhasa, then they went to Reting monastery, established in the 11th century: "Tibet has a scanty rainfall, and at the time of our arrival, richly painted thangkas had been hung out for an airing. Geshe's heart leapt at the sight. They were of Indian workmanship, and it is also possible that they had been brought from India." They copied them.

In his memoirs, Rahul Ji noted: "My Tibetan journeys were a combination of bitter-sweet experiences—the bitterness as extreme as the sweet. Sometimes, animals to carry us and our goods were as readily provided as a householder's hospitality. Sometimes, though we ourselves were willing to walk, we could not hire porters, and it was difficult to get a yard of space to rest ourselves."

His following visit to Tibet was a great success: "I saw many dozens of ancient Sanskrit MMS. I was able to photograph many of them and copy down many by hand."

The day of May 25, 1936, was memorable: "We were informed by Dolma Phodrang [one of the temples in Sakya monastery] that they had received the key to Chakpe Lhakhang... I had very little expectation that I would find a Sanskrit manuscript there. After arriving, I turned to the left and found the first stockroom. The door and doorframe seemed centuries old. Who knows how many years of dust must have been collected? On one occasion, dust spread so profusely that the whole stockroom was blanketed as if in smoke."

The Mahapandita continued his exploration: "We waited a little and then moved in. There was also enough dust on the floor to make footprints. We found hundreds of scriptures there, some wrapped in cloth, while others had been left uncovered. Among them, we found scriptures as old as seven and eight hundred years. These were the texts that had been written and read by great ancient Tibetan masters and scholars. They were precious jewels of Tibetan literature and history." They had found the lost manuscripts.

Rahul Ji continued to explore the room: "I was searching for palm leaf manuscripts in Sanskrit. After browsing here and there, I found one which was not wrapped in cloth. One, two, three, four... I found twenty manuscripts in all. I opened one and began to look at it. I was overjoyed."

This discovery symbolises the age-old relationship between Tibet and India.

Today, it is important to remember these ancient linkages (there are many others), which bear testimony to the deep connections between the people of India and Tibet.

If these connections could be revived in any way, it could completely change the perspective of the conflict with China and Beijing's erroneous narrative for the border 'dispute'. In the meantime, Beijing should be reminded that Tibet has been (and is still geographically) India's northern neighbour. And real heroes like Mahapandita or Geshe should not be forgotten; on the contrary, they should be honoured, and a young generation of historians should be encouraged to boldly follow in the footsteps of the wandering scholars.

Tibetans in Exile – Raising Voices for a Distant Homeland

13 March 2024, Vision Times

Tibetans in Calgary spoke out against human rights violations in China on the 65th anniversary of the 1959 Tibetan Uprising.

CALGARY, Alberta — Tenzin Tsepel's dearest dream is to see the Potala Palace with her own eyes. She enjoys watching YouTube videos of tourists visiting the massive fortress in Lhasa, the Tibetan capital. She grew up in southern India, like thousands of Tibetans who fled their homeland after it was occupied by Communist China in 1950. Her grandparents followed the Dalai Lama on foot across the Himalayas, escaping persecution after the Tibetan uprising of March 10, 1959.

"To me, [Tibet] feels like home. But at the same time, I feel like it's a home that was stolen from me, and I was raised mountains away from my homeland," Tsepel said.

On March 10, 2024, in an annual event followed by Tibetans worldwide, Tsepel marched with other members of the community in Calgary to commemorate the 65th Tibetan National Uprising Day.

As customary, they held a two-hour static protest in front of the People's Republic of China (PRC) Consulate to denounce the CCP's human rights abuses.

On the same day, Tibetans in Toronto joined with supporters for a protest rally that saw 1,900 participants, including members of the Chinese democracy movement, gather before the city's PRC consulate.

Sheng Xue, vice chairperson of the Federation for a Democratic China, gave a speech at the Toronto event praising the Tibetans' continued resistance to the CCP and urged others to help end communist tyranny in China.

"China has constructed dams along [Tibet's major] rivers, not only harming aquatic life, but also destroying and flooding local villages and displacing Tibetans," Tsepel said.

She added that the regime "has also made efforts to forcibly separate Tibetan children, over one million – that is three quarters of the Tibetan children population in Tibet – to place [them] in colonial boarding schools."

Tsepel compared the CCP's boarding schools in Tibet with the Indian residential schools in Canada's history.

"These children are now not only indoctrinated, but they are forbidden from speaking our own language, from practicing our culture and religion," she said. "You can imagine the profound intergenerational trauma."

During the 20th century, Tibet exercised independent rule despite being a sovereign part of the Chinese republic. In 1949, the legal Chinese government was toppled by communist armies, who established a repressive totalitarian regime.

According to the U.S. Department of State, human rights abuses in Tibet under communist rule include unlawful or arbitrary killings and arrests, disappearances, torture, and cases of cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment, such as transformation through re-education and rape of Buddhist girls and nuns.

The CCP claims that its occupation has brought Tibet prosperity and emancipation, calling the region's Buddhist culture a "feudal serfdom" that was transformed into a progressive and civilized "socialist system," as mentioned in an article by state-run paper the Global Times.

In an emailed response to a Vision Times reporter, the PRC Consulate in Calgary did not directly comment on the protest, but stressed that "Xizang has been an integral part of Chinese territory since ancient times," using the Mandarin Chinese name for Tibet. It also appended the PRC's white papers on the subject in its response.

According to Tibetan estimates, 1.2 million Tibetans have died as a result of the Communist Party's tyranny, including at least 85,000 who perished during and following the 1959 uprising that led to the Dalai Lama's flight. A report by the UN Refugee Agency found that Chinese regime authorities burned sacred Tibetan texts and destroyed more than 6,000 monasteries in Tibet during the Cultural Revolution.

The consulate's response ignored the human rights abuses ongoing in Tibet, and repeated the Party's claims of having led the region down a "bright road of unity, progress and development."

Apart from Tibetans and Tibetan Buddhism, the CCP has endeavored to destroy or subvert all religious faith in China. Independent Christians, Muslims, and practitioners of the Falun Gong spiritual practice have been subject to decades of harsh persecution ranging from fines to being harvested alive for their organs.

"In recent years, the Tibetan issue has almost been cast aside," said Dorjee Parsur, co-president of Students for a Free Tibet at the University of Calgary.

"Since we march every year, we want to make sure that people remember that major events are still occurring in Tibet."

Dorjee, born in Calgary, says he's proud of his culture and identity, and stressed the importance of Buddhism for Tibetan culture.

"I think that it [Buddhism] makes me a better person in general," he said. "We believe that the merits of our good actions will result in good favor, and I believe that good will eventually triumph over evil."

As for Tenzin, she dreams of visiting the town where her grandparents were born and raised.

"I do want to be able to go to my country, see the landscape, see the mountains and [feel] the air," she said. "I feel like it'll bring me to tears, really."

Exposing China's Human Rights Charade Under Xi Jinping: Insights From China's Fourth U.N. Universal Periodic Review and Beyond

13 March 2024, Tenzing Dhamdul, Domino Theory

I first heard of the United Nations Human Rights Council's Universal Periodic Review in detail during the International Tibet Youth Forum held at Dharamshala, where it was introduced to us by a member of the Tibet Justice Center. This, along with my eventual participation in the Asia Regional Meeting in Tokyo organized by the International Tibet Network, equipped me to participate in the India Advocacy Week in December 2023. The week was a coalition of organizations working for Tibet, namely the International Tibet Network, Students for a Free Tibet, the Tibetan Youth Congress, the National Democratic Party of Tibet, the Foundation for Non-Violent Alternatives, and the Voluntary Tibet Advocacy Group. During this event, we met and engaged with Indian parliamentarians, highlighting that China's fourth review was about to take place.

The Universal Periodic Review is a three-hour examination of a U.N. member's human rights record conducted by all other U.N. member states. This review mechanism was established in March 2006 by U.N. General Assembly resolution 60/251 with the aim of promoting and protecting human rights in every country. Since the first periodic review in 2008, all 193 member states have each been reviewed three times. The review process is currently in its fourth cycle, which began in November 2022.

The People's Republic of China underwent its fourth review on January 23, 2024 at the U.N. Human Rights Council in Geneva. More than 21 U.N. member states raised questions and brought recommendations, shedding light on, among other abuses, the gross violations of human rights in Tibet.

A Tibetan activist stages a protest at the Chinese embassy in New Delhi on March 11, a day after the 65th Tibetan National Uprising Day against the Chinese occupation of Tibet. (Photo: AFP)

When it comes to Tibet, there was a twofold increase in the number of member nations calling out China on its human rights record compared to China's third review in 2018. Member states that raised concerns about Tibet, shedding light on, among other abuses, the gross violations of human rights in Tibet, included the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany, Australia, France, Lithuania, Japan, Sweden, Norway, Austria, Switzerland, Poland, the Czech Republic, the Netherlands, Ireland, Montenegro, New Zealand, Canada, Denmark, Belgium and Estonia.

Even Pakistan, a close strategic ally of China, called for China to "further intensify international cultural and religious exchanges, especially through more visits to Xinjiang and Tibet."

Thinley Chukki, the official representative of the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration at the Tibet Bureau in Geneva, stated that, "The colonial boarding school system, which targets the very culture and identity of Tibetans in occupied Tibet, was exposed and brought to light by many of these states, and hearing them speak on it was profound." However, she was dismayed to hear blatant lies uttered by the Chinese representatives when addressing their human rights report to the U.N. floor. The Chinese representatives said these boarding schools were established because Tibetans lived far from their schools, when the truth is that the Chinese systematically shut down schools near Tibetans and intentionally established these boarding schools – where the main language of instruction is Mandarin – to separate young Tibetans from their families and culture, thereby cutting them off from their traditional roots.

The Chinese representatives were well prepared, as they are aware of the gross violations of human rights their country commits. Some of the tactics they utilized in the lead-up and post Universal Periodic Review included:

1. Hosting their own side events both before and after review sessions, both of which praised China's human rights track record, with some participants and speakers calling out the West for the double standards it sets. On January 22, a side event titled "Putting Development at the Center of the Agenda: Safeguarding Economic, Social and Cultural Rights" took place in Geneva. On January 24, another side event titled "Human Rights and Chinese Modernization" was organized by Beijing's China Society of Human Rights Studies. Writing in Bitter Winter regarding the latter event, Tenzin Youten, in his article "China's Own Propaganda Side Event at the U.N. Human Rights Council," states that "all the representatives belong to China-based institutes, established and funded by the Chinese government," with none of these experts reporting on the Tibetan uprisings of 2008 and the Uyghurs uprisings of 2009.
2. Utilizing available diplomatic might, especially when it comes to nations of the Global South. This tactic was uncovered by Reuters, which saw diplomatic notes sent by Chinese missions to countries reading, "I would kindly request your delegation to render valuable support to China and make constructive recommendations in the interactive dialogue... taking into account the friendly relations and cooperation between our two countries."
3. The tried and tested intimidation tactic of bringing a large delegation to occupy seats at the review session, which numbered more than 40 diplomats, complimented by a considerable number of Chinese NGOs known as GONGOs, or government-organized NGOs. This tactic was previously reported on by Kunchok Dolma Yakha, Special Appointee for Human Rights at the Tibet Bureau in Geneva, who mentioned that in 2018, during China's third review, her colleague Kalden Tsomo from the Tibet Bureau was screamed at by a Chinese woman to hand over seats Kalden had saved for her Tibetan colleagues. Kalden told the woman she was familiar with these intimidation tactics.
4. Publishing their own narratives in Chinese-owned media. This can be seen from an article titled "U.N. Human Rights Council UPR Working Group adopts Recommendations made to China," published by Xinhua News Agency on January 27, which did not mention any of the Universal Periodic Review Working Group's for China questions and recommendations but instead painted a rosy picture of the session. Similarly, a video taken from Xinhua was uploaded to YouTube on January 28, 2024 titled "China delivers good performance in UN Periodic Review of Human Rights," by the channel China Human Rights. In the video, Chen Xu (陳旭), China's ambassador to the U.N. Office in Geneva, speaking with the news anchor, said China's Achievements in human rights won international acclaim.

Even with such gaslighting tactics, China lost face in front of an international audience when it came to its gross violations of human rights. There is a clear trend one can notice here, and that is even with China's growing power and influence in the world, nations are gradually coming together and questioning the Chinese Communist Party more strongly than ever. This has become increasingly obvious since Xi Jinping became China's leader, with the suppression of freedoms in Hong Kong, its use of debt traps, and the militarization of islands in the South China Sea.

Further igniting the flames of protest in the Tibetan diasporic community were the arrests of more than 1,000 Tibetans, including monks, for protesting against the construction of a dam expected to destroy six monasteries and forcefully relocate two villages in Dege County, in Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture. The recently concluded Ninth International Conference of Tibet Support Groups held in Brussels came out with a statement against this crackdown in Tibet, highlighting the clear and evident duress in Tibet.

One now awaits the verdict of the U.N. report on China's human rights, which is set to be adopted in either June or July. It remains to be seen whether it will recognize these and other ongoing human rights violations occurring in China.

'Tibet's path to freedom mirrors challenges faced by Palestine, Ukraine'

10 March 2024, The Sunday Guardian

Tenzin Tsundue is a leading Tibetan activist and a writer. While speaking to The Sunday Guardian on the occasion of the 65th anniversary of the Tibetan uprising, Tsundue reflects on Tibet's struggle for independence, comparing it to global movements like Palestine and Ukraine. He highlights Tibet's historical bid for independence in 1913 and the 1959 uprising against Chinese rule, resulting in over a million deaths and cultural destruction. Tsundue talks about China's systematic suppression of Tibetan culture, including population influx and language restrictions. While acknowledging India's support for Tibet, he calls for a more active international involvement. Edited excerpts.

Q: March 10 marks the 65th anniversary of the Tibetan Uprising which is perhaps the most significant event that Tibet witnessed since 1900 apart from declaring its independence from China in 1913 (proclamation of independence in 1913), an independence that lasted till 1950. My question to you is whether that brief time period of independence is now a part of history which is unlikely to be witnessed again? Given the military and diplomatic might that China now enjoys, do you believe that another uprising can happen?

A: The Tibetan National Uprising of 10 March 1959 marked the Tibetan people's unrest all across Tibet against the Chinese invasion that slowly occupied Tibet in every sense. This uprising raised a robust Tibetan national resistance across three provinces of Tibet, and also resulted in His Holiness' exile into India. China took twenty years to crush this wave of resistance, and by early 1980s, over a million Tibetans had been killed (one sixth of Tibetan population), more than six thousand monasteries destroyed and the treasures of the monasteries looted by Chinese communist leaders. Tibet was not the only victim of Chinese expansionism. East Turkestan, Southern Mongolia and Manchuria had been invaded and occupied. All of these four occupied countries today make 60% of China's 9.6 million KM<sup>2</sup>.

I am happy you mentioned the thirteenth Dalai Lama's Proclamation of Independence of Tibet of 1913. This gives me the opportunity to explain how this modern day China-Tibet conflict started. The 1911 Chinese war of Independence, Xinhai Revolution was overthrowing the 250 years of Manchu occupation as the foreigner rule and the first independent government was Republic of China with Dr Sun Yat Sen as the first Chinese President. In the enthusiasm, the Chinese freedom fighters were attempting to occupy neighbouring countries as an inheritance of power. When the Chinese war reached certain parts of Tibet, the 13th Dalai Lama escaped to India, but the Chinese were thwarted by the Tibetan army. Returning to Tibet, the Dalai Lama initiated legal reforms to draw Tibet out of backwardness and isolation.

That year in 1913, Tibet signed a treaty with Mongolia where the two neighbouring countries recognized each other's independence (we must remind Mongolia this). And the next year Tibet signed the McMahon Treaty on 24 March 1914, which India recognizes even today as Tibet's ceding of Tawang Region (Arunachal Pradesh) to British India in lieu of British India's promise to intervene in demarcating the borders between Tibet and China.

Today, freedom struggles are no longer unilateral efforts but multi-interest geopolitics; Ukraine and Palestine are good examples right in front of us. Revolutions rise in those moments of hope when people are beaten to despair and are left with nothing to lose. Xi Jinping's insecurity, international isolation of China are windows of hope for us, but ultimately the stringent measures in Tibet will push Tibetans towards another uprising.

Q: The uprising had brought the global focus on the human rights violations and the suppression of cultural and religious freedoms by the Chinese government in Tibet. How would you describe the situation in Tibet now?

A: In 1959, when the issue of Tibet was raised, small countries like El Salvador, Malaya, Ireland, Malta, Nicaragua, Thailand and Philippines spoke up for Tibet in the United Nations. The People's Republic of China was not even a member of the UN. It was the time when Taiwan's Republic of China represented the One China policy. Three resolutions were passed in the UN, 1959, 1961 and 1965 that condemned China's atrocities in Tibet and recommended the right to self-determination for Tibet. Today, even though China wields a veto power in the UN, we are still able to shame China on its disastrous human rights records. And we are not alone. We have freedom fighters from East Turkestan, Southern Mongolia and Manchuria with us in doing this. Even the Chinese democracy activists from China and Hong Kong join us, Taiwan too.

Tibet's second uprising of 2008 at the time of Beijing Olympics was a defining moment in the history of the Tibetan freedom movement. That year the uprising spread all across the Tibetan Plateau like forest fire, mostly led by anonymous youngsters. That year, we lost more than 500 Tibetans to Chinese bullets, thousands wounded and more than 10,000 arrested, some of whom are still in jail today.

The international community's dependence on China trade and supply chains has tremendously raised pressure on mining in Tibet. China has been bombing Tibetan mountains and pasturelands to mine natural resources. China has been mining among others, lithium, gold, copper and rare-earths from Tibet and in the process rough swept Tibetan nomads and farmers from their ancestral lands and resettled them into "reservation" type artificial villages. The natural resources from Tibet and other occupied countries go into making cheap Made-in-China products, and countries around the world have benefited at the cost of Tibet.

This makes me believe that there is international community's complicity in China's occupation of Tibet. But the culture of consumerism in globalization has made consumers blind and apathetic to the sources of their profits. I have asked intellectuals, politicians, and the media in western countries to do more for Tibet because they have far too long benefited at the cost of Tibet.

Rivers from Tibet that feed more than one and half billion people in South and South East Asian countries and also China are being further dammed and parts of river and electricity diverted to power the industries in China. The recent case of Tibetan protest against further damming of the Yangtze River in Dege region in South Eastern Tibet is a case in point. Monks and nuns have been beaten during the peaceful protest, and over a thousand Tibetans have been arrested.

Q: A major concern in the international community regarding Tibet is the influx of Han Chinese migrants into Tibet that has led to dilution of Tibetan's culture. Can you elaborate on that?

A: The last time I studied population influx in Tibet was China's 2011 census where I saw the Tibetan population was one point less than six million, but the Chinese population in Tibet was standing at 13 million. The 2021 census was opaque and confusing. The statistics didn't spell out racial proportions.

We are concerned about the homogenizing machinery that is Sinicizing culture, language and race in the occupied countries. Not only are inter-racial marriages encouraged, cultural practices like Buddhist pilgrimages, celebration of Buddhist festivals are discouraged, observation of Ramadan is banned in East Turkestan, Muslim women banned from wearing burqas and men from sporting beards.

Since three years, teaching Tibetan language in Tibet has been shut out of the system. Government run boarding schools do not teach Tibetan in China's "bilingual policy". Colonial boarding schools are turning Tibetan children into Chinese.

Racial profiling mechanisms in Tibet include DNA sampling. The Chinese government has been collecting DNA samples from children as young as six years old. Such scrutiny has shocked the world.

Q: India has—despite voices from certain quarters to not accommodate the Tibetan exiles as it would anger China—continued to stand with the Tibetan people for years now. How do the young members of the community see this relationship between India and Tibetan people?

A: Let me start by saying I am not a believer in charity in politics. Policies are driven by short or long term self-interest. As a Tibetan born in India, I believe Tibet attaches soft power value for now when India is not able to assert her full power against China's expansionist aggression in the Himalayas.

But India's relationship with China has been undulating from warm and cold, and now "abnormal" as Minister of External Affairs, S. Jaishankar reiterates again and again.

Younger generation Tibetans feel our relationship must go beyond "gratitude" and practically participate in dealing with China. Uprisings in Tibet and revolution within China can truly change the dynamics. There is no military solution between the two Asian giants.

Q: Don't you think that the Tibetan freedom movement is more active on social media and international forums but has become subdued on the ground?

A: It's the first time we are able to speak and be heard, even as we experiment vocalizing on social media platforms. Tibet has been always written about by others, today we are able to write our story ourselves, speak our mind in foreign languages and be there where our voices never reached. For the first time we have 80,000 Tibetans who are citizens of different countries in the world and they are able to demand governments to take action, pass resolutions. The new generation of Tibet is making this happen on platforms that our parents never had. The "ground" for us is no longer the street where our slogans were seldom heard, the ground has changed; it's the media, parliament, academia, think-tanks, public debates, and conferences where old notions are thrashed out and new narratives are created.

Q: The Dalai Lama is the most prominent voice of the Tibetan movement. Why has the movement not been able to produce any other prominent face of the movement who is as commonly recognized as the Dalai Lama? Would you ascribe it to the policies followed by China at domestic and at the global level?

A: The fact that we have such a Dalai Lama is everything. We have one person among us who is the most respected and revered living person in the entire world among business tycoons, presidents, dictators and saints. But, we must also work towards leadership in the post Dalai Lama scenario, and it's not easy. You must understand it's been only 65 years since we emerged from isolation and experimented with democracy. The fact that we not only survived, but thrived as a refugee community is a huge success. And this is made possible due to India's humanitarian support.

I believe as long as the US, India and all other countries affected by the dictatorial regime run by the Chinese Communist Party fight this evil, this will naturally support freedom for Tibet and democracy in China.

Q: What can countries like India and the United States do more to strengthen the Tibetan movement?

A: The United States' global supremacy is being challenged and India's Himalayan territorial integrity is being challenged, and the common adversary i.e. China is making these countries natural allies. In the long run they will realize that the only way to deal with China is work with the people of China's occupied countries who have been fighting China for 75 years. Even the US and India were friends with China at one point of time. We have suffered every possible torture and trauma as a people and nation, and yet survived.

Q: You are a prominent member of the Tibetan exile community. How does it feel to be in exile and look forward and wait for something that perhaps might never happen?

A: "Tenzin, what's your chance?" friends often ask me out of sympathy and sometimes mockingly, even the "educated" ones interrogated me. Once, I was even told "Go back if you want to protest". I had gone to Tibet to fight. Got arrested, beaten, jailed and later thrown out saying "You are born in India. You are Indian. Get out."

I understand. When China seems to have overwhelming power with menacing weapons, money and dictating terms on half of the world on business, people cannot imagine a free Tibet. But what has blighted the world's imagination: money and weapons are exactly the same "power" that is causing China their agony in recent years and now. Increasingly the world over the definition of "development" has become unilateral—material growth.

My answer: "यार, गांधी से भी कभी पूछा गया होगा, यार तेरा भी कोई चांस है?" Gandhi too must have been asked the same question: "Gandhi, do you stand any chance?" Looking at the British Empire ruling two thirds of the world and arrogantly saying "The sun never sets on the British Empire". Today, the entire UK can fit inside Rajasthan, one of the states of India. Empires come and go. India took 200 years and the Jews, 2000.

In 70 years of Chinese occupation, China has changed into the world's industry and the only religion left in China is money. We fight with nonviolence and His Holiness the Dalai Lama is our leader. Our country may not be free today, but we are. And one who has freedom in the heart will remain free. Of course, Tibet will be free.

How exiled Tibetans keep alive the culture of a homeland most have never dared visit

10 March 2024, Hong Kong Free Press

Tibetans will on March 10 mark the 65th anniversary of the 1959 uprising against Chinese forces that led to their spiritual leader the Dalai Lama fleeing into exile, followed by tens of thousands of compatriots.

From teaching centuries-old crafts to cataloguing their language, exiled Tibetans guard the cultural identity of a homeland most have neither seen nor dare visit, and where they say Beijing is eradicating their heritage.

Crouched over a minutely detailed devotional "thangka" painting depicting Buddha, artist Lobsang Tenzin teaches students in northern India.

"It is important to keep the traditions of our history," said the 49-year-old, dipping a needle-thin brush into rich blue paint made from crushed lapis lazuli as six young Tibetan trainees watch.

"These skills were nearly lost, but we pass on the skills by teaching young artists."

Tibetans will on March 10 mark the 65th anniversary of the 1959 uprising against Chinese forces that led to their spiritual leader the Dalai Lama fleeing into exile, followed by tens of thousands of compatriots.

Inside Tibet, the chaos of China's 1966-76 Cultural Revolution left temples razed and monasteries reduced to ruins, destruction that continued in the decades that followed.

Today, activists decry what they say are Beijing's determined efforts to erase what is left of Tibet's cultural and religious identity.

Lhadon Tethong, head of the Tibet Action Institute, condemns what she calls "cultural genocide" — including Beijing's sharp restrictions on Tibetan language, with children "indoctrinated" at state-run boarding schools.

Beijing, which maintains "Tibet is part of China", fiercely rejects the accusations.

Chinese foreign ministry spokeswoman Mao Ning this week said that people in Tibet are "living a happy life", in response to UN rights chief Volker Turk's assertion that China was violating fundamental rights.

Tibet enjoys "social stability, economic growth, solidarity among all ethnic groups and harmony among various religious beliefs", she said.

'Former glory'

Tibet scholar Robert Barnett, from SOAS University of London, called Beijing a "foreign ruler deciding what's best for a people whose culture it barely knows".

"There is a gradual whittling away of a culture and a history," Barnett said.

"It is a process where you gradually eliminate all the elements of a history, a people, culture and of a society that are inconvenient to the new rulers."

Tibetan authorities say there are 130,000 Tibetan exiles, many in India and Nepal but also in more than 25 countries worldwide – just a fraction of the seven million living under China's control.

As the decades pass, that makes the preservation of cultural identity even more challenging.

Tenzin studied and now teaches at the Norbulingka Institute, a social enterprise centre training more than 300 men and women in painting, embroidery, weaving and woodcarving.

The complex of red and green Tibetan-style buildings, close to the Dalai Lama's base in India's Himalayan hill town of Dharamsala, was launched in 1995 to employ highly skilled artisans eking out a living with repair jobs.

"After the great masters came to India, they ended up doing odd jobs, trying to build their lives in a new country," said Tsultrim Dorjee, a senior manager at the institute.

"The institute helped them use their skills... the goal was to return Tibetan art to its former glory."

Others take a more modern approach, like 29-year-old artist Tashi Nyima, with his bright cartoon-style canvases that nonetheless still reflect his people's heritage and political battles.

Born and brought up in Dharamsala, where red-robed monks and nuns crowd streets alongside Tibetans in baseball caps and jeans, Nyima said younger generations struggle with a "very mixed identity".

But he remains committed to the cause.

"I've always believed that Tibet will be free one day," he said, in front of his painting of a shackled monk.

"If I didn't have this belief in me, I wouldn't have done these kinds of works – I would have just stopped."

'Long haul'

Another battle is keeping the language alive.

While Google Translate offers 133 languages, Tibetan is not among them – but exiles in 2022 released their own 223-volume dictionary, available online.

"Once the language is preserved, then everything falls in place," said Dorji Damdul, director of Tibet House in New Delhi, founded by the Dalai Lama to promote his people's heritage.

"Language is like the medium through which all the flow of culture and philosophy happens."

But young Tibetans in India are increasingly seeking opportunities in Europe and North America.

Damdul, born in India in 1968 and a former translator for the Dalai Lama, admits that keeping an identity alive is a "major challenge".

"In Tibet, assimilation by force happens with the communist Chinese," said the Buddhist scholar. "In the West, natural assimilation can happen because it's too free."

Tibet's Dharamsala-based government in exile says it is looking to keep the increasingly scattered community connected, including via online conferences teaching younger generations about their history.

"If they understand Tibet a little more, they could be the best advocates," said Penpa Tsering, elected as the government's sikyong, or leader, by Tibetans worldwide.

"Even though we are physically distant, we are mentally close together."

Tsering's administration oversees more than 60 Tibetan language schools in India and Nepal and supports nearly 300 monasteries and nunneries.

"We are here for the long haul," said Tsering. "Don't think that we'll vanish just like that."

Reassessing Tibet's Plight in the 21st Century

09 March 2024, Financial Express

Tibet has a recorded history dating back to the year 602 when the central Tibetan states were united under the leadership of Namri Songsten.

We have many other examples of Chinese occupation in its different neighbouring regions, from Xinjiang to Hong Kong. However, it all started with Tibet, which became a test case for the Chinese idea of the world where oppression and a pervasive police state have become the new normal. It is also critical to understand that Tibet's plight has become so typical in our daily lives that it has no global momentum like other struggles against oppression in general. Tibet existed as an independent state from 1912 to 1951 until the People's Republic of China annexed the roof of the world and made it an experimental ground for totalitarian practices.

A Brief History of Tibet

Tibet has a recorded history dating back to the year 602 when the central Tibetan states were united under the leadership of Namri Songsten. It was also the time when Lhasa became the capital. From the year 602 to 842, it is called the imperial age in Tibetan history. During these long 200 years' time, Chinese and Tibetans have had many border conflicts, which ended with the China-Tibet Peace Treaty of Year 821, where it was established that Tibet is an independent entity. The treaty famously mentions, "Tibetans shall be happy in Tibet, and Chinese shall be happy in China". From 1240 to 1250, Mongols invaded Tibet from Central Asia. However, as Mongol Prince Godan Khan met Tibetan lama Sakya Pandita, the lama became the spiritual leader of the prince, and it yielded significant autonomy for Tibet, and Buddhism spread across Inner and Central Asia.

From 1270 to 1350, there was a priest-patron relationship between Mongols and Tibetans. It is also essential to mention that during the Mongol rule too, Tibet was separated from China, which was also occupied by Mongols. In 1370, the Mongol empire in China fell to the ethnic Han Chinese. However, Tibet had already broken its ties with Mongols and did not pay any tributes to the Ming rulers of China. A crucial turning point in the Tibetan nation occurred when Mongol ruler Altan Khan gave the title Dalai Lama to Sonam Gyatso, then leader of the Gelugpa school of Buddhism. In return, the Dalai Lama announced Altan Khan as a reincarnation of Kublai Khan. It gave legitimacy to Altan Khan's rule. This event is now a normal priest-patron relationship, but if translated through the Western understanding, it is an example of how the Church (Tibetan monks) gave legitimacy to the State (Mongols in Central Asian highlands).

Things suddenly got haywire for Tibet when, at the start of the 18th century, Dzungar Mongol tribes invaded the nation. To quell the invasion, the Chinese Qing Emperor sent his military, but he took advantage of the volatile situation of Tibet, annexed the Kham and Amdo area, and called Tibet a tributary state. Qing dynasty's influence was not only limited to Tibet but also felt in other neighbouring countries of China, such as Korea, Vietnam, Mongolia, and Nepal.

The reign of the fifth Dalai Lama, Ngawang Lobsang Gyatso, also known as 'the Great Fifth', marked the unification of Tibet. He created a religious state in Tibet and did not become a subservient to the Ming Chinese empire. It was during the fifth Dalai Lama's reign that the legendary Potala Palace was built. In the subservient time, the hold of Ming China over Tibet started eroding, and as the 13th Dalai Lama described it, it was more of a 'patron and priest' rather than an Empire and subject.

In 1912, the Ming empire in China collapsed, paving the way for the Republic of China. Tibet also reaffirmed its independence from the titular rule of China and expelled the Chinese troops from Lhasa. While reaffirming the independence, the Dalai Lama said, 'we are a small, religious and independent nation'. In 1914, the Shimla treaty occurred between British India, Tibet and China. It gave secular control of Qinghai to China, and the rest of Tibet was considered independent. The refusal to sign this treaty by China made Tibet go under the British Indian fold, where all the Tibetan communications with China happened with the British mediation. After the death of the 13th Dalai Lama, the nationalist government in China led by Kuomintang ratified the current 14th Dalai Lama and a representative from the government of China named General Wu Zhongxin was there at the ceremony. This event has been widely documented in the international media.

During the height of World War II, Tibet established its foreign office and sent congratulatory missions to China and India. A letter given by the Tibetan Mission in China addressed to Chiang Kai-shek maintained that 'We shall continue to maintain the independence of Tibet as a nation ruled by the successive Dalai Lamas through an authentic religious - political rule'. In 1947, when India organised the Asian Relations Conference, Tibet sent its delegation to New Delhi.

Tibet's Annexation by China and Aftermath

In 1949, the Communist Party of China won the civil war and started one-party rule in mainland China. Tibet became the culprit of the first geopolitical ambitions of an expansionist China. In seizing the control of Tibet, China called it a 'peaceful liberation from feudalistic serfdom'. However, it is still unclear how the Dalai Lama's rule was a 'feudalistic serfdom'. In October 1950, about 40,000 Chinese troops invaded Tibet, which had virtually no military in its possession. Details of the Chinese invasion of Tibet reached its hinterland around 1952, which was the connectivity status in Tibet. Any rational person in their right mind could ask how it was serfdom if there was no connectivity between the ruler and subject present.

In 1951, under unstable circumstances, the 17-Point Agreement was signed between China and Tibet, and it was maintained that China 'would not alter the existing political system in Tibet'. After agreeing on all this on paper, the Chinese maintained repression in Tibet, causing Lhasa to become the Tibetan refugee home. On March 10th 1959, which is commonly known as Tibetan Uprising Day, around 300,000 Tibetans gathered around the Potala Palace, where the Dalai Lama resides, fearful that Chinese authorities may assassinate the Dalai Lama. Heavy Chinese artillery fires compelled the Dalai Lama to go into exile. March of 1959 in Tibet was flooded with bloodshed, and it was just a trailer of what was coming for the nation.

In the coming decade, Mao applied all the policies of mainland China to Tibet, in which hundreds of thousands of Tibetans died, particularly during the Cultural Revolution. Geographically, Tibet is around the size of Western Europe. China first made one of its three provinces, U-Tsang, as the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) and kept the other two provinces under its direct control. However, the region defined as 'autonomous' was not autonomous at all, and Tibet's representation in the CPC administration of TAR is negligible. If Tibet had been independent, it would have been the world's 10th-largest state.

Since the last 60 years of rule by China, there have been multiple kinds of repression faced by the Tibetan people. The living embodiment of their faith in different Buddhist Monasteries has been destroyed. In 1995, six-year-old Gendun Choekyi Nyima, who was recognised as the 11th Panchen Dalai, was imprisoned by China. He became the world's youngest political prisoner. China has tried creating an alternative 'patriotic re-education campaign' aimed at assimilating Tibetans into the Chinese fold.

At the start of the 21st century, Tibetans have used self-immolation as a way of protest. There have been over 135 self-immolation incidents in Tibet. In 2012, around 80 such incidents were counted. Interestingly, it was also the year when Xi Jinping was about to assume Chinese leadership.

March 10th every year marks the anniversary of the Tibetan uprising worldwide, where Tibetans protest against the repressions of the Chinese regime. However, the Chinese regime has used brute force to destroy the faith-based civilization. China has signed extradition agreements with countries like Nepal for the dissenting Tibetan refugees. Today Tibet is a live example of a panopticon where no information goes outside. March 10th every year marks a dent in the history of different movements that Tibetan story of survival is alive.

Tibetan Soldiers in the Chinese Army. 2. "Tibetans Are Useful but the CCP Doesn't Trust Them"

09 March 2024, Bitter Winter

Second part of "Bitter Winter" exclusive report on Tibetans enlisted in Beijing's People's Liberation Army. There are various reasons why China recruits them.

Tibetans are recruited in the People's Liberation Army (PLA), China's military force. Why? The proximate cause is that, wanting to strengthen its military presence around the "Line of Actual Control" (LAC) at the contested border with India, the Chinese regime encountered difficulties in acclimatizing its usual troops at those extreme environments. Han Chinese are accustomed to the average mainland China weather conditions, which are milder. Additionally, the PLA noted the prowess of the Vishesh Seema Bal, the Special Frontier Force of India, many of whom are Tibetan refugees and Gurkhas, during the Indian Army's operations on August 29-30, 2020, that secured the high peaks of the Kailash ranges of the Trans-Himalaya. Extending over China, India and Nepal in parallel to the Himalayas, this is a strategic area in the western part of the Tibetan Plateau, which is included only partially in the TAR.

But there is also a remote, deeper cause for drafting Tibetans into the PLA. One of the main theatres of collision during the Spring and Summer 2020 confrontation between China and India was the Galwan Valley, in Ladakh. In the face of that, the Chinese regime felt the urgency to strengthen Tibetans' loyalty and keep surveillance over their families, the second goal being very often the tool to obtain the first. Thus, Beijing directed the PLA's senior commanders to enlist at least one soldier from each Tibetan family. This ideally reminds the "home-stay" program imposed by the CCP to Uyghurs in the XUAR. In that case, over a million party officials invaded Uyghur families as "guests," while in the TAR "guests" are taken from families to serve party officials: in both cases, the regime brutally interferes with households in name of its capillary control over its citizens.

Another fact proves it. The never forgotten seriousness of the Galwan Valley incident pushed the political and military authorities also to coerce around 20 fighters from the Enbo Fight Club (EFC) to form the Plateau Resistance Tibetan Mastiffs, based in Lhasa and stationing in the Tibetan plateau. EFC, known for mixed martial arts, is a gym located in Chengdu, the capital city of the Chinese province of Sichuan. It was founded in 2001 by a Chinese ethnic Tibetan citizen and retired army police officer. It often does charitable work for impoverished families.

But the PLA is employing the EFC fighters to provide hand-to-hand combat training to soldiers in the region. This reflects the regime's efforts to address its perceived security concerns in the area, yet what may seem a normal employment of local resources—including civilians, a decision that Beijing has been now implementing for a while—is instead another form of oppression. In fact, information gathered by "Bitter Winter" from Tibetan informants makes it evident that those EFC fighters were induced into joining the military only after threats against their families. However, their decision to join led—our sources report—to severe backlash from their own community. Consequently, they suffered a loss of financial and emotional support from fellow Tibetans. In fact, these individuals, once celebrated and supported by Tibetans both within and outside the TAR, have been later facing ostracism and scorn. Criticism and disdain towards them become pronounced—our informants told us—, particularly on DouYin, a popular Chinese social media platform, where Tibetans have begun labelling them as "Chinese dogs," a deeply derogatory term in Tibetan culture.

Now, what is glaringly missing in this scenario is a distinct Tibetan regiment within the PLA structures. This underscores Beijing's apprehensions regarding Tibetans. Sources reported to "Bitter Winter" that the Chinese government has been heard saying it will never provide arms and ammunition to them since it fears that, once equipped with weapons, Tibetans may also retaliate against the regime.

Furthermore, the 2008 protests against the PRC's persecution that took place across all the Tibet plateau and caused tens of victims, to which almost 160 confirmed cases of self-immolations followed, only increased the CCP's fears. It is evident from several of its policies. For example, China is aggressively constructing and upgrading numerous airports and heliports in the western regions of the TAR and the XUAR. This infrastructure development started in 2017 but was reinforced after the 2020 LAC incident, accompanied by the enhancement of roads, railways, and other logistic capabilities, which facilitate swifter troop movements and weapon deployment for the PLA.

Also, the establishment of new and improved airports around the LAC is expected to stimulate economic growth and tourism by connecting these areas more closely with the PRC's major commercial and political hubs—as far as all this fits and benefits the regime's astute way to totalitarianism "with Chinese characteristics," i.e. controlled, scrutinized, and spied liberty.

The Chinese dual-use approach, serving both military facilities and granting more securitization devices, has been well described by the Washington, D.C.-based Center for Strategic & International Studies's "ChinaPower" observatory. Nonetheless, the overarching strategy of the PRC, driven by internal insecurities and external geopolitical considerations, had already been detected in 2016 by Tsering Topgyal, Assistant Professor of International Relations at the Department of Politics and International Studies of the University of Birmingham, the UK, in his book "China and Tibet: Perils of Insecurity."

Beijing's profound sense of unsafety, he argued, fueled by its perception of sociopolitical vulnerability, significantly influences its policies regarding Tibet's religious, linguistic, educational, and economic spheres. The regime's refusal to acknowledge the existence of a "Tibet Issue" and its rejection of proposals for real Tibetan autonomy stem from fears of undermining its nation-building endeavors. Years have passed since, but this "Chinese complex" over Tibet (and Xinjiang, that its non-Han inhabitants call East Turkestan) has only increased with the unfolding and progress of the Xi Jinping-era.

Since President Xi's rise to top power at the highest level of the CCP and the state, respectively in 2012 and 2013, secured virtually forever through the removal of the two-term limit on the presidency in 2018, the Communist nomenklatura in Beijing has in fact constantly grown in its deep concerns about instability and the purported potential for "separatist" movements using "terrorist" tactics in both the TAR and the XUAR. All the efforts to increase the already extensive surveillance measures and massive control over the populations of those two regions especially aim in fact at suppressing their ethnic non-Han components on a scale that has become paroxysmal and at a pace justified only by—unjustifiable panic.

Tibetan Soldiers in the Chinese Army. 1. The Context

08 March 2024, Bitter Winter

"Bitter Winter" exclusive report on Tibetans enlisted in the Chinese People's Liberation Army. But first, we should understand the area's geography and geopolitics.

The People's Republic of China (PRC) is constantly at war with its citizens, its neighbors, and yes, the entire world. Ideological in nature, revolutionary in means and goals, aggressive always, its war is waged at many levels and employs different weapons. Some of them plays on the chords of the subconscious, the emotional, and the imaginative, shrewdly mixing intimidation, propaganda, and a strategic pressure on the collective self of societies. In this respect, several of the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) techniques can be compared to the functioning of the levers that have been famously described by French anthropologist and sociologist Gustave Le Bon (1841–1931) in his 1895 book "Psychologie des foules"—published in English as "The Crowd: A Study of the Popular Mind"—and the exploitation of the mechanisms addressed by American journalist and social commentator Vance Packard (1914–1996) in his 1957 book "The Hidden Persuaders."

The CCP attempts to both impress and intimidate "ad intra" and "ad extra" alternates boasting shows of strength and arrogant assertions of "faits accomplis." In this peculiar art of war, geography plays a key role. University of Pisa's Marco Tangheroni (1946–2004)—an Italian specialist of navigation and trade in the Mediterranean sea during the Middle Ages—taught that the dynamics of human civilizations become clearer when the study of history is organically connected to that of geography. This consideration is also reported—by way of a real life anecdote—in the introduction to a posthumous collection of essays by Tangheroni, penned by Italian social commentator Giovanni Cantoni (1938–2020), who himself underlined another important truth through a maxim: if your history is wrong, your politics will be wrong as well.

Anti-communist as they were, Tangheroni and Cantoni would not be surprised to see the CCP among their most diligent pupils. In fact, communists do always do their homework, never stopping elaborating and manipulating. And while it should be a fatigue to daily reinvent the wheel of Chinese history, modern and ancient, the CCP gladly and constantly plays also with geography. Both fabricated history and geography are in fact used by the Chinese leadership and apparatchiks to tame facts, twisting them into a surrealistic new version of the world shaped by ideology, where cultures, religions, and ethnic identities are customized and orchestrated to build and maintain a political consensus that both produces and praises the final aim of Sinicization. Recently, "Bitter Winter" had the occasion to reflect upon the imposition of a fake semantization of that concept that the CCP uses to perform its totalitarian goal.

The CCP's frequent re-designing of the PRC's both national and regional borders on the world map is a case in point, normally justified by Beijing with supposedly strategic necessities, but mainly performed just to exhibit muscles. The latest-and surely not the last-unilateral redefinition of the national boundaries of the country came on August 28, 2023, with the publication of the 2023 edition of the "China Standard Map" by the PRC's Ministry of Natural Resources. Of course, this provoked outraged reactions by India, Malaysia, Vietnam, the Philippines, and the Republic of China (Taiwan) for the arbitrary annexations of parts of or all their territories to Chinese sovereignty, but it is interesting to note that Moscow didn't protest for the similar and illegitimate appropriation of territories belonging to the Russian Federation. We would probably not go astray if we imagine that this silence is probably due to the new alliance between the PRC and Russia, somewhat sealed also by Beijing's simultaneous mute concession to some of Moscow's territorial claims.

A constant major center of local geopolitical controversy is the border between PRC and India that is called "Line of Actual Control" (LAC). It separates PRC's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region (XUAR) and Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) in the north from India's Ladakh union territory, Uttarakhand, Himachal Pradesh, Sikkim, and Arunachal Pradesh states in the south, along the Himalayas. On that gigantic mountain range, the borders between PRC in the north, and Nepal and Bhutan in the south make the India-China boundary discontinuous. The LAC is roughly divided into three sectors, the western between India's Ladakh and PRC's XUAR and TAR being the most disputed of several contested bordering areas.

Totally informal, the LAC was designed as a de facto compromise following the cease-fire that froze the Sino-Indian War of 1962. In 1993, the two Asian countries agreed to respect it, yet there are neither official maps nor clear demarcations of lands; and so disputes continue.

Therefore, on occasions soldiers from the People's Liberation Army (PLA), or the PRC's armed force, cross the LAC and ignite new open contentions. In 1963, the Publications Division of the Government of India in New Delhi published a pamphlet, entitled "China Aggression in Maps" (now available online at the web site of French journalist, sinologist and Tibetologist Claude Arpi), to document the problem, which of course continued well after that year.

The most recent and serious of those military altercations took place in 2020, starting on May 5 (and factually dragging as late as January-February 2021), along all the three sectors of the LAC, but with particular intensity in the west, in the valley of Galwan. This is a river that flows from Aksai Chin into Ladakh, the first being occupied by the PRC but claimed by India as part of the latter. There, the clash between the armed forces of Beijing and New Delhi peaked in a physical brawl that resulted in casualties on June 15-16, 2020, bringing military buildup on both sides and more territorial disagreements, mainly the claimed, reported occupation by the PRC of about 2,000 square kms of Indian territory in eastern Ladakh that haven't been returned yet.

Some may wonder how it comes that two regional and world giants can shed blood for a handful of square kilometers in what "Bloomberg" media outlet efficaciously described as "a freezing high-altitude desert," "a mostly uninhabited terrain" where, "during winter months," "temperatures can drop to 40 degrees below zero." The principal reason is that a substantial part of politics is made of liturgies, rites, and symbols, national sovereignty being one of the most importantly perceived. Another is the strategic role played by boundary areas: for example, the PRC has no intention to give easily up Aksai Chin, a desert area with no natural resources that nonetheless preciously connects the XUAR and the TAR. A third, very pragmatic, reason is that for the CCP all is a good occasion and tool to tighten control on its citizens and impose its power.

The Spring and Summer 2020 battle on the roof of the world-a low intensity conflict, but highly rated by both sides-caused widespread international reactions and a broad press coverage, but there is another aspect of its aftermath that goes little noticed. After the skirmishes, the Chinese regime initiated the military recruitment of Tibetans in the PLA to bolster its standing presence in the area, i.e. maintain the occupation of Indian territories as part of its strategic long-term deployment plans.

Reincarnation and realpolitik keeps Dalai Lama's succession in dilemma

08 March 2024, The Hindu

As Tibetans mark on Sunday the 65th anniversary of the failed uprising against Chinese forces that led to the 88-year-old spiritual leader fleeing into exile in India, the question of who will succeed him is in sharp focus.

Esoteric questions of reincarnation rarely have real-world political consequences, but many fear the search for a successor to Tibet's Dalai Lama could inflame regional rivalries.

The 88-year-old spiritual leader, Tenzin Gyatso, has shown no indication of serious health issues, and has said that his dreams suggest he could live until he is 113.

But as Tibetans mark on Sunday the 65th anniversary of the failed uprising against Chinese forces that led to him fleeing into exile in India, the question of who will succeed their ageing leader is in sharp focus.

Tibetan activists are keenly aware that his death will mark a major setback in his push for more autonomy for the Himalayan region.

It would deprive the cause of a Nobel Prize winner whose moral teachings and idiosyncratic humour have made him one of the world's most popular religious leaders.

Many expect China will name a successor.

That raises the likelihood of rival nominations for the six-century-old post, including one chosen by exiled Tibetans based in India, a regional rival of China.

Tensions between the world's two most populous countries have already flared after a deadly Himalayan border clash in 2020.

Here, AFP explains how realpolitik may impact the question of reincarnation.

Reincarnation or emanation?

While the bodies of previous Dalai Lamas have been entombed in stupa burial mounds, Tibetans believe their soul carries on, living in a new being.

Tibetan monks traditionally choose the Dalai Lama through a ritualistic search that can take years, seeking telltale signs a child is the reincarnation of a spiritual leader first born in 1391.

The 14th Dalai Lama, who has lived in exile in the northern Indian town of Dharamsala since the failed uprising in 1959, has floated the possibility of a non-traditional succession. He already ended the post's political powers in 2011 in favour of an elected Tibetan government-in-exile.

Keeping Beijing on its toes, he has alternatively suggested that his reincarnation could be a girl for the first time, or that he might be the last Dalai Lama. Instead of reincarnation – whereby the soul returns in a newborn – there is also the intriguing possibility of "emanation before death".

In that case, Tibetans believe the Dalai Lama's spirit could transfer to an adult successor.

autonomy for his Tibetan homeland. | Photo Credit: AP

Esoteric questions of reincarnation rarely have real-world political consequences, but many fear the search for a successor to Tibet's Dalai Lama could inflame regional rivalries.

The 88-year-old spiritual leader, Tenzin Gyatso, has shown no indication of serious health issues, and has said that his dreams suggest he could live until he is 113.

But as Tibetans mark on Sunday the 65th anniversary of the failed uprising against Chinese forces that led to him fleeing into exile in India, the question of who will succeed their ageing leader is in sharp focus.

Tibetan activists are keenly aware that his death will mark a major setback in his push for more autonomy for the Himalayan region.

It would deprive the cause of a Nobel Prize winner whose moral teachings and idiosyncratic humour have made him one of the world's most popular religious leaders.

Many expect China will name a successor.

That raises the likelihood of rival nominations for the six-century-old post, including one chosen by exiled Tibetans based in India, a regional rival of China.

Tensions between the world's two most populous countries have already flared after a deadly Himalayan border clash in 2020.

Here, AFP explains how realpolitik may impact the question of reincarnation.

Reincarnation or emanation?

While the bodies of previous Dalai Lamas have been entombed in stupa burial mounds, Tibetans believe their soul carries on, living in a new being.

Tibetan monks traditionally choose the Dalai Lama through a ritualistic search that can take years, seeking telltale signs a child is the reincarnation of a spiritual leader first born in 1391.

The 14th Dalai Lama, who has lived in exile in the northern Indian town of Dharamsala since the failed uprising in 1959, has floated the possibility of a non-traditional succession. He already ended the post's political powers in 2011 in favour of an elected Tibetan government-in-exile.

Keeping Beijing on its toes, he has alternatively suggested that his reincarnation could be a girl for the first time, or that he might be the last Dalai Lama.

Instead of reincarnation – whereby the soul returns in a newborn – there is also the intriguing possibility of "emanation before death".

In that case, Tibetans believe the Dalai Lama's spirit could transfer to an adult successor.

"It is possible for the Lama to appoint a successor who is either his disciple or someone young who is to be recognised as his emanation," the Dalai Lama said in 2011.

What will China do?

China's officially atheist government has called the Dalai Lama a separatist.

In 1995, Beijing detained a child that the Dalai Lama had recognised as the Panchen Lama – another influential religious figure.

China, meanwhile, selected another child to become the Panchen Lama.

Rights groups have described the boy who was detained as the world's youngest political prisoner, and his whereabouts remain unknown.

The Dalai Lama is determined his successor will not face the same fate.

"No recognition or acceptance should be given to a candidate chosen for political ends by anyone, including those in the People's Republic of China," he warned in 2011.

"It is particularly inappropriate for Chinese communists who explicitly reject even the idea of past and future lives... to meddle in the system of reincarnation," he added.

He has also preemptively dismissed suggestions his successor's name must be plucked from a "Golden Urn" – which Beijing controls – by saying its use "lacked any spiritual quality".

India, meanwhile, which has long-hosted tens of thousands of Tibetan exiles, would be expected to continue its support and back a successor approved in the process set out by the Dalai Lama.

But that could raise tensions between the neighbouring powers, who have already clashed in contested border areas, including Ladakh, home to a sizeable Tibetan population.

What has the Dalai Lama said?

The Dalai Lama has promised to write a "predictive letter" for monks to follow around his 90th birthday in July 2025.

He has said responsibility for choosing any successor will "rest primarily" on his Gaden Phodrang Trust, a Zurich-headquartered foundation.

But he has also suggested he may be the last Dalai Lama.

"If I die before Tibetans regain their freedom, it is only logical to assume that I will be born outside Tibet," he wrote in his autobiography, "Freedom in Exile".

"Of course, it could be that by then my people will have no use for a Dalai Lama, in which case they will not bother to search for me," he added.

"So I might take rebirth as an insect, or an animal – whatever would be of most value to the largest number of sentient beings."

Exiled Tibetans Guard Heritage From 'Cultural Genocide'

07 March 2024, Barron's

From teaching centuries-old crafts to cataloguing their language, exiled Tibetans guard the cultural identity of a homeland most have neither seen nor dare visit, and where they say Beijing is eradicating their heritage.

Crouched over a minutely detailed devotional "thangka" painting depicting Buddha, artist Lobsang Tenzin teaches students in northern India.

"It is important to keep the traditions of our history," said the 49-year-old, dipping a needle-thin brush into rich blue paint made from crushed lapis lazuli as six young Tibetan trainees watch.

"These skills were nearly lost, but we pass on the skills by teaching young artists."

Tibetans will on March 10 mark the 65th anniversary of the 1959 uprising against Chinese forces that led to their spiritual leader the Dalai Lama fleeing into exile, followed by tens of thousands of compatriots.

Inside Tibet, the chaos of China's 1966-76 Cultural Revolution left temples razed and monasteries reduced to ruins, destruction that continued in the decades that followed.

Today, activists decry what they say are Beijing's determined efforts to erase what is left of Tibet's cultural and religious identity.

Lhadon Tethong, head of the Tibet Action Institute, condemns what she calls "cultural genocide" – including Beijing's sharp restrictions on Tibetan language, with children "indoctrinated" at state-run boarding schools.

Beijing, which maintains "Tibet is part of China", fiercely rejects the accusations.

Chinese foreign ministry spokeswoman Mao Ning this week said that people in Tibet are "living a happy life", in response to UN rights chief Volker Turk's assertion that China was violating fundamental rights.

Tibet enjoys "social stability, economic growth, solidarity among all ethnic groups and harmony among various religious beliefs", she said.

Tibet scholar Robert Barnett, from SOAS University of London, called Beijing a "foreign ruler deciding what's best for a people whose culture it barely knows".

"There is a gradual whittling away of a culture and a history," Barnett said.

"It is a process where you gradually eliminate all the elements of a history, a people, culture and of a society that are inconvenient to the new rulers."

Tibetan authorities say there are 130,000 Tibetan exiles, many in India and Nepal but also in more than 25 countries worldwide – just a fraction of the seven million living under China's control.

As the decades pass, that makes the preservation of cultural identity even more challenging.

Tenzin studied and now teaches at the Norbulingka Institute, a social enterprise centre training more than 300 men and women in painting, embroidery, weaving and woodcarving.

The complex of red and green Tibetan-style buildings, close to the Dalai Lama's base in India's Himalayan hill town of Dharamsala, was launched in 1995 to employ highly skilled artisans eking out a living with repair jobs.

"After the great masters came to India, they ended up doing odd jobs, trying to build their lives in a new country," said Tsultrim Dorjee, a senior manager at the institute.

"The institute helped them use their skills... the goal was to return Tibetan art to its former glory."

Others take a more modern approach, like 29-year-old artist Tashi Nyima, with his bright cartoon-style canvases that nonetheless still reflect his people's heritage and political battles.

Born and brought up in Dharamsala, where red-robed monks and nuns crowd streets alongside Tibetans in baseball caps and jeans, Nyima said younger generations struggle with a "very mixed identity".

But he remains committed to the cause.

"I've always believed that Tibet will be free one day," he said, in front of his painting of a shackled monk.

"If I didn't have this belief in me, I wouldn't have done these kinds of works – I would have just stopped."

Another battle is keeping the language alive.

While Google Translate offers 133 languages, Tibetan is not among them – but exiles in 2022 released their own 223-volume dictionary, available online.

"Once the language is preserved, then everything falls in place," said Dorji Damdul, director of Tibet House in New Delhi, founded by the Dalai Lama to promote his people's heritage.

"Language is like the medium through which all the flow of culture and philosophy happens."

But young Tibetans in India are increasingly seeking opportunities in Europe and North America.

Damdul, born in India in 1968 and a former translator for the Dalai Lama, admits that keeping an identity alive is a "major challenge".

"In Tibet, assimilation by force happens with the communist Chinese," said the Buddhist scholar. "In the West, natural assimilation can happen because it's too free."

Tibet's Dharamsala-based government in exile says it is looking to keep the increasingly scattered community connected, including via online conferences teaching younger generations about their history.

"If they understand Tibet a little more, they could be the best advocates," said Penpa Tsering, elected as the government's sikyong, or leader, by Tibetans worldwide.

"Even though we are physically distant, we are mentally close together."

Tsering's administration oversees more than 60 Tibetan language schools in India and Nepal and supports nearly 300 monasteries and nunneries.

"We are here for the long haul," said Tsering. "Don't think that we'll vanish just like that."

Tibetans fear for future as they recall failed uprising against China

07 March 2024, The Hindu

Tibet has alternated over the centuries between independence and control by China

Buddhist monks walk down a street in McLeodganj near Dharamsala. While once thousands fled to India annually, fewer than a dozen escaped last year, Tibet's exiled government says. File | Photo Credit: AFP

The Dalai Lama, wrapped in red and yellow robes, urged chanting monks and nuns in his latest public prayers to help heal the world with their "compassionate heart".

"Being a good human being is everybody's responsibility," he said, weeks ahead of Sunday's commemorations of the failed Tibetan uprising against China that saw him flee into exile in neighbouring India.

"I urge all of you to strive towards it."

The 88-year-old Buddhist leader says he has decades yet to live, but Tibetans who have followed him abroad are bracing for an inevitable future without him.

China says Tibet is an integral part of the country, and many exiled Tibetans fear Beijing will name a rival successor to the Dalai Lama, bolstering control over a land it poured troops into in 1950.

Tibet has alternated over the centuries between independence and control by China, which says it "peacefully liberated" the rugged plateau and brought infrastructure and education.

But Tsultrim, a sprightly 95-year-old Tibetan former CIA-backed guerilla, offers a warning from the past.

He recalls how he took up a gun when Tibetans rose up against Chinese forces 65 years ago on March 10, 1959, in a revolt whose crushing forced the Dalai Lama across snowy Himalayan passes into India.

Tens of thousands followed.

"We were asked to rise up to resist the invading Chinese army and to escort the Dalai Lama to exile," Tsultrim told AFP, dressed in a black puffer jacket, still with a soldier-like manner with close-cut grey hair and a strong handshake.

Today, he is among the last of a generation to remember what he calls a "free Tibet", and tells younger Tibetans not to trust Beijing.

"Before Tibet lost its independence, we were herders and farmers," said Tsultrim, who uses only one name and is based in the Dalai Lama's adopted hometown of Dharamsala in northern India.

"Life was good, and our living was good... We had nothing to do with money, the herders sold meat and butter and farmers sold grains."

The past

Tsultrim later joined Tibetan insurgents based in Nepal's mountainous kingdom of Mustang in 1960, trained and supplied with rifles and radios by the CIA.

For more than a decade they snuck into Tibet to lay ambushes, including blowing up Chinese army trucks.

"We were volunteers with our own horse, and carried our own rifle and food," he said. "We kept waging war."

Washington used the 2,000-strong force as a covert Cold War proxy.

But after the CIA cut funding, and the Dalai Lama in 1974 urged fighters to lay down arms and follow his call for a peaceful solution, Tsultrim left for India.

After working as a farm labourer for decades, he retired to an old people's home near where his leader lives.

"I came to see the Dalai Lama before dying," he said.

His comrade Ngodup Palden, 90, clings to a fading dream.

He became a paratrooper in India's special Tibetan force for 24 years, seeing combat in the China-India war of 1962.

"Before we lost our country, we lived a comfortable life," he said, staring out at the snow-capped Himalayan peaks that divide him from his homeland.

"It is my hope to return to a free Tibet during my lifetime," he said, prayer beads clicking through his fingers.

"I have some hope in my heart, to be back in my homeland, my happy homeland."

The present

Those coming from Tibet today say Palden's hope is fantasy.

While once thousands fled to India annually, fewer than a dozen escaped last year, Tibet's exiled government says.

Activists say Tibetans' movements in their homeland are monitored, and that many fear arrest or retaliation against relatives should they make it out.

"I feel like a bird that has been caged for a long time and is now free to flap its wings and fly," said 37-year-old Tsering Dawa, a former bank manager from Tibet's main city Lhasa.

He abandoned his middle-class life in 2020 fearing re-arrest after contacting journalists about China's "vocational training centres".

U.N. experts say the centres are used to "undermine Tibetan religious, linguistic and cultural identity" — charges Beijing denies.

Dawa said he had been detained without trial in 2015 for nearly a year after messaging an exile group to report passport restrictions for Tibetans.

He said his detention included a brutal beating and interrogation that pushed him to "the brink of insanity".

"I told my mother that if we stay in Tibet, we are bound to die," he said, warning her she would be punished if he left without her.

"If we leave, there is a 50% chance of making it."

With routes across the mountains to Nepal barred by China's security forces, he packed a bag and posed with his 68-year-old mother as "tourists heading on holiday".

Swallowing their terror, they smiled and snapped photographs at Lhasa airport, starting a journey that would eventually bring them to India.

In his cramped one-bedroom apartment he described leaving behind 600,000 yuan ($83,000) in his account, two houses and a car.

"The reason I got out was because of my willingness to sacrifice it all."

The future

Younger generations who grew up in exile fear threats ahead.

"China is hell-bent on appointing their own Dalai Lama once he passes away," said Tenzin Dawa, a 31-year-old activist.

Born in India, she heads the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy.

She worries that the younger generations have lost hope of seeing their ancestral home.

"We grew up stateless in India... and, we never know what might happen when His Holiness the Dalai Lama passes away," she said.

"That's why we're seeing a lot of emigration of Tibetans to Europe and North America."

Tens of thousands of Tibetans have left India since 2011, according to Indian government figures.

"It is a big concern," the activist added. "The younger generations, it is they who have to carry on the movement."

The Dalai Lama: Tibet's Spiritual Leader, Bane Of Beijing

07 March 2024, Barron's

The Dalai Lama, the charismatic Buddhist spiritual leader celebrated worldwide for his tireless campaign for greater autonomy for his Tibetan homeland, has been a thorn in China's side for decades.

Tenzin Gyatso, who describes himself as a "simple Buddhist monk", became the face of the Tibetan cause as he crisscrossed the globe, mixing with royalty, politicians and celebrities.

The 88-year-old, with his famous beaming smile, has become a global symbol of peace whose message transcends religion, regarded by his many supporters as a visionary in the vein of Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King.

The Dalai Lama was just 23 when he fled the Tibetan capital Lhasa in fear for his life after Chinese troops crushed an uprising that began on March 10, 1959 – 65 years ago this Sunday.

It took him 13 days to trek across the Himalayas to the Indian border. He has never returned.

His life in exile has centred around the northern Indian hill-town of Dharamsala, home to thousands of fellow Tibetans who maintain traditional customs, even though many have never set foot in their ancestral homeland.

In Dharamsala, he set up a government-in-exile and launched a campaign to reclaim Tibet, evolving to embrace a "middle way" -- relinquishing independence for greater autonomy.

In 1989 he won the Nobel Peace Prize for his bid to "seek reconciliation despite brutal violations".

The award catapulted him into the global spotlight, courted by world leaders and Hollywood stars.

In his maroon robes, simple sandals and wide-rimmed spectacles, the Dalai Lama made an unlikely celebrity.

But his sense of mischief – he once announced he would like to reincarnate as an attractive blonde – and infectious chuckle proved irresistible, and made him a darling of the world's media.

The Chinese government, however, has remained impervious to his charm, branding him a separatist and a "wolf in a monk's robe".

Tibet has alternated over the centuries between independence and control by China, and Beijing says the region is an integral part of the country.

The Dalai Lama wants greater autonomy for his people, including the right to worship freely and to preserve their culture, which many Tibetans say has been crushed under Chinese rule.

Formal negotiations with Beijing broke down in 2010. A year later, the Dalai Lama retired from politics to make way for a new leader elected by exiled Tibetans around the world.

Born into a farming family in the Tibetan village of Taksar on July 6, 1935, he was chosen as the 14th incarnation of Tibetan Buddhism's supreme religious leader at the age of two.

He was given the name Jetsun Jamphel Ngawang Lobsang Yeshe Tenzin Gyatso – Holy Lord, Gentle Glory, Compassionate Defender of the Faith and Ocean of Wisdom – and taken to Lhasa's 1,000-room Potala Palace to be trained to become the leader of his people.

He indulged a precocious scientific curiosity, playing with a watch sent to him by US president Franklin Roosevelt and repairing cars, one of which he crashed into a palace gate.

But his childhood ended abruptly at age 15 when he was hastily enthroned as head of state after the Chinese army invaded Tibet in 1950.

Nine years later, as Chinese troops crushed a popular uprising, he escaped to India.

When told the Dalai Lama had fled, Chinese leader Mao Zedong reportedly said: "In that case, we have lost the battle."

He was welcomed by India's first prime minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, who offered Dharamsala as a base for him and thousands of fellow Tibetan refugees.

Throughout the Dalai Lama's life, he has been treated as an honoured guest in India – an official policy stance that has been a source of tension with Beijing.

It is unclear how, or even whether, his successor will be named, with his predecessors chosen by monks according to ancient Buddhist traditions.

He has alternatively suggested the next Dalai Lama could be a girl, that his spirit could transfer to an adult successor, or that he could even be the last in the line – and that he might be reincarnated as an animal or an insect instead.

But he has always been clear on one point – that any successor named by China would not be credible.

"No recognition or acceptance should be given to a candidate chosen for political ends by anyone, including those in the People's Republic of China," he has said.

The Maldives Is a Tiny Paradise. Why Are China and India Fighting Over It?

05 March 2024, The New York Times

Malé, the capital and most populous city of the Maldives.

Asia's two giants are crowding the island nation with building projects, tossing its newborn democracy to and fro.

Between a few flecks of coral in the Indian Ocean, a ribbon of highway more than a mile long swoops up from the blue. Since 2018, the China-Maldives Friendship Bridge has connected this archipelago's hyper-dense capital, Malé, and the international airport — expanded by Chinese companies — one island to the east.

But China is not alone in chasing friendship with the Maldives. A 20-minute walk across the capital, next to Indira Gandhi Memorial Hospital, an even longer sea bridge will link Malé with islands to the west. This one is being built by Indian workers, with money from India.

The Maldives, a tiny tourism-dependent country of 500,000 people, barely registers as a blip alongside India and China, the world's most populous nations. Yet every blip counts in the two giants' competition for influence across South Asia, and that has set the Maldives on a zigzagging course between them.

India, at the heart of the vast region, has long been its most powerful economic and military force. Still, China has made significant inroads with its much larger financial resources, signing infrastructure deals and securing access to ports in countries surrounding India.

The Maldives' location makes it a strategic priority for both of Asia's superpowers. China needs a military presence on the Arabian Sea to safeguard its access to oil from the Persian Gulf. And India, which has been clashing with China along their Himalayan border, wants to make sure that the Maldives, its island neighbor, doesn't become too cozy with Beijing.

In January, India found itself in a sudden blowup with the Maldives over a perceived threat to the islands' tourism lifeblood. But the great-power competition across the Maldives' sky-blue lagoons has yet to reach a boil. Gains and losses are marked more by the tilts of the Maldives' own politicians — more pro-India at some points, more pro-China at others — and, most of all, by the money that both sides spend to win Maldivian hearts and minds.

From his high-rise office looking out over Malé's marina, Mohamed Saeed, the Maldives' minister of economic development and trade, puts his country's needs in stark terms. Its economy is now worth about $6.5 billion a year, of which $6 billion is earned by tourism, and most of the rest by fishing tuna. The goal is to make it a $12 billion economy within the next five years.

The Maldives discovered tourist dollars in 1972, and it now draws more than a million visitors a year to the "water villas" that branch out from wooden boardwalks and define its high-end resorts.

The country became a democracy only in 2008, with the election of a charismatic young leader, Mohamed Nasheed. The current president, Mohamed Muizzu, was elected five months ago, in the latest swing of the pendulum between India and China. Mr. Muizzu took office after campaigning on an "India Out" platform, which called for expelling about 80 Indian military personnel stationed across the Maldives to provide support.

Mr. Saeed, a Muizzu appointee, was also a cabinet minister during the last "pro-China" government, when the China-Maldives Friendship Bridge was opened. He oversaw a free-trade agreement with China. But these days he sticks to the line that Mr. Muizzu's government is pursuing only a "pro-Maldives" policy.

There is no preference for China, he says — "we extend our invitation of free trade to all countries," because "we would like to get the best value for our tuna."

Pursuing cordial relations with China and India simultaneously might seem the wisest course. But that became more difficult, said Mimrah Ghafoor, a writer and former career diplomat, as both countries stepped up their influence campaigns just as the Maldives was making its transition to democracy.

China has the deeper pockets, with development banks that dwarf India's. But, Mr. Ghafoor noted, if China "has mostly carrots," India "has both carrots and the stick." That is because the Maldives depends on its near neighbor in times of intense need.

Mr. Ghafoor rattled off a list of crises in which Indian help proved indispensable, from fighting back a coup launched from Sri Lanka in 1988 to rescue work after the tsunami of 2004 to a delivery of 1,200 tons of freshwater by airplane and tanker during a shortage in 2014 – a time when the Maldives was led by a China-leaning president.

Beyond money and geography, there is another important difference between India and China as competitors, one that was illustrated during the Maldives' flare-up with India earlier this year.

Three junior ministers attacked India's prime minister, Narendra Modi, on social media after he had promoted his country's own paradisaal atoll, an even smaller and far less developed archipelago called Lakshadweep. These "India Out" Maldivians inferred a threat to their economy. In the much louder backlash, nationalistic Indians urged a boycott of the islands.

The disruption to relations offered a contrast with China, which exerts supreme message control. That gives it the ability to negotiate effectively with smaller countries behind closed doors. Beijing may be less comfortable with the Maldives' new democracy than New Delhi is, but it has navigated relations just as adeptly.

One fierce democracy advocate, Eva Abdulla, a high-ranking member of Parliament, is proudly pro-India. But mostly she is anti-oscillation.

"Flip-flopping on foreign policy is clearly not good for us," she said. Not in terms of security, and "it doesn't allow for any kind of stability in development projects."

Ms. Abdulla, a cousin of Mr. Nasheed, the former president, argues that there are many reasons to stand by India as a partner. She mentions their cultural affinities, as South Asian democracies. Along with hospitals and schools on the far-flung islands, India funds things like a cultural center in Malé, to promote yoga and Indian dance.

Mr. Modi's pro-Hindu policies at home rub many the wrong way in the Maldives, which is supposedly a 100 percent Muslim society. Even so, "we can't afford a fistfight with India," Ms. Abdulla said. On this, she and the president, Mr. Muizzu, whose parties will be battling each other in parliamentary elections in April, agree.

Mr. Muizzu has stepped up his calls for a generic Maldivian nationalism, in favor of the islands' own language and its Islamic values, while steering clear of an anti-India tone. He has reluctantly made good on his promise to expel the Indian military personnel, but India has not quit its development projects.

One of the most visible is a giant expansion of an airport on the island of Hanimaadhoo, an hour's flight north from Malé. It is home to one of the planes used by the Indian airmen. And it is the kind of project that makes some Maldivians fear that their sovereign territory is being prepared as a potential battleground in somebody else's war.

Hanimaadhoo, population 2,664, hardly seems to need the extra runways being built by an Indian firm.

Nor do the little-touristed islands nearby. Yet digging machines are at work 24 hours a day, in effect re-engineering the delicate island to make it capable of landing enormous aircraft. A similar airport, built by Indians at the opposite end of the country, makes Hanimaadhoo seem like part of a pattern.

Maldivians are not the only ones to think that. An Indian laborer at the site named Ranjit said he thought it was obvious why India needed to build a military-ready facility here. "China is coming," he said. "Don't you see the Chinese ships getting ready?"

On Feb. 22, the Xiang Yang Hong 03, officially a Chinese research vessel, pulled into Malé. The Maldives' government said it was just a port call. But as with the Indian airport projects, the ship left an air of ambiguity about possible military uses in its wake.

Book Review: Echoes from the Forgotten Mountains

04 March 2024, Vijay Kranti, Phayul

Jamyang Norbu's book 'ECHOES FROM FORGOTTEN MOUNTAINS : TIBET IN WAR AND PEACE' is a monumental documentation of the brave armed fight of Tibetan people against a powerful and ruthless colonial power. It is going to stay as one of the most detailed and authentic monographs on this subject for coming generations of Tibetans, students and researchers Dominance of Buddhism and Dalai Lama in most of popular narratives on Tibet has led to a common belief that occupation of Tibet by China in 1950-51 was a cake walk. Chinese systematic and concerted propaganda about presenting the colonial grabbing of Tibet as 'peaceful liberation' too has made many outsiders believe further that Tibetan people's faith in Buddhism and Dalai Lama's commitment to non-violence had converted Tibet into a land of the timid and the Tibetan masses as indifferent people who had neither the desire nor capacity to push back the Chinese communist aggression. Hence the destiny of Tibet to live with the curse of colonial occupation for over seven decades now.

This popular but unfounded belief about Tibet needed an authentic, explosive and monumental book like "Echoes From Forgotten Mountains" (891 pages) to shatter it into pieces. This book, written by famous Tibetan writer and researcher Jamyang Norbu, successfully brings out the self-respecting, brave and heroic facet of Tibetan people who vigorously fought, though vainly, against a far better placed Chinese Communist Party and its People's Liberation Army (PLA) which outweighed the ceremonial Tibetan army enormously in terms of equipment, manpower, fighting experience and, more than everything else, the strategic wisdom of the national leadership. There have been surely some books, focused on Tibet's armed resistance against the Chinese occupation – some by the CIA operatives and other outsiders who had authentic knowledge of Tibetan guerrilla operations( e.g. Roger McCarthy's 'Tears of the Lotus'; Conboy and Morrison's 'The CIA's Secret War in Tibet'; Mikel Dunham's 'Buddha's Warriors'; Carole McGranahan's 'Arrested Histories'; and John Kenneth Knaus' 'Orphans of the Cold War'). And then there was an eight volume autobiographic 'Resistance' by Lhamo Tsering who himself was among the top ranking leaders of Tibet's most fearsome guerrilla force 'Chu Shi Gangdruk.' But Jamyang's book is unique in many ways. The strongest point of this book is that it is based on Jamyang Norbu's years long research of all available material on the Tibetan resistance movement and his one to one personal meetings with surviving Tibetan soldiers, guerrilla fighters, secret agents, peasants, merchants and even some surviving beggars who were either direct participants or were firsthand witnesses to many important developments or their close associates and family members.

Jamyang being himself a Tibetan guerrilla soldier of 'Chu Shi Gangdruk', now defunct but has been the most respected national guerrilla freedom army of Tibet between 1950s and mid 1970s, and a highly acclaimed political commentator, historian, novelist and a popular playwright is among the most suitable Tibetans to write on the subject of this book. His earlier books like 'Illusion and Reality', 'Buying the Dragon's Teeth', 'Shadow Tibet' and 'Don't Stop the Revolution' have been received quite well both by Tibetan as well as non-Tibetan scholars on China and Tibet. His novel 'The Mandala of Sherlock Holmes' won the Crossword Book Award in 2000 and has been translated in over a dozen languages.

And more than all this, Jamyang is a unique Tibetan writer among the Tibetan diaspora who has inspired and educated all three generations of opinion leaders and ordinary Tibetans over past seven decades through his forceful theatre and writings. Within my limits of knowledge of Tibetan society over past five decades I can say that Jamyang leads the class of Tibetan thinkers and opinion leaders who, like Lhasang Tsering, Karma Choephel, Karma Yeshe, Tenzin Tsundue or the brave Tsering Woesser from inside Chinese occupied Tibet, have kept the fire of national independence alive. Their job has been surely not easy in the face of serious disagreement and opposition from the highly influential and powerful section of the exile Tibetan establishment who have formally given up the demand for national independence ('Rangzen') in return for 'genuine autonomy' for Tibet within the Chinese constitution.

This is one more reason which is going to make this book popular among the pro-'Rangzen' section of Tibetans in exile and those living inside Chinese occupied Tibet. Jamyang's popularity among this section of Tibetan society reflects from the Beijing-based Tibetan poet and blogger (Ms.) Tsering Woesser who has described him as the "Lu Xun of Tibet".

Jamyang has liberally used his personal life story and the history of his own family to make this massive narration interesting, authentic and easy to understand the story of Tibetan armed resistance. Jamyang's courage to present his perspective of history to his audience makes his voice stand out in the cacophony of present day Tibetan society which stands divided along a deep trench between its Rangzen and the Umaylam (middle path of rapprochement with China) factions. One example is his description of the events of 1950 which led to Chinese PLA's first major and key victory in the eastern Tibet. While the Tibetan Kashag (Cabinet of Dalai Lama's exile government) paid glowing tributes to its former minister colleague Ngabo Ngawang Jigme on his death in Beijing as an active collaborator of China in 2009, Jamyang has exposed his role as a coward and traitor Governor of the Tibetan region. In this context it is interesting to remember that on Ngabo's death the Chinese government officially described him as "a great patriot, renowned social activist, good son of Tibetan people, outstanding leader of China's ethnic work and a close friend of CPC." Surprisingly, the Kashag in Dharamshala also issued an official tribute which referred to Ngabo as "Honest and Patriotic who always spoke truth even under the most trying and difficult circumstances". Jamyang writes in details (page-81/82) how keen was Ngabo to surrender his brave and ready to fight 2,500 Tibetan soldiers including the Tibetan commander General Muja before just one hundred 'exhausted' PLA soldiers. Jamyang's narration includes his interviews with Robert Ford (1923-2013), the only radio operator of the Tibetan government and the only foreigner living permanently in Tibet when China's PLA attacked and occupied a big part of Eastern Tibet. Quoting Ford he writes, "When Muja finally came out of the monastery, he was angry and grim-faced. He told Ford that Nagabo had ordered him to surrender. He apologized to Ford for delaying him and ordered his men to make camp. Then Muja, Ford and the 2,500 soldiers of the Tibetan army of Chamdo waited haplessly before the walls of Drugu Monastery till eventually ... one hundred exhausted PLA troops from the Ngamda crossroad arrived, and Ngabo was finally able to surrender."

The book also presents Jamyang's eye for details and his narration of very simple and obvious looking things to make his story interesting and informative. For example, he describes striking similarities of architecture and other characteristics between various towns at the entry points to Tibet even if they were located hundreds of kilometers apart from each other. His observations about such similarities between Kalimpong and Darjeeling from Bengal direction; Gangtok from Sikkim side; Dartsedo (Kangding) from Sichuan and Satham Lijiang from Yunnan are interesting.

The variety and quality of a good number of old and historic photos included in the book add extra glamour and value to it. For example, vintage photos from Jamyang's own family album; many historic personalities and scholars related to Tibet; heroes of Tibetan battles and public uprisings against the invading PLA; prominent guerrilla fighters of Chu-Shi-Gangdruk; real photos of Chinese atrocities during the Cultural Revolution; and photos of Chinese, Tibetan, British and Japanese spies make it a rich collection. However, nearly complete set of photos of the CIA-trained Tibetan guerrilla fighter paratroopers who were secretly air dropped in Tibet make this book unique and a collectors' pride.

Another set of visuals which help the reader in grasping the story of Tibetan resistance against the PLA are the maps included in the book. Some maps which deserve to be preserved by the reader include a detailed map of Tibet of 1950s showing location of all major towns and cities; routes connecting Tibet to Gangtok and Darjeeling; a large map depicting routes and directions of Chinese advance and Tibetan fighters' retreat in early 1950s; the routes taken by Chu-Shi-Gangdruk's founder commander and the supreme hero of Tibetan guerrilla resistance Andrug Gonpo Tashi right from Paksho in the East to Nyemo and Shigatse in the West; and, of course, the map of Mustang guerrilla bases in Nepal showing the location of each of the 16 Company camps of Chu-Shi-Gangdruk.

What makes Jamyang unpopular among the Tibet's exiled establishment is his frankness and courage to speak up his mind on sensitive issues. This book highlights this aspect of his personality at many places. And all this comes from his enthusiasm about conducting his own studies and research. A major part of his book is based on his personal and detailed interviews, spread over many years, with numerous individuals who were first hand witness to Tibet's war with China. His description of the daring role of many Tibetan women fighters like Gyari Dorje Yudon of Nyarong, Ani (Nun) Pachen Lemdatsang of Gonjo and Lhalu sonam Deki as well brave political leaders like Ani (Nun) Glingshar, Gurten Kunsang, Dolma Chonzom, Sampho Ngudup Wangmo and Lobsang Dekyong reflect the widespread anger and opposition to the Chinese colonial rule in Tibet.

Ford told Jamyang about his discussions with General Karchung of Tibetan army who had faced first attack of PLA on 7 Oct 1950 at Riwoche and later was in Chinese captivity along with Ford. Quoting from his long interviews with Ford, Jamyang points out that there was only one radio receiver at Ford's command when PLA entered Tibet. If Tibetan army had one more radio at Riwoche and another at Markham then the history of Tibet would have been different. "In just, possibly, a week or so, the many high passes in that region would have become snowbound..... Chinese would have had to force their pack animals and porters through the many snowbound passes to Chamdo, and that would unquestionably have led to a disaster (for PLA)...."

In the chapter titled 'Requiem' Jamyang has, like a surgeon, finely analyzed the reasons behind the defeat of Tibetan army and guerrilla warriors at the hands of invading PLA. He writes, "The organization of the Tibetan army was indeed archaic. The individual Tibetan soldier was not as well trained, certainly not as well equipped as his European, American or Chinese counterpart. But he had native toughness, courage and amor patriae. No Tibetan soldier threw down his weapon and fled at the first sign of the enemy. Even when defeated he gave a good account of himself....." While describing the valor and fighting spirit of the Tibetan warriors Jamyang also points out some weak points too. At one point the book says, "....When (Tibetan people's) troops went to the front line, they took their families with them. With (General) Muja's men now came as many women and children, with all their household goods and personal belongings piled up on yaks and mules...."

The formal Tibetan army was defeated on the Eastern front in the very first Chinese attack in October 1950. This defeat was quick and decisive against an enormous, well equipped and experienced PLA as the Tibetan army not only lacked drastically on its manpower front but also because of utter paucity of necessary training, equipment. Moreover, it was near total absence of planning, vision or desire on the part of Lhasa government to have and maintain a good national army. The role of Ngapo Ngawang Jigme, the Tibetan governor of the region, who was already known for his pro-China tilt and who decided to not only to surrender to the PLA but also ordered blasting of entire Tibetan armory which proved as the proverbial last straw for the Tibetan side. His decision not only deprived the willing Tibetan soldiers to fight back but it also closed door on the arms and ammunition reaching those soldiers and lay people who had decided to carry on the fight. But thanks to the self-respecting and fighting spirit of the ordinary Tibetans, especially those from the frontline provinces of Kham and Amdo, entire responsibility of armed resistance against the occupying PLA across Tibet for coming decades was shouldered by groups of local chieftains, ordinary citizens, Lamas and Nuns.

Jamyang's book is a systematic, the most voluminous one so far and commendable documentation of this struggle which, unfortunately, could not keep up against a giant and shrewd opponent. He has presented a detailed history of various stages and forms of Tibetan armed struggle through stories and deeds of individual freedom fighters belonging to various big and small groups across Tibet. However, a good part of the book is dedicated to the Chu-Shi-Gangdruk (i.e. 'Four Rivers Six Ranges') which was a volunteer guerrilla force lead by legendry Andrug Gampo Tashi, the most fearsome, brave and highly respected fighter of modern Tibetan history. The book tells the force's story right from its formation as a volunteer army and later its adoption by American secret service CIA for training at Colorado's secret Camp-Hale and subsequent armed operations inside Tibet. Unfortunately the US and CIA's support lasted only until the US government started its love affair with Mao's China in 1970s. CIA's sudden decision to pull out its hands from under the guerrilla force and leaving it unprotected only to be massacred jointly by the Nepal's Royal Nepal Army and the Chinese PLA in mid 1970s.

In addition to telling stories of many individual Tibetan guerrilla soldiers Jamyang has also interviewed many of CIA's American trainers and the coordinators who were involved in training the Tibetans in handling arms and ammunition, running battery less transmitters, secret coding of wireless messages and air dropping of arms and paratroopers deep inside Tibet. He has also described the role of Dalai Lama's two elder brothers Taktser Rinpoche and Gyalo Thundup in the CIA operations.

Jamyang describes in good details how Taktser Rinpoche personally stayed at Colorado and was provided a special house at the Camp Hale as he played an important role in the training of Tibetan guerrillas. Gyalo Thundup's role, true to his nature and specializations was focused on liaison with the US government and, as described by Mikel Dunham in his CIA focused book 'Buddha's Warriors', was involved in managing the American CIA funds for Chu-Shi-Gangdruk. In their later years Taktser Rinpoche finally joined California University as a professor and remained a vocal and strong supporter of the idea of complete freedom (i.e. 'Rangzen') for Tibet till his last breath. However, Gyalo Thundup has been living in his so many avatars which include his close and controversial association with Beijing that has led to convincing Dalai Lama to shift his goal from 'Rangzen' to the 'Middle Way Approach' (MWA) which means accepting Tibet as a part of China under Chinese constitution in exchange for 'genuine autonomy' for Tibet. It is not surprising that Jamyang as one of the most vocal proponents of 'Rangzen' and strongest opponents of the MWA has invited all kinds of reactions, including opposition and condemnation, from many Tibetan quarters including the exile Tibetan establishment in Dharamshala. I am amused to note that while he has given details about the valor and the role played by many less known individual participants of Tibetan armed struggle, Gyalo Thundup is conspicuous by his near total absence from this voluminous book despite latter's prominent role in the CIA sponsored armed guerrilla war.

A good section of the book is focused at the aggressive conduct of the Chinese Communist Party and the PLA after occupation of Tibet. He has probed and described in details how ordinary Tibetan people including monks, nuns and nomads across Tibet opposed and resisted the Chinese imposition of the communist system in the guise of 'Democratic Reforms'. He also describes the 1959 Lhasa-Uprising of Tibetan people against Chinese rule which finally prompted Dalai Lama to secretly escape from Tibet to India.

The fact remains that the armed struggle of helpless and friendless Tibetan people failed to match Chinese power machine over past seven decades. In the face of millions of new Han settlers across Tibet, a massive machine of soldiers, policemen, informers and a sophisticated digital surveillance system has left no space for an armed resistance inside today's Tibet. But the unending stream of self-immolation by Tibetan people which has seen over 150 young boys and girls, monks and nuns making the supreme sacrifice over recent years to give voice to the Tibetan people's refusal to accept China's rule and dominance over their country is an unambiguous indication of Tibet and Tibetans' resolve for freedom. It may not be easy to comment on all issues covered in this 891-page book in a single review but one can say for sure that this book is a monumental documentation of the brave armed fight of Tibetan people against a powerful and ruthless colonial power. On the strength of my, whatsoever limited, knowledge and understanding of Tibet and the people of Tibet over past five decades I can safely predict that this book is going to prove one of the most detailed and authentic monographs of Tibetan people's armed struggle and their desire for national independence.

Unsettled LAC is Xi's pressure point on India to stay away from West

01 March 2024, The Hindustan Times

It seems that China is in no mood to resolve its dispute with India. On February 19, the India-China Corps Commanders met at Chushul-Moldo border point to discuss disengagement, relocation and de-escalation in eastern Ladakh.

It has been four years since the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA) transgressed over Galwan, Gogra Hot Springs, Pangong Tso Lake and had accretion of forces at Depsang Plain as well as Charding Nala Junction in Demchok. Even after four years, the disengagement has not been complete, what to talk of relocation or de-escalation.

Even now, the Chinese have packed up nearly 50,000 troops along with rocket systems, missiles and fighters on a standby in the hinterland in Tibet. Even on February 19, both the Indian and Chinese sides couldn't get past each other. The Chinese used the transgressions in East Ladakh to pressurise the Narendra Modi government.

China wary of India's ties with West?

It is a million dollar question of which one can only speculate the answers. It is quite evident that the Chinese will use the non-resolution of Line of Actual Control (LAC) to pressurise India not to go to the West. It is a clear cut pressure point that the Chinese are using the QUAD to translate into an alliance much bigger than a talk shop.

The Chinese also want to use this to ensure that the Indian borders never remain stable and India is always on the tenterhooks due to its huge army, latest advanced weapon systems and numerically high presence in eastern Ladakh.

This is happening despite the government making it very clear that the normalisation of bilateral ties with China only go through the settlement and de-escalation on the LAC, which is 3,488 kilometres long. Currently, the Chinese PLA is packed up in Ladakh, the eastern sector along Arunachal Pradesh and across Sikkim.

Even before Xi Jinping became the Chinese president for the third time in October 2022, the Chinese sent six combined armed brigade, virtually a division strength each, along the Arunachal and Sikkim borders. Those combined armed brigades are still there. As of now, the LAC is packed up with Chinese forces, who are doing all kinds of military upgradation all along the LAC.

How India is responding to China?

The Indian side has also responded in a similar fashion. It has ensured that the Chinese challenge does not go without riposte. The problem is, over the past four years, things are not at all moving. The India-China trade is still heavily in favour of China, the trade deficit being more than $100 billion.

The Chinese want to settle the border on their own terms. It means you impose the 1959 line, proposed by then Chinese premier Chou en Lai on East Ladakh and you give up on Arunachal Pradesh or what they call as South Tibet.

Prime Minister Narendra Modi tried to reach out to China in 2018 at Wuhan and in 2019 at Chennai, trying to sort out the border. He tried to sort out with Xi Jinping the resolution of the boundary issue. But the Chinese responded by a transgression in May 2020.

As PM Modi told one of his senior officers, "I wanted to give support of 140 crore Indians to President Xi Jinping but he was more interested in 140 square kilometres of land".

Peace At Border Must For Improvement Of Ties With China: S Jaishankar

02 March 2024, NDTV

China must adhere to border management pacts and there has to be peace and tranquillity along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) for improvement in Sino-India ties, External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar asserted on Saturday amid the lingering military face-off in eastern Ladakh.

In an interactive session at a think-tank, he highlighted how the Modi government has been focusing on boosting the border infrastructure and that there has to be an equilibrium eventually in the relations between India and China.

In an oblique reference to governments in the past, Mr Jaishankar, replying to a broad question on dealing with China, said India did not use international relationships as effectively as it could have in the past.

In this context, Mr Jaishankar identified development of national power as very crucial.

"Powers rise, powers stand their ground, powers build equilibrium; not by fancy statements and clever debates. They have to do hard work of governance, putting the resources, push the system, deliver on the ground, monitor it, supervise it and have relationships which will contribute to it," he said.

The Indian and Chinese troops are locked in an over three-and-half-year confrontation in certain friction points in eastern Ladakh even as the two sides completed disengagement from several areas following extensive diplomatic and military talks.

The external affairs minister underlined the need for India to build deep national strength including in areas of technology and supply chains to effectively face challenges from China.

"It is a combination of all of this but the bottomline is there has to be an equilibrium and there has to be peace and tranquillity in the border areas and there has to be adherence to the agreements which were arrived at," Mr Jaishankar said at the Ananta Aspen Centre.

"Because if you do not adhere to the agreements, tell me how you would have even the basic understanding and going forward, if there isn't peace and tranquillity at the border, how can any society look at other forms of cooperation when the border is disturbed or violent," he said.

"And there has to eventually be an equilibrium, I am convinced it will. I am convinced we have to work hard for that equilibrium," he said.

Mr Jaishankar said the Modi government has significantly enhanced the border infrastructure in the last 10 years.

As a result of a series of military and diplomatic talks, the two sides completed the disengagement process in 2021 on the north and south banks of the Pangong lake and in the Gogra area.

Is turbulent the new normal in Sino-Indian relations?

02 March 2024, Observer Research Foundation

On India's part, it has stood up to the China challenge on several fronts.

At the 2024 iteration of Raisina Dialogue, Asia's premier conference on geopolitics, China featured prominently in the discussions, given that there has been a tense standoff at the border between the Indian and Chinese armies for nearly four years. The clashes between the two armies in Galwan in 2020, which resulted in fatalities of on both sides, is an important turning point in the relations between the two Asian powers. Foreign minister S Jaishankar deconstructed China's approach in dealing with India. He said that while China tried to change the status quo at the border in the process violating the agreements to which it is a signatory, it was trying to stymie India's bid to get a permanent seat in the UN Security Council. The minister alluded to China deploying mind games to resolve border issues with India, but that the breakthrough would come about only if other powers were kept at bay. Underlining India's response to these developments, Jaishankar stated that India would not let a competitor curtail its policy choices, and that his government would look to make use of the international system for the best outcome.

The reason for such a pessimistic assessment of the ties between the two nations is that the clashes in Galwan have been followed by China trying to change the status quo on the ground at different points along the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

The Indian government has termed relations between the two nations as "abnormal" and also pinned the breakdown of trust between the two nations on China's aggressive action at the border. The reason for such a pessimistic assessment of the ties between the two nations is that the clashes in Galwan have been followed by China trying to change the status quo on the ground at different points along the Line of Actual Control (LAC). In addition to the military coercion, China has resorted to mind games, which Jaishankar alluded to. China unilaterally renamed towns in Arunachal Pradesh, to which it lays claims. It also publicised a map recently showing large parts of Indian territory as part of China. The cartographic onslaught is also backed by a massive build-up of People's Liberation Army (PLA) soldiers along the border, and China creating enormous infrastructure—both civilian and military—to improve the staying power of its military. Twenty-one rounds of talks between the two militaries that have been conducted has led to resolution at some friction points, but overall troop deployment remains a cause for concern.

On India's part, it has stood up to the China challenge on several fronts. First, it has matched China's troop deployment at the border, there has also been a fillip to the development of infrastructure facilities at the border. Second, India has taken the lead in banning cellphone apps on national security grounds, and there has been curbs on infusion of Chinese capital and investment into India.

The government's approach has received public approbation. ORF's Foreign Policy survey 2023 found out that an overwhelming 83% of the respondents interviewed in urban India gave a thumbs-up to India's foreign policy. There is little constituency for peace with China since nearly 80% of those surveyed cite China's aggression at the border being responsible for the trust deficit. More so, because many of these respondents see India's seat at the UN Security Council (that China has sought to block) as a key priority. On the bright side, more than three-fourths of the respondents see India's G20 Presidency and the Quad as appropriate fora to pursue India's interests, with the same number putting great store in Australia, Japan, and the US (Quad members) as leading partners in the near future.

Leveraging the international system

Thus, faced with the China challenge, India has crafted a foreign policy that seeks greater engagement with the world. A case in point is India's G20 presidency under which more than 100 countries were invited to a 'Voice of Global South' summit, taking up issues of food and energy security, fast-tracking reforms of global financial to seek better representation to developing nations. The other central piece of this proactive foreign policy was India's increasing engagement with the Quad, which Jaishankar described as India's riposte to those who seek to veto her policy choices. Speaking at the Quad Think Tank Forum on Feb 24, the minister highlighted nascent capacity-building initiatives that were helping policy-makers in the Indo-Pacific region better evaluate infrastructure projects on viability and sustainability criterion. Such efforts underscore Quad's commitment to the region reeling from the impact of China's debt-trap diplomacy in the wake of the Belt and Road Initiative.

The other central piece of this proactive foreign policy was India's increasing engagement with the Quad, which Jaishankar described as India's riposte to those who seek to veto her policy choices.

At the same time, China's belligerence through different means continues unabated. An important aspect of China's aggression and expansionism has been the deployment of grey-zone warfare, in which a nation uses strategies to pursue its aims, but that may not invoke a strong military response from the other side. For example, China has built 'xiaokang' villages near the Indian border in a bid to bolster its territorial claims, and now there are reports that these are being populated with settlers.

During the Raisina conclave, India's Chief of Defence Staff Anil Chauhan drew attention to China's use of such strategies to hobble rivals. If the 2010s put strains on India-China ties due to land-based incursions, then the coming decades may see increased strife in the maritime and cyberspace spheres as well.

While China considers the South China Sea as its lake, it has stated that the Indian Ocean is not India's ocean. There have been reports of Chinese research vessels trawling the Indian ocean to collate and build a repository of data, which may give its submarines an edge in navigating in this region.

The Indian establishment will also have to be alert to increased efforts by Chinese state and non-state actors who will try to infiltrate the cybersecurity domain to steal data that may have national security ramifications. It's a turbulent road ahead for Sino-Indian ties.

Money, power and the peril of courting Chinese nationalism

02 March 2024, Aljazeera

In January, a Chinese ultranationalist vlogger – video blogger – came across red circular stickers on the glass doors of a shopping mall in Nanjing featuring the words: "Happy 2024."

The vlogger claimed that what appeared to be innocent New Year decorations were, in fact, nationalistic Japanese motifs since the red circles resembled the rising red sun in Japan's national flag. "This is Nanjing, not Tokyo! Why are you putting up junk like this?" he snarled at a manager at the mall. Local police subsequently got involved and ordered staff at the mall to take down the decorations and gave the mall's management an official warning. "It is the most ridiculous thing I have ever heard," 33-year-old noodle shop owner Alice Lu from Shanghai told Al Jazeera.

"If red circles are not allowed then there is no end to the things that must be removed," Lu said.

Following the standard set by the local police in Nanjing, users on Chinese social media were quick to highlight the absurdity of all the red circular objects that would need to be banned, including the logo of China's telecommunications giant Huawei, posters of China's first Communist leader, Mao Zedong, featuring a rising sun in the background, and even traffic lights.

The fiasco drew in China's state-run CCTV which chastised the vlogger in an article on its Weibo account, calling his actions "detrimental to individuals, companies and society as a whole".

Shaoyu Yuan, a scholar of Chinese studies at Rutgers University in the United States, said CCTV's comments demonstrated an attempt by the Chinese government to maintain state control over the narrative surrounding nationalism.

"They want to ensure that nationalism serves as a unifying force rather than being misused," Yuan told Al Jazeera.

Steering patriotism

Under the rule of Chinese President Xi Jinping, fervent patriotic sentiment has been encouraged among the public for years.

Xi said in June that "love of our country, the feeling of devotion and sense of attachment to our motherland is a duty and responsibility of every Chinese", and that "the essence of patriotism is loving the country, the Party and socialism all at the same time".

The importance of state-defined patriotism was highlighted at the beginning of January when a new "patriotic education law" came into effect in China with the stated aim of instilling "love of the country and the ruling Chinese Communist Party (CCP)".

During Xi's presidency, that patriotic fervour has been projected outward from China by its "wolf warrior" diplomats, including former foreign ministry spokesperson Zhao Lijian who famously floated the idea that the US military was responsible for the COVID-19 coronavirus outbreak in Wuhan.

Zhao also posted a fabricated image depicting an Australian soldier holding a bloody knife to the throat of an Afghan child in 2020, at a time when relations between Australia and China were in free fall.

While the CCP promotes its own version of patriotism, it also moderates nationalistic output at times, too.

Incessant bashing of the US online is a common pastime among active Chinese nationalists. But leading up to a highly anticipated summit between President Xi and US President Joe Biden in November, China's media and nationalist commentators suddenly dialled down their anti-US rhetoric.

Beijing adjusts the volume on nationalistic rhetoric to serve its interests, according to Yuan, engaging in a balancing act of patriotic sentiment when necessary.

"While nationalism is encouraged as a means of fostering a strong national identity and loyalty, its excesses can lead to extremism and undermine international diplomacy, social harmony and public order," Yuan said.

Nationalism turns violent

Lu from Shanghai said the Nanjing incident was an example of how the promotion of intense patriotic feelings in China has led to a toxic environment – particularly when it comes to Japan-related topics.

"It is a bit scary actually how anti-Japanese feelings can make some people react in China," she said.

Chinese modern nationalism directed at Japan is deeply influenced by historical conflicts, most notably the events of the Second Sino-Japanese War during World War II, Yuan said.

"These have left a lasting imprint on the Chinese collective memory, fuelling sentiments of resentment and vigilance towards Japan," he said.

Anti-Japanese sentiment was on display in 2022 when a known cosplayer was approached by police in Suzhou, a city not far from Shanghai, as she was taking pictures of herself on the street wearing a Japanese kimono. Before being taken away, a police officer was recorded shouting at the woman: "If you came here wearing hanfu (traditional Chinese clothing), I wouldn't say this, but you are wearing a kimono as a Chinese. You are Chinese!"

A few days after the arrest, CCTV launched a social media topic promoting the wearing of hanfu-style clothing.

The Suzhou incident pales in comparison, however, to August 2012 when a dispute in the East China Sea over control of the Senkaku/Diaoyu Islands, which are administered by Tokyo but claimed by Beijing, led to large anti-Japanese protests across urban China.

While protests are often swiftly broken up by the Chinese authorities, the anti-Japanese demonstrations in several cities saw no interference, and from there they turned increasingly violent.

In the central Chinese city of Xi'an, a Chinese man in a Japanese car was pulled out of his vehicle and severely beaten, sustaining life-changing injuries.

The government-controlled People's Daily subsequently said in an editorial that it did not condone the violence, but attempted to explain it as a sign of Chinese people's patriotism.

By the time police intervened and restored order at the end of September, Japanese shops, companies and restaurants had been vandalised and China-Japan relations were bruised.

Sales representative Simon Wan, 36, remembers the demonstrations in Beijing devolving into riots at that time.

"From our apartment window, we saw people smash my father's Toyota (a Japanese car brand) which was parked on the street below," he told Al Jazeera.

"My family and me stayed indoors most of the time those days to avoid trouble. It was quite frightening."

Wan believes that the government does not want to see a repeat of the anti-Japan riots in 2012.

"So, I think they reacted to the nationalistic vlogger in Nanjing because they wanted to avoid any kind of escalation," he said.

When ultranationalist fervour leads to property damage or becomes counterproductive to China's diplomatic goals, it goes too far, according to Yuan, at which point the Chinese authorities will seek to contain it – as in Nanjing.

Making patriotism pay

The vlogger in Nanjing was not just chastised for being too nationalistic, however. He was pilloried for using patriotism to turn a profit from his video blogs.

"Patriotism is not a business," CCTV stated in its rebuke of the vlogger.

But, patriotism can in fact be a lucrative business for many nationalistic bloggers and vloggers on Chinese social media.

According to Yuan, there are many ways to monetise patriotism for people such as Hu Xijin, a public figure and commentator who has leveraged his nationalistic stance to amass significant followings on social media.

"This business aspect of patriotism involves not only direct profits from social media platforms through advertisements and sponsored content but also endorsements and partnerships with brands that wish to align themselves with patriotic sentiments," he said.

Chinese social media accounts with more than a million followers can earn their owners a few hundred thousand dollars a year, while nationalistic commentators such as Hu Xijin have tens of millions of followers. But as the vlogger in Nanjing discovered, the attention garnered by nationalistic tropes does not guarantee fame and fortune, and can instead lead to infamy and misfortune.

In 2022, blogger Sima Nan had his social media accounts across Chinese platforms blocked after he engaged in a war of words with China's tech firm Lenovo during which time it was revealed that he was a homeowner in the US state of California, despite his overt anti-Americanism.

Another nationalist, Kong Qingdong, was banned from Weibo in 2022 for undisclosed reasons. Kong was also temporarily banned in 2012 after he had sparked a public outcry when he referred to Hongkongers as "dogs" and other slurs.

"Navigating the waters of nationalistic content creation in China can be as perilous as it is profitable," Yuan said.

"While the Chinese government often supports and promotes nationalistic sentiment that aligns with its policies and image, there are red lines that cannot be crossed, and content creators who venture too far, misinterpret the government's stance or criticise its policies – even under the guise of nationalism – can find themselves facing swift repercussions," he said.

Adding to the peril, China's red lines are fluid and can quickly change depending on the situation.

The sudden shift in nationalistic rhetoric leading up to the Biden-Xi summit in November is an example of such a rapid change.

"A nationalistic stance that aligns with the government's current diplomatic posture might be encouraged at one time but could become problematic if diplomatic priorities shift and the stance is no longer deemed appropriate," Yuan explained.

Such fluidity is an element of the CCP's balancing act regarding nationalism.

"It (the CCP) aims to promote a strong sense of national identity and pride among its citizens while avoiding the pitfalls of hypernationalism that could lead to xenophobia, regional tensions, or internal dissent," Yuan added.

"Additionally, the Chinese government has always sought to prevent any single voice or group from becoming so influential in nationalist discourse that it could challenge the authority of the Communist Party or create factions within society."

Looking back on his experience during the anti-Japan riots in 2012, Wan, the sales rep from Beijing, said he worried that the government's promotion of patriotism and tolerance towards nationalism would endanger Chinese society in the long run.

"I think President Xi told American President Biden a few years ago that those who play with fire will get burned," he said.

"I think that is also the case for anyone in China that plays too much with the flames of nationalism."

China bolsters military recruitment aimed at sharpening its military power: A warning for its neighbours

01 March 2024, Times of India

China has been intensifying its military recruitment efforts to strengthen and modernize its armed forces under Xi's leadership, with a significant boost in the past year. The PRC is recruiting not only its former officers but also highly skilled foreign veterans and technically qualified students. Alongside, State-owned Enterprises (SOE) and private companies are raising their volunteer armies.

Several steps have been taken since last year. First, the PLA's newly amended recruitment guidelines, which took effect on May 1, 2023, stated that conscription would be focused on preparations for war, and priority would be on recruiting highly skilled personnel, including retired personnel. It also included scope for wider mobilisation of the population in the event of war, including the recruitment of women to active service, as well as previously demobilised soldiers, who may return to their old posts and rank "if they meet the requirements." This regulation, which has 74 articles in 11 chapters, focuses on recruiting more "high-calibre soldiers, standardising and optimising conscription procedures, and improving the system's efficiency." The State Council and the Central Military Commission have been given powers to adjust the methods and requirements of recruitment to enlist citizens to active service.

Second, China revised the retirement age for top reservist commanders, raising it from 55 to 60 to retain skilled professionals longer.

Third, the regulations prioritise university graduates with special skills or knowledge, particularly in science and engineering, for induction into combat forces.

Fourth, China is using foreign highly skilled veterans for training its trainers. In September 2023, Air Force Chief of Staff Gen. Charles Brown warned airmen and allies that China's PLA "wants to exploit your knowledge and skill to fill gaps in their military capability." He further stated that "foreign companies are targeting and recruiting US and NATO-trained military talent." China's recruiting efforts include contracts that seem "too good to be true," or that are scant on details about the customer. According to US officials, these job offers come from a mix of privately owned companies backed by China and those directly contracted by the Chinese government. Targets include pilots, maintainers, air operations centre personnel, and a variety of other technical experts from across multiple occupations who could provide insight into US and NATO air tactics, techniques, and procedures. China is also using US veterans to train air force officers in third countries. In June 2023 the Department of Commerce placed the Test Flying Academy of South Africa on an export control list because it was facilitating training and technical support to the PLA using a former US military member.

Fifth, China has directed the State-owned and private companies to set up their volunteer armies. Since last year, at least 16 major Chinese firms, including a privately-owned dairy giant (Yili group), have established fighting forces. These units, known as the People's Armed Forces Departments, are composed of civilians who retain their regular jobs. They act as a reserve and auxiliary force for China's military. Yili's private army unit is under the management of the PLA garrison in Inner Mongolia and the Communist Party committee of the regional government, indicating the linkages between private armies with the PLA. These armies are to be deployed within the country. However, the Chinese definition of its area includes the disputed regions in its periphery, and therefore the possibility of their deployment there cannot be ruled out. These can be used to maintain social disorders within the country. China faces problems in Tibet, Xinjiang, and Hongkong as well as labour protests. The number of labour strikes and demonstrations surged to 1,794 in 2023, more than doubling from 2022, when only 830 cases were recorded. China is crushing the dissidence with a strong hand. Crucially, as these units work under the PLA, they can help the Communist Party more effectively quell incidents of social unrest.

How China views these private armies is significant. Wu Qian, a Chinese defence ministry spokesperson, stated that the aim to raise PAFDs was part of China's whole-nation approach to national defence and that the militias are available for everything from a large-scale mobilisation to the response to a natural disaster.

Overall, China's recruitment efforts could significantly bolster its military strength. There are more than 2 million active personnel. The People's Armed Police (1 million) adds to China's current standing army, while there are some 8 million professional reserves under the age of 45 who have already served. Experts suggest that with a potential reservoir of 10 million students and regional reserves, national mobilization could produce an army of around 30 million in varying states of training and readiness. Even if this figure is exaggerated, the realistic figure could be around 10 million personnel including technical men.

This large force could impact China's approach to regional disputes, potentially leading to increased assertiveness and use of force, as seen in its actions in areas like Taiwan, the South China Sea, and along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) with India. It has scant regard for international law and it uses manufactured historical facts to pursue expansionism. While internal problems can be dealt with by the private armies, the regular forces can be deployed in the disputed areas. China's aggressiveness is seen as a new normal. Xi has often stated that the use of force against Taiwan cannot be ruled out. However, this high number of troops is not required for Taiwan, hence they could have different objectives. Chinese militias are already being used in artificial islands, turning them into its forward military bases. Along the LAC, China has created villages where trained personnel can be housed and used for encroachment into the Indian side. Besides, China can use technical units for more aggressive influence operations aimed at weaponising the public mind. India and other neighbours having territorial disputes with China should take precautionary counter-measures.

Make in India can dial up Chinese characteristics

01 March 2024, Reuters

India's ambition to become a factory to the world can use a helping hand from China. The South Asian country wants to triple electronics exports to $300 billion, opens new tab in about three years, but its firms lack the expertise to manufacture parts like display screens and camera modules - areas dominated by suppliers from the People's Republic. Convincing them to set up factories in India will be tricky, but not impossible.

India has had a decent start so far. It became a net exporter of mobile phones in 2020 after introducing hefty import taxes, which forced handset makers including China's Xiaomi (1810.HK), opens new tab to move production to the country. As a result, and following a long push to force companies to Make-in-India, local value addition, or the share of locally-sourced components, jumped, opens new tab to 17% from just 6% between 2016 and 2018, according Counterpoint research. Taiwanese firms Foxconn (2317.TW), opens new tab and Pegatron (4938.TW), opens new tab are also assembling iPhones in the country; JPMorgan analysts reckon India might produce one in four iPhones by 2025.

Most of that, however, is in low-value manufacturing like smartphone assembly and producing batteries and chargers. To compare, Vietnam's local value addition is 24%, largely thanks to investments from the $28 billion Shenzhen-listed Luxshare Precision Industry (002475.SZ), opens new tab and Beijing-based BOE Technology (000725.SZ), opens new tab, a top maker of TV and smartphone screens.

Wooing those firms has been a thorny issue for India because of strained political relations with its neighbour. More than a dozen Chinese suppliers including Luxshare received initial approvals to set up, opens new tab local factories over a year ago, according to Bloomberg. But progress appears to have stalled.

New Delhi is now mulling removing barriers to Chinese investments, provided the two countries' shared border remains peaceful. It also recently cut import duties on some smartphone components, though they are still much higher than in Mexico and Southeast Asia. India's deputy IT minister Rajeev Chandrasekhar recently warned in a government document seen by Reuters that the country must "act fast" to lure global companies with lower tariffs, or risk losing out to Southeast Asia and elsewhere.

In exchange for investment and expertise, Chinese firms would have better access to a thriving smartphone market. That is expected to triple to $90 billion by 2032, according to Morgan Stanley. Foreign brands operating retail stores in the country, like Apple (AAPL.O), opens new tab, have to source at least 30% of the product's value locally.

India' economy is growing fast and consistently beating market expectations; GDP expanded 8.4% in the December quarter from a year earlier, official data released on Thursday showed. Foreign direct investment is lagging, however. That could hobble the dream to create jobs through manufacturing. India has had good reason to hold back the red carpet treatment on investments for a country nibbling at its border but Make in India can use some Chinese characteristics.

India risks losing out to China and Vietnam as it seeks to become a major smartphone export hub and must "act fast" to lure global companies with lower tariffs, deputy IT minister Rajeev Chandrasekhar said in government documents seen by Reuters, the news agency reported on Feb. 13.

"India has high production cost due to highest tariffs amongst key manufacturing destinations," wrote Chandrasekhar in the documents. A Jan. 3 letter and a confidential presentation drafted by Chandrasekhar was sent to the Finance Minister, Reuters added.

"The geopolitical realignment is forcing supply chains to shift out of China ... We must act now, or they will shift to Vietnam, Mexico and Thailand."

February

China says Hong Kong's 'one country, two systems' is permanent

28 February 2024, The Japan Times

Beijing's point person to Hong Kong said the city's special governing formula will remain a "permanent structure," the South China Morning Post reported, as the Chinese official sought to boost confidence in the Asian finance hub.

Xia Baolong, who leads the Hong Kong and Macau Affairs Office, on Monday said the "one country, two systems" principle helps set Hong Kong apart from mainland Chinese cities, the Post said. The newspaper cited an unidentified attendee of a meeting between the Chinese official and about 40 local and foreign business chambers.

Hong Kong is guaranteed a high degree of autonomy until at least 2047 under a political arrangement enshrined in the city's constitution, but Beijing's political crackdown has eroded rights once seen as fundamental to its success. Prominent observers including former Morgan Stanley Asia chair Stephen Roach have called on Beijing to commit to the model to revive growth in the city.

Xia has embarked on a weeklong inspection trip in Hong Kong as the city is pushing to enact a domestic security law. The proposal has raised concern among the finance community about potential chilling effect on open discussion of economic and policy issues.

In his meeting with business representatives, Xia highlighted the city's judicial system, stock market, large presence of international banks and proficiency in English among its distinct advantages, the official was reported as saying, citing an attendee.

His reported remarks add to Chinese top leaders' previous vow to maintain Hong Kong's semiautonomous status. President Xi Jinping said in July 2022 of the "one country, two systems" policy: "There is no reason for us to change such a good policy, and we must adhere to it in the long run."

Chamber representatives discussed topics including Hong Kong's integration with mainland China and the proposed security bill known as Article 23 during their 90 minute meeting with Xia, the city's Chief Executive John Lee told reporters Monday.

Xia's trip comes at a crucial time for Hong Kong's political and economic future. The city briefly lost its place to India as the world's fourth-largest stock market earlier this year as global capital poured out of China.

In 2020, Beijing tightened its grip over Hong Kong by imposing a broad national security law, a move that followed historic and sometimes violent protests in the former British colony. The crackdown on civil liberties, coupled with strict Covid curbs, has prompted thousands of residents to leave Hong Kong in recent years, leading to a talent drain on the financial sector that's a linchpin of the city.

Lee last month unveiled a broad plan to pass the city's own security legislation, which offers vague definitions of issues like state secrets and espionage. The one-month consultation period on the Article 23 bill ends Wednesday, when the city is also set to unveil its annual budget.

"They basically said that they understood the reason for it, and they supported it, because in their country, they have similar laws, and they don't have any effect on their consideration and confidence in Hong Kong," Lee said of foreign chambers' comments on Article 23 during the media session. "In fact, a few even said that, with the stability ensured, then there is a good foundation for development."

Expanding Forced Labor in Xinjiang: New Report Exposes CCP's Growing Atrocities Against Uyghurs

27 February 2024, BNN

Unveil the escalating forced labor practices against Uyghurs in Xinjiang, marking a grim advancement in the Chinese Communist Party's human rights violations. Explore the transition from re-education camps to the 'Poverty Alleviation Through Labor Transfer' program, and the international response to combat these harrowing discoveries.

A recent investigation by Adrian Zenz for The Jamestown Foundation unveils the escalating forced labor practices against Uyghurs in Xinjiang, marking a grim advancement in the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) human rights violations. This intensification is part of a systematic attempt to control, assimilate, and erase Uyghur culture through what is now the largest state-imposed forced labor system in the world.

From Re-Education to Forced Labor

The transition from notorious re-education camps to the 'Poverty Alleviation Through Labor Transfer' program represents a strategic shift by the CCP to make forced labor operations less detectable while extending their impact. Adrian Zenz's rigorous analysis indicates a sinister plan to transfer a significantly higher number of Uyghur workers to other provinces in 2023, under the guise of economic development and poverty reduction. This move not only intends to dilute the Uyghur presence in Xinjiang but also subjects them to severe exploitation and cultural erasure.

International Response and Legislative Actions

In response to these harrowing discoveries, the United States has taken a firm stance through legislative measures, notably the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act, aiming to block imports of goods produced with forced labor in Xinjiang. Furthermore, the recent passage of the Uyghur Policy Act by the House of Representatives underscores a growing international commitment to combatting the CCP's human rights abuses, providing a glimmer of hope for Uyghur activists seeking justice and the cessation of forced labor practices.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

Looking Forward: Implications and Challenges

The revelations brought to light by Zenz's research pose significant challenges for global trade relations and the ethical responsibilities of multinational corporations. The persistent efforts by the CCP to obscure the true nature and scale of forced labor in Xinjiang necessitate vigilant and coordinated international action. As the world grapples with these findings, the fate of the Uyghur community hangs in the balance, prompting a crucial reflection on the moral imperatives that govern global economic and political engagements.

As the international community continues to digest the implications of these findings, the spotlight on Xinjiang's forced labor camps serves as a stark reminder of the ongoing human rights crisis. The pursuit of justice for the Uyghurs remains a critical test of the world's commitment to human dignity and freedom.

Leadership Psychology of China's Xi Jinping

26 February 2024, The Diplomat

The Diplomat author Mercy Kuo regularly engages subject-matter experts, policy practitioners, and strategic thinkers across the globe for their diverse insights into U.S. Asia policy. This conversation with Dr. Kenneth Dekleva – professor of Psychiatry and director of Psychiatry-Medicine Integration at UT Southwestern Medical Center, Dallas, Texas; senior fellow at the George H.W. Bush Foundation for US-China Relations; and previously regional medical officer/psychiatrist with the U.S. Dept. of State from 2002-2016 – is the 403rd in "The Trans-Pacific View Insight Series." The views expressed in this interview are entirely his own and do not represent the views of the U.S. government, the U.S. Department of State, or UT Southwestern Medical Center.

Compare and contrast Xi Jinping's past and present leadership psychology.

Xi Jinping has been president of China for over a decade, and as one of the most powerful leaders in the world today, his decisions have profound consequences for economic security, stability, and world peace. An understanding of Xi's leadership psychology is critical in understanding his response to crises, his negotiating style, and how he can be expected to meet China's economic and political challenges over the next decade.

Xi is rational, ruthless, and resilient. He is a formidable adversary and is often underestimated, including by various components of the U.S. intelligence community, who have in his case often confused status and ideological biases with ability. His successes embody his ability to wed his remarkable personal narrative with that of aspirational objectives for China, such as the Chinese Dream of Great Rejuvenation, drawing upon a combination of Chinese nationalist and Chinese Communist Party (CCP) themes.

Diplomats, business leaders, and dignitaries who have met with Xi have described him as polite, restrained, and a good listener. The comments of giants such as the late Singaporean Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew and the late U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger are instructive. Lee, who had met every previous Chinese leader, including Mao, stated, "I would put him in Nelson Mandela's class of persons. A person with enormous emotional stability who does not allow his personal misfortunes to affect his judgment. In other words, he is impressive." In July 2011, Kissinger described Xi as "more assertive, there is a significant presence when he enters a room. His generation has been steeled by suffering."

Identify Xi's decision-making blind spots.

Xi is a true believer, believing in the CCP's primacy, and in China's potential for greatness and rejuvenation. Xi has repeatedly stated that "the East is rising, and the West is in decline." Xi's exceptionalism, while linked to his personal and political self-confidence, represents a potential blind spot.

Having visited America on numerous occasions since 1985, Xi has to appreciate America's exceptionalism and greatness. But Xi likely misses America's resilience, a different part of its exceptionalism. It's an easy mistake, when America remains politically, socially, and economically divided, inward-facing, and weary after two decades of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Had Xi visited America in 1979, he would have seen a country equally beset by – in President Carter's words – "malaise," stagflation, and political/military decline. But the election of President Reagan changed all that. Xi ignores such facts at his peril.

And as Xi ages into a third (and possibly a fourth) five-year term, the risk exists that he will, like many aging, autocratic leaders, exhibit a larger degree of cognitive rigidity in his decision-making.

Xi, beholden to Marxist dialectical reasoning, is seen as rigid and ideological – an easy bias to see. But doing so misses Xi's pragmatism. Xi's shift in course after COVID lockdowns and his recent appeals to the private sector, as China struggles with rising youth unemployment, high levels of debt, and sluggish growth, highlight his flexibility. Diplomatically, Xi has recently shifted his language, course, and tone in reducing tensions with America, where relations had fallen to new lows. This was dramatically seen in his November 2023 speech – which received a standing ovation – to hundreds of American business executives in San Francisco.

In uncertain areas such as economic slowdowns, response to COVID, foreign relations, trade, crises (e.g., the spy balloon incident of 2023), and China's role in diplomacy involving Russia, North Korea, Ukraine, Iran, Saudi Arabia, and Israel, Xi has navigated more cautiously, even patiently, while shifting tactics to align his and China's national interests within the ancient Chinese paradigm of shi, outlined by Professor David Shin as "the alignment of forces, the propensity of things, or the potential born of disposition."

Examine Xi Jinping's leadership interactions and dynamics with global leaders.

Xi has met with Russia's President Putin 42 times since coming to power in 2012. Xi has spoken of their closeness, referring to him as a "dear friend," and highlighting their "deepening trust" and a "deep friendship." During the 2022 Beijing Winter Olympics, both leaders cited their "no limits friendship." Many external observers have read more deeply into this friendship than it warrants. I'd suggest that it's more uneven and unequal, where Xi (and China) is the stronger of the two partners.

Xi's relationship with North Korea's Chairman Kim Jong Un is also intriguing. While China and North Korea have been – in the words of Mao – "as close as lips and teeth" – this has not always been the case since Xi came to power. He and Kim only first met during 2018 and 2019, before and after Kim's historic Singapore summit with President Trump. Both visuals and readouts of their meetings hinted at a growing closeness, but for both, a pragmatic one, as China needs a politically stable North Korea as a strategic buffer vis-à-vis South Korea, and North Korea is deeply reliant on China economically.

Xi's self-confidence comes across most notably in his interactions with many other foreign leaders, choosing when to meet, whom to meet, and how to meet with them, in the service of his and China's national interests. This has emerged in his interactions with leaders at the 2022 SCO Summit, the 2022 BRICS Summit, and his recent meetings with European Commission President Ursula von der Leyen, European Council President Charles Michel, Germany's Olaf Scholz, France's Emmanuel Macron, and numerous American business and political dignitaries, including the late Henry Kissinger, Bill Gates, Elon Musk, Secretary of the Treasury Janet Yellen, Secretary of Commerce Gina Raimondo, Governor of California Gavin Newsom, and Secretary of State Antony Blinken.

Analyze Xi Jinping's calculus toward China's approach to Taiwan.

Will Xi invade Taiwan? Xi has repeatedly stated that reunification will occur, peacefully or otherwise, and yet he – not a disruptor per se – is unlikely to make an impulsive or irrational decision to invade Taiwan. If a red line were crossed, and Taiwan declared independence, Xi could be forced to act militarily, as well as diplomatically, economically, and politically.

A possible scenario involves China further isolating Taiwan, using a whole gamut of government approaches, including air defense patrols, naval blockades, espionage, China Coast Guard patrols, cyberattacks, political/economic pressure, diplomatic pressure, and legal measures. Russia's war setbacks in Ukraine may have chastened Xi, but Ukraine's failed counteroffensive and loss of fiscal year 2024 U.S. congressional funding due to U.S. domestic political changes may further embolden Xi.

Assess how Xi's leadership style could define China's future direction.

Xi remains a confident, powerful leader, who has achieved immense successes, including continuing to lift hundreds of millions of Chinese out of poverty, a significant achievement and component of Xi's Dream of Chinese Great Rejuvenation. During his February 2023 visit to Moscow, in parting with President Putin, Xi stated that global power dynamics are shifting, in an evolving multipolar world, and that "together we should push forward changes that have not happened for 100 years." Xi's response to such challenges will define both his and China's legacy during the 21st century.

Understanding Xi's leadership style, political psychology, and governance outcomes is critical as a rising China asserts itself in Asia, the Global South, and the Middle East, and increasingly counters America's stature, influence, and global power.

New Report: Uyghur Forced Labor Increased in 2023

26 February 2024, Bitter Winter

Under personal instructions from Xi Jinping, Uyghurs continue to be victims of forced "labor transfers" inside and outside Xinjiang. The aim is not economic only.

"Bitter Winter" is often caught in social media controversies where naïve netizens or, more often, CCP trolls argue that all is well in Xinjiang and that Uyghurs are coercively moved to other provinces for forced labor is something that might have happened in isolated incidents in the past but is no longer happening now.

A new report has now been published, which documents that Uyghur forced labor is increasing rather than decreasing. It will not persuade the trolls but perhaps will raise some doubts in the minds of the naïve fellow travelers.

Researcher extraordinaire Adrian Zenz's new report is about "Forced Labor in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region: Assessing the Continuation of Coercive Labor Transfers in 2023 and Early 2024." Quoting mostly documents from the CCP itself, Zenz reports that in 2023 the authorities set a goal of increasing transfer of Uyghur workers to other provinces by 38%. As it often happens in China if bureaucrats want to avoid the risk of being demoted or worse, the quota was not only achieved but exceeded.

"Labor transfer" is a label covering two different Xinjiang realities. It indicates both the forced transfer of workers from agriculture and other jobs they had freely chosen to mandatory factory work. This includes work at factories by Uyghurs detained in "transformation through education" camps, renamed in official documents "Vocational Skills Education and Training Centers." From there, inmates are bussed to the forced workplaces. The second reality is the "Poverty Alleviation" through "Pairing Assistance" connecting Xinjiang to other regions and provinces where Uyghur workers are transferred.

Concerning the first project, "by the third quarter of 2023, the XUAR had already exceeded its entire 2022 labor transfer volume of 3.03 million person-times. State media announced the transfer of 3.05 million person-times rural surplus laborers between January and September, surpassing the state-mandated quota by 10.9 percent." Let me repeat that all these data come from official CCP sources.

As for the second project, Xi Jinping in person when he came to Xinjiang in August 2023 told local CCP cadres that "the Pairing Assistance program that links eastern Chinese provinces with ethnic regions in Xinjiang for cross-provincial labor transfers needed to be strengthened." One strategy used for this is that "land use rights, covering up to 90 percent of land in some areas, are being transferred away from local farmers to state-run cooperatives, forcing the local population into wage labor through coercive labor transfers."

Forced labor transfer to other provinces does not serve the purpose of boosting the latter's economy with slave labor only. In the South of the region, "labor transfers are part of state efforts to 'optimize' (i.e. reduce) the Uyghur population ratio in southern Xinjiang, in order to 'end the dominance of the Uyghur ethnic group' in their own homeland." These policies, the report says, "continued through early 2024,” and there are plans to increase the quotas this year and in 2025.

“In short, coercive labor mobilization continues unabated.” “Uyghur forced labor is becoming both more prevalent and more insidious.” What the West can do is ask its own companies, guided by the recent Volkswagen scandals, not to employ Uyghur slave labors, and sanction those that do.

Red China Isn't 'Back' Under Xi Jinping. It Never Went Away

26 February 2024, Time

About a year ago, former Prime Minister of Australia and sinologist Kevin Rudd wrote that Red China is “back.” If only Beijing could come to its senses and return to the policy of “Reform and Opening Up” it pursued so successfully for 40 years, he argued. But Rudd, like many others, has based a pious hope on a faulty analysis, one which goes as follows: Deng Xiaoping and his followers abandoned Marxism the moment Mao Zedong died in 1976 to transform an insulated country reeling from the chaos of the Cultural Revolution into the world's second-largest economy.

The key term is obviously “reform.” For decades, a motley crew of foreign politicians, entrepreneurs, and experts have told us that “Reform and Opening Up” meant a move from the planned economy to a capitalist one. And in the wake of economic reform, they have assured us that political reform would inevitably follow, turning China into a responsible stakeholder if not a thriving democracy. There were major economic reforms but the political shift never happened. None of these fortune-tellers had bothered to genuinely read the country's constitution, listen to its leaders, or understand its past.

One common view is that since every one of China's leaders after Mao was a victim of the Cultural Revolution (Deng was purged three times; Xi Jinping was sent into exile in the countryside at the age of 15), they understood all too well the danger of power wielded by a capricious hand. But the opposite is true. After Mao launched the Cultural Revolution in the summer of 1966, he first allowed select students called Red Guards, then the population at large, to ferret out and denounce every party member who might have harbored misgivings about his leadership and the revolution at large. “Bombard the Headquarters,” he urged his followers. The result was a social explosion on an unprecedented scale. Party officials recoiled in horror, many of them hauled to denunciation meetings, paraded through the streets, demeaned, tortured, occasionally locked up and the key thrown away. Mao used the people to purge the party of real and suspected enemies, but then in 1968 used the army to purge the people in turn, making sure no one was left standing to challenge him. After his death, the leadership was determined never to allow ordinary people to criticize the party again.

Deng, who had long warned against “bourgeois liberalization,” codified that approach in 1982 with the Four Cardinal Principles in the constitution. These four principles boil down to two core values: keep to the socialist road, and uphold the leadership of the party, or, in two words, Marxism-Leninism. The Four Cardinal Principles have been regularly invoked by every leader to this very day.

Although Deng wanted his country to “Open Up,” by which he meant that foreign capital and technology should be welcomed, he regularly launched campaigns against “spiritual pollution” from abroad. It was not merely an old man railing against long hair, jeans, and pop songs. Like Mao, Deng was all too well aware of the concept of “peaceful evolution,” first formulated in 1957 by John Foster Dulles. The Secretary of State proposed that the U.S. and its allies use peaceful means, including loans, commerce, and the arts, to accelerate the transition toward democracy of countries in the Soviet orbit, thereby shortening the life span of communism. This is precisely what happened in Poland as people voted themselves out of communism on June 4, 1989, the very same day Deng sent 200 tanks and some 100,000 soldiers to grind the democracy movement into the dust at Tiananmen Square.

Even before the Soviet Union disintegrated a few years later, Jiang Zemin, Deng's chosen successor, placed the party on high alert against efforts by the “capitalist camp” to infiltrate and undermine the party through “the plot of peaceful evolution.” The alleged conspiracy remains, to this day, the Chinese regime's greatest fear, feeding paranoia and ill-will in a country that has arguably benefited from more good-will than any other in the world. Everything, from stamping out Mickey Mouse under Jiang and Winnie the Pooh under Xi is seen as a devious plan to bring down the communist party. Every time a Bill Clinton or a George Bush suggested in Beijing that with economic reform, political change was not far on the horizon, they were providing the leadership with all the evidence it needed to confirm their view that sinister foreign powers were trying to overthrow the Chinese government.

Even the economic reforms are overstated. Mao wreaked havoc on the economy with the Cultural Revolution. It had to be rebuilt over decades. But in a one-party state, politics is always in command. The vision pursued by the regime was to invigorate the socialist economy, not to completely abandon it. The radical collectivization of the past was left behind, but the Marxist principle of state ownership over the means of production, including land, capital, labour, energy and raw materials, was largely maintained. When, in 1992, Deng proposed leasing land to attract more foreign investment, he called it "Capitalist Tools in Socialist Hands": why fear the capitalist dollar when the state controlled everything? After 2000, Jiang made sure powerful party committees were set up even in private enterprises, making the distinction between private and public ownership all but meaningless. Control over the means of production is precisely what has allowed China to provide chosen enterprises with endless subsidies and a seemingly inexhaustible line of cheap credit. That has made sure that no country could compete the moment access to the World Trade Organization was granted in 2001.

In 1987, China's then-Premier Zhao Ziyang met the 75-year-old Erich Honecker in Berlin. The party leader of East Germany expressed his earnest concern over the nature of China's "Reform and Opening Up." Zhao explained that the policy was temporary only: in the future, once its living standards had been raised, the population would acknowledge the superiority of socialism, at which point the "scope for liberalization will be reduced further and further." A few months later, at the Party Congress in Beijing, he explained that "we will never copy the separation of powers and the multi-party system of the West." It was an uncanny prediction. East Germany has long since vanished, but Red China never went away.

How does India's military measure up against China and Pakistan?

23 February 2024, FirstPost

Global Firepower in its 2024 index put India's military in fourth place and China's at third on its top ten list. Pakistan, meanwhile, was at number 9. Indian Army chief Manoj Pande has said the army is ready and capable of dealing with 'any situation' along the border

India and China this week held yet another round of high-level military talks over the border row in Eastern Ladakh.

While there was no breakthrough in the 21st round of talks at the Chushul-Moldo border point, both sides did agree to maintain 'peace and tranquillity.'

Meanwhile, defence secretary Giridhar Aramane on Wednesday said India is standing up to a 'bully' in a very "determined fashion."

"India is giving a face off to our neighbour in almost all the fronts we have with them, wherever there is a mountain pass, we are stationed there... and wherever there is a road we have to be there. So that way we are there standing against a bully in a very determined fashion," he said.

Indian Army Chief General Manoj Pande last month called the situation along the LAC in eastern Ladakh is "stable" but "sensitive."

He said Indian troops are maintaining a "very high state" of operational preparedness to effectively deal with any eventualities.

But how strong is the Indian military? How does it measure up against China and its traditional rival Pakistan?

Let's take a closer look:

The Global Firepower Index

The Global Firepower, which rates the world's nations on military strength, in January released its 2024 index.

The company uses over 60 factors including military equipment, financial stability, geographic location and resources to determine a country's 'Power Index' score.

It assigns a value to a country's military firepower.

The firm says that while its perfect score of 0.000 is unattainable, the smaller the value assigned to a country the more powerful is its ability to fight a conventional war.

"Our formula allows for smaller, more technologically-advanced, nations to compete with larger, lesser-developed powers and special modifiers, in the form of bonuses and penalties, are applied to further refine the list which is compiled annually," the firm states on its website.

So how did the India, China and Pakistan fare?

The Global Firepower Ranks Index 2024 put India in fourth place on its top ten list with a value of 0.1023 China, meanwhile, placed one spot ahead of India at rank three with a value of 0.0706.

Pakistan was at number nine at a value of 0.1711.

The top two countries on the list are the United States and Russia with values of 0.0699 and 0.0702 respectively.

Bhutan was dead last with an assigned value of 6.3704.

Manpower

Now, let's examine the armed forces of all three nations – beginning with the manpower

China can call upon 2,035,000 active personnel, while India has 144,55,550 active duty personnel.

Pakistan, meanwhile, has just 600,000 personnel.

China has just 510,000 reserves, while India has 1,155,000 reserves.

Pakistan, interestingly has 550,000 reserves – more than China.

It is important to note that China and India are the top two most populated nations in the world with 1.4 and 1.2 billion people respectively.

Pakistan, by comparison, has around 250 million.

So naturally, China and India have a larger population to draw from.

When it comes to the paramilitary, India is ahead with 2,527,000 troops.

China has just 625,000 paramilitary personnel, while Pakistan has 500,000 paramilitary troops.

India has, of course fought wars, with both China and Pakistan.

The India-China border conflict erupted on 5 May, 2020, following a violent clash in the Pangong lake area.

The ties between the two countries nosedived significantly following the fierce clash in the Galwan Valley in June 2020 that marked the most serious military conflict between the two sides in decades.

But army chief Pande has signalled that India is prepared for anything.

"The army is ready and capable of dealing with any situation along the northern borders (with China). We have taken several concrete measures to develop our capabilities in those areas," Pande said.

Budget

When it comes to the money spent on defence, China is ahead with a budget of $224 billion.

India, meanwhile, has a budget of $73.8 billion.

Of course, even China's declared budget must be taken with a pinch of salt.

The Times of India quoted Centre for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) as reckoning China's military budget was four times more than the figures they gave out in 2002.

The US Department of Defence thinks its real military budget might be around 1.1 to 2 times more than what it gives out in its official reports.

Pakistan, by comparison, has a paltry defence budget of $6.34 billion.

Air Force

When it comes to the air forces of all three nations, it is again China that comes out on top.

Beijing has 3,304 aircraft, while India and Pakistan have 2,296 aircraft and 1,434 aircraft respectively.

It is to be noted that while India is attempting to beef up its air force and phase out aging crafts, deliveries of fighter jets and other equipment takes time.

Tanks

China has 5,000 tanks, while India is not far behind with 4,614 tanks.

Pakistan has only 3,742 tanks.

China has 174,300 armoured vehicles, while India has 1,51,248 armoured vehicles.

Pakistan lags far behind here with just 50,523 armoured vehicles.

China leads the pack when it comes to self-propelled artillery with 3,850 systems.

Pakistan, surprisingly, has 752 such systems while India has just 140 systems.

This is even more surprising given India's history when Bofors guns played a vital role in winning India the Kargil war.

Naval power

When it comes to the naval power, it is China that emerges on top yet again.

While China has 730 vessels in its fleet, India has 294 vessels.

Pakistan has just 114 vessels.

China and India both have two aircraft carriers each – the INS Vikramaditya and INS Vikrant for India – while Pakistan has zero aircraft carriers.

Interestingly, China until recently was considered a 'Green-water Navy' – that is one that had operational capabilities limited to its own region.

However, China has since built the world's largest fleet and has other countries including Australia the United States – which is a 'Blue-water Navy' – worried about Beijing's expansionist ambitions.

CNN quoted FDD senior fellow Craig Singleton as saying, "It's a question of when – not if – China will secure its next overseas military outpost," he said.

This comes in the backdrop of China's continued threats to force a reunification with Taiwan – which Xi Jinping has described as 'inevitable'.

But defence minister Rajnath Singh in February sounded a warning.

Rajnath said that India is maintaining a sustained presence in the strategic waters to ensure safety and security of all cargo vessels and it will not shrink from countering any threat that undermines collective well-being of the region.

"It is our steadfast resolve to be the first responder and the preferred security partner in the Indian Ocean Region, and for the peace, stability and prosperity of the wider Indo-Pacific," he added.

Singh said India will continue to play the role of a 'Vishwa Mitra' (friend of the world) in forging meaningful partnerships with an aim to make the world a truly "connected and equitable habitat".

Claude Arpi | China playing new border games close to Mt Kailash

23 February 2024, Deccan Chronicle

Western Tibet has a rich historical background, particularly in proximity to Mount Kailash, near the trijunction between India, Nepal and Tibet. It is the case of Purang/Taklakot and a place called Toyo, located a few kilometres away, which have gone down in history for the epic battle between the Dogras of Gen. Zorawar Singh and the Tibetans troops. In December 1841, the Dogra troops, who had just conquered Western Tibet (known as Ngari), were defeated by the Tibetans – and also by the winter.

The great Tibetan historian, Tsepon Shakabpa, thus described the battle of Taklakot/Toyo: "The Tibetan government quickly dispatched Ü Dapön [Gen.] Shedra Wangchuk Gyelpo and the Ü Tsang [Central Tibet] militia under the leadership of Cabinet minister Pellhün; when they arrived in Ngari, one regiment of the foreign army [the Dogras] was stationed at Rutok [near Pangong-tso], another was at Trashigang [near Demchok on the Ladakh border], and a third was at Rupshö [in Ladakh]. Secret preparations were made for the Tibetan troops to confront each [Dogra] unit. Zorawar Singh and the most seasoned [Dogra] troops, who were stationed at Taklakhar [Taklakot] Castle [in fact in Toyo] were confronted... In the eleventh month [December 1841], during the coldest weather of the year, the Tibetan troops attacked from all directions simultaneously."

The fate of Zorawar Singh and his troops were sealed, according to Shakabpa: "Three days after the fighting began, heavy snow fell. Thus, the Sikh troops who were at Taklakot became frozen solid. Trembling under their difficulties, the Sikhs were attacked by the Tibetans in terrible hand-to-hand fighting... While Zorawar Singh was riding his horse, rushing back and forth, he was recognized by a Yasor called Mikmar. He threw a spear and Zorawar Singh fell from his horse. Leaping off of his own horse, Mikmar cut Singh's head off and carried it into the middle of the Tibetan camp. This was seen by the Sikh [Dogra] soldiers, and they fled in whatever way they could."

A few months later, Maharaja Gulab Singh smashed the Tibetan forces trying to invade Ladakh. Dapön Zurkhang and Dapön Pelzhi were captured and taken to Leh, where a peace treaty was signed between the Dogras and the Tibetans, confirming once more the traditional border between Ladakh and Tibet. The tomb of Zorawar Singh still exists in Toyo, which has recently come in the news, but for different reasons.

An article in the Chinese media mentions a newly-built village in Toyo: "China continues to promote the improvement of the rural living environment, paying close attention to greening [the area], beautification and [water] purification; the changes in Toyo are a concrete manifestation of the Ngari region's efforts to build a beautiful and livable countryside." During the past three years, in Western Tibet alone, a total of 31 projects have been implemented to build liveable, "industrial" and beautiful villages, a local Communist Party cadre explains; in his jargon that it will be: "in accordance with the principles of beautiful leisure villages, happy and liveable villages, clean and tidy villages." But why a new village in Toyo? Says Newsweek: "China appears to have completed the construction of a new dam in the country's southwestern border regions, a project that could have far-reaching strategic implications for its southern neighbours India and Nepal." Built on the Mapcha Tsangpo (or Peacock river, also known as Ghaghara or Saryu in India and Karnali in Nepal), it is a perennial source of fresh water supply to the downstream populations. What is strange is that the existence of this hydropower plant, located close to the Indian border, has not appeared in any published Chinese plan earlier. Though satellite imagery only shows a medium river-of-the-river dam, without a large reservoir, India downstream should be concerned. But there is more. A new airport is coming up a couple of kilometres north of the hydropower plant and the "model" village. In June 2018, the Civil Aviation Administration of China had announced that Tibet would soon have three new airports. The Chinese-language press had given some information about the location of these three airports: one was to be located in Lhuntse, north of Arunachal Pradesh, the second was north of a border post with Nepal and the last in Purang. Chinese website seetao.com explained: "These three airports can be used for civilian use in peacetime, military aircraft training on the plateau; direct military use in wartime, holding military operations, will be able to play a very important role." Though many in India had forgotten about this announcement, the airport is now functional; on November 10, 2023, videos of the newly-built airfield appeared on the Chinese social media. These three developments (model village, hydropower station and airport) should be seen as one, undoubtedly all are for dual (civil and military) use. A separate occurrence needs to be noticed: the closure of the Kailash Yatra to Indian pilgrims. The 6,638-metre-tall diamond-shaped mountain is considered to be the abode of Lord Shiva and also one of the most sacred places in the Jain, Buddhist and Bon religions. For centuries, pilgrims from India have visited the holy site; since the 1990s, they could cross into Tibet via Lipulekh Pass in Pithoragarh district and later enter Tibet via Nathu-la in Sikkim. After the Doklam incident in 2017, the Indian yatris were not allowed to use these routes anymore. As Beijing ignored Kathmandu's request to permit the aerial sightseeing of Mount Kailash, Nepali tour operators decided to offer the yatris an alternative and a large number of devotees started using the Nepal route from Simikot to Purang by chartered helicopters; unfortunately, the scheme was subsequently closed due to the Covid-19 pandemic. After the scheme reopened for Nepalis in 2022, the Chinese authorities did not allow Indian visitors to fly to Purang, though last year alone, Nepali tour operators received over 50,000 bookings from Indian pilgrims for the sacred pilgrimage. According to the Kathmandu Post, a new alternative has been found: a flight could remain in Nepalese territory and have a "remote" darshan of the sacred mountain: "Shree Airlines operated a first-of-its-kind aerial pilgrimage tour of the holy places, making the pilgrims' dream come true without a Chinese visa" – explained a communiqué last week. It is clear that China does not want Indians to have a real darshan of the holy mountain, or even come close to the place where Zorawar Singh is buried; and these latest developments in the area explain why.

Tibet border closure hits family reunions, local trade

23 February 2024, The Kathmandu Post

According to Chheten Sherpa Lama, Nepali side tried their best to reopen the border, but to no avail. Temba and his wife Paten Sherpa, permanent residents of Olangchungola in ward 7 of Phaktanglung Rural Municipality, live in an animal shed near Sinjema lake. They raise yaks in the highlands and also provide food and accommodation for visitors. They have three children who study in Phungling, the district headquarters of Taplejung, and in Kathmandu.

The Sherpa couple has been tending to animals in the isolated pasture, situated around 47,700 metres above sea level, just a few hours walk from the nearest human settlement. Their shed is close to the Tiptala Bhanjyang, near the Nepal-China border in Taplejung. There is Riu settlement of Dinggye County of Tibet, an autonomous region of China, just across the border. Riu, which is 35 km from the Nepal-China border, is Paten's maternal home. While it takes around five hours on foot to reach the Nepal-China border from Sherpa's shed, by bus it takes one hour. "But I have not been able to visit my maternal home for the past four years. The way to my maternal village is inaccessible as the Nepal-China border remains closed for a long time," complained Paten.

The Chinese government closed Tiptala Bhanjyang border point amid a coronavirus threat in January, 2020. Due to the protracted border closure, hundreds of locals in the northern villages of Taplejung have been unable to meet their relatives in Tibet for four years now.

Bhujung and Bhomo Sherpa of Mauwatar in Olangchungola have a similar ordeal like that of Temba and Paten. Bhomo, who was born in Tibet, married Bhujung of Bhotkhola Rural Municipality in Sankhuwasabha district. The couple later migrated to Mauwatar and began rearing yaks. They are happy with the income they earn from rearing animals, which supports their livelihood and three children's education. However, Bhomo has one complaint—the border has become a barrier preventing her from meeting her parents in Tibet.

Temba and Bhujung would frequently visit Tibetan markets for trade, transporting various goods on yaks. During their visits, they formed connections with Tibetan girls, whom they eventually brought back as life partners. "We never imagined that the border would close some day leaving us unable to visit our relatives," said Bhujung.

The Chinese authorities installed a telephone repeater tower near the Nepal-China border. But it is not useful for the Nepali side. Nepalis living near the border have to trek down to Olangchungola to make a phone call. Although there is a 2G network of Nepal Telecom in Olangchungola, it does not support online communication platforms like WhatsApp and Viber.

"We have to walk for five to seven hours just to make a phone call to my maternal relatives in Riu. It would take me less time to reach my maternal home than to get to Olangchungola. But the closed border is a barrier in my way," said Paten, who is in her mid-forties.

Tsering Kipa, who has been living in Olangchungola with her husband Dandu Sherpa, is in her early seventies. She has a strong desire to reunite with her maternal family in Tibet. Her husband Dandu also shares her longing and wants to support her. But their wish to visit their relatives in Tibet will remain unfulfilled unless the Chinese authorities reopen the border.

According to Chheten Sherpa Lama, ward chairman of ward 7 of Phaktanglung Rural Municipality, there are at least 18 women in Olangchungola and Yangma settlements who have their maternal homes in Tibet. He said that many Tibetan women married to Nepali men from Ghunsa, Phale, Mikkakhola among other settlements as well.

Chheten claimed Nepali side tried their best to reopen the border, but to no avail. According to him, the chief of Dinggye County telephoned him in September last year and informed that the border would reopen soon. Accordingly, the then chief district officer of Taplejung Goma Devi Chemjong distributed border identity cards to the people living in northern villages bordering Tibet.

"We have discussions with the representatives of the county. They tell us that the border will reopen once they get permission from the centre (Beijing). The government of Nepal should talk to the central government of China," said Chheten.

Trans-border trade and animal husbandry have been hugely affected by the border closure. People living near the Nepal-China border rely on Tibet for their daily essential commodities, as the area has yet to be connected to the national road network. Tibet also serves as a major market for them to sell a variety of products including medicinal herbs and domesticated animals.

Feature story: Is the migration of exile Tibetans to the west a boon or bane?

23 February 2024, Phayul

The Chinese invasion of Tibet in 1959 forced approximately 80,000 Tibetans to seek refuge in India, Nepal, and Bhutan. Decades later, a demographic survey conducted by the Tibetan government in exile known officially as the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) in 2009 reported a Tibetan exile population of 1,28,014; 94,203 in India, 13,514 in Nepal, 1,298 in Bhutan, and 18,999 elsewhere. Over the past decade, this geographic distribution of the Tibetan diaspora has undergone significant changes. In 2020, a study conducted by the 15th Kashag titled "Baseline Study of the Tibetan Diaspora Community Outside South Asia" indicated that approximately half of the Tibetan population now resides outside the traditional exile communities in South East Asia, with 36,098 in North America and 26,379 in Europe, Australasia, and Far East Asia. In the subsequent four years, these numbers are likely to have increased in the population of Tibetans outside South East Asia.

In recent years, a noticeable increase in migration has been observed, especially among youths and middle-aged Tibetans. The primary driver of this trend is financial stability and employment opportunities, compelling many of them to resettle in the West as a significant portion of Tibetan households are engaged in traditional agriculture or seasonal sweater business. With only a small percentage involved in individual businesses or unregistered units, many Tibetan youths migrate in search of better employment opportunities.

The incumbent President Penpa Tsering, during his 2023 speech in Minnesota, openly acknowledged the diminishing presence of youths in Tibetan settlements in India. He stated, "It is the fault of the Tibetan government in exile that we cannot provide the youth jobs that fit their education qualifications in the settlements," attributing the migration to the inability to offer suitable employment. Consequently, the diminishing youth population in settlements has set off a chain reaction, resulting in a decrease in the number of children."

It is worth noting that the CTA has played a pivotal role in facilitating the migration of Tibetans to Western countries. While assigning blame can be complex and multifaceted, many argue that the CTA bears partial responsibility for the challenges faced due to the decline in the Tibetan population in the Indian subcontinent.

State-sponsored schemes

The decades in exile saw a significant challenge in terms of livelihood and rehabilitation for the Tibetans with chunk of the community still receiving fresh batches of Tibetans refugees. Between 1989 to until early 2000s, Tibetan refugees under a relatively relaxed border continued to flock into India with an average of 3000-4000 Tibetans every year.

This influx bolstered the number of Tibetans in the refugee settlements, schools as well as monastic institutions, that fostered the preservation of Tibet's unique culture and religion.

While this increased the number of the diaspora community, challenges emerged as to the standard of living, livelihood challenges and the overall economic condition of the Tibetans in exile. With those conditions in play, the exile Tibetan government sought every help including foreign aid to make the lives of Tibetans better. Beginning in the early 1960's the exile government sent batches of Tibetans to the west under humanitarian schemes sponsored by foreign countries.

The history of migration from India to the West began in the early 1960s after Tibetans resettled in South Asian countries. In 1963 the Swiss government welcomed 1,000 Tibetan refugees, marking the country's first non-European refugees. Today, more than 8,000 Tibetans are living in Switzerland. In 1971, the Tibetan Refugee Program led to the resettlement of 228 in Canada. In 1972, nearly a thousand Tibetans settled in Dee Why, Sydney, Australia, especially former Tibetan political prisoners and their families. This trend continues today, with several Tibetan political prisoners and their families resettling in Australia. In 1990, 1,000 Tibetan refugees from India immigrated to the U.S. under the resettlement program. The latest mass migration was in 2013, resettling 1,000 Tibetan refugees to Canada. According to the findings of Francoise Robin, a Tibet specialist at France's National Institute of Eastern Languages and Civilisation, approximately 8,000 Tibetans currently reside in the country.

The Tibetan Demographic Survey of 2009 estimated that over 9,309 individuals moved to the West during the period 1998-2009. By 2024, nearly half of the Tibetans in exile reside in foreign countries, highlighting the continuous flow of Tibetans seeking refuge and opportunities abroad. The number of exile Tibetans who have migrated to the west through these schemes have doubled or more as immediate families and relatives of these state sponsored schemes have also moved to the west through family reunion visas as well as spouse visas.

Tibetan Rehabilitation Policy 2014

The Tibetan Rehabilitation Policy (TRP) 2014, formalised by the Government of India on October 20, 2014, in consultation with the Tibetan government in exile, to address issues related to the land occupied by Tibetans in various settlements across India, due to the absence of proper land lease document. The policy states that state governments should sign a lease document for the land occupied by Tibetan refugees. This lease is to be granted for a period of 20 years, or until it is revoked or cancelled. This provision offers a level of security and tenure to Tibetan refugees who may have been occupying land without formal documentation. Other key aspects of the TRP 2014 are the extension of various state and central government schemes and provisions, as well as improvements in infrastructure facilities within Tibetan settlements.

One of the policy's emphasis was on the formalisation of land lease agreements, granting land use rights to Tibetans, and extending central and state benefits for various development schemes. A research paper authored by Tenzin Choedon titled 'Rehabilitation or a Temporal Adjustment: An Assessment of the Tibetan Rehabilitation Policy, 2014' however, argues that the policy's primary concentration on resolving land-related issues resulted in relatively less attention being given to the implementation of other developmental schemes.

Contrary to the expectations of the CTA, only five states in India, namely Karnataka, Uttarakhand, Himachal Pradesh, Arunachal Pradesh, and Sikkim, have adopted the Tibetan Rehabilitation Policy (TRP) 2014. Speaking to Phayul, Choedon said, "The limited adoption of the TRP 2014 in only five states in India can be attributed to various factors, and resistance may indeed exist in states that did not adopt it. There isn't a singular factor that could explain the reluctance of some states to adopt the policy; each state has its unique political, economic, and social dynamics that must be considered. For instance, examining the relationship between local residents and Tibetans in a specific state is crucial. The dynamics of the relationship between Dharamshala locals and Tibetans may differ significantly from that between Tibetans and local residents in Uttarakhand."

The provisions outlined in the policy have faced criticism for their perceived lack of clear deliverables, both in written documentation and practical implementation. Notably, the policy fails to address the challenges faced by Tibetans regarding property ownership or leasing in their names. Additionally, it does not provide any guidance or mention government job opportunities for the Tibetan community. Perhaps most crucially, the policy does not offer clarity on the legal status of Tibetans under the Indian constitution, leaving their legal standing uncertain. This lack of clarity on the legal status of Tibetan refugees, persisting for more than sixty years in exile, coupled with the challenges faced by Tibetans in their daily lives that are significantly influenced by their legal identity, stands out as a major factor contributing to the mass migration of Tibetans to the West. The uncertainty surrounding their legal standing has likely played a pivotal role in shaping the decisions of many Tibetan refugees to seek better opportunities and stability in Western countries.

The implementation of the TRP 2014 has given rise to questions, whether it genuinely serves as a 'rehabilitation policy' for Tibetans in India or is it intended more as a preventive measure, considering its consultation with the CTA, particularly in issues like the migration of Tibetans to the West. "The adoption of the policy is the result of a mutual agreement between the Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) and the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), aimed at resolving the persistent land disputes among Tibetan settlements with various institutional bodies and their local residents. Furthermore, the policy aims to consolidate Tibetans in these settlements by providing them access to various schemes while securing the "temporariness" of the exile community. In the past decade, there has been a significant increase in the population migrating abroad or to urban areas, coupled with a decline in childbirth. This demographic shift raises concerns within the CTA regarding its primary goal of protecting Tibetans and preserving their culture in exile. Therefore, the TRP is framed not only as a means of rehabilitation but also as a preventive measure to address the challenges posed by the migration of Tibetans, particularly to the West," Choedon opined.

Impact on the institutions

The migration trend of Tibetans from South Asian countries to others has presented multifaceted challenges for the Tibetan government in exile, impacting the sustenance of educational institutions, Tibetan settlements, and overall sustenance of the government itself.

The migration of Tibetans has had a substantial impact on Tibetan schools in exile, as highlighted by Sikyong in his May speech in Shimla. The data from the Department of Education indicated a significant decline in the number of Tibetan students over the years. In 2012, there were reportedly over 20,000 Tibetan students, but by 2022, this number had diminished to 9,700.

The Sikyong identified several factors contributing to this decline. Firstly, there has been a decrease in the arrival of Tibetan children from inside Tibet. Secondly, the migration of Tibetan youths to Western countries emerged as a significant factor impacting the student population. Finally, a low birth rate within the Tibetan community was identified as the third reason for the diminishing student numbers.

President Penpa Tsering, in his address at the 16th Annual School Heads' Meeting of Sambhota Tibetan Schools Society (STSS) in Dharamshala in January 2024, disclosed the number of monasteries under CTA to be 292 monasteries. The total monastic population residing in these monastic institutions stands at approximately 39,000. Notably, only 29% of these monks are of Tibetan descent. The majority, comprising 69.5% hail from the Himalayan region, while the remaining 1.5% are from Mongolia and various other countries. The number of Tibetans enrolling in monasteries have reduced multifold over the years.

While the decline in schools and monasteries cannot be attributed only to migration to the west, it is arguably a major factor.

Geshe Lhakdor, the Director of the Library of Tibetan Works and Archives (LTWA), in his speech at Manjushri, a Dharamshala-based organisation in January 2024, highlighted the growing trend of migration of Tibetan youth to the West, pointing out how it poses a threat to the preservation of the Tibetan language and culture. Additionally, he noted that Tibetan children in the West have fewer resources available to them for learning the Tibetan language and culture. This, he said, could potentially impact the continuity and depth of Tibetan cultural and linguistic traditions among the younger generation in the diaspora.

In India, compact communities have appeared to be a medium to reinvigorate Tibetan identity, primarily through schools, monastic institutions, and cultural centers. Recognizing this significance, a major initiative has been undertaken by the 16th Kashag (Cabinet) known as the 'Building Back Compact Communities' (BBCC) program. The BBCC program reflects a commitment to address the challenges posed by the dispersal of Tibetan communities. The initiative is likely to focus on rebuilding, strengthening, and revitalising the core elements that contribute to the cohesiveness of compact communities, including efforts to enhance educational institutions, preserve cultural heritage, and sustain monastic traditions.

A new frontiers

The mass migration of Tibetans from India to foreign countries has catalyzed the emergence of a global Tibetan diaspora, scattered across different nations. This dispersion has given rise to a network of impassioned individuals committed to advocating for the rights and freedom of Tibetans. These diaspora communities have evolved into focal points for organizing advocacy efforts and elevating awareness about the Tibetan cause. The migration has additionally empowered Tibetans to participate in political activism and lobbying endeavors in foreign nations, enabling them to influence policies both locally and nationally in support of their cause. This active involvement in politics further contributes to garnering political backing for the Tibetan cause on the international stage.

Chemi Lhamo, a Tibetan-Canadian human rights activist and Campaigns Director at Students for Free Tibet, told Phayul, "Migration of Tibetans to foreign countries provides a unique opportunity for the next generation of Tibetan advocacy as more Tibetans will bear hyphenated identities in the ever-changing political world. The advocacy work done in respective nations as a Tibetan vs. a Tibetan citizen of the respective country is drastically different with various access to spaces such as a meeting with your member of parliament (MP) as a constituent vs a meeting request for a conflict on the other side of the world".

In the global context, Lhamo sees the potential for Tibetans equipped with knowledge of their host nations and accepted degrees to bring Tibet to the international stage through diverse avenues. However, she underscores the need for balancing this promising network and opportunity with the preservation of the Tibetan identity, maintaining relationships with the current host nation, India, and ensuring the continued engagement of youth in the Tibetan freedom movement.

When asked about changes in the dynamics of Tibetan advocacy due to resettlement in various foreign countries, Lhamo cites a tangible example. "During the last China's UPR, 9 states mentioned Tibet and this year last week in Geneva, 21 states mentioned Tibet and made 24 recommendations. This is one example that is a direct result of Tibetans resettling in various foreign countries and lobbying their respective governments, taking up space in the international world and representing Tibet". Lhamo also envisions a turning point, where Tibetan activists are not solely advocates for Tibet but are increasingly recognized as leaders in broader global movements, including the environmental movement and the fight for democracy against authoritarianism. Lobby days and activism by Tibetan youth, including those born in the west have significantly increased the vigor and bite of both activism and advocacy abroad, the exploits of which the CTA relies and bets on.

Delving into a more practical level, financial and living standards of Tibetans in the West and their families in the Indian subcontinent, have improved over the years due to migration. Thousands of Tibetans have migrated from South East Asia to other countries in search of employment and financial stability. Tamding Dolma, a naturalized French citizen who migrated to France from India a decade ago, shared that her decision to move was primarily driven by her family's financial difficulties and lack of employment opportunities in India. When questioned about the financial support she provides to her family in India, she explained that her migration to France was instrumental in alleviating the financial constraints her family faced. Subsequently, both her brother and sister also migrated to France.

Tamdin told Phayul that over the past decade she and her siblings have been successful in stabilizing the financial condition of their family in India. Despite inherent challenges of moving to and adjusting in a foreign country, she believes that the decision to migrate has proven to be financially beneficial not only for them but also for others in similar situations. Migration has contributed to the dissemination of Tibetan culture and religion globally. Tibetan Buddhism, once confined to the Himalayas, has now spread worldwide, with Tibetan Buddhist monks and prayer flags becoming common sights. Emily Yeh's research on the 'Tibetan Diaspora in the US' suggests that the emigration of Tibetans in recent decades has played a crucial role in popularizing Tibetan Buddhism globally.

Legitimacy of the CTA

The migration of Tibetans to the West perhaps most significantly poses threats to the legitimacy of the Tibetan government in exile based in Dharamshala. The diminishing population of the Tibetan community in India has the potential to reshape the demographic makeup of compact Tibetan communities, specifically influencing the leadership and administrative capacities of the CTA.

The subject of migration was touted to be a challenge by majority of the Sikyong candidates during the campaign of the last general election of CTA in 2021. Key presidential candidates including the incumbent Sikyong Penpa Tsering highlighted the issue of migration on their campaign trail.

With the demographic distribution of exile Tibetans nearing half in the Indian subcontinent and the other half in the west, the question of CTA's legitimacy, at least in the few decades, many say, will come into question. The CTA has significant jurisdiction and clout in CTA administered settlements and schools in India only and not in the west. While the Tibetans in the west have a deep affinity with the CTA and its leadership, the absence of physical spaces and improper administration channels in the west has undermined the CTA's reach in the west.

The CTA faces challenges in administering scattered Tibetan communities in countries in the West, as it lacks jurisdiction similar to its role in India. This circumstance raises administrative issues, as highlighted by challenges encountered during the latest demographic survey conducted in 2022 by the present administration under the leadership of President Penpa Tsering. The survey was deemed "inconclusive" and "unsuccessful." "We have received around 66,000 forms from the India-Nepal-Bhutan population census. However, we are yet to receive numbers from some schools and also yet to consider the number of men enrolled in the army," the Additional Secretary from the Department of Home, Dawa Tsultrim told Phayul earlier. Notably, the survey identified a gap of 4,000 forms during online filing. A spokesperson acknowledged this discrepancy, stating, "We are currently looking to solve this discrepancy in the number of forms we have received. But perhaps Tibetans from the West could have submitted forms through their respective settlements but since their Green Book is listed abroad, it could have complicated their entries."

The development is a stark reminder that CTA's jurisdiction and clout faces a number of problems particularly when the target demographic is spread sparsely in western countries.

The bigger challenge, however, is the decreasing number of Tibetans in CTA administered refugee settlements, schools and monasteries in India where, observers feel that in the next one or two decades, the problem could exponentially become evident with CTA's legitimacy coming into question with the number of Tibetans.

In an interview with Phayul, Sikyong Penpa Tsering acknowledged the rapid increase in Tibetan migration, expressing an understanding that this trend is likely to continue over time. He elaborated on his recent official visit to France and other countries, highlighting his engagement with Tibetans in these regions. Sikyong Penpa Tsering emphasised his commitment, as outlined in his campaign manifesto, to bridge the emotional gap arising from the physical distance among Tibetan communities.

Addressing this concern, Sikyong Penpa Tsering told Phayul that adapting to new realities is crucial to maintaining legitimacy. "The idea is that if Tibetans in the West can sustain themselves, it might be beneficial to allow them to grow independently, especially when continuous financial support might become unsustainable over time. The sustainability of various initiatives, such as weekend Tibetan classes is an effort made by Tibetan associations and individuals in the West. They are managing well with support from the Department of Education, textbooks, and their own endeavours. This emphasis is on fostering a mindset that allows these initiatives to grow organically, minimising reliance on external assistance," he said.

"The evolving demographic and social changes within the Tibetan diaspora highlights the importance of legislators and leadership actively listening to the voices of the people, considering the significant demographic shifts and social transformations. There is a growing need to adapt representation structures to align with the aspirations and needs of the community," he told Phayul.

Indian Army Prepares For A Tough Summer On China Border – OpEd

22 February 2024, Eurasia Review

The Indian Army says it is preparing in full earnest to counter anticipated Chinese incursions and “other forms of aggression” along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) that intelligence reports have indicated as likely to take place in the summer of 2024 on or before the Indian parliament polls.

Senior military intelligence officials told Eurasia Review that Army Chief Gen Manoj Pande has decided to “combatise” its Central Command, which so far largely provided reserves for the frontline fighting formations in the Western, Northern and Eastern commands.

In US, he was provided with detailed and quality technical-signal intelligence and satellite feeds on Chinese military movements in Tibet and neighbouring provinces, they said.

On Wednesday, Indian defence secretary Giridhar Aramane described China as a “bully” and thanked the US for support to face up to its northern neighbour.

Speaking at the Indus-X summit, Aramane did not rule out “a recurrence of the May 2020 situation” (when Indian and Chinese forces suffered casualties in violent clashes on the Ladakh border) and said US support was critical for India in such a situation.

“One thing which helped us very quickly is the intelligence, the situational awareness which the US equipment and the US government helped us with,” Aramane said. “So that is one single most important area.”

The defence secretary said the strong resolve that both India and the US support each other in the face of a common threat is going to be of much importance.

Military sources said the Indian army is raising a new Corps under the Central Command for deployment in the Central sector of the Line of Actual Control (LAC) with China that falls between Ladakh (under 14 Corps) and Siliguri corridor (under 33 Corps).

This corps will now have its own additional artillery, aviation and engineer brigades along with other elements. So far the Central Command was largely an administrative Command.

The military officials said that Headquarters Uttar Bharat (HQ UB), the administrative formation under the Central Command, is being converted into a full-fledged corps called the 18 Corps with one division and three independent brigades under it to take care of that part of the LAC, which falls between the Leh-based 14 Corps, under the Northern Command, and North Bengal’s Sukna-based 33 Corps, under the Eastern Command.

India has pumped in close to 68,000 additional troops and associated equipment in Eastern Ladakh, deployment was also strengthened along the LAC in the central sectors as well as the Eastern Command.

As part of the changes, the HQ UB, which only had one brigade under it along with some Scout Battalions, got a total of three brigades as the LAC heated up. The new ones included Joshimath-based 9 (Independent) Mountain Brigade, Pithoragarh-based 119 Brigade and the Pooh-based 136 Brigade.

The Dehradun based 14 Division, which was earlier under the Western Command, was also brought under HQ UB.

With the raising of the 18 Corps, the Army will now have a total of seven corps dedicated to guarding the borders with China, up from the earlier five.

Besides the 18 Corps, the LAC also got an additional strike corps since 2020 after Mathura-based 1 Strike Corps was reoriented to the border with China from that with Pakistan, as part of the larger changes in deployment.

The Central Command is operationally responsible for the defence of the central sector along the LAC and the international Border with Nepal – stretching across the four states of Himachal Pradesh, Uttarakhand, Uttar Pradesh and Bihar.

It is also home to 13 Category ‘A’ training establishments, 18 regimental centres and a large number of logistics establishments.

Military sources said these training establishments are likely to be moved to the Southern Command where the army is less likely to face operational challenges and might just beef up naval amphibian operations, for which it might raise four battalions of Marines on lines of UK’s Royal Marines.

Book Review: ‘Women In Tibet: Past And Present’

22 February 2024, Feminism in India

Women in Tibet: Past and Present, edited by Janet Gyatso and Hanna Havnevik, offers a thorough examination of Tibetan women’s lives, covering their history, challenges, and achievements. This anthology sheds light on often overlooked narratives, emphasising women’s resilience, agency, and societal contributions. It explores the complexities of Tibetan women’s experiences over time, revealing evolving socio-cultural dynamics and their impact on women’s roles and aspirations.

Beginning with an exploration of women’s roles in the traditional society of Tibet, the anthology draws from historical sources such as ancient texts and inscriptions from the Tibetan empire era. Authors in this section analyse gender relations, family structures, and religious practices, providing nuanced insights into historical experiences.

In the latter part of the book, attention turns to contemporary challenges faced by women in Tibet, examined through ethnographic research and field interviews. This section explores how modern political changes, migration, and globalisation have affected Tibetan women. It highlights their struggles to preserve cultural heritage amidst rapid change, with personal narratives illustrating resilience and determination. These stories emphasise women's empowerment, pursuit of education, and activism, showcasing their ability to enact positive change in their communities.

Throughout the chapters, a consistent theme revolves around the methodological challenges associated with studying 'Tibetan women'. The authors discuss the inherent selectivity in reporting, the various historical perspectives on women's status within Tibetan society, and the recurring instances of deviations from established norms. It's noted that the category of women doesn't align precisely with the fluid gender norms that exist, and caution is repeatedly emphasised regarding the perils of overgeneralisation. These perils are not solely due to indigenous and physical disparities but also because of the evolving conceptions of womanhood and personhood, regardless of gender, throughout Tibetan history.

As the analysis progresses, the focus expands to include recurring motifs such as religion and spirituality, with a particular emphasis on the portrayal of women's bodies across multiple chapters. The evolution of the function and significance attributed to women's bodies is observed, transitioning from primarily serving as conduits for family lineage perpetuation in ancient Tibetan society to becoming significant centers of political expression in contemporary Tibetan culture. This transformation is closely intertwined with another theme present in the anthology: the women's endeavor to reclaim their Tibetan identity and culture while asserting their voices amidst political challenges

The body of the Tibetan woman as a site of reproduction

The Genealogy of the imperial household offers a fascinating glimpse into the intricate dynamics of women's roles in historical Tibet. It predominantly lists consorts who bore heirs, prompting speculation about whether a consort's fame was solely tied to her ability to produce male heirs for the throne (p.46). This raises questions about the overlooked consorts who played vital roles in the imperial court regardless of childbirth. Empresses, even if they bore heirs, were seldom mentioned in historical records, indicating their relative visibility compared to other consorts and wives, whose recognition often came posthumously. Additionally, sisters and daughters of emperors were mentioned only upon marriage, suggesting their significance depended on being entrusted to another man's care, often unrelated.

In a similar breath of thought, the Annals too shed light on the differentiation in forms of address amongst the various female members of the imperial household on the basis of their utility, with mothers to heirs of the throne being honored as 'yum' (mother) or 'chi' (grandmother) or sometimes even the high-ranking title of 'mangmoje' signifying their role as the sovereign lady of many. Furthermore, the hierarchical structure of the imperial household, with titles like 'empress' applied to various women, including the principal consort and imperial princesses, underscores the complexity of women's roles and ranks. This intricate web of titles and roles reflects the intricate nature of women's positions within the imperial court, each title representing a different facet of their significance in the historical narrative

The body of the Tibetan woman as a symbol of disruption

In Tibetan society, traditional gender roles require young men to pursue monastic life, while young women are expected to enter patrilocal marriages (p.263). These roles are rooted in the belief that women possess limited mental capacities compared to men, implying their perceived inferiority in emotional regulation, bodily control, and focused thinking (ibid). This division reinforces women as foundational support for male endeavors and forms spatial distinctions, placing the female body in the profane realm and the male mind in the sacred sphere.

However, young women, especially from economically disadvantaged areas, started showing interest in nunhood to escape household burdens and labor (p.277). This trend grew where arranged marriages and women's heavy farm work became societal norms (ibid). Voluntary celibacy and opting out of motherhood provided autonomy for vulnerable women facing state birth control measures.

As Charlene Mackley argues, nuns challenge established gender norms in Tibetan society, especially with the state enforcing childbirth quotas and the encroachment of Han and Muslim Chinese settlements, diminishing male authority (p.283). The androgynous appearance of young nuns highlights the contrast between marriage and procreation in a society where both are scarce. Despite leading celibate lives, nuns often faced scandalous gossip, silently enduring societal representations of their ritually marked bodies (p.284). Their rejection of traditional gender roles made them central in opposing evolving gender practices, seen as perplexing and multifaceted (ibid). This gossip attributed to nuns a significant, unintentional influence in disrupting the gender binary foundation of Tibetan social structures. Consequently, nuns' bodies symbolise a society in transition, caught between tradition and transformation

The body of the Tibetan woman as a site of political resistance

In the struggle against the Chinese state, Tibetan women have found their bodies to be powerful tools of political defiance, transcending individual incidents like forced abortion and sterilisation to embody deeply personal resistance (p.362). Negative experiences, such as betrayal or witnessing abuse, often manifest physically or mentally, highlighting the strong link between psychological and somatic well-being across different backgrounds, including urban and rural women, educated and uneducated, and various historical periods.

In Lhasa's prisons, women's bodies become focal points of conflict and resistance, particularly evident in the accounts of incarcerated nuns who endured imprisonment from a young age (p.334). As public spaces shrink, women's bodies become contested terrain, symbolising cultural identity and group cohesion through concise, emotionally charged rituals reflecting Tibetan values.

Tibetan nuns have significantly reshaped protest into a non-violent act, intertwining it with ritual, religion, and femininity (p.333). Through methods like singing, hunger strikes, and prayers in prison, they demonstrated that these actions are deeply internalised and aligned with Tibetan Buddhist principles. Their non-violent strategies effectively portrayed the state as an oppressive force to the international community, challenging the state's narrative of authority and masculinity (p.337). These acts of resistance affirmed cultural identity and countered physical manifestations of political oppression.

Beyond nuns, the state also utilises the female form to assert control, as seen in the case of correctional officials at Drapchi prison who banned nuns from cutting their hair, turning the body into a stage for political displays once again

The shortcomings of the book

While commendable, the book on Tibetan women lacks depth in certain areas. It could have provided a more thorough analysis of the historical and cultural factors influencing Tibetan women's status, offering deeper insights into socio-political dynamics and traditional customs. Additionally, while addressing challenges faced by Tibetan women, it could have explored key issues like education, healthcare, and employment opportunities in greater detail to provide a nuanced understanding of their struggles.

Moreover, the book primarily focuses on Tibetan women's narratives within Tibetan society, overlooking their interactions and contributions on a broader scale. Exploring their engagement with the international community, experiences of Tibetan women in exile, and involvement in global feminist movements would have offered a more holistic perspective.

Lastly, while touching upon external forces like the Chinese occupation and modernisation, the book lacks a critical analysis of their impact on Tibetan women's lives. A deeper examination of the complexities and specific challenges faced by Tibetan women in the contemporary political climate would have enriched the discussion.

Before this book's publication, scholarship on Tibetan women largely focused on autobiographies of prominent figures like Ama Adhe (The Voice that Remembers: A Tibetan Woman's Inspiring Story of Survival) or narratives of nuns and female mystics in Tibetan Buddhism (Women of Wisdom, Lady of the Lotus-Born: The Life and Enlightenment of Yeshe Tsogyal). These accounts overlooked the experiences of ordinary Tibetan women, creating a gap in understanding. Women in Tibet: Past and Present fills this void by presenting diverse stories of Tibetan women from various backgrounds and time periods.

This collection not only contributes to academic discourse but also engages policymakers, activists, and the general public in discussions about gender in Tibetan society. It encourages further research and advocacy for Tibetan women's rights on a global scale. Additionally, it has empowered formerly incarcerated Tibetan women to step forward and share their firsthand narratives of experiences as prisoners, as seen in recent publications like Tibet in Chains: The Stories of Nine Tibetan Nuns. In conclusion, Women in Tibet: Past and Present is a significant milestone in Tibetan women's studies, highlighting their struggles and accomplishments while promoting inclusivity and equity for the future.

A window of opportunity for Western companies to quit Xinjiang

22 February 2024, Financial Times

When Volkswagen decided more than a decade ago to build a plant in China's Xinjiang region with Chinese partner, SAIC, the aim was not primarily to sell cars to the local market. It was also to appease Chinese authorities who demanded the joint €170mn investment in return for approving VW's plans to expand in Guangdong, as someone acquainted with the discussions over the plant recently told me. Now the German auto group is learning the hard way that politically-driven investments have the potential to become hefty financial and reputational risks. The company has been disqualified by Germany's Union Investment for its sustainable funds after media published claims that forced labour had been used by the joint venture to build a test track in the region.

Forced labour has been a feature of the government's crackdown on the mainly Muslim Uyghur population and other minorities. Human rights groups have estimated that more than 1mn Uyghurs and other Muslims were detained over a period of several years, while thousands have been reported to have been transferred out of the region to work in factories, some supplying global brands. After Handelsblatt published the allegations on the test track, VW announced that it was reviewing the future of its partnership there. VW's review came just days after BASF revealed it would sell stakes in two Xinjiang chemical plants following separate allegations of human rights abuses involving its joint venture partner. Is it just coincidence that, after years of refusing to disinvest for fear of angering Chinese authorities, two of Germany's biggest industrial companies are now willing to brave a political backlash by calling into question the future of their investments there? Not likely, according to several people with long experience of working in China. Each company has specific reasons, but it may also be that a rare window of opportunity has opened to exit uncomfortable investments in China – at least for those companies still publicly demonstrating their commitment to the country. This week Beijing reported that in 2023 China attracted the lowest level of foreign direct investment for 30 years. Investor confidence has been shaken by trade tensions with the US, slowing economic growth, a continuing property crisis and industrial overcapacity. In response, the government wants to revive growth by winning foreign investors back. So punishing two of the country's biggest foreign investors for reviewing or selling insignificant investments in Xinjiang would be the wrong signal to send, says Max Zenglein, chief economist at China consultancy Merics. VW is pouring €5bn into China's electric vehicle sector, while BASF is spending €10bn on a state of the art chemical plant. "This is a very opportune time to get out," Zenglein says. "This is a chance for companies to stop saying nothing is going on in Xinjiang." One executive who has lived and worked in China for more than 20 years also believes that for VW and BASF, at least, the timing is propitious. China "wants the foreign investment. Officials are very explicit about the economic challenge . . . Do you really want to punish those guys that are still pouring money into the economy when everyone is running for the exit?" Meanwhile, it is clear that western regulations demanding clean supply chains are beginning to bite, he adds. Ensuring traceability is difficult in most parts of the world, but particularly in China. VW found this out to great cost. Thousands of its cars have been held up in US customs because the company unwittingly violated the Uyghur Forced Labour Prevention Act when a small supplier used tiny components from Xinjiang. In Germany, companies found to have violated the country's new supply chain laws, which also ban forced labour, face fines of up to 2 per cent of global turnover. Beijing may hotly deny allegations of human rights violations in Xinjiang. But it also wants foreign investment. Perhaps that means that VW and BASF can finally extricate themselves from Xinjiang without a political backlash. If so, that would be good for their shareholders. It may also encourage other companies to move faster to quit the region. But the departure of two such high profile names could also mean less access to international working conditions, and less scrutiny of operations. "It feels bad," the executive said. "No one there will care any more if there is forced labour."

China, Xi Jinping and the making of 'one people, one ideology'

20 February 2024, Financial Times

It is rare that disagreements among China's political elite are reflected or even hinted at in public. So the high drama that unfolded between Xi Jinping, Beijing's authoritarian leader, and Hu Jintao, his predecessor, in front of the world's television cameras in 2022 rated as communist box office. Xi and Hu were sitting next to each other before the massed ranks of deputies at the 20th Congress of the Chinese Communist party, a convocation so important that it is held only once every five years. Xi had used the congress to secure a third term as head of the party, a distinction that effectively meant he was set up to become China's "leader for life". But something was amiss. At the closing ceremony, Hu reached to take a red folder in front of him. Another Chinese official slid it out of his grasp. Xi then signalled to an orderly who grabbed Hu under an armpit and escorted him from the auditorium. On the way out, Hu touched the shoulder of Li Keqiang, China's premier, a former protégé, but the premier offered him only the merest of acknowledgments. As Hu was hustled out, none of a seated row of top officials even so much as turned to wish him well. They stared straight ahead, studiously ignoring his humiliation.

This chilling episode is one of many analysed in a probing new book by Steve Tsang and Olivia Cheung, two respected sinologists at Soas University of London. Over seven chapters, it dissects what must have a claim to be the most important yet least understood political philosophy of our age. The Political Thought of Xi Jinping jettisons a vogue for China books with sensationalist titles (Danger Zone, Destined for War, When China Rules the World and so on) but offers a valuable service. Patient scholarship is deployed to slash through a jungle of jargon and impenetrable doublespeak until shafts of light shine through. Understanding what is truly meant by Xi's "community with a shared future for humankind", "Chinese Dream", "dual circulation" and several other slogans is part of the demystifying process. But the ultimate conclusion of Tsang and Cheung could not be more stark. "In short, Xi's vision puts the Party led by himself front and centre to forge a single powerful country with all its people united in the ambition of restoring China to its 'historic' place as the centre of the world," they write. Thus, all of Xi's circumlocutions end with a single ambition – "One Country, One People, One Ideology, One Party and One Leader". Anything or anybody who gets in the way – as Hu apparently did that day – is dealt with. The reason that Hu was prevented from opening the red folder, Tsang and Cheung say, is that the dossier inside would have revealed that his protégé, Hu Chunhua, had failed to secure promotion to the politburo. With this move, Xi was amputating his predecessor's power base. Another book that seeks to demystify the world's second superpower is China's World View by David Daokui Li, one of China's most high-profile academics and founding dean of the Schwarzman College at Tsinghua University in Beijing. Li has also served as an influential adviser to China's central bank. Given his status as an insider, readers might expect a recitation of CCP talking points. But this thought-provoking book is far more nuanced, honest and at times critical of China's reality. Written in the vein of a tutorial for interested foreign observers, Li's book seeks to explain how China really works, with chapters on the central government, local governments, corruption, the environment and other aspects of the national polity. Li's view of Xi is much more favourable than that of Tsang and Cheung. At times, he lets slip fascinating vignettes: Xi's first wife, Ke Lingling, sought to divorce him, wanting to emigrate to the UK. "For one year, every week he would make phone calls to the UK to persuade her to come back," Li writes. Ke did not heed his entreaties and the couple divorced in 1982. Li portrays Xi as a detail-orientated leader with a thirst for first-hand knowledge. In a meeting that Li attended, Xi is quoted as saying: "I want to taste the steam bun myself. I don't want other people to chew it for me." One big challenge that Xi faces, according to Li, is that as people become better educated – with over 50 per cent of young people attending college – they are increasingly argumentative and expressive. "Obviously, no Chinese leaders confronted such an issue until now," he writes. In the chapter on local governments, he is similarly frank. He tells the story of a highly capable local official named Chen, who knew that "superb job performance would not be enough to secure a promotion". Chen chose to bribe a powerful political mentor who himself was later sentenced to life in prison for taking "huge bribes". Chen went down in the fallout, confessing to bribery and ending up in jail. The reader is left with a sense of how difficult China's governance model makes it for local officials to remain uncorrupted. But Li remains optimistic, seeing a future reminiscent of Singapore, in which officials are paid so handsomely that the incentive to be corrupt is diminished. The final chapter in his book argues that the rise of China is unlikely to cause a war – either hot or cold – with the US. Li's argument rests on an assertion that China's emergence will provide economic opportunities for most people in the world, more public goods in the form of advances in science and technology, and a more effective fight against climate change. This may be true but only up to a point. The much less appealing reality for many in the west is that as Chinese industries climb the value chain, they are eating away at the market share of the west's most vaunted corporations. Politicians in Washington, Brussels, Berlin and elsewhere are growing increasingly concerned that China's rise will not enhance the west but hollow it out. And that, to borrow Tsang and Cheung's vision, will embolden China's ambition of seizing a place at the centre of world affairs.

Echoes From Forgotten Mountains: Tibet In War & Peace

19 February 2024, Rising Kashmir

The history of mankind since its earliest recorded versions in as many languages as thinkable has been fraught with internecine conflicts for reasons ranging from an insatiable lust for land, women or hoisting one's views on others by means that may not be commensurate with a civilized world. Unfortunately even to this day and date the same mentality is being extended by a powerful community or nation on a weaker side throwing international consideration and propriety to dogs. From present day Ukraine and Armenia to Israel –Palestine the year of 2023 is no different from the era of late 1940s or early 1950s when the Chinese Juggernaut steamrolled into the so called 'Roof of the world' (Tibet) crushing in one go one of the most peaceful loving people inhabiting this planet of ours.

This 75 year old struggle of Tibetans against the People's Republic of China seems to have been stymied by an evil combination resulting of 'iron curtaining' of information emanating from that hapless region as also a systematic sinicization by the CCP (Chinese communist party). Be that as it may, a plethora of excellent books written from a firsthand account of happenings have been tumbling out of this iron curtain to afford a peep into one of the most highly surveillance-hit occupied territories of the world i.e. Tibet. The latest book to join this bandwagon of expose on Tibet is 'Echoes from forgotten mountains: Tibet in war and peace' penned by none other than the irresistible Tibetan resistance fighter cum author of repute and an independence activist 'Jamyang Norbu'. A Kalimpongborn Tibetan having joined the resistance movement in the 1970s who has been highly critical of meekness of the Exile government towards Chinese high handedness since long, despite fickle American support combined with a world of indifference; Jamyang Norbu is a 'one man army' out to tear into the Chinese perfidy with all his might at his command.

Though in the past, dime a dozen books of repute on Tibetan affairs have hit the reader's stands, but nothing comes closer even by a whisker to this book when told with such power and insight that can only ride on the shoulders of an excellent writer like Jamyang Norbu. Ever since he began writing historical plays for the 'Tibetan institute of performing arts' in the 1970s, Norbu realized that to document Tibetan history and culture was to resist against its erasure. Over the years he became one of the sharpest chroniclers of his people, doggedly tracking archival material and persuading Tibetans to tell their stories.

This masterpiece of book is neatly divided into 40 chapters with some of the titles taking a reader on to a roller coaster ride itself of Tibetan struggle from its very inception stage- 'The ghosts of Chamdo, Seventeen point swindle, Requiem, Nest of spies, March winds, A crane from Lithang, wind and wildfire, The man whose luck dried up, The golden throne or Four rivers six ranges to name a few. Norbu's book is a detailed and accurate record of the Tibetan resistance against communist china from the first few months of 1950, when Tibet was invaded by communist china. The intrepid writer that Norbu is, takes a reader on a journey that is lost in time and space, conjuring up the lush green forests of Markham, Lhasa's bustling Banakshneighbourhood, the meadows of Lithang, the besieged fortress of Tsethang, the mountain hold out of Mustang in northern Nepal etc. In these places, countless Tibetans rich and poor, monks and lay people, devout Buddhists, and devoted skeptics, oracles and intellectuals, men, women, children and the elderly, aristocrats and commoners, Lhasa urbanites and steppe nomads lived, fought, died and hoped.

Norbu tells a reader of 'Yunru Pun', the unassuming tribal chief who led the 1955 Lithang uprising that were the first embers in a rebellion which would reverberate the entire eastern Tibet before spreading its arch of fire towards Lhasa; of Phagpa, the lord Chamberlain who Norbu suspects masterminded the great escape of Dalai Lama from Lhasa in 1959; of ChushiGangdruk's death -defying 'Long ride north' through the desolate Changtang plateau, the PLA hot on their heels, a mirror image of Mao's long march; of Trinlay, the nun who thrown out of her monastery by the 'Red guards' became 'Nyemo Achi' the leader of the rebel army of the Gods as Tibet buckled under the cultural revolution.

A discerning reader will find to his delight that this seminal book in particular embellishes two main protagonists who are the main anvils around which this entire narrative of Tibetan struggle weaves its web. First personality to cast his mesmerizing effect on the readers is 'Bhusang, the man whose luck dried up' and Norbu himself. The first born into a peasant family chafing under aristocratic overlords; the second, to one such aristocratic clan but forced into semi-exile in India long before Chinese annexation. 'Bhusang' a rookie doctor in Lhasa when it rebelled against china in 1959 joined the CIA-trained operatives sent to Tibet to help the resistance. India-raised Norbu was witness to these echoes of doomed struggles, opting to join what remained of it in northern Nepal before going to France to see if Paris's support of Tibet would be more tangible than Washington's. Both men saw their dreams turn to dust. Captured by the PLA, Bhusang spent years in Chinese jails, labour camps finding upon release that his wife had remarried and his children had starved to death. He left the country he had fought for, and where nothing was left for him to further dream on. Norbu after resistance's demise turned to writing and activism. Such were the vicissitudes of life that were the hallmark of the numerous Tibetan resistance fighters that are recreated in all their complexity, richness and defiance which a reader would find this book unstoppable once he leaves through its various pages.

Tibet has been in the news recently, which is significant because on 23 August 2023 Beijing released the 2023 edition of the 'Standard map of china' which included Taiwan, the South China Sea, Arunachal Pradesh and the Aksai chin as Chinese territories. A few days later Xinhua news agency reported that president Xi Jinping in a letter addressed to 2023 'Forum on the development of Xizang' had validated the change of name of India's northern neighbor from Tibet to Xizang. The forum itself was called: 'new era, New Xizang, New journey: New chapter in Xizang's high quality development and human rights protection. The ultimate culmination of a long travel of sinicization of Tibet.

With India too locking horns with its bête noire in the high plateau of Tibet and the Galwan clash too fresh in the psyche of the country, this masterpiece of book on Tibet couldn't have come at a better time.

In these circumstances, the publication of 'Echoes from forgotten mountains—Tibet in war and peace’ is reminding us of about what exactly happened to Tibet in the bygone era and still continuing too in all its ferocity.

Hong Kong’s economy needs reinvention to become more than just China’s superconnector after a lost half decade

18 February 2024, South China Morning Post

The Hong Kong economy has had a lost half decade. It shrank in two of the last five years; 3.2 per cent GDP growth last year did not make up for the 3.5 per cent contraction in 2022. Growth in the coming years may continue to be sluggish as the mainland Chinese economy grapples with high levels of debt – especially in property – excess capacity and insufficient demand, deflationary pressures, and a persistent decline in asset values.

Hong Kong’s economic woes should trigger a deep rethink of what it needs to do to maintain its relevance in a global economy that has changed dramatically since the global financial crisis of 2008-2009, changes accelerated by the Covid-19 pandemic.

The evidence of the last 26 years points to an inescapable conclusion: even if being a superconnector to the mainland is a necessary condition of Hong Kong’s growth and prosperity, it is not a sufficient one. The city should strive to be much more than just a superconnector of mainland China. Three arguments support this conclusion.

Hong Kong’s superconnector status hasn’t helped it outperform other Asian hubs

First, despite being the superconnector for China – the world’s fastest-growing economy over the last three decades – Hong Kong’s growth has lagged behind Singapore’s by a considerable margin. As recently as 2003, Hong Kong’s GDP per capita of about US$26,000 was roughly the same as Singapore’s. Today, Singapore’s GDP per capita, at over US$82,000, is nearly 70 per cent higher than Hong Kong’s despite mainland China growing much faster than Southeast Asia during the last three decades.

Clearly, Singapore’s superior performance was not just because it was the superconnector of Southeast Asia. Instead, Singapore established itself as a key node in global value chains in a number of high value-added industries – electronics, petrochemicals, pharmaceuticals and biotech, and precision engineering to name a few. By contrast, Hong Kong’s economy has become too specialised in a few highly correlated services – finance and insurance, real estate, trade and logistics, business services and tourism – and is too reliant on growth in the mainland.

Defenders of Hong Kong’s model say that compared with Singapore, it is more productive because it is more market-driven, less dependent on government interventions, and therefore less vulnerable to governmental mistakes and corruption. About three decades ago, economists such as Alwyn Young argued that Hong Kong’s growth model was more sustainable than Singapore’s because whereas growth in Hong Kong was led by total factor productivity (TFP, a measure of innovation), growth in Singapore was driven mainly by factor accumulation (perspiration rather than inspiration).

Young’s predictions have not come to pass. There is little evidence in the last 30 years to indicate that Hong Kong’s economy has had higher TFP growth or is more innovative than Singapore’s. Meanwhile, as the Hong Kong economy became ever more specialised and reliant on the mainland, its gains in efficiency may have been outweighed by the loss of diversity and resilience.

Being a superconnector has reduced Hong Kong’s economic diversity

The literature on regional integration is largely positive: economies grow faster when they integrate with larger markets. But the literature also highlights some risks for smaller economies – risks that Hong Kong should always have been alert to. For instance, firms and talent may leave for better opportunities in larger, faster-growing markets. The manufacturing sector may be hollowed out, and the loss of manufacturing reduces opportunities for technology learning and upgrading.

In addition to these risks of integration, Hong Kong has also given up a vital tool of macroeconomic stabilisation – monetary policy – because of its pegged exchange rate.

Rather than enable it to enjoy the best of both worlds, being a superconnector combined with the US dollar peg may have consigned Hong Kong to the worst of both worlds in the last two years. China’s structural problems have meant there has been no post-Covid rebound, while the US dollar peg has deprived Hong Kong of the ability to lower interest rates or the exchange rate to support the economy.

Looking ahead, interest rates in the United States are likely to be reduced this year; this would relieve the pressure on the Hong Kong dollar and allow interest rates in Hong Kong to come down to levels more suited to its context. But Hong Kong’s excessive reliance on growth in the mainland will not be reduced any time soon. With GDP growth in China likely to slow to 3-4 per cent in the next 10 years, one would have to be blindly optimistic to believe that growth in Hong Kong would not be adversely affected.

It has also reduced Hong Kong's policy space and undermined its international character

The Covid-19 pandemic forced Hong Kong to choose between its connections with the mainland and its connections with the rest of the world. Rightly or wrong, it prioritised the former over the latter. But because China's zero-Covid policy was increasingly misaligned and out-of-sync with global norms and practices, Hong Kong found itself isolated and perceived as "just another Chinese city".

More so than the National Security Law, zero-Covid did considerable harm to Hong Kong's reputation as an international city. It also showed how maladaptive the Hong Kong government had become. As the virus evolved to become more transmissible and less deadly, and as the rest of the world outside China adapted to live with the virus, Hong Kong's persistence with draconian zero-Covid restrictions – even after Covid-19 had become endemic in the city in early 2022 – showed the rest of the world that policymaking in Hong Kong had become less pragmatic and scientific.

Zero-Covid also produced disastrous consequences for Hong Kong: it neither saved lives nor protected the economy. Compared with other jurisdictions in East Asia, Hong Kong has had more excess deaths during the pandemic, even as it delayed its economic recovery unnecessarily.

Zero-Covid also inflicted more trauma on Hong Kong's economy than the National Security Law did. At the height of zero-Covid madness in early 2022, tens of thousands of professionals in the business and financial sectors left Hong Kong – many to Singapore. And the trauma continues, not least because the Hong Kong government has not convened an independent inquiry on its handling of Covid-19, without which the authorities will not have the opportunity to learn from their mistakes, businesses will persist in their belief that the quality of policymaking has deteriorated, and residents will remain sceptical and cynical of the government – deepening Hong Kong's existential crisis.

Avoiding stasis and blind optimism

In many of the Hong Kong government's public pronouncements, there is a tendency to blame external factors for Hong Kong's problems – high interest rates in the US, geopolitical tensions, Western efforts to contain China – while disregarding or downplaying domestic factors such as China's slowdown, Hong Kong's US dollar peg, and zero-Covid. While these stories may be understandable from a political communication perspective, they hurt Hong Kong more in the long run.

First, these narratives do not do the Hong Kong people or the economy any favours. They create the impression that all of Hong Kong's problems are created by outsiders or enemies abroad. Not only does this damage Hong Kong's standing as an international city, it also does not help Hongkongers understand the complex challenges the city faces in a less globalised, more polarised world. These narratives create simplistic, binary, and ultimately false, stories that Hong Kong is caught in a battle between East and West, between good and evil. In so doing, they polarise society even more.

Second, these narratives give the authorities a crutch and an excuse not to engage in a deeper, self-critical reflection of what Hong Kong needs to do to stay relevant. Why bother to change if we can easily scapegoat the West or blame others for Hong Kong's problems?

Third, these narratives are often based on blindly optimistic predictions of China's rise, and of the West's decline. While this is a possibility, it is by no means guaranteed no matter how sincerely or strongly we hold these beliefs. They also promote excessive optimism in the face of our problems and failings. While optimism is usually a good mental disposition, we should avoid the denialism, defensiveness, and self-delusion that the writer Lu Xun described so well in The True Story of Ah Q.

Rather, Hong Kong's policymakers should seize the opportunity that the current economic malaise offers to engage in a far-reaching exercise on how the Hong Kong economy should be adapted, even reinvented, for the future. Doing so would not only signal to the world that Hong Kong has every intention to remain an essential node of the global economy, it would also give Hongkongers more reason to be confident in Hong Kong's future.

Xi Jinping's Succession Dilemma

17 February 2024, Asia Society

The most intellectually honest answer to the question of who will succeed Xi Jinping as China's paramount leader is simply, "We don't know."

Xi's succession is the ultimate "known unknown" of Chinese politics. We do not know when Xi will leave office. We do not know how Xi will leave office. We do not know whether Xi will handpick a political heir. We do not even know how a successor would be chosen if Xi does not designate one.

This opacity is concerning. China is arguably the world's second most powerful country. Xi's role as general secretary of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) gives him a central role in economic, diplomatic, and military decisions that reverberate across the globe.

Would a new leader embrace or reject Xi's legacy? Governments and businesses everywhere have a stake in his replacement's preferences on political control, market reform, U.S.-China relations, and territorial ambition regarding Taiwan and the South China Sea. But it is hard to speculate about the future of such issues without any insight into the nature of Xi's departure or how his successor would be selected.

Still, the absence of clear foresight does not mean we should just throw up our hands and not think about Xi's succession. Peering into a future largely devoid of information makes it even more important to identify and evaluate the evidence that does exist. Such evidence does not tell us what will happen with Xi's succession. But it does allow us to engage in informed conjecture about what might happen. The evidence includes Xi's political behavior over his first 11 years in power, the history of succession politics in the CCP and other Leninist governing parties, and a handful of Party-state regulations.

This evidence leads to three conjectures: First, Xi is unlikely to anoint a successor, or at least not a strong successor, well in advance. Second, the ultimate outcome of Xi's succession is unlikely to be orderly or predictable, because of contending political networks and manipulable Party regulations. Third, the policy outcomes of Xi's succession will depend on China's situation when he leaves office, although some continuities are probable regardless of Xi's performance.

Xi is Unlikely to Anoint a Successor Far in Advance

There are many ways Xi could leave office, including a voluntary resignation, an elite rebellion, a military coup, or a sudden illness — with huge potential for variation within each scenario. Several possibilities are discussed by Richard McGregor and Jude Blanchette in their stellar article After Xi: Future Scenarios for Leadership Succession in Post-Xi Jinping Era.

Xi will likely rule China until he "goes to meet Marx," as the saying goes. Xi had acquired enough power to ignore the nascent precedent saying he should indicate a successor at the 19th Party Congress in 2017. The next year, he amended the state constitution to remove term limits on his concurrent role as head of state, allowing him to rule for life as president as well as head of the Party and the military. In 2022, at age 69, Xi ignored previous norms that said leaders aged 68 or older should retire from the Politburo.

Xi is unlikely to voluntarily name a successor, let alone hand over power, anytime soon. Doing so could weaken his authority, exacerbate divisions within his network of supporters, and eventually threaten his political legacy and personal safety. And right now, Xi's power — especially his centralized control of personnel, ideology, security services, and the military — makes it very difficult for any rivals to organize against him, even if his policies become unpopular.

Elite rebellion is not impossible. Research conducted by Milan Svolik shows that two-thirds of deposed authoritarians fall to inside challengers. Yuhua Wang finds that almost 60% of Chinese emperors who did not exit office by natural death were murdered, deposed, forced to abdicate, or forced to commit suicide by regime elites. A conceivable trigger for Xi would be an economic depression or military misadventure, or if he began purging his closest allies.

Naming a successor could undermine Xi's authority. Once Xi announces the next paramount leader, he could become a lame duck as the political elite begin to softly cultivate ties with and take more political cues from the successor. Even if that person did nothing but follow Xi's orders, there would effectively be more than one power center in the Party. The successor would also provide a focal point that would make it somewhat less difficult for Party insiders to rally against Xi's leadership in any moment of crisis.

Choosing a successor could also weaken Xi's political support. Xi would probably choose a close political ally to advance his political project. But that choice would mean not choosing others, which could alienate top lieutenants who are overlooked. It could also empower lower-ranking officials with close ties to the designated heir, while disempowering those without such ties. Such fractures could weaken Xi's ability to mobilize the Party elite to implement his decisions. If Xi were to try to overcome this problem by nominating an outside candidate, all his close allies might feel vulnerable, and together they could undermine the successor — and, by extension, Xi himself.

Finally, handing power to a successor could threaten Xi's legacy. Xi could retain formidable informal influence after retirement, but he appears to prefer the security of formal office, having worked assiduously to institutionalize the powers of the general secretary and ban the informal "old person" politics practiced by Deng Xiaoping and Jiang Zemin. Leaving office would also render Xi vulnerable to the hidden preferences and political talents of his successor (indeed, few glimpsed Xi's true colors before he became leader and began displaying the extent of his personal ambition and political skill). His anti-corruption campaign and ideological crackdowns have made him many enemies, and Xi may fear for his freedom and safety, or at least for the longevity of his policy priorities. More fundamentally, Xi seems to see himself as a man of destiny, a true believer in the Party's mission of national rejuvenation and his own ability to achieve that goal. One look at U.S. politics is enough to see that politicians everywhere have egos and like to stick around.

But there are good reasons for Xi to have a plan, or multiple plans ...

We cannot see into Xi's mind, and any succession plan that currently exists would be one of his most closely guarded political secrets. In his excellent book Party of One: The Rise of Xi Jinping and China's Superpower Future, Chun Han Wong makes the most persuasive counterargument that an orderly succession is in the cards. Wong contends that "Xi's ability to engineer a smooth succession could determine whether his vision of a rejuvenated China will survive him." If Xi can install a strong successor who will continue his policy agenda and protect his family, that could avoid a power struggle that risks dividing the Party, harming the country, and undermining Xi's legacy. Xi would surely like to do this, but the political price could be prohibitive.

Party history offers little precedent that would appeal to Xi in this regard. Mao Zedong launched the Cultural Revolution in part to attack his heir apparent, Liu Shaoqi, for undermining Maoist economic policy. Lin Biao, the next designated successor, died in a plane crash as he attempted to flee Beijing after his son hatched a plot to assassinate Mao. Deng Xiaoping purged his first two protégés, Hu Yaobang and Zhao Ziyang, for wavering in their commitment to Party dominance, and then he had to force Jiang Zemin to re-embrace economic reform with his 1992 "Southern Tour." And Xi must surely see how Jiang's support for his own rise ended up severely curtailing Jiang's political influence.

The pitfalls outlined above will likely discourage Xi from naming a replacement anytime soon, even to the detriment of his longer-term legacy. The likeliest precedent for Xi's succession would therefore be that of Mao to Hua Guofeng. Following Lin Biao's death in 1971, Mao eyed Wang Hongwen as his successor, then changed his mind and eventually tapped Hua Guofeng five months before dying in September 1976. Hua was plucked from relative obscurity but barely lasted two years as paramount leader until Deng outmaneuvered him (although both sought to revise Maoist policies).

This history illuminates another confounding variable in succession prognostications: Xi might change his mind, perhaps even multiple times, about whether to appoint a successor and who it ought to be. As Xi ages, he could increasingly cultivate political heirs, and he will likely have to delegate more duties to subordinates. But the very hint of Xi's retirement would be a seismic shock to elite politics, and the reaction of perceived allies and adversaries will influence his thinking. If he feels uneasy or threatened, he could cancel his plans. Likewise, even if a successor is decided, if Xi comes to doubt their loyalty or competence, that designation may not last. Xi's Succession is Unlikely to be Orderly or Predictable

Xi's successor is unlikely to be as powerful, regardless of how the succession occurs. The later a successor is appointed prior to Xi's departure, the weaker they are likely to be. If Xi appoints no successor, different networks of Xi followers are likely to struggle over the top job.

Much of this uncertainty stems from the Party's lack of clear succession mechanisms. Mao tapped Hua, Deng ousted Hua, Deng elevated Jiang, Deng anointed Hu, and then Jiang supported Xi. It is backroom politics through and through.

Xi's selection as Hu's heir apparent after the 17th Party Congress in 2007 was reportedly helped by his victory over Li Keqiang in a straw poll of senior officials. But Xi ended intra-Party voting after 2012 in favor of choosing new leadership lineups through elite interviews.

If Xi picks a successor, he will likely go through the motions of an orchestrated but seemingly rigorous selection process to bolster the legitimacy of the chosen cadre. He could also embed the choice in authoritative Party documents and make other leaders declare their assent, making it more difficult (or at least more awkward) to turn on the successor.

If Xi experiences a sudden health incident, there is no way to know what would happen next. Article 23 of the Party charter simply states that the general secretary is elected by a plenum of the Central Committee and must be drawn from the ranks of the Politburo Standing Committee (PSC). Xi's successor would likely, but not necessarily, be a current PSC member, because a plenum could technically add a new member and then make that person the general secretary.

But how would the Central Committee even convene a plenum without a general secretary? The Party Charter says that the Politburo is responsible for convening plenums, but it is the general secretary who is responsible for convening the Politburo. This legal conundrum lays bare the importance of informal power in determining political outcomes in Beijing.

History can be a guide to the future ...

The best account of the transition from Mao to Hua to Deng is Joseph Torigian's book Prestige, Manipulation, and Coercion, the title of which sets out the three key factors that matter for succession struggles in Leninist one-party regimes.

First, the importance of prestige means that victory often depends more on interpersonal authority than policy differences or economic interests. If we apply this theory to the case study of Xi's succession, we can examine the different networks that connect senior leaders below Xi.

Two potential rival networks of Xi loyalists seem to be emerging. The first is a group of officials connected to Fujian Province who either got to know Xi when he was a local leader there from 1985 to 2002 or worked with him there afterward, including Xi's chief of staff Cai Qi and new economic czar He Lifeng. The second is a group of officials with similar ties through Zhejiang Province, where Xi was leader from 2002 to 2007. Atop this group is Li Qiang, who, as premier, leads the work of the ministries in the State Council. However, we know little of the personal relationships between top leaders or the possible coherence of such networks without Xi. And, the longer Xi rules, the more of his longtime associates will retire into "Party elder" status and vie for post-Xi political influence with emerging "seventh generation" leaders born in the 1970s.

Second, victory depends on coercion. That is, gaining the support or control of the military, police, intelligence services, and other security-related ministries to enforce the succession. For Xi's succession, we might look at which networks of Xi followers appear well placed to leverage China's centers of coercive power.

One could argue that the Fujian network is best placed to deploy coercion. It likely includes top security official Chen Wenqing and Minister of Public Security Wang Xiaohong, as well as newly empowered Central Military Commission (CMC) Vice Chairman He Weidong and his fellow CMC member Miao Hua. Cai Qi's remit includes the Central Guard Bureau, which is responsible for the security of Party leaders. Chen Yixin, the minister of state security and a close colleague of Xi and Li Qiang in Zhejiang, could emerge as a rival powerbroker.

The third key factor, manipulation, means victory depends more on the ability to control the process of selection rather than playing to a defined "selectorate." However, while rules can be bent or even ignored, the appearance of legality, legitimacy, and stability is still important.

If Xi were to depart suddenly, who could best manipulate the process of selection? The situation would be extremely fluid, but a case can be made that Cai Qi – or someone in his position in the future – would play a role. Cai has an unusually central role in managing internal Party affairs as a PSC member who leads both the Central Secretariat and the General Office of the Central Committee. He would likely be the first senior leader to learn of any developments regarding Xi's health or decision-making.

The Party charter produces the legal conundrum discussed earlier, but Article 23 also establishes the Central Secretariat as the working body of the Politburo. In the absence of a general secretary, Cai could argue for a generous interpretation of this article that allows the Central Secretariat to call a Politburo meeting that then convenes a plenum.

An aspiring leader would not need universal support to pull this off. According to Article 25 of the Central Committee Work Regulations (which the General Office has the authority to interpret), only a majority of Politburo members must be present to hold a meeting. So, 13 Politburo members could convene a plenum. Article 24 says that a majority of Central Committee members then need to be present to hold a plenum. That is 103 members. Just half of those members are then needed to pass a decision. Thus, following the Party's own rules, one would theoretically need the support of only 52 Central Committee members to appoint a new general secretary. (This minimum condition assumes that the 52 Central Committee members include 13 Politburo members.)

However, executing such a plan would require many other things to go one's way, including control of the propaganda system, support from the military and security services, and rivals too weak or disorganized to challenge the move. Moreover, any new leader would prefer to come to power with the façade of unanimous support within the Party.

Another wildcard could be the vice president. Article 84 of the state constitution says that if the presidency becomes vacant, then the vice president becomes president. While the largely ceremonial presidency is easily the least important of Xi's three main roles, the new officeholder would hold constitutional powers to promulgate laws, appoint state leaders, grant special pardons, declare a state of emergency, and even declare war and issue mobilization orders.

However, the constitution says that the president exercises these powers "pursuant to decisions of the National People's Congress and the National People's Congress Standing Committee [NPCSC]." Still, an accidental president could still try to affect the succession process by blocking government action. If they collaborated with a powerful NPCSC chairman, they could use lawfare, new appointments, or emergency decrees to gain more leverage.

These thought exercises are not concrete forecasts, however, and they are most valuable as illustrations of the uncertainty and unpredictability of succession politics within the Party, especially if there is a sudden succession crisis or a move to depose an anointed yet unpopular successor.

Post-Succession Policies Will Depend on Xi's Level of Success

The history of succession politics in China points to the third major conjecture about Xi's succession. That history suggests the Party is more likely to continue Xi's policy agenda if China is on a positive trajectory when he leaves office, and more likely to depart from Xi's legacy if China is experiencing significant difficulties.

For example, strong elite and popular support for change emerged following Mao's passing in 1976 in a society traumatized by the chaos of the Cultural Revolution and the disaster of the Great Leap Forward. Hua Guofeng and then Deng Xiaoping embraced political loosening and economic reform.

Similarly, when Xi succeeded Hu in 2012, there was widespread social discontent with weak leadership, rampant corruption, and lax regulation, and Party insiders were alarmed by the disunity evident in the Bo Xilai scandal. A mood of crisis arguably helped Xi consolidate power.

It is impossible to say what China will look like by the time Xi's successor is determined. While pessimism is rising, and the country's growth trajectory will notably underperform its world-beating past, it is far from certain that China is destined for crisis or even for stagnation.

What is least likely to change after Xi is the continuation of CCP rule. The officials around Xi, whether they like him or not, have a vested interest in perpetuating the system that has defined their lives and careers. Not even the Cultural Revolution could convince cadres otherwise. Of course, Xi's departure would open a window for social protests, but the Party could probably still deploy its forbidding internal security forces to suppress dissent.

A successor will almost certainly owe much to Xi. They may lean into Xi's legacy to burnish their own legitimacy, at least at first, necessitating continued veneration for Xi Jinping Thought even if it is repurposed to advance different policy objectives, much as Deng did with Mao's legacy.

A successor is unlikely to enjoy Xi's same concentration of political authority, which would mean more power sharing, perhaps among different networks of Xi supporters. This could create a somewhat looser ideological environment with more room for policy debates and more decentralized governance. In that environment, Chinese society could become somewhat more open and tolerant.

An intriguing consideration that is leading some analysts to take a more optimistic view of China's political future is generational change – that is, future leaders may have different values, and so may govern differently. Research by Wei Shan and Juan Chen finds that young Chinese are more individualistic, more desiring of self-expression, and less compliant with authority figures. But they are also less likely to prefer democracy as a form of governance, probably because of propaganda, patriotic education, and growing political dysfunction in many democracies. Fundamentally, however, the study of generations cannot fully explain how an individual will respond to their times. Many people assumed that Xi's personal traumas during the Cultural Revolution and his professional experiences in the Reform and Opening era would make him a relatively liberal leader. They were wrong.

Economic policy is more fertile ground for anyone wishing to depart from Xi's legacy. Even senior policymakers today know that China's economy is facing unprecedented challenges, and Xi's preferences for security and control are affecting its performance.

After Xi, an elite consensus could conceivably emerge around shifting course on the economy and moving toward more market-oriented policy settings, stronger support for the private sector, greater openness to foreign firms, and new approaches such as household stimulus packages.

Foreign policy is less likely to change than economic policy. U.S.-China strategic competition increasingly resembles something like a new Cold War, wherein both Beijing and Washington view competition with the other as a foreign policy priority. This strategic dynamic would make it politically and practically difficult for any new leader to engineer a structural rapprochement with the United States, although they may pursue détente while Beijing seeks to address domestic challenges (like the path that Xi is currently pursuing with the United States).

However, a new leader could also feel the need for a show of force to boost their political status and prove their control of the military. Torigian shows how Deng did this by invading Vietnam in 1979; Xi arguably did something similar by leading China's response to the Diaoyu/Senkaku crisis in late 2012.

Xi's succession is unlikely to precipitate an extreme scenario like an invasion or blockade of Taiwan. But it raises the possibility of Chinese military actions, such as Sino-Indian border incursions, island reclamation in the South China Sea, or massive military exercises around Taiwan.

Conclusion

Predicting the future is hard. Foreign Policy published an article in 2017 claiming that Xi had already chosen his successor: Chen Min'er. Seven years later, Chen is not even on the PSC. Likewise, there is little chance that we can guess the precise process and result of China's next succession.

But analyzing the history, regulations, and structure of Chinese politics suggests we can have a higher degree of confidence in some more general projections. Xi is unlikely to anoint a successor anytime soon and may never settle on a durable plan. Whether a plan exists or not, the process will probably be influenced by personal rivalries, political machinations, and the security apparatus. Policy shifts will depend on China's situation at the time.

And Xi could rule for a long time yet. He would be 84 years old at the 23rd Party Congress in 2037. If Joe Biden wins the U.S. presidential election in 2024, he would be 86 at the end of his second term. Deng was 87 when he embarked on his landmark Southern Tour in 1992.

What is the likely impact if Xi effectively rules for life? Politics would become progressively less stable, as other leaders maneuver against each other in case of a sudden succession crisis. Decision-making could become increasingly personalistic and volatile. Policy would probably continue to emphasize national security, adopt state-heavy solutions to economic problems, and play into strategic competition with the United States and its allies and partners.

That assessment sounds bleak, but we should also remember the possibility of change. Julian Gewirtz has written of the need to avoid "historical determinism" about China's future. The uncertainties highlighted here underscore the dangers of assuming that China will always be like it is today.

After all, history is driven by a combination of individual leaders, institutional structures, economic constraints, social pressures, and international relations, all of which interact in ways that are fundamentally dynamic and difficult to foresee. Xi's legacy may endure with minor tweaks. Or China could see even stronger militarism, instability, and repression under its next leader. But there is also a chance that a new general secretary will move the Party toward more tolerant politics and more open markets.

While a wide range of succession scenarios are possible, one thing is clear: all of them have enormous geopolitical implications. Given the stakes, and despite the many uncertainties, the imperative to monitor and assess Xi's succession is more powerful than ever.

Tibet's Enduring Struggle: A Tale of Resilience and Hope

17 February 2024, RTV

A poignant tale of Tibet's embattled history, intertwining themes of resilience, cultural erosion, and geopolitical power play. Delve into the controversial saga of Tibetan sovereignty, spanning seven decades and leaving an indelible mark on the global conscience.

A tale of an embattled land, a story that intertwines history, politics, and human resilience. The occupation of Tibet by China is a narrative shrouded in controversy, a saga that has spanned over seven decades, leaving an indelible mark on the global conscience.

The Sovereignty Question: Treaties and Declarations

The roots of the Tibetan conflict trace back to the early 20th century. In 1913, the 13th Dalai Lama declared Tibet's independence following the fall of the Qing dynasty. This declaration was further solidified by the Simla Convention of 1914, a tripartite treaty between Britain, Tibet, and China, which recognized Tibet as an independent state. However, China's refusal to accept the treaty's terms and the subsequent political turmoil in China cast a shadow over Tibet's sovereignty.

Under the reign of the 13th Dalai Lama, Tibet embarked on a journey of modernization, establishing its first postal service, minting its own currency, and introducing modern education. These strides towards self-governance were met with resistance from China, culminating in the invasion of Tibet by the People's Liberation Army (PLA) in 1951.

The Post-1950 Aggression: Exile, Persecution, and Erosion of Identity

The Chinese occupation of Tibet marked a dark chapter in its history. The PLA's aggressive policies led to mass exile, with the current Dalai Lama seeking refuge in India in 1959. The ensuing decades saw the systematic erosion of Tibetan cultural identity, as China flooded the region with Chinese settlers, a move widely viewed as a strategy to Sinicize the Tibetans.

The Tibetan language, religious practices, and customs were suppressed, leading to what many term as cultural genocide. The situation escalated in the late 1980s and early 1990s, with widespread protests against Chinese rule resulting in brutal crackdowns and mass arrests.

The Water Factor: A Crucial Resource and its Geopolitical Implications

The Tibetan occupation is driven by more than just the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) desire for obedience. The Tibetan Plateau, often referred to as the 'third pole' due to its numerous glaciers, is the source of several major Asian rivers, including the Yellow and Yangtze. China's massive water problems, including pollution and mismanagement, have made control of Tibetan water resources crucial for the CCP's domestic power.

Moreover, the occupation has significant geopolitical implications. By controlling the water supply to Southeast Asia, India, and Pakistan, China potentially weaponizes it against these countries. This strategic leverage has become a critical point of contention in the region's political landscape.

As we stand in 2024, the Tibetan struggle for sovereignty continues, a testament to the resilience of a people fighting to preserve their culture and identity. The occupation of Tibet serves as a stark reminder of the complex interplay of politics, power, and resources in shaping the world's geopolitical landscape.

In the grand tapestry of human history, the Tibetan narrative is a poignant thread, a tale of resilience and hope amidst adversity. As journalists, it is our responsibility to shed light on such stories, to ensure that the voices of the oppressed are heard, and the actions of the powerful are scrutinized.

Why Pakistan's unstable coalition won't faze China, IMF: 'everyone understands army is in charge'

16 February 2024, South China Morning Post

Pakistan's coalition government formed after a deeply controversial election is not expected to last, analysts said, but major creditors such as China and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) will stay the course on current ties despite concerns over further instability.

After the February 8 polls, the country's powerful military-led establishment herded together six political parties to form the next government – an arrangement observers say is likely to unravel long before its five-year term is up.

"There are plenty of reasons to think this government won't last long," said Michael Kugelman, director of the South Asia Institute at the Wilson Centre, a Washington-based think tank.

There is friction between the two biggest partners in the incoming coalition – the Pakistan Muslim League-Nawaz (PML-N) of three-time former prime minister Nawaz Sharif and ex-president Asif Ali Zardari's Pakistan People's Party (PPP).

The new government would also be under intense pressure from jailed ex-leader Imran Khan's Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf (PTI) party, which backed independent candidates comprising the single largest grouping in the National Assembly.

Despite being imprisoned, the former cricket star could still upset the applecart by ordering the PTI to boycott parliament, or by confronting the new government and its military overseers with violent public protests against reportedly widespread electoral fraud.

Few Pakistani governments have served out their full terms and no prime minister ever has. Honeymoons have often given way to "ugly divorces" between the civilian and military leaderships, Kugelman noted.

Additionally, the new multiparty coalition will be "unwieldy and weak, and led by parties that don't get along".

"This could all doom it to failure," he warned.

However, Kugelman said while Pakistan needed renewed, multi-year financial help from the IMF to prevent it from defaulting on its international debt and trade payments – like Sri Lanka did in 2022 – the prospects for a new deal "won't be damaged by the election controversies" as long as the Washington-based lender "believes Islamabad is committed to seeing through economic reforms".

During the new coalition's first few weeks in power, the civilian and military leaderships are "likely to be of one mind in supporting reforms, though for political reasons, [it] may drag its feet and resist new austerity measures".

For both political and economic reasons, the government and military will have a "strong incentive" to "ensure unrest over widespread electoral fraud is limited", Kugelman said.

According to veteran Pakistani political journalist Nusrat Javed, the leaders of the PML-N and PPP only agreed to join hands under duress from the military establishment.

"They were given an ultimatum to either agree on a candidate for prime minister by Wednesday or have one foisted upon them," he said in a recent television appearance.

Late on Tuesday, they chose deputy PML-N leader Shehbaz Sharif, who led a similar coalition government that replaced Khan's PTI administration after a vote of no-confidence in April 2022 and held office until last October.

"In the end, Pakistan's establishment got exactly what it wanted: a weak coalition led by the military's preferred parties, and susceptible to the military's influence," Kugelman said.

If Shehbaz does head the next Pakistani government, "that could give it a lifeline", given that he historically has had good relations with the military, Kugelman added. But a pliant leader "may not be enough" to ensure the government's survival, according to Kugelman, especially if the coalition becomes increasingly strained.

General understanding

While concerned by the prospect of greater instability, the IMF and foreign investors are not likely to be fazed by Pakistan's domestic political shenanigans, analysts say.

The IMF is "well aware who's in charge, and based on what we have seen during the last six months, it appears they don't have any issues with that set-up", said Mattias Martinsson, chief investment officer of Tundra Fonder, a Swedish asset management firm focused on frontier and emerging markets.

"Given where we are, in terms of sentiment and valuations, I think there are very few foreign investors that were expecting anything other than what now appears to be the outcome," he said. "Everyone understands that the army is in charge. Whoever formally represents them carries less significance."

Financial markets are “cynical, and reward stability and predictability”. It appears the market has “got that in some form, thus I expect an improvement from here”, albeit from extremely low levels, Martinsson added.

The Pakistani military’s stern oversight will also be reassuring to the country’s other major creditors China, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates (UAE), analysts said.

Although greatly concerned by the legitimacy and longevity of the new Pakistani government, they are expected to continue supporting it with financial assistance and through strategic investments.

China “wants a strong, cohesive and stable Pakistan which can best partner with it as a reliable ally in South Asia”, said Mustafa Hyder, executive director of the Pakistan-China Institute in Islamabad.

“A Pakistan with fault lines is a Pakistan that China would definitely be concerned about” because it would mean further inconsistency of policies and instability.

“It would mean a not-as-robust partnership because of Pakistan’s potentially fractured domestic body-politic,” Hyder said.

But he added that “the question mark” about the sustainability and longevity of the incoming government “should not impede China’s perspective on supporting Pakistan”, financially or otherwise, because its relationship “is with the state of Pakistan”.

Irrespective of whichever government is in Islamabad, there “is a clear consensus” in Pakistan, both in the civil and in the military leadership, “on our relationship with China”, according to Hyder.

This special relationship is expected to persuade Beijing “to be forthcoming about reinvigorating” the multibillion-dollar China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), an envisioned US$60 billion programme of President Xi Jinping’s Belt and Road Initiative.

China has financed and built about US$28 billion of mostly power generation and infrastructure projects under CPEC since 2016. They were instrumental in overcoming Pakistan’s massive power shortages and improving overland connectivity between the Chinese-operated port of Gwadar on Pakistan’s western Indian Ocean coast and the Xinjiang region. Hyder said Beijing would be encouraged by the expected reappointment as prime minister of Shahbaz, who “has been a force-multiplier for CPEC” since the programme was launched.

Concerns in the Middle East

Like China, Saudi Arabia and the UAE are “undoubtedly somewhat unnerved by the tumultuous and controversial election with its dubious results”, said Hussein Ibish, a senior resident scholar of the Arab Gulf States Institute in Washington.

The disputed Pakistan election result “leaves too much room for instability” among Pakistan’s civilian political class and government “for the tastes of its stability and security-minded Gulf Arab allies”.

Pakistan has long-standing agreements with Saudi Arabia and several of its neighbours to militarily intervene if its territorial integrity were to be endangered by any foreign power.

Ibish said the Gulf monarchies were “highly supportive” of the regional and global status quo, and “do not welcome unrest, particularly in a vital nuclear power” in the Indian Ocean basin, which was also a leading trade partner for them.

Pakistan and India possess formidable nuclear arsenals of similar size.

But anxiety about Pakistani politics “is nothing new” to the Gulf Arab states, he said.

Instead, there is a sense among them that if the situation in Pakistan “really do start to go off the rails”, a return to military rule is “always a distinct possibility”.

That would “not necessarily be unwelcome” in Gulf Arab countries that prefer “stable and predictable autocrats over the chaos” produced by polarised and corrupt democratic civilian systems such as Pakistan’s, Ibish said.

So their concerns about the longevity of the incoming Sharif-led coalition government “won’t necessarily” make Riyadh and Abu Dhabi reluctant to extend further financial assistance to Islamabad, or to go ahead with planned strategic investments in Pakistan’s state-owned firms coming up for privatisation.

“That the Pakistani military has served as a backstop against utter chaos, and presumably would do so again if need be, serves as a reassuring idea” that suggests investments even directly within Pakistan itself “will not be fundamentally threatened or altogether lost”, Ibish said.

Financial assistance “may be smiled upon” by the Gulf Arab states “as a way of helping to stabilise Pakistan”, which will be in their interests, he said.

“Much depends on Pakistan’s policies as well as perceived stability,” said Ibish. “If Pakistan continues to act as a largely helpful player, it can expect ongoing support at a fairly high level, at least comparable to recent levels.”

The regional impact of Pakistan’s muddled election would be modest, analysts said.

Foreign policy is in the military’s ambit so Pakistan’s approach to its neighbours after the next government comes to power will be “tethered more to what the army wants to do than to what the new civilian leadership wants to do”, according to Kugelman.

India is currently focused on its general election in May and “not at all interested” in outreach to Pakistan, no matter who leads the next government in Islamabad, he added.

Likewise, Pakistan's border tensions with Afghanistan and Iran "won't be impacted" by the election.

Still, the next Pakistani government will have "a major challenge on its hands" trying to manage those tensions even while dealing with severe economic stress and fending off pressure from a PTI-led opposition, Kugelman said.

Uyghurs Continue to Oppose "Genocide Tours" to Xinjiang

16 February 2024, Bitter Winter

I met Rushan Abbas, the founder and executive director of Campaign for Uyghurs, at the admirable International Religious Freedom Summit in Washington DC, where she and I were both speakers. We discussed developments in Xinjiang (which its non-Han-Chinese inhabitants prefer to call East Turkistan) and how Chinese propaganda is at work to deny the genocide that is happening there. Different kinds of "useful idiots" are mobilized internationally. Others in the West, however, are not necessarily moved by ideology. They simply found a way of making money out of a genocide.

Abbas criticized in particular the "genocide tourism" promoted by travel companies in the U.S., Europe, and Australia, denounced by two reports of the Uyghur Human Rights Projects (UHRP), published respectively in August 2023 and January 2024. While some travel companies have direct links to pro-Chinese lobbies and organizations, others do not. They are just interested in selling for significant money "unique travel experiences" to their customers. Abbas told me that this is a subtle, yet extremely dangerous way of manipulating the Western public opinion and normalizing the genocide.

Massimo Introvigne and Rushan Abbas at the 2024 International Religious Freedom Summit in Washington DC.

The UHRP second report analyzes and names eighteen European travel companies from France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, in addition to another ten tour operators from the UK, the U.S., and Australia listed in the first report. There is nothing "adventurous" in the trips they propose. They are carefully monitored by the Chinese authorities, and organized in cooperation with them. Destroyed mosques and Islamic cemeteries are carefully avoided.

Tourists are told that they will become familiar with the ancient Uyghur identity, with the implication that China is not repressing it. This is, however, a lie. "The Uyghur identity on display in East Turkistan," states the first UHRP report, "is that which has been permitted by the Chinese state. What the Chinese state has left of public expressions of Uyghur identity has remained for commodification and exploitation not only by visitors on tours from overseas, but also domestic tourists. By visiting these simulacra of Uyghurness, the travel company and visitor on an organized tour are complicit in the denial of the Uyghur people to define their own identity. In addition, tourism is a primary means with which the Chinese state territorializes and securitizes East Turkistan. The tourist presence coerces Uyghurs to perform a revisioned version of their culture, history, and religion as the security apparatus of the state maintains this fictional depiction."

A special scandal of the "genocide tours" is that some of them lead tourists to visit "the homes of Uyghur families," carefully selected by the regime. These are visits, says the second UHRP report, "which families are in no position to refuse given the environment of securitization and state control. This represents a significant violation of privacy and perpetuates the surveillance programs that have been carried out in Uyghur homes. As an example, the French travel company Hasamélis, as part of its La Route de la Soie Chinoise tour, offers dinner in Turpan with a Uyghur family in their home. Other companies offering home visits include EMS Voyage [France], Shiraz Travel Tours [Italy], and Viatgi [Spain]."

Taking tourists to visit "Uyghur family homes" in a context of genocide may not be so much different from a travel agency who would have offered tours to Nazi Germany to visit the homes of more or less genuine Jewish families, which would have assured the naive visitors that all was well for the Jews there.

Cover of the first UHRP report.

"By bringing tourists to East Turkistan, these travel companies are implicitly supporting the normalization of genocidal Chinese government policies aimed at eradicating the Uyghur identity, further denying the Uyghur people the ability to define 'Uyghurness' for themselves," the UHRP concludes. "UHRP is clear in its message: we are urging international travel companies in North America, Europe, and Australia to cease profiteering from genocide. We do not advocate for a ban on [individual] travel to East Turkistan, leaving the decision to visit the region to the conscience of the individual traveler. We recommend travel companies and trade associations call for an end to tours to East Turkistan and to increase due diligence processes and human rights compliance in line with international standards. Travel companies have the opportunity to turn from selling 'Genocide Tours' to becoming Uyghur allies through publicly canceling tours and condemning China's crimes against humanity."

Explained: China's 'Xiaokang' border defence villages along the LAC, now being occupied

15 February 2024, The Indian Express

The Chinese people have started occupying several of the country's model 'Xiaokang' border defence villages, along its border with India's northeastern region.

Since 2019, China has been building villages along the Line of Actual Control (LAC), which separates India and China, but they were unoccupied until a few months ago.

Some villages along the LAC, and opposite the Lohit Valley and the Tawang sector of Arunachal Pradesh, are now being occupied by residents, The Indian Express has learnt from officials.

What are these Xiaokang border defence villages?

China has been constructing 628 such Xiaokang or "well-off villages" along India's borders with the Tibet Autonomous Region for over five years now. These have been constructed all along the LAC, including the Ladakh and Arunachal Pradesh borders.

The structures include mostly double-storey, large and spacious buildings. The construction for most of these planned villages has already been completed, as per officials.

The exact purposes of these villages have remained unclear, but they were understood to be dual-use infrastructure — can be used both for civil and military purposes — and have thus been a concern from a defence perspective. The strategic community looks at it as a way to assert Chinese claims over certain areas along the LAC.

Notably, the exact extent of the LAC has been a source of contention between the two countries for years. India considers it to be 3,488 km long, while China says it is around 2,000 km.

Has any law been introduced concerning these villages?

A new law on China's land borders was brought into effect from January 1, 2022. The law was passed in 2021 by the Standing Committee of China's National People's Congress (which is China's rubber-stamp Parliament), for the "protection and exploitation of the country's land border areas".

China's official news agency Xinhua stated: "The law also stipulates that the state shall take measures to strengthen border defense, support economic and social development as well as opening-up in border areas, improve public services and infrastructure in such areas, encourage and support people's life and work there, and promote coordination between border defense and social, economic development in border areas".

Thus, this border law covers the border defence villages programme.

How is India responding to it?

The Indian government announced the Vibrant Villages Programme in 2022 to develop its border villages into modern villages with all amenities and as tourist attractions. The programme builds on the existing Border Area Development Programme (BADP) under the Union Ministry of Home Affairs.

Under the programme, India plans to develop 663 border villages into modern villages in the first phase. Of them, at least 17 such border villages along the borders with China in Ladakh, Himachal Pradesh, Uttarakhand, Sikkim and Arunachal Pradesh, have been selected for development as a pilot project.

In Arunachal Pradesh, villages in the eastern part of the state and the Tawang region have been identified such as Zemithang, Taksing, Chayang Tajo, Tuting and Kibithu.

What other infrastructure is being developed by China along India's northeast?

China has been constantly building infrastructure all along the LAC, including in Arunachal Pradesh's Tawang region and the Siang Valley.

This includes the construction of new roads and bridges to improve connectivity through the passes. China has also been constructing houses and other infrastructure in Bhutanese territory.

India has also focused on strengthening its border infrastructure and improving forward connectivity with the construction of new roads, bridges, and helipads. There has also been a push to develop alternate routes to the LAC and improve inter-valley connectivity in the northeast.

Why China Isn't Blowing Up Over the Deaths of Fishermen That Taiwanese Forces Chased Away

15 February 2024, Time

Two Chinese fishermen drowned off the coast of Kinmen, a group of islands that sit just six miles from mainland China, after being chased by Taiwanese maritime forces on Wednesday—marking what Taiwan's Coast Guard Administration says is the first of its actions to have caused deaths. But China's response to the tragedy, which some suggested could be used to escalate tensions already simmering around the island's sovereignty, has been uncharacteristically restrained.

A Taiwanese coast guard statement Wednesday said the unnamed, mainland-China-registered boat had crossed a maritime border and failed to stop for inspection, instead speeding away from its patrol. The fishing boat capsized during the pursuit and four of its crew members fell into the sea, two of whom were rescued while the other two lost consciousness and died.

China was not happy. Zhu Fenglian, spokesperson for the Taiwan Affairs Office of the State Council in Beijing, condemned Taiwan for "such a vicious incident," which also, China noted, happened during Lunar New Year celebrations. Zhu blamed Taiwan's Democratic People's Party—which is pro-independence and recently won another presidential term leading the island—alleging that its officials have long mistreated fishermen from the mainland and forcefully and dangerously seized mainland fishing boats, a pattern it claims led to the recent deaths.

"We warn the relevant parties in Taiwan to respect the historical fact that fishermen from both sides of the Taiwan Strait operate in the traditional fishing areas of the Taiwan Strait and ensure the personal safety of mainland fishermen, effectively preventing the recurrence of such incidents," said Zhu.

Taiwan's coast guard said that fishing boats, such as the one in question this week, that have "no name, no ship certificate, and no ship registration" are "a common concern of cross-strait collaborative law enforcement," Taiwan's government-owned Central News Agency reported.

"We deeply regret that the mainland crew refused to cooperate with our law enforcement work and this unfortunate incident occurred," Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council said in a statement on Thursday.

The deaths sparked outrage among the Chinese public. On Weibo, posts about the incident have garnered over 50 million views. In particular, some social media users are taking the chance to air nationalist sentiments, calling for retaliation against Taiwan, which Chinese authorities have long claimed—sometimes with threats of violence—as part of China.

"This is blatant provocation," one Weibo user wrote, in a post that has garnered over 1,500 likes. "If it's not possible to attack Taiwan now, it's not difficult to severely punish Taiwan's for its evil deeds, given our current strength."

China's official reaction, however, has been relatively "muted" considering the incident concerns Taiwan, Benjamin Ho, coordinator of the China Programme at the S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies in Singapore, tells TIME. And despite the clamor, he says, China is unlikely to escalate the matter.

Chin-Hao Huang, author of Power and Restraint in China's Rise and associate professor of political science at the National University of Singapore, tells TIME that one reason why China's response has been somewhat tempered may be due to a "tacit recognition" of the illegal actions of the fishing boat.

"In terms of legality, it is clear who's in the wrong here—who actually trespassed and operated a vessel without the proper registration," he says. "There's an understanding and recognition too, from the Chinese side, that you can't really press this case further because there's no legal grounding for them to issue a tough and harsh statement."

Ho also cautions that fishermen casualties would not rank high in China's priorities. "It's probably not going to rank as heavily as if a Chinese jet would be shot down, or even a drone," he says.

Taiwan has a history of apprehending fishermen from the mainland entering its waters. In September 2023, the Taiwanese Coast Guard detained the crew of a fishing vessel spotted 16 nautical miles off Hua Islet, Taiwan's westernmost islet. Fishing vessels and fishermen have historically been used by Chinese authorities as a way to solidify Beijing's claims to disputed waters, especially in the South China Sea.

While the Taiwan Strait has long been home to political tensions, fatalities resulting from the ongoing territorial rows are virtually unheard of. A pair of deadly maritime disasters involving Taiwanese authorities and mainland Chinese fishermen made headlines in 1990, when a fishing boat repatriating 50 illegal Chinese immigrants back to the mainland was hit by a Taiwanese naval vessel at sea, killing 21 on board the boat; that came just weeks after 25 Chinese immigrants died of suffocation while being repatriated to mainland China, after Taiwanese authorities forced them into boat cabins that were then sealed shut.

Already strained relations between China and Taiwan were thrown into greater uncertainty after the DPP's William Lai Ching-te won the presidency in Taiwan's January election. While it remains too early to tell if Beijing will up its belligerence against the island it claims as its own, the level of restraint it has shown this week may offer a glimpse into a broader strategy going forward that may prioritize diplomacy over conflict.

"In the grand scheme of things," says Huang, "I think maybe, in Beijing's calculations, this shouldn't torpedo the larger effort China may have to ... encourage Taiwan to return to more functional collaboration."

Tibetan Legacy: Under the Dragon's Gaze

15 February 2024, Bharat Shakti

Tibetan history is a roller-coaster ride, with Tibet at some stages dominating the region while at others being subjected to foreign rule and even a protectorate status. Currently, it's undergoing a focused and systematic Sinicization attempt, with Beijing bent upon ensuring that these proud people lose their identity and get absorbed in the Chinese cultural milieu. The following piece provides an insight into the Chinese design of the ongoing assimilation campaign.

At Strategic Crossroads

Perched atop the "Roof of the World," Tibet's strategic significance stems from its unique geo-cultural position. Nestled between the vast emptiness of the erstwhile Soviet Union to the west and the burgeoning empires of India and China to the south and north, it has acted as a cultural sponge, absorbing and transmitting influences for millennia. This constant ebb and flow – Buddhist philosophies from India, artistic styles from China, nomadic traditions from the steppes – has woven a rich tapestry into the very fabric of Tibetan identity. Yet, its strategic allure has also brought political turmoil as empires vied for control of this critical Himalayan gateway, shaping not just its borders but also the complex interplay of cultures that defines Tibet's enduring legacy.

Glorious History

Tibet's history sparkles with periods of immense political, military and cultural brilliance, starting with the reign of Songtsen Gampo in the 7th century. His vision saw the unification of disparate Tibetan tribes, laying the foundation for a vast empire. Through strategic marriages and military prowess, he extended Tibetan influence from the Caspian Sea to the borders of China, controlling the silk route and thereby establishing a golden age for Tibet. In 763, Tibetan forces briefly held sway in Xian, the capital of the great Tang Empire of China and placed an emperor of their own choice on the Chinese throne. The first ever treaty between the Chinese and Tibetans was signed in 783 which fixed the boundary between the two at the eastern edge of the present-day Gansu province.

Bon and Buddhist traditions flourished, with the latter finding its expression in the iconic Jokhang Temple and the Potala Palace, architectural wonders that continue to awe. This era also witnessed the adoption of a written script, solidifying Tibetan identity and paving the way for a literary renaissance. This golden age resonated for centuries, leaving an indelible mark on the Tibetan psyche and shaping its unique cultural identity.

Mongol and the Chinese Influence

However, Tibet could not sustain its glory beyond the 12th century due to internal power struggles and external threats that constantly marred the Tibetan landscape. In 1207, the Tibetans acquiesced to the Mongols, who subsequently appointed the Sakya head lama (later christened Dalai Lama) as their Viceroy in Lhasa. In 1279, with the establishment of the Mongol Yuan dynasty in China, Tibet became a part of the Mongolian empire and remained so for about a century. Tibet regained its independence as the Ming dynasty came to power in China. Later, the Dzungar Mongols gained ascendancy in Tibet, and it took the Chinese Qing dynasty to intervene militarily in 1718-19 to oust them.

Claiming this as a "conquest" of Tibet, the Qing placed two residents with a body of troops at Lhasa. The Dalai Lama was established in a position of full temporal power and ruled Tibet as a Qing "protectorate". Although internally, Tibet continued to enjoy almost full autonomy as Chinese law, language, and writing systems were not applied in Tibet. This arrangement continued well into the 20th century; barring a few hostile incidents between the Chinese and the Tibetans, the arrangement ran well.

A Pawn in the Great Game

The British, who understood the strategic importance of Tibet, more so given the increasing rivalry with the Russians to exercise control over Central Asia, tried to establish diplomatic and business relations with Tibet. However, China did not allow the British overtures to succeed. The British finally launched the "Younghusband Expedition" in 1904, which resulted in directly signing a treaty with the Tibetans. This treaty was followed by the signing of the Sino-British convention in 1906 regarding the status of Tibet. The British brokered another tripartite treaty in 1914, the "Shimla Convention", to mediate the growing dispute between China and Tibet and to define the India-Tibet border. The Chinese reluctantly joined the convention and initiated the draft but refused to sign the final version, which they refused to acknowledge to date.

The Nationalist Government of China, which succeeded the Qing Empire, also claimed sovereignty over Tibet, Mongolia, and Sinkiang. Nevertheless, Article 120 of its constitution, drafted in 1949, stated, "The self-government system of Tibet shall be safeguarded".

As the communists came to power after defeating the nationalists, they launched an invasion to "liberate" Tibet in October 1950, forcing the Dalai Lama to succumb and sign a treaty. This treaty, signed in May 1951, also agreed to respect the status quo regarding Tibet.

Systematic Sinicization

Immediately after the occupation of Tibet, the Chinese Communist Party members, government officials, and masses of Chinese immigrants started coming into Tibet. They slowly began impacting politics, religion, language and economics. The Tibetans resented this trend and caused the "Khampa Rebellion" of 1958, followed by a declaration of independence by the Tibetans, repudiating the 1951 agreement. This uprising was put down with a heavy hand, and the Dalai Lama fled to India, ceding the political space to the communists.

The "Cultural Revolution", like in other parts of China, had a disastrous impact on Tibet wherein thousands of ordinary people and monks were imprisoned, almost all the monasteries and temples closed or destroyed, and a system of communes introduced, which affected the very core of Tibetan society, religion, and economy.

Since then, China has been making immense effort to integrate Tibetan culture and society with that of China, thereby raising serious concerns about the erosion of Tibetan language, religion, and identity. While Tibetan remains an official language, Mandarin now dominates education and administration. Similarly, religious practices face limitations as monasteries are subject to increased surveillance.

Uncertain Future

Beijing's current stance offers little hope for concessions on Tibetan autonomy, be it administrative or religious, as promised in the past. The Chinese government, under Xi Jinping's leadership, seems unwilling even to engage in dialogue with the Dalai Lama, whom all Tibetans recognise as their spiritual and temporal leader. This hardening stance has only intensified efforts to assimilate Tibet into the fabric of China.

These stark realities cast a long and uncertain shadow on the future of Tibet. Concerns loom large, particularly regarding selecting the Dalai Lama's successor and the ongoing assimilation campaign. The coming years will be pivotal as a crucible determining whether Tibet's rich legacy endures. Can the unwavering spirit of its people, its dedication to cultural preservation, and the steadfast support of the international community stand firm in the face of these looming uncertainties? Only time will tell.

Why China Wants to Be Asia's Only UN Security Council Member

15 February 2024, NewsWeek

China's stance on being the sole Asian representative in the United Nations Security Council has come into sharper focus following Russia's robust endorsement of India's bid for permanent membership earlier this month.

The Russian ambassador to India, Denis Alipov, has extended support to New Delhi's aspiration to the UNSC permanent seat, saying Saturday in an interview with Russian state media outlet, Russia Today: "We are of the view that India as a permanent member of the Security Council could make a significant contribution to promoting balance as well as an agenda focused on the interests of the world majority, primarily the countries of the Global South."

With Russia's backing, India's bid now faces opposition solely from China within the five permanent members group, highlighting Beijing's determination to remain the exclusive Asian power within it. But India's candidature could also face opposition from other non-permanent members of the UNSC.

This development occurs against the backdrop of heightened tensions and rivalry between China and India, both vying for leadership within the developing world. New Delhi increasingly considers Beijing a challenge to its geopolitical interests, while the former has developed close ties with Washington. China and India have clashed over their border dispute in the Eastern Ladakh region since June 2020. The ongoing border stand-off, now in its fourth year, continues to bear down on their bilateral relationship.

India's Minister of External Affairs, Dr Subramanyam Jaishankar, said in Perth, Australia, that India will certainly achieve the target of joining the UNSC as a permanent member, India's new agency, The Press Trust of India, reported on February 10.

"We will get there. I am 100 percent certain we will get there. But I will also tell you that honestly, we will not get it easily because the world is full of competition," Jaishankar said.

The process for reforming the U.N. Security Council is stringent, requiring the support of at least nine of its 15 members and the acquiescence of all five permanent members: Britain, China, France, Russia, and the United States.

Analysts suggest that China's opposition is rooted in its ambition to be the singular Asian representative among the council's permanent members.

Ashok Kantha, India's former ambassador to China from 2014 to 2016, told Newsweek that Beijing has made efforts to thwart New Delhi's candidature to the coveted UNSC while giving passive assurances.

Newsweek reached out to China's embassy in New Delhi for comment.

"However, in practice, we have found that China has actively obstructed any restructuring of the UNSC and our efforts run into the Great Wall of China's opposition. We have interpreted the Chinese behavior as the lack of support for the rise of India and its aspirations, notwithstanding formal assurances to the contrary," Kantha said.

"China is not inclined to share the space with another developing country and would like to preserve its status as the only non-western country that is a permanent member of the UNSC."

Kanti Bajpai, a professor and Wilmar chair of Asian Studies at the National University of Singapore, told Newsweek that China may try to build consensus among other middle powers to stall India's quest for a UNSC seat.

"China will certainly invoke the middle powers argument. Namely, there is a range of middle powers that would not support India, Japan, and Germany, and until there is more consensus, it would be inappropriate to admit these three powers as permanent members," Bajpai said.

"Singapore is very cautious and will not break with the rest of ASEAN on this. A lot, therefore, depends on key players in ASEAN. For Singapore, that means Indonesia and Malaysia. New Delhi has not paid much attention to the region after Modi's first term and has done quite a lot of things to annoy it (including not joining RCEP)," he added.

Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP) is a free trade agreement among the nations in the Indo-Pacific, which New Delhi decided to sit out despite prolonged negotiations to join the trading bloc.

Chinese state media have said the United States' proposed reforms to the UNSC, including India's seat at the table, are driven by geopolitical interests rather than genuine calls for reforming the body.

"Japan and India are the two poles of Washington's China-targeted "Indo-Pacific" strategy, Germany is the center of Europe to deal with Russia, and Brazil is the No 1 country in the US' backyard of Latin America. It can be said that this is largely a deployment against China and Russia," an op-ed by Chinese state media outlet China Daily said last year. Despite Moscow's support for New Delhi, China's opposition to India's seat is unlikely to change. The challenges to Security Council reform are manifold, including the formidable task of amending the U.N. Charter, which experts believe will be challenging to achieve.

In the broader debate over Security Council reform, various countries and regional blocs have proposed modifications to make the body more representative and regionally balanced.

Nations such as Italy, Argentina, the Republic of Korea, Mexico, and Pakistan, alongside the African Union, have also expressed interest in reform plans or sought to become permanent members, according to the China Daily op-ed. However, these proposals have not garnered the necessary support from key players, including the United States, the publication said.

"China will certainly urge these countries to oppose Indian membership or, at the very least, it will argue that these countries are not comfortable with Indian membership and that, therefore, India does not deserve a seat," Bajpai told Newsweek while commenting on other countries aspiring to take up UNSC seat.

"China would also use its influence in the Global South to oppose India. India's recent loss in UNESCO to Pakistan shows that India's support in the Global South may, in any case, be shaky. China will exploit this," he added.

Why global firms are looking to exit China's Xinjiang

15 February 2024, Times of India

China on Thursday urged companies not to be "blinded by lies" over its human rights record in Xinjiang, after German automaker Volkswagen said it was discussing the future of its activities in the troubled region.

In a statement sent to AFP, Beijing's foreign ministry said allegations of abuses in the region were "entirely a lie concocted with the aim of destabilising Xinjiang" and urged firms "to distinguish right from wrong and not be blinded by lies".

Volkswagen cars blocked by US customs

German automaker Volkswagen has said that several of its models had been refused entry into the United States, after it emerged that a Chinese-made component may have breached labour laws.

"We are working to rectify a delay in delivering certain Volkswagen Group vehicles from ports to dealers due to a customs issue," Volkswagen said in a statement.

The trouble related to a "small electronic component", which was "in the process of being replaced", Volkswagen said.

The part, said to be from "western China", was found to be in breach of US anti-forced labour laws, according to a report by the Financial Times.

Ban on imports

The US has banned most imports from Xinjiang, in western China, unless companies offer verifiable proof that production did not involve forced labour.

Rights campaigners have for years accused Beijing of a brutal crackdown against the Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities in Xinjiang, including through forced labour and detention camps. Beijing denies the allegations of abuse.

The issue of forced labour is acutely sensitive for Volkswagen, which has long been plagued by questions over its factory in the region, operated by its local partner SAIC.

Xinjiang is home to numerous factories that supply multinational companies, including big-name Western brands.

How America is failing to break up with China

13 February 2024, The Hindustan Times

WHEN IT COMES to tracing the geography of global supply chains, few companies provide a better map than Foxconn, the world's largest contract manufacturer. This year the Taiwanese giant has built or expanded factories in India, Mexico, Thailand and Vietnam. The Chinese production sites once loved by Western companies are firmly out of fashion. Souring relations between the governments in Washington and Beijing have made businesses increasingly fretful about geopolitical risks. As a consequence, in the first half of the year, America traded more with Mexico and Canada than it did with China for the first time in almost two decades. The map of global trade is being redrawn.

At first glance, this is almost exactly as desired by America's policymakers. Under first Donald Trump and then Joe Biden, officials have put in place an array of tariffs, rules and subsidies. The latest arrived on August 9th: an executive order introducing screening for outbound investment, and banning some investment into Chinese quantum computing, artificial-intelligence projects and advanced chips. America wants to weaken China's grip on sensitive industries and, in a motivation that mostly goes unspoken, prepare for a possible invasion of Taiwan by its adversary. This attempt to "de-risk" trade with China is the cornerstone of the White House's foreign policy. Yet despite extensive efforts, and the reshaping of trade seemingly evident in headline statistics, much of the apparent de-risking is not what it appears.

Instead of being slashed, trade links between America and China are enduring—just in more tangled forms. The American government's preferred trading partners include countries such as India, Mexico, Taiwan and Vietnam, in which it hopes to spur the "friendshoring" of production to replace imports that would have come from China. And trade with these allies is rising fast: just 51% of American imports from "low-cost" Asian countries came from China last year, down from 66% when the Trump administration's first tariffs were introduced five years ago, according to Kearney, a consultancy. The problem is that trade between America's allies and China is also rising, suggesting that they are often acting as packaging hubs for what, in effect, remain Chinese goods. This flow of products means that, although America may not be buying as much directly from China as before, the two countries' economies still rely on each other.

For evidence, look at the countries that benefit from reduced direct Chinese trade with America. Research by Caroline Freund of the University of California, San Diego and co-authors investigates this dynamic. It finds that countries which had the strongest trade relationships with China in a given industry have been the greatest beneficiaries of the redirection of trade, suggesting deep Chinese supply chains still matter enormously to America. This is even truer in categories that include the advanced manufacturing products where American officials are keenest to limit China's presence. When it comes to these goods, the share of American imports arriving from China declined by 14 percentage points between 2017 and 2022, whereas those from Taiwan and Vietnam—countries that import heavily from China—gained the greatest market share. In short, Chinese activity is still vital to the production of even the most sensitive products.

Exactly how the rerouting works in practice differs across countries and industries. A few products can be sourced only in China. These include some processed rare earths and metals where Chinese companies dominate entire industries, such as the gallium used in chip production and the lithium processed for electric-vehicle batteries. Sometimes exports to America and the rest of the West from their allies are nothing more than Chinese products that have been repackaged to avoid tariffs. Most often, though, inputs are simply mechanical or electrical parts that could be found elsewhere at greater cost by an assiduous importer, but are cheaper and more plentiful in China.

Pass the parcel

All three types of phoney decoupling can be found in China's backyard. The latest official data, published in 2018, concerning exports by the Association of South-East Asian Nations (ASEAN), a regional club, show that 7% by value were actually attributable to some form of production in China—a figure that is probably an underestimate, given how difficult it is to disentangle trade. Fresher data suggest that China has only grown in importance since then. The country has increased its share of exports to the bloc in 69 of 97 product categories monitored by ASEAN. Electronic exports, the largest category, which covers everything from batteries and industrial furnaces to hair clippers, have exploded. In the first six months of the year, Chinese sales of these goods in Indonesia, Malaysia, Thailand, the Philippines and Vietnam rose to $49bn, up by 80% compared with five years ago. There is a similar pattern in foreign direct investment, where Chinese spending in crucial Southeast Asian countries has overtaken America's. Factories farther afield are also humming with Chinese activity, perhaps most notably in the car industry. In Mexico the National Association of Autopart Makers, a lobby group, has reported that last year 40% of nearshoring investment came from sites moving to the country from China. A rich supply of intermediate goods is duly following. In the past year, Chinese companies exported $300m a month in parts to Mexico, more than twice the amount they managed five years ago. In central and eastern Europe, where the car industry has boomed in recent years, phoney decoupling is even more conspicuous. In 2018 China provided just 3% of automotive parts brought into the Czech Republic, Hungary, Poland, Slovakia, Slovenia and Romania. Since then, Chinese imports have surged, thanks to the rapid adoption of electric vehicles, where the country increasingly dominates production. China now provides 10% of all car parts imported into central and eastern Europe, more than any other country outside the EU. Tighter trade links between America's allies and China are the paradoxical result of America's desire for weaker ones. Firms panicked by worsening relations across the Pacific are pursuing "China plus one" strategies, keeping some production in the world's second-largest economy, while moving the rest to countries, such as Vietnam, that are friendlier to Uncle Sam. Yet American demand for final products from allies also boosts demand for Chinese intermediate inputs, and produces incentives for Chinese firms to operate and export from alternative places. Although Apple, the world's largest company by market capitalisation, has moved production outside China in recent years, this comes with a caveat: much of the production still relies on Chinese companies. The tech giant lists 25 producers in Vietnam on its official suppliers list. Nine are from mainland China.

Tighter trade links between America's allies and China are the paradoxical result of America's desire for weaker ones. Firms panicked by worsening relations across the Pacific are pursuing "China plus one" strategies, keeping some production in the world's second-largest economy, while moving the rest to countries, such as Vietnam, that are friendlier to Uncle Sam. Yet American demand for final products from allies also boosts demand for Chinese intermediate inputs, and produces incentives for Chinese firms to operate and export from alternative places. Although Apple, the world's largest company by market capitalisation, has moved production outside China in recent years, this comes with a caveat: much of the production still relies on Chinese companies. The tech giant lists 25 producers in Vietnam on its official suppliers list. Nine are from mainland China.

Given that most countries are desperate for the investment and employment that trade brings, America has been unable to convince its allies to reduce China's role in their supply chains. Many are content to play both sides—receiving Chinese investment and intermediate goods, and exporting finished products to America and the rest of the West. Ironically, then, the process driving America and China apart in trade and investment may actually be forging stronger financial and commercial connections between China and America's allies. Needless to say, that is not what President Biden had in mind.

Correction (February 8th 2024): The chart in this article has been updated to show the correct value for India.

China Pulls Taliban Out Of Isolation; Beijing Eyes Afghanistan's Mines To Dominate Smartphone, EV Market?

13 February 2024, The EurAsian Times

A report in India's News18 on December 23, 2022, published an interesting news: China needs Afghanistan's lithium and copper mines to dominate the supply chains of components needed to make electric vehicle batteries and smartphones.

A week before that news was broken, Wang Yi, the Chinese foreign minister, had visited Kabul to meet with Taliban foreign minister Amir Khan Muttaqi. This was the first highest-level meeting between China and the Taliban regime after the Taliban had toppled the elected government in Kabul.

As a goodwill gesture, Wang Yi had invited Muttaqi to the third meeting of foreign ministers of Afghanistan's neighbors on March 30 and 31 in Tunxi, Anhui.

Since 2021, China has been in close touch with the Taliban and has been eyeing her lithium and copper mines. It is not only Afghanistan but the mineral deposits across the world are also what China has been looking for, the Financial Times reported,

The paper adds, "The meeting will possibly begin with the investment of the Chinese into mines in Afghanistan," as stated by Ahmad Munib Rasa, a political analyst who was talking to TOLO News.

One of the world's biggest copper deposits is located at Mes Aynak, south-east of Kabul. According to the Financial Times, the copper deposits also came under discussion between Muttaqi and Wang Yi during their talks in Beijing.

Chinese delegations are also reported to have visited Nangarhar and Laghman provinces of Afghanistan to examine accessibility to other minerals.

Acceptance & Contradiction

A quick survey of Sino-Taliban relations reveals that China had been considerate and sympathetic towards the Afghan Taliban from the day it ousted the elected government in Kabul.

Many rumors associated with Chinese expansionist designs in the Muslim-dominated countries in the Gulf and the Middle East were making rounds. These rumors intensified with the hotchpotch withdrawal of the US and NATO armed forces from Afghanistan after nearly three decades of fighting.

It appears that China has not given terrorism the extraordinary importance that countries like India, Japan, or South Korea have. When China twice vetoed the majority resolutions in the Security Council designating the Pakistani perpetrators of the Mumbai carnage, the entire world was stunned by how China openly patronized terrorism anywhere if it harmed the interests of other countries not friendly to China.

Significantly, casting aside the cloak of ambiguity, Chinese President Xi Jinping took a bold step and, on January 29, 2024, in an official ceremony, accepted the credentials of the envoy to Beijing from Taliban-governed Afghanistan.

Ambassadors from 41 countries, including Afghanistan, presented their credentials to the Chinese President in the said ceremony. In December 2023, Afghan ambassador Bilal Karimi had met Wang Yi, the Chinese foreign minister.

Last year, China had imposed conditions for formally recognizing the Taliban-ruled Afghanistan. It had stated that before complete diplomatic relations, the Afghan Taliban must undergo reform.

Beijing had categorically said that to obtain full diplomatic recognition, the government in Kabul would need to enact political changes, enhance security, and repair ties with its neighbors. Both nations were continuing their diplomatic relations and hosting each other's diplomats at the same time.

China had also said that while Afghanistan should not be kept outside the international community, the Taliban needed to live up to the expectations of the outside world.

The curious thing is that reports of atrocities perpetrated on innocent citizens, especially the women in Afghanistan under the Taliban, are regularly pouring in. Though the Taliban had promised to show due respect to human rights and, in particular, the rights of women, this does not seem to have been translated into practice.

How then did Beijing suddenly change its resolve remains a mystery. The simple explanation is that national interest has an overwhelming weight against human rights and public commitments.

At the same time, China has repeatedly declared that it respects Afghanistan's national sovereignty and its choices. It has also said it does not meddle in Afghanistan's domestic affairs.

Non-interference assurance by China is certainly in response to the commitment made by the Taliban that they will not allow their land to be used for militancy against another country.

This is an important commitment, but how long will Beijing stick to it is difficult to say. Nevertheless, as long as the threat of Uyghur Islamic uprising in Xinjiang remains a political scenario in the Eastern part of China, she would very much welcome the Taliban, promising not to allow their land to be used for militancy in another country.

In the recent past, a rumor was making circles that some Uyghur fundamentalist youth are receiving training in terror somewhere in Nangarhar, the northeastern part of Afghanistan.

It has to be noted that one of the conditions which Beijing has stipulated for recognition of Afghanistan was that, among other things, Kabul should mend its relations with its neighbours.

As of today, Pakistan is the only neighbor of Afghanistan with which relations are soured. Imposing this condition means that China wants to take Pakistan also into the loop so that Pakistan-based jihadists desist from propagating the Islamic resurgence movement among the Pakistan-based diehard jihadist-terrorist organizations.

Indo-Afghan Relations

China has taken the lead in giving formal recognition to the Taliban regime in Afghanistan. Not only that, it has also said that "Afghanistan should not be kept at a distance from the international community."

This subtly points the finger towards the US and its allies, who have imposed sanctions on Afghanistan for violation of human rights. With China's recognition of Afghanistan, it is obvious that a large number of Asian and African countries would follow suit.

India is foremost among the Asian countries and also among the democracies in the world, which will have to think twice about how her close relations with the Taliban regime must be shaped.

India has age-old relations with Afghanistan. Our history, including the history of the colonial period, is intertwined with that of the Afghans. Independent India has always extended the hand of friendship to the Afghans and supported their case at all international forums.

Thousands of Afghan students are studying in technical and professional institutions in India, and many of them receive scholarships from the Government of India. India is the foremost country that has assisted Afghanistan in building vital infrastructure like roads, buildings, bridges, dams, cinema halls, secretariat, etc.

India provides medical facilities to Afghan patients coming to India for treatment. India exported wheat to Afghanistan when there was a scarcity of food grains. India is a partner in the Chahbahar project, which will connect Chahbahar with Kabul by railway undertaken by India.

The Taliban government is conscious of India's support and friendship. Though India has not formally recognized the Taliban so far, the nature of relations that India has with the Taliban shows that the two governments have developed an understanding between them.

India was among ten regional countries that participated in a meeting of diplomatic representatives convened by the Taliban set up in Kabul on January 31. It reflects the growing engagement with a regime not officially recognized by New Delhi.

India's participation at the meeting of diplomatic representatives convened by the Taliban setup reflects the growing engagement with a regime that isn't officially recognized by New Delhi.

The Regional Cooperation Initiative meeting, which was addressed by Taliban acting foreign minister Amir Khan Muttaqi, was also attended by diplomats from Russia, China, Iran, Pakistan, Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Kazakhstan, Turkey and Indonesia. Russia was represented by its special representative for Afghanistan, Zamir Kabulov.

There was no official word from Indian officials on the meeting, which came days after the Indian embassy in the United Arab Emirates (UAE) invited the acting Afghan envoy, Badru'd Din Haqqani, to the Republic Day celebrations in Abu Dhabi.

Hafiz Zia Ahmad, deputy spokesman of the Taliban foreign ministry, quoted the Indian representative who attended the meeting as saying that New Delhi backs all initiatives focused on the stability of Afghanistan.

"India actively takes part in international and regional initiatives regarding Afghanistan and supports every effort leading to the stability and the development of Afghanistan," Ahmad quoted the Indian representative as saying in a post on X.

In this background, it is logical that India also takes initiatives purporting formal recognition of Afghanistan's sovereignty. It would not be a figment of imagination to presume that Beijing's hasty step of recognizing Taliban Afghanistan could have happened because the Chinese may have gotten wind of how Afghanistan was coming closer to India. Though the philosophy of seeking friendship with Afghanistan by the two rival giants of India is markedly dissimilar, China feels that India's heavy footfall in Afghanistan could pose a serious challenge to her B&R Initiative in this Asian region.

China 'Pushes the Boundaries' with its expanding borders

13 February 2024, The Economic Times

Beijing: In late 2021, Chairman Xi Jinping famously told President Joe Biden, "Aggression or hegemony is not in the blood of the Chinese nation. Since the founding of the people's republic, China has never started a single war or conflict, and has never taken one inch of land from other countries." However, such a claim is demonstrably false, as China recklessly pushes forward its boundaries on land and at sea.

Including Bhutan and India, along their shared rugged, mountainous frontier, China is pushing forward wherever it can to forge a fait accompli on the ground. It is doing the same with illegal territorial claims in the South China Sea and attempting the same in Japan's Senkaku Islands.

The Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) in the USA provided an assessment of new People's Liberation Army (PLA) infrastructure near the Indian border. It noted, "China is currently undertaking a major expansion of its infrastructure that is enhancing its ability to project military power along its western frontier" in both Tibet and Xinjiang. The CSIS report revealed China is constructing or upgrading dozens of airports and heliports, supplemented by new roads, rail and other infrastructure that enhance PLA logistics by permitting greater quantities of troops, weapons and supplies to be shuttled closer to the frontier.

It added, "The pace of development in the region accelerated following standoffs and skirmishes between China and India along disputed portions of their border in 2017 and 2020." The 2017 reference is to the Doklam Plateau, where PLA engineers attempted to build a road. Even more serious was the outbreak of bloody violence at Galwan Valley in Eastern Ladakh in 2020.

In the rugged and unforgiving high-altitude terrain of Tibet and Xinjiang, airports and heliports grow exponentially in importance. They are vital for moving personnel and equipment into the area, plus they serve as launch pads for reconnaissance assets and potentially strike missions.

CSIS assessed: "The airpower buildup taking place on China's western frontier is sweeping in scale. Based on analysis of satellite imagery and other open-source material, China Power has identified 37 airports and heliports within Tibet and Xinjiang that have been newly constructed or upgraded since 2017 ... At least 22 of these are identifiable as military or dual-use facilities, or are expected to be once they are completed. The pace of this activity sped up significantly in 2020. That year alone, China began constructing seven new air facilities and initiated upgrades at seven others."

Much of the construction is occurring in Tibet. All five existing dual-use airports have received new terminals, hangars, aprons and runways since 2017, while four new airports have been constructed less than 60km from the Indian border. For example, Lhuntse, Ngari-Burang and Shigatse Tingri Airports fill glaring gaps in the PLA's coverage. The dual-use Shigatse Peace Airport is the closest to Doklam, and it has received a large underground facility that has at least three entrances.

CSIS added: "The PLA is also significantly scaling up its ability to conduct helicopter-based operations through the construction of at least five new heliports in Tibet, and the upgrading of two heliports. These heliports, which are operated by PLA Army aviation units, are dotted throughout Tibet, stretching from Rutog County in the west to Nyingchi City in the east. The addition of these heliports stands to significantly enhance PLA operations in the mountainous region, since helicopters are capable of manoeuvring in ways that aeroplanes and ground equipment cannot."

As for Xinjiang, at least 15 airports have been upgraded since 2017, seven of which are military or dual-use. One example is Hotan, 240km from the Indian border. It has a new runway, additional tarmacked areas and an expanded air defense complex.

Three new airports have started construction in Xinjiang since 2019, including Tashkorgan near the border junction with Pakistan, Afghanistan and Tajikistan.

Nonetheless, CSIS explained: "Despite the military benefits that China's investments in the region have brought, the PLA faces several notable disadvantages compared to India. Much of China's side of the border is situated on the highest portions of the Tibetan Plateau, which is often described as the 'roof of the world', owing to its high elevation. Twenty of China's airports and heliports within Xinjiang and Tibet are located more than 3,000m above sea level..."

Such altitudes present massive operational challenges for the PLA. Thin air affects the performance of aircraft taking off, which in turn requires longer runways and aircraft may not be able to carry full weapon, cargo or fuel loads. Cold and harsh weather adds its own challenges too.

Official Chinese figures reveal that Tibet's highway system grew 51 per cent from 2015-20 to a total of 11,820km. In the same period, Xinjiang's highway network grew from 17,830km to 20,920km. As well as enhancing economic development, these roads assist the PLA in moving supplies. For instance, at least eight roads stretching from the G219 highway towards the Indian border are being constructed. The PLA would be able to use them to quickly reposition troops if another Galwan Valley confrontation occurred, for example.

Completed in 2021 and reducing travel time by eight hours, another new road connects Nyingchi to Medog County in eastern Tibet. Nyingchi hosts the headquarters of the PLA's 52nd and 53rd Combined Light Infantry Brigades, showing how critical such new routes are in spreading the influence of the PLA.

Xinjiang's rail network has grown quickly too, from 5,900km in 2015 to 7,800km in 2020. New lines help connect military bases and airports. However, Tibet's topography makes the creation of new railways very difficult, and the region boasts only 800km of tracks. Nevertheless, the first high-speed railway from Lhasa to Nyingchi opened in 2021 and, soon after it opened, it carried PLA personnel to an exercise area.

China's "salami slicing" tactics, used so successfully in the South China Sea, are a reliable indication of how China is acting in other border areas too. One victim is Bhutan, with Beijing using such tactics against it for years. Afterwards, China attempts to formalize its theft of land by engaging in negotiations, but this type of bullying has negatively impacted bilateral negotiations. China lays claim to 269km<sup>2</sup> of Bhutanese territory in Doklam in the west, 495km<sup>2</sup> of the sacred Buddhist area of the Beyul Khenpajong in the north, and 650km<sup>2</sup> of the Sakteng wildlife sanctuary in the east.

China has trespassed the Bhutan border and rapidly constructed settlements such as Gyalaphug village. Sudha Ramachandran, writing for the Jamestown Foundation think-tank in the USA, noted: "Beijing appears to be robustly altering the status quo on the ground along its border with Bhutan. Recent satellite images reveal the staggering pace at which the PRC is building townships along a river valley in Beyul Khenpajong located in territory it claims in northcentral Bhutan." Currently, the settlement contains more than 200 structures, including roads, hydropower stations, communication facilities and military/security outposts built over the past decade. China has faced little pushback from Bhutan, exacerbated by the difficulty in accessing the area from the Bhutan side.

A 1998 agreement was supposed to see both countries "refrain from taking any unilateral action to change the status quo of the boundary," but Chinese words are as cheap as the paper they are written on. The PLA is particularly enraptured with the tri-junction border at Doklam, as dominating this area would improve China's military position versus India. Ramachandran said, "The rationale behind Beijing's land grab is not entirely clear. Unlike Doklam, which is near India and where the PRC has also pressed ahead to alter the situation on the ground through construction of roads and bunkers, control over Beyul Khenpajong would have no strategic value in the event of an India-China war." Regardless, "Parallel to changing the status quo on the ground in its favor with its infrastructure-building activity, China is keen to enhance its economic and other presence in Bhutan. This would help the PRC to create a favorable environment for itself while increasing its leverage."

When it comes to China's outrageous maritime territorial claims and bullying at sea, state media and government channels are spouting increasingly ridiculous messages. For example, the Global Times tabloid tweeted on 27 January that the China Coast Guard (CCG) had expelled "Japanese vessels near the Diaoyu/Senkaku Islands, which are an inherent part of China's territory, and CCG vessels carry out maritime rights protection and law enforcement activities in China's jurisdictional waters in accordance with the law. We urge the Japanese side to immediately cease all illegal activities in this area and ensure that similar incidents do not occur again." Such statements are figments of China's imagination. Beijing has also succeeded in antagonizing the Philippines, causing Manila to become more strenuous in its criticism of blatant Chinese interference. After Manila stated it would modernize military facilities in its northernmost province of Batanes, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Wang Wenbin warned the Philippines to "tread carefully and don't play with fire".

Subsequently, a Philippine Department of National Defense press statement issued on 10 February sternly warned China: "The Defense Department stresses that Batanes is Philippine territory, and China has no business warning the Philippines about what it does within its own territory. China's pronouncements and acts are the main reasons for its low credibility with the Filipino people. China should refrain from engaging in provocative rhetoric and activities if it truly wants to earn the widespread trust and respect that it is trying so hard to gain but has, so far, been unable to."

Chinese encroachment has caused growing resentment from countries like the Philippines and Japan, and its 2020 gambit against India in Eastern Ladakh in mid- 2020 resulted in awakening Indian ire too. China has refused to return to the April 2020 status quo in Ladakh, despite numerous talks and disengagement of troops from friction points. The PLA carved out for itself important buffer zones, largely from Indian territory and causing Delhi to lose control of areas it formerly patrolled, which is precisely how Chinese salami slicing proceeds. Once the PLA has gained a foothold, it is impossible to dislodge it.

Both China and India worked hard to strengthen their respective infrastructure after the Eastern Ladakh confrontation, and it is estimated both sides keep around 50,000 troops in Ladakh. In October 2021, China began constructing a new road and 300m- long bridge over the strategically important Pangong Lake so soldiers can move quickly to either side of the lake and areas adjacent to the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

Construction of a bigger and wider bridge started in 2022, which would even allow armored vehicles to cross. In a conflict, bridges are vulnerable; however, in scenarios beneath that, bridges are an important logistical tool for the PLA.

To the west of these bridges, the PLA established what is believed to be a permanent divisional-level headquarters and garrison, just 6km from the LAC. Settled permanently from mid-2020, the camp expanded throughout 2021.

As well as revetments and a company's worth of armored vehicles, there are shelters presumably for artillery and antiaircraft systems. It functions as a node connecting troops at Pangong with the Western Theater Command headquarters. After work began in August 2021, a second radome was constructed on a mountain peak north of the lake, about 6km from the headquarters facility. Such construction efforts show that China has no intention of retreating; rather, it is deepening its foothold.

A report published last year by the Indo-Pacific Security Program of the Center for a New American Security, concluded: "While the Chinese and Indian militaries have since pulled back forces from the most contentious standoff sites where the 2020 build-up occurred and established temporary buffer zones, both sides retain high numbers of troops forward deployed along the disputed frontier, and there are several flashpoints that could erupt into another border crisis at any time ... With both China and India enhancing infrastructure and introducing new and advanced weapons systems on their sides of the disputed border, combined with forward deployments and heightened lack of trust, the chances for continued standoffs that could erupt into local or even full-blown conflict remain high."

The same is true everywhere that China is blatantly pushing forward with coercive or stealthy methods. Unless victims strenuously stick up for themselves, China is only emboldened to continue such illegal moves to enlarge its territory. In a sense, Xi was right - no, China "has never taken one inch of land from other countries" - for it has helped outside to hundreds of square miles instead. (ANI).

China Is Winning the Battle for the Red Sea, America Has Retired as World Policeman

13 February 2024, The Heritage Foundation

Hardly for the first time, remote Arab tribesmen are reshaping the world. Piratical attacks on international shipping by Yemen-based Houthi rebels have created a significant security crisis in the Red Sea. The world's largest shipping lines have been forced to suspend transit through the Red Sea and thus the Suez Canal. And with nearly a third of global container traffic typically flowing through Suez, this has seriously disrupted world trade. Yet the most enduring impact of the crisis may be on the geopolitical balance between two great powers, each many thousands of kilometres away from the scorching sands of the Arabian Peninsula: China and the United States.

As the world's largest trading nation, China has much at stake in the Red Sea. Europe is China's top trade partner, and more than 60% of that trade by value usually flows through the Suez Canal. With that route disrupted, cargo vessels are diverting around Africa's Cape of Good Hope, adding up to two weeks in additional travel time and vastly increasing shipping costs. By 25 January, the average cost of shipping a 40-foot container from Shanghai to Genoa spiked to $6,365, an increase of 464% from two months earlier. Insurance rates have also skyrocketed. What's more, Chinese companies have in recent years poured billions of dollars' worth of investment into assets in the region, such as the 20% stake in the East Port Said container terminal of the Suez Canal that is now owned by Chinese state shipping giant COSCO. At a time when China's growth rate is already struggling, the crisis risks imposing a serious further drag on its economy.

Apparently perceiving this vulnerability, Washington has tried to use it as leverage to convince Beijing to help end the crisis. China is the top economic and geopolitical backer of Iran, which in turn backs the Houthis, using them as a proxy to needle Israel, the United States and its allies. Some officials in Washington are convinced that, if it really wanted to, Beijing could quickly pressure Tehran into ending the Houthi attacks. Biden administration officials have "repeatedly raised the matter with top Chinese officials in the past three months", according to the Financial Times, and U.S. National Security Advisor Jake Sullivan recently flew to Thailand to directly plead the administration's case in a meeting with Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi.

>>> Don't Hand China a Victory in the Pacific

This diplomatic effort seems to have failed. Aside from a tepid public statement calling on "all relevant parties" to "ensure the safety of navigation in the Red Sea", Beijing appears to have made no move whatsoever to remedy the situation. Instead, it called on Washington to "avoid adding fuel to the fire" in the Middle East. The attacks continue.

Some in Washington are pouting. Rep. Jake Auchincloss (D-Massachusetts), for instance, slammed China in a Congressional hearing in late January for being "not only missing in action as a purported upholder of international commerce and rules, but... in fact actively undermining the potential for a peaceful resolution to this issue". This failure to intervene was just "another example of the malign and malicious attempts at global leadership from the Chinese Communist Party".

But Auchincloss and others of like mind in Washington should perhaps be careful what they wish for. For decades—indeed, arguably for the better part of two centuries—it has been the United States that has served as the world's "upholder of international commerce and rules". In fact, it was a determination to protect the flow of maritime commerce from pirates that induced the young United States into its first foreign intervention, the Barbary Wars of 1801 and 1815, and permanently forged its identity as an international actor. If the nation were truly to become and remain a merchant republic that meant that it must, as then-President Thomas Jefferson declared, "superintend the safety of our commerce" through "the resources of our own strength and bravery in every sea".

Two centuries later, the U.S. Navy was still operating under the slogan of "A Global Force for Good". Which is to say that the whole image—and reality—of America as a superpower largely rests, like the British Empire before it, on its ability to secure global trade. If there is any remaining shred of the "Pax Americana" on which the whole recent era of globalization was built, this is it.

It is in this context that Washington officials ought to consider what it would mean if Beijing were to listen to their pleas and actually take over America's role as a security provider. If the nations of the world were to begin turning to China for "global leadership" rather than the United States whenever their merchant ships were in need of protection, it would decisively mark the transition from an American century to a Chinese one, much as Britain once yielded the seas to its former colony. Washington should count itself lucky that Beijing has so far declined to try out for the role.

Meanwhile, America's own effort to perform its old job of securing the sea lanes has proved little more than a fiasco. With the U.S. Navy severely undermanned and overstretched around the globe, it attempted to assemble "Operation Prosperity Guardian", a multinational coalition of forces under its command meant to patrol the Red Sea. But this effort functionally collapsed almost immediately when France, Italy and Spain—all of whom Washington prematurely announced would be members—declined to participate, saying they wouldn't accept U.S. command. No Middle Eastern countries other than Bahrain signed up either. In a throwback to yesteryear, navies are instead each going solo and escorting the vessels sailing under their own flags and titles. What we are seeing, then, is a true breakdown in the "international order"—in the sense of there being any order—that was once imposed by American power. We are returning to an older, more typical world in which there is no world policeman, and everyone is obliged to protect their own national interests.

The Chinese are well prepared to capitalize on this situation. Although COSCO has for now also abandoned the Red Sea route, other smaller Chinese shippers have spotted commercial opportunity and leapt to fill the gap. China United Lines (CULines), for example, has rushed to start up a "Red Sea Express" service linking Saudi Arabia's Jeddah to Chinese ports. They are able to do so because the Houthis seem to be under strict orders to try to avoid attacking China-linked vessels. Ships still running the straits into the Red Sea now regularly make sure to prominently display Chinese flags and use their satellite identification data to announce that they have Chinese owners, or even just Chinese crew members. The number of vessels transiting the area while preemptively broadcasting that they carry Chinese crew has surged from less than two per day to more than 30 in late January. Apparently this is the magic talisman to keep pirates at bay—though China's navy has at least three warships in the area to escort its vessels, should it prove insufficient.

The reason Beijing seems so relaxed about the crisis is obvious: this is a situation in which China wins either way. Either the threat continues but shipping is safer for Chinese vessels than for others, in which case sailing under the protection of the red and gold flag may become a coveted competitive advantage, or Beijing finally tells Iran to knock it off, in which case China becomes the principal beneficiary of the security vacuum left by the United States. Both outcomes would be geopolitical coups. No wonder China is willing to accept a little short-term economic pain as the situation plays out.

Meanwhile, the crisis also provides China with a real justification for continuing to rapidly build out a "blue water" navy able to project power far from its own shores. As it happens, this is the same justification traditionally been offered by the United States: that, in the absence of security and stability, it needs the ability to protect global sea lanes and the lives of its citizens abroad. The military base China built in Djibouti in 2016 to enable the deployment of its warships across the Indian Ocean and around the Horn of Africa now looks prudent.

This is how the "world order" has always been shaped and reshaped: by nations and empires acting abroad to protect their own interests—or progressively failing to do so while others move to fill the void. The crisis in the Red Sea is therefore both symbolically and practically meaningful. Unless the United States and its allies can get their act together, we may look back on this as a moment when a vast geopolitical shift was revealed for all to see. As for everyone else, it's likely that the crisis will serve as a sign that the time to prepare for the harsh realities of a far more "multipolar", less globalized world has by now well and truly arrived.

Xi Jinping's never-ending hunt for corruption in the Communist Party

12 February 2024, BBC

As the latest phase of Xi Jinping's anti-corruption crackdown cuts through high-level banking and the elite nuclear rocket force, some have questioned when it might end.

The short answer: it won't.

It has become a central plank of the system of governance for China's leader.

And, because the anti-corruption drive has been used to remove anyone with even the slightest hint of a tendency to divert from his way of doing things, Mr Xi is sometimes characterised as an out-of-control Stalin-like figure purging left, right and centre without good cause.

But there are those who do not see it that way.

"Xi might be paranoid about high-level corruption, but his fear is not delusional," says Andrew Wedeman, head of China Studies at Georgia State University.

"The corruption he fears is certainly real. It is likely also true, of course, that Mr Xi has capitalised on the crackdown to gain political advantage".

Under Chairman Mao, the philosophy was that corruption could be controlled by fostering a love of the Party.

Then, during the Deng Xiaoping and Jiang Zemin eras, the idea took hold that, if you gave people a better living, they'd have less motivation to act corruptly.

By the time Hu Jintao was in charge, most Chinese people had a much better life but there were those who wanted more and were prepared to use unscrupulous means to get it, again boosting fraud on a widespread scale.

Now it feels like Chairman Xi has gone all the way back to Mao's way of doing things, putting a huge emphasis on Party loyalty to fix the problem.

And it is via the Party that these campaigns are launched, with investigations revolving around alleged breaches of its own regulations. It's effectively a matter of organised politics with the Party running probes however it wants.

'People simply disappear'

It can do this because most people with high-level positions in Chinese society are Communist Party members - whether in financial institutions, sporting organisations, government departments or universities.

But once a member, you are at risk of falling foul of Party discipline charges which are at times very vague and even relate to questions of personal morality and bringing the Party into disrepute.

During this process, the teams from the feared Anti-Corruption Commission simply make people disappear.

In theory, their families are supposed to be informed before they're taken away for questioning in secret locations, but there's no guarantee this will happen.

One day you simply stop being seen in public and the next it is assumed you are being interrogated for an indefinite period, with no legal representation or outside accountability.

And, while this is supposed to be cleaning up economic interaction so it will run more smoothly, the crackdown could well be having the opposite effect.

"It's reducing incentive to be creative, entrepreneurial and risk-taking, which had been the driving force of [China's] economic growth since 1979," political scientist Lynette Ong from the University of Toronto told the BBC.

You'll hear the expression "lying flat" used a lot in the China of today. It sometimes refers to those in their 20s dropping out of the "rat race", while living at their parents' home and whiling away the hours playing video games with no great ambition in life because they can't see a positive future.

But it's also being used to describe officials in state-owned enterprises or the private sector who are just doing enough work to keep their jobs, nothing more, nothing less. They see it as too risky to stand out by pushing for innovation or appearing too ambitious.

"Xi wants officials to be clean and hardworking," says Deng Yuwen, who was once editor of the influential Communist Party newspaper The Study Times.

"But with Xi focussing on corruption, they'll just 'lay flat'. Mr Xi, of course, doesn't want to allow this and is demanding that they work hard lest their corruption be exposed. But the crackdown has gone on for over 10 years now and officials have become used to it. If you chase me to do work, I'll put in a bit more effort. If you stop using the whip on me, I'll just take it easy for a while and 'lay flat'".

Big money, vast bribes

But the high-profile take-downs in recent months in the finance sector are a different matter, homing in on senior executives who are accused of being very active for the wrong reasons. Among those implicated for allegedly taking vast bribes are former chairs of major banks and one time regulators. More than 100 finance sector officials have been punished over the past year.

"Too many officials have been involved in financial corruption over many decades. It's impossible to clean this up in one or two years," says Mr Deng. "Banking was the big target last year. It will also be that this year and the same for the coming year as well".

According to Prof Wedeman, "We ought to expect a lot of high-stakes corruption in the banking sector because, after all, the banks are where the big money is".

However, if banking is where the money is in China it is with the military that ultimate power resides.

The People's Liberation Army is not the country's army, it is the Party's army and it keeps it in absolute control.

So the purge of generals running the nuclear rocket force as well as that of the Defence Minister, Li Shangfu, has shown just how serious China's corruption battle has become - with unscrupulous procurement processes reportedly pushing faulty gear all the way into the nuclear arsenal.

"We're not only talking about embezzling funds or getting kickbacks, but also subpar military equipment being purchased and potentially used by the People's Liberation Army," Alex Payette, the CEO of Montreal-based geopolitics consultancy Cerciis said. Alfred Wu from Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy says corruption in the rocket force would have hit Mr Xi hard.

"He had very high hopes for the rocket force," Prof Wu told the BBC. "If I have a very strong rocket force then, in the future, if I have a war with Taiwan, it can be absolutely instrumental."

Does he think that reorganising this crucial part of the People's Liberation Army could actually delay any move to take Taiwan by force?

"Of course, of course!"

Yet analysts observing the anti-corruption crackdown in China have identified a gaping flaw in Mr Xi's approach in the form of a complete absence of any systemic changes which could tackle these problems in the long run.

"The Party, despite its efforts to develop its regulatory apparatus and discipline inspection rules, etc, has failed to curb corruption. Insofar as the Party remains the sole structure to access state resources, it cannot curb infrastructural corruption," said Prof Payette.

Some other countries have introduced genuinely independent anti-corruption bodies, increased transparency, improved the rule of law and empowered an independent media to report on corruption. China has done none of those things.

Instead, the Communist Party polices itself. What's left is a never-ending search for bad apples without a strategy to stop them going off in the first place.

In addition to this, according to Prof Wedeman, social attitudes also need to change drastically: "Reducing and controlling corruption requires not just changes in laws, regulations and oversight but deeper changes in the culture of officialdom and the socialisation of new generations for whom corruption and bending the rules are no longer standard and acceptable practices."

Mr Xi's sweeping anti-corruption drive has also potentially made some officials frightened to speak out, especially those close to him who are supposed to be giving him frank and fearless advice.

For many, this became apparent after three years of the Covid crisis, when the rest of the world had re-opened but China remained closed and heavily restricted even with the economy tanking.

"No doubt there are smart people around him," adds Prof Ong, "But his insistence on zero-Covid until massive protests broke out suggests to me that those who understand economics don't really have his ears".

Other China watchers fear Mr Xi has surrounded himself with "yes men".

"At this point, Xi is not looking for frank advice. He is looking for loyalty," says Prof Payette.

"Xi seems to have fallen prey to being constantly praised by cadres who only seek to be promoted. Looking at early Party history, he should have known that Party cadres engage in flattery to avoid being purged and gain access to the upper echelons of the Party-state apparatus."

To an extent there is a belief that all officials are corrupt (whether they be the high-level "tigers" or the "flies" on the lower rungs) and that those who have been singled out are, for whatever reason, a threat to Mr Xi.

It is estimated that five million people have been punished in various ways during the crackdown, with some receiving warnings or fines with others getting heavy prison sentences or even the death penalty.

But rather than fostering a belief that the country is being well governed, many believe it is also trashing the Party's reputation amongst the general public.

As Professor Wedeman put it, "I suspect that more than 10 years of the crackdown and a seemingly endless parade of 'caged tigers' has most likely deepened public cynicism.

"Quite simply, if you spend a decade waging a 'life and death' battle with tigers and - 10 years into the hunt - you are bagging as many as you bagged when you started hunting, it strongly suggests you are not hunting them to extinction and might not have even significantly reduced their numbers."

India Says It Stopped China's Attempt to Repeat 1962 Border War

12 February 2024, NewsWeek

India's home-affairs minister said China tried to bring about a repeat of the 1962 war between the countries during a 2020 border conflict, but New Delhi successfully stood up to Beijing's aggression.

In a rare move, Amit Shah made the comments in Lok Sabha, India's lower house of parliament, while taking stock of New Delhi's performance during the Covid pandemic and discussing other related issues. China and India fought a bloody war in 1962 over the disputed 2,100-mile Line of Actual Control (LAC), which has since shaped the bilateral relationship between two countries with vast populations and hugely important economies.

Since 2020, the two sides have been locked in an intense border stand-off in the Eastern Ladakh region, with thousands of soldiers from both countries still stationed in the frigid Himalayan area. The soldiers exchanged blows on June 15, 2020, when 20 Indian soldiers and at least four Chinese soldiers died.

"During this period, when the COVID pandemic was raging, China showed its real face, like in 1962. We stood firmly to it and didn't lose an inch of land," Shah said in parliament on Saturday.

The U.S. increasingly considers New Delhi a bulwark against Beijing's aggressive stance against neighbors in the Indo-Pacific. The U.S. State Department recently approved the sale of 31 MQ-9 Reaper drones to India, which are likely to be deployed along the border with China to improve surveillance of the contested boundary, Reuters reported on February 1.

India is seeking a restoration of the status that existed before April 2020, when the People's Liberation Army soldiers were deployed in forward positions along the LAC.

Meanwhile, Beijing has downplayed the ongoing tensions between the countries by calling on New Delhi to look at the broader bilateral relationship while putting the current phase of border tensions aside.

"It is unwise and inappropriate for the Indian side to link the boundary issue with overall relations. This approach is against the two countries' shared interests," Col. Wu Qian, a spokesperson for China's defense ministry, recently told reporters in Beijing.

India is seeking a restoration of the status that existed before April 2020, when the People's Liberation Army soldiers were deployed in forward positions along the LAC.

Meanwhile, Beijing has downplayed the ongoing tensions between the countries by calling on New Delhi to look at the broader bilateral relationship while putting the current phase of border tensions aside.

"It is unwise and inappropriate for the Indian side to link the boundary issue with overall relations. This approach is against the two countries' shared interests," Col. Wu Qian, a spokesperson for China's defense ministry, recently told reporters in Beijing.

India's Prime Minister Narendra Modi said in June 2020 that China hadn't taken any territory as the controversy over its incursion into territory held by New Delhi continues.

"Neither have they intruded into our border, nor has any post been taken over by them (China). Twenty of our jawans (soldiers) were martyred, but those who dared Bharat Mata, they were taught a lesson," Modi said, according to the Hindustan Times on June 19, 2020.

China's increasing political influence in the south Pacific has sparked an international response

12 February 2024, Hindustan Times

China's increasing political influence in the south Pacific has sparked an international response

Bradford (UK), Feb 12 (The Conversation) Taiwan elected Lai Ching-te, also known as William Lai, to be its next president on January 13. His election marks the continuation of a government that promotes an independent Taiwan.

Just two days later, the Pacific nation of Nauru severed ties with Taiwan and transferred its diplomatic allegiance to Beijing. More recently, on January 27, Tuvalu's pro-Taiwan prime minister, Kausea Natano, lost his seat in the nation's general election.

Natano's finance minister, Seve Paeniu, who is aiming for the prime ministership himself, was returned to his seat. In his campaign, Paeniu pledged to review Tuvalu's relationships with China and Taiwan. These examples indicate China's growing influence in the south Pacific, a region that the world's major powers are competing for influence over. But why is the region significant? And how are these major powers exerting their influence there?

Preventing recognition of Taiwan

Taiwan has been governed independently since 1949. But Beijing believes it should be reunited with the rest of China. It is not an option for states to diplomatically recognise both China and Taiwan – China forces them to choose. For decades, the Chinese government has used a combination of carrots and sticks to pressure such states into transferring diplomatic recognition from Taiwan to China.

China has, for example, imposed significant political, diplomatic and economic sanctions on countries that continue to formally recognise Taiwan. In 2022, China curbed imports from Lithuania to punish the country for allowing Taiwan to open a de facto embassy in the country.

But China also offers states – and their governing elites – economic and political incentives for withdrawing diplomatic recognition of Taiwan. It has, in the past, used its influence in the UN and other international organisations to block assistance or elect specific people to international positions.

Nauru's change of diplomatic position, and the political debate unfolding in Tuvalu, should be understood as part of China's longstanding effort to prevent and reduce recognition of Taiwan as a sovereign state.

But they are a significant step forward for China. Nauru has a leading position in the Pacific Islands Forum – the main political decision-making body for the region – so the country's change of stance could lead to wider formal diplomatic changes in the south Pacific.

China, of course, has legitimate economic and political interests in the south Pacific too. It is a vital export market for natural resources from Pacific island states and is a key source of incoming tourism. According to Chinese statistics, total trade volume between China and Pacific island states grew from USD153 million to USD 5.3 billion between 1992 and 2021.

Competing for influence

Nauru's decision is another diplomatic setback for Taiwan, which is now formally recognised by just 11 countries. However, this is not in itself a serious concern for the US, Australia and their allies. They all formally recognise China, while at the same time maintain close, informal links with Taiwan. Their focus is on trying to limit the depth of Chinese political and economic influence over Pacific island states and elsewhere in the Asia-Pacific region.

But they are a significant step forward for China. Nauru has a leading position in the Pacific Islands Forum – the main political decision-making body for the region – so the country's change of stance could lead to wider formal diplomatic changes in the south Pacific.

China, of course, has legitimate economic and political interests in the south Pacific too. It is a vital export market for natural resources from Pacific island states and is a key source of incoming tourism. According to Chinese statistics, total trade volume between China and Pacific island states grew from USD153 million to USD 5.3 billion between 1992 and 2021.

Competing for influence

Nauru's decision is another diplomatic setback for Taiwan, which is now formally recognised by just 11 countries. However, this is not in itself a serious concern for the US, Australia and their allies. They all formally recognise China, while at the same time maintain close, informal links with Taiwan. Their focus is on trying to limit the depth of Chinese political and economic influence over Pacific island states and elsewhere in the Asia-Pacific region.

In 2022, China put forward a proposal for a diplomatic, economic and security agreement with the region. The agreement was, however, later abandoned due to resistance from some Pacific island nations at the urging of the US and Australia.

US strategy in the south Pacific

When president, Donald Trump launched a number of deals with Pacific islands, including Nauru, Marshall Islands, Solomon Islands, Palau and Micronesia.

However, Trump's strategy for a "free and open Indo-Pacific" had limited success. This was not only due to his confrontational posture towards China, but also to his threatening and protectionist "America first" rhetoric.

Joe Biden's comparatively measured diplomacy has seen more success.

In 2022, the Biden administration announced its "Pacific partnership strategy". The initiative included a commitment of US$810 million in development aid across the Pacific island region.

And in May 2023, the US secretary of state, Antony Blinken, stated that he would work with Congress to provide over USD 7.2 billion to support the region. Since then, the US has recognised the Cook Islands and Niue as independent, sovereign nations, increased its diplomatic footprint in the region and has committed strongly to work with the Pacific Islands Forum to promote a "democratic, resilient and prosperous Pacific islands region".

The shift of diplomatic ties from Taiwan to China does not mean that Pacific island nations want to reduce their ties with the west. But the US, Australia and their allies will need to invest a lot more in diplomatic, economic and security assistance if they want to counter China's growing influence there.

The New Regulations for Religions in Xinjiang: Part of a Wider Campaign Against Religion

08 February 2024, Bitter Winter

China's Xinjiang Province, home to predominantly Muslim ethnic groups, will come under a new set of regulations on February 1, whose translation was published by "Bitter Winter" on January 8, significantly restricting religious expression. This move tightens government control over religious practices and is part of a wider campaign to control religion in the region. Notably, all new places of worship must now adhere to "Chinese characteristics and style," potentially altering the architectural and cultural identity of religious sites. This legislation coincides with ongoing efforts to regulate religious gatherings and online content, raising concerns about the erosion of religious freedom in Xinjiang.

Human Rights Watch raised concerns about these regulations. The revisions aim to "Sinicize" religion in the region, aligning with President Xi Jinping's policy since 2016 to bring religious practices and places of worship in line with Han Chinese culture and Communist Party ideology. These new regulations seem to be an extension of national restrictions on religion implemented since 2014, further tightening control over the Uyghurs' religious freedoms.

The Chinese government has been accused of widespread human rights abuses against Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims in Xinjiang since 2017. These include mass detentions without trial, torture, disappearances, constant surveillance, religious and cultural persecution, family separations, forced labour, sexual violence, and forced sterilizations. Human Rights Watch and the UN have both concluded that these actions constitute "crimes against humanity." While some re-education camps seem to have closed, hundreds of thousands remain imprisoned, and Uyghurs abroad struggle to contact their families. Despite international condemnation, China's policies aimed at assimilating Uyghurs through force appear to be going through fresh rounds of intensification.

Human Rights Watch condemned these developments as an attempt to suppress Uyghur culture and force religious practices to align with Communist Party ideology. Non-compliance risks imprisonment, raising concerns about the future of religious freedom in the region.

In 2014, the authorities revised religious regulations, expanding control over Uyghurs' online religious activities and restricting clothing deemed "extremist." It was accompanied by the launch of the "Strike Hard Campaign against Violent Terrorism," which intensified in 2017 and resulted in horrific human rights abuses. The campaign criminalized everyday expressions of faith, punishing people for possessing digital Quran recordings or simply having a beard, effectively targeting Uyghurs based on their religious identity and cultural practices.

The new 2024 regulations in China impose significant restrictions on all religious practices and places of worship. They mandate that religions align with "core values of socialism" and embrace the government's initiative to "Sinicize" religions, essentially making them conform to Chinese culture and Communist Party ideology (article 5). Even the architecture of religious buildings is tightly controlled, demanding they reflect “Chinese characteristics and style” (article 26). Building, expanding, or altering any place of worship now requires navigating a more complex and stricter approval process with additional conditions for even applying (articles 20, 22, and 25).

A Buddhist temple and a Chinese-developed industrial area in Xinjiang. AI-generated elaboration of a Chinese poster.

While controlling the external aspects of religious spaces like size and location is important under “Sinicization,” Human Rights Watch warns that the policy goes deeper. It compels places of worship to scrutinize their own teachings and doctrines, searching for aspects that align with “social harmony” and goals of “contemporary China’s development.” This analysis must be conducted through the lens of “excellent traditional Chinese culture,” essentially forcing religious beliefs to conform to the Communist Party’s ideology. In effect, religious venues under “Sinicization” become tools for promoting the Party’s values to the public.

The new regulations effectively place religious practice under direct government supervision. A new dedicated chapter grants authorities control over what and how religion is taught. Only government-approved groups can provide religious education (article 13). Even religious schools must adhere to “Chinese characteristics,” which means raising “patriotic religious talents” and interpreting scriptures according to government guidelines (articles 14 & 15). Further restrictions limit religious establishments, requiring them to report and obtain permission for both religious training (article 18) and large gatherings (article 42). This effectively centralizes and regulates religious education under government supervision.

The new laws reach beyond mosque control, tightening its grip on the religion through the China Islamic Association. This government-sanctioned body now holds exclusive authority over organizing the Hajj pilgrimage, excluding non-member mosques and individuals. Religious leaders are tasked with promoting “patriotism” and schools must incorporate Chinese values like praising socialism and using Mandarin. Critics see this as an attempt to legitimize actions in Xinjiang, particularly towards the Uyghur minority, by presenting them as efforts to integrate Islam with Chinese identity.

The new rules also allow local Communist Party representatives or cadres in villages and neighborhoods to monitor society, particularly for religious activities deemed illegal. This includes reporting “illegal religious organizations, preachers, activities,” or any religious influence on local affairs. Critics see this as increased repression, especially in regions like Xinjiang and Tibet, and point to its similarity with President Xi Jinping’s “mass mobilization” approach to governance and control. This approach, often described by Chinese media as inspired by Mao Zedong’s Fengqiao experience, empowers lower-level authorities to actively monitor and report on potential issues.

The Chinese government’s actions in Xinjiang, including mass detention, cultural suppression, and forced labour, have been widely condemned by international rights groups and Western governments, with some even accusing them of constituting genocide. A 2022 UN report found “serious human rights violations” that might amount to crimes against humanity. While China denies any wrongdoing, claiming its policies aim to combat extremism and terrorism, local activists fear lasting harm. As new restrictive laws come into effect, Bekzat Maksutkhan, an activist representing ethnic Kazakhs impacted by the crackdown, worries this marks the official legalization of previous repressive actions and further erosion of religious rights in the region.

China’s communist government, officially atheist since its founding in 1949, has a history of controlling religion. While past laws aimed to govern religious practices, particularly in Xinjiang, new legislation represents a major shift. Experts see this not just as a demand for control, but as a push for religions to adhere to specific “Chinese characteristics and style” in architecture, customs, and even personal aspects like clothing and ceremonies. For Muslims, these regulations dictate that religion shouldn’t influence cultural practices and require newly built or renovated religious sites to adopt a distinctly Chinese aesthetic.

The Chinese government exerts increasing pressure on religions they perceive as foreign, especially Islam and Christianity. While officially allowing worship in approved churches, authorities have demolished unregistered ones and removed religious symbols. Buddhism, particularly the majority Han branch, faces less scrutiny, but Tibet’s Buddhist traditions are harshly suppressed. The government aims to weaken support for the Dalai Lama and assimilate Tibetans through forced assimilation campaigns and the destruction of religious sites. This “Sinicization” approach aims to sever ties between these religions and their global communities, making them subservient to the Communist Party and devoid of political influence. This strategy mirrors the treatment of Islam in Xinjiang, where authorities strive to control religious expression and promote a state-approved version of Islam.

There has been some criticism of China's highhandedness from outside, to no avail. For years, concerns have been raised about Chinese authorities altering or demolishing mosques in Xinjiang. A 2020 report documented widespread changes, with two-thirds of mosques impacted since 2017, coinciding with a broader crackdown. Now, a 2023 report reveals this campaign has expanded beyond Xinjiang, targeting other regions under a policy called "consolidation." This involves removing traditional Islamic features like domes and minarets, replacing them with Chinese designs to achieve a more unified aesthetic. While Beijing rarely comments, state media has even praised such alterations as preserving heritage, raising questions about the true motives behind this policy.

In conclusion, China's 2024 religious regulations in Xinjiang signal an alarming intensification of Uyghur repression. The legislation, aligning with President Xi Jinping's Sinicization policy, imposes unprecedented control over religious practices, extending beyond mosques to influence education, large gatherings, and even the architecture of places of worship. The Sinicization agenda, forcibly assimilating Uyghurs into Han Chinese culture, erodes religious freedom and imposes Communist Party ideology. International condemnation and accusations of crimes against humanity seem ineffectual as China's authoritarian measures expand beyond Xinjiang, threatening not only Uyghur culture but also the global communities of various religions. The regulations starkly underscore China's unyielding commitment to subjugate religious identity under state control.

China and the Question of Tibet

05 February 2024, Indian Defence Review

Since China's invasion of Tibet in 1951, Beijing's propaganda machinery has been striving to maintain its precipitancy improving the legitimacy of its claims on Tibet. In the process, China has tried to wipe the Tibetan identity by replacing it with the Han Chinese identity through elimination of Tibetan icons, symbols, history, language and culture.

The Tibetan government in exile in India and its supporters around the world struggle to spread awareness on Tibet while having to counter the China set narratives.

On 25 January 2024, a hearing was held on the 'Legal Status of Tibet' by the Estonian Parliament. The hearing was chaired by MP Juku-Kalle Raid, Chair of the Parliamentary Support Group for Tibet and a member of the Foreign Affairs Commission.

There were 35 parliamentarians, journalists, academicians and Tibet supporters who were present at the hearing.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering, Representative Sonam Frasi from the Office of Tibet, London, Professor Hon-Shiang Lau and Dr Michael van Walt van Praag were also present at the hearing.

Sikyong stated the historical context of Tibet and Tibet's stance for a Middle-Way Approach. He also stressed on the importance of rectification of the historical information proving Tibet's independence before its invasion by the People Republic of China (PRC).

According to Prof Lau, there was sufficient and substantial evidence of Chinese Imperial records proving clearly that all the past Imperial dynasties in China, such as the Ming and Qing, considered Tibet as an independent nation and never a part of China. This was reaffirmed by Dr Michael van Walt van Praag's presentation which portrayed the perspective from a legal stance. He further explained, since the historic records from time of antiquity legitimize the Tibet's claim, it is easy to comprehend why China is persistent with its trading partner nations to declare 'Tibet as an internal issue of China'.

This would provide the necessary justification for denying Tibetans their right to self-determination.

On 29 January 2024, Sikyong Penpa visited with the members of the Latvian Parliamentary Support Group for Tibet to discuss the conditions in Tibet, international support for Tibet, and to seek a concrete action at the Latvian Parliament to acknowledge the legitimacy of Tibet.

Despite the support shown in Latvia, there was no formal statement made by the Latvian Government on PRC's human rights violations at the Universal Periodic Review on China last week.

The Tibetan delegation also visited Vilnius, Lithuania on Jan 30th 2024 to advocate Tibet's historically independent status and the threat from President Xi Jinping's Government in China.

Additionally, it is important to mention that most Baltic States, though in solidarity with Ukrainians in regards to the Ukraine-Russia war, still prefer to continue their business with Russia.

While the Tibetans strive to prove the legitimacy of their state, it is yet to be determined as to how far the Baltic States would extend their favour to Tibet when there remains a doubt in regards to their actions in regards to Ukraine with a certain inclination to China as well.

Chinese Subjugation of the Tibetan Snow Lion (Background)

On March 10, 1959, thousands of Tibetan citizens assembled around the Potala Palace in Lhasa owing to the imminent threat from the communist Chinese government to abduct and assassinate their leader, Dalai Lama. It was apparent that, with the previously existing Sino-Tibetan tensions, the disgruntled feelings of the Tibetans would soon shape into a national movement.

What initially started as peaceful protests fast transformed into an uprising against the Chinese government, leading to the massacre of many Tibetans who resisted the oppression from China. Since that fateful day, March 10 has been marked as the single most important – albeit one of the most tragic days – in the history of Tibet. It is also referred to as Tibetan Martyrs' Day, honouring all those who sacrificed their lives for their nation. By 2009, there were hundreds of reports of Tibetan self-immolation in protest against Chinese occupation.

On March 11th 2023, a huge protest was organized by expatriate Tibetans in front of the Chinese Embassy in Vienna, Austria. The demonstration consisted of more than 150 Tibetans protesting against the atrocities and human rights violations committed by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in Tibet, while anti-China pamphlets were also distributed.

In February 2018, China's public security bureau in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) released a notice to the public to cooperate with the government and inform the authorities of any activities pertaining to the "underworld forces". Most of the illegal activities mentioned were pertaining to a large number of cultural, traditional and informal activities related to the Tibetans. Preservation of language, dispute mediation or even initiative for environment preservation were viewed as initiatives to secretly support the Dalai Lama or an effort to mobilize a Tibetan freedom movement. All restrictions were implemented to curtail Tibetan human rights. In a notice issued by Nagchu county in TAR, a reward of 100,000 yuan (US$ 15,600) was announced for any tip-off or information in regard to the illegal activities outlined in the notice.

Cultural, linguistic and religious assimilation

In 2022, the Chinese government demolished the 99 feet Buddhist statue of Padmasambhava. In the same year, reports of demolition of two more Buddhist statues was reported. It is understood, the action to destroy the icons and statues of Buddhism is China's ploy to stomp out anything Tibetan and infringe on their right to religious freedom.

Post the destruction of the Buddhist statues, comparisons were made between Taliban and the Chinese, who in the past were responsible for the destruction of the 15th century Buddha statues in Afghanistan.

Considering all things Tibetan were illegal by the CCP, several Tibetans by default have been considered to be in violation of Chinese law.

As a member of the UN, China has accepted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. As such, its own crackdown on Uyghurs and the Tibetans displays a disregard for international law and human life. The first wave of the Chinese repression targeted the individuals connected with demonstrations or dispelling any anti-China information. This was followed by tightened and more rigid security in various areas of TAR, where stationing CCP cadres in every village or monastery would conduct and aid further house-to-house surveillance.

In 2014, "Document 9", an internal CCP briefing paper, was circulated that stated that the civil advocates in the society were plotting to overthrow the CCP leadership. It would prove to be a threat to the political authority of the CCP. Since the circulation, CCP has found justified reasoning in introducing more addendums to the restrictions on non-governmental activities nationwide.

China's consistent effort to create cultural, linguistic and religious assimilation under Xi Jinping's "one ethnic nation" spells the demise of the Tibetan and Uyghur identities. In the process, many Tibetans, Uyghurs and other minorities are separated from their families to receive instructions in Chinese medium in state-run institutions or schools, which function as boarding schools. These institutions function primarily to integrate non-Chinese ethnicities into the dominant Han culture, thereby diminishing gradually the influence of their original identities. It is apparent that by denying the children the knowledge of their heritage, culture and language, the Chinese aim to commit cultural genocide. With no strong ties or loyalties to one's origins, regions like TAR or Xinjiang could be controlled more effectively by China, as no group would be willing or able to oppose.

UN Human rights experts have also expressed serious concern about the cases of harassment, enforced disappearances, arbitrary prosecution, and detention of lawyers, women rights activists, and human rights activists with regard to China's crackdown. This also includes China's mass surveillance in the Xinjiang region, entrenched censorship and consolidation of anti-terrorism and sedition law, which is also now applicable to Hongkong.

In 2022, on basis of the reports from the US Department of Treasury, the US announced sanctions on two Chinese officials, Wu Yingje and Zhang Hongbo, for alleged human rights violations in the Tibetan Autonomous Region. In December 2022, the US Senate advanced the Tibet-China conflict Resolution Act, displaying its interest in resolving the Sino-Tibet conflict. The bill calls for a resolution to the conflict and has acknowledged the Tibetan right to self-determination. Senators Todd Young (Republican-Indiana) and Patrick Leahy (Democrat-Vermont) together introduced this bipartisan bill, while recognizing that CCP's motivations in the TAR were "self-serving" with failed negotiations due to CCP's refusal to cater to any Tibetan interest. The US in its resolve to support Tibet, has dissolved the so-called "Tibet Question" narrative i.e. whether Tibet was ever a part of China as claimed by the Chinese. While the American support in favour of Tibet may come as a humanitarian effort, strategically it also provides the US with the opportunity to discredit and limit the growing Chinese influence. This move was welcomed by the Dalai Lama's office of Tibet in Washington D.C.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering from the office of Central Tibetan Administration in India also viewed the decision as a positive step. The Chinese foreign ministry, in a rebuttal to the US, applied sanctions on two American citizens and called US accusations baseless and interference in Chinese internal affairs. In June 2022, the leaders at G7, in relation to China addressed matters in regards to China's commitment to democracy in Hong Kong, calling Beijing's actions "non-transparent and market-distorting interventions" in the economy, and also conveyed their concern over the human rights violations in Tibet and Xinjiang. Prime Minister Narendra Modi was also an invitee at the meeting.

While China views the 14th Dalai Lama as a separatist, India has consistently maintained its stand to honour him as an esteemed guest of India. Since 1959, India continues to be home to the Dalai Lama and thousands of Tibetan exiles who struggle to fight for the homeland they left behind.

China's strategy of Sinicization of Tibet is the very reason why one would question the need for the Sinicization of entities that are already Chinese. The question remains, with the traction building against the treatment meted out by China for Tibet, will the Dragon continue its subjugation of the Snow Lion as the world continues to watch.

January

China Continues to Pose a Challenge to India's Security and Economy

30 January 2024, Daily Excelsior

India's External Affairs Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar may disagree, but the country has failed to use its import trade muscle to improve its diplomatic relations with China. His recent statement on Sino-India relations at a gathering in Nagpur earlier this month that "a strife-torn border and good business can't go together" lacks clarity and goes against the factual position with regard to the country's growing imports from China despite the latter's growing military postures along India's land and maritime borders. The trade with China has been practically one-sided with India importing more and more from China and exporting less and less due to rigorous Chinese restrictions. India has failed to react. India continues to feed China and its economy with billions of dollars of imports every year helping the Chinese industry and trade keep millions of their people employed at India's cost. This is irrespective of increasing Chinese military threats along India's borders.

Even the highly aggressive Chinese armed attacks along the Sino-Indian border, including Pangong Lake site in Ladakh and the Tibet autonomous region, the Galwan river valley and near the border of Sikkim in 2020 did not lead to India's import cut from China. India imported goods worth US$65 billion from China during 2020-21. In fact, for reasons best known to the Indian government, imports from China have reached record levels under the Narendra Modi government. During the last 10 years China has substantially raised its military and trade muscles in the broader South Asia region covering all countries surrounding India. They include Iran, Pakistan, Nepal, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh and Myanmar. The new Maldives government has already established close military and diplomatic relationships with China. The latter is also in the process of getting Bhutan, a close ally of India, under its fold.

India's latest loss of influence over its tiny neighbour, Maldives, to China should add to its diplomatic concern. Newly elected Maldives President Mohamed Muizzu asked the government of India on 14th January to vacate its military presence by 15th March, this year. Incidentally, only 88 Indian military personnel are currently in Maldives assisting the country with maritime security and disaster relief efforts. While the deteriorated India-Maldives relations over the last 10 years do call for framing of an effective maritime doctrine by India, Jaishankar must explain why India lost its diplomatic grip over Sri Lanka and the Maldives to China and why does India continue to feed the Chinese economy with billions of dollars-worth imports every year. Clearly, India's SAGAR diplomacy, launched at Mauritius in 2015 by Prime Minister Narendra Modi, has failed to restrict China's growing influence in the Indian Ocean region. The SAGAR initiative stands for 'Security and Growth for All in the Region.'

After the Narendra Modi government came to power, imports from China zoomed from $60.41 billion in 2014-15 to $94.57 billion in 2021-22. The trade deficit with China, which was around only 1.48 billion in 2004-05 increased to $36.21 billion in 2013-14. The bilateral trade climbed to $135.98 billion in 2022 while the country's trade deficit with China crossed the $100-billion mark. The Modi government must explain this unusual trade bonhomie with China, which poses a real threat to India's security and geographical integrity. China is being allowed to dump goods at will – from banned synthetic kite flying strings which are responsible for periodically slitting the throats of the public to high-end electronics and cyber crime devices, including card games. Suffice it to say that China's share in India's imports is alarmingly high. Lately, India is even importing automobiles, including passenger cars from Chinese manufacturers. Among the major Chinese electric vehicle manufacturing companies currently active in India are: BYD Auto, SAIC Motor, Great Wall Motors, Changan Automobile, Jinko Solar and Shenzhen Wuzhoulong Motors.

Thus, the Indian foreign minister's statement with regard to linking the boundary and trade relations with China would appear to be of little consequence. China continues to hurt India's defence and economy concerns with impunity. Contrary to the claim that India's global stature has vastly improved under the present government, the support for anti-India Khalistani terrorists in Canada and the US speaks volume of such statements. Despite India's rising wealth and economy in terms of the gross domestic product (GDP), the world's most populous country is far from being considered as a global economic power. The economy continues to be highly import based despite the prime minister's 'Make-in-India' initiative. The Modi government's well-perceived attempt failed to achieve the desired objective in the absence of a strong China-focused import policy.

Maybe, after the coming Lok Sabha elections, the new government should ponder over the reason for India's growing dependence on China for the supply of such a wide range of products as simple nail cutters and umbrellas to electronics, pharmaceutical intermediates and automobiles. The new government should take drastic measures – tariff and non-tariff – to severely cut down imports from China and use trade as a diplomatic tool to deal with China. The government should not fall for cheap 'Bharat narrative' put up subtly in state-run Chinese media, praising India's significant strides in the spheres of economic, social governance and foreign policy under Prime Minister Modi. The article in Global Times might have been carried in anticipation of Narendra Modi-led Bharatiya Janata Party's return to power for a third term. It is possible that China has taken Jaishankar's trade-security linkage threat seriously. (IPA Service)

China Introduces Strict Rules In Xinjiang On Islam, Other Religions

30 January 2024, Radio Free Europe

In a move set to tighten government control over practicing religion in China's western Xinjiang Province, the Muslim-majority region will introduce a set of regulations that – among other things – will require all new places of worship to reflect "Chinese characteristics and style."

The sweeping legislation will come into force on February 1 as part of a broader multiyear campaign aimed at controlling religion in Xinjiang, which is home to mainly Muslim ethnic groups such as Uyghurs, Kazakhs, Kyrgyz, and Hui (aka Dungans).

As part of the new set of "regulations on religious affairs," all new mosques, churches, and other religious buildings must reflect Chinese design elements and any renovations to extant layouts will require approval from Xinjiang's regional authorities. Additional measures include controls on "large-scale" religious gatherings – which will require approval from the local government at least one month in advance – and that religious content posted online must be screened by the regional government.

The rules also say for the first time that interpretations of religious doctrine must "meet the requirements of contemporary China's development and China's outstanding traditional culture," a move that experts warn could further cement an ongoing crackdown against Uyghur and minority rights in the region.

"The move is significant, as it's about cutting off China's religions from international networks and communities and keeping them socially and politically isolated under the watch of the Chinese Communist Party," Bradley Jardine, managing director of the Oxus Society for Central Asian Affairs, told RFE/RL.

China has been accused of systemic human rights violations in Xinjiang, including launching a dragnet that sent more than 1 million Uyghurs, Kazakhs, and other Muslim minorities to detention camps and prisons.

A growing body of evidence – including firsthand testimony and leaked official Chinese government documents – support the accusations, which range from forced labor to sexual abuse, forced sterilization, and erasing Uyghur cultural and religious identity, including the tearing down of mosques and other religious sites.

These actions have drawn accusations of genocide from international rights groups and several Western governments. In 2022, a UN report found China was committing "serious human rights violations" in Xinjiang that may amount to crimes against humanity. China has denied any human rights abuses in the region and says that its policies in Xinjiang are designed to counter extremism and terrorism.

Against this backdrop, local activists are worried about the lasting effects of these policies as the new rules come into force.

"Religious rights have long been restricted in Xinjiang," Bekzat Maksutkhan, the director of Naghyz Atazhurt, an unregistered organization in Kazakhstan focused on ethnic Kazakhs affected by the crackdown in Xinjiang, told RFE/RL. "But this law is the legalization of all those previous actions."

„What Does The New Law Mean?

Since the founding of the People's Republic of China in 1949, the communist government's atheistic ideology has led to consistent efforts to suppress and control religion inside the country.

But while previous legislation has governed religious practices inside Xinjiang, experts say that the new legislation marks a significant escalation, demanding not just control but a specific reflection of "Chinese characteristics and style" in religious buildings and customs.

According to the regulations set out for Muslims, religion should not interfere in "clothing, weddings, funerals, and other ethnic customs" and "religious activity sites that are newly built or renovated, expanded, or rebuilt should reflect Chinese characteristics and style in terms of architecture, sculptures, paintings, and decorations."

Claims of Chinese authorities altering or pulling down mosques in Xinjiang are not new, with a 2020 report from the Australian Strategic Policy Institute documenting the destruction and renovation of mosques in Xinjiang, finding two-thirds were changed, mostly since 2017, when Beijing accelerated its crackdown and expanded its camp system.

A 2023 report by the watchdog group Human Rights Watch used public documents, satellite images, and witness testimony to show that the Chinese government had expanded its campaign of closing and altering mosques to regions other than Xinjiang, as part of an official policy known as "consolidation." As part of this, local authorities have removed architectural features of mosques – such as Arabic-style domes and minarets – replacing them with traditional Chinese designs to make them look more "Chinese."

Authorities in Beijing have rarely commented on this policy, but a June 2022 report by the Chinese state news outlet CCTV praised the removal of such architectural features as "protecting traditional heritage."

The new regulations look to formalize and build on these policies.

Beyond the rules on mosques, the law looks to expand the authority of the Islamic Association of China, the official government supervisory organ for Islam. The state body will now be the only organization that can organize activities related to the hajj, the Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca, and only mosques and individuals that are members of the association will be allowed to participate.

The law also calls on religious leaders to transmit a "patriotic" spirit to followers and stipulates that religious schools should instill Chinese characteristics, such as praising socialism and using Mandarin Chinese, in their teachings.

"China is trying to justify its crimes in Xinjiang to the world and the international community to make their crimes appear legitimate," Yerbol Dauletbek, the head of Atazhurt Eriktileri, another organization in Kazakhstan that helps ethnic Kazakhs, told RFE/RL. "This law is one of them."

Why China Targets Religion

The ruling Chinese Communist Party has viewed religion as a form of foreign influence that could undermine its authority and has looked to control and suppress all major religions in the country.

China's overall policy has been called "Sinicization," which requires religious groups to align their doctrines, customs, and morality with Chinese culture. The government also has strict rules for all religions, with provisions in its national law saying that it is illegal for minors 18 years or younger to attend religious services or celebrations or be taught about religion in any way.

Government pressure has been particularly targeted toward religions that Beijing views as foreign, such as Islam and Christianity – both Protestantism and Catholicism.

Authorities have in the past removed crosses from churches and had others demolished.

Christianity in China is also governed by several sets of rules. Christians are allowed to worship in "official churches" registered with supervisory government agencies, although millions of Christians in China still worship in underground churches.

Since Xi Jinping became leader of the Communist Party in 2012, Beijing has tightened control over Christian activities outside of registered venues, shutting down churches that refuse to register and arresting prominent church leaders.

Buddhism – particularly Han Buddhism, the most widespread branch practiced in China – has been treated more leniently by Chinese authorities, but the government has cracked down on Buddhists in Tibet. Beijing has tried to cement allegiances there and discourage support for the Dalai Lama, the Tibetan Buddhist leader living in exile in India. Chinese officials have also been accused of carrying out "political reeducation" campaigns, separating children from their families, and have torn down thousands of Tibetan Buddhist monasteries, monuments, and statues.

A similar approach to that practiced on Buddhism in Tibet has also been applied to Islam in Xinjiang.

When Xi last visited the region in August, he called on officials there to conserve "hard-won social stability" and to "more deeply promote the Sinicization of Islam and effectively control illegal religious activities."

"When we say Sinicization, the broad core is aimed at cutting [these] world religions off from the world," Jardine said. "And [instead] keeping them locally grounded, tied to the Communist Party, and politically neutralized."

Why Chinese spy balloons are back in force over Taiwan

29 January 2024, The Hill

China is stepping up a campaign to coerce and intimidate Taiwan, sending batches of spy balloons over the self-governing island nation that flouted Beijing's warning with the election of a pro-U.S. president earlier this month.

The spy balloons flew into Taiwanese airspace almost daily before and after Taiwan's Jan. 13 presidential elections, part of what analysts see as a new effort to weaken Taiwanese independence.

On this side of the Pacific, the flyovers were a reminder of China's spy balloon that floated over the U.S. mainland last year and blew up relations between Washington and Beijing for months. Beijing claimed at the time the dirigible was a wayward weather balloon – a claim made all the more far-fetched given the calculated use of the surveillance balloons over Taiwan.

Kristen Gunness, a senior policy researcher at the RAND Corporation, views China's aerial actions as an "extension" of the air and maritime pressure campaign and a "signal about increased surveillance," but she argued the tension is unlikely to escalate any further.

"Balloons are a big deal, but it's not enough of one to be able to – especially if Taiwan isn't doing anything about it – to provoke a conflict or crisis," she said.

However, experts are seriously worried about China eventually taking more aggressive action against the island, which it considers historically part of the mainland – especially after Taiwan's voters delivered a blow to Beijing.

U.S. Adm. John Aquilino, the commander of Indo-Pacific Command, predicted China would step up its aggression following the election.

"When something occurs that they don't like, they tend to take actions," he said at a Pacific Forum conference event this month after the Taiwan elections.

U.S. officials have warned that rather than invade, China is likely to increase pressure on Taiwan for now. Washington has issued a warning that any military action may come in 2027, the year Chinese leader Xi Jinping has said his forces should be ready.

A new report from the Center for Strategic and International Studies showed most experts believe a "soft quarantine" or a blockade of Taiwan is more likely than an invasion, though that scenario could escalate into a military conflict.

Gunness said China is dealing with domestic issues, including a tanking economy, that makes action unlikely this year or in the immediate future unless there is a major, unforeseen escalation like Taiwan declaring independence.

"China may just stay the course for a while because it doesn't want to rock the boat with the U.S.," she said. "That said, I do think that China will continue ... what it's been doing, which is basically conduct air and maritime operations around Taiwan to show that they can control the maritime and airspace."

Chinese spy balloons seized the world's attention last year when one flew over the continental U.S. in February for days before an American fighter jet shot it out of the sky and into the Atlantic Ocean.

The bulbous, white balloon weighed some 2,000 pounds and was 200 feet tall – with a payload that included antennas and surveillance equipment. The U.S. cast doubt on Beijing's explanation that it was a weather balloon gone adrift.

China has used the spy balloons for years to spy on the U.S., Japan, Taiwan and other nations in a program the U.S. says is global in scope.

But the latest efforts in Taiwan have seen China deploy a particularly large number of spy balloons, with sometimes up to six balloons flying into Taiwanese airspace in one day, according to Taiwan's Ministry of National Defense.

China already has eyes and ears over Taiwan and the balloons are unlikely to be practically useful for surveillance.

Instead, the balloons are part of a Chinese tactic to diminish Taiwanese independence, said Ho-fung Hung, a political economy professor and East Asia expert at Johns Hopkins University.

"They are basically trying to squeeze the airspace and then blur the line between Taiwan and mainland China as much as possible to establish a kind of status quo in which this kind of integration between Taiwan and China is no longer concrete or clear," he said.

"They are creating a status quo in which there's no clear boundary anymore."

In the past few days, the balloons stopped flying over Taiwan as frequently, but they also stopped in mid-January before picking up again.

The flyovers occur along with China sending aircraft into Taiwanese airspace in regular intrusions that have occurred for years.

The Institute for the Study of War warned in a Thursday analysis that China will try to "normalize using balloons in tandem with other aerial and naval" violations of Taiwanese territory "to wear down Taiwan's threat awareness."

President-elect Lai Ching-te's victory in the elections this month is a loss to China, which had backed a candidate seeking closer Beijing ties with the Kuomintang (KMT) party.

Lai is the current vice president in the administration of Taiwan President Tsai Ing-wen, and its Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) has now won a historic third consecutive term.

While Lai once talked of declaring independence, he became more measured during his campaign, saying the status quo works because Taiwan operates independently anyway.

Lai said in his victory speech that Taiwan opened a "new chapter" in its democracy.

"We are telling the international community that between democracy and authoritarianism, we will stand on the side of democracy," he said.

But the election was not a total loss for China; the opposing KMT party won a majority in the Parliament.

President Biden and China's Xi discussed Taiwan during a November meeting in San Francisco and agreed to restore military communications. The leaders of the two world superpowers did not make a breakthrough or resolve existing tensions, with Xi reportedly telling Biden that China will reunify with Taiwan.

Robert York, the director for regional affairs at the Pacific Forum, said the U.S. and China "fundamentally" remain at odds over key issues such as Taiwan, but the countries remain in a "reprieve" since the Biden-Xi meet.

"The Taiwan elections have not caused a significant downturn in those relations as of yet," he said, "but the [Chinese Communist Party], Xi Jinping, they've been quite clear that their position on Taiwan has not changed."

The U.S. sent an unofficial delegation to Taipei after Lai's victory and two U.S. lawmakers traveled to the island nation this week.

The spate of balloon launches is unlikely to push the U.S. or Taiwan to any action. Taipei scrambles aircraft when China intrudes over Taiwanese airspace but chooses not to engage to avoid provoking Beijing.

Col. Wang Chia-chun, the deputy head of Taiwan's Ministry of National Defense, said earlier this month it was not worth shooting down the balloons because it would be "exactly what the Chinese want," according to remarks shared by national news agency Focus Taiwan.

Another military spokesperson said Taiwan would only respond with force to the balloons if they posed a major threat.

The U.S. has informal relations with Taiwan and would not engage with regular Chinese incursions, though it has sent destroyer ships through international waters of the Taiwan strait in defiance to China, including one this week.

Even if China continues intimidating Taiwan with the balloons, Taipei will be focused on building out its defenses, said York from the Pacific Forum.

"Striking one of the balloons or actually confronting one of the Chinese planes or vessels that interferes in their space is probably not worth the risk," he said.

"The only thing Taiwan really can do is to continue to shore up its defenses, such as continuing to lengthen its mandatory service, and also beginning to make preparations for defenses on the island."

15 months on, China may appoint ambassador to India

29 January 2024, Times of India

New Delhi: After going 15 months without an ambassador in India, China may finally be ready to appoint its next envoy, as Sino-Indian ties remain plagued by border issues, not least the delayed completion of the disengagement and de-escalation process in eastern Ladakh.

It is learnt that senior diplomat Xu Feihong, who has served as ambassador to Afghanistan, is China's pick to head its mission here.

Xu has also been China's ambassador to Romania and is currently posted as assistant minister for foreign affairs.

The formalities for the appointment of the new envoy are still not complete though and it's far from clear when he will actually take office.

China's previous ambassador to India, Sun Weidong, had left in Oct 2022. The delay in the appointment of the new ambassador has come in the middle of the most turbulent phase in bilateral relations in decades, sparked by the 2020 Galwan clashes and Beijing's reluctance, as India has repeatedly emphasised, to heed bilateral agreements for border peace and tranquillity. However, while the border situation still remains abnormal with heavy deployment by both sides, no violent confrontation has been reported in recent months.

While India will be happy to receive the ambassador, it's unlikely to make any significant or immediate difference to the current state of relationship, especially as India heads to polls. The government has continued to maintain that ties can't be normalised till China fully addresses the situation in eastern Ladakh, which resulted from the 2020 military standoff, and foreign minister S Jaishankar said in an interview to TOI earlier this month that India must show perseverance and endurance on China. He added that beyond the boundary issue, it's even about how India is perceived as a strategic entity. In its military and diplomatic talks with China to fully resolve the standoff in eastern Ladakh, India's position has been that the relationship can progress only by maintaining peace and tranquillity at the border.

China says the border issue should not be linked to bilateral relations and points to the fact that the two sides have achieved disengagement at four places in eastern Ladakh. However, there are other places like Depsang and Demchok where the stalemate is yet to be broken. Both sides have held 20 rounds of corps commander-level meeting to resolve the standoff, with focus now on resolution of the remaining issues and maintenance of peace on the ground in the interim.

A New Great Game: China, India, and the Dalai Lama

29 January 2024, Jalis Akhtar Nasiri, Bitter Winter

Beijing is challenging India's historical connection with Buddhism, presenting it as an "ancient Chinese religion." Its aim is political, its disregard for human rights is obvious.

The Dalai Lama with U.S. Undersecretary of State and Special Coordinator for Tibetan issues Uzra Zeya in July 2023 in New Delhi. Credits.

The Panchen Lama, traditionally the second-highest leader in Tibetan Buddhism, holds immense spiritual and political power. However, this role has become entangled in a political struggle between the Dalai Lama and the Chinese government. Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, recognized by the Dalai Lama as the 11th Panchen Lama, was abducted by the Chinese government in 1995 at the age of six. In his place, the Chinese government appointed Gyaltsen Norbu, who lacks legitimacy among Tibetans and serves more as a political mouthpiece for the Communist Party. Tibetans view Gyaltsen Norbu as a puppet, isolated and controlled by the Chinese authorities. He promotes Sinicization and communist ideology, urging Tibetans to assimilate into Chinese culture and accept the Party's rule. This, naturally, draws ridicule and fuels non-acceptance, highlighting the failure of the Chinese government to gain true legitimacy in Tibet.

It is now well known that for the last few years China has begun framing Buddhism as an "ancient Chinese religion" and is granting its citizens a certain freedom to practice it. This move holds potential benefits for both domestic and international spheres. Within China, the promotion of government-controlled Buddhism is seen as a tool for promoting social stability, particularly in restive areas like the Tibet Autonomous Region and other Tibetan communities. By emphasizing shared cultural heritage, the government hopes to ease tensions and foster cohesion. Beyond its borders, China seeks to leverage its growing role in Buddhism to gain influence in neighbouring regions. By establishing itself as a key patron and influencer of powerful Buddhist organizations, China aims to bolster its soft power and expand its geopolitical reach.

India, the birthplace of Buddhism, sees the religion through a different lens. India embraces Buddhism as a tool for both diplomacy and cultural preservation. On the one hand, India uses Buddhism to build stronger ties with its Southeast Asian neighbours who share the faith. On the other, India offers a safe haven for Tibetan Buddhists fleeing religious persecution and sees the preservation of their traditions as an important duty. So, India recognizes its potential to foster both international relationships and the well-being of its diverse citizenry.

The future of Tibetan Buddhism and China's control over Tibet hinge on the selection of the next Dalai Lama. The current Dalai Lama, aging and nearing the end of his life, remains a symbol of Tibetan religious and political aspirations, contested by China who considers Tibet its own. Historically, Tibetan leaders resisted Chinese authority, while China, pointing to their past influence, asserts dominance. China desperately needs the Dalai Lama to return and recognize their rule. Failing that, they aim to appoint their own Dalai Lama, controlling the Tibetan religious hierarchy and solidifying their grip on the region. This, however, risks further unrest and resentment, as centuries of tension have not softened Tibetan resistance to Chinese control.

China's project is to challenge India's historical connection to Buddhism and control the narrative around the Dalai Lama. India has consistently treated the Dalai Lama as a revered guest, recently underscoring this regard with birthday wishes from Prime Minister Modi. This action resonates deeply, as India and Tibet share a centuries-old Buddhist bond. This historical link is further strengthened by Tibetan culture's deep roots in Indian philosophy and practices, including the concept of reincarnation and the meticulous selection of the Dalai Lama.

However, this historical harmony was disrupted in 1949 when China invaded Tibet. India swiftly condemned the invasion and recognized Tibet's independence, citing its established institutions and deep cultural ties to India. China's subsequent aggression, both internally and towards India in 1962, aimed to erase Buddhist traditions and assert regional dominance. Ultimately, the Dalai Lama's escape to India in 1959 and India's acknowledgement of Tibet's stifled autonomy cemented the complex, intertwined history between Buddhism, India, and China.

Geshe Lhakdor, a respected Tibetan Buddhist scholar, argues that China's attempts to lead the Buddhist world through spectacles like "World Buddhist Conferences" are a smokescreen. Their real motive is to legitimize their control over Tibet by installing their handpicked Panchen Lama, Gyaltsen Norbu, as the supreme Buddhist leader. This effort has backfired. The world recognizes Norbu as a puppet, parroting Chinese propaganda. China's obsession with this charade stems from its need to justify its brutal occupation of Tibet, marked by forced disappearances, torture, and suppression of Tibetan culture. The plight of the Panchen Lama embodies both China's oppression and Tibet's resistance. Under Chinese rule, the traditional role and spiritual heritage of the Panchen Lama face an existential threat. Norbu's subservience to the Chinese government is a hollow symbol of their failed attempt to control Tibetan Buddhism.

China's disregard for human rights extends far beyond Tibet. Despite being a major world power, it fails to uphold international law and treaties, silencing dissent and oppressing minorities like Uyghurs and Mongolians. This refusal to respect basic human dignity and engage in international scrutiny exposes China's true agenda.

The Uyghurs are a Turkic people with a rich history dating back thousands of years. They have established various kingdoms and empires, but for decades have faced challenges maintaining their independence. After several attempts at autonomy in the 20th century, China established the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region in 1955. While initially peaceful, Uyghur grievances regarding immigration, cultural erasure, and economic disenfranchisement have intensified in recent years. Since 2017, China has faced accusations of mass detention, forced labour, and other human rights violations against Uyghurs, sparking international condemnation and concerns of genocide. Despite China's claims of normalcy, independent evidence suggests continued oppression and hardship for the Uyghur Muslim population in Xinjiang.

Similarly, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) has implemented a policy mandating Mandarin Chinese as the medium of instruction in Inner Mongolia, replacing the region's native Mongolian in core subjects like language, politics, and history. This move sparked significant protests, with hundreds of ethnic Mongolians facing arrests or forced resignations from public office for expressing dissent. Beyond suppressing peaceful demonstrations, the CCP's policy blatantly contradicts its own laws, which encourage minority language education.

This push for Mandarin assimilation mirrors similar tactics used against other ethnicities like Uyghurs and Tibetans, raising concerns about cultural suppression and forced national unification. Chimeddorj, a local professor, poignantly summarizes the grave implications: "If our language is wiped out, we as a distinct people will also cease to exist." The CCP's actions highlight a broader pattern of cracking down on minority cultures and religions in the name of social stability and national unity, raising troubling questions about human rights and cultural preservation in China.

The world must remain vigilant. The Panchen Lama controversy is a microcosm of a larger struggle for human rights and cultural preservation. Only through unwavering Tibetan resistance and international solidarity can Tibet achieve justice and self-determination.

In conclusion, China's manipulation of Tibetan Buddhism, epitomized by the Panchen Lama controversy, exposes a broader struggle involving human rights violations and cultural suppression. The abduction of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima and the imposition of Gyaltsen Norbu illustrate China's attempts to control Tibet's spiritual heritage. This strategic manoeuvring extends beyond Tibet, as seen in the Uyghur and Mongolian regions. The Dalai Lama's pivotal role in the power play signifies a geopolitical tussle between China and India, challenging historical ties. Geshe Lhakdor's critique unveils China's deceptive leadership in the Buddhist world, revealing a smokescreen to legitimize control. The world must remain vigilant, recognizing the urgency for human rights and cultural preservation, urging solidarity to counter China's oppressive narrative and ensure justice for Tibet and beyond.

Atheist China should have no say in Dalai Lama's reincarnation

29 January 2024, Tsewang Gyalpo Arya, The Japan Times

Beijing has staked a claim to the leader's succession by distorting history

Celebrations mark the Dalai Lama's 80th birthday in Dharamsala, India, in July 2015. The question of who will succeed the Tibetan leader, Tenzin Gyatso, now 88, looms large.

Since the occupation of Tibet in 1950, the Chinese Communist Party has persistently distorted historical facts to interfere in Tibetan religious matters.

This includes the process to select the reincarnation of the 14th Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso, who is now 88 years old and whose international popularity has kept his people's plight alive on the global stage. Buddhists believe that an enlightened being and highly accomplished master may consciously propose to be reborn for the benefit of others. In Tibet, this is known as tulku and the system is deeply embedded in its religious culture. Among the many reincarnated masters respected and revered by Tibetans, the Dalai Lama is the highest spiritual leader, or lama.

To gain total control over this foundational pillar of Tibetan culture and interfere in the reincarnation process, China issued Order No. 5 in 2007 and, last year, Order No. 19. These laws are a gross violation of Article 18 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Article 36 of the Chinese Constitution, which protect religious freedom.

The CCP is avowedly atheist and possesses no belief in the concept of life after death. "Religion is poison," Mao Zedong said during one of his early meetings with the 14th Dalai Lama, in the 1950s. Soon after, China started destroying a total of over 6,000 monasteries and nunneries throughout Tibet. The destruction of statues of the Buddha, closure of the Larung Gar and Yachen Gar monastic centers in 2016 and 2019 respectively, and demolition of Drago Monastery's school in 2021 are but a few instances of continued religious persecution.

The world is also aware of the disappearance of the 11th Panchen Lama, one of the top Tibetan religious figures, and how China installed its own puppet replacement in 1995 – and how it is forcing Tibetans to venerate this false leader.

It is preposterous for China to claim authority over the selection of monks. Through official decrees and proclamations, and a series of articles in the Global Times, a CCP mouthpiece, China has affirmed authority over the reincarnation system, staking this claim in ancient practices. "Titles are understood in traditional Chinese law as 'imperial commendations,' that is, 'honorary titles' granted by the Central Government of China to the leaders of religious sects," according to the Global Times. However, such assertions are based on a distorted reading of history.

Firstly, most of these titles were given during the time of Yuan (1271-1368) and Qing (1644-1912) rule. As both dynasties were not Chinese, the connotation of a Chinese central government is wrong and out of context: China was then a territory occupied by the Mongol Yuan and, subsequently, Manchu Qing.

The Dalai Lama's reincarnation system dates back to the 14th and 15th centuries, when the 2nd Dalai Lama, Gedun Gyatso – the reincarnation of the 1st Dalai Lama, Gedun Drupa – was born in 1475. This system has continued all the way to the current Tibetan Buddhist leader and China's claim that it has controlled the process since ancient times is a lie.

The title of dalai lama was not conferred, for the first time, on Sonam Gyatso, the 3rd Dalai Lama, by an emperor of the Ming dynasty (1368-1644) that ruled China at the time. It was Altan Khan, the Mongol king, who – after receiving teachings from Sonam Gyatso — gave him the title dalai, meaning "ocean of wisdom," in 1578. The spiritual leader, in turn, offered the title dharma raja, or "religious king," to Altan Khan. This goes to show that the offering of honorary titles was not a unilateral imposition, but a bilateral process, meant as a gesture of goodwill and diplomatic courtesy, in this case between the Tibetan master and Mongol ruler.

It was in 1792, when Tibet sought the help of the Qing rulers to drive out the invading Gurkha force of Nepal, that the Manchu emperor wrote a set of regulations in 29 points for the effective administration of Tibet. It was suggested that the selection of the Dalai Lama and Panchen Lama's reincarnations should be done by drawing names from a "golden urn." But this came more in the form of advice than a decree and, except for the selection of the 11th Dalai Lama in the mid-19th century, this method was never used.

China has recently asserted that reincarnated living Buddhas should be found within the country, selected using the golden urn and receive approval from the central government — implying that all those outside Tibet are disqualified. But tulku can be reborn anywhere; it is up to the individual to decide. There have been many reincarnated lamas in India, Nepal, Mongolia, Bhutan and other countries. For example, the 4th Dalai Lama was born in Mongolia and the sixth in India.

Before departing this world, high lamas leave hints with close associates or a designated committee as to where their reincarnations should be found. The committee then looks for a child born in the region indicated and, after studying and conducting tests on the prospective lama, the reincarnation is confirmed. This process involves traditional religious rituals, including consultations with deities.

In a statement from September 2011, the 14th Dalai Lama made clear that his reincarnation is his choice and that nobody has the right to interfere in it. The purpose of reincarnation is to continue spiritual work for the benefit of the masses, he affirmed, so if his successor were to be born in a region where freedoms are restricted, the very purpose of reincarnation would be lost. The Dalai Lama's reincarnation will, therefore, be found in a free country.

In 2019, representatives from the international Tibetan community and heads of Tibetan religious schools met in Dharamsala, India — home to the Tibetan government in exile — and unanimously asked China to stay out of the reincarnation issue. Similar statements have come from Tibetan groups in Japan, India, Vietnam and Europe.

The United States government made clear in its 2020 Tibet Policy and Support Act that any interference from China will be confronted at the international level.

Instead of intimidation and threats, a warmer approach from Beijing would do better to win over people's hearts. As for the selection of the 15th Dalai Lama, only respect for and understanding of Tibetans' beliefs will lead to real harmony. In contrast, continued meddling in their spiritual domain will further distance them from Beijing.

Beware of Thermo Fisher's Net

28 January 2024, Tibetan Review

Palden Sonam* argues that the American company Thermo Fisher Scientific's recent statement that it had stopped the sale of its DNA-based human identification technology in Tibet Autonomous Region, though a symbolic victory to the campaigners, will have little effect since China can still bring it in by other means.

The American company Thermo Fisher Scientific recently issued a statement that it had halted sale of its DNA-based human identification technology in the so-called Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR). This was the result of an active campaign by rights organisations like Students for a Free Tibet as the Chinese authorities have been misusing the technology for mass DNA collection from Tibetans for surveillance and control. It is a symbolic victory.

However, given the superficiality of Thermo Fisher's statement, there is little cause for reassurance — indeed much less to celebrate. This is, of course, not to minimize the efforts of those who campaigned for it to hold Thermo Fisher accountable for its complicity in the pervasive repression of Tibetan people. In fact, it is their peaceful pressure that led Thermo Fisher to make such a statement even though it does not appear to change the availability of its DNA toolkits for Chinese security agents in occupied Tibet owing to several factors.

First, in its statement, Thermo Fisher mentioned that it stopped the sale of its products in the TAR, which includes only the western part of Tibet. It excluded Kham and Amdo regions of Tibet where, similar numbers, if not more, Tibetans live. This means that Chinese authorities can continue to collect DNA from Tibetans living in the Tibetan territories divided and ruled within different Chinese provinces like Qinghai, Sichuan, Gansu and Yunnan using Thermo Fisher's technology. Beijing's drive to build a mass DNA database of Tibetans is not confined to those living in the TAR but also includes Tibetan in other Tibetan regions beyond TAR.

Second, even if Thermo Fisher paused selling its DNA testing kits in TAR, this does not preclude it from transferring the same technology to it through other Chinese regions. Past record of the company fails to allow much room for hope that this will not happen. All these years, the company turned a blind eye while China used its technology in Xinjiang and Tibet to build mass DNA databases for aggressive surveillance of Uighurs and Tibetans. It was only under public pressure from human rights groups and investors that it began to show some signs of uneasiness about its deals with China.

Third, Beijing and Thermo Fisher speak different languages but the meaning is the same – the former said that rumours of its DNA collection drive in Tibet is a “groundless accusation” while the latter stated that its toolkits are not misused. At least the impression they tried to create is that no mass DNA collection has been done by Chinese authorities in TAR, and, therefore, no misuse of Thermo Fisher technology took place, contrary to credible evidence found by internationally respected organisations like Human Rights Watch, Citizen Lab, and others.

Fourth, in this context, Thermo Fisher’s brief statement is more an attempt to save its brand image rather than an acknowledgement of its failure to prevent the misuse of its technology for human rights abuses. In order to defend itself, it also has to defend China. This is evident from its statement that “our sales of this technology in Tibet Autonomous Region are consistent with routine forensic investigation in an area of this size.” This claim, however, does not corroborate with research findings on the issue. The scale of the mass DNA collection drive in Tibetan regions go beyond the scope of normal criminal investigation – from targeting children as young as five to women and Buddhist monks.

Fifth, Thermo Fisher also added that its biotechnology is used for purposes ranging “from tracking down criminals, to stopping human trafficking and freeing the unjustly accused”. However, a company as resourceful as Thermo Fisher knows that the greatest threat to the life and liberty of Tibetan people today does not come from some underground criminal gangster groups but the totalitarian Chinese state and its repressive colonial rule.

The question is, what meaningful differences does the Chinese security establishment having possession of the Thermo Fisher technology make to those unjustly imprisoned, detained or disappeared Tibetan political prisoners or their families? Will the people of Tibet ever find out about the status and whereabouts of the Panchen Lama, who has remained kidnapped by Beijing since 1995 when he was only six years old? For that matter, will the niece of Tenzin Delek Rinpoche – who lives now in the US, ever know under what circumstances her uncle – a Buddhist leader, died in Chinese jail in 2015? As recently as on January 15, Tsedon, a Tibetan college student, died in Chinese police custody in Nyemo county (TAR) after being detained by Chinese security agents in December for unknown reasons and her family was denied her body. Will her family ever know how she died in the hands of Chinese security agents?

The answer, Thermo Fisher knows best, is a big NO. The colonial power in Tibet seeks hi-tech tools like DNA testing kits more to control an occupied nation rather than to curb crime. DNA databases are a part of a digital totalitarian system in Tibet and, the supply of Thermo Fisher’s technology contributes to the efficiency of the same repressive system that violates the rights and dignity of the Tibetan people. It is clear that Thermo Fisher’s statement seemed to be more a strategy to dodge public criticism of its dealings with the Chinese security bureau in Tibet than an expression of its sincerity to rectify its past failures or wrongs. It is a public relations net thrown by Thermo Fisher in which those concerned are expected to jump and sing: “Oh! Thermo Fisher has done a great job.”

We need, therefore, to be aware of this shrewd net, lest we too end up as another thread in its cast net that shrouds the reality. The reality of a nexus between a totalitarian colonial regime pushing for the maximum intrusive surveillance against an occupied people and a multinational corporation whose motive is to milk the maximum profits, even if it means at the cost of other people’s freedom and human rights, needs to be exposed.

China is preparing for ‘history warfare’ that India must counter

27 January 2024, Uday India

Recently, news circulated that after the Galwan incident, which claimed the lives of 20 Indian soldiers and some 40 Chinese soldiers in June 2020, new clashes would have taken place between India and China on the Line of Actual Control (LAC). This probably explains why External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar often mentions that relations between the two Asian giants are ‘not normal’.

Clashes would have taken at least twice on the LAC during the past three years, China would have attempted to violently attack some Indian Army checkpoints (probably not in Ladakh) between September 2021 and November 2022.

General Manoj Pande, the Chief of Army Staff, himself stated that the situation on the border with China was ‘stable, yet sensitive’.

While these incidents need to be taken seriously (and they are, by the Indian Army), they show the limits of the Chinese ability to militarily create mischief on the northern border.

Opening New Fronts

In this context, there is no doubt that Xi Jinping's regime will try to open new fronts, perhaps not so visible, but which could lead to serious consequences if India is caught napping.

One of these is what could be called 'History Warfare', through which Communist China will try to prove that it has always occupied the Tibetan plateau and that the borders areas (whether Tibet or Xinjiang) have always been under Chinese possession.

Earlier this month, The Global Times, the mouthpiece of the Chinese Communist Party asserted: "Half-decade-long frontier archaeology yields major discoveries, reveals diverse yet united Chinese civilization."

The article says that in Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region, nearly 80 archaeological projects were taken up between 2019 and 2023.

Why is Chinese control suddenly projected far from the historical frontiers of the Middle Kingdom (represented by the Great Wall of China); the answer is clear, all these areas are part of China since immemorial times: "archaeological projects in Xinjiang, along with other discoveries made in North China's Inner Mongolia Autonomous Region, Southwest China's Yunnan Province, and other parts of the country, have contributed greatly to the enrichment of the current research landscape of China's frontier archaeology."

A new term has come into being 'frontier archaeology'; in fact a China Frontier Archaeology Symposium was recently held in Beijing; its declared objective was "to facilitate discussions about future topics in Chinese archaeology."

Ethnic cultural diversity

The Symposium looked into questions such as 'ethnic cultural diversity' or 'ancient Silk Road cultural exchanges'. A 'frontier' archaeologist, Chen Hurong told The Global Times that this reflects "the unique value of frontier archaeology. ...Compared with many inland archaeological projects, frontier histories can often vividly depict ancient China's exchanges with other cultures."

Another Chinese 'expert' affirmed that apart from Xinjiang and Xizang autonomous regions, northern China is also the birthplace of many 'frontier sites'. Note that 'Xizang' is the new name for 'Tibet', a century-old nation which no longer has a name of its own.

According to Party's mouthpiece: "Extending the Chinese frontier archaeological landscape to Southwest China's Xizang [Tibet] Autonomous Region, more than 10 research sites have been investigated in the last five years including the Nwya Devu and Sang Kar Gang sites."

The Nwya Devu (Nyadeu in Tibetan) is an archaeological site located in the eastern Changthang region of Nagchu Prefecture, at the altitude of 4,600 m (15,092 ft) above sea level. It is the highest known archaeological site from the Paleolithic area; it is supposed offer evidence for one of the earliest known presences of humans at high-altitude ...around 40,000-30,000 BP (before present era).

The conclusion of the research will undoubtedly be that Tibetans are 'Chinese' since 30,000 or more years, and the 1950 invasion was simply a forced 'return to the motherland'.

Another site has witnessed extensive excavations by the Chinese Academy of Sciences' Institute of Tibetan Plateau Research (ITP); called Sang Kar Gang, it is located near Lhasa, the Tibetan capital: "Over 1,000 stone artifacts were unearthed, providing crucial materials for the understanding of the earliest human migration into the central Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, their routes and survival strategies."

This highly-political research explores "the process of early human adaptation to the plateau is also crucial to gaining a comprehensive and in-depth understanding of the formation and evolution of modern populations in Xizang." Adaption from where? The answer is obviously from China.

Xinjiang and Inner Mongolia are also being excavated to show the extent of the Chinese influence, millennia ago.

To link it with contemporary China, The Global Times is not shy to admit: "Many cross-cultural frontier archaeological projects conducive to the China-proposed Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) have been launched."

The Situation on the Indian Side

On the Indian side, not much has been done to confront the History Warfare onslaught.

However, The Times of India recently reported a study claiming that natives of Ladakh clearly share their genetic heritage with India and Tibet, not China: "The research asserts that the three lakh natives of the region are a genetic mix of 60% from India and Western Eurasia and 40% from Tibet." The conclusions of the research were published in the international magazine 'Research Reports' in the US. This is good news.

The research team comprised DNA sequencing experts from Benares Hindu University's zoology department, led by Prof Gyaneshwar Chaubey, experts in archaeology as well as some Ladakhi scholars, including Padma Shri Dr Tsering Norbu (a retired Ladakhi surgeon), Dr Sonam Splanzin (the first woman Ladakhi archaeologist) and Dr Stanzen. The team studied 122 samples (98 females and 24 males), all belonging to the Bot tribe, from two places in Central Ladakh.

Prof Chaubey explained: "Ladakh is the highest inhabited region of India and has unique biodiversity. With a population of nearly 3 lakh people, Ladakh is an example of long-term human occupation going back at least to the Paleolithic period."

It was earlier unknown whether genetic and archaeological diversity in the mountainous region has developed indigenously or resulted from gene flow from distinct geographic regions.

The interesting conclusion of the research is that the genetic component of the samples is completely different from the ancestry of China.

Trans-Himalayan Archeology

Another attempt to explore the past has been conducted by archeologist Vinod Nautiyal and his team; according to them: "The Trans-Himalayan region, which runs parallel to the main Himalayan Range and south of the Tibetan Plateau, has not been explored extensively because of its rough terrain. Early work reported human burials from Leh in Jammu and Kashmir but the most significant evidence comes from Malari in Uttarakhand where a cave burial culture dated c. 200–100 BC has been identified."

They admit that in contrast "across the Himalayas in Mustang, western Nepal, a large number of multi-storey caves used both for burial and habitat ion between c. 1200 BC and AD 1500 have been excavated."

They quoted the Kinnaur district of Himachal Pradesh which boasts of only two sites which can provide information on human burial; these burials have been dated speculatively to c. 2500–200 BC: "Neither of these sites, nor the human remains, have been subject to any archaeological or further scientific investigation," they admit.

It is a fact that not much has so far been written about the migration and the trans-Himalayan relations.

Similarly, the Franco-Indian Archaeological Mission in Ladakh (Mission Archéologique Franco-Indienne au Ladakh, or MAFIL) was created in 2012. It was founded as a joint venture with the Archaeological Survey of India (ASI).

Their objective is to show in an irrefutable manner, that Buddhism was present in Ladakh in the last quarter of the first millennium AD and maybe as early as the middle of the first millennium. The only material evidence comes from rare rock inscriptions. This is important, but it lacks the trans-Himalayan aspect.

More importantly, studies need to be conducted on the ancient kingdom of Zhangzhung; it could document the intense activities and contacts between Northern India, the Tibetan plateau and Central Asia, while these remained minimal with China.

A friend who has done extensive archeology in Spiti, recently wrote to me: "I am looking at mineral resource data for western Tibetan Plateau, as of the 2nd Millennium BCE. I have managed to convince myself that the Indus Valley Civilization (IVC) used Ladakh, Zaskar and Spiti as well as Ngari as sources for minerals and other raw resources in the Bronze Age. ...Gold, silver, copper, iron, lead and precious stones (eg, sapphires, turquoise, crystals, agate, steatite) would have been traded; but also wool, animal skins, and timber products. The IVC could have exchanged these items with finished metal objects."

This is worth digging into further to counter China in this new form of warfare.

China's Preference for Hard Power Is Creating Major Headaches for Beijing

26 January 2024, The Diplomat

Taiwan's election result points to a broader trend: China is failing to use soft power effectively, and paying the reputational price.

The Taiwanese presidential election on January 13, won by Vice President Lai Ching-te (or William Lai) of the ruling Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), was hardly welcomed by China. The Chinese government had actively opposed the DPP. It has been accused, not for the first time, of electoral interference in favor of its preferred candidates.

After the election, the Chinese Foreign Ministry said in a statement, "Whatever changes take place in Taiwan, the basic fact that there is only one China in the world and Taiwan is part of China will not change." The statement reiterated the One China principle and re-affirmed Beijing's opposition to "'Taiwan independence' separatism." Punctuating its position, Beijing condemned foreign leaders who extended congratulations to Lai, and welcomed Nauru into an official relationship as the Pacific island state severed ties with Taiwan just two days after the election.

While the response of the Chinese Foreign Ministry was expected and Nauru's de-recognition of Taiwan not unexpected, the Taiwanese election points toward a larger problem with Chinese foreign policy over the past decade. Broadly speaking, there has been a shift away from a relatively sanguine view of China's peaceful rise, where Beijing's power and influence was perceived as a common good across the international community, to a more nuanced and cynical perception of Chinese objectives.

The first perception is firmly associated with the discourse regarding China's peaceful rise and the idea of "responsible power" as exemplified by President Hu Jintao's call in 2005 for "common security and prosperity" and a "harmonious world" at the plenary meeting of the United Nations

Summit. From this perspective, China's increased influence and material power would benefit the globe and provide a non-Western perspective and economic heft to tilt the international political economy more toward the Global South. But that image has fractured amid China's increasing willingness to use its material power to pursue its own interests – to the detriment of both individual states and the international order.

Much of this change in perception has occurred since the adoption of a more assertive “wolf warrior” foreign policy and diplomatic language, which has been materially and rhetorically committed to opposing liberal values and democratic institutions in favor of a more robust defense of Chinese values, China's territorial claims, and the extension of Chinese material power. Concens deepened with the use of China's trade and investment prominence to “punish” states, such as Australia and Lithuania, that pursue policies or hold viewpoints that China considers unacceptable.

In some instances, this has generated a dangerous cycle of mutual recriminations as politicians in other states have focused on Beijing's actions and rhetoric to sustain their own power based on insular nationalist tropes and appeals. As such, China has been more and more confronted by the United States, the European Union, United Kingdom, and other states across a range of areas. China has had border clashes with India and is the target of recalibrations in the defense policies of Australia, Japan, and the Philippines. Still other states are openly attempting to lessen their dependence on Chinese trade and investment.

This is not to say that Chinese foreign policy has been unsuccessful over the past decade. The Belt and Road Initiative, despite criticisms, has generated goodwill and has left a wide swathe of beneficial infrastructure while creating numerous opportunities across large areas of Africa and Southeast Asia. China has extended and deepened its presence and control over the South China Sea. Outside of the West, China has largely sidelined human rights concerns regarding Xinjiang, Tibet, and Hong Kong while supporting authoritarian regimes such as Myanmar.

Beijing has extended its presence into the Indian Ocean (through outreach to the Maldives and Sri Lanka) and the South Pacific (through a defense agreement with Solomon Islands). It has extended its influence in areas such as Latin America, the Sahel and the Pacific, enabling smaller states the opportunity to counterbalance the previous colonial powers, which have been able to maintain their sphere of influence over the areas. China is an indispensable player in addressing global problems such as climate change and biodiversity loss.

In short, it has become a superpower, its actions and omissions to act impacting the international system in a variety of ways.

Yet the costs and significant pushback from other states undermine the long-term viability of Chinese foreign policy objectives and instruments. Three recent policies have particularly set back China's influence: Its full-throated extension of mainland authority into Hong Kong in the face of pro-democracy protests in 2019-20, its support of the Russian invasion of Ukraine in 2021, and its weaponization of trade.

First, China's blunt assertion of control over Hong Kong undermined Chinese credibility in regards to treaty obligations and rule of law. It also significantly altered political, economic and social perceptions of the Taiwan situation both inside and outside the island.

Second, China's rhetorical support of the Russian invasion of Ukraine has been a dramatic departure from Beijing's traditional insistence on state sovereignty and “non-interference” as the underlying principles of its foreign policy. Chinese support of Russia magnifies and re-vivifies the former “sphere of influence” politics as an accepted method of international politics; Russia has made no attempt to hide its desire to regain its sphere of influence in Eastern Europe as a war objective. This conception of international order, with a diminished role for international law, leaves smaller states more at the mercy of larger states. As such, states across the Asia-Pacific (especially those with territorial disputes with China) have increasingly sought outside allies and armed might to counter perceived Chinese intentions, fueling a security dilemma and additional insecurity in the region.

Third, China's willingness to use its economic power to “punish” states has alarmed foreign governments. China implemented tariffs on a variety of Australian exports after Canberra called for a WHO investigation into the source of COVID-19. Beijing went further in the case of Lithuania, which opened a new Taiwanese representative office, not only banning exports from the country but threatening to ban products from third countries that sourced intermediate parts from Lithuania. These cases illustrated the risks some states might suffer amid large trade and investment asymmetries with China.

Power and influence – both in terms of hard power, such as military or economic might, and soft power, such as cultural attractiveness – is exercised in many ways across the international system. The mistake that Chinese policymakers have made in the past decade is they have tended to rely too much on “hard” power as a tool to achieve their desired foreign policy objectives. Instead, China must embrace soft power approaches and cultural attractiveness if it is going to continue its peaceful rise.

This has not been lost on Chinese policymakers. President Xi Jinping has embraced the historical narratives of the Chinese civilization, highlighting peaceful trade across the Silk Road and maritime Asia as well as shared colonial humiliations as a way to open a window of mutual interests with developing states. Yet, the notion of soft power must not simply be rhetorical. In the Asia-Pacific, the proffered narrative has too often resulted in Chinese policymakers substituting the realization of Beijing's international objectives as a universal "pan-Asian" good – a tendency shared with other nations such as the United States – instead of acknowledging the cacophonous diversity and different interests found within and across each Asia-Pacific state.

More importantly, the effective use of soft power must also include a willingness to compromise and re-articulate core interests in the face of opposition by other states or the international community. This use of soft power necessarily involves political choices. And these political choices, while difficult, are open to Chinese policymakers. Unfortunately, some policies and political positions, such as Taiwan unification or Chinese sovereignty over the South China Sea have been promulgated and advertised with a high level of rhetorical content and commitment by the Chinese leadership. These types of policy commitments can create a "legitimacy trap" for policymakers and be more resistant to changes in material circumstances or compromise, as they tend to become bound up in the legitimacy of the regime or individual leader. This can privilege continued adherence to inappropriate and costly policies or political positions.

The Taiwanese election is an example of such a problem. Since the changes in Hong Kong, Taiwanese people have felt less and less attraction to China. This is hardly surprising, as Beijing insists on the same "One Country, Two Systems" formula used in Hong Kong as its overarching goal for Taiwan. At the same time, the DPP, as a governing party, has softened its independence rhetoric to embrace the "status quo."

Yet Chinese policymakers have been unable to adjust to these new changes, leaving them unable to harness the cultural affinities that exist between Taiwan and the mainland. Instead, Chinese leaders have doubled down on the rhetoric and policy frameworks that undermine any effective application of soft power or seek compromise. This has enflamed nationalism, both in China and across the region, and raises the potential that Chinese policymakers may be "trapped" by their own rhetoric into actions that may lead to violence.

While one cannot doubt the intensity of Chinese feeling over Taiwan, in other parts of the world such as Northern Ireland, Sudan/South Sudan and the former Yugoslavia, the parties have put aside their emotions and made arrangements that over time can provide the possibility for better lives and new approaches to ethnic and political conflict. A more generous approach, and a more inclusive and less insular approach to foreign policy, would better serve Chinese and regional interests.

US company must stop supplying China's regime with DNA surveillance tech

25 January 2024, The Hill

The U.S. biomedical company Thermo Fisher Scientific announced on Jan. 5 that it will no longer sell human DNA identification technology to the Chinese police in the Tibet Autonomous Region. In 2019, it had made a similar decision to halt the sale of these products in Xinjiang, the northwestern region where the Chinese government's persecution of ethnic Uyghurs amounts to a crime against humanity. Helping to protect the rights of Tibetans and Uyghurs in China is essential, and Thermo Fisher's decisions are important and welcome. But they fall short of what is needed, given the gravity of abuses. And within China, the problem of mass DNA surveillance goes beyond these two regions.

Thermo Fisher's announcement sidesteps a key question: What about sales of its technology to Chinese police in other parts of the country?

In the past seven years, Human Rights Watch has documented that mass collection and cataloging of people's DNA form a part of the Chinese police's countrywide mass surveillance systems, which involves the use of facial and voice recognition technology, big data platforms, among other technologies. These technologies have empowered the Chinese government to maintain a vice-like grip on a complex society, from cities to its most remote borderlands, hunting down dissidents and neutralizing protests.

In 2017, Human Rights Watch exposed how the Chinese government was forcing ordinary people unconnected to crime throughout China to have their blood drawn and DNA samples taken. Without people's consent, the police put this genetic information into nationally searchable databases, which may now contain more than 140 million DNA profiles or 10 percent of China's population. The scale of such genomic surveillance is unprecedented in the world.

We also noted that Uyghurs in Xinjiang were being targeted in particular by the authorities for mass DNA surveillance schemes.

Human Rights Watch wrote to Thermo Fisher at that time about its findings. Thermo Fisher said then that “it is not possible” for the company to monitor the use of all its products, but that “we do expect all our customers to act in accordance with appropriate regulations and industry-standard best practices.” Thermo Fisher took no apparent action then and did not reply to a follow-up letter.

That year, the Chinese government ratcheted-up abuses against Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims in Xinjiang. In addition to Orwellian surveillance, the authorities carried out mass arbitrary detention in political education camps and prisons, forced labor, forced separations of families, sexual and reproductive abuses, and cultural persecution. These widespread and systematic abuses amounted to crimes against humanity. After two years of growing attention to these abuses, along with tireless campaigning by Uyghur activists and U.S. congressional pressure, Thermo Fisher stopped sales to Xinjiang police in 2019.

However, as Human Rights Watch pointed out to the company, mass DNA collection is not limited to Xinjiang. In 2022, Human Rights Watch and Citizen Lab independently documented such abusive DNA collection in Tibet. Thermo Fisher’s recent announcement that it would halt sales to Tibet was “based on a number of factors” that it did not specify.

By now, companies operating in China know or should know that the Chinese police’s deployment of technology for mass surveillance is a national project, and so stopping sales only to certain parts of China is far from adequate. In 2020, a report by the think tank Australian Strategic Policy Institute showed that Chinese police were building a male DNA database that would allow it to identify all men in the country, and that Thermo Fisher had played a key role in supplying technology to this chilling surveillance program.

One way to make sure Thermo Fisher’s equipment is used only for legitimate purposes would be for the company to put in place a rigorous human rights due diligence process. This would include independent auditing, to monitor all its clients in China, and making the audit findings public.

Until then, the company should halt all sales of human DNA identification products to China’s police, judiciary, and all forensic genetics labs. The company has not responded to Human Rights Watch regarding why it has not yet done so.

The U.S. Department of Commerce, which has since 2022 been empowered to impose export controls on U.S. technology for use by foreign “military, security, or intelligence services,” should also expand these controls to include key emerging technologies, including human DNA identification technology, as several members of Congress have repeatedly demanded.

Given the Chinese government’s dubious global leadership in innovating surveillance methods and systems, the next steps by companies like Thermo Fisher in China will invariably affect human rights around the world.

Opinion: Will Lai Ching-te move away from Tsai Ing-wen, The Tibet Question in Taiwan’s New Era

25 January 2024, Phayul

Taiwanese President Tsai Ing-wen flanked by Vice-President William Lai and his running mate Hsiao Bi-khim at a campaign rally in New Taipei City on election eve. (Photo/Reuters)

On May 20th, 2024, Lai Ching-te of the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) will be sworn in as the 8th President of the Republic of China (Taiwan) in a ceremony that will be closely watched not just by its allies, but more importantly by the almost Sauron like fiery Eye of Beijing. The DPP’s third consecutive presidential victory and fifth overall elicited a wave of positive acknowledgment from other “separatists’ factions”, a favored term of Beijing, including the Tibetan exile leadership, East Turkistan supporters, and Hong Kong advocates. The Dalai Lama’s congratulatory message for Lai underscored the importance of Taiwan’s “exercise of democracy” as “a source of encouragement for all of us who aspire to live in freedom and dignity”. On his X account (formerly Twitter), the President of the Central Tibetan Administration, Penpa Tsering, drew a parallel between the Tibetan exile polity and Taiwan, stating that “As a democracy in exile, Tibetans profoundly admire the spirit of self-determination exemplified by the people of Taiwan”.

Taiwanese and Tibetans are connected through the practice of Buddhism, and a small community of Tibetans and Tibetan monks reside in Taiwan, albeit with legal issues surrounding their residency. Politically, the two have always been entwined vis-à-vis their relations with the PRC. In her X post, the outgoing President of Taiwan, Tsai Ing-wen, expressed gratitude to the Dalai Lama for his recognition of “the importance of our exercise of democracy in Taiwan to freedom and dignity worldwide”. Both Taiwan and Tibet pose a security problem for China precisely because they challenge Beijing’s perception of its sovereignty and legitimacy to rule. The late Prof. Dawa Norbu noted that the Communist Party of China sees several similarities between Taiwan and Tibet in terms of the past and present issues that inform its vicious diatribe against the two. The DPP’s first presidential victory in 2000 was built upon the emergence of a wave of native Taiwanese nationalism replacing the then-ruling Kuomintang party that continued to talk about a unified “China” albeit with a different leadership. Both the incumbent President, Tsai Ing-wen, and the newly elected President on January 13, Lai Ching-te, belong to the generation of Taiwanese born in Taiwan with a strong sense of Taiwanese national identity. Under such historical and present circumstances of an increasingly assertive Taiwanese identity and interests, separate from China, and an apparent blossoming relationship between Tibetans in exile and Taiwan, one would be predisposed to believe that the Tibet issue will be prominently figured in these changing realities of Taiwanese socio-politics, leading to significant progress in Tibet – Taiwan relations.

Despite such optimistic assumptions for the future, the reality remains that for Taiwan’s leadership, whether it be the DPP or Kuomintang, the cross-straits relationship has always been prioritized over its support for the Tibetan National Movement (or even the Hong Kong or East Turkistan movements), and while its civil society has fostered and shared platforms with the latter, such transnational solidarity has been absent from Taipei’s public statements or actions. It is no wonder that while Tsai Ing-wen gushes over the Dalai Lama’s support for Taiwan’s exercise of democracy, she never contemplated meeting the Tibetan leader even once during her eight years in office, despite repeated requests to do so from Tibetans and sections of Taiwanese society. While former Presidents Lee Teng-hui and Chen Shui-bian met the Dalai Lama in 1997 and 2001 respectively, Tsai’s refusal to follow in their footsteps disappointed many who believed her presidency would signal a shift from the conciliatory approach towards Beijing of her predecessor Ma Ying-jeou with regards to the Tibet issue. Ironically the Dalai Lama’s third visit to Taiwan in 2009 occurred during Ma Ying-jeou’s Presidential tenure, a KMT stalwart and a favorite of the CCP. When Tsai succeeded him as a DPP leader, with a perceived image of a staunch bulwark against Beijing, the Dalai Lama’s visa to visit Taiwan in order to attend the 2019 Taiwan International Religious Freedom Forum and on the request of many other supporters was denied. Although her government denied even having received a visa application, RFA’s interviews with participants of the forum confirmed that the Dalai Lama was invited but he was unable to attend due to interventions of Taiwan’s Mainland Affairs Council. In my interview with the then Representative of Taipei’s Tibet Office and the current Director of the Tibet Policy Institute, Dawa Tsering, he revealed that prior to the Dalai Lama’s scheduled visit, his office received numerous correspondence from various channels imploring the Office of Tibet and thus the Dalai Lama to refrain from applying for the Taiwan visa in order to avoid antagonizing and suffering retaliation from Beijing. After much deliberations with the Dalai Lama, it was decided to comply with their requests. There was no public statement of rejection of the Dalai Lama’s proposed visit, and the Taiwan government maintained the position that they hadn’t received any application, a claim that was devoid of the actual context in which the decision was made.

The Tibet-Taiwan-China triangular relationship is commonly understood as a complex nexus, and that complexity and stagnancy persist even if China is ‘taken’ out of the equation, despite the impossibility of doing so in reality. Since the occupation of Tibet and the establishment of the Tibetan exile community in India and Nepal, the ROC, under Kuomintang, continued to maintain secretive relations with Tibetans inside and outside Tibet, and a rising antagonistic relationship with the Tibetan exile leadership, particularly with regards to the activities of the ROC’s Mongolian and Tibetan Affairs Commission (MTAC). It was the visit of the Dalai Lama to Taipei in 1997 that signaled a significant warming and shift in these relations, which was followed by two other visits in 2001 and 2009. Although the controversial vocational training program, run by the MTAC, for Tibetans from India to Taiwan, ended in 1999, following the visit of the Dalai Lama several Tibetans have moved to Taiwan either as part of individual ventures or for religious purposes. The institutionalization of this relationship was formalized in the establishment of the Office of Tibet in Taipei, immediately following the visit of the Dalai Lama in 1997.

However, Tibet and Tibetans continue to be obscured in the public perception of Taiwanese social and political demographic, whether it be due to the overwhelming presence of the cross-strait tension or the “government’s restriction of information on Tibet” [1]. During my year-long stay in Taiwan in 2017 as a Research Fellow, I encountered a similar reaction from the Taiwanese students, and general populace with regards to Tibet. I was rather amused by their wonder of seeing a Tibetan who was not a monk. On further pressing them on the matter, they spoke about how in their school textbooks, Tibetans were portrayed as individuals who lived on high mountains, with dark sun burnt skin and rosy cheeks. Their incredulous surprise on seeing a Tibetan woman who did not fit this mold was shocking, to say the least, displaying a severe lack of awareness of Tibet and Tibetans, which was compounded by the existence of such racial stereotypes. It would be too simplistic to condense it down to a mere lack of engagement at the policy level, but the reality remains that outside of Buddhism, Tibet, and Tibetans have not received a nuanced and realistic focus at various levels of Taiwanese society.

Was Tibet an independent country before its occupation by Communist China? Does it have the right to be one in the future? These questions lie at the core of the Tibet – Taiwan relationship. I spoke at the Geneva Forum in 2023, on the “One China” narrative in International Relations, and how Beijing’s push for its discourse with limited international resistance adds to its legitimacy and diplomatic muscle. Nicole Su, the Director General of the Taipei Cultural and Economic Delegation in Geneva, wholeheartedly agreed with this observation, and the continuing presence of Taiwan’s representatives in such CTA-led forums speaks to the mutual interests that bind the two. Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the CTA, in his 2021 meeting with the Taiwanese Representative to India, Baoshuan Ger, highlighted the mutual interest and concerns of the Tibetan and Taiwanese people.

However, this “camaraderie” does not reappear in the Taiwanese government’s official position on Tibet. Taiwan and Tibet “stand together” when it comes to opposing China but on a governmental level there has never been any indication of any support for Tibet’s “core issue” which is freedom from Communist occupation or the official position of the CTA i.e. genuine autonomy under the Middle Way Approach. Both the ROC and PRC claim Tibet as part of China, and while the KMT and the CCP have disagreed vehemently over the governance of China, both have not supported any change in Tibet’s present occupied status.[2] The DPP, unlike the KMT, has moved away from any vestigial ambitions of replacing the CCP as China’s government and has solely focused on governing Taiwan as a separate entity from the PRC. However, it has continued to maintain its silence on Tibet, and its political future to avoid antagonizing its cross-straits neighbor. This absence of reciprocity on its “mutual interest” with Tibetans is a major limitation in any hope of translating the relationship into a position of potential strength.

Such limitations have been materialized in the striking difference of support or acknowledgment of Tibet and Tibetans between the political leadership in Taipei and Taiwan’s Civil Society. While the engagement and solidarity between Tibetan exile society and Taiwan’s NGOs have increased in recent years (such as the Taiwan Foundation for Democracy and a few DPP legislative members), the same cannot be said for the Taiwanese political leadership. During Tsai-Ing Wen’s presidency, the Dalai Lama did not make a single visit to the country, despite its strong Buddhist population. While Tsai refused to meet the Tibetan and global leader as Taiwan’s President, she did not harbor such reservations during her meeting with the Dalai Lama in 2009 when she was still rising in the ranks of her party and Taiwan’s political leadership. She has even participated in Tibet support rallies, but that level of support was drastically reduced once she became President.

Tibet and the Tibetan issue receive solidarity not just from Taiwan’s NGOs, but also through its political sector, but that is limited to the lower rungs of the latter. It remains to be seen whether Lai Ching-te will seek to either emulate Tsai Ing-wen, the President of the Republic of China, or Tsai Ing-wen before her rise to the Presidency. Dawa Tsering, during our interview, noted that Lai Ching – te during his time as Mayor of Tainan City, visited the Office of Tibet to express gratitude for the Dalai Lama’s aid for the earthquake that devastated his city. His Vice President-elect, Hsiao Bi-khim, has frequently participated in Free Tibet rallies and served as Vice-Chair of the Taiwanese Parliamentary Group for Tibet when she was a Member of Parliament. Similar to Tsai-Ing wen’s ‘promotion’ from a DPP member to President, it would be too much of a stretch of one’s hope for Taiwan, under the new leadership of Lai and Hsiao, to acknowledge Tibet’s inherent right to determine its future. However, the Taiwanese Government’s policies vis-à-vis its allies not just Tibetans, but also Hong Kongers, Uyghurs, and Mongolians will be a litmus test of its mettle against Beijing’s aggressive demands for integration.

The PLA is in crisis. That won’t stop China invading Taiwan

25 January 2023, The Telegraph

Xi Jinping’s purge of corrupt officers suggests his army is in crisis, but he can’t resist the momentum towards war.

Over the last four years, there have been a series of clashes between the ground forces of the People’s Liberation Army and India’s defenders in the Himalayas. Despite substantial logistical and other material advantages, Chinese soldiers have performed poorly in combat.

The ground forces are unlikely to lead actions against the likely targets of Taiwan, the Philippines, or Japan, but the unexpectedly bad performance in the Himalayas raises a critical question: can the world's largest military, China's PLA, win wars?

As an initial matter, it's evident that the leadership of the Chinese military is in turmoil.

Turmoil is the almost inevitable result of the PLA reporting to the Communist Party of China, through the Party's Central Military Commission. Its status as a party army means the Chinese officer corps is even less professional than counterparts in most other countries.

The political masters of the PLA have been especially vigilant in exerting control after Marshall Lin Biao's attempted coup against Mao Zedong in 1971. "The Party commands the gun," Mao's phrase, or similar statements are often seen in official pronouncements. There are, as in many militaries in communist states, two reporting lines in China, and the political one is more important than the military chain of command. Politics are now consuming China's senior officers. Hong Kong's South China Morning Post reported at the end of last month that five current or former commanders of the Rocket Force were removed from both the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress and from China's top legislative body itself.

Last year, the top two officers of the Rocket Force, which controls almost all of China's nuclear weapons, were replaced. At least 70 in that branch have disappeared in recent months. There are reports that early last July, prior to the mass firings, the chief of the Rocket Force's Third Department committed suicide, by hanging.

At the same time, it appears Xi Jinping is generally purging officers opposed to war. Former air force general Liu Yazhou, a prominent military thinker, received a death sentence in February 2022 – revealed only last year – reportedly for outspoken opposition to an invasion of Taiwan.

Apparently, the chiefs of the largest state military contractors have their heads on the chopping block too. Three of them were removed from China's top advisory organ, the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, in December.

And then there is the recent case of the last defense minister, General Li Shangfu. He was last seen in public August 29 and was formally sacked October 24. His replacement was named only on December 29. The long and unexplained intervals suggest a long period of internal wrangling.

The official explanation of events in the past months is that Xi Jinping is ridding the military of "corrupt" officers. Yes, the officers removed are undoubtedly corrupt, but so are many if not most of the remaining generals and admirals. In general, "corruption" campaigns in Communist China – especially those directed against senior figures – are straight-out political purges.

What's going on in the Rocket Force? There are various theories. Xi Jinping could be installing officers who he believes will obey his orders to launch; Xi's handpicked men are being purged by his opponents; or Xi is becoming paranoid and, Stalin-like, is replacing his own people at a fast clip. There are no good implications for any of these theories.

James Fanell, co-author of the upcoming Embracing Communist China: America's Greatest Strategic Failure, told The Telegraph that the PLA is fit to fight, pointing out, among other things, that the Rocket Force has been successfully firing missiles at various targets like Taiwan and moving ships off Hainan Island. "For decades," he said, "the US intelligence community and Defense Department have consistently underestimated the capabilities of the People's Liberation Army and its intentions, whether denying the Chinese navy would pursue aircraft carriers 30 years ago or today's assertions that the PLA is not combat capable because of so-called 'purges' of officers."

So do all the disappearances, removals, and firings affect the ability of the PLA to go to war?

Short answer: We can only guess. Outsiders have less and less visibility inside the Chinese regime as it closes itself off from the rest of the world. Common sense, however, says the rapid replacement of officers has to be degrading readiness. At this moment, generals and admirals are undoubtedly paying at least as much attention to their personal enemies in their own ranks as to China's.

This churning – there are hints that the turnover will continue at least for another half year – suggests Xi Jinping is not confident that the military is ready to fight. This is not to say, however, that China will not end up in a war.

"China will surely be reunified, and all Chinese on both sides of the Taiwan Strait should be bound by a common sense of purpose and share in the glory of the rejuvenation of the Chinese nation," Xi declared in a paragraph that appears to list what will happen this year. Whatever his actual intentions, China's aggressive leader is creating markers by which his many – and growing number of – political enemies will judge him by. There seems to be an irresistible momentum to war inside the Chinese regime.

For many, great-power conflict is inconceivable. That, however, brings to mind Enoch Powell. Said the British politician, "History is littered with wars which everybody knew would never happen."

China is 'risky' for supply chains and India a favored destination for U.S. firms, survey shows

24 January 2024, CNBC

U.S. firms are increasingly viewing China as a risky bet for their supply chains — neighbor India is set to benefit as companies look elsewhere to set shop.

As many as 61% of the 500 executive-level U.S. managers surveyed by UK market research firm OnePoll said they would pick India over China if both countries could manufacture the same materials, while 56% preferred India to serve their supply chain needs within the next five years over China.

The survey showed that 59% of the respondents found it "somewhat risky" or "very risky" to source materials from China, compared with 39% for India.

At least a quarter of the executives who participated in the independent, third-party survey, commissioned by marketplace India Index in December, do not currently import from either China or India.

"Companies are seeing India as a long-term investment strategy as opposed to a short-term pivot to avoid tariffs," said Samir Kapadia, CEO of India Index and managing principal at Vogel Group, in an exclusive interview with CNBC.

Warming ties between the U.S. and India, spearheaded by President Joe Biden and Prime Minister Narendra Modi, with the former's "friendshoring" policy aimed at encouraging U.S. companies to diversify away from China have also made India an attractive alternative.

The relationship between the two countries entered a new chapter with Modi's state visit to the White House in June where a slew of deals on large collaborations in defense, technology and supply chain diversification were signed.

"The U.S. and China continue to sit in rather chilling air. Whereas there is a constant stream of iterations, conversations, dialogues and agreements between U.S. and India," Kapadia said.

India has seen a flurry of announcements about investments into the country in the recent past.

Earlier this month, Maruti Suzuki, announced that it would invest $4.2 billion to build a second factory in the country. Vietnamese electric auto maker VinFast also said in January that it aims to spend around $2 billion to set up a factory in India.

Risks still remain

Despite the optimism, U.S. firms are still cautious of India's supply chain capabilities.

The survey showed that 55% of the respondents found quality assurance was a "medium risk" they might face if they have factories in India.

In September, Apple supplier Pegatron had to temporarily cease operations at its factory in the Chengalpattu area near Chennai after a fire broke out.

Delivery risk (48%) and IP theft (48%) were also a worry for U.S. firms looking at India.

Other firms looking to fully or partially move their supply chains to India may not be able to duplicate Apple's fast presence in the country, warned Amitendu Palit, senior research fellow and research lead of trade and economics at the Institute of South Asian Studies.

"What Apple has done will not be able to be done immediately and as quickly by many other companies. Apple has the capacity to create an ecosystem much faster than other companies, so time must be factored in," Palit told CNBC in a Zoom interview.

Both Palit and Kapadia agreed that completely shifting supply chains away from China will not be possible.

"I don't think China will ever be taken out of the equation," Kapadia said. "The reality is that China will always be a cornerstone of U.S. supply chain strategy."

Investments into China still remain robust and it is still the "second choice" for investments after the U.S., said Raymund Chao, Asia-Pacific and China chairman at PwC.

Vietnam the next best bet?

Similar to India, Vietnam has been also been option on investors' minds when adopting a "China plus one" strategy.

The optimism in the Vietnamese market led to a more than 14% surge in foreign direct investments last year compared with 2022.

According to LSEG data, $29 billion in foreign direct investments were pledged to Vietnam from January to November last year.

But Vietnam will not be able to achieve what India can, Kapadia pointed out, explaining that the world's most populous country has access to "a very large customer base that Vietnam doesn't offer."

"Companies are not making these decisions for cost arbitrage. They're making these decisions for cost savings and access to markets. You're not going to see that same sort of benefit in just shifting to Vietnam," he added.

Fewer Westerners in China is bad for China — but worse for the West

24 January 2024, South China Morning Post

In his regular column in the Post, David Dodwell sometimes refers to a time in his youth when he serendipitously went to Pakistan and taught in a tribal area there in 1968. It was a life-changing event for him.

I've heard similar stories. One is from a former student. Decades ago, he briefly taught English in a remote area in Nepal and that also had a profound impact on his life. He admitted he was not qualified to teach, and thought at the time the area was so poor in so many ways that English seemed the last thing those students needed.

I also met English teachers in China many years ago, employed solely because they were from the West. They acknowledged they weren't good at teaching but all loved the experience. Most did not plan to teach for long. After one or two years, they moved on to other places and careers.

These stories used to be about personal experience and growth. But the recent development of Westerners leaving China puts those in a different perspective. Perhaps a shift in soft power dynamics between China and the West is happening right before our eyes?

For a long time, the West represented a superior culture in its scientific advancement, economic strength and enlightenment ideals. The English language has an undisputed dominance worldwide. All these factors enabled people like Dodwell to go to less developed places as volunteers or backpackers, take a temporary teaching job, and then move on, whereas the reverse is unimaginable. Although only briefly, they embraced a tougher living environment, interacted with local people and made new friends. Whether they realised it or not, this sojourn made them goodwill grass-roots ambassadors of the West, bringing different concepts and cultural practices to people much less privileged. China was once such a backward place, and it has received its share of grass-roots ambassadors since it opened up to the West in 1979. Gradually, the number of qualified teachers increased, as well as professionals and college students. Some brought their families. Consciously or not, they all exerted a constant and cumulative soft influence.

Unfortunately, the number of these grass-roots ambassadors has declined. There was an exodus during the coronavirus pandemic due to a combination of factors, such as travel restrictions, geopolitical tensions and a weak economy. Although people are coming back, the number is low compared to the pre-pandemic level.

The most dramatic drop is in the number of American students in Chinese universities – a 98 per cent fall from 11,639 in the 2018-19 academic year to 211 in 2021-22.

People believe the dwindling number of Westerners is bad for China. It is. But it is also bad for the West, if not worse. With people retreating from China, the West is losing its most effective goodwill grass-roots influence there, and its understanding and experience of China will be poorer.

In contrast, China's influence in the West is growing in terms of its grass-roots ambassadors and their understanding of the West. It is most evident in Chinese students abroad.

The number of students going to Western universities kept increasing until it was disrupted by the coronavirus pandemic. Compared to the fall of American students in China, the fall of Chinese students in the US was much smaller. And after travel restrictions lifted, the number of Chinese students going to European universities picked up.

It is also indicative to look at the rate of students who return to China. From 1980-2000, about one third of Chinese students returned to China. The rate increased to 80 per cent between 2016 and 2019. In addition, some star researchers made huge headlines when they returned to China to work. All these suggest China is no longer that backward place people fled from for better economic or academic opportunities.

Judging from these trends, it seems to me that China is doing much better than the West in nurturing its soft power. If the West wants to catch up, it needs to put more people back on the ground.

President Xi Jinping recently said China would invite 50,000 young Americans to join exchange and study programmes over the next five years to improve China-US relations.

The US can take advantage of this initiative, use it to increase its own grass-roots influence, and leave the rest to serendipity.

India-China Border Issue: Stable Yet Sensitive – Analysis

24 January 2024, Eurasia Review

The Sino-Indian standoff since 2020 has had a lasting negative effect on not only their diplomatic relations but also the management of their 4,057 km Line of Actual Control (LAC). Speaking to the media on the eve of Army Day, which falls on 15 January, Indian Army chief Gen. Manoj Pande spoke of the situation being "stable but sensitive."

On the other hand, External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar told a meeting in Nagpur recently that unless there was a solution on the border where the forces were "face-to-face", you cannot "expect the rest of the relations will go on in a normal manner."

The narrative that India and China have been having repeated rounds of talks at the diplomatic and military levels to resolve the eastern Ladakh situation created by the Chinese actions on the LAC in 2020 is more complicated than it appears. Reports now suggest that even while the two sides continue their dialogue, tensions along the LAC remain high with attempts by the Chinese to ingress into new areas while the Indian side proactively counters them. The LAC, which is a notional line not drawn on any agreed map, was peaceful and stable on account of a series of bilateral agreements between the two sides signed in the last 30 years, however, since 2020, when some 20 Indian jawans and four People's Liberation Army (PLA) personnel died in the clash in Galwan, not only has the border management been destabilised, but it is unclear as to which measures have kept the peace remain in force and which are no longer tenable. Fortunately, one key agreement—that of not using guns within two kilometres of the LAC remains in place, else, the Sino-Indian situation could have been much worse.

Last week, an intriguing report stated that the Indian Army has taken down videos of investiture ceremonies of the Western and Central Army commanders from YouTube because the citation of some awardees revealed how "live" the LAC has been since 2020.

This is apparent from the accounts that have been pieced together from the now deleted videos where soldiers have received gallantry awards for dealing with the situation in the period September 2021–November 2022. As such, it does not cover the major incident at Yangtse, northeast of Tawang, that transpired on 9 December 2022 when 300 Chinese soldiers tried to overwhelm Indian positions. Both sides used clubs studded with nails which led to injuries to dozens of the Indian Army and PLA personnel.

Just where on the 4,057-km LAC the incidents took place is not clear—or deliberately withheld for security purposes. A soldier may get an award in a particular sector, but the investiture takes place in the Army Command he is serving at the time. On 7 January 2022, several PLA personnel tried to swarm an Indian post in Shankar Tekri, reportedly on the Himachal-Ladakh border. Sepoy Raman Singh and his colleagues in the 8th Sikh Light Infantry (LI) managed to best the Chinese and push them away, seizing their guns.

In September 2022, Lt Col Yogesh Kumar Sati of the 31 Armoured Division elements of which are located in Ladakh carried out a task as part of Operation Snow Leopard (the name of the Indian military response to the Chinese actions in the summer of 2020). He was able to avoid detection and completed the mission successfully. The details of the operation have been withheld.

In November 2022, more than 50 PLA personnel tried to capture the Atari Post, and Naib Subedar Baldev Singh led his men to take them on and injured over 15 Chinese personnel. In the process, Singh himself was injured.

The date of the third operation has been withheld, but it relates to an award to Lt Col Pushmeet Singh of the 19 J&K Rifles for conducting a patrol that prevented a major standoff with the PLA. The situation was de-escalated through two days of talks between the Indian and the Chinese sides.

The last award mentioned is to Major Sourav Kumar of 15th Kumaon who carried out multiple covert missions into Chinese-held territory and established a covert surveillance post for the defence of the Siliguri Corridor. This was under Operation Dorji. Hav. Pradeep Kumar Singh was given a Sena Medal (gallantry) for establishing the covert post in Chinese territory for surveillance purposes.

India and China have so far held Corps-Commander level to resolve the situation in Eastern Ladakh, with the last round being held in October 2023. Through most of 2020, the Army and the government claimed that the Chinese established blockades in three places—Kugrang Nala, Gogra post and the north bank of Pangong Tso, they did not acknowledge the more serious ones at the Depsang Bulge and Charding Nala.

The PLA also massed troops near the LAC in violation of existing agreements. India responded with a counter-mobilisation and placed its forces atop the Kailash range overlooking the Chinese positions in Spanggur Tso.

Through the military-level talks, blockades at three places have been removed and the area under contention has been designated as a "no patrol zone." But two important places remain to be dealt with—the Depsang Bulge and the Charding Nala near Demchok.

Laxness on the part of Indian security forces resulted in India losing access to 30 out of the 65 patrolling points in Ladakh as a result of the 2020 moves by China. Now several of them have been converted into no-patrol zones through mutual consent. However, the most affected area arising from the 2020 blockade is the Depsang Bulge where agreement seems to be eluding the two sides.

The current situation is not only "sensitive" as the Army Chief has noted, but also unstable. Both sides are clearly viewing the LAC from the point of view of obtaining military advantage along it. While the prohibition on the use of guns still seems to be observed, we don't know how they view the other confidence-building measures. For one thing, the soldiers are armed and you never know in which circumstances they could be used leading to greater casualties and a deeper crisis.

The Chinese may have gained the first-mover advantage in eastern Ladakh, but the Indian Army now seems to be determined to ensure that it is not taken by surprise again. And as the investiture accounts suggest, they are adopting a proactive posture against the Chinese.

All this is happening even as the two sides are building up on both sides of the LAC. The Indian side is concentrating on its communications link, while the Chinese have built permanent billets, ammunition dumps, and helipads. This is not a situation conducive to either stability or peace. The entire confidence-building measures regime has collapsed, but to rebuild it requires trust, and for that, as the Indian side insists, there must be a return to the status quo ante in eastern Ladakh followed by an entirely new set of diplomatic negotiations.

How China's Government Keeps Inadvertently Hurting Its Own Economy

24 January 2024, Time

China did not have a good 2023. Official statistics released this month showed that the world's second-largest economy—which analysts had projected would bounce back after its strict COVID-19 prevention measures were lifted in December 2022—underperformed in just about every economic indicator. For what it's worth, GDP growth was at 5.2%, a bit higher than expected, but even that figure is widely distrusted given the country's staggering youth unemployment, real estate crisis, disappointing stock market, and general local malaise last year.

To resuscitate the flailing economy, President Xi Jinping's administration has introduced a slew of new initiatives in 2024, including measures to attract foreign investors and stimulate domestic consumption. But acting as a seemingly ever-present counterweight to China's economic rise is a parallel set of ambitious policies by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) meant to improve or protect Chinese society, which have in recent years tended to come with some undesired knock-on effects.

In a particularly embarrassing case, China's attempt to crackdown on young people's addiction to gaming last month fuelled speculations of impending curbs on China's largest gaming companies and rattled the stock market so much that one day later, authorities hurriedly vowed to revise the draft regulations they had just introduced.

Ambitious goals like these, outlined by departments across the government to align with Xi's vision of an ideal society, find themselves increasingly at odds with the government's push to revive China's faltering economy.

Recognizing the problem, last week, the director of the National Development and Reform Commission's Department of National Economy, Yuan Da, said at a press briefing that "the importance of strengthening policy coordination has become further highlighted," and he vowed that his agency would do a better job of reviewing proposals for "non-economic policies" to check that they don't "have a shrinking inhibitory impact on the economy."

It's not going to be an easy balance to strike. "Now the government has multiple objectives to pursue," Adam Y. Liu, assistant professor at the Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy in Singapore tells TIME. "When you have clear multiple objectives, sometimes these objectives are not necessarily in sync with each other."

Liu believes the persistent policy clashes boil down to the overcentralization of power and the desire, by local officials who enforce such policies, to appear faithful to the whims of China's top leader, no matter the economic costs.

"It's really more about showing your loyalty. Sometimes, even if it doesn't make any economic sense, it makes a lot of political sense to do economically senseless things."

Here are some of the ways in which China has inadvertently harmed its own economy in pursuit of non-economic priorities.

Gaming

In December, the National Press and Publication Administration (NPPA), which regulates China's gaming sector, announced a set of draft regulations aimed at curbing online games, including setting spending limits and banning games from rewarding players who log in every day—the latest in a series of curbs on the gaming industry in recent years as authorities have sought to tackle gaming and smartphone addiction among youth.

But the crackdown, which gained traction in 2021, has come with serious economic fallout in China's multibillion dollar gaming industry, which saw its total revenue shrink for the first time in 2022. The draft regulations announced last month also sparked panic among investors who worried about another tech crackdown reminiscent of the one in 2021. Shortly after the rules were announced, shares plunged for China's two biggest gaming companies, Tencent and NetEase, which saw nearly $80 billion erased from their combined value.

Authorities scrambled to contain the panic. The NPPA issued a statement one day later vowing to "revise and improve" its draft rules. Authorities also quickly approved 105 domestic games, in what state media outlet Global Times reported was a signal of support for the country's gaming industry. In early January, the chief of the CCP's propaganda department, which oversees the NPPA, was removed, Reuters reported.

Anti-corruption

Xi's aggressive campaign against corruption has become one of the hallmarks of his presidency, punishing 4.7 million officials over the last decade as China's top leaders vow to purge corrupt personnel across the rungs of its bureaucracy no matter if they're "tigers" or "flies." The campaign is showing no signs of slowing, with Xi announcing this month that the corruption cleanup will be deepened across key industries such as finance, pharmaceuticals, and infrastructure.

While authorities argue that the zealous effort to stamp out corruption is for the good of China's economy, experts have long warned that it is coming at a hefty cost, discouraging officials from embarking on new projects for fear of being deemed corrupt and hurting investor confidence in the sectors that are being targeted. China's anti-graft campaign has led to massive fallouts across its economy, from the get-go: an estimate by Bank of America Merrill Lynch in 2014 put its cost at $100 billion; and just last year, a crackdown on corruption in China's healthcare sector wiped $142 billion from the market value of healthcare stocks.

Anti-espionage

Amid increasing political friction with the U.S., China in July implemented a new anti-espionage law that sought to limit foreign consultancies over fears of them giving out state secrets. But with how broadly worded the law was, it effectively muzzled business advisers tasked with providing due diligence information and intel to foreign companies hoping to invest in the country and worsened an already fraught business environment.

While the effect of the law has yet to be fully measured, it was implemented amid a bad foreign investment baseline. Commerce ministry data shows that actual utilized new foreign direct investment for 2023 was 1.1 trillion yuan ($155 billion), 8% lower than in 2022, despite consistent messaging from China's premier and economic champion Li Qiang that the country is open for business.

"Anyone who is looking to invest in there has to be a little worried," said JPMorgan & Chase CEO Jamie Dimon in an interview with CNBC at Davos 2024. "The risk/reward changed dramatically."

Zero-COVID

Once lauded as the most efficient infection containment strategy at the onset of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020, China's zero-COVID policy—known for its widespread lockdowns, population-wide quarantines, and mass testing regimes—became its own bane after the Xi administration refused to make adjustments, even as the virus became endemic globally.

At one point, the measures made it difficult for families to secure food supply and hampered responses to fires and other emergencies. Some residents were forcibly quarantined, and protests broke out in several cities over residents' inability to work due to the rigid health policy. Dissatisfaction reached its peak in November 2022, with protesters on the streets calling for an end to zero-COVID in a rare moment of popular political dissent in China.

A stunning reversal came in December 2022, when the Xi administration suddenly dropped all its restrictions. But the economic effects of years of lockdown endured, especially the depreciated consumer and business sentiment.

Private education

Private tutoring firms in China became especially popular at the height of the COVID-19 pandemic. While the $150-billion industry capitalizes on teens' hopes to achieve success in the annual gaokao (national university admissions tests) in June, the Xi administration believed it also exploited parents' anxieties that only a child with a university degree can be successful in life.

In June 2021, the government suddenly banned for-profit tutoring, even barring them from advertising their services to a degree. But the ban, which was meant to cut down on child-rearing costs amid a record-low birth rate as well as to police the ballooning profits of education firms, forced many private education companies into the red. China's largest education company laid off as much as 60,000 personnel in light of the overhaul, adding to an already swelling unemployed population.

The ban was also ultimately unsuccessful in stopping for-profit tutoring: a black market of private tutors emerged, pandering to parent's desperation to improve their children's gaokao test scores, with much more exorbitant prices.

What Taiwan's Election Tells Us About China and 2024

23 January 2024, The Heritage Foundation

On January 13, Taiwan's voters chose a new president and legislators. China pulled out all the stops to try to intimidate and entice voters into selecting its preferred candidates. This campaign included violating Taiwanese airspace, financing pro-Beijing social media, promoting misinformation and conspiracy theories, paying for lavish trips for Taiwanese officials to China, and applying economic pressure.

It didn't work. Lai Ching-te of the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) was elected the island's next president and will be inaugurated in May. Lai was Beijing's least-favorite candidate, due to his history of advocating for Taiwan independence and the DPP's refusal to accept China's preconditions for dialogue. However, Lai won with a plurality of just 40.1% of the vote and only succeeded because the opposition vote was split between two challengers.

It is hard to know to what extent China's efforts influenced voter decisions. Each of the three parties that fielded presidential candidates has a strong support base independent of Beijing's actions. Nor does Beijing's preference for a given candidate necessarily make that candidate illegitimate. Each of Taiwan's mainstream political parties seeks to preserve the status-quo, and none of them support unification with China.

Yet, Beijing's efforts to influence Taiwan's elections and other political processes are real, and they aren't going to abate anytime soon. They are part of a decades-long campaign to delegitimize and isolate Taiwan and make Beijing's one-China principle a reality: "There is but one China in the world, Taiwan is an inalienable part of China's territory, and the Government of the People's Republic of China is the sole legal government representing the whole of China."

Beijing has vowed to impose unification by force if necessary. But it prefers to play the long game.

For instance, dating back decades, Beijing has conducted an increasingly aggressive campaign to isolate Taiwan and impede its participation in international organizations.

China was one of the original 51 member states of the United Nations. Due to its participation in the alliance of victors of World War II, China was awarded a permanent seat on the U.N. Security Council when the organization was founded in 1945. In the first few decades of the U.N., China was represented by the Republic of China. Shortly after the U.N. was founded, the Chinese Communist Party gained momentum in the civil war and controlled the entire Chinese mainland, with ROC forces retreating to Taiwan.

In the early 1950s, the CCP-controlled PRC initiated a prolonged diplomatic campaign to take over the representation of China in the U.N. and other international organizations. This effort culminated with the adoption of U.N. General Assembly Resolution 2758, which recognized the PRC as "the only legitimate representatives of China to the United Nations."

Since then, with rare exceptions, Beijing has opposed Taiwan's participation in international organizations and has applied diplomatic and economic pressure to convince other governments to sever diplomatic ties with Taiwan and oppose its participation in international organizations. In 2023, Honduras became the latest government to sever ties with Taiwan, leaving only 13 governments that recognize Taiwan.

Across the U.N. system, China has now succeeded in ostracizing Taiwan. For instance, Taiwan is not able to participate as an observer in any meetings of the U.N. or its specialized agencies despite the many equities that Taiwan has in matters considered by those organizations.

This effort has gone to ridiculous and petty lengths. For instance, Beijing has strong-armed the U.N. to deny private citizens access to U.N. headquarters or register for U.N. conferences if they have Taiwanese passports. Additionally, it has blocked applications from non-governmental organizations (NGOs) seeking consultative status with the U.N. unless they "explicitly recognize Tibet and Taiwan as integral parts of Chinese territory."

Beijing's efforts are a direct assault on the rights of the Taiwanese people who overwhelmingly wish to preserve the status quo of de-facto sovereignty under a democratic system that is fully separate from Beijing.

The U.S. understands and rejects this illegitimate campaign. When the U.S. recognized Beijing in 1979, it also announced that it opposes any unilateral change to Taiwan's status and would support Taiwan's ability to defend itself from forced unification with China. This position has enjoyed broad bipartisan support since the passage of the TRA and U.S. policy was articulated under the Reagan Administration in its Six Assurances to Taiwan.

In the past few years, Congress has passed legislation clarifying that U.S. policy is to advocate for Taiwan's participation in international organizations and instructing the administration to implement a strategy to counter efforts by Beijing to undermine support for Taiwan internationally, including its participation in international organizations.

This policy is based on U.S. interests, as Taiwan is generally supportive of American policy in these organizations. But more fundamentally, it is based on the belief that 23 million people deserve a voice in the international system—a voice that is currently silenced at the behest of Beijing.

Taiwanese democracy is vital and worth defending—and demonstrates that the Chinese people are perfectly capable of having a free system of government when given the opportunity. This was not only the case in the election that took place Saturday. It will continue to be true in the years ahead.

Activists Decry Tibet 'Cultural Genocide' Ahead Of China Rights Review

22 January 2024, Barron's

Activists accused China of seeking to "erase" Tibetan cultural and religious identities, urging a review of Beijing's rights record at the UN on Tuesday to focus on its "cultural genocide" in the region.

United Nations experts and activists estimate that more than a million Tibetan children between the ages of three and 18 have been separated from their families and placed in a network of residential boarding schools.

"That represents nearly 80 percent of Tibetan school-aged children," said Lhadon Tethong, head of the Tibet Action Institute.

Beijing has defended the boarding school system as respectful to cultural rights, and insisted it is needed especially in remote, high-altitude and scarcely-populated areas, where children often need to travel long distances to get to school.

But a group of independent UN experts last year warned that the system "appears to act as a mandatory large-scale programme intended to assimilate Tibetans into majority Han culture, contrary to international human rights standards".

In the schools, the children face "very intensive indoctrination", Tethong told AFP, adding that they often come out barely able to communicate in Tibetan and voicing criticism of Tibetan traditions.

"It is a case of cultural genocide, a clear-cut case," she said.

She and other advocates for Tibetan rights took part in an event at the UN in Geneva on Monday ahead of a review of China's rights record on Tuesday.

Beijing will be undergoing a so-called Universal Periodic Review (UPR) – an examination all 193 UN member states must face every four to five years to assess their human rights record.

A civil liberties crackdown, Hong Kong's draconian national security law and repression in Xinjiang are among concerns expected to be raised.

The Tibetan advocates appealed Monday for countries not to forget about the situation in Tibet, where they accuse Beijing of a worsening crackdown and efforts to erase the cultural and religious identity. "We have seen a worsening of rights in China, especially in Tibet," Thinlay Chukki, a representative of Tibet's spiritual leader the Dalai Lama, told Monday's gathering.

Tibet has alternated over the centuries between independence and control by China, which says it "peacefully liberated" the rugged plateau in 1951 and brought infrastructure and education to the previously underdeveloped region.

But many exiled Tibetans accuse China's ruling Communist Party of repression and eroding their culture.

And the network of residential boarding schools was the main tool for erasing Tibetan culture, according to Tethong.

She said the system was similar to the colonial boarding schools in Canada and the United States.

While the Canadian and US schools aimed from the late 19th century to forcibly assimilate Indigenous children to "white and Christian" culture, she said that in China "we're talking about political indoctrination".

"It's not just stripping the kids of their traditional identity, language and culture and religion, but it's really trying to imprint on them this sort of hyper-nationalist Chinese identity with this Communist Party as its foundation."

She said it was important to shine a spotlight on what was happening, urging countries to raise the issue during China's UPR.

"This is the opportunity to put the Chinese government on notice... that the system is known and that it is wrong," she said.

Governments, she said, must "call for the Chinese government to stop this very obvious campaign of assimilation... of elimination of Tibetan children's identity and culture through the school system."

AFP has sought a comment from the Chinese mission in Geneva.

When China ceded Hong Kong to the British in 1841 — and how its impact is felt till date

21 January 2024, Indian Express

The Qing ruler ceded Hong Kong, at the time home to a dozen or so fishing villages, to the British during the First Opium War on January 20, 1841. That fateful day continues to shape Hong Kong's present. Here's a look at the history.

Hong Kong was ceded to the British by the Chinese on January 20, 1841. This development has shaped Hong Kong's history over the following 183 years – and will continue to do so into the foreseeable future. How? To answer this, we take a look at a brief history of Hong Kong.

The British get Hong Kong

European powers began trading with China in the 16th century. Their favourite commodity? Tea – a beverage the British would soon become addicted to. While the British loved Chinese tea, they did not have anything to trade with China in return. Thus, Britain's favourite beverage soon became a drain on its bullion reserves.

The British get Hong Kong

European powers began trading with China in the 16th century. Their favourite commodity? Tea – a beverage the British would soon become addicted to. While the British loved Chinese tea, they did not have anything to trade with China in return. Thus, Britain's favourite beverage soon became a drain on its bullion reserves.

By the late 18th century, the British came up with a solution – opium. They began flooding China with the drug produced in the East India Company's possessions on the Gangetic plain. Britain's trade imbalance was thus fixed, but at the cost of eating away the very fabric of Chinese society.

Even as the malaise of addiction spread in China, the ruling Qing dynasty was unable to stop the flow of opium. Things came to a head in 1839, after the Emperor found his own son dazed under the influence of opium. A vicious crackdown was ordered, and soon began the First Opium War

The British, who claimed to be "protecting free trade", humiliated the weak Qing armies in a series of defeats. In 1841, the Qing were forced to sign the Treaty of Chuenpi, officially ceding the island of Hong Kong to the British (it was already a base for British merchants since the early 1820s). A year later, the British would end hostilities after signing the Treaty of Nanking, which gave them increased access to Chinese ports and an effective-free hand to sell opium. China's "century of humiliation" had just begun.

Hong Kong becomes a thriving port city

In 1841, Hong Kong was home to only a few thousand people, mostly from fishing communities. But the British soon realised its commercial and strategic value – Hong Kong boasted of a deep, fairly sheltered harbour, possessing east and west entrances, and lying on the main trade routes of the region. As British commercial activity in the Far East increased with help of the concessions received in the Treaty of Nanking, so did Hong Kong's importance. The island would soon attract all kinds of people from the mainland, from those seeking economic opportunities, to those escaping conflict. By 1860, the island's population was touching 1.2 lakhs. That year, the British signed the Treaty of Peking, ending the Second Opium War. The defeated Chinese were forced to hand over more territory, including the Kowloon Peninsula and the Stonecutter's Island to the victors.

Finally, in 1898, the British negotiated a lease of the "New Territories", in which they would receive control of Hong Kong and a total of 235 islands for a period of 99 years. By this time, Hong Kong's population had touched 3 lakhs. At the turn of the 20th century, Hong Kong was one of the most important port cities in the world.

British hand Hong Kong back

After being occupied by the Japanese from 1941-45, the island fell back into the hands of the British. Now despite a wave of decolonisation that would soon spell the end of the British Empire, the British had no intention of leaving Hong Kong, especially after the Communist takeover in China under Mao.

For Mao and the Communists, this was an enduring symbol of the 'century of humiliation' faced by China in the hands of Europeans. Nonetheless, fearing a larger conflict with the West, Mao desisted from sending in an invading party into the island, and chose instead to wait it out. The Communist supported labour movements and strikes inside the city in the 1950s and '60s.

China, however, would institute economic reforms in 1977, fundamentally altering its relationship with the West. In 1984, the Sino-British Joint Declaration was signed by British PM Margaret Thatcher and Chinese Communist Party Chairman Deng Xiaoping – it was agreed that the British would hand over all its territories in and around Hong Kong in 1997, and govern using Deng's principle of 'one country, two systems'.

But, the people of Hong Kong were not all pleased. However, the people of Hong Kong, many of whom had grown accustomed to western political freedoms and economic ways, were not all happy. In the years preceding the handover, a record number of Hong Kong residents, especially the most affluent classes, emigrated abroad, while many who stayed back continued to oppose reunification.

China's actions post the handover have not assuaged fears. Throughout the 2000s and 2010s, Hong Kong saw wave after wave of protests, with residents fighting to preserve the promised autonomy. They complain that Beijing, bit by bit, continues to chip away at the 'one country, two systems' concept, which promised them significant autonomy within the Chinese state.

Protests heated up in 2019 and 2020, as Beijing introduced new laws which would allow mainland security agencies to operate in Hong Kong, allow for extradition of citizens from the island to the mainland, and increase its police powers over the island.

For an increasingly assertive Chinese state, the goal of 'one country' takes precedence over the promise of 'two systems'. For many in Hong Kong, however, there is little to gain from this.

What next for China and Taiwan?

21 January 2024, The Sunday Guardian

Since President Xi Jinping has made the unification of Taiwan a historical necessity and a part and parcel of his great rejuvenation of the Chinese nation, the use of force remains a real possibility.

In the recently concluded general elections in Taiwan held on 13 January 2024, the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) gained the highest votes and will form the government in a few months. In a triangular contest, the DPP candidate, Lai Ching-te defeated Hou Yu-ih of the Kuomintang (KMT) and former Taipei Mayor Ko Wen-je of the new political outfit Taiwan People's Party (TPP). On the 13th evening, when results were announced, ChenBinhua, a spokesperson for the State Council Taiwan Affairs Office, was quick to denounce 23 January the victory of Lai, when he said the DPP “cannot represent the mainstream public opinion” in Taiwan. Earlier on 30 December 2023, Chen had pronounced Lai as the “saboteur of cross-strait peace.” On 14 January, Wang Yi, the State Councillor and Foreign Minister of China during his visit to Egypt warned that “Whoever wants to pursue ‘Taiwan independence’ is dividing China’s territory and will be severely punished by history and law.” Even though Nauru severed its diplomatic relations with Taiwan, global congratulations poured in for Lai and some major powers such as the US, UK and Japan openly congratulated Lai, drawing Beijing’s ire.

What could be expected next? Since mainland China has pronounced this election as a choice between war and peace, the victory of Lai-Hsiao team is bound to face bigger challenges in the form of military, economic, and psychological coercion. Wang Wenbin, the spokes person of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs remarked on the eve of Taiwan elections that “Taiwan independence” and peace across the Taiwan Strait are incompatible as fire and water (水火不容).

“Taiwan independence”, he said, means “war and is a dead end.” Two distinctive things that have emerged from this election are—the indigenisation and externalisation of the “Republic of China” (RoC), and both are mutually inclusive from a Taiwanese perspective.

As regards the indigenisation, the DPP, the KMT and the TPP without exception have indigenised themselves, especially the KMT that has its origins in the mainland.

The candidature of Hou Yu-ih in this election is an example, for the Party have realised that without localisation it would be difficult to oust the DPP that has very strong roots in Taiwan and is free from the “mainland complex.” No wonder former president Ma Ying-jeou’s call for having trust in Xi Jinping has fallen on deaf ears in the Island. The RoC, rather than “reclaiming the mainland”, is Lai Ching-te limited to governing Taiwan.

Rather all political parties in Taiwan have reached a consensus that the present status quo need to be maintained, and that the declaration of independence is a misnomer. The so-called “externalization” of the RoC is visible in the wake of China’s diplomatic and military assertiveness and geopolitical churning in the Indo-Pacific and beyond. Nauru snapping diplomatic ties with the RoC is an indicator that Taiwan would not be able to stop the small republics embracing the People’s Republic of China (PRC). Therefore, the new strategy, rather continuation of the Tsai Ing-wen’s “letting the small go and embracing the big powers” strategy would be the new normal. This, in other words, is China’s Achilles’ heel for two major reasons.

One, the externalization of the RoC and the response it receives from major powers undermines the “One China Policy”. Two, it also draws a parallel between the authoritarian PRC and the democratic Taiwan. In other words, the 113-year-old republic, that has survived till date and is ruled from Taiwan gains prominence, if not legitimacy, and emboldens countries around the world to look at the Taiwan question from a different perspective. Since the PRC considers itself the only legitimate entity to rule China, any attempt by countries to legitimize the RoC would be dealt with appropriately, including the use of force. Moreover, since President Xi Jinping has made the unification of Taiwan a historical necessity and a part and parcel of his great rejuvenation of the Chinese nation, the use of force remains a real possibility. Given the predicament of the DPP in the Executive Yuan, the mainland is expected to continue its United Front work in the “relevant political parties” for the “cause of the national unification” and better cross Strait exchanges, as pronounced by Chen Binhua, when Lai was declared winner on 13 January. The Lai-Xiao duo, while toeing former President Tsai’s political line, though may adopt a more pragmatic approach to deal with mainland China, however, much would also be dictated by the state of US-China relations.

The Biden administration has adopted an unusually tough posturing against China, even committing to use military force. This posturing may change if Donald Trump makes a comeback. Remember him saying Nancy Pelosi “always creating trouble” when she visited Taiwan in 2022? Nonetheless, “One China Policy” of the US would continue. As regards, the India-Taiwan ties, these are likely to maintain an upward trajectory in fields such as trade and investment, education and culture. But India is unlikely to change its “One China Policy” in the near future, even if there are sections in India calling for revisiting the same in the face of the prolonged military standoff between India and China in the Western Sector.

100 years since death of Lenin marked by silence from China’s Communist Party. Why?

21 January 2024, South China Morning Post

For the centenary of the death of Karl Marx in 1983, China issued a special set of commemorative stamps.

In 2018, for the 200th anniversary of the birth of the German thinker and founder of communism, Chinese President Xi Jinping presided over a memorial meeting, one of a host of state-led events held to mark the occasion.

Sunday marks 100 years since the death of Vladimir Lenin. However, there will be no official commemoration for the man who founded the Soviet Union and put Marxism into practice before leaving a controversial legacy for the world.

Marxist-Leninism has been enshrined in the charter of the Chinese Communist Party as a guiding principle, along with the ideologies of successive communist leaders since the People's Republic of China was founded in 1949.

However, unlike during the times of founding leader Mao Zedong, commemorations of Lenin appear to have fallen off the agenda for Chinese propaganda officials.

Yuan Yuhua, a self-taught leftist scholar and academic lecturer, said Lenin and the 1917 October Revolution – which inspired the founding of the Chinese Communist Party four years later – had been played down in recent years.

A mainland political scientist who declined to be named put the different treatment down to the eventual collapse of the Soviet Union, and the controversies around Leninism.

Blots on Lenin's legacy include the massacre of political rivals – the 1918-1922 "Red Terror" carried out by his Bolshevik party, famines during the early 1920s and 30s, as well as atrocities during the totalitarian rule of his successor, Joseph Stalin.

"Even Russian leaders reviewed Leninism after the collapse of the USSR [Union of Soviet Socialist Republics] in the late 1980s. In the following years, China was busy with market reform and opening up to the outside world, therefore Lenin was not a point of emphasis on the agenda for government propaganda," the political scientist said.

Thousands of Lenin statues around the world have also been pulled down since the fall of the Soviet Union, among the most famous being the mass removals in Ukraine in the past decade.

While Russian President Vladimir Putin has delivered sharp criticisms of Lenin, his statements about the founder of the Russian Communist Party have been inconsistent. He has also rejected calls to bury Lenin's body, which remains on display in Moscow's Red Square.

A website that documents remaining Lenin statues said there were about 6,000 left worldwide as of 2021, with four of them in mainland China.

Alfred Wu, an associate professor at the National University of Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, said while official commemorations might be lacking, Leninism was ingrained in the political fibre of China's ruling party.

"Leninism is in the DNA of the Communist Party of China. Examples are the structure of the party and the party-state," he said.

Leninism dictates that the communist party, as the "vanguard party", should establish a single-party socialist state called the "dictatorship of the proletariat".

In the party state, every aspect – from political, economic and social, to cultural and intellectual life – would be regulated strictly by the communist party.

In the 1990s and 2000s, the Chinese Communist Party, while resolute in maintaining single-party rule, tried to delegate the responsibilities of actual policy formulation and implementation to the government and focus more on giving general directions.

This trend was reversed under Xi, who has merged party organs and government departments in a massive restructuring since the 19th national party congress in 2017.

The political scientist who declined to be named said the restructuring indicated a return to Leninism. "The party-state of recent years stems from Leninism," the analyst said.

Leninism also influenced Sun Yat-sen and the early days of the Kuomintang (KMT), which was set up in 1912 according to the structure of a Leninist state, Wu said.

The KMT retreated to Taiwan in 1949 after losing to the communists in a civil war. It upheld single-party rule in its early decades, until it lifted martial law and legalised opposition parties in the 1980s.

In mainland China, while Lenin is still a familiar name for many young people as someone they know from school textbooks, there is not much interest in him or his legacy.

Jade Song, 27, an employee of a public institute in southern Guangdong province, said her impression of Lenin was more from politics and history classes in school.

"When his name is mentioned, words like 'proletarian revolution' and soviet come to mind, as well as the impression of him as a revolutionary pioneer, a spiritual leader, and a figure who had a great impact on China. Also, he is usually mentioned along with Marxism," she said.

But topics related to Lenin were rarely raised among friends, she added. "So I feel that many people, like me, still mainly learned about him from textbooks and only have simple impressions but not deep understanding of his thoughts."

To Beijing university student Wu Yuening, Lenin is a complex historical figure criticised for his political repression. But "the history books present him more in a positive way as a revolutionary and theorist", the 19-year-old said.

Yuan, the leftist scholar, said young people in China showed more interest in Mao than Lenin.

"So many young people have flocked to Shaoshan [the birthplace of Mao] to commemorate the 130th anniversary of his birth [last December]. Young people pay more attention to Mao."

What's at stake for China as border tensions flare between Iran and Pakistan?

20 January 2024, South China Morning Post

China is expected to step up its engagement to protect its interests in Iran and Pakistan after the two countries mounted tit-for-tat attacks in each other's border areas this week, analysts say.

But the attacks – the latest episode in a turbulent area at the centre of an independence movement that also involves part of Afghanistan – are unlikely to descend into broader conflict, they say.

Two children died on Tuesday night when Iran fired on two targets in Balochistan province in Pakistan, according to Pakistani authorities.

Tehran said it was targeting Jaish al-Adl, a Sunni separatist group that operates mostly in Iran's Sistan and Baluchestan province bordering Pakistan, where the ethnic Baloch are people seeking independence. Pakistan hit back on Thursday, killing nine people – including three children – in a border village in Sistan and Baluchistan province, Iran said.

Islamabad said it too was targeting rebel armed groups hiding in Iran.

The strikes triggered a series of diplomatic protests between the two sides.

China, a close partner of both countries, said it was following the situation closely and would like to play "a constructive role" in easing tensions.

The ministry urged Tehran and Islamabad to "remain calm and exercise restraint" and avoid escalation of the tension.

Abdul Basit, an associate research fellow at Singapore's S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies, said the stakes for China were high in both countries.

"Tensions between Islamabad and Tehran are detrimental to Beijing's economic and geopolitical interests, while a stable Iran-Pakistan-Afghanistan region opens several opportunities for China to expand into Central Asia and beyond," Basit said.

"China still maintains a low-key approach in the Iran-Pakistan tensions. But through backchannel contacts, China will play a more proactive role in bringing tensions ... to a close."

As China's "iron brother", Islamabad has a close partnership with Beijing, with cooperation ranging from economic investment to defence.

Pakistan is the largest buyer of China's weapons. Nearly 54 per cent of China's major arms export between 2018 and 2022 went to the nation, according to the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute.

Pakistan is also home to dozens of projects related to the multibillion-dollar China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, a centrepiece of China's Belt and Road Initiative.

The corridor is part of Beijing's efforts to connect its far west Xinjiang to the Arabian Sea and key components are in Balochistan, one of Pakistan's poorest provinces.

But the Balochistan Liberation Army, a separatist insurgent group based in the province, has attacked Chinese infrastructure and personnel in protest against Chinese construction in the area.

China and Iran are also forging stronger relations, with the two countries signing an agreement in 2021 reportedly covering areas from investment to defence.

Despite sanctions imposed by the US, China's oil imports from Iran jumped 48 per cent year on year in the first half of 2023, making Iran its third-largest oil supplier.

Tehran also sees Beijing as an escape route from international isolation. Last year, China helped broker a peace deal between Iran and Saudi Arabia, and Tehran became a member of the Beijing-led Shanghai Cooperation Organisation in July.

This year, Iran will officially join Brics, an association of five major emerging national economies: Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa.

Zhu Yongbiao, from the school of politics and international relations at Lanzhou University, said that maintaining border security, especially curbing the rise of separatist forces in the region, was crucial for China for economic and political reasons.

"[A stable border situation] will be beneficial for China in terms of belt and road project construction. Meanwhile, if the conflict escalates, the degradation of the security environment may affect China's western border, which [China] does not want to happen," he said.

Zhu said Pakistan, Iran, and Afghanistan often accused each other of harbouring terrorist organisations and further escalation would affect Afghanistan.

China is looking to Taliban-controlled Kabul for help to contain the East Turkestan Islamic Movement, which Beijing blames for violence and ethnic tensions in Xinjiang.

Iran and Pakistan are also two crucial partners for China in its counterterrorism efforts in the region. Last year, China began regular anti-terror talks with Pakistan and Iran "to tackle the cross-border movement of terrorists", the first dialogue of its kind with Iran and Pakistan.

Meanwhile, since Iran and Pakistan are both members of the SCO, an escalation may undermine Beijing's ambition to lead the Global South, according to Zhu.

"The SCO's major responsibility is to maintain cooperation on security. If two of its members clash, that will seriously affect the SCO's reliability and its capability, which is bad for Beijing," Zhu said.

Basit said tensions between Iran and Pakistan were not expected to escalate and both countries could use diplomatic channels to resolve the situation, especially as Pakistan headed into a general election next month, and Iran faced greater security challenges over conflicts in the Middle East from Gaza to the Red Sea.

Zhu added that the border clashes between Pakistan and Iran had continued for a long time and the two countries had plenty of experience in de-escalation.

Managing Regional Rivalries and Extraregional Interests as a Buffer State: The Nepalese Case Study

19 January 2024, Georgetown Journal of International Affairs

Given India and China's contentious relations, smaller states in South Asia, such as Nepal, face challenging geopolitical realities. Nepal seeks to maintain amicable ties with both of its powerful neighbors, but the limits of being a small state in the region push it towards greater international participation to not be held prisoner by either India or China.

As a small landlocked country between India and China, Nepal has long been considered a buffer state—a small country sandwiched between larger rival powers—with its challenging geography in the Himalayan mountain range lending to this conceptualization. Nepal has sought to maintain close ties with India and China. However, China and India's economic rise as well as their border disputes have challenged Nepal's ability to walk the diplomatic tightrope. As China has increased its presence in Nepal, India has sought to respond through infrastructure investment in the country. China's continued attempts to exert political and economic influence in South Asia have alarmed New Delhi, which has historically considered the region within its security umbrella. In 2016, Nepalese Prime Minister Prachanda framed Nepal's role as a "dynamic bridge" between India and China and called to maintain equidistance. To avoid being beholden to Indian and Chinese interests, Nepal has committed to multilateralism in international politics and engagement with non-regional and international actors. It has actively participated in the United Nations (UN) and built relationships with the United States and Europe. Thus, Nepal seeks to maintain its state agency despite being a small state in a geopolitical context heavily influenced by India and China.

Nepal's Challenge

Nepal has strong cultural, linguistic, and religious ties with India. The two countries' leaders often emphasize the civilizational and religious links between the world's only two Hindu-majority countries. China has sought closer ties with Nepal since the 2008 riots in the Tibetan Autonomous Region and the subsequent pressure to stabilize its restive frontier provinces. Since then, China has ramped up its trade and investment ties with Nepal, accounting for 14 percent of Nepal's international trade in 2022. Chinese investments are vital for infrastructure development in Nepal, which has long sought international investors. For example, in January 2023, Pokhara International Airport started operations after being constructed by China CAMC Engineering, a Chinese state-owned enterprise. The international airport was built at an estimated cost of $216 million. These developments are a major concern for India given its history of cooperation with Nepal. Growing Chinese investments have invoked fears of a reduction in Indian influence, which have occasionally sparked tensions between India and Nepal.

Maintaining amicable relations with both of its neighbors remains a challenge for Nepal. Since opening its borders to international tourism in 1951, Nepal's foreign policymakers have carefully navigated its international relationships. Today, the country faces major challenges tied to changing political dynamics and power capabilities in the region. The country's foreign policy must address the security concerns of both of its neighbors, as Sino-Indian tensions continue to simmer with the powers' latest major border clash occurring in 2022. Nepal has also accrued considerable debt due to investments from Chinese state-owned enterprises; some fear that Nepal could have a similar fate as Sri Lanka due to extensive debt from infrastructure development. Nevertheless, Nepal's main challenge remains to manage its equidistant approach towards India and China amidst increased pressure from both powers.

Non-regional Engagement as a Foreign Policy Strategy

Nepal has long pursued engagement with non-regional actors to strengthen its political agency. Having joined the UN in 1955, Nepal has been active in UN peacekeeping missions and, as of August 2023, is the second largest contributor of the UN's troops and police. In addition, Nepal has historically been enthusiastic about joining international normative conventions. For example, it is the first country in South Asia to abolish the death penalty. Nepal is also the only South Asian party to the Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which seeks to abolish the death penalty globally. Furthermore, Nepal participates in regional and international organizations and explicitly supports UN principles in its foreign policy principles. Accordingly, it was also the first country in South Asia to decriminalize homosexuality in 2007, enshrine protections for LGBTQI rights in its constitution in 2015, and legalize same-sex marriages in 2023. Nepal also maintains strong ties with numerous European actors, such as the European Union, in promoting international development.

In line with its goal of engaging with non-regional actors, Nepal has built strong relations with the United States. In 2017, Nepal's government signed a $500 million grant agreement under the US-led Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC), mostly geared towards infrastructure development in Nepal. In February 2022, debates about the implementation of the MCC prompted protests in Nepal against increasing the US presence in the country. Chinese officials also lobbied against the MCC and claimed that the MCC represented coercive diplomacy. Despite these protests, Nepal and the United States agreed that the MCC would enter into force on August 30, 2023. The MCC presented Nepal with the opportunity to bolster its infrastructure, particularly in the energy sector. The grant included funds for constructing transmission lines to deliver energy from the country's hydroelectricity dams, which are projected to produce 12,000 megawatts of power by 2030. Some argue that the MCC constituted a US response to Nepal joining the China-led Belt and Road Initiative (BRI). Strategic concerns abound in China regarding this development, reflecting how Nepalese relations with China may suffer if Nepal pursues further US engagement. Nevertheless, the MCC presents Nepal with an opportunity for infrastructure investment while bolstering ties with an extra-regional power—preventing India and China from “boxing in” Nepali diplomatic relations.

Nepal building ties with European and American development partners seeks to ensure that Nepal's foreign policy does not revolve around regional powers India and China. Seeking extra-regional partnerships and committing to international normative frameworks not only help attain some of Nepal's development needs but also diversify its foreign relations. While this approach may not fully overcome Nepal's geopolitical contentions, it reinforces the country's commitment to multilateralism and international norms to expand its agency in international politics.

Managing the Challenge

Nepal finds itself increasingly under pressure from India, as China increases its influence in the country. The challenge for Nepal remains to manage ties with its neighbors amidst closer US-India ties and increasing Sino-US contentions. The MCC demonstrates that Nepal has garnered attention from the United States. US investment may strain Nepal's relations with China, as Sino-US tensions become more pronounced. The country has consistently shown a keen interest in maintaining its agency by engaging in international politics and partnering with Western powers.

To manage the dynamic geopolitical changes in the region, Nepal must continue its equidistant approach vis-à-vis India and China. However, other regional ties would also help Nepal maintain its geopolitical agency. Nepal could improve its regional engagement by bolstering regional connectivity through the Bay of Bengal Initiative for Multi-Sectoral Technical and Economic Cooperation (BIMSTEC).

Concurrently, Nepal's efforts in strengthening ties with extra-regional powers should continue. This approach may allow Nepal to garner international prestige while not sacrificing the country's limited resources and capabilities. Nepal should also maintain its close development partnership with European actors and the United States. Such relations are essential for both the country's material development and the diversification of Nepal's diplomatic and strategic ties. Nepal should also reiterate its commitments to international multilateral efforts by supporting UN peacekeeping missions, LGBTQI rights, women's rights, multilateralism, and non-violent conflict resolution. Nepal could further promote its agency internationally through initiatives among other landlocked developing countries in the UN. Such ties would likely prevent Nepal from being geopolitically boxed in the region. Thus, despite its limited capabilities and resources, Nepal can partake in regional and international initiatives and strengthen its international presence.

The Futile Legacy of Mao Zedong

19 January 2024, Foreign Policy

Just after Christmas, the People's Republic of China's increasingly authoritarian leader-for-life Xi Jinping celebrated Mao Zedong's 130th birthday. Xi led the Politburo's Standing Committee in a requiem in the Great Hall of the People for the infamous Red Emperor, the greatest mass murderer in modern if not all human history. The members thrice bowed before the grand killer's statue and remembered his “achievements.”

Mao's thoughts are a "spiritual treasure" and would "guide our actions in the long term," Xi said. The Chinese people must "work to enable our party to adhere to its original mission ... maintain vitality and vigor, and ensure that our party never degenerates, never changes its color, and never loses its flavor." Under Mao, Xi said earlier last year, the Chinese Communist Party developed a "brand new form of human civilization."

Ironically, by strengthening his arbitrary rule, Xi is actually making an eventual counterreaction more likely. Ever-tightening repression poisons the entire system. Fear exiles honesty and accountability in policymaking, leading to more and bigger mistakes, including at the top. State centralization and politicization are reversing the very forces that spurred economic growth. The determination to indoctrinate as well as regulate already has spawned antagonistic youth movements that challenge authority. Political stability is likely to be only temporary; when Xi passes from the scene, the succession fight is likely to be more bitter and fraught.

Not everyone agrees with Xi. On a recent trip to China, I met an academic colleague who expressed profound pessimism, which he said many intellectuals and others shared. In the past, he observed, they at least could look forward to some change every five or 10 years, when a new party general secretary (and president) was chosen.

But no longer. Not only is Xi president for life, but the party is also rapidly reverting back to the habits of the Maoist era.

Yet Xi was not alone in reveling in the supposed achievements of the Great Helmsman. Mao's birthplace in the southern Hunan province, which I've visited, has long been a major tourist destination. Today, it may be the one place in China where a dissident can covertly promote revolution. As a Nikkei report on the anniversary observance noted, "The younger attendees on Tuesday seemed particularly inclined to chant slogans considered more extreme in their rhetoric. Those included such slogans adopted by China's Red Guards during the Cultural Revolution as 'No crime in revolution!' and 'To rebel is justified!'"

However, as Xi concentrates his power, I wonder who these young visitors think they're rebelling against.

Right now, Xi's power seems unshakeable. But so did Mao's during his lifetime. Almost immediately after he died, policies began to change—and had shifted on the ground even beforehand. Within a decade or two, the country was almost unrecognizable.

Some of the devotion to Mao was real, and he retains some fervent fans. When I visited his impressive mausoleum in Tiananmen Square a few years ago, the lines were long. Many people bought flowers from vendors before entering to set before Mao's massive bronze statue in the entryway. Some visitors seemed genuinely overcome with emotion. However, capitalism ultimately triumphed: On exiting, everyone passed by stalls marketing overpriced Mao tchotchke.

That the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) continues to cling to Mao to maintain its revolutionary credentials is embarrassing, but hardly surprising. Mao remains one of China's most recognizable symbols. His portrait hangs on the Gate of Heavenly Peace on Tiananmen Square's northern edge. His mausoleum dominates the space and is much more impressive than Vladimir Lenin's dark and dank resting place. And Mao's face adorns China's currency.

All this was built on a pile of corpses. The CCP consolidated power with campaigns against so-called counterrevolutionaries, landlords, and other enemies, killing 5 million or so Chinese. In 1950, Mao made the decision to enter the Korean War to save North Korean leader Kim Il Sung. Some 200,000 Chinese soldiers died, along with untold thousands killed by them in a war prolonged by two-and-a-half years. In 1956, Mao initiated the Hundred Flowers Campaign or Movement, in which he encouraged the people to speak freely. Apparently shocked after receiving criticisms rather than encomiums, he responded with the Anti-Rightist Movement, in which millions were killed.

In 1958, Mao's fertile mind came up with his worst idea yet: the so-called Great Leap Forward, simultaneously collectivizing farming and decentralizing manufacturing. Estimates of total deaths vary widely, but perhaps the most comprehensive account came from a party member and Xinhua reporter. Yang Jisheng figured: "[T]he Great Famine brought about 36 million unnatural deaths, and a shortfall of 40 million births."

Mao's final flight into pure madness was the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution. The murderous mix of party purge, civil war, and social collapse may have caused as many as 2 million deaths.

Mao's death was almost as consequential as his life. Pragmatic revolutionary Deng Xiaoping won the resulting power struggle and moved China down the course of economic reform. However, Deng, like Mao, rejected political liberalization and orchestrated the 1989 Tiananmen Square crackdown, which was followed by purging millions of party members.

The CCP recognized that Mao had made mistakes, but it was unable to let go of the legacy of the national founding father altogether. Mao was still 70 percent right, the official verdict decided. (Contrast the Soviet Union's Nikita Khrushchev, who was able to take Joseph Stalin's legacy down entirely, in part because Lenin provided a convenient alternative state founder.)

Even after Tiananmen, China remained far freer than under Mao. However, that was then. In almost every way, Xi has shoved his nation backward.

Independent journalists and human rights lawyers are gone. Internet controls are tighter. Repression of churches is more intense. Academic exchanges are more limited. Controls over Tibetans, Uyghurs, and Hong Kongers have metastasized. Companies host party cells. Business is being made to serve the CCP.

And Xi has greatly strengthened party and personal control and uses both propaganda and coercion to insist that everyone thinks like him. He has tried to control history, presenting an idyllic version of the party's bloody past. There is a burgeoning personality cult, though it seems perfunctory, lacking the ardor and intensity that more often surrounded Mao, at least during the latter's life.

An important problem with Xi's retreat to Maoism is the absence of Mao. Give the latter his due: Charismatic and driven from the start, he took a weak and divided movement from defeat to triumph and cast off centuries of Western and Japanese imperialism. In contrast, Xi is a colorless apparatchik who carefully ascended a party structure created by others. He wants Mao's control without having earned, brutally and bloodily, Mao's power.

Opposition exists but is futile. Wall Street Journal reporter Lingling Wei reported on a meeting at which a forlorn liberal administrator who had worked on stock market reform "signaled me to a corner of the venue. ... 'The whole thing about getting listed companies to set up party committees,' he said, 'is a reversal of what we had tried to do.' Then he walked away without saying anything else." Indeed, China may be slipping back toward the Soviet Union in terms of political sentiment, if not economic achievement. People are still much better off than before, but a sense of ennui, even despair, afflicts those who desire personal freedom to enjoy their material bounty and personal opportunity to shape the social order around them. Xi, like Leonid Brezhnev, insists that soulless apparatchiks are the center of society.

It appears to be the fate of every nation that the worst will get on top, sometimes. However, as Friedrich Hayek predicted, they will do so more often in communist systems.

China is proving the rule. There was Mao. Now there is Xi. With Xi celebrating Mao, hopefully there won't be another.

With an Eye Toward India, China Bolsters Military Infrastructure Development in Tibet

19 January 2024, The Diplomat

A new 80 billion yuan investment in TAR infrastructure is part of Beijing's long-term strategic design for handling internal and external threats.

On January 11, China announced an 80 billion yuan ($11.2 billion) investment to boost key infrastructure such as airports, railways, and highways in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) by the year 2035. This was disclosed through a government work report released after the second meeting of the 12th People's Congress of the Autonomous Region..

Besides China's expansionist policies, the massive infrastructure buildup in TAR is being driven by both external and internal threats, as Tibetans continue to resist Chinese domination. These massive strategic investments not only substantiate India's growing concerns but also vindicate claims from the Tibetan diaspora that infrastructure developments in Tibet are a major instrument of repression, primarily serving Beijing's strategic and expansionist designs.

Strategically, this major announcement fits within the broader objective of Beijing's aim to establish a highly effective and expansive three-dimensional transportation network in the Tibet Autonomous Region, connecting it with other regions in China and also with other countries in South Asia. Beijing's long-term infrastructure plan also solidifies its military's ground and logistic network and air infrastructure, boosting the realization of the Chinese People Liberation Army's strategic layout of the Tibet Military Region (TMR) by 2035.

The People's Liberation Army was restructured into theater commands in 2016. The Western Theater Command (WTC) consists of the Tibet Military Region, Xinjiang Military Region, 76th and 77th Group Army, and is primarily tasked with addressing security threats stemming from India, especially along the disputed Sino-Indian border.

The PLA's strategic plan for the Tibet Military Region aims to internally connect all the PLA units under the WTC stationed within TMR and externally connect with other forces under other theater commands. Infrastructure developments within the TAR are part of this strategic vision.

According to the TAR's government work report, the 80 billion yuan will go toward three sectors: air, rail, and roads. In terms of air transport, the plan calls for 10 new general airports and 47 temporary take-off and landing points. For railways, the funding will go toward the Tibet section of the Sichuan-Tibet Railway, electrification renovation projects for the Bomi-Ranwu section of the Yunnan-Tibet Railway, and electrification renovation projects for the Gela section of the Qinghai-Tibet Railway. Three road projects are identified: construction of the Medog to Chayu section of National Highway G219, an upgrade and renovation of National Highway G318, and opening of the entire Lhasa-Shigatse (Lashi) Expressway to traffic.

These projects are in keeping with the 14th Five Year Plan of Tibet Autonomous Region, released in 2021. The plan laid out Beijing's long-term objective (through 2035) of strengthening TAR's transportation and logistics infrastructure system by building a comprehensive, three-dimensional transportation network based on railways, high-grade highways, and airports.

Critically, the national development plans enshrined in the 14th Five Year Plan were designed along the lines of China's military development strategy, as remarked by Xi Jinping's speech to the PLA and Armed Police Force in 2020. Fan Xiaojun, the political commissar of the Northern Theater Command, also stated that the purpose of the 14th Five Year Plan is for military construction and preparation for war to integrate peacetime and wartime support systems.

The Aviation Development Plan in TAR

The People's Government of TAR work report released on January 11 specifically mentioned that the major allocation of 80 billion yuan will prioritize the construction of 10 new general airports and 47 temporary take-off and landing points in 2024. The construction of 10 new general airports is part of the General Aviation Development Plan of Tibet Autonomous Region (2021-2035), which aims to construct 59 new general airports, seven new transport airports, and 200 aprons in TAR by 2035. Beijing's long-term aviation development plan has clear military orientations, with the major aim of building military air infrastructure. The General Aviation Development Plan of TAR states that the construction of airports in the border areas of the region will be prioritized to form the "national security barriers" providing strong support for the military force. As shown in the following table, the 59 planned general airports are strategically placed in the counties of TAR along the China-India border. Moreover, the General Aviation Development Plan of TAR has clearly stated the planned airports will actively engage in military flight activities under the public services classification, including national defense stability maintenance, emergency rescue missions, border defense and surveillance, and short-distance transportation.

After the completion of general airport construction, the PLA's Army Aviation Brigades of Tibet Military Region and other aviation units of the Western Theater Command will play a key role in mobilization and spearheading PLA's military operations along the India-China borders.

The Railways and Roadways Development Plan in TAR

The rest of the 80 billion yuan investment will be allotted to accelerate the completion of major rail and road development projects in the Tibet Autonomous Region. The railways and roadways are expected to strengthen the PLA's ground and logistical network in TAR.

The main focus of the railway projects in TAR this year will be to fast-track the construction of the TAR section of the Sichuan-Tibet Railway and to start electrification renovation projects for the Bomi-Ranwu section of Yunnan-Tibet Railway and Gela Section of the Qinghai-Tibet Railway.

These railway projects have clear military implications for India. Internally, the rail network will connect all the Western Theater Command's units within TAR, and externally it connects the WTC with other theater commands. The ramping up of construction of the Sichuan-Tibet and renovation of the Qinghai-Tibet railway will strengthen the connectivity and logistic network between the Tibet Military Region with the PLA units under the 76th and 77th Group Army, stationed in Sichuan and Qinghai province.

The renovation of the Bomi-Ranwu section of the Yunnan-Tibet Railway will facilitate the connection of all critical areas of Tibet along the borders from Xinjiang toward Lhasa and Nyingchi to all the major cities of Yunnan province. Yunnan is the home to major PLA brigades under the 75th Group Army of the Southern Theater Command, including the infantry, artillery, air defense, and armored brigades stationed across cities like Dali, Kunming, Kaiyuan, and Lancang, etc.

Suyash Desai has argued that the Bomi-Ranwu section of the Yunnan-Tibet Railway will allow rapid mobilization of these PLA units under the 75th Group Army stationed in Yunnan on the India-China border in TAR during possible future military clashes. Critically, the Yunnan-Tibet Railway will also be used by PLA Rocket Force units stationed in Yunnan, such as the 96824 Unit stationed in the Xiaoshiba District of Kunming.

The underlined railway projects come under China's major railway planning document, the Tibet Autonomous Region 14th Five-Year Plan Mid- and Long-term Railway Network Plan. Overall, the plan envisions building a railway network of about 5,948 kilometers running through all the border areas of TAR, connecting all prefectures and 55 counties of TAR internally and externally with all nearby provinces such as Sichuan, Gansu, Qinghai, Yunnan, and the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, and ultimately with the main railway network across China by 2035.

As per the railway construction projects under the Mid- and Long-term Railway Network Plan, the layout of the railway network was designed to first and foremost connect all the border areas of TAR, including the India-China border, via new and planned railways. Again, this effort will accommodate the PLA's strategic design, as exemplified by the construction and expansion of the Yunnan-Tibet Railway, Xinjiang-Tibet Railway, Sichuan-Tibet Railway, and Qinghai-Tibet Railway. China's mammoth railway construction plans in TAR are set to be completed in 2035, which includes 10 major projects to build new railway lines, three major reconstruction and expansion projects, and one new railway branch line.

The comprehensive three-dimensional transportation network in TAR would be incomplete without the roadway plans as funded under the 80 billion yuan announced on January 11. In 2024, road projects such as the Shiquanhe Town to Kunsha Airport section of highway G4218, the Medog to Chayu section of highway G219, and the upgrade and renovation of highway G318, and opening of the Lhasa-Shigatse (Lashi) Expressway will be rapidly accelerated with the planned investment.

Roadway development in TAR is also part of broader Beijing's plan, as outlined in the Fifth National Highway Network Plan issued in July 2022.

Implications for India and Beyond

After the infamous Galwan Valley clash with India in 2020, the Chinese army has attempted to capture numerous Indian military border posts, leading to continuous violent clashes, as per the latest reports. Examples of China's military excursions against the Indian Army since the Galwan clash include PLA soldiers attacking the Indian Army post in Shankar Tekri along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) on January 7, 2022. Another clash ensued when about 50 PLA soldiers tried to cross the LAC at Atari Post on November 27, 2022. All these events are worrying, given the potential for such clashes to escalate into a broader war.

Regardless of the ongoing border peace talks between India and China, the disputed border region remains the most conflict-prone area and a key flashpoint in Asia, where "politics, proximity, and paranoia" raise the possibility of escalation. By 2035, after all the military infrastructure and construction in TAR laid down in the long-term plan are completed, Beijing will be more than prepared to launch a massive military operation against neighboring countries along its western frontier.

The recent ramping up of the construction of military infrastructure is part of Beijing's aim to gain an absolute advantage against Indian forces along the border and will massively strengthen the PLA's transportation, logistical capabilities, and overall combat readiness in TAR. Therefore, infrastructure development plans under the 14th Five Year Plan for Tibet Autonomous Region have major strategic implication not only for India and its neighbors but also for the international order.

Unmasking Global Corruption: A Tale of China, America, and Nepal

17 January 2024, BNN

Global corruption is exposed in the US and China, Europe grapples with political instability due to corruption scandals, while China restructures its military amid fears of a Taiwan invasion. Nepal's political future hangs in the balance.

In a world dominated by power and money, the corrosive tendrils of corruption seep into the upper echelons of both American and Chinese societies. The recent public disclosure of trial documents related to the infamous Jeffrey Epstein has shone a glaring spotlight on the rot within the American elite. Meanwhile, on the other side of the globe, the Communist Party of China's Central Committee has also opened its closets to reveal a grim reality. Over the past decade, more than 1.6 million Party officials have been investigated for corruption. Despite this stark revelation, the Communist Party has pledged to embark on a 'self-revolution' to tackle this systemic issue.

Corruption: A Global Challenge

The cancer of corruption is not limited to these global superpowers. Across the Atlantic, in the heart of Europe, several high-profile individuals and officials are entangled in corruption scandals. From Albania to Russia, Portugal to the European Parliament, the scandals span the spectrum of power abuse, cash-for-influence networks, and even interference with EU Sakharov Prize nominations. This widespread corruption has triggered political instability and fuelled opposition against ruling parties.

Portugal's Prime Minister Antonio Costa recently stepped down unexpectedly in the wake of revelations about an investigation into potential government corruption. The shockwaves of his resignation are yet to settle, with the future of his Socialist Party hanging in the balance.

China's Military Restructuring

As the world grapples with corruption, China's President Xi Jinping is undertaking a major restructuring of the country's military. The move, seen as an attempt to replace any generals hesitant about engaging in warfare, has raised the specter of a possible invasion of Taiwan. Xi's military reforms, which include overhauling Beijing's military forces and improving military-civilian cooperation, have intensified focus on Taiwan, a self-ruled island that China claims as its territory.

The Political Landscape of Nepal

While the world's superpowers grapple with corruption and military ambitions, the political landscape of Nepal is caught in a critical crossroads. With the collapse of the Soviet Union in the early 1990s, the global trend leaned towards the US as a model. However, Nepal stood as a stark contrast with a Marxist socialist party rising to power. Despite this, recent acceptance of the Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) terms by Nepal's ruling party suggests a leaning toward American influence. This raises important questions about the party's socialist credentials and the country's future direction.

Tibetan issues not in focus, but repression persists – exiled former leader

16 January 2023, Greek City Times

The plight of Tibet has become less discussed internationally but repression continues and China is applying what it did there to other regions, a former head of the Tibetan government-in-exile said on Saturday.

China seized control of Tibet in 1950 in what it describes as a “peaceful liberation” from feudalistic serfdom. International human rights groups and exiles routinely condemn what they call China’s oppressive rule in Tibetan areas.

Speaking to Reuters during a visit to Taiwan to observe the island’s elections, Lobsang Sangay, the leader of the India-based Central Tibetan Administration until 2021, said Tibet had somewhat fallen off the international agenda.

“I think Tibet is not current,” said Sangay, who remains an influential figure in the exile community and close to exiled spiritual leader and Nobel laureate the Dalai Lama, who he met with in India just before arriving in Taipei.

Tibet went through mass protests in 2008 before Beijing held the Olympics, and then a series of self-immolations by Tibetans in protest against Chinese rule, but then what China was doing to Uyghurs in Xinjiang followed by the security crackdown in Hong Kong took more attention, he added. “On the one hand, yes, there is less coverage about Tibet. That doesn’t mean the situation in Tibet is less serious,” Sangay said. China’s Foreign Ministry did not immediately respond to a request for comment. China does not recognise the exiled government, and has defended its rule in Tibet as bringing much needed development to what was a backward and feudal society. Sangay said other ethnic minorities in China had very similar experiences to the Tibetans.

“I always say, if you close your eyes and listen to a Mongolian speaking, a Uyghur speaking, a Tibetan speaking, the situation is very similar.” In the 1990s and early 2000s problems in Tibet were viewed as an “isolated, more peripheral issue”, and people who visited China thought engagement would make the country “more like us”, Sangay said. “But when it happened to the Uyghurs, to Hong Kong and potentially Taiwan, people thought hey, this is a system you are dealing with. This is an expansionist power.”

China’s perspective on ties with Pakistan and CPEC’s prospects

16 January 2024, Hindustan Times

This year marks a decade since the announcement of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC). This brief analyses Chinese-language literature to understand the country’s current stance on Pakistan and the CPEC. Two trends emerge. First, China appears to be facing a dilemma over Pakistan. While the Chinese government wants the CPEC to be successful, China’s strategic community now shows little optimism on the initiative. Second, contrary to the common perception that a crisis-hit and weak Pakistan will be more firmly entrenched in the Chinese sphere of influence, Islamabad now has few backers in Beijing. China is keen for Pakistan to work on its internal stability and to creatively engage multiple stakeholders, particularly India and the US, to help successfully implement the CPEC and its larger geostrategic goals.

In recent months, Pakistan has been grappling with what some analysts have referred to as a “polycrisis” – an “existential” economic crisis, an intense political conflict between the government and opposition leader Imran Khan, and a drastically deteriorating security situation. Pakistan has sought assistance from “friendly countries” and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) to stabilise its economy and strengthen its ability to pull through the ongoing crisis. While Pakistan did secure an initial approval from the IMF for a $3 billion loan programme on 30 June 2023, mere hours before the IMF agreement expired, overall, this time, international assistance for the country has been somewhat less forthcoming. Most notable was China’s ambivalence to a faltering Pakistan, despite being the country’s largest creditor, and having the ability to restructure its debt and reverse its economic free fall. Despite the rhetoric of an ‘iron-clad, all-weather friendship’ between Beijing and Islamabad, of Pakistan being the fulcrum of China’s South Asia policy, and of the $60 billion China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) being the cornerstone of the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), China chose a ‘wait and watch’ policy on the Pakistan situation, often even suggesting the US is to blame for Pakistan’s current plight. At one point, even Pakistan’s strategic circles—which are rarely critical of China—began to question why Beijing was not doing more to help Islamabad. Significantly, China's current reticence comes on the back of reported cuts to the CPEC budget (by a substantial 56%) in 2022.

Amid this backdrop, this brief examines Chinese resources—the discourse in the Chinese-language media, discussions on the Chinese internet, and writings by Chinese academics and scholars—to understand the current dynamics of China-Pakistan relations.

Feature story: The continuing saga of housing for Tibetan Exiles in India

16 January 2024, Phayul

The issue of housing for Tibetan exiles in India persists as a complex challenge, despite concerted efforts from multiple stakeholders, including the Indian government, His Holiness the Dalai Lama, the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), and associated religious leaders. While the larger chunk of Tibetan exiles in India have been accommodated in established and compact settlements, a number of Tibetan exiles still linger in a limbo of extended uncertainty. The responsibility to help those who are without housing facilities rests with the exile Tibetan government, known officially as the Central Tibetan Administration. However, the weight of blame does not rest entirely on the administration.

The affected group notably include newly arrived Tibetans and members of scattered Tibetan settlements, who, despite arriving early in India, do not have homes of their own. This disparity in housing provision stands stark against the backdrop of 35 established Tibetan settlements in India, 12 in Nepal, and 7 in Bhutan, which serve as vital anchors of the community.

History and present initiatives

The genesis of the housing issue can be traced back to the aftermath of China's occupation of Tibet in 1959, compelling over 80,000 Tibetans to seek refuge outside Tibet. The Dalai Lama and the Government in exile took on the arduous task of rehabilitating these displaced refugees. Tibetan refugee settlements were established in collaboration with India, Nepal, and Bhutan, with the aim to preserve Tibetan socio-cultural values within cohesive communities.

Despite the establishment of these settlements, a considerable number of Tibetans continue to live outside these established communities, presenting a persistent challenge. To address this disparity, the Department of Home, Central Tibetan Administration, under the 16th Kashag, launched the "Building Back Compact Communities" (BBCC) project, also known as "Shipoe Leyshi" in Tibetan.

The primary objective of this initiative is to provide housing facilities to Tibetan exiles lacking permanent residences, thereby fostering a sense of belonging and stability within the diaspora. The last administration led by former President Dr. Lobsang Sangay has also undertaken projects to provide housing, in new compact communities in Bir, Bylakuppe, Dickyiling where many households were provided housing. Successive administrations over the course of the last few decades have also pushed forward with their own initiatives to solve the problem of housing.

The current administration, in an official notice from the Department of Home on October 18, 2023, revealed that 655 households, primarily comprising recently arrived Tibetans from Tibet, applied for housing allotment. Additionally, a subsequent notification on April 28, 2023, urged homeless Tibetan households to register, resulting in 992 new household names, including 354 newly arrived Tibetan households and 638 scattered Tibetan households. As of now, a total of 1,647 households have registered for the project.

The plan ahead

The 1,647 households consist of Tibetan exiles from various locations across India, including Bangalore, Mundgod, Lugsam, Kollegal, Ladakh, Tengang, Shillong, Bir Dege, Bir BTS, Shimla, Dharamshala, Kullu, Mandi, Sunder Nagar, Rewalsar, Gangtok, Darjeeling, Kalimpong, Sonada, Dehradun, Harbertpur, and Hunsur, encompassing 2,661 family members.

The CTA plans to rehabilitate these households by carving out chunks of land in existing Tibetan settlements of Odisha (Phuntsokling), Mainpat in Chhattisgarh state (Phendheling), and in Mundgod (Doeguling), Bylakuppe (Chokor), Hunsur (Rabgyaling), Kollegal (Dhondenling), Bylakuppe (Lugsam Samdupling), Bylakuppe (Dicki Larsoe) in South Indian states of Karnataka. They were given the deadline of November 10 to complete the form and select at least two preferred settlements as options from the lot.

Upon finalizing the preferred choice of settlements, the CTA will provide a plot of land as well as financial assistance to construct the houses. Families choosing Mundgod (Doeguling) and Bylakuppe (Dicki Larsoe) will receive 5 lakh rupees from the CTA, while those opting for Hunsur (Rabgyaling) and Kollegal (Dhondenling) will receive 7.5 lakh rupees. Those choosing Bylakuppe (Lugsam Samdupling) will receive 2.5 lakh rupees, and families selecting Odisha (Phuntsokling) and Mainpat in Chhattisgarh state (Phendheling) will have the entire houses built for them by the CTA.

Deputy Secretary of the Department of Home, Ngudup Wooser, speaking to Phayul revealed that the project began some time ago. However, limited participation in the form-filling stage has slowed the project's progress and that the project is currently stuck in its early stages. When the households finalize their preferred settlement choices, the department will then coordinate with settlements to identify available land in those settlements. The entire project is expected to take between 2 to 4 years.

This initiative aligns with the incumbent Sikyong Penpa Tsering's speech in Shimla on May 11, 2023, where he highlighted that the growing trend of migration of young Tibetans from India to foreign countries, has led to a decline in school enrollment and settlement population. The present Kashag plans to revitalize settlements and schools by resettling the people who lack permanent residence in areas with available land and housing.

President Tsering said that his project serves two purposes; one of providing housing to the houseless Tibetans but also strengthening the existing Tibetan settlements and repopulating the settlements which have been depleted by varying factors like migration to the west, declining birth rate as well as little to no new refugees from Tibet.

Voices from the ground

The ongoing project by the current administration as well as those initiated by the previous administration under former President Dr. Lobsang Sangay is not immune to criticism, with questions over viability, practicality and quality of finished projects.

Challenges of livelihood is a persistent talking point in the larger context of the relocation project. Phuntsok, a third-generation resident of Rangzen Camp in Shimla, shared his concerns about the proposed relocation project impacting the approximately 60 households in his scattered Tibetan settlement in Shimla. The community originally settled in the region decades ago when Tibetan refugees were involved in road construction for a livelihood and later set up small businesses along the encampment. Phuntsok emphasized the economic challenges that they would face if they were to relocate to the new settlements, as the families in their camp are currently engaged in business activities in Shimla during the summer.

He explained that the Himachal government had instructed them to vacate the land, promising an alternative plot in Shimla. Despite their legal stay-order, Phuntsok expressed confusion about the future, questioning whether they would have the opportunity to register for housing once the Himachal government fulfils its commitment to allot plots near Shimla, especially if they participate in the housing scheme under the Tibetan government.

CTA official Ngudup Woesser told Phayul that efforts by the administration to acquire land for households in legally contested areas like Shimla, Dharamshala, among others have not been successful and that the department cannot assist individuals who wish to remain in these contested areas. The President of the CTA, Penpa Tsering has said on several occasions that houseless Tibetans can avail the benefits of housing while also being engaged in businesses and livelihoods elsewhere so that households can use the housing during the time when they are not engaged in their seasonal businesses. He stressed that his administration will exercise "leniency" in that regard, in contrast to his predecessor.

Another grievance towards the project is the size of the houses, particularly those allotted in the projects initiated by the previous Kashag. Dekyi Yangzom, leader of newly inaugurated Mundgod Camp 10, a project that was initiated by the previous administration and completed a few months ago, told Phayul that the problems are faced by the small families due to the size of the houses. The housing for bigger families consisting of more than two family members is spacious and good but the housing for childless families and single people are small, with only one room, kitchen and bathroom. Out of 40 houses, 24 are 300 sq. ft, which were distributed to a single person or a family with two members, whereas the remaining 16 are 600 sq. ft, which were distributed to families with more than two members.

She, however, added that we are grateful to the Tibetan government for allotting them the houses but said that with the money spent on that scale, the finished product could have been more user-friendly in terms of space. Questions however linger over whether expectations for more spacious and better housing are legitimate or overly expectant of the administration whose capability to deploy funds are dependent on availability of funds as well as the approval of the parliament.

What is the way forward?

The Project "Building Back Compact Communities" to provide land and housing to houseless households has a host of challenges primarily stemming from the absence of common ground between the CTA and the beneficiaries. The beneficiaries must have realistic expectations from the administration on what help the CTA can provide, considering the limited funds as well as the number of people seeking help. Since government projects are for the masses, each unit cannot be tailor fitted to the needs of individuals.

On the administration's part, the key agenda should be scoping the ground realities and understanding the needs of the beneficiaries so that the funds deployed translate into fulfilling the aspiration of the target group, and avoiding grievances in the future. Projects must be drafted in consultation with stakeholders, especially when it is for the rehabilitation of the mass.

Taiwan's president-elect Lai Ching-te: How China, US and Russia reacted to his election

13 January 2024, Live Mint

Taiwan elections 2024: Lai Ching-te, candidate of the ruling Democratic Progressive Party's (DPP), won the Taiwan election held on Saturday, January 13. Both China and the United States reacted sharply to the latest polls as the DPP secured unprecedented third consecutive term in the nation.

Taiwan's election took place at a time of growing geopolitical tensions between Beijing and Washington. China claims Taiwan as its own. But Lai's party rejects China's territorial claims. It is speculated that Taiwan's president-elect Lai Ching-te may have to deal with the ire of China which has repeatedly denounced him as a "dangerous separatist".

Taiwan elections: How China reacted to Lai Ching-te's victory?

China said on Saturday "reunification" with Taiwan was still "inevitable" after president-elect Lai Ching-te won the pivotal election on the self-ruled island, AFP reported. The election "will not impede the inevitable trend of China's reunification", Beijing's Taiwan Affairs Office spokesperson Chen Binhua said in a statement published by state news agency Xinhua.

The spokesperson was quoted as saying that the vote "will not change the basic landscape and development trend of cross-strait relations". He said Beijing "firmly oppose(s) the separatist activities aimed at 'Taiwan independence' as well as foreign interference". Chen Binhua said the results did not "represent mainstream public opinion on the island" of 23 million people.

China strongly opposes Lai. In Beijing's view, Lai, 64, is a separatist and "troublemaker through and through" for comments he first made in 2017 as premier about being a "worker" for Taiwan's formal independence - a red line for Beijing.

How US reacted

The US, which is Taiwan's main military partner, said it does "not support independence" of Taiwan. "We do not support independence..." US President Joe Biden was quoted by Reuters as saying when asked for reaction to Saturday's elections.

Earlier, the US had pledged support for whichever government emerges. In a show of support for the government, Biden plans to dispatch an unofficial delegation to the self-governed island, according to a senior Biden administration official.

US Secretary of State Antony Blinken congratulated Lai Ching-te on his victory and said the US "is committed to maintaining cross-strait peace and stability, and the peaceful resolution of differences, free from coercion and pressure." He said the US looks forward to working with Lai and leaders of all parties in Taiwan to advance their "longstanding unofficial relationship, consistent with the US one China policy."

The United States is Taiwan's most important international backer and arms supplier despite the lack of formal diplomatic ties with the island.

How Russia reacted

Russian foreign ministry spokeswoman said Russia's position on Taiwan is unchanged and that the country considers it an integral part of China, TASS reported.

Sino-Indian Border Infrastructure In The Indian Defense Ministry's Year End Review – Analysis

14 January 2024, Eurasia Review

The Indian Ministry of Defense released its Year End Review 2023 a few days ago. The review provides a state of play on areas under its purview including defense production and exports, major defense acquisitions, border infrastructure, and individual service updates from the Indian army, navy and air force. Much of what India is attempting to do in the defense realm has to do with China and its growing military prowess. However, a look at past year-end reviews demonstrates that it is not always so overt in doing so. In this regard, the Year End Review for 2020 was an exception, as there was a special emphasis on China's aggressive behavior. The review came only a few months after the Galwan clash, in which India lost 20 soldiers, so this is maybe not so surprising. But since then, it appears that India has gone on to do a more general review that scans all the major developments concerning the Indian Ministry of Defense.

Even though there was no specific mention of China in this year's review, the construction of border infrastructure along the India-China border is accelerating and there is a detailed appraisal of the current status in the review. This is important given that India and China are still locked in a conflict with a total of around 150,000 troops standing by on both sides of the border. Many commentators have suggested that it was the infrastructure race that led to the Chinese actions in 2020.

Upgraded infrastructure comes with enormous benefits, from better trade to commercial prospects. It's also a critical enabler for applying military power. In the case of India and China, there has been an evident military imbalance as far as defense platforms, military units, and the physical infrastructure. China's focus on building modern state-of-the-art infrastructure across the border and in the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) has had an important bearing in terms of its ability to get troops to the border. The extensive road network in Tibet as well as the rail links that China has developed in these areas have facilitated troop mobilization by road and rail in a short time span. Further, China's establishment of oil and logistic depots all along the border areas says a lot about the advanced infrastructure capabilities that China has put in place, which in turn put India at a significant disadvantage. The Indian side continues to face limitations when it comes to troop mobility and logistics supply to forward areas because of the relatively poorer state of infrastructure on its side of the border. Infrastructure development on the Indian side has picked up pace in recent years, but the Indian military still faces many constraints. In October, in a study on the state of the Sino-Indian border infrastructure John Swartz provided a detailed account of the improvements to date. Swartz writes that "the increased number of tunnels and bridges also signals far more investment, operational capacity, and technical capability, while independently adding to the quality of the road system." He added that as far as air forces are concerned, India has enjoyed topography-induced "strategic advantage" (which allows India to launch aircraft at full capacity) and therefore even with a smaller budget, India's position is not badly placed. However, the rail connectivity in the border areas presents a rather bleak picture, with Swartz arguing that there exists "a large asymmetry."

The 2023 review notes that the Indian Defense Minister dedicated a total of 118 infrastructure projects led by the Border Roads Organization (BRO), although this is across the country and not limited to Sino-Indian border areas alone. In September, the minister unveiled 90 projects across 11 states and union territories. Of the 90 projects, a large number of them belong to the Sino-Indian border areas including 36 in Arunachal Pradesh; 26 in Ladakh; 11 in Jammu & Kashmir; five in Mizoram; three in Himachal Pradesh; two each in Sikkim, Uttarakhand and West Bengal and one in Nagaland. Across different sectors along the Sino-Indian border, notable projects included the Nechiphu Tunnel in Arunachal Pradesh; as well as two airfields, two helipads, 22 roads and 63 bridges. In January 2023, 28 infrastructure projects were kicked off at an event at Siyom Bridge on Along-Yingkiong road in Arunachal Pradesh. These projects included 22 bridges, including Siyom bridge; three roads and three other projects in seven border states or union territories of the Northern and North-Eastern regions, comprising of eight projects in Ladakh; five in Arunachal Pradesh; four in Jammu and Kashmir; three each in Sikkim, Punjab and Uttarakhand and two in Rajasthan. The review claimed that the BRO was able to complete these strategically vital projects in record time, most of them within a single working season using the best available technology.

As for the scale of work, the review stated that 601 kms of roads have been finished during the year. The review added that extensive work has been done "on India-China Border Roads and all other Op-Critical Roads along the Northern Borders." This includes critical roads such as Nimu-Padam Darcha road, Gunji-Kutti-Jolingkong road, Balipara-Chardwar-Tawang road, TCC-Taking road, TCC-Maza road that are proceeding at an accelerated pace. Some of the major road projects that are at varying stages of work, with some nearing completion in the coming months include: Raqni-Ustad-Pharkiyani Gali road and Srinagar-Baramulla-Uri road in Jammu and Kashmir; alternate connecting road to DBO road in Ladakh as well as the Chushul-Dungti-Fukche-Demchok road; and in Uttarakhand, the Gunji-Kutti-Jollingkong road, a road in the Ghatibagarh-Lakhanpur-Lipulekh Pass, and Nyu Sobla-Tidang road. The government also set up three telemedicine nodes, including two in Ladakh and one in Mizoram this year. Meanwhile, the Ministry of Home Affairs has approved the construction of four roads, a total of 255 kms, in Arunachal Pradesh under Project Arunank.

As for tunnels, the BRO has undertaken work on 20 tunnels, 10 of which are under construction and 10 in the planning stage. The BRO will soon begin working on the 4.1 km Shinku La Tunnel on the Nimu-Padam-Darcha road in Ladakh, with aims to complete it by December 2025, according to Union Minister Anurag Thakur who detailed the Cabinet decision. When completed, this will be the highest tunnel in the world at an altitude of 15,855 ft, and will provide better connectivity irrespective of weather to the border areas around Ladakh. Another important tunnel project currently underway is the Sela tunnel on Balipara-Chariduar-Tawang Road in Arunachal Pradesh which involves two tunnels of twin tube configuration.

The review notes that this can reduce the travel distance by more than 8 kms and bring down travel time by an hour, and most importantly it will establish all-weather connectivity to Tawang. This tunnel, when completed, will possibly break another record in terms of being the longest bi-lane highway tunnel in the world at an altitude of 13,800 feet. There is also the 260-meter Kandi Tunnel in Jammu and Kashmir, strengthening connectivity between Jammu and Poonch that was completed in October. Some of the key bridges in the border areas include a permanent bridge over the Shyok River in Ladakh which was completed in March. During the year, a total of 3,179 meters of bridges were developed.

All of this has been possible with better financial allocation and a sharper focus from the government following on from the increasingly adversarial nature of ties between India and China. According to the review, the BRO's budget has come to "a record high of Rs 12,340 crore in FY 2022-23 with a 100% jump in the funds allocated under GS Capital Head over the preceding two years which now stands at Rs 5,000 crore."

Given the state of bilateral relations between India and China, New Delhi is doubling down on its efforts regarding strategic border infrastructure. In fact, since the Galwan conflict began in the summer of 2020, infrastructure development has received a strategic push to get troops and military supplies positioned near border areas. India's push comes in the wake of China's two-decade-long push from the late 1980s to construct state-of-the-art infrastructure across Tibet and the Sino-Indian border areas. India's defensive approach to infrastructure development changed only in the late 2000s after seeing China's modern road and railway networks and what they meant in the context of the Sino-Indian border conflict.

China Failed to Sway Taiwan's Election. What Happens Now?

13 January 2024, New York Times

China's leader, Xi Jinping, has tied his country's great power status to a singular promise: unifying the motherland with Taiwan, which the Chinese Communist Party sees as sacred, lost territory. A few weeks ago, Mr. Xi called this a "historical inevitability."

But Taiwan's election on Saturday, handing the presidency to a party that promotes the island's separate identity for the third time in a row, confirmed that this boisterous democracy has moved even further away from China and its dream of unification.

After a campaign of festival-like rallies, where huge crowds shouted, danced and waved matching flags, Taiwan's voters ignored China's warnings that a vote for the Democratic Progressive Party was a vote for war. They made that choice anyway.

Lai Ching-te, a former doctor and the current vice president, who Beijing sees as a staunch separatist, will be Taiwan's next leader. It's an act of self-governed defiance that proved what many already knew: Beijing's arm-twisting of Taiwan — economically and with military harassment at sea and in the air — has only strengthened the island's desire to protect its de facto independence and move beyond China's giant shadow.

"The more hard-line, tougher approach hasn't worked," said Susan Shirk, a research professor at the University of California, San Diego, and the author of "Overreach: How China Derailed Its Peaceful Rise." "That's the reality of Taiwanese politics."

That evolution, cultural and political, comes with risks. Mr. Lai's victory forces Mr. Xi to face a lack of progress. And while China's full response will play out over months or years, China's Taiwan affairs office said Saturday night that the election cannot change the direction of cross-strait relations, effectively ensuring that the dynamic of brinkmanship and stress will continue and most likely intensify.

China and the United States have made Taiwan a test of competing sensitivities and visions. To Beijing, the island is a remnant of its civil war that the United States has no business meddling with. To Washington, it is the first line of defense for global stability, a democracy of 23 million people and the microprocessor factory for the world.

The gargantuan stakes add gravity to every word or policy that Mr. Lai or his party might deliver now and after his inauguration in May. With Taiwan's sense of self and China's expectations in conflict, Mr. Xi is not expected to sit idly by.

Before the election, in editorials and official comments, Chinese officials painted Mr. Lai as a villain, calling him a stubborn "Taiwan independence worker," a "destroyer of cross-strait peace" and potentially the "creator of a dangerous war."

During the campaign, Mr. Lai, 64, a veteran politician respected by supporters for his quiet determination, said that Taiwan did not need formal independence. In a news conference after his victory, he said he would seek a balanced approach to cross-strait relations including "cooperation with China," following the path of his predecessor, Tsai Ing-wen.

But there is little chance of China changing its opinion.

"Lai Ching-te is an impulsive and politically biased figure, so we cannot rule out the possibility that unpredictable and unknown developments may occur during his tenure," said Zhu Songling, a professor of Taiwan studies at Beijing Union University.

"I'm afraid it's very dangerous," he added, noting that Mr. Xi's views on Taiwan were clear. That includes his insistence that force can be used if necessary.

Western scholars of Chinese politics are not much more optimistic.

"The next four years will be anything but stable in U.S.-China and cross-strait relations," said Evan S. Medeiros, a professor of Asian studies at Georgetown University.

Like other analysts, he said to expect a familiar suite of pressure tactics.

At the very least, China will keep trying to manipulate Taiwan's politics with disinformation, threats and economic incentives. Chinese officials have also hinted they could target trade, eliminating more tariff concessions.

Expanded military drills are another possibility. Chinese fighter jets, drones and ships already encroach on Taiwan almost daily.

Beijing has also shown that it will keep prodding Washington to pressure Taiwan and to cut military support. Messages of alarm are becoming a common feature of U.S.-China diplomacy.

In Washington, on the eve of Taiwan's election, Liu Jianchao, the head of the Chinese Communist Party's international department, met with Secretary of State Antony J. Blinken. The United States said Mr. Blinken "reiterated the importance of maintaining peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait."

Mr. Liu, based on other official statements, most likely warned the United States not to intervene "in the Taiwan region" — a complaint sparked by an announcement that a delegation of former officials would head to Taipei after the election. Such visits have followed past elections. China's Foreign Ministry condemned "the American side's brazen chattering."

There are no plans in Washington to go silent, however, or constrain cooperation. Quite the opposite. Last year, the Biden administration announced $345 million in military aid for Taiwan, with weapons drawn from American stockpiles. Bills in Congress would also tighten economic ties to Taiwan, easing tax policy and laying a foundation for economic sanctions against China if it attacks.

Having worked with the Americans as vice president, Mr. Lai can move faster, analysts said, possibly into more sensitive areas.

The United States could increase collaboration on cybersecurity, strengthening communication networks to a point that blurs the line with (or prepares for) intelligence sharing. It could seek to place military logistics equipment on the island — a strategy the Pentagon is introducing throughout the region.

It is also an open secret that American military advisers, mostly retired officers, have a growing presence in Taiwan. Some Taiwanese officials call them "English teachers." Under Mr. Lai, many more could be on the way.

"Beijing has been turning a blind eye, so the question is: What size of that presence will cross the Rubicon?" said Wen-ti Sung, a political scientist at the Australian National University's Taiwan Studies Program. He added: "Hopefully each additional step will not be seen as overtly provocative to elicit or justify a massive Chinese reaction."

War, of course, is not inevitable. It may be less likely right now, when China is busy with a dismal economy and the United States with wars in Europe and the Middle East.

Some analysts also hope that Mr. Xi will find a way to claim victory in the election and step back from antagonism. With a third-party candidate, Ko Wen-je, winning 26 percent of the vote with a vague focus on a middle path in China relations, Mr. Lai won with just 40 percent.

"It's in China's national interest to expand the path of peaceful integration so they won't have to fight," Professor Shirk said. "There are a lot of people watching this interaction and Beijing's reaction — all the investors are watching it too."

In Taiwan, however, there may be little Mr. Xi can do to polish China's image. In recent surveys, less than 10 percent of Taiwanese respondents considered China trustworthy.

"We have seen too many examples of what Xi did to Hong Kong and how he treated his people," said Cheng Ting-bin, 56, a teacher in Taipei who voted for Mr. Lai.

Most Taiwanese see their future elsewhere. On Saturday, many said they hoped the government could leverage the powerful semiconductor industry to build connections to Southeast Asia and Europe.

During the campaign, any identification with China seemed to have been erased. Though Taiwan's official name is the Republic of China, a holdover from when Chinese nationalists fled there, R.O.C. references were hard to find. At Mr. Lai's rallies, supporters wore shimmering green jackets with "Team Taiwan" written in English across the back.

Even the Nationalist Party, known for favoring closer ties with Beijing, emphasized deterrence, the status quo and Taiwanese identity. Its candidate, Hou Yu-ih, spoke with such a strong Taiwanese accent that Mandarin speakers unfamiliar with local inflections had a hard time understanding him.

In many ways, the election was less of a referendum on China policy than usual. Cost-of-living issues became more dominant in part because the candidates' platforms on foreign affairs all aligned with what most people said they wanted: a stronger military, closer ties with the democratic world, and a commitment to the status quo that avoids provoking Beijing but also seeks to tiptoe out of its orbit.

"What we want is just to preserve our way of life," said Alen Hsu, 65, a retiree who said his father had come from China and his son serves in the Taiwanese Air Force.

"China," he added, "simply cannot be trusted."

China: Guidelines Instruct Religions How to Implement the New Patriotic Education Law

12 January 2024, Bitter Winter

The key statute on domestic indoctrination is in force since January 1. Now religions are told how they should enforce it. We offer a full English translation of the Guidelines.

On January 4, 2004, the 25th meeting of the National Joint Conference of Religious Groups was held at the China Islamic Association. The five authorized religions issued Guidelines on how the Patriotic Education Law should be implemented by religious communities, making them even more than before mouthpieces for the Party's propaganda. As the Guidelines state, believers should understand that in China "the state is greater than religion, and the state law is greater than religious rules."

We offer a full English translation of the Guidelines.

***

The "Patriotic Education Law of the People's Republic of China" is our country's first law on the theme of patriotism. The formulation and implementation of the Patriotic Education Law, and the promotion and protection of patriotic education in the new era through the rule of law, are of great and far-reaching significance for inheriting and carrying forward the national spirit, gathering the people's strength, promoting the construction of a strong country and national rejuvenation. To conscientiously study, publicize, and implement the Patriotic Education Law, inherit and carry forward the spirit of patriotism in our country's religious circles, and enhance the national awareness, civic awareness, rule of law awareness, and patriotic sentiments of religious clergy and religious believers, we issue the following directives:

Adhere to the principles of patriotism, love for the party and love for socialism. Strengthen patriotic education and deeply understand that without the Chinese Communist Party, there would be no New China, there would be no socialism with Chinese characteristics, it would be impossible to realize the great rejuvenation of the Chinese nation, and there would be no good possibility of a healthy life for the various religions in our country today, and no happy life for the vast number of religious believers. Our country's religious circles must learn, think, and practice Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era, especially General Secretary Xi Jinping's important expositions on religious work, firmly support the "two establishments" and resolutely achieve the "two safeguards" to safeguard national unity and peace. We should focus on national unity, understand the idea of building a socialist modern country in a comprehensive way, and realize the great rejuvenation of the Chinese nation as a distinct theme, strengthen ideological guidance, cultural cultivation, educational guidance, and practical cultivation, build a solid sense of the Chinese nation's community, and continuously enhance our respect for the great motherland, the identity of the Chinese nation, Chinese culture, the Chinese Communist Party, and socialism with Chinese characteristics.

Adhere to and carry forward the fine tradition of patriotism. Our country's religious circles have a long and profound tradition of patriotism. Buddhism advocates "dignifying the land, benefiting and loving people," Taoism insists on "helping the world and benefiting people, protecting the country and loving the people," Islam advocates "patriotism is part of faith," Catholicism emphasizes that "patriotism is a commandment of God," and [Protestant] Christianity requires that "a good Christian should be a good citizen." These are the enduring spiritual riches of our country's religious circles. We must deeply explore the patriotic values contained in Chinese religious thought, actively publicize the glorious history of the unity and struggle of our country's religious circles under the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party, and tell vivid stories of patriotism, love of religion, and dedication to society with heart and soul, so that patriotism can become the firm belief, spiritual strength, and conscious action of religious clergy and religious believers.

Persist in filling up our country's religion with excellent traditional Chinese culture. Strengthen cultural self-confidence, inherit and develop China's excellent traditional culture, carry forward socialist core values, strengthen religious ideological construction, deeply explore the content of the teachings and canons that are conducive to social harmony, the progress of the times, and healthy civilization, and make adjustments to the teachings and canons so that they are in line with the development and progress of contemporary Chinese requirements and in line with the official interpretation of China's excellent traditional culture, and promote the deepening and solidification of the Sinicization of religion in our country. Strengthen the study and use of the country's common spoken and written language by religious circles in the process of interpreting and preaching scriptures, organize religious clergy and religious believers to recite Chinese classics, and carry out learning and experience activities for China's excellent traditional culture. Celebrate the Spring Festival, Lantern Festival, Qingming Festival, Dragon Boat Festival, Mid-Autumn Festival, and other important festivals together. Through colorful folk cultural activities, we can experience traditional culture and enhance our feelings for our country.

Continue to carry out patriotic education and practice patriotic activities. Make full use of commemorations of major national historical events, national public memorial ceremonies, patriotic education bases, etc. to carry out extensive patriotic education and inspire patriotism among religious clergy and religious believers. Continue to carry out education on the history of the Party, the history of the New China, the history of reform and opening up, the history of socialist development, the history of the development of the Chinese nation, and education on the theme of loving the Party, patriotism, and socialism, and further promote the "Four Advances" activities at religious venues. Integrate patriotism throughout the entire process of education and teaching in religious schools and into various subjects and teaching materials.

Adhere to comprehensive and strict governance of religions, strengthen the self-construction of religious groups, and establish a good image of patriotism and love of religion in the religious community. Carry out publicity and education on the socialist rule of law, and guide religious clergy and religious believers to firmly establish the awareness that the state is greater than religion, the state law is greater than religious rules, and the people are citizens first. Relying on magazines, websites, public accounts, etc. sponsored by religious circles, we will produce, broadcast, and publish excellent works on patriotic themes, set up special columns, strengthen publicity and reporting, sing the main theme of patriotism, and strive to comprehensively promote the construction of a strong country and the great cause of national rejuvenation. We will contribute wisdom and strength.

China Buddhist Association

China Daoist Association

China Islamic Association

Chinese Patriotic Catholic Association

Catholic Bishops Conference of China

Three-Self Patriotic Movement

China Christian Association

National Association of Chinese Young Men Christian Associations

National Association of Young Women's Christian Association of China

China's external propaganda on Tibet: Erasing Tibet to 'tell a good Chinese story'

11 January 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

China's Tibet policy has been a subject of international scrutiny ever since its invasion and subsequent occupation of Tibet in 1959. The Chinese government knows that there is a political problem in Tibet. But rather than resolve it, one of its approaches is to falsify the situation and employ various methods to control the narrative around Tibet, aiming to reshape its portrayal in global discourse. This report examines China's recent external propaganda efforts concerning Tibet, highlighting the objectives and the tactics.

China's external propaganda efforts regarding Tibet have been a complex and multifaceted undertaking, spanning decades and utilizing diverse channels and strategies. In the first four decades following the establishment of the People's Republic of China in 1949, China suffered significant damage to its international image. Mao Zedong's invasion of Tibet, China's conflicts with neighboring nations, the calamitous Great Leap Forward and the Cultural Revolution all inflicted immense harm on China's reputation in the global community.

Deng Xiaoping, who succeeded Mao, introduced market reforms aimed at altering China's trajectory, but the Tiananmen Square Massacre in 1989, occurring under his rule, further tarnished China's image, the repercussions of which persist to this day. Subsequent leaders, including Jiang Zemin and Hu Jintao, intensified China's external propaganda activities to rehabilitate and enhance the country's international standing, portraying China as a peaceful and developing nation.

Accordingly, Beijing took specific steps to impact the international perception of its conduct in Tibet. In 1993 a secret two-day "Conference on the Work of the External Propaganda on the Question of Tibet" was held in Beijing by the Chinese government to review its strategy. From leaked documents of the meeting, which the International Campaign for Tibet had obtained and subsequently published,[1] it was clear that the foremost concern of the Chinese government was how to address the challenge of the loss of the propaganda war internationally over Tibet. One document of the meeting talked of how "the distorted propaganda and attacks of the Dalai Cliques and international enemy forces still enjoy a large market in the world".[2] The meeting recommended that among other things, "Multi-level and different forms of vivid and lively propaganda should be carried out regarding sovereignty and human rights record. Its aim is to promote the further understanding on the part of the overseas people of the question of Tibet so as to eliminate the impact created by the Dalai Clique and the international enemy forces through their distortions and attacks against us ... and to win the support and sympathy of the overseas people for us".[3]

Many recommendations made at the Beijing meeting were incorporated into decisions of the 1994 Third Forum on Work in Tibet. The Third Tibet Work Forum marked an official end to moderate policies and a dramatic increase in political repression. The situation in Tibet following this meeting saw tighter internal security, longer prison sentences for political activism, increased control over monasteries and nunneries, intensified political education in schools and more detentions. The forum identified the influence of the Dalai Lama and the "Dalai clique" as the root of Tibet's instability. Officials at the third work forum described the Tibetan independence movement as a snake, and their attempts to "cut off the serpent's head" led to restrictions of the spread of Buddhism and a political campaign to destroy the religious as well as the political standing of the Dalai Lama.[4]

Comprehending the international community's sympathy for the Tibetan cause, during Jiang Zemin's term, dialogue was restarted in 2002 between his officials and the Dalai Lama's envoys. This was continued under Hu Jintao and extended into the years leading up to the 2008 Beijing Summer Olympics, finally ending in 2010. Some China watchers are of the view that the talks with the Dalai Lama's envoys were merely a pretense, aimed at temporarily alleviating international criticism of China's actions in Tibet until the conclusion of the Olympics.

Since 2008, human rights in Tibet have deteriorated greatly. Tibetans' ability to engage in religious activities, move and associate freely, express concerns, access information and enjoy due process is severely curtailed. Their right to enjoy a healthy environment, access resources to achieve an adequate livelihood and access Tibetan-medium language education is also restricted.

The pivotal year of 2008 marked Beijing's decisive move to accelerate its efforts to control the narrative surrounding Tibet. This strategy included a dual approach, to curtail the outflow of stories depicting its atrocities and to propagate its own narrative on Tibet. There was thus a policy aimed at halting the exodus of Tibetan refugees from Tibet, partly to halt the dissemination of their accounts of Chinese atrocities.

In 2009 there were strategic substantial investments (approximately US $7.25 billion, according to Professor Anne-Marie Brady of the University of Canterbury) for "big propaganda" (Chinese: da waixuan) to bolster international news coverage on China and enhance its global presence.[5] This dual strategy, aimed at curbing the dissemination of Tibetan accounts while actively promoting China's perspective, has remained in effect for the past 15 years, showcasing Beijing's persistent efforts to control the discourse on Tibet.

External propaganda in Xi Jinping era

Xi Jinping emphasized early in his tenure the importance of external propaganda in shaping China's global image and narrative. On Aug. 19, 2013, during his address to the National Propaganda and Ideology Work Conference, Xi advocated for "innovation" in China's external propaganda efforts, promoting the idea of effectively "telling China's story." [6]

Xi highlighted the necessity for meticulous and adept external propaganda, urging innovative methods that blended Chinese and external elements to effectively communicate China's narrative. He emphasized the importance of creating new concepts, categories and expressions to articulate China's perspective and voice on the global stage.

Taking advantage of Chinese investments launched in 2009 to strengthen international news coverage and global presence, Xi's directives to pursue innovative external propaganda have led China's external communication efforts to unprecedented levels of assertiveness and ambition. Leveraging advancements in information technology and bolstered by the nation's growing confidence in its national power, these efforts signify a significant evolution in China's approach to global propaganda on Tibet.

Rebranding Tibet as 'Xizang'

The latest development in the propaganda strategy is the attempt to impose the Chinese term "Xizang" in place of "Tibet" to the international community. Capitalizing on the turmoil caused by the COVID-19 pandemic, China quietly and strategically introduced a new policy around fall 2021. Amid the pandemic, the Chinese party-state aimed to eliminate Tibet's name from global discourse, with the sinister objective to replace it with the Sinified term "Xizang." Over the past two years, since the policy's discreet inception, it has become evident that China's propaganda attempts to erase the name "Tibet" are being systematically, gradually and incrementally implemented on the global stage. This effort is part of China's external propaganda strategy to present a favorable narrative of the country under the theme to "tell a good Chinese story."

China employs a strategic linguistic approach aimed at substituting the term "Tibet" with "Xizang," a Sinified term, in order to reduce the international recognition of Tibet as a distinct entity. This policy, introduced during the midst of the global COVID-19 pandemic in fall 2021 by the Chinese Communist Party Propaganda Department, was quietly implemented without significant public attention. [7] Reflecting on the two years since its launch, it is evident that the rebranding strategy of Tibet as Xizang is gradual, deliberate and incremental.

The initial introduction of propaganda portraying Tibet as Xizang can be traced to the tabloid Global Times, owned by the state media organization People's Daily.[8] In recent times, Xinhua and People's Daily have started using it. Even when the term Tibet is utilized, these Chinese state media entities are sure to append "China's Tibet" to emphasize their preferred propaganda phrase.[9]

The intermittent use of the term "China's Tibet" is expected to persist in the short to medium term, eventually transitioning gradually toward China's preferred propaganda term "Xizang" in the long run. Recognizing Tibet as a widely recognized global name, the Chinese party-state anticipates that its external propaganda strategy for Tibet will require time to succeed. Paradoxically, despite its intent and available resources, the Chinese party-state faces the challenge of imprinting its preferred term when very few outside China are familiar with the term Xizang. China's past efforts in rebranding Tibet as Xizang had failed, but the current unfolding strategy seems to be more confident and better planned than in the past.

Propaganda forums on Tibet

The concerted effort to officially and internationally promote the term Xizang gained momentum in 2023. Initially the push unfolded gradually through state or party-affiliated media channels and external propagandists aiming to normalize "Xizang" usage.

One particularly prominent platform for this propaganda was the 7th Forum on the Development of Tibet, which reconvened on May 23, 2023, after a hiatus since 2019 due to the COVID-19 pandemic. The forum's title and theme reveal its propagandistic nature. Officially titled "2023 Forum on the Development of Xizang, China: New Era, New Xizang, New Journey-New Chapter in Xizang's High-Quality Development and Human Rights Protection," the forum marked a deliberate attempt to replace the internationally recognized name "Tibet" with "Xizang" in English-language discourse.

[10] This strategic shift is evident when compared to the titles of the previous six forums, which were all titled "Forum on the Development of Tibet, China."

The pivotal moment arrived in October 2023 when China began to officially use "Xizang" for Tibet in the English rendition of Foreign Minister Wang Yi's remarks during the third "Trans-Himalaya Forum for International Cooperation" held in Tibet.

[11] Notably the event saw the participation of officials from over a dozen countries, several of which share borders with Tibet. All reference to Tibet in his opening speech at the forum on Oct. 5 was given as "Xizang," including calling the Qinghai-Tibet plateau the "Qinghai-Xizang plateau." This rendition of Wang's speech adds weight to his pronouncement of the external orientation of China's propaganda work to Sinify Tibet's global image and erase the internationally recognized term "Tibet" in diplomatic discourse.

The orchestration of such events falls under the purview of the State Council Information Office (SCIO), also known as the CCP Central Office of Foreign Propaganda, an institution established in 1991 with the primary aim of countering international backlash following the Tiananmen Square Massacre in 1989.

SCIO has remained consistently engaged in propagating the Chinese narrative on Tibet. It orchestrated a series of 'Forums on the Development of Tibet,' with the first event in the series held in the Austrian capital of Vienna in 2007. The second was held in the Italian capital Rome in 2009, and the third was held in the Greek capital of Athens in 2011. Since the fourth forum, which was held in the Tibetan capital Lhasa in 2014 (the fifth and sixth were also in Lhasa in 2016 and 2019, the seventh in Beijing in 2023), the Tibet Autonomous Region has also been named as a co-organizer. This could be a deliberate move to lend official credence to the TAR's government, aligning its participation with the overarching narrative orchestrated by Beijing. Incidentally, the seventh forum held in May 2023 had "Xizang" replacing Tibet in the English version of documents.

Propaganda through conferences

Multiple conferences with an international orientation were also orchestrated throughout 2023 in addition to the above-mentioned forum. One such event was the "7th Beijing International Tibetology Symposium," themed "Prosperity and Development of Tibetology and an Open Tibet," held on August 14, which sought to manipulate academic platforms for political agendas to push China's narrative for the foreign audience.[12]

Presented as a scholarly exchange co-hosted by United Front entities, including the China Association for the Preservation and Development of Tibetan Culture, the conference underscored China's tight control over academic dialogue and genuine mutual learning. It served to legitimize the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) approach in Tibet and promoted a state-centric narrative on Tibet. Activities and awards for "Research on the Relationship between Tibet and the Central Government since the Yuan Dynasty (Volume 1 and 2)" exemplified this effort to push forward historical propaganda.

Through the format of an interview to Chinese state media, Li Decheng, deputy director-general of the China Tibetology Research Center, further advanced the state narrative on Tibetan Buddhism's reincarnation practice. On Aug. 16, 2023, during the 7th Beijing International Symposium on Tibetology, Li launched a pointed attack on the 14th Dalai Lama, asserting that the recognition of the Dalai Lamas is the prerogative of the Chinese government and not the 14th Dalai Lama himself. According to Li, religious affairs are part of Chinese state affairs, and the management of religious affairs should be in accordance with state-promulgated laws.[13]

An editorial published in the United Front News WeChat account soon after the symposium reinforced China's strategy of dominance in Tibetology, touting its achievement in suppressing Tibetology in Western academia. The editorial framed academic progress as a competition between China and the West on Tibet. Oversimplifying the multifaceted nature of Tibetology and dismissing critical scholarly work, it alleged that Western scholars have ulterior motives in their research efforts to control the narrative on Tibetology and the pursuit of truth.

The Chinese party-state also convened a first “Tibet Chinese National Community Awareness Forum” at the InterContinental Lhasa Paradise, owned by the InterContinental Hotels and Resorts group, in Lhasa on Sept. 18, 2023.[14] The forum, whose theme was “Creating the Soul of China and Co-Creating a Model District,” brought together a total of 420 delegates, primarily Chinese academics, from all over China to share ideas to “better strengthen national unity and safeguard the reunification of the motherland in Tibet.”[15] State media highlighted numerous Chinese academics specializing in supplying ethnic policy ideas toward creating a Chinese nation.

Discrediting the Dalai Lama

For many around the world, Tibet and the Dalai Lama are inseparable. Almost three decades ago, the Chinese party-state made a deliberate decision to target the Dalai Lama. In July 1994, during the CCP’s Third National Forum on Work in Tibet held in Beijing, a vehement campaign against the Dalai Lama was initiated. Party documents, using aggressive and crude language, likened the Tibet issue to a serpent, with the Dalai Lama portrayed as its head. According to these documents, “The focal point in our region’s fight to oppose splittism is to oppose the Dalai clique. As the saying goes, to kill a serpent, we must first cut off its head. If we don’t do that, we cannot succeed in the struggle against splittism.”[16]

This aggressive campaign against the Dalai Lama, launched in 1994, persists to this day. In Tibet, the party has prohibited Tibetans from displaying his photograph, routinely condemns the Dalai Lama during party meetings and mandates that Tibetan job applicants express no affinity toward him.

On the global stage, the Chinese party-state, in its external propaganda, frequently refers to the Dalai Lama as a “wolf in sheep’s clothing,” a puppet of the CIA, a former serf master or even a demon. While the global community widely admires the Dalai Lama for his efforts in promoting peace and human unity, the CCP has incessantly pursued its campaign over the years to discredit and vilify him, aiming to neutralize the Tibet issue.

The CCP policy to discredit the Dalai Lama persists. In April 2023, leveraging the susceptibility of global media to sensationalism, shadow propagandists from China orchestrated a smear campaign against the Dalai Lama. They distorted an innocent interaction between the Dalai Lama and an Indian boy at a public event, falsely framing it as an act of pedophilia.[17] By editing and manipulating an official video recording of the public gathering, these propagandists fabricated and disseminated a narrative depicting the Dalai Lama as a pedophile.

The Chinese authorities took further leverage of global media reports on the distorted projection of the Dalai Lama with the boy for propaganda against the Dalai Lama for the Chinese audience. Writing under the name of the “Human Rights Research Institute of Southwest University of Political Science and Law” to gain credibility, the domestic audience was provided a compilation of negative reports carried by global media against the Dalai Lama. [18] The report carries offensive and defensive arguments over the incident to drive home the Chinese Communist Party’s propaganda goal of demonizing the Dalai Lama.

Misusing modern technology for information control
The Chinese government extensively employs censorship and information manipulation to suppress critical information regarding Tibet’s political situation, human rights violations and cultural suppression. It utilizes modern information technology not to address societal issues but rather for censorship and surveillance purposes.

Contrary to the optimistic view of modern information technology as a solution to human problems, the Chinese government has embraced these advancements for controlling information and surveillance. The CCP’s utilization of information technology for repression is extensively documented. As global technological advancements move toward artificial intelligence in 2024, there’s little doubt that the Chinese government will harness this technology to further suppress dissent under the guise of “innovative management.”

The Chinese government has tightened its control over the flow of firsthand accounts from Tibet by imposing stricter border controls to prevent Tibetans from sharing their experiences of CCP governance.

The year 2008 marked a significant shift in controlling the exodus of Tibetan refugees. Beijing’s focus on bolstering its international image shifted gears after the successful staging of the Summer Olympics. In the months preceding the Olympics, widespread uprisings against Chinese governance erupted in Tibet.[19] In response to these events and in alignment with its strategy to enhance China’s global image following the Olympics, the Chinese party-state initiated various measures to stem the outflow of Tibetans.

The annual average of approximately 2,500 Tibetan refugees escaping through the mountains saw a notable decline in 2008. While 2,338 Tibetan refugees crossed the border in 2007, this number plummeted by 75% in 2008, with only 588 making the journey. This policy aimed at halting the flight of Tibetan refugees has seen remarkable success, with a sharp decline to merely five arrivals in 2022. The Chinese government's stringent measures have yielded near-perfect success in stemming the flow of Tibetan refugees and their narratives.

By turning Tibet into a highly securitized enclave and effectively curtailing the flow of firsthand accounts from the region, the Chinese party-state hopes it has successfully cleared obstacles to amplify its external propaganda on Tibet.

Propaganda tactics: Vetted foreign media tour

China's stringent control over access to Tibet remains extensively documented, and journalists are particular targets of this strategy.[20] Journalists, only a select few, are only provided access after being meticulously vetted to align with the Chinese Communist Party's narrative, and they constitute the exclusive group permitted entry through state-organized and managed tours. This carefully curated access serves a dual purpose: to counter international criticisms and to craft a favorable image of Chinese governance, positioning it as a model for the global community.[21] China has persistently sought to influence countries in the Global South, advocating for its vision of "people-centered" development and the concept of "harmonious development between human beings and nature."

An illustrative example of this orchestrated narrative presentation was the program by the China International Press Exchange Center for some 30 journalists in Tibet. From Oct. 3 to 8, 2023 they facilitated the visit of these journalists from 20 countries to Nyingtri and Lhasa in Tibet, as part of "telling the real story of Tibet." [22] Notably, the journalists were from countries such as Pakistan, Nepal, Belarus, Ethiopia, Chile, Vanuatu, Timor-Leste, Malaysia, Kyrgyzstan, and Georgia—predominantly underdeveloped or developing nations, often sharing similar political ideologies, and frequently recipients of Chinese aid and loans.

Echoing China's propaganda: diplomatic tours and state-controlled narratives

China is known to be leveraging its diplomatic channels and economic influence to exert pressure on international organizations, governments and corporations to conform to its prescribed narrative on Tibet. Utilizing its position as a global power, the Chinese government orchestrates tours to Tibet for selected foreign diplomats, primarily from developing countries, to amplify its external propaganda on Tibet. These carefully curated tours showcase a sanitized version of Tibet, devoid of the stark realities of human rights abuses, cultural suppression and environmental degradation.

In August and September 2023, a delegation of 11 Geneva-based foreign diplomats from developing countries, including Venezuela, Cuba, Nicaragua, Pakistan and Belarus, visited Tibet at the invitation of China's Foreign Ministry. Ambassador Khalil

Hashemi, the permanent representative of Pakistan (he has since been appointed as the Pakistani Ambassador to China), led the group.[23]

During their visit, the diplomats were met by Yan Jinhai, deputy secretary of the Party Committee and chairman of the Tibet Autonomous Region. Chinese state media reported that Yan extolled Tibet's "achievements" in economic development, living standards, national unity, cultural preservation and ecological efforts under the leadership of the CCP.

Despite the international community's persistent concerns about the human rights situation in Tibet, the delegation ignored these issues and instead echoed the CCP's propaganda.

A similar group of foreign diplomats, primarily from developing countries, was taken on a tour of Tibet in May 2023, just before the forum on the development of Tibet. Chinese state media extensively quoted these delegates, presenting their glowing affirmations as validation of Beijing's narrative on Tibet.[24]

For instance, the ambassador of the Philippines to China praised China for ensuring that "local [Tibetan] students can learn new things, but also while preserving their own culture, their own language."

Similarly, the ambassador of Nepal to China lauded China's Belt and Road Initiative for promoting connectivity and enterprise structural development.

Both these ambassadors echoed Chinese propaganda at the expense of the reality of the situation in Tibet.

Foreign propagandists in service

Under Xi Jinping, Communist China is increasingly resorting to tactics reminiscent of its early revolutionary days. One such tactic involves cultivating an international image using foreign influencers. Historically, figures like American journalists Edgar Snow and Anna Louise Strong were instrumental in allowing the party-state to communicate the merits of the communist model to the world. In the contemporary era, where social media wields greater influence than traditional media within specific audience segments, the party-state has actively been engaged in recruiting foreign influencers to disseminate its propaganda through digital channels.

These foreign social media influencers amplify or defend the CCP's messages to global audiences. While their impact within Tibet, particularly among Tibetans themselves, remains minimal, they serve the party's interests by bolstering its legitimacy among Chinese citizens and by advocating for and disseminating the party's narrative on Tibet abroad.

A recent report by the Australian Strategic Policy Institute (ASPI) outlines that the CCP-state has orchestrated an extensive network of international individuals who propagate its online propaganda and narratives on China, aiming to portray itself as a respectable adherent to global norms and regulations.[25] This effort includes the establishment of multilingual influencer studios, engagement with international students in Chinese universities and competitions incentivizing creators to advocate for the CCP's perspective.

According to ASPI, Beijing has recruited over 120 international influencers willing to align their content with the CCP's narratives, endorsing its values, policies and ideology. These influencers are instrumental in bolstering the party's credibility among Chinese audiences and amplifying its propaganda on the global stage. Some influencers, seeking increased popularity and revenue, have discovered that aligning with Chinese nationalism through promoting CCP propaganda can expedite their success, exploiting algorithms of mainstream social media platforms that prioritize consistent and trending content. The report further highlights the prevalence of content generated by Chinese state media and foreign influencers dominating searches related to contentious topics like Tibet and Xinjiang, utilizing social media algorithms favoring frequent posting of new material.

ASPI underscores that while these influencers aren't directly instructed by state media, they are motivated by rewards, inducements and limitations. The report cautions that the proliferation of foreign influencers advocating for the CCP will complicate the discernment between genuine, factual content and propagandistic material, posing challenges for social media platforms, foreign governments and individuals seeking to distinguish between the two.

Examining the content shared by foreign influencers on the topic of Tibet, it emerges that their primary goal is to defend the Chinese government against worldwide criticisms, while presenting themselves as neutral and independent observers or "journalists" unaffiliated with China.

Screenshots of a sample of collected postings below serve as compelling evidence of the agenda of the foreign influencers. Their strategic dissemination includes promoting the contentious replacement of the universally recognized name "Tibet" with the Chinese-imposed term "Xizang," aligning with China's persistent endeavor to control the narrative surrounding Tibet. They advocate for China's boarding schools designed for Tibetan children, positioning these institutions as progressive avenues for education and socio-cultural integration.

They staunchly amplify China's specific political narratives, particularly emphasizing and justifying the Chinese government's stances on pre-1959 Tibetan governance and societal structures. A notable aspect of their dissemination involves echoing the state's portrayal of Tibetans, often presenting them in a perpetual state of joyfulness, frequently depicted engaging in traditional dances, while endorsing China's "ethnic minority policy" as a model of "inclusive" governance.

Furthermore, they actively participate in smear campaigns targeting the Dalai Lama, leveraging manipulated video clips from public events to malign him. They also echo the Chinese party-state's depiction of Tibetans as a community stuck in a backward cultural paradigm, citing their nomadic and herding practices as detrimental to the environment. Paradoxically, they advocate for China's "Green China" initiatives, arguing for the displacement of herders while defending China's polluting factories as essential economic engines.

Additionally, they echo China's narrative of ushering modernization and economic progress into Tibet, predominantly highlighting the expansion of the railway network and the surge in tourism without questioning the negative impacts of these on Tibet and Tibetans, which include whether or not they come at the cost of eroding the unique cultural identity and sustainable practices of the Tibetan people.

Outreach through Tibetans in exile

Understanding the impact of the Tibetans in exile on the international community's approach to Tibet, Tibetans in exile were particularly discussed in the 1993 propaganda strategy conference. In his opening remarks, Zeng Jian-hui said, "We should reinforce our propaganda to Tibetans living abroad. There are hundreds of thousands of Tibetans living abroad. These people form the basis of the Dalai Clique. We should try to win them over through our propaganda and our actual work with them, so as to weaken the force of the Dalai Clique." [26] Zeng further suggested the way to do this was "by using their feeling for their homeland."

Accordingly, the Chinese authorities have been making efforts, including through officials of the CCP's United Front Work Department posted in some of the Chinese embassies in Australia, Belgium, Canada, India, Nepal, Switzerland, and the United States, in wooing Tibetans in exile. A main method adopted is provide incentives for them to return to Tibet, or the offer of travel to Tibet. On Dec. 8, 2023 five returned Tibetans in Tingye (Dinggye) in western Tibet were provided with 2500 Yuan each by the county's United Front (which issued a press release on it) for attending a symposium to discuss affairs of Tibetans who returned to the county.

At the end of August this year, a meeting was held in Beijing on the issue of "returned Tibetans." [27] A United Front report on the meeting claimed to have "strengthened the power of friendship" (with Tibetans in exile) and that in the past five years it has "established regular contacts with overseas Chinese in India, Nepal, Australia, the United States, Switzerland and other countries and regions where Tibetan [and] overseas Chinese live in large numbers, effectively expanding the circle of friends of the Overseas Chinese Federation.” The report further said that it has been “guiding them [Tibetans in exile] to tell the story of Tibet well, spread the voice of Tibet well.”

Indeed, 2023 saw Chinese authorities allowing a select few Tibetans from India and the West to visit their homeland, after a gap of several years. More interestingly, unlike in the past, sources say that these Tibetans experienced lesser restrictions and were in fact encouraged to speak out about their experience on their return to their respective places. According to sources, the United Front arranged for group tours by Tibetans abroad to their homeland.

Conclusion

China’s ambitious long march to bolster its international image was accelerated 15 years ago. In the period following the 2008 Beijing Summer Olympics, which symbolized China’s emergence as a global power, the strategy to manage the Tibet issue on the international stage commenced by halting the exodus of Tibetan refugees from Tibet and initiating external propaganda on Tibet through China’s “big propaganda” media investments to propagate its own narrative on China’s rise and sovereignty over Tibet.

The Chinese government employed diverse methods to control the discourse surrounding Tibet, aiming to redefine its global portrayal. With confidence in its status as an economic powerhouse, China became increasingly assertive in its external propaganda, displaying meticulous planning and execution unlike its past efforts.

Amid the global preoccupation with the COVID-19 pandemic, the Chinese party-state quietly launched a renewed policy to replace the universally recognized term Tibet with the Sinified term Xizang in fall 2021. Two years into the implementation, it’s evident that the strategy to replace “Tibet” with “Xizang” is deliberate, gradual and incremental.

In 2023, China aggressively pushed this policy on the international stage through orchestrated propaganda forums on Tibet, targeting diplomats and journalists, especially from developing countries. The year also witnessed a sophisticated smear campaign against the Dalai Lama, a culmination of nearly 30 years of efforts to vilify him, projecting false accusations on a global scale.

China’s external propaganda on Tibet appears set to intensify in the coming years as part of its long-term plan to erase Tibet’s identity and discredit the Dalai Lama globally. With no end in sight to Xi Jinping’s rule and his directive to “tell a good Chinese story,” China’s external propaganda on Tibet is expected to continue incrementally.

However, the positive impact hoped for by the Chinese party-state from its external propaganda on Tibet remains doubtful. China’s image problem seems to persist from 15 years ago when it sought to alter its international image. Despite the party’s claims of victory, doubts persist within China regarding the effectiveness of its efforts. The COVID-19 pandemic and China’s lack of transparency in external propaganda have seemingly damaged China’s international image, potentially returning it to its starting point from 15 years ago.

If the situation of the Tibetan people is as good as the Chinese government claims, it should have nothing to fear in providing access to Tibet to independent observers, journalists and diplomats. If it seriously believes the people of Tibet have benefited greatly under its rule, it should allow them freedom of movement and expression so that they can travel and make this case themselves.

The Taiwan that China wants is vanishing

10 January 2024, BBC News

There was a time when the beneficent smile of a dictator greeted you everywhere in Taiwan.

It’s a far rarer sight now as more and more of those likenesses, which once exceeded 40,000, are removed.

Some 200-odd statues have been stashed away in a riverside park south of the capital Taipei. Here, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek is standing, sitting, in marshal’s uniform, in scholars’ robes, astride a stallion, surrounded by adoring children, and in his dotage leaning on a walking stick.

A democratic Taiwan no longer seems to have room for its erstwhile ruler.

The island’s burgeoning identity is once again being tested as Taiwan votes in a new government on Saturday. And with each election, China is more troubled by the assertion of a Taiwanese identity - one that thwarts the chances of what it calls “peaceful reunification” with the mainland.

Chiang fled China in 1949, escaping impending defeat in the civil war at the hands of Mao Zedong’s communist forces. He came to Taiwan, which became the Republic of China and remains so to this day. The mainland, ruled by Mao and the Chinese Communist Party, became the People’s Republic of China. Both claimed the other’s territory. Neither Chiang, nor Mao, conceived of Taiwan as a separate place with a separate people. But that is what it has become.

Unlike Taiwan, China’s claims never waned. But almost everything else has changed on either side of the 100-mile strait. China has become richer, stronger and an unmistakable threat.

Taiwan has become a democracy and is in the middle of yet another election where its ties with Beijing are being tested. No matter the result of Saturday's vote, its freedom is a danger to the Chinese Communist Party's hopes of unification.

There are still those who see themselves, like Chiang, as Chinese - they look to China with admiration and even longing. On the other side are those who feel deeply Taiwanese. They see Beijing as yet another colonising foreign power, like Chiang and the Japanese before him.

There are also 600,000 or so indigenous peoples who trace their ancestry back thousands of years. And then there is a younger, ambivalent generation that is wary of questions about identity. They feel Taiwanese but see no need for Taiwan to declare independence.

They want peace with China, they want to do business with it but they have no desire to ever be part of it.

"I am Taiwanese. But I believe in the Republic of China," says a woman in her 50s, wrapped in tinsel and Christmas lights, much like Elton John.

This is an uncommon response at an election rally for the Kuomintang or KMT, the party Chiang led until his death in 1975. And this is their heartland - Taoyuan County - where tens of thousands have turned out to see their presidential candidate, Ho Yu-ih.

The KMT is proposing peace and dialogue with the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), its old nemesis. Taiwan, it says, can prosper only when it talks to Beijing.

"We should be friends with the mainland," the woman says, laughing. "We can make money together!"

Her name is impossible to hear over the deafening sound of patriotic rock.

There is a huge roar of approval as Chiang Wan-an, the great-grandson of Chiang Kai-shek and a rising star in the KMT, comes on to the stage.

"I like him very much, he's very handsome," says the woman in the tinsel. "I hope he will be president one day!"

The crowd is overwhelmingly those in their 50s or 60s, traditional KMT supporters with family or business ties to the mainland.

"I am Chinese. Taiwan is just a small island. Look at China!" says one man in his 50s, excited about China's recent spate of space launches. "Of course we should reunify - not now maybe, but one day we must reunify."

There are few young people in the crowd - those who are don't seem to be drawn to the KMT's legacy.

"I'm not voting for the party, I'm voting for the candidate," says Lin Chen-ze. "I am Taiwanese, but I want peace. The [ruling] Democratic Progressive Party has been in power for eight years, it's time for a change, and Hou Yu-ih is a good man. He is honest and efficient."

The answers to a decades-old question - Do you see yourself as Chinese or Taiwanese? - are getting mixed up. For Beijing that is alarming. For Taiwan's political parties, it is a delicate, new dance, where ideological certainties are being quietly shelved.

"It's not right what they've done to these statues," says Fan Hsun-chung, a sprightly 94-year-old veteran, as he walks through the park full of Chiang's statues. Fan was 18 in 1947 when he left his home in Sichuan, deep in the mountains of southwest China, to join Chiang's army. In early 1949, as the Chinese civil war turned dramatically against them, Fan's unit was shipped to Taiwan to prepare for its use as a bastion.

Six months later Chiang, his government and a defeated army of close to a million men followed.

Fan thought he would return home soon. But after Mao took power, he couldn't go home, or even write home. "So, I waited and waited, for decades."

He didn't see his hometown - far up a tributary of the mighty Yangtze river - until 1990. By then his family was long dead, many of them persecuted by the Communist Party for his actions as a "counter-revolutionary". His mother and older brother, he learned, had starved to death during Mao's industrialisation drive, which had triggered a famine. Despite his seven decades in Taiwan, Fan says he never stopped feeling Chinese: "When we came here our country did not perish; we are still the Republic of China. Taiwan is a province, one of the smallest of more than 30 provinces."

Not far from here is where Chiang himself lies in unquiet rest: inside a black marble sarcophagus, still unburied nearly half a century after his death.

"We were fighting for the unification of China," Fan says. "We wanted China to be strong, unified and independent. That was our dream."

For Chiang, Taiwan was only a stronghold from which to lick his wounds and pursue dreams of reconquering China. The man and his dream may be long dead, but his imprint is obvious.

Walk the streets of Taipei and you are surrounded by names from a bygone era in China: Nanjing East Road, Bei-ping North Road, Chang-an West Road. The language used for education and commerce is Mandarin, a dialect from northern China

Taipei is a city of wheat noodles and dumplings, again northern fare. There are also plenty of excellent Shanghainese restaurants: a legacy of the exodus of much of that city's business elite as the communists took power.

But Chiang's legacy came at a huge cost. Any expressions of Taiwanese political identity were ruthlessly crushed. Many thousands were tortured, imprisoned and executed under Chiang, whose personality cult rivalled that of Mao, Stalin or Kim Il Sung. The period entered the history books as the White Terror.

The KMT and the CCP are "like identical twins with the same mindset", says 86-year-old John Chen, a political activist. "They both have this idea that we are all part of Greater China."

Chen is walking through the cell block of an old military detention centre on the south side of Taipei - a place he knows all too well.

In 1969, a military court tried and jailed him here. He had been married three weeks. He spent the next 10 years in Jing Mei, one of Taipei's most feared prisons. His crime: taking part in a pro-Taiwan independence group while in medical school in Japan.

He shared the cramped cell with six other inmates. They had no bunks, only a squat toilet in the corner and a tap and a bucket to wash. They sweltered in the summer and froze in the winter. They were allowed out for exercise for just 15 minutes a day.

Chen, who was born under Japanese rule, speaks fluent Japanese, and admits to feeling more affinity with the ways of Japan than with those of mainland China.

"I don't consider myself Chinese. I am Taiwanese," he says.

Chen is among the many millions - the majority of the island - whose families emigrated from China. They largely came from Fujian in several waves starting in the early 1600s. They speak Taiwanese, a version of southern Fujian dialect, as different from Mandarin as English is from Portuguese.

To him, "Taiwan is already independent" and the future is bright.

"One day the Chinese Communist Party will collapse. And when it does, we can fully join the international community."

He dismisses Beijing's claims that Taiwan is part of China because they share a common culture and language.

"Where does that leave Tibet or Xinjiang? And if the Chinese nation is built on being Chinese or speaking Chinese, what about Singapore?"

The era of military rule is long over, and monuments across Taiwan commemorate the White Terror.

But Beijing's persistent claims, some argue, are making a bristling, younger generation rethink how they see themselves.

Lōa Ēng-hōa began learning Taiwanese about five years ago. Now he only speaks in Taiwanese, or English, but refuses to speak in Mandarin.

To him it is the language of a colonial oppressor. He likens it to British people being forced to speak Italian because England was once part of the Roman Empire.

"When I was at elementary school, we would gather each morning and sing the [Republic of China] national anthem. And there were always some lazy students who didn't bother singing, and I would shout at them 'don't you love your country!' I really thought I was Chinese."

He says it was only when he went to work in Australia and saw how it was dealing with its turbulent history, that he began to awaken to his identity.

Under KMT rule, school children were forbidden from speaking Taiwanese and punished if they did. Taiwanese parents made their children speak Mandarin, even at home, believing that it would help them get into university or find a good job.

Lōa says Taiwanese may not be banned but the "ideological dominance" of Mandarin persists.

"And the most important thing is that we are still denied the right to be educated in Taiwanese - 80% of people are ethnically Taiwanese, but we don't have the right to be educated in our own language. How ridiculous is that?"

For young people like him, the ruling Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), which once called for Taiwanese independence and whose success grew out of anti-Beijing sentiment, is not going far enough. The DPP was once a ragtag outfit that struggled to win local elections and parliamentary seats. Taiwanese was the language of its rallies. Now, it's the party of power. It has ruled for 16 years in total, including the last eight.

Now its young supporters speak fluent English and are passionate about the environment and LGBTQ rights, more so than any urgent need for formal Taiwan independence.

At a recent rally in Taipei, the DPP's vice-presidential candidate, Hsiao Bi-khim made her first big public address. Young and charismatic, she was a big hit with the crowd.

In Beijing, she is loathed: born in Japan to an American mother and Taiwanese father, Hsiao's most recent job was as Taiwan's de-facto ambassador to the United States. China's state media has been busy spreading rumours that she can barely speak Mandarin, which is untrue.

But China fears the rise of politicians like Hsiao, who have almost no family ties to the mainland, and see Taiwan as closer to Tokyo and Washington than Beijing.

Beyond the DPP, this is the first election where all three presidential candidates are of Taiwanese descent. None are from families that came to Taiwan with Chiang in 1949. The KMT's Hou is the son of a market trader from southern Taiwan who climbed through the ranks of the police force to head the national investigation bureau.

Today, the DPP no longer talks about the need for formal independence and the KMT speaks of dialogue with Beijing, but sidesteps the subject of unification, or whether Taiwan is part of China.

Both are now embracing Taiwan's peculiar "status quo"- it elects its own leaders, but it is not considered a country.

At the KMT rally, the woman in tinsel summed it up bluntly: "This is the mountain protecting us. Without the Republic of China [status], Taiwan is finished. Taiwan can't be independent. Independence means war."

This is what experts call "strategic ambiguity". So far it has satisfied everyone, including Beijing. But that is not how people define who they are.

"We are all Taiwanese today regardless of where our grandparents came from. We inter-marry and mix Taiwanese and Mandarin when we speak to each other," say a group of hikers on a trail near Taipei.

When they travel abroad, they say they are from Taiwan. "We do not want people to think we are from China."

That is a problem for Beijing - because they are deciding what they want to be.

And that runs counter to the CCP's message - a unified China under the rule of the Communist Party. It's a message that has been delivered to Tibetans, Uyghurs, Mongols - and Hong Kong.

Not everyone feels Taiwanese, or exclusively Taiwanese, but more and more young people seem to lean this way, polls suggest.

Even in this new Taiwan, Chiang's family name counts. Many here say they would like to see the KMT nominate his great-grandson in 2028. And Hsiao has been touted as a contender for the DPP.

Either could win, but the challenge for China is that the Taiwanese will decide.

Young voters say all they care about is peace: "I have two younger brothers and I am very worried they will end up fighting in a war with China," says 21-year-old Shen Lu at the KMT rally.

Like their most powerful allies, few Taiwanese talk of independence because that feels impractical, even impossible. But peace has become a refrain for keeping what they have - whatever they might choose to call it.

"I am Taiwanese but the most important thing for my generation is peace," Shen says. "I don't want unification. I want the situation to stay as it is now. We should keep it like this forever."

China's Colonial Boarding Schools In Tibet And The Danger They Represent

09 January 2024, StratNewsGlobal

NEW DELHI: At the United Nations, the tables are being cleared for the Universal Periodic Review, a roughly quadrennial process where member states human rights situation comes under scrutiny. It could be a particularly troubling time for China given its discord with the West, that could see more countries taking a close look at Beijing's human rights practices.

Some of these relate to China's education policies in Tibet that Dr Gyal Lo, a Canada-based Tibetan sociologist describes as "colonial". In an interview with StratNews Global, he said that after closely studying the education system, he was able to draw some conclusions.

"While teachers are teaching, students are learning and schools are running, yet our society is not making any progress. So, what is wrong with our education system. We analysed the curriculum and the education policy and I was the first to academically describe China's school system in Tibet as colonial boarding schools", he said.

The system he said, draws from China's education policy that has two aspects: one hidden and the other that is "on the table".

"When you read what's on the table, there's no problem, but it's in the implementation of the document on the ground that the double game is played. One should closely watch how it is implemented, since it is done in a way they want."

Gyal Lo says the hidden policy is what matters here for this is what has been at play for over six decades. The hidden policy limits instruction in Tibetan language, culture and tradition to about 20%. Earlier it was more but since Xi Jinping took over in 2008, the approach has changed.

"They want one culture, one nation one language. So, there's no space for our culture and language. This is I think is China's top ideological conspiracy being practiced over many decades in Tibetan society. Our school system produces cheap labour. They have weaponised the school system to turn four generations of Tibetans into cheap labour."

The Chinese of course deny any wrongdoing in Tibet and when pressed, resort to circumlocution. For instance, they claim that the number of students in boarding schools is low, and only cite the case of the Tibet Autonomous Region, which is sparsely populated. But Dr Gyal Lo points to the other regions of Tibet the Chinese prefer not to talk about: Utsang, Amdo and Kham populated by 2/3rds of ethnic Tibetans.

Key questions put to the Chinese rarely elicit a reply, or if they do, it is usually a lie, he says. At the same time, he feels the UN is the best place to put pressure on China to clean up its act in Tibet. The Chinese tend to listen to those who are rich and powerful while ignoring the weak.

This has implications for India. If Tibetan language and culture are safeguarded and allowed to be practiced, India is safe given the knowledge and awareness each culture has of the other. But if the colonial boarding schools become the norm in Tibet, with its focus on Sinicizing Tibetans, then Tibetans thinking like Chinese will only deepen India's insecurity.

China's Public Image Actually Getting Worse

09 January 2024, CFR

As I noted in a Discussion Paper two years ago, China's global public image has become highly negative in the Xi Jinping era due to growing authoritarianism at home, a souring economy that puts a dent in the idea of a China model for other states, hyper-assertive diplomacy with neighbors, and China's increasingly close economic and political links to Russia. Indeed, China and Russia recently passed $200 billion in bilateral trade and the upswing shows no sign of letting up, as China has become one of the main places Russia can obtain a wide range of goods.

Recent polling by the Pew Research Center, which has historically closely tracked global views of both China and the United States, suggests that China's public image globally remains poor, and is possibly getting worse. According to Pew, virtually all of the twenty-four countries surveyed, which include wealthy democracies and developing countries, currently have more favorable views of the United States than of China. (Exceptions were Kenya, which had slightly more favorable views of China, and Nigeria.) Most countries also had far more confidence in U.S. President Joe Biden than in Chinese leader Xi Jinping, a dent in Xi's desire to re-emerge on the world stage and, seemingly, play a greater leadership role again after several years of virtual isolation at home.

Despite this, China's overwhelming economic presence in Southeast Asia and the lack of a coherent U.S. counter-strategy, as the Indo-Pacific Economic Framework has mostly crumbled, has made China far more powerful than it was even a few years ago in its near region. States like the Philippines and Singapore and, depending on the presidential election coming up, Indonesia, may be turning more to the U.S. for defense cooperation, but increasingly regional polling is showing that Southeast Asian countries see China as the dominant influence. Even in Vietnam, which built a closer partnership with the United States this year, that partnership was followed up by Vietnam solidifying ties with China, showing that China remains one of its most important partners.

China's poor global image, and the ways in which it has frightened neighbors with its assertive diplomacy and actions in regional waters do still provide an opportunity for the United States. But Washington needs to respond not only with defense cooperation but with a regional economic strategy that, supported by Japan and other key partners, can have greater relevance for South and Southeast Asian countries.

The China factor seemingly less significant in Taiwan's 2024 presidential election

07 January 2024, East Asia Forum

On 13 January 2024, Taiwanese citizens will elect their next president and members of the Legislative Yuan. The incumbent President Tsai Ing-wen of the pro-independence Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) is not running due to term limits.

Two opposition parties attempted to form an alliance to unseat the ruling DPP. But the plan fell apart due to disagreements over who would head the ticket as presidential candidate. With the subsequent withdrawal of Terry Gou – the billionaire founder of tech giant Foxconn – from the presidential race, Taiwan's 2024 presidential election is effectively a three-way race.

The main contenders are Lai Ching-te of the ruling DPP, Hou Yu-ih of the opposition party, the Kuomintang (KMT), and Ko Wen-je, chair and founder of the minor Taiwan People's Party (TPP).

The DPP's Lai has strong pro-independence credentials and currently serves as Taiwan's vice president. He has been leading in the polls since July. As the mayor of New Taipei City, the KMT's Hou is not a particularly dynamic or forceful candidate and has little experience at the national and international levels. He has endorsed the 1992 Consensus – which implies that both Taiwan and the Chinese mainland belong to one China without specifying what 'China' means. But Hou is perceived as feeble in his commitment to this cross-strait policy that is important to KMT heavyweights like former president Ma Ying-jeou.

Ko of the TPP is a medical doctor turned politician who recently completed his second term as mayor of Taipei. He positions himself as an anti-establishment outsider, and his straight-talk and terse soundbites are well-received among young voters who resent the traditional political divide between the 'pan-Blue' and 'pan-Green' political camps headed respectively by the KMT and DPP. To brand himself as an alternative 'third force', Ko emphasises that his cross-strait policy would be guided by the principles of 'deterrence and communication'.

Though the 'China factor' remains the key political cleavage in society, and the most important factor affecting citizens' electoral behaviour, it has not been as big of a campaign issue in the 2024 elections as in the 2020 polls.

Chinese President Xi Jinping's 2019 policy address on a 'Taiwan plan' and Beijing's subsequent repressive responses to the Hong Kong protests provided an opportunity for President Tsai Ing-Wen to burnish her image as a defender of Taiwan's sovereignty and democracy. The China factor revived her flagging electoral prospects and led to her landslide victory in the 2020 election.

Instead of amplifying Beijing's threats, Tsai now downplays them even though Chinese leaders have intensified their military pressure. DPP leaders seem to worry that the KMT's narrative that the upcoming election is a choice between war and peace may negatively impact Lai's chance of winning.

The Lai campaign has rarely discussed Chinese military threats other than countering the KMT's narrative by framing the election as a choice between democracy and autocracy. To ease citizens' concerns that another DPP administration would invite a violent response from Beijing, Lai has moderated his pro-independence positions and emphasised that he would continue Tsai's cautious approach towards the relationship between Taiwan and China.

Believing that cross-strait exchanges can bring economic and political dividends to Taiwan, engagement with China has always been the KMT's cross-strait policy. This may explain why Hou has proposed to revive the Cross-Strait Service Trade Agreement, opposition to which culminated in massive 2014 protests known as the Sunflower Movement. But the engagement proposition may be difficult to sell considering that less than 40 per cent of Taiwanese citizens now support the 1992 Consensus – a decline of more than 20 per cent since 2019.

With Taiwanese living under constant military threat for several decades, Beijing's persistent pressure has become a nuisance that invites resentment. As a result, the 'war and peace' narrative has yet to resonate with voters. This is not to say that Taiwan's citizens do not worry about the China threat. But pocketbook issues – including stagnant wages, a shortage of affordable housing and meagre career prospects – appear to attract more attention, particularly among the younger generation.

Although the 'China factor' appears to have been overshadowed by the economy in the 2024 presidential campaign, Beijing has still inserted itself in the process, knowing that Lai's victory would mean Taipei continuing its policy of demonstrating the island's independent and separate status in the international community.

Attempting to influence electoral outcomes, Chinese leaders have continued their military pressure on Taiwan and magnified the 'war and peace' narrative. It was reported that the Chinese government has also been spreading disinformation to discredit DPP candidates, and it has applied a new round of economic coercion measures on Taipei. After Xi Jinping repeated the message that China's 'reunification' with Taiwan is inevitable, a senior mainland official warned the island's citizens to make a 'correct choice' in the upcoming elections.

Beijing's efforts so far have yet to sway public opinion. Lai continues his lead in the polls, as contenders of the other two parties trail behind. Past experience has shown that the Chinese government's threats and overt endorsements almost always invited opposite outcomes. In addition to contributing to President Tsai's landslide victory in the 2020 election, Beijing's hard-line policies also backfired in the 1996 and 2000 presidential elections as candidates of whom Chinese leaders disapproved got elected.

Most Taiwanese have no desire to be part of China. Beijing's repressive responses to Hong Kongers' quest for democracy have further alarmed many on the island. All indications show that that Chinese leaders will continue their uncompromising policy toward Taiwan – and the history of tense and chilly cross-strait relations under DPP leadership may repeat itself should Lai win the election on 13 January.

Dark realities of Xinjiang: Tough test for Uighurs

07 January 2024, The Pioneer

As reports of China's alleged human rights abuses in Xinjiang surface, a storm of international outrage erupts. Diplomats, politicians, and human rights organisations decry the treatment of Uighurs, accusing China of systematic oppression, torture, and brainwashing. Despite the global outcry and sanctions, China remains defiant, raising questions about the UN's ability to hold the authoritative regime accountable.

The recent reports of China attempting to sell the Xinjiang story to diplomats, politicians, and journalists from friendly nations are eliciting strong protests from various quarters. Many of these visitors have witnessed and experienced outright violations of the basic freedoms of Uighur and other ethnic Muslims in Xinjiang Province.

China is maintaining several "re-education camps" or "vocational training centres" in Xinjiang. The purpose of establishing such camps is to deradicalise the locals in response to the growing Islamophobia in the region. Additionally, the Chinese Government asserts that these centres aim to improve labour skills and alleviate poverty in the province. Local officials strongly believe that these efforts are genuinely beneficial and contribute to restoring social stability, harmony, and prosperity to Xinjiang.

However, the reality is exceedingly harsh. Uighurs are enduring pain and untold misery. China is vehemently suppressing the Uighurs in Xinjiang Province, solely aiming to curb separatist tendencies among the people in this volatile region. This is Beijing's official explanation for the extensive security and surveillance measures imposed throughout Xinjiang. Beijing has been incarcerating millions of Uighurs in these re-education camps, subjecting them to systematic brainwashing, torture, and other degrading treatments. In 2021, Agnes Callamard, the Secretary-General of Amnesty International, accused Chinese authorities of creating "a dystopian hellscape on a staggering scale".

The Uighurs find themselves at a cultural and historical crossroad, facing a severe test for survival under the Communist rule from Beijing. Nearly 12 million Uighurs reside in the Xinjiang Uighur Autonomous Region (XUAR), as it is officially known in China, located in the northwest and serving as a crossroads between Central Asia and East Asia.

Last year, Chinese President Xi Jinping visited the far-western province and emphasised the need to maintain "hard-earned social stability" in the region. He conveyed to officials in the Xinjiang Uighur Autonomous Region (XUAR) that Beijing intends to persist with its counterterrorism policies there. It serves as a litmus test for China, requiring a delicate balance between its global expansion agenda and the need to ensure domestic stability throughout the mainland and its overseas territories, including Hong Kong, Macau, and the South China Sea (SCS).

The UN has already accused China of serious human rights violations in Xinjiang. A long-awaited report, published in 2022 by the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights on the XUAR, rightly pointed out that China is engaged in "serious human rights violations against the Uighurs" and other predominantly Muslim communities in the province. Beijing vigorously attempted to prevent the release of the Xinjiang report, but it was eventually made public by the UN human rights body just before the retirement of Human Rights Commissioner Michelle Bachelet. She visited Xinjiang in May of that year, and only after her visit was the highly sensitive report brought to the public's attention.

However, for the Communist Party apparatchiks and its top leaders, this report was dismissed as nothing more than a "farce" orchestrated by Western powers.

Global human rights agencies, such as Human Rights Watch (HRW), assert that China is committing crimes against humanity in Xinjiang. Following the release of the report, Chinese officials maintained their abusive "strike hard policies", resulting in the suppression of fundamental freedoms for Uighurs and other Turkic Muslims. HRW strongly argues that UN member states should not remain silent in the face of such crimes against humanity. Additionally, HRW urges concerned governments to:

A. Work toward the successful adoption of a UN Resolution to investigate instances of crimes against humanity and hold those responsible accountable.

B. Improve efforts to document individuals who are detained, imprisoned, and forcibly disappeared, and make attempts to reunite families.

C. Impose targeted sanctions on Chinese officials implicated in serious abuses in Xinjiang.

D. Consider pursuing criminal cases under the concept of "universal jurisdiction," allowing a country's domestic judicial system to investigate and prosecute certain grave crimes, such as torture, even if they were not committed on its territory.

Human Rights Watch (HRW) also contends that the current Human Rights Commissioner, Volker Turk, should act on the recommendations of the report from his office, previously provided by his predecessor. It is time to hold accountable those responsible for committing heinous crimes against the Uighurs and other minorities in the Xinjiang Uighur Autonomous Region (XUAR).

The pivotal question is whether the UN, in general, and the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC), in particular, have the mandate to hold China accountable for massive human rights abuses in Xinjiang over the years. It is deemed impractical for any international agency, including the International Court of Justice (ICJ), to compel an authoritative regime like Xi's to cease human rights violations in Xinjiang. While sanctions have already been imposed by various nations, including the US, the UK, Canada, and the European Union (EU), on Chinese officials alleged to be involved in rights violations against the Uighurs and other Muslim minority groups in 2021, it is essential to note that this marked the first coordinated sanctions by EU Members against China since the historic Tiananmen Square massacre in 1989. In response, China retaliated with almost equivalent sanctions against some EU politicians and officials.

Back in 2020, the International Court of Justice (ICJ) joined over 300 other NGOs in urging the UN to establish a specific mechanism for systematically monitoring and reporting on instances of human rights abuses by China.

Notably, this collective call was followed by a similar appeal from 50 UN experts. Both groups emphasised China's systematic human rights abuses in Hong Kong, Tibet, and particularly in Xinjiang. They also highlighted the Communist nation's efforts to conceal information about the deadly COVID-19 pandemic and its continued attacks on those defending human rights. The joint letter expressed deep concern about China's global network of censorship, threats, surveillance, and blatant violations of UN processes.

Beijing, leveraging its newfound power status driven by economic clout, wolf warrior diplomacy, and growing military strength, employs tactics to deny NGOs accreditation, attack UN experts, and undermine country resolutions at the UN Human Rights Council. These actions signal the authoritative Communist regime's attempt to establish its own system within the current West-led global governance paradigm, potentially shifting it to a China-led one in the future. This has prompted the West, especially the US, to initiate multiple confrontations with China, ranging from trade to information wars in recent times.

China perceives these sanctions as a threat to its sovereignty. Beijing dismisses such sanctions as based on lies, disinformation, disregard for facts, and distortions. Consequently, China uses these sanctions to tighten its policing and surveillance tactics, particularly in controlling the Uighur Muslims.

For the Uighurs, changing the status quo is an uphill task. The only plausible solution lies in generating global awareness through the efforts of human rights agencies, rights activists, the UN and its special organs, and concerned nations, shedding light on the atrocities committed against the Uighurs and other small Muslim groups in the Xinjiang Uighur Autonomous Region (XUAR).

China must adhere to all international norms, allowing UN agencies to investigate the atrocities against the Uighurs. Beijing should not forget that it is an integral part of the international system and community.

Its scant regard for international norms, coupled with attempts to impose an authoritarian system over its people and allies, is disturbing.

This approach is not how China can counter the US and other emerging powers. President Xi must first set his own house in order before pointing fingers at others.

Denying basic freedoms to the Uighurs and other Muslim minority groups is unacceptable. They are Chinese people and deserve the same rights as other Chinese citizens.

Their religion should not be treated as a barrier to enjoying the universal human rights enshrined in the UN Human Rights Charter. While it is crucial to contain radical and separatist tendencies among the Uighurs, punishing the entire Uighur and Muslim groups collectively is not the solution.

Vicious circle of Chinese propaganda: Will 'emperor' Xi remember what happened to his father?

06 January 2024, FirstPost

Since years, China has entered in a vicious circle. To hide its shortcomings, Beijing plays more and more on two issues: Monitoring the Internet and social media within the country, and increasing its propaganda inside and outside the Middle Kingdom. Remember June 2020, after the Galwan incident, Beijing first announced that the Chinese Army had not suffered any casualty (it was later revised to four soldiers killed), while it was known that at least 40 to 45 Chinese soldiers had died during the battle with the Indian troops.

Of course, no one ever mentioned that it was Xi Jinping's birthday, but the propaganda took over: Qi Fabao, a regiment commander who was wounded during the confrontation, was decorated for his 'bravery', became a national hero and a torch bearer at the 2022 Beijing Winter Olympics; later, he even received a double promotion in the Xinjiang Military District. The high pitched propaganda for the new 'hero' helped hide the real number of casualties.

Will Hong Kong's National Security Law safeguard or harm its citizens?

06 January 2024, East Asia Forum

In October 2023, Hong Kong Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu announced that the government would table its own local national security legislation, with the China-imposed National Security Law (NSL) remaining in effect during the process.

The local legislation aims to fulfil Article 23 of the Basic Law, which guarantees the 'one country, two systems' framework by prohibiting acts that, in the government's eyes, threaten the regime security of the Central People's Government. The legislation allows the government to criminalise activities that have been accepted in Hong Kong for long, such as building ties between local and foreign political organisations or bodies, which might undermine the Central People's Government. Since Hong Kong's sovereignty transfer to China in 1997, the government has not succeeded in enacting a law that fulfils Article 23's requirements. The first attempt at such legislation occurred in 2002 but ended with the government withdrawing the bill after more than 500,000 citizens protested against it.

In 2020, China imposed a national security law on Hong Kong following city-wide protests in 2019 that led to a landslide victory for pro-democracy parties in local elections. Between 2020 and 2023, the NSL's implementation has cracked down on most of the pro-democracy activists and organisations. The Hong Kong government has weaponised the courts to detain more than 100 leading opposition figures without trial.

The NSL covers four offences – secession, subversion, acts of terrorism and colluding with foreign forces. The offences of secession and subversion overlap with the seven offences outlined in Article 23 of the Basic Law. The local government can potentially address the other five crimes set out in Article 23 – treason, sedition, theft of state secrets, prohibition of foreign political organisations from conducting political activities in Hong Kong and prohibition of local political groups from establishing ties with foreign political organisations or bodies – in the new legislation.

Since the NSL was imposed, local authorities have revived the colonial-era sedition law of the Crimes Ordinance to arrest activists and journalists. There are also pre-existing laws related to offences of treason and theft of state secrets in Hong Kong.

It is very likely that the Article 23 legislation will aim to reorganise and expand pre-existing criminal offences under the umbrella of the local national security legislation. The government could extend the sentences for existing offences like sedition and broaden their applicability to enhance their social and political control.

Another possible reason for the eagerness of the local government to push for the legislation is to align with the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) 'safeguarding national security' policy agenda in the mainland. As the CCP is eager to incorporate an anti-espionage campaign into the 'safeguarding national security' framework, Hong Kong government officials have also repeatedly stressed their intention to incorporate anti-spy measures into the Article 23 legislation.

Religious organisations could be the foremost group affected by the new law. Article 23 of the Basic Law does not clearly define offences related to establishing ties between local political groups and foreign political organisations. There is ambiguity in the meaning of 'political groups' and how the Hong Kong government interprets it.

In 2002, when the government introduced the legislative bill of Article 23, religious groups, particularly the Catholic Church and its former bishop of Hong Kong Cardinal Joseph Zen Ze-kiun, raised concerns on whether their ties with the Vatican would constitute an offence. There was apprehension that the Church would be forced to cut ties with the Vatican – like in the mainland – resulting in a loss of their freedom to worship and to have succeeding bishops appointed by the Holy See.

The government's response in 2002 frightened the religious clergy and believers, pushing them to become core supporters of the anti-Article 23 movement. If the new legislation replicates the vague terms such as 'political groups' and 'establishing ties with foreign political organisations or bodies' found in the Basic Law, religious organisations are inevitably at risk.

The Chinese authorities have prosecuted underground Catholic prelates in the mainland loyal to the Vatican to implement the policy agenda of 'sinicisation of religion'. Given the Chinese government's hostile stance towards foreign religious groups, the Hong Kong government has the incentive to tighten religious freedom to please Beijing.

Global corporations would also be affected by the new legislation. The recent conviction and lengthy jail sentence of a Japanese national on espionage charges shows how overseas companies in the mainland are vulnerable to national security imperatives. The Hong Kong government's commitment to incorporating anti-espionage offences in the new bill may prompt foreign businesses to draw parallels with the mainland's history of targeting foreign business groups.

The Hong Kong government has employed many techniques in the NSL to restrict the ability of independent courts to handle national security cases. The presiding judges in such cases are handpicked by the Chief Executive. Jury trials have been eliminated and pre-trial deprivation of liberty has become a norm. The criminal defence counsel is assigned by the government instead of being the choice of the defendants. Following legislation enacted pursuant to an 'interpretation' by Beijing of Hong Kong's constitution, overseas lawyers have almost no chance to represent their clients in national security trials in Hong Kong.

The degradation of judicial independence in Hong Kong has already incentivised many global investors to move their offices elsewhere, like Singapore. The new national security legislation might only further drive international business groups away from recognising Hong Kong as a low-risk hub for investment.

China's Election Interference in Taiwan Explained

04 January 2024, NewsWeek

As Taiwan prepares for its eighth presidential election since democratization, the island is facing increasingly varied and sophisticated attempts by China to influence the outcome of the contest.

The poll on January 13 will determine who becomes only the fifth directly elected president of the nation of 23 million people since 1996.

Voters will also have a say in which party controls the legislature, shaping the course of the island's two most important relationships: China, which has framed the contest as a choice between peace and war, and the United States, Taiwan's largest security provider and advocate on the world stage.

Joseph Wu, Taiwan's foreign minister, urged international vigilance against Beijing's efforts to interfere in its electoral process. In an interview with The Economist published Wednesday, Wu said Taiwan was on the front line of Chinese authoritarian expansionism.

The following are both conventional and innovative ways China has sought to sway Taiwanese public opinion in the current election cycle.

Economic Warfare

Weaponizing two-way trade across the Taiwan Strait has been one of China's favorite tactics to squeeze Taiwan in recent years.

On December 15, China's Commerce Ministry listed more than 2,000 "trade barriers" it said the Taiwanese government had placed on Chinese products. The ministry has hinted at retaliation, fueling suspicion Beijing was waiting for the right moment to hurt Taipei's ruling Democratic Progressive Party among its traditional support base in the island's agricultural heartland ahead of the elections.

On December 27, Beijing said it would enact trade sanctions if the DPP continued to support "Taiwan independence," over which China's leaders have previously said they would go to war. President Tsai Ing-wen, first elected in 2016, has maintained that Taiwan is already a sovereign country, ruling out a declaration of de jure independence.

In 2021, China began to introduce a series of bans on Taiwanese agricultural products due to the alleged discovery of pests or harmful chemicals. Pineapples, sugar apples and groupers were among the banned produce, although it resumed shipments of the latter two in 2023.

In August last year, China suspended imports of Taiwan-grown mangoes, again citing pests. It was a political move, coming days after Taiwan's Vice President Lai Ching-te—now the presidential front runner—made brief stops in New York and San Francisco.

China claimed the transits violated the U.S.'s "one China" policy, under which Washington and Taipei maintain no formal diplomatic relations. The White House disagreed.

Military intimidation

In his resolute New Year's Eve address, Chinese leader Xi Jinping declared that Taiwan, which Beijing views as part of China's territory—will "surely be unified" with the mainland.

Since 2020, the Chinese People's Liberation Army has conducted several high-profile exercises near the island, simulating an amphibious invasion of Taiwan and a future blockade.

The superpower has also sent numerous warplanes and warships across the median line of the Taiwan Strait and into Taiwan's surrounding airspace, in near-daily maneuvers analysts believe amount to a form of psychological warfare.

Beijing "seeks to erode the confidence of the Taiwanese people in their ability to defend their way of life," Bonnie Glaser, managing director of the Indo-Pacific Program at the German Marshall Fund of the United States, previously told Newsweek.

Perks in China

Prosecutors in Taiwan are cracking down on local officials suspected of accepting bribes in the form of paid visits to China, typically involving all-expenses-paid guided tours, accommodation and meals—offered in exchange for their support for pro-Beijing policies at home.

Taiwanese media reported last month that at least eight local officials in the central city of Taichung had been detained and their phones and other evidence seized. Authorities said accepting China's "hospitality" violated the Anti-Infiltration Act of 2019, introduced to "prevent external forces from infiltrating Taiwan's democracy."

In addition, Taiwanese authorities have questioned than more than three dozen neighborhood chiefs about suspected paid trips offered to them and their families ahead of the elections.

Pressure on Expats

Taiwanese expatriates living in China are believed to be under pressure to support the main opposition Kuomintang party, which is traditionally viewed as being on friendlier terms with the Chinese government than is the ruling DPP.

A Taiwanese businessman living in China allegedly asked other businesspeople from Taiwan to each donate a minimum of $330 to the KMT, according to a report on Monday by the Taipei Times newspaper. Posting in a private social media chat group, the businessman is said to have instructed individual donors to provide their names and other personal information, raising concerns that they might be subject to reprisal if they chose not to give money to China's preferred party.

"It is Beijing's way of saying: 'If you want to do business in China, you have to donate to the KMT and vote for the KMT,'" the report cited one DPP legislator as saying.

An association representing Taiwanese business groups in China has denied the allegations.

Digital Influence

"Taiwanese society has become an important experimental field for China's influence operations," Wang Chan-Hsi, an associate researcher at Taiwan's top military think tank, the Institute for National Defense and Security Research, told Newsweek.

The disruption in people-to-people exchanges caused by COVID-19 pandemic led Beijing to hone digital means of infiltrating Taiwanese society, combining them with traditional methods and united front work.

In addition, Russia's information operations following its invasion of Ukraine in 2022 also bolstered China's understanding cognitive warfare, Wang said. In August that year, Taiwan created an information policy-making Ministry of Digital Affairs to regulate cybersecurity.

Among the concerning trends is the rise of deepfakes, images in which a person's appearance or words have been digitally altered with the aid of artificial intelligence and machine learning.

The technology—now more accessible than ever through open-source software—has opened up another front in election interference, serving the dual purpose of harming the image of China's political opponents in Taiwan while consuming the finite resources of local law enforcement, Wang said. In August, the minor opposition Taiwan People's Party filed a report with the island's Investigation Bureau over an allegedly altered "crude and egregious" audio recording of party founder and presidential nominee Ko Wen-je, who was purportedly criticizing Lai's controversial U.S. layovers.

On Wednesday, DPP lawmaker Lo Chih-cheng said he had been the victim of deepfake pornography that was making the rounds online.

Social Media Disinformation

China's influence operations are increasingly capitalizing on the algorithms of social media platforms like YouTube, Facebook and TikTok to disseminate a plethora of short videos filled with messaging that favors the Chinese Communist Party, according to Wang of INDSR.

This content is fine-tuned to specific demographics, such as older voters who, according to Princeton University researchers, are more susceptible to disinformation, as well as younger viewers whose political identity has not yet solidified.

In addition, Chinese agents use online platforms to give financial backing to collaborators in Taiwan and to encourage internet celebrities to peddle pro-China narratives in exchange for cash, Wang said. These hard-to-trace money flows are more difficult for the Taiwanese government to counter.

Tim Niven, research lead for the Taipei-based NGO Doublethink Lab, told Newsweek that the influence operations targeting Taiwan were trending more toward "amplifying local collaborators and extreme pro-China voices."

Attacks and other forms of propaganda that clearly originate in China were "less effective and carry the risk of attribution," he said.

In one example last February, fake quotes attributed to U.S. President Joe Biden, who was purportedly plotting the "destruction of Taiwan," were picked up by a pro-Beijing Taiwanese influencer and former KMT legislator, who shared it on Facebook.

The false statement proceeded to go viral on Chinese media before being "laundered" by media companies in Taiwan, Niven said, in a classic example of a disinformation loop.

The remaining days before the election could witness "more dramatic cases," he said. "The closer these things happen to election day, the more effective they are likely to be, and the less time government and civil society have to investigate and respond."

Last month, social media analytics firm Graphika said it had uncovered a large-scale, coordinated effort to manipulate political debate online ahead of Taiwan's elections.

Its investigation identified more than 800 "inauthentic" Facebook profiles and 13 Facebook pages sharing content framed to support the opposition KMT. Graphika acknowledged, however, that it was unable to pinpoint the source.

Two key military appointments from China's naval ranks reflects Xi's territorial ambitions, analysts say

02 January 2024, CNN World

When Xi Jinping named Adm. Dong Jun as China's defense minister last week, it marked the first time a naval officer has been elevated to that position, and analysts say it gives a clear indication of the Chinese leader's priorities – Taiwan tops among them.

Dong's experience, both as head of the People's Liberation Army Navy (PLAN) as well as operational assignments in the Chinese military's Eastern and Southern theater commands, gives him an "unprecedented background" in the defense minister position, according to a report from the China Maritime Studies Institute (CMSI) at the US Naval War College in Rhode Island.

His resumé "reflects serious joint and naval focus under Xi with growing potential applications to disputed sovereignty claims in the East and South China Seas – none more important than Taiwan," CMSI analysts Andrew Erickson and Christopher Sharman wrote in their report.

Carl Schuster, a former director of operations at the US Pacific Command's Joint Intelligence Center, said Dong "has international, joint and extensive naval experience in the two theaters that have been in the forefront of leader Xi Jinping's most aggressive assertions of Chinese territorial claims."

Xi, who has made taking control of Taiwan a cornerstone of his broader goal to "rejuvenate" China to a place of power and stature globally, said last month that the "reunification" of Taiwan with China is "inevitable."

China's Communist Party claims Taiwan as its own territory, despite never having controlled it. Chinese officials say they aim for peaceful "reunification" but have not ruled out using force to take control of the island.

China's military has ramped up diplomatic, economic and military pressure on Taiwan under Xi.

Chinese jets now frequently cross into Taiwan's air defense identification zone as well as over the unofficial, but until recently largely adhered to, "median line" that runs down the Taiwan Strait.

Crossings of the median line by Chinese warships have also become much more frequent.

Beijing is engaged in other sovereignty disputes, too, with Japan over the Senkaku Islands – which China calls the Diaoyus – in the East China Sea and with a handful of governments over contested reefs, shoals and islands in the South China Sea, almost all of which Beijing claims as its territory.

Though the defense minister position in China is a largely ceremonial role, serving as the public face of military diplomacy with other countries, Erickson and Sharman said Dong, with his experience, will make "a potent interlocutor with foreign counterparts."

Possible Asian flashpoints

Tensions are heating up around the region, and diplomacy is becoming ever more vital amid hardening stances and unpredictable events.

A presidential election in Taiwan this month could have huge ramifications on the island's relations with China – and tensions across the Taiwan Strait.

In the South China Sea, the China Coast Guard has been in more aggressive encounters with Philippine vessels trying to resupply a Philippine military outpost on disputed Second Thomas Shoal.

And in the Senkaku chain, which is controlled by Japan but claimed by China, more than 100 China Coast Guard and other vessels are entering Japan's contiguous zone around the islands monthly, according to statistics provided by Japan's Foreign Ministry in December.

Meanwhile late last year, Beijing reopened a key military communication line with Washington that had gone dormant after the visit of then-US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi to Taiwan in 2022.

As both the Philippines and Japan are US mutual defense treaty allies – and as Washington is obligated to support Taiwan's self-defense – Dong's abilities to speak with US counterparts to avoid any military escalation in all three areas could be vital to peace.

But if hostilities did break out, Dong could be an important adviser to commander-in-chief Xi, the analysts said.

"Admiral Dong, one of the PLA's most experienced joint commanders, has deep expertise at the operational level of war," Erickson and Sharman wrote.

Schuster notes Dong's years of experience in the Southern Theater Command, encompassing the South China Sea, including as deputy commander of all PLA forces in the Southern Theater and commander of the PLA Navy units there.

He was also deputy commander of the East Sea Fleet, which operates in the East China Sea and the Taiwan Strait, Schuster said.

That shows Dong embodies "Xi's priority on experiences that may be critical to his plans for the South China Sea and Taiwan," Schuster said.

And it wasn't just Dong who Xi appointed last week that points to the Chinese leader's priorities, the analysts said.

A focus on submarines

Days before Xi elevated Dong to defense minister, he appointed Adm. Hu Zhongming as overall commander of the PLA Navy.

Hu, a career submarine officer with operational and command experience in the South China Sea, is considered by analysts to be a sensible choice for the role.

Submarines are one key area where the PLA Navy is widely regarded to be behind its potential adversary the US Navy.

In general, Chinese submarines are considered to be louder and easier to track than their American counterparts.

"The US still dominates war under the seas," Paul Dibb, an emeritus professor of strategic studies at the Australian National University, wrote on the website of the Australian Strategic Policy Institute in December.

"For example, China's strategic nuclear submarines (SSBNs) do not provide Beijing with an assured nuclear second-strike force because they are very vulnerable to US attack submarines (SSNs)," he wrote.

China is also considered to be behind the US in anti-submarine warfare, but has been investing in improvements in recent years, according to Schuster. Hu would seem to be the perfect person to make improvements to the PLA's submarine forces, said Alessio Patalano, professor of war and strategy at King's College in London.

"As a submariner with considerable experience in managing risks and improving training, Admiral Hu will make sure that China's most important strategic capability is brought up to the highest standards,” Patalano said.

Hu’s command experience includes two instances in which he is credited with averting what could have been catastrophic events, which led him to develop training procedures designed to prevent repeat occurrences, according to reports in state-run Chinese media.

The analysts highlighted Hu’s experience as a theater commander, supervising PLA forces over broad regions.

“Multi-fleet experience gives Admiral Hu unique insights into each fleet’s strengths and weaknesses that will enable him to provide organizational and training improvements to ensure PLAN readiness, as well as to offer uniquely tailored guidance for PLAN operational and tactical improvements,” Sharman and Erickson wrote.

Favoring the navy

While Xi filled two positions within China’s military hierarchy, those appointments came as nine military figures were removed from their positions in the National People’s Congress, China’s rubber stamp legislature – a rare move that signaled a wider purge in the PLA.

And the analysts pointed out that before Dong’s appointment, the defense minister position had been vacant for two months, since Li Shangfu was removed from the role without explanation following an extended absence from public view.

Xi has been on a decade-long drive to crackdown on corruption in China’s military ranks so the dismissal of the nine military figures, in particular, is fueling speculation about their potential alleged involvement in corruption.

No charges have been announced, but the affiliations of the nine dismissed officials gives some clues into what might be happening in China.

Only one of the nine was from the navy. Most were from the PLA Rocket Force, which is responsible for the China’s land-based nuclear and conventional missiles.

In the tightly controlled hierarchy of the Chinese Communist Party, the signposting is clear, Patalano said.

“The appointment of two naval officers at these key posts, especially defense minister, strongly suggests two things: the navy is regarded as the most loyal service to Xi; and it’s also the one that combines technical and professional knowledge with the aims of keeping China projecting power in its immediate periphery.”